I was pleased to meet Capt. W. B. Grey, of Pasco, a member of the constitutional convention—and a working member, too—who has a pretty clear idea of what the people want and what is best for them. The Christians kicked against him somewhat, but he was elected nevertheless. It was bruited over his district that he was an Infidel. He received letters and telegrams from all quarters. He answered without fear or favor: "Keep the Church and State forever separate," and "I am willing to grant to every other man the same privileges I ask for myself." On that platform of genuine democracy he was chosen to the convention. It is known that nobody can buy him, and that he will stand for justice right through. I also met Comegys, of Eastern Washington, brother of our Comegys of Snohomish, who has made a brilliant fight during the convention for a purely secular government.

Judge Bush, of Seattle, is here, and he watches the convention with judicial clearness, and his valuable reports are in FREETHOUGHT. All should read them. Macdonald of Ellensburg and Jones of Port Townsend I have also been made acquainted with. I attended one session of the convention. There is plenty of talk, but the work moves on. There are able men in the convention. They have voted out "God" and put "the Supreme Ruler" into the preamble. Grey says that means a twenty-dollar gold piece, and I guess he is about right. I had rather trust in the gold piece any time than in the God if I was hungry or naked.

Just as I was leaving on the boat whom should I meet but D. W. Smith, of Port Townsend? It was a glad surprise. We could only shake hands, for he came on the same boat by which I went, but it does one a world of good to meet so open-hearted a comrade, who never shirks a soldier's duty.

The boat plunges into the sound. The smoke spreads over, and only faint luminous spaces are discovered on either side. The woods are like a delicate fringe—the mountains beyond are scarcely seen. The bubbles roll along the polished steel-blue surface of the waters.

We reach Tacoma in the late afternoon: a busy city, with mighty prospects, uneven streets, massive dwellings, shanties almost ready to tumble down, and the et ceteras of frontier civilization. It is struggling for empire and will win many a jewel, but I doubt if any city of the sound will wear the full-orbed tiara. The trade and manufacturing will be distributed. There will be several flourishing cities, but I doubt if there is one great city like San Francisco or New York. If there is it is impossible at present to decide whether it will be Tacoma, Seattle, Port Townsend, Port Angeles, Olympia, or Grey's Harbor. All of these places have brilliant prospects of future growth, and like the "pigs in clover," I shouldn't wonder if every one of them got there.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Tacoma, August 13.

THE "SABBATARIANS."

The Sunday-law bigots have had their convention in San Francisco, and Field Secretary Crafts has, presumably, presented the best arguments at his command in favor of a law compelling the people of this state to observe Sunday as a pleasureless holiday. While disclaiming any intention of advocating a union between church and state, Mr. Crafts has not been wholly able to conceal that this is his real object, and other speakers have made no attempt at such concealment. The Rev. Mr. Wheeler, of Sacramento, was candid enough to say that the church asked for Sunday laws in order to support Christianity by the arm of the state. "When you destroy the Sabbath," he said, "you have overthrown the grand religion on which the government rests." Such was the burden of the arguments of a majority of the speakers. But Dr. Wheeler went still further. He claimed that whereas an eminent judge had decided that Stephen Girard, by ignoring the Christian religion, disqualified his trustees from acting, so the legislators of California should be held incompetent and disqualified for having neglected to make provision for sustaining the religion of their fathers!

Thus the cloven hoof shows through the thin disguise of a plea for "Sunday rest for workingmen," in spite of all Mr. Crafts's denials that it is there. He may himself be able to conduct the crusade on a "secular" basis, but he cannot make the other and less cool-headed fanatics do anything of the kind. He may argue that a Sunday law would be perfectly constitutional, but they do not know or care whether it is constitutional or not. In the minds of these gentlemen, not the constitution, but what they are pleased to term the word of God, is the fundamental law of the land. Some of them even mistake their own conscience for other people's, as in the case of the speaker at this convention who declared that every man should be prohibited from indulging in ordinary worldly pursuits on Sunday in order that he may spend the day according to the dictates of his own conscience. This is exactly like putting a man in jail for the purpose of guarding against interference with his liberty to go where he chooses.

One of Mr. Crafts's own arguments is about as bad. He declared that in the government employ the religious man is discriminated against, because the government requires Sunday labor, and the religious man's conscience will not permit him to work on that day, and he therefore cannot enter the service. Now, when this case is looked at as it really is, it will be seen that the discrimination is from the other side. The government does not demand that the employee shall observe Sunday; it is the employee who demands that the government shall observe that day, and because the government declines to obey the employee, the latter's "conscience" forbids him to remain in the public service. The government respects the rights of conscience and accepts his resignation, but the man has not been discriminated against.

It is scarcely to be wondered at that these sabbatarians do not offer some good and valid reasons why Sunday should be a day of enforced idleness, because there are no such reasons. There are perhaps good reasons why people should rest one day in seven, as there are good reasons why they should work the other six; but a law enforcing six days of work would be no more absurd than a law enforcing one day of idleness. These bigots overlook the difference between a custom and a law. The custom of Sunday observance prevails here among those who wish to keep the day, and such persons need no law to compel them to so observe it. Others have not that custom, and to enforce it upon them by law would be as unjust as to compel the pious to work.

Californians say to the Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts: "Go home. You are wasting our time and your own. You cannot palm off a church movement upon us as a merely secular arrangement intended for our good. The churches of our city do not open their doors to secularists as they have opened them to you. If this is a secular movement, hire a hall, call a mass meeting; give us your argument unmixed with religious incantations called prayers, and musical insanities called hymns. Separate the civil from the religious in your propaganda, and then the simplest of us may believe that you do not intend to mix the civil and the religious by means of your Sunday laws. Until you do this you will not deceive any except those who pay the preachers to do their thinking for them."

We do not think that the Sabbath Union can obtain as many signatures to the petition in favor of a Sunday law as have already been obtained to the protest against such a law.

A BAD, BAD BUSINESS.

The lamentable Terry shooting affair promises to become as sensational through the courts as it has through its own inherent tragic nature. The circumstances of the case may be briefly stated. Judge Field, while on his circuit as associate justice of the United States Supreme Court, was publicly slapped in the face by ex-Judge Terry. Thereupon Judge Field's body-guard, Deputy Marshal Neagle, shot Terry dead.

Terry was a man whose conduct on the bench is spoken of as above reproach; but as a private citizen he had the reputation of a bully and a desperado. Judge Field's record is nearly the reverse of Terry's. In the capacity of private citizen he is blameless, while his judicial record is stained with charges of unfairness and venality. As providence is said to be on the side of the largest battalions, so justice, as administered by Field, has, it is alleged, almost invariably been found on the side of the heaviest purse. He was called upon to decide between Sarah Althea Hill and the heirs of one Sharon, with whom the woman had lived as wife or mistress. Terry pleaded the cause of Sarah Althea, and became sufficiently interested in his client to make her his wife, but she lost her case through Field's decision. She became violent while in court, and charged Field with bribetaking. Field ordered her removed, whereupon Terry interfered, and husband and wife were jailed for contempt of court.

Terry, it is said, vowed vengeance on the judge, but Field, instead of putting Terry under bonds to keep the peace, provided himself with a body-guard, and pursued his calling as before. On Wednesday morning, August 14, the two men met in the railroad eating-room at Lathrop, in San Joaquin county, with the deadly results known to the reading public for the past ten days. As Terry died like a dog, so, as a victim, he was buried with less honor than is often bestowed upon murderers. The Catholic church, of which he, as well as his wife, had been a communicant, refused his body its funeral mummeries, and those with whom he had associated upon the bench and at the bar declined to recognize him as one of them by adjourning court. Such as Terry may have been, he was a self-made man. In stature he was almost a giant, of herculean strength, and fearless as a lion. But his was a case of arrested development. He never became civilized, and seemed not to be able to learn that the wager of battle has been superseded by less violent, even if less satisfactory, forms of adjudication.

Mrs. Terry now regards herself as the natural avenger of what she calls her husband's murder. She at once caused the arrest of Judge Field, and the formality of apprehending and bailing him has been gone through with. Neagle, the marshal, is in jail, faring better, perhaps, than he ever did before. Mrs. Terry, it is said, endeavored to secure the services of Col. R. G. Ingersoll and Benjamin F. Butler as her counsel, but failed. Judge Maguire, however, has taken the case in hand in association with District Attorney White, of San Joaquin county, who believes that as the killing was done within his jurisdiction, the San Joaquin courts should conduct the investigation and prosecution. He had Neagle in jail at Stockton, but the prisoner was removed to San Francisco under federal authority, and now the first problem to be settled, according to Judge Maguire, is whether or not the United States Circuit Court has jurisdiction to release from custody, on habeas corpus, a prisoner held by a state sheriff under a warrant issued out of a state court of competent jurisdiction. This is a great question—the question of state sovereignty—and if it was the object of the authorities to give the lawyers and jurists something to wrangle over until public interest in the matter is exhausted, they have taken the right course to effect that result. At present Neagle, if tried, would be acquitted, but there may be a reversion of public sentiment by the time his case gets before a jury, sufficient to send him to the penitentiary for life.

Supposing the memory should go back to the time when Sarah Althea Hill became the mistress of Sharon with the understanding that she should ultimately be recognized as his wife. Supposing that Sharon's heirs, in their greed for the dead man's gold, bribed the bench and defeated justice. Supposing we add to these features of the case the assault upon Field and the killing of Terry—it is bad enough already. But supposing that Neagle is convicted of homicide. Supposing the widow of Terry should take vengeance into her own hands, and kill Judge Field as his henchman killed Judge Terry. And supposing, as a final act in the tragedy, Mrs. Terry should expiate the crime upon the gallows. In consideration of all that has happened and all that may happen, there would be many people in the world ready to believe that the whole miserable business had begun and ended with acts of injustice to a woman.

H. L. GREEN announces that the Freethinkers' Magazine for September will be a Bruno number. It will contain a page of the Bruno monument, George Jacob Holyoake will furnish an original article on "The Murder of a Philosopher;" T. B. Wakeman one on "Giordano Bruno in the Past, Present, and Future;" there will be an original poem on Bruno, by Lydia R. Chase; a sketch of the life of Bruno, by Professor Thomas Davidson; also an article on Bruno, by Karl Blind, and much other valuable and interesting matter. Mr. Green will send us a few copies of this number to be sold at twenty cents each.

"Looking Backward," a socialistic romance which has been termed the "Uncle Tom's Cabin of Industrial Slavery," by Edward Bellamy. Price, 50 cents.

We hope the friends of this paper will not forget its necessities during the present rather dull times. Can they not get us up clubs of subscribers—two for $3; three for $4, or four for $5? If not clubs, can not each send us one more subscriber at least?

We hope, too, that all whose subscriptions have expired will renew at once.

THE Youth's Companion, in an article on "Patrick Henry's Death," says:

"Patrick Henry wrote out an elaborate answer to Paine's 'Age of Reason,' but being impressed by the replies to Paine then appearing in England, he directed his wife, shortly before his death, to destroy the manuscript, which she did."

It is related that Benjamin Franklin read the manuscript of Paine's "Age of Reason," and advised the author against publishing it, using the famous warning, "Don't unchain the tiger." Franklin died in 1790, and the "Age of Reason" was not written until 1793, so that Franklin's advice must have come in the form of a spirit communication, but it is nevertheless regarded by the church as good enough material for Sunday-school history. There is no such anachronism in the way of Patrick Henry writing a reply to Paine, but whether he did or not remains an open question. Some statements that we see in religious prints are historical facts, and others are theological fakes.

MR. E. M. MACDONALD, the Editor of the Truth Seeker, has been confined at home and disabled from editorial management, by typhoid fever, for some two weeks, and may continue so awhile longer.

So reads a notice at the head of the editorial columns of the Truth Seeker of August 17. We have information four days later in the form of a telegram which reads:

"Gene is better. Out to-day. A. C. M."

By the time this is before our readers the editor of the Truth Seeker will doubtless be back at his desk. Meanwhile the philosophical articles by Mr. W. L. Colby on "The Elimination of Inconstant Factors" and kindred subjects will engage the public mind.

MR. BRADLAUGH's paper, the National Reformer, says:

"Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, who by sheer hard work is keeping Colorado and the far West fairly alive on Freethought questions, sends us his new pamphlet on 'The Glory of Infidelity.' Mr. Putnam writes vigorously, and is apparently doing some very good propagandist work."

Unfortunately, Mr. Putnam has not been able to penetrate so far into the interior as Colorado this year, but we understand that Mr. W. F. Jamieson is keeping that state fairly alive. The majority of the speakers are in the West now, and New Jersey and the far East are somewhat neglected.

SINGLETON W. DAVIS, the author of a pamphlet on the "Scientific Dispensation of a New Religion," has started a little paper at San Diego called the Silver Gate. It discusses economic problems and temperance, and advertises Mr. Davis's job printing office. In his initial number the editor comes out boldly in favor of a law prohibiting smoking on the streets. This will be likely to get him into trouble with Anarchist Danielewicz of the Beacon.

WANAMAKER apparently has no influence over Postmaster Van Cott of New York, as a special Sunday delivery has just been established in that city, and Mr. Van Cott declares that it will be continued.

L. C. GEERTSON, of Salmon City, Idaho, writes that he never saw harder times in Lemhi county than at present; but he nevertheless sends $10 as a donation to FREETHOUGHT, together with his own renewal and a new subscriber. We thank Brother Geertson for his example, which shows that enthusiasm for a good cause may always rise superior to commercial depression.

We hope that the readers of FREETHOUGHT are becoming acquainted with Mr. C. F. Burgman, our constant advertiser. He is a thorough Liberal and a conscientious merchant. Arrayed in one of Mr. Burgman's glove-fitting suits, the modest man may for a time forget the remark of the sage that beneath his clothes he is naked.

B. F. UNDERWOOD is to give a course of lectures at Snohomish, W. T., commencing September 4. He will soon after start for California, to lecture in San Francisco, Oakland, Sacramento, and other places in this state.

THE executive of the Canadian Secular Union have fixed upon Saturday and Sunday, September 14 and 15, for a Convention of Secularists and Freethinkers in Canada. The Convention will be held at Toronto.

We acknowledge the receipt, from Mrs. K. Parker, Anaheim, of $1 for the expenses of the next Convention of the California State Liberal Union.

HORACE SEAVER, editor of the Boston Investigator, died last Wednesday afternoon, aged 78. Ingersoll will pronounce a eulogy at Paine Hall on Sunday.

MR. HOWE'S LECTURE.

Mr. W. O. Howe, of Oakland, spoke before the San Francisco Freethought Society last Sunday evening on "Our Common Foe." There were, he said, two divisions of his subject, one devoted to demonstrating the nature of our common foe, and the other to demonstrating the remedy. It would be impossible to crowd both into an hour's lecture, and he would therefore give the first half now and the second half at some future time. "Our Common Foe," as conceived by Mr. Howe, turned out to be usury, or interest, which he described as a subtle monster that like a thousand-edged sword reaches out its octopus arms and overshadows the environments of mankind. Mr. Howe demonstrated by mathematical calculations that in one hundred and four years the usurers would own the earth, and hold a three-trillion-dollar mortgage on posterity. The discourse lasted an hour and thirty minutes, and at its close Usurer Schou passed the hat to slow music by Professor Joran.

Chairman Lemme thanked the lecturer on behalf of the audience, and the audience on behalf of the treasurer, and announced that the floor was open for speeches of ten minutes each.

Mr. Curtis responded, and, in opening his remarks, chid the lecturer for the great length of time he had occupied in presenting only one phase of his subject. Mr. Curtis feared that if it took as long to state the remedy as it had taken to make the diagnosis the patient would die before the medicine was ready. The speaker argued that interest, being paid in every direction and charged by all, balanced and neutralized itself. He wished the lecturer the best success, but warned him that if he would become popular he must condense.

Mr. Knight criticised the mathematical calculations of Mr. Howe as the reductio ad absurdum. Interest could not accumulate above the sum total of values. There were usurers in the time of Christ, and a thousand dollars put at interest then, according to Mr. Howe's computation, would now amount to more than the entire wealth of the world. Undoubtedly some of those usurers had a thousand dollars out at interest, but no bad results seem to have been entailed on posterity from that cause. Mr.

Knight said he did not agree with Harry George, that progress brought poverty. There was never less poverty than now, never more comfort than is now enjoyed. The great foe of humanity was conservatism, a determination to stand still.

By invitation, Miss Ada Ballou addressed the audience. She did not complain about the length of time occupied by the speakers. She believed in giving men all the rope they wanted, and trusting to luck for good results. The women did not have much of a show in this world, notwithstanding they were the producers of the race. If they did not complain of the kind of usury they were subjected to, the men certainly ought not to murmur over their less serious troubles.

In confuting his critics Mr. Howe said that if he had had more time so that he could give all his address, the matter would have been made clearer. He had been thus minute because presenting the question to people who had not thought upon it. Mr. Howe would grant for the sake of argument that the world was improving, but we must not be satisfied with a little comfort and a little prosperity. So long as there are evils to fight, and improvements possible of attainment, there should be no rest for the reformer.

The next lecture is to be delivered by Hon. F. B. Perkins, whose subject is "Truth." Mr. Perkins informs me that his discourse will involve, also, some pointed observations about lies.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

Ex-Judge Terry, who was shot at Lathrop Aug. 14 by Deputy Marshal Neagle, was buried at Stockton on the 16th. The Catholic church refused its auspices; the courts declined to adjourn out of respect to the dead jurist, and there were more curiosity-seekers than friends at the funeral. Neagle will probably be tried in the United States courts, though an attempt is being made to get the case into the courts of the state. Public opinion generally justifies Neagle in the shooting, and his trial anywhere will be mere formality.—"Bill" Higgins, a political boss of San Francisco, died last Wednesday morning.—The various labor unions of the city will have a mass meeting Saturday night, Aug. 24, at Metropolitan Hall to protest against the decision lately rendered by Secretary Windom on the Chinese "tourist" question.—There was a $20,000 fire last Sunday among the wooden buildings at the corner of Fourth and Townsend streets.—The clergymen of Stockton have unanimously condemned the practice of holding funeral services on Sunday.—The case of most of the recalcitrant National Guard musicians has been finally settled by the imposition of a fine of $16 apiece. It is estimated that, taking into account their losses from lack of employment since the trouble, this brings the penalty up to more than $50 each.—The Rev. C. E. Schuyler, pastor of the Congregational church at Petaluma for several months past, has left that place under a cloud. He is charged with misappropriating church funds and with other offenses and was requested to resign, which he did.

The pugilist Sullivan has been sentenced to a year's imprisonment at hard labor in the Mississippi penitentiary.—There was no ball game at Cincinnati last Sunday, as the authorities threatened that if one were played they would break it up by arresting the president and all the players.—The Brown-Sequard "life elixir" is still being experimented with, in some cases attended by fatal results. The weight of testimony is in favor of the process as a tonic or stimulant.—Secretary Windom has written a letter to T. J. Barry of Boston in reply to an inquiry, in which he says that Chinese persons other than laborers may leave and re-enter the country without let or hindrance, provided they satisfy the officers of the fact of their not being laborers and of having lawfully resided in the United States.—Members of the Salvation Army at Helena, Mont., were placed in jail last week for violating a city ordinance forbidding the playing of music on the streets.—The original "Old Black Joe" died at Mount Holly, N. J., Aug. 15. His proper name was Joseph Queen. He was undoubtedly the oldest man in the state, being one hundred and twelve years old. He was a runaway slave and went to New Jersey in 1827.—The Rev. D. M. Helmick, a Methodist preacher of Neola, Iowa, is in jail charged with having shot down a young man named Carl Palmer without provocation or excuse. The shooting grew out of a feud engendered between Helmick and Palmer over a romantic attachment which the latter had formed with a young lady of the neighborhood.—The wife of Mike McDonald, the Chicago gambler, has eloped with the Rev. Mr. Moysant, her father confessor.

M. Damala, the husband of Sarah Bernhardt, died in Paris, Aug. 18, of cerebral congestion.—It is reported that an attempt was made recently to assassinate Dom Pedro, emperor of Brazil. As he was leaving the palace a man shot at but failed to hit him.—Japan had on July 28 the most destructive earthquake experienced for thirty-five years. Many persons crushed to death and vast quantities of property destroyed is the result.—Another great inundation of the Yellow river, China, has occurred, this time in Shantung, and though the details are meager, it is probable that the loss of life and property will be very great, the immense breach indicating that a wide territory has been flooded.—Boulanger is sentenced by the French Senate Court to be deported to some fortified place and imprisoned.

SUCCESSFUL CAMPAIGN IN COOS COUNTY.

DEAR FREETHOUGHT: We have again enjoyed one of Putnam's annual visits. I learn from friends at Marshfield that the lectures were well received. The audiences were large and appreciative, at the three lectures delivered there, and the excursion and picnic on North Coos River, as well as the lecture, were a great success.

Putnam's first lecture this year on the river (Coquille) was at Coquille City, thence he went to Randolph, Bandon, Myrtle Point, and Arago. It being harvest time I could not, as heretofore, accompany our friend on his tour.

At Coquille City the "Glory of Infidelity" was well received. The audience was fully as large as at former lectures. The Coquille Secular Union met after the lecture and elected H. H. Nichols, of Coquille City, secretary, I. M. Upton having resigned on account of press of other business. It being late the Union adjourned to meet at Arago on the 4th inst. at eleven o'clock.

The lecture at Arago on Saturday evening was well attended by an appreciative audience, and the young people, as well as some of the older ones, enjoyed themselves after the lecture by dancing until midnight. The greatest enthusiasm was reached on Sunday, the 4th inst., at Arago, it being the last lecture of the series under the auspices of the Coquille Secular Union. There was a picnic in the grove on the fair grounds. Roller-skating occurred at intervals during the day, and the Myrtle Point Brass Band discoursed some of its best selections. The Union met at the appointed time, there being about thirty members present, all of whom became members of the state organization. The Union ordered twenty copies of the "Glory of Infidelity" for distribution, and adjourned to meet at Myrtle Point on the day of Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel's lecture there.

There was a large attendance, quite a number coming from Myrtle Point, Norway, and Coquille City. The "American Republic" received hearty encores and lots of them during the afternoon.

The lecture at Myrtle Point on Friday evening was also well attended, and among the audience was the Rev. Dr. J. P. Easter, M.D., who announced that he would answer the lecturer in September. "He knew that Putnam would not be near enough to hear him then." Brother Easter, when present at a Liberal lecture, generally announces that he will answer it, and September is his favorite month. However, should some unforeseen circumstance occur so that he cannot fulfill his appointment, and September go by, then there is an indefinite postponement. Putnam suggested that he meet him on Sunday evening, the 4th, at Myrtle Point, the audience by vote having invited him (Putnam) to again lecture there, and he would divide time with Easter. Some one in the audience suggested an hour, another two hours, and yet another thought it best to give Easter all night. Easter was offered five dollars and all expenses paid if he would come, but when Sunday evening arrived Easter was conspicuous by his absence.

The announcement drew quite an audience, and I feel confident that a majority were disappointed; but the disappointment soon vanished after Putnam had started in on Moody and Sam Jones. Our campaign was a grand success, and we now look forward to Mrs. Krekel's visit.

CALL FOR THE OREGON CONVENTION.

By virtue of the authority vested in us by the Oregon State Secular Union, we hereby call the FIRST ANNUAL CONVENTION of said Union to meet in Portland, Oregon, at Masonic Hall, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, the 12th, 13th, and 14th days of October, 1889; the object being to secure the total separation of church and state.

The advocates of this measure in Washington Territory are invited to join their Oregon friends in this Convention.

Done at Portland, Oregon, this thirty-first day of July, 1889.

C. BEAL,
J. K. SEARS, A. F. NEUNERT, } Board of Directors.
LEE LAUGHLIN, L. AMES,

SECULAR WORK IN OREGON.

W. H. Breese, of Talent, Jackson county, is the fourth vice-president to report. His letter is full of inspiration. "Every tear you dry, every smile you cause, will bring you reward of the highest kind. Every obstruction you remove from the path of a struggling humanity will stamp you as one of humanity's saviors. And all this will hasten on the time of which Victor Hugo speaks, that 'in the twentieth century creeds will be dead, wars be dead, royalties be dead, but men will live.'"

Dr. Matteson, of Aumsville, is the fifth vice-president to write. His letter is full of philosophy and a life of experience. He understands the human mind and points out the obstacles to be overcome in our educational work. The doctor sends a fine list of names.

P. Britt, of Jacksonville, is the sixth vice-president heard from. When I opened his letter the first thing I saw was a postal order for five dollars, which I thought was a commission from Wanamaker as postmaster at Portland. Brother Britt's letter is good. He sends some names and says: "I am old and feeble. I take the greatest interest in the welfare of the Oregon State Secular Union and the success of the Convention. I firmly believe that if there is not something done to oppose priests and preachers they will soon put an end to our free institutions."

Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, of Kansas City, the celebrated dramatic orator, will deliver the opening address at our Convention on Saturday morning, October 12. She will make her home while here with Miss Mattie Blaisdell, at 363 Third street.

Through the columns of FREETHOUGHT I will assign homes for our speakers.

C. BEAL,
President Oregon State Secular Union.

ABERDEEN, OR., Aug. 12, 1889.

MY DEAR MR. BEAL: Your kind invitation to attend the Liberal Convention, Oct. 12, 13, and 14, was duly received, and I will say in reply that I shall certainly be with you on that occasion "if no preventing providence interferes." I am sure there is the material in Oregon and Washington to form one of the largest and grandest Liberal conventions ever held in any part of the whole country. I have been lecturing in Oregon for nearly two months with good success. In no state in the Union in which I have lectured is there a larger per cent. of Liberals than in Oregon. I have had pretty good audiences in almost all the places I have spoken, in spite of the fact that the people have been engaged in harvesting and threshing "from early morn till dewy eve."

We need organization. In no state is organization more practicable. It costs but little to build a Liberal hall in Oregon as lumber is very cheap. In many places there are Liberals who would cheerfully donate all the lumber necessary to build a hall, and others who would haul it, and in many places there are carpenters who would contribute a part of their time towards the construction of the building. It seems that all that is necessary is for some few to go ahead in the community, get up an interest, organize, build a hall, and then they are on their feet.

It seems to me that the convention you are getting up will go a great ways towards setting the ball in motion for secular work in this portion of the north west. We need organization. We need to have all the splendid Liberals of these two states attend the convention. And when I say this I mean the women as well as the men. We have a large number of grand, Liberal women in Oregon. I have not yet seen the heroines of Washington, but I have met with a large number of Liberal women in Oregon who are ready to take hold and work for the Secular Union. We hope these ladies will turn out in full force at the convention. Portland is a convenient place for thousands of people in Oregon and Washington, and if we do not have a large number present I shall be disappointed. But we expect a grand time there and therefore it is natural to expect that all our Liberal friends and their relations will be only too glad to be at this "feast of reason and flow of soul."

We shall not only set the Liberals to organizing, but we need to point out to them the need of supporting the Liberal journals, and especially must they see to it that FREETHOUGHT receives their full and generous support.

I can hardly imagine what a man can be thinking about who, calling himself a Liberal, does not support any of our Freethought papers. I meet not only Liberals, but I also "meet up with" a great many "half breeds"—persons who call themselves Liberals but do not subscribe to a paper, nor contribute toward the support of lecturers in the field. And the most lamentable feature in the whole business is to find good Liberal men leading such half breeds up to the Liberal lecturer and introducing them as Freethinkers! I am getting tired of that sort of Liberals.

I cannot share in C. B. Reynolds's notions respecting the "little self-sacrifice" of our lecturers at conventions. The fact is we lecturers have plenty of rough and tough work with small pay, and every thinking man knows the fact. We are doing a "little self-sacrifice" all the time, and cannot afford to attend conventions in a city and pay hotel bills. Besides it is not necessary. We have hosts of Liberals and a small support from them will bear the expenses of the speakers. Some people may dislike "begging" in our conventions. But the fact is some of these people who dislike begging are people who left the church because they were too stingy to pay their pew rents. They left the church and came out to call themselves Liberals, and now they are kicking and ready to leave the Liberal ranks because they are called on to pay the fiddler. Begging is the method of the past—and the successful method of the present in the church, in politics, and in all free assemblages. We shall have to stick to this old method until another and a practical method for supporting the speakers is devised.

I hope we shall all have occasion to rejoice in a large, harmonious, and successful convention. Here's my hand.

Yours fraternally,

W. S. BELL.

ON THE TRAIL.

To the Editors of Freethought:

After ten days' sojourn at Marshfield, I took the steamer "Comet" for Empire City, at the mouth of Coos bay. This is an old town, and many of the buildings are empty and in a dilapidated condition, but it has the finest location on the harbor for a town, as it is high and level, and very picturesque. Immediately west of the "city" lies the rippling, shining bay, perhaps a mile wide, then the long peninsula of sand, probably another mile in width, and then you are on the beach of old Pacific, where the breakers never cease to chase each other up and down the coast. The view from Empire, out onto the sea, is superlatively grand. Here is infinity enough without praying to a 7x9 God. Away here in this "sunset land" where solitude is almost supreme, for this country is very little settled as yet, is the place to study nature and forget the blood of the lamb. I stopped at the Arago hotel, a fine, large hotel owned by the mill company, but leased and run by Mrs. Moore with Mr. Briggs, the gentlemanly clerk and manager. The Arago is the largest and finest hotel of the three in the "city," and here they feed the hungry, and the weary are at rest. I gave six lectures in the fine courthouse to large audiences, although a second edition of Sam Jones (at least in style) was running a "distracted" meeting, and had been for the past two weeks. I went one evening to hear the "Rev. Gentleman." His text was "Do you love Christ?" He described the "overshadowing" business. I wish the thousands of readers of FREETHOUGHT could have heard Brother Jones's account of the birth of the young Savior, ah; of that star in the east, ah; of how Herod was out-Heroded by the King of kings, ah. Mr. Jones is a very ignorant man, and claims he was raked in from the slums of San Francisco by the Salvation Army folks. He is a young man, but filled with the "holy unction," as he called it, whatever that may be, to save souls. In a former letter I gave Brother Bell the cake for telling stories, but Bell is left in the shade by this young dominie. He would tell his anecdote with great sensational effect that would bring the house down, and then apply the moral by raving and charging like a madman, until every hair on your head would stand on its own particular end and you could easily imagine the smell of brimstone. His descriptive powers were evidently taxed to their utmost when he described Jesus carrying the cross up the steeps of Calvary, loaded down to the water's edge with that awful burden, ah, on that fearful day, ah, and when at last, ah, the top of the mountain was reached, ah, and the cross was laid on the ground, ah, and the God of the universe was stretched out on that awful cross, ah, and those terrible spikes were driven, ah, through that beautiful white but quivering flesh, ah, and the blood that was to save the world, ah, began to flow, sinner, for you and me, ah, and when those blood-thirsty Jews raised that cross with its precious burden of the world's redeemer and placed it in that awful hole prepared for it, ah, it struck the bottom of that hole with a dull thud, ah, the sun refused to shine, the earth trembled with convulsions, for lo! a god was to die, ah. I thought of the poem by Lara, "The God Horror."

Still lies the blight of that shadow's night
O'er the fairest fields of earth,
And from the gloom of the dead God's tomb
Stalks forth the wraith of the cursed faith
That on Golgotha had its birth.
O'er all our land that spectre hand
Still holds the dripping knife,
Still hangs the sword o'er the festal board,
And the skeleton guest, in his grave-clothes drest,
Dashes gall in the wine of life.

How long, how long, ye brave and strong,
Will ye cringe to a broken reed
Or kiss the rod of dotard God,
And the shackles of a creed?
Awake, arise, lo! the captive cries
From the gloom of the prison cell,
And the blood and the tears of a thousand years
Are quenching the fires of hell.

Brother Jones kept his Bible-banging meetings up during my week of lectures, but the Empire folks seem to prefer science and Liberalism, for I had the courthouse full all the time, while I understood he had only twenty to thirty for an audience, and these composed of the faithful.

I enjoyed my visit to Empire very much. I found very intelligent and educated people there: Mr. S. H. Hazard, wife and sister; Mrs. McLaughlin, Mr. Stauff, wife and children; Mr. Ploeger, the gentlemanly radical head salesman for the leading dry goods house, who has been everywhere and is a great reader and thinker; Mrs. Cammon and son, whose genial home is a place of rest to weary lecturers, and many others that gave us a hearty welcome to their homes and hearts. A better people we seldom find than in Empire.

Ocean steamers and sailing vessels are continually coming and going. A saw mill with a capacity of 150,000 feet per day; two stage lines to the railroad, eighty to one hundred miles away; logging and fishing camps and coal mines all around; and being the county seat, this place is a fine head center. One day I was out for a stroll and exercise, and found my way into the cemetery. My eye caught sight of the head-stone of James Oliver, while under the name were the beautiful words seldom found on tombstones:

The world was his country; to do good his religion.

Mr. Oliver lived a few years ago on the North Fork of the Coos river in this county, and was a true-blue Freethinker, took several radical papers and many books, and circulated them all up and down the valley, and now it is known as the "Valley of Infidels." Hence Putnam, Reynolds, and Bell all went there to lecture. Let our faint-hearted brethren take courage and keep their "lamps trimmed and a-burning," for there is a mighty work to do.

"THE Glory of Infidelity" is a very able and interesting and nicely printed and bound pamphlet recently issued by Putnam & Macdonald, 504 Kearny street, San Francisco, Cal. The price is but ten cents, and it should have a large circulation, for its author, S. P. Putnam, is renowned for the pleasing and piquant, clear, vigorous language of his productions.—Plain Dealer.

"THE Glory of Infidelity," by Samuel P. Putnam, is received, and it is one of his ablest lectures. It sustains, all through, the appropriateness of its title. Send ten cents for it, to Putnam & Macdonald, 504 Kearny street, San Francisco, Cal.—Voice of the People.

FRUITS OF CELIBACY.

Facta non verba is a sound proverb. There is nothing more convincing and effectual in combat of error than facts. Especially is this the case when we have to deal with the verbose errors and falsehoods of religion. No better way can be chosen on which to send the conquering hosts against the superstition-barricaded fastnesses of fanaticism, than the broad highroad of clerical depravity, of ministerial rascality, and ecclesiastical corruption. We see specimens of it every day in every telegraph column of every newspaper, although not as numerous in the calendars of criminal courts, as the sanctimonious and unctuous sinners (thieves, lechers, and brutes), have a felicitous knack in slipping the noose of the law from their fat necks over their long ears and dolichocephalous (narrow) crania. Now and then, however, outraged justice gets her work in on some hierarchical "honorary citizen" of Sodom and Gomorrah. I just see in my Swiss papers a sample case—one of unfortunately too many bestialities perpetrated by the savory servants of the savior who said, "Blessed are the pure in heart." But to facts:

On June 7, there stood at the bar of the Criminal Court of the Canton (state) of Lucerne, Switzerland, Joseph Leonz Amrein, of Willisau Land, fifty years of age, Roman Catholic vicar at Emmen, charged with heinous offenses against the principles of chastity. The trial took place with closed doors. Owing to accumulating ugly rumors the school trustees of that place had, upon the deposit of a heavy guarantee, effected the arrest of the dominie just as he was coming out of church and before he had learned of his impending fate, so that he was prevented from following the example of his worthy colleague, Parson Troxler, of St. Urban, who managed to evade the officers of the law and is now safely reading mass in some American parish. The investigation unearthed a state of affairs too grossly brutal and obscene to be even hinted at, too revolting even for the pen of a Zola. In dozens of cases that "man of God" had abused children of from eight to sixteen years, and what he had perpetrated traverses all degrees of sexual perversity, from mere obscenity in language to the most damnable sexual excesses of an unnatural beast. He scattered Satan seed in two communities; for what he did with children of ten to sixteen he taught little ones of from eight to ten years. And this not only during a short period but through a series of years. Before the recent discoveries this wretch had been suspected of unnatural vices while in Grosswangen; the ecclesiastical superiors instituted an examination, but the records were refused the secular authorities by the bishop's commissary and the guilty scoundrel was simply removed to another parish, thence again, and so on until he brought up at Emmen, where the measure finally was full and ran over.

It is described as really diabolical how the criminal enticed the victims of his hellish lust; he "treated" them in taverns and in his apartments; he gave poor boys clothing; and the blood curdles in ones veins on learning of his dark designs and devices; of how he tracked and trapped the victims in by-paths and turn-pikes, as they came from field or factory, and as he visited them in the school-rooms, even. A favorite opportunity for the lecher was on Sunday afternoons when the children would go to the parsonage to get books to read, the parson being librarian of the Pius Society. Many of the children would, however, obstinately refuse to go to the seducing devil any longer.

This state of affairs being abundantly testified to, the public persecutor moved for a punishment of six and a half years in the penitentiary with hard labor, but the Criminal Court, finding the term too short, extended it to seven and one-half years. A few yards of hempen neckwear would have been the right length, for is it not Voltaire who said that there would be no peace and happiness on earth till the last priest be strangled with the entrails of the last king?

Such is the fruit of the celibacy of the Roman Catholic clergy! Such are the men (or at least a lamentably large portion thereof) to whom so many blind, ignorant, credulous, and unsophisticated parents entrust the education of their children!

When will the end come? When light has driven darkness from the fair face of a priest-polluted earth and the cross of Christ is duly recognized by all in its true hideousness as the voluptuary symbolic relic of the Bacchanalian phallus worship of ancient paganism, which at least had one advantage over its offspring, Christianity, in openly professing its cult of nymphomania and satyriasis.

IN THE SIERRAS.

Here the high mountain-peaks are calm at rest,
Grand in the gloom of solitude and snow;
Sublime in their repose, they have impressed
Their sombre glory on all forms below.
The skies of crystal blue above them glow
In one majestic sphere of boundless light,
Where height and depth and distance grandly show
The magnitudes of nature, and invite
The thoughtful mind to some yet loftier height.

For mind expands with oceans, mountains, stars,
Absorbing them, explaining the unknown;
To Nature's secrets breaking down the bars,
It claims the Universe as all its own.
Here it has built a kingdom, there a throne,
Its natural law is that it must desire
To stand on suns and stars, and if alone,
'Tis destined ever onward to aspire,
Forever on, through whirlwind, flood, or fire.

Enter this glorious forest! 'Tis a scene
In which our feelings grow, and growing glow
With the sublimity of all between
The sun above and clouds and earth below.
Within this august place man may bow low
To the Omnipotent; this is his shrine,
High in the mountains, amidst clouds and snow,
And near the heavens; and here the sunbeams shine
To light this fane imperishable, divine.

Its green arcades expand from dizzy spires,
So high they only seem to fade away,
Where light and distance, fainting, each retires
Into the glorious solar realms of day.
Here morn's auroral splendors, in their play
Of crimson radiance and celestial gold,
Give to the clouds and forests their display
Of beautiful sublimity. Behold!
Space arched o'er all, their natural dome unrolled.

No surpliced priest, no mitred bishop here
Has consecrated this to the most high
With pagan pomp, oblations insincere;
But the strong earthquake, passing swiftly by,
And the winged cyclone, shaking earth and sky,
Are the great ministers whose prayers are heard.
Their orisons are thunderbolts that fly
On flame and lightning, scorching creeds absurd,
And are a part of God's most holy word.

Thoughtful and watchful, I have lingered here
Till on day's verge the sun goes down to rest;
I see that glorious monarch disappear
With feelings far too deep to be expressed;
Yet neither can the spirit be suppressed,
For the eternal fountains of the soul
Like a great river's flood flow unrepressed,
Gathering new volume as they near the goal
Of Time; and lo! eternities unroll.

SPIRITUALITY AND MATERIALITY.

Although a believer in a spiritual existence which follows this material one, I think this, our present life, has little to do with spirituality. We are now material beings and cannot subsist on spiritual things, no matter how pleasant such are to contemplate or to dream about. In material things alone we find our food, clothing, and shelter; and nothing spiritual can feed the body, give it protection from heat and cold, or provide it with habitation. It is a fact, nevertheless, that many people devote their principal efforts in life to disseminating spiritual ideas, while pretending to ignore and rise above material things; but these same people find themselves dependent on matter for every thought they ever had, and for the sustenance that keeps the life-principle in their flesh and blood. In view of this one fact, what does all their windy verbiage on spirituality amount to? Is it needed? and is the world in any way benefited by it? I have reached the conclusion that it isn't; and hold that dabbling with spiritual things and dealing with conditions that may or may not exist in another world, is something that works injury to this, by diverting time and attention from the practical affairs of life. I have also noticed that spiritual teachers as a class live very near the material plane, notwithstanding their precepts and advice to others about cultivating spirituality; and most of them—if their health is good—fail to practice what they preach. Spiritual things have always been held up before the masses to lessen discontent by exciting anticipations that would lead them to forget present privations, and divert their minds from the inequalities of life occasioned by unjust laws; while the priest and the politician have worked harmoniously and lived high on the fat of the land. Consequently spiritual things here and now are a mockery and a delusion, and the ignis fatuus of simplicity and credulity. Spiritual teachers were never known to take pay for their services in spiritual things; but invariably demand that the exchange of commodities shall give to them material money or material products. For feeding the masses on windy nonentities, as far as this life is concerned, they obtain the tangible, comfort-giving, life-sustaining necessities of existence. In other words, something for nothing. When hearing any person discoursing on the necessity of cultivating spirituality or the value of spiritual things, I now feel that my time is being wasted and nothing beneficial is received. This material world contains all that we need now, and spiritual things will have their uses when we become spiritual beings in a spiritual world; and not before. In saying this I am not unmindful of the fact that the desire is universal to know what follows death: whether annihilation or a spiritual existence; but when this desire has been satisfied by the knowledge or belief that life continues in a spiritual state, it is folly to neglect material things by striving after spiritual. Too much importance has always been attached to the spirit world, and this one has been neglected in consequence. Our present needs and duties are confined to materiality, and the physical body takes precedence over the soul, because its condition decides the mental states and regulates the happiness of the soul. The state of the body invariably decides the state of the mind, and to deal with practical things in a practical manner, I will remark that this is the motto I nail to the wall of my domicile:

: PHYSICAL COMFORT IS THE BASIS OF ALL HAPPINESS. A HUNGRY :
: MAN IS AN ANGRY MAN. GOD BLESS OUR HOME. :
:.....

It has been said by historians that hunger would throw that great and good man, George Washington, into a perfect rage; and I am somewhat like George in that respect myself. In fact, I have found this complaint general in my observations among the human bipeds, differing in degree, whether "spiritual-minded" or otherwise. Nature is inexorable in her demands, and the pangs of hunger, if unappeased, will plant a little sheol in the breast of man's immortal soul. If her spiritual demands, though unappeased, will create such a disturbance, I have never realized it; neither have I seen those who have. Spiritual wants as far as I know make little disturbance, but let the body want for food, raiment, or shelter, and we realize by unmistakable evidence the power of matter over mind, or body over spirit. You cannot neglect the body and find peace for the soul, and only when its wants are supplied can any person feel or honestly assert that life is worth living. What then is the duty of mankind and the need of the present? Is it to build more churches, to send out more spiritual teachers, and to monkey with metaphysics? No! It is to regulate conditions in this material world so every person born into it can obtain the comforts of life and provide for his physical wants. Provide for the body and the soul will take care of itself; and let this fact be blazoned forth until mankind learns that spiritual things are of no earthly account, and spiritual teachers of all kinds, grades, and characters are simply humbugs and drones, without whom the world would be better off. It is not more spirituality the world wants, but less ignorance, less selfishness, and more of justice and equity between man and man. When the world is properly fed, clothed, and sheltered, and man's material wants and necessities are fully provided for, then, and not till then, will we see the millennium.

The world has been surfeited with spiritual theories, doctrines, and dogmas to better the condition of mankind, but each and all have proved to be total failures for the good and sufficient reason that spiritual things are not adapted to a material world. The combination will not work, and it is about time that fact was generally known and the reign of reason and common sense was established on a purely material basis. Spirituality will do to dream about in our slumbers, but in waking hours materiality alone can satisfy the senses and give comfort and pleasure to life.

C. SEVERANCE.

DID JESUS CHRIST RISE FROM THE DEAD ?*

VIII.

What a pity Christ, instead of learning to get out of the grave and fly, had not made himself acquainted with what, in astronomical language, is known as the parallax. In other words, he should have made himself aware of the change of the earth's position in relation to celestial objects. It might have troubled him to, trigonometrically, have tried to find the angle in the triangle, whose apex was Sirius, subtended by a line joining two extremities of the earth's orbit. This might have been work beneath the august dignity of a carpenter-god, but wellnigh as dignified as riding on donkeys and cursing fig-trees. He would have found that the angle at the apex is too small to be appreciated by the nicest instrument astronomy ever had at its command, although the instruments now in the hands of modern astronomers could appreciate the angle were it so much as one second or the 3600th part of a degree. Therefore it has been concluded that, at the very least, Sirius is 19,200,000,000 miles distant from the earth. Christ flying for 1,884 years—at the rate of 1,000 miles an hour—will, by this time, have flown about 16,503,840,000 miles, so that he is many millions of miles from Sirius! Sirius, indeed, is quite at our own doors compared with the remote star system (30 Doradus) which the telescope of Sir John Herschell discovered in the Magellanic clouds of the southern celestial hemisphere. The late Dr. Nichol, professor of astronomy in the University of Glasgow, represents us as in the centre of a sphere whose circumference is 35,000 times as far from us as Sirius, and asserts that, even beyond that circuit, "infinity, boundless infinity, stretches unfathomed forever." But neither in the Magellanic clouds, nor in the remotest star-dust system, has the telescope descried one vestige of the kingdom of heaven or one plume of an angel's wing.

So much for the journey Christ set himself on the day he flew from Olivet. I have shown how many miles he is now distant from Olivet, if he has been flying ever since, summer and winter, day and night, at the rate of a cannon ball. I have not, in my calculation, allowed him a single halt to thrash any one with whip-cords, or thrust any Chorazin to hell. Do you say I am too irreverently literal? I ask you, in all candor and fairness, if you do not wish me to believe that Christ really flew "up into heaven" from the Mount of Olives, what do you desire me to believe? Did he not fly, but only appear to do so, and thereby delude his dupes like a Cheap-Jack, with some sleight-of-hand and a juggler's trick? He must have done the one or the other, or the scripture lies. Take your alternative. Do not evade me by asserting he was a "spirit" of which you and I know nothing. If he were God incarnate, he had a body. Spirit or no spirit, the buoying of a human body into the air is necessarily linked with the concepts of force and space and time. Spirit or no spirit, if he took his body with him, he must have taken it at the rate of so many knots an hour. If he did not take it with him, he is no more clothed with humanity than are the other members of the Trinity. Has he yet overtaken Enoch and Elijah, who also flew to heaven, having a good start of him? Are the whole three still flying through space, like rival hawks in falconry, and ejaculating,

"Deil tak' the hindmost, on they drive?"

O priests of the doomed faith, your Christianity is only a paradigm of insanity, and your church a synonym for a mad-house. Civilization, indeed—we a civilized people! It is only civilized lunacy that can interest itself in the exploits of a flying god.

*By Saladin, editor of the Agnostic Journal.

But the curious fact in regard to Christ's flying to heaven—another fact upon which clergymen never preach—is his having flown twice to heaven, at two different times, and from two different places at least fifty miles apart! Mark and Luke make the ascension occur on the day of the resurrection; and the Mount of Olives, quite close to Jerusalem, has been fixed upon as the perch from which the divine aeronaut flew. But, according to Matthew, he first appeared to the eleven at a mountain in Galilee, the nearest point in Galilee being about fifty miles distant from Olivet! Of course, both accounts must be true; they are both alike inspired by the Holy Ghost. He flew to heaven from Olivet on the day of the resurrection; but, several days after, he appeared to the eleven on a mountain in Galilee. Consequently, as I have said, his ascent must have been accomplished from two different places and at two different times. In other words, he went to heaven in piecemeal or by instalments. Not having started from earth at the same time, the two instalments could hardly reach heaven at the same time. It would be exceedingly awkward, if, when he went to sit down at the right hand of the father, he found that the sitting-down portion of him had not yet arrived. All this is, of course, remarkably easily understood and believed; and any one who believes it will be "saved."

"Palestine was one of the countries most in arrear in the science of the day; the Galileans were the most ignorant of all the inhabitants of Palestine, and the disciples of Jesus might be reckoned among the most stupid Galileans."

"That some of the Christian legends were deliberate forgeries can scarcely be questioned; the principle of pious fraud appeared to justify the mode of working on the popular mind; it was admitted and avowed. . . . The Christian lived in a supernatural world; the notion of the divine power, the perpetual interference of the deity, the agency of the countless invisible beings which hovered over mankind, was so strongly impressed upon the belief that every extraordinary, and almost every ordinary, incident, became a miracle, every inward emotion a suggestion, either of a good or an evil spirit. A mythic period was thus gradually formed, in which reality melted into fable, and invention unconsciously trespassed on the province of history."

The former of these two quotations is from Ernest Renan, the latter from the Rev. Dean Milman. They form the padlock and the key to the mystery of the origin and growth of Christianity. The creed originated amid the exceptionally credulous ignorance of the Jews, and grew amid the pious frauds of the more grossly superstitious among the Gentiles. Under Constantine, for state reasons, it was invested with the purple of empire; and it takes many centuries for Truth, poor and in rags, to slay Error, dressed in purple and fine linen. At last, however, truth has gained a vantage-ground from which victory is almost within her grasp. At last she can thus fearlessly assault religious fables without atoning for her temerity in religious dungeons, or chained to a stake amid the red and angry swirl of religious flames.

SABBATH AND SUNDAY.

The "American Sabbath Union," says the Portland Oregonian, wants a law enacted to enforce abstention from labor on Sunday. Though the Union itself professes to observe the day as a religious duty, in compliance with the command of the almighty, as given through Moses, it wishes the state to command its observance as "a rest day," solely as a measure of secular policy, for the physical and moral well-being of the body of the people. Observed in this way, however, Sunday will not be a sacred day. It will merely be a holiday, and this, in fact, with very great numbers is its significance now.

Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, in his sermons on the subject, says: "The right arm of the Union's work is to promote the religious Sabbath, the left arm is to preserve the civil Sabbath. The religious Sabbath treats Sunday work and dissipation as sins against God; the civil Sabbath considers them only as crimes against man." This is not an ingenuous way of putting the statement. It is found impossible to enforce the doctrine that non-observance of Sunday is a sin against God, and now there is an effort to gain the point through indirection, by making failure to keep Sunday as a day of rest a crime against man.

But if the state is not to enforce observance of Sunday as a sacred day, it cannot possibly make non-observance of Sunday a crime. It can appoint Sunday as a day of weekly rest, a holiday after the manner of other holidays; but if the day of weekly rest stands on this ground it may be observed or not, as persons may or may not wish to observe it. We have now many holidays, but their observance is merely voluntary. The state, unless it forms an alliance with the church to declare non-observance of Sunday a sin against God, has no more ground for its command to men to rest on the Sunday holiday than on the Christmas holiday; and, in fact, since the requirements of modern life make it desirable, and even necessary, that many activities shall continue without interruption of holidays or rest days, the people, or a majority of them, would not want the proposed Sunday law enforced, and hence it would not be enforced. A great many persons now rest on Sundays; some rest on other days of the week as convenience or opportunity allows; and a great many of us would rest not only one day in the week, but seven days in the week, if we could. Necessity, in one form or another, drives most of us to work and keeps us at it. From this necessity the state never can relieve us. We rest when we can, and work because we can't help it.

There can be no dispute over the historical origin either of the Jewish Sabbath or Christian Sunday. How far either is "sacred" must be left to individual feeling, and this again depends on temperament, education, reading, and thought. We know how the Jewish Sabbath originated; the book of Deuteronomy gives us a positive statement. The people of Israel were commanded to "keep the Sabbath day" in commemoration of the fact that God had delivered them from servitude in the land of Egypt; and the account we have in the book of Genesis of the creation, written probably 500 years after the deliverance from Egypt, and after the Sabbath had long been established among the Jews, states that God "rested on the seventh day and sanctified it." The week was a very ancient division of time; there is reason to believe that the Israelites derived it from Chaldea during their sojourn there and before they went down into Egypt, and the Chaldeans, the earliest astronomers, based it on the seven planetary bodies then known, including the sun and moon, and a day of the week was made sacred to each. During the latter part of the period of their sojourn in Egypt the people of Israel had been oppressed with grievous servitude. They had been forced to work under task-masters without rest or holiday, and when they recovered their liberties after the exodus, it was natural that they should seek and receive a revelation authorizing and commanding them to rest one day in seven. Moses presented, as from Jahveh, the God of Israel, the command the people wanted, and the Sabbath was fixed in the constitution of the Jewish state. We make constitutions in a different manner now. They had no constitutional conventions then; Moses went up to Sinai and brought the constitution back. Attested by lightning and thunder, that deeply impressed a people wholly unaccustomed to such phenomena, the constitution was received and adopted, not as from the "Supreme Ruler of the universe," as the convention at Olympia puts it, but as from the local and tribal god of Israel, a god who was for Israel all the time, and against everybody else.

The Christian world has changed the sacred day, the day of rest, from Saturday to Sunday. For this change there is not even the semblance of divine authority that appears in the sanction of the Jewish Sabbath. Nowhere in the New Testament is the substitution of Sunday for Saturday as "the Sabbath" authorized or enjoined. The first day of the week, or Sunday, is mentioned only eight times in the New Testament, and in none of the texts is there the least hint that the day was sacred, or was thereafter to be so considered. In one place in the New Testament mention is made of a religious meeting held on the first day of the week, and there is no doubt that during the early years of Christianity these meetings became frequent. Jesus was believed to have risen on that day, and these meetings were held chiefly in commemoration of the resurrection. But throughout the New Testament the seventh day of the week is uniformly called the Sabbath, and there is no command for the observance of the first day of the week as a holy or sacred day. The authority for such observances rests partly on a usage of the early church, but chiefly on a decree of the Emperor Constantine who, in the year 321, when that union was made between church and state which the world has ever since been trying to sever, ordained the union of the worship of Christ with the worship of Apollo, and commanded "rest on the venerable day of the sun."

Sun worship, symbolized by the worship of Apollo as the god of the sun, was common throughout the Roman empire. The first day of the week, or Sunday, was the day devoted to this heathen worship. This form of idolatry was almost universal throughout the ancient world. In Gibbon's History, chapter xx, we read: "The devotion of Constantine was peculiarly directed to the genius of the sun, the Apollo of Greek and Roman mythology; and he was pleased to be represented by the symbols of the god of light and poetry. The unerring shafts of that deity, the brightness of his eyes, his laurel wreath, immortal beauty and elegant accomplishments, seemed to point him out as the patron of a young hero. The altars of Apollo were covered with the votive offerings of Constantine; and the credulous multitude were taught to believe that the emperor was permitted to behold with mortal eyes the visible majesty of their tutelar deity; and that, either waking or in a vision, he was blessed with the auspicious omens of a long and virtuous reign. The sun was universally accepted as the invincible guide and protector of Constantine."

The emperor, therefore, commanded the observance of the day devoted to the worship of the sun, not as the Sabbath, which it was not, but under its old astronomical and heathen title, Dies Solis, or the day of the sun, which it was. It was a piece of statecraft, designed as a means of uniting the worship of Christ with the worship of Apollo, and Constantine stamped on his coins the name of one and the image of the other. The idea was to create harmony in the empire by making it appear that the religions differed little from each other, and were in fact essentially the same.

Historically, therefore, the observance of Sunday is an outgrowth of sun worship. Having seen the origin of the observance of the seventh day of the week as a holy day, the manner of the change from the seventh day to the first day and the reason therefor, we may be able to get a juster estimate of the assertion that it is a sin against God to do anything on Sundays for which our ecclesiastical teachers have not granted us a dispensation. The other part of the argument, that men work too assiduously and therefore that a weekly rest-day should be ordained by law, may seem to superficial observation quite another thing; but in fact it has its origin in a desire to cause the state to support the church in the claim that non-observance of Sunday is a sin against God. But for this and for their desire to have the day all their own, the ministers of our "Sabbath Union" would care little whether working people had one day's rest in a week, or not. Very probably they would even exhort us against the sin of idleness, when we proposed a rest-day for ourselves.

ELIMINATION OF INCONSTANT FACTORS.

In endeavoring to ascertain the cause of any given class of effects, the rule of logic is, to eliminate, among the many intermingled factors each one of which is suspected of being the cause, those factors that are inconstant. The remaining constant factor, present in all cases, is plainly the cause. Now, an effect whose cause we wish to ascertain is, our present civilization. So we must examine all the countries in which civilization is present, and eliminate all the factors that are by chance present in some countries but not in others; that is, inconstant. The remaining constant factor, present in all countries, will plainly be the cause.

The honor of being the cause of our civilization is claimed by Christians for their religion, and also by Rationalists for Freethought and material development. Application of the logical method gives a test that is decisive. On the one hand, every country that has civilization has Freethought and material development, commenced to get civilization not when it had merely Christianity but when it commenced to get Freethought and material development, and now has civilization in degree just proportioned to its degree of Freethought and material development. On the other hand, those countries that have Christianity only, and have not Freethought and material development, remain still without civilization. Christianity, then, is an inconstant factor, and is not the cause; Freethought and material development, then, is a constant factor, and is the cause.

Having made the general statements, it remains to name the particular facts in proof. To name the countries that have civilization, along with Freethought and material development, is unnecessary; the list is lengthy, and we all know them. To name the countries that are without civilization, having Christianity but not Freethought and material development, is what we will now proceed to do.

There are two such countries, and they afford us excellent test cases. One is Spain. Her situation, on a peninsula, the only contiguous country being France, with whom she has always had a hostility that prevented the introduction of French or other improvements, has helped to preserve her isolated from other nations. The other cause of her isolation has been her religious bigotry. At all events, here she has been isolated for centuries. All this time she has been the most intensely, fiercely, hotly Christian nation in the world. Has this Christianity of which they boast produced in her civilization? No. She is a semi-barbarous country to-day.

Abyssinia is the next example. Christianity was introduced there in the year 300. It has flourished luxuriantly. It has caused the Abyssinians to rave, kneel, pray, cringe, split into sects, kill, persecute, and tell lies about one another. In short, it has had all its legitimate effects. But owing to the geographical situation of Abyssinia, Freethought and material civilization did not get in, and to-day the Abyssinians are savages.

Besides these two countries, a late dispatch from Paris calls our attention to another that will probably serve as an example:

PARIS, July 16.—A letter has been received by the Paris Geographical Society announcing that Count Teleki, who a while ago discovered the big lake Basso-Narok in east central Africa, found a Christian tribe to the north of this lake. They live about three hundred miles southwest of Abyssinia. No white man or native missionary has ever been among them as far as they know, and Count Teleki is the first to give any information about them. He believes that at some distant period in the past they have had relations with the Christian Abyssinians. About eight hundred years ago a princess of the Jewish faith drove out the reigning dynasty in northern Abyssinia, and for a century the Christians were bitterly persecuted. It is thought probable that during this era some Abyssinian families escaped to the south and founded Christian colonies, from whom sprung the Christian natives whom Teleki has found surrounded on all sides by paganism. Their religion is a very debased form of Christianity, but considerable New Testament history has been handed down to them in traditions, and they have a priesthood, the cross, and other emblems of Christianity.

Now, are these savages in any degree elevated above surrounding tribes? Does the explorer say he finds in them the arts and sciences of civilization? If Christianity produces all such good things, why has it not produced them there? Why the remarkable exception? Why do we not read of the explorer, astounded, emerging from encircling tribes of low negro trash sunk in their wicked heathen beliefs, to a state of towers and palaces, learning and justice, triumphant proof to be thundered at us from pulpits? Information of some such thing is sadly wanted.—Truth Seeker.

THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

OFFICIAL CALL FOR THE THIRTEENTH ANNUAL CONGRESS.

The next annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held in Philadelphia, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 25, 26, and 27, 1889. It is deemed expedient to hold this meeting where our society was organized in 1876, and where the so-called "National Reform Association" has its headquarters, and has recently held an important convention, and for many historic and other reasons.

All charter and life members, all vice-presidents, all chairmen of state executive committees, and all duly accredited delegates from local Secular societies are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress. Each local society is entitled to send its president, secretary, and three other delegates. Annual members by payment of one dollar are entitled to seats.

Particulars as to the place of meeting, speakers, and their subjects, etc., will be announced hereafter.

Buckle's Four Propositions.

I have endeavored, says Buckle, in his "History of Civilization," to establish four leading propositions, which, according to my view, are to be deemed the basis of the history of civilization. They are—1. That the progress of mankind depends on the success with which the laws of phenomena are investigated, and on the extent to which a knowledge of those laws is diffused. 2. That before such investigation can begin, a spirit of skepticism must arise, which, at first aiding the investigation, is afterward aided by it. 3. That the discoveries thus made increase the influence of intellectual truths, and diminish relatively, not absolutely, the influence of moral truths; moral truths being more stationary than intellectual truths, and receiving fewer additions. 4. That the great enemy of this movement, and therefore the great enemy of civilization, is the protective spirit; by which I mean the notion that society cannot prosper unless the affairs of life are watched over and protected at nearly every turn by the State and the Church; the State teaching men what they are to do, and the Church teaching them what they are to believe.

A Logical Necessity.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Inclosed you will find $2 to pay for my subscription to FREETHOUGHT, and 10 cents for "The Glory of Infidelity."

Your paper has become a necessity to me, and I won't do without it as long as I can pay for it. I wish I had $20 to send, to help along the glorious cause of Freethought.

Why He Cannot Subscribe.

To the Editors of Freethought:

I am in receipt of your letter; also of copy of FREETHOUGHT. You state the importance of sustaining the Liberal papers, to which I certainly agree. You suggest that I subscribe and aid in obtaining subscriptions, with which I would comply gladly if I could. I think FREETHOUGHT one of our best and ablest Liberal papers. But I am now sixty-one years of age, almost, and have devoted my life chiefly to reform—anti-slavery, when it cost much to oppose slavery; woman suffrage, anti-Mormonism, free trade, and the like. I have sacrificed much in opposing the silly superstitions of the church, which were much more popular when I was young than they are now. I am at present a farmer. And farmers were never so poor as now. Tariff taxes on his supplies take all that he can earn. He sells his crops in a free-trade market and buys supplies taxed from 25 to 150 per cent. The Eastern manufacturing states are booming with prosperity, while agriculture is robbed and being crushed out for the benefit of trusts and monopolies. I am too poor to take the Liberal papers—yours among others—much to my regret.

Very respectfully yours, A. J. GROVER.

VOLTAIRE'S ROMANCES.

A new edition, with numerous illustrations. "I choose that a story should be founded on probability, and not always resemble a dream. I desire to find in it nothing trivial or extravagant; and I desire above all that under the appearance of fable there may appear some latent truth, obvious to the discerning eye, though it escape the observations of the vulgar."—Voltaire.

Early Western Journalism.

[The following, from the New York Graphic, is a good story in itself, and besides has for one of its principal characters a gentleman who is now well known in the Liberal ranks, the Hon. Joseph Wolff.]

When William N. Byers, the Colorado pioneer of journalism, first started in to print the Rocky Mountain News he had a pretty tough time of it and experiences lively enough to suit a Ute Indian agent.

News was plentiful enough, and it was not generally supposed that the press would make any editorial attacks upon the citizens of Auraria, as Denver was then called; so one day when Byers found fault editorially with the killing of a Mexican by Charles Harrison, a gambler, the latter's friends, fully armed, gathered about and made an attack upon the log house occupied by the News. The editor and his reporters and type-setters were so surprised at the suddenness of the attack that they did not have time to make any resistance.

Editor Byers was taken captive to Harrison's saloon, called the "Criterion." The crowd wanted to kill him on the spot, and knives and pistols were flourished in his face. Harrison had once been a Mason, and knew that Byers was a member of the fraternity, so, under the pretense of taking him into a side room to talk, he got him out of the place altogether.

Byers was plucky enough, for he ran for his office, and, arming all hands, laid low for the enemy, who came fast enough, and a lively combat took place and one man was killed.

It was just about this time that the Hon. Joseph Wolff, of Boulder, Col., who was a good printer and a handy man about an office, arrived in town from Omaha via a freight train.

He was dead broke, and he made at once for the News office and asked for the boss. Byers, seated on a barrel, was pointed out to him.

"Want any hands?" asked Joe, leaning against the door.

"That depends," said Byers, without looking up.

"Depends on what?"

"Can you shoot?"

"You bet."

"Will you?"

"Of course."

"Well, then," said the editor, getting off the barrel, "here's a rifle and there's a case—go to work."

"What'll I do first," asked Wolff, "kill somebody or throw in a case?"

Byers went to the window, leaned well out, looked up and down carefully, and then turning back, said:

"I guess you'll have time to throw in a handful."

Just about this time the office was in a state of siege, and to write and print what Byers wrote and printed at that time required a greater amount of moral courage, or what is more commonly called nerve, than is possessed by journalists of the present day.

Many threats were made and more than one combat took place, but the editor came out ahead, and always stuck to the paragraph in his salutatory, which read: "Our course is marked out. We will adhere to it, with steadfast and fixed determination to speak, write, and publish the truth, and nothing but the truth, let it work us weal or woe."

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and understand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future

Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously written. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

DR. FELLOWS.

A Self-Sacrificing Convert.

Will S. Green of the Colusa Sun tells the following anecdote: "Something over forty years ago we were in Tennessee, when a Mormon preacher came along. He was preaching away with no effect, until some people concluded it would be a good thing to duck him in the creek one cold day. This enlisted the sympathy of a wealthy man of the neighborhood, who invited the Mormon to come to his house to preach. In a couple of weeks he had converted the wife of his host and her sister, and from that it spread, until when he left he took away quite a colony. The gentleman who had taken the Mormon in loaded up some wagons full of goods for his wife, who with her sister was 'sealed' to the preacher, gave her some money and told her to go. The legislature of Tennessee being in session, he went down, got a special Act for divorce, and in less than a month he was married again and going on as though nothing had happened. This man's wife wanted to take a negro girl with her, but he would not consent unless the preacher would promise to 'seal' her also, and under that promise the girl went. When you have got a man's sympathy you have half converted him.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

E. A. STEVENS, Secretary American Secular Union.

Temperance and Prohibition,

BY G. H. STOCKHAM, M.D.,

Sets forth the merits of moral suasion as opposed to force in settling the liquor question.

Paper, 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts. Address this office

An old lady, very devout but inclined to look on the dark side of life, told a visitor that perhaps not more than two persons in the village would be saved, at the final reckoning—herself and the minister, and she had her doubts about the minister.

The Winning Hand.

Tell me not of hands heroic,
Batling for our fellow-men;
Of the helping hand of woman,
Or the hand that wields the pen;
Nor the hand that beats the carpet
On the back-yard fence unfurled;
For the hand that beats four aces
Is the hand that beats the world!

SAN FRANCISCO, - - - AUGUST 31, 1889.

KING HUMBERT of Italy has been excommunicated by the pope, so says the Venice Gazette, on account of his participation in the dedication of the Bruno monument at Rome, June 9. The king does not complain.

ENGLISH manufacturers of idols for heathen countries have over $1,000,000 invested in the industry, which employs hundreds of hands; and in spite of the large sums of expended on missionary enterprises, Satan still some mischief finds for these idol hands to do.

MR L. K. WASHBURN will probably assume the editorial chair of the Boston Investigator left vacant by the death of Horace Seaver. He has for some time been connected with the paper as lecturer and writer, and no better choice of editor could be made.

THE clergy are anxious to serve the country. Two hundred and fifty of them applied for a chance to fill the vacancy in the corps of army chaplains which occurred August 29. The 249 disappointed parsons will of course pray ardently that the labors of the successful applicant may be abundantly blessed, and perhaps they will do as much good in that way as they would if every one of them had secured the post.

A "BUSTED" politician of Oakland named Ayers, who had been pestering a prosperous politician for a job, was offered five dollars a day if he would stand still and keep his mouth shut. He accepted the proposition and put in last Saturday at his new contract. The same offer should be made to the Rev. Dr. Horton and some of the other Oakland preachers and politicians. The citizens would probably be glad to make a public appropriation to cover the expense incurred.

THE article in this paper by Judge Bush on the Washington Constitution deserves careful reading. It seems that the convention fell far short of framing a constitution sufficiently explicit in its provisions to prevent a practical union of church and state whenever an unscrupulous legislature chooses to bring about such a union. While dealing with the matter of taxation the convention should have settled the question forever by providing that all private property should pay its just share of taxes.

THE majority of the ministry strongly favor the prohibition movement and compulsory sobriety. If this is logical, it should be carried further, and they should entirely abandon their calling—which is one of moral suasion wholly—and turn their attention to the lobby, in order to get laws that will compel the people to be religious, and then compel them to be moral. When Christian ministers advocate compulsory laws for anything, they cease to be teachers, sink their calling, and reach the level of politicians.

THE Rev. William Gleeson, a Romish priest of Oakland, declares that our public school system, as now conducted, is productive of crime against life and property. Gleeson is having a discussion on the school system with the Rev. Mr. Wendte, and in a recent published article he charged that "the American public school system was instituted by the efforts of Fanny Wright, a Scotch irreligionist, who came to this country in 1824." Miss Wright came to America in 1818. We were not aware that she instituted our public school system, but if she did, the Rev. Father Gleeson could do her no greater honor than to give that fact all the publicity possible.

THE SAN FRANCISCO FREETHOUGHT SOCIETY.

The next meeting of the San Francisco Freethought Society will be held at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, Sunday evening, September 1, at 8 o'clock. Thomas Curtis will speak on "Fifty Years of Freethought."

NEWS AND NOTES.

Buckley has sprung out of the depths of the woods. The new civilization mingles with the ancient forests. Immense stumps are in the middle of the streets, almost big enough to live in. But the fires burn in the heart of them night and day and they are fast disappearing. When evening spreads its mantle a somewhat lurid aspect is presented. One might imagine himself on the confines of hades. The forked flames are leaping here and there in the lofty branches, while heavy volumes of smoke roll from the ground as if in the chambers of the earth were the workshops of the infernal host. But the spirit of man is here, the flowers grow and the green grass, the cottage and the cabin are built, the fireside sparkles, the wheels of industry make music, the rattle and the thunder of the mills are heard, the great trees tumble down, the iron horse speeds and glitters by, and glimpses of a beautiful Eden are caught amid the charred masses of the wilderness gloom. Only a year old is this thriving little city, and it has the vitality of manhood already. It has come to stay. If it has grown in a night it has the promise of the boundless day. I have met nowhere with a warmer welcome or more generous friends.

Coke Ewing is a host in himself—not only willing to do his share but earnest to induce others to do the same. He is an able enlisting officer in the ranks of Freethought. He is a leading merchant of the place, but is not afraid to speak his thought openly, and he has lost nothing by so doing. A few such men along the line would advance our movement wonderfully. They help to develop our forces by brave and inspiring efforts; and brighter hopes shine on the way of toil.

His mother, Mrs. R. B. Ewing, has been a Freethinker almost from her youth by the simple power of her own thought. Born upon the frontier, in the bosom of the Presbyterian church, she had but few books to read, or other advantages for culture. She had to make her way by innate force into the fair fields of truth. The first book to open her eyes was "Nelson on Infidelity," a plea for the orthodox faith. The very weakness of its arguments convinced her of the false foundations of the Christian religion, and from that time on she has followed the path of common sense and humanity. She is a noble exemplification of the independence of woman. Five years ago she plunged into the wilderness—before the railroad was built, or scarcely a cabin—and took up a claim, and with wonderful pertinacity has held on and made a home. A six-foot man couldn't do any better than this gentle and delicate woman, in the conquest of nature. On the afternoon of Thursday, with Coke Ewing, I wandered through the giant forest to this secluded domicile, about a mile and a half from Buckley. We go along the banks of the White river, where the mills are setting their swift teeth into the stubborn pines and cedars, that are compelled to abdicate their branching freedom and become boards, nothing but boards. Such is the relentless way of civilization. We beheld one of these monarchs bow its shaggy crown, amidst dust and turmoil, to the shuddering earth. It seemed cruel, and if these trees have life how they must revolt against this tyranny. If trees ever have it their own way I wonder what kind of revenge they will take. In a cleared space of about two acres, no other dwellings in sight, is the residence of Mrs. Ewing, in a kind of delicious solitude, where the green and gray ranks hem in from the world; where the river flashes in the verdant shrubbery, and not a sound can be heard save what the birds make, and the winds and rushing stream. Here is the home of Freethought; here are books and papers, and the latest and brightest outcome of man's genius, and mingling with the majesty of the unhewn forest are the fires of the human mind that make the wilderness bloom and blossom like the rose.

B. F. Small, whom I met two years ago at Seattle, is still on the pioneer roll and finds no halting-place for thought or deed, and is always at the front, and keeps up good cheer. He makes the sparks fly, and the anvil chorus rings. Around his hospitable board I found the "feast of reason and flow of soul."

Since I saw my friend last he has taken to himself a wife, and as neither of them believes in the "rib story," equality is the angel of the fireside.

Mrs. Mary Ballard is also a woman without superstition, who studies the problems of life with earnest purpose and finds no use for the churches.

E. M. Goss, Robert Donaldson, Charles Harkens, Leon Emont, D. S. Dundas, A. D. Teuke, A. Wickersham, F. L. Clogston, E. VanAlstine, are on the roll of Freethought. These and many others have made my work at Buckley pleasant and successful. The lectures were largely attended. The school-house was full both evenings. At present there is no church building here and the clergy are rather scarce. They don't find a very adequate support. Buckley is fortunate in its vigorous infancy. But I suppose the grip will come ere long—the hand of priestly power. But in the mean time Freethought is pushing on, the sun is shining and the flowers are growing, and out of the heart of the gloomy forest this fair village is making its way to wealth and beauty and elegant homes, and the depths of gloom will be succeeded by golden harvest fields.

The Allman brothers and other friends came over from Boise City, and this also has a look ahead and don't propose to trail its colors in the dust.

So everything has a brilliant look. Onward and upward, over and through the Cascades, is my journey now. In the bright sunset Pasco gleams into view, and we cross the mighty river which seems here like a vast lake stretching into misty distances. On from Pasco to Cheney, and the moon rises and the midnight hour is struck before we arrive. A good sleep refreshes for the bright morning. I have a chance for breakfast, and a few words with comrade Jewell, who, unfortunately, is on a bed of sickness, but is cheerful as ever and won't give up the ship. The train starts for Davenport, but when half way there, at Medical Lake, the engine breaks down, and for four hours we are doomed to wait to the music of the solemn pines—and a melancholy music it is—until we hear the whistle of the locomotive that comes to give us a lift. I reach Davenport at about five o'clock P.M., instead of eleven o'clock A.M., but in plenty of time for the lecture, and so I submit to the delay without any expletives. My friend Wilson is ready to greet me, and whenever I see his face I know that everything is all right, and that the flag is flung to the breeze. In a little while I am whisked over the wild and dusty roads to the residence of Mr. and Mrs. John Nichols, about a half mile from the station, on a gentle eminence overlooking a broad reach of territory, mostly uncultivated but holding the promise of a brilliant future. Mr. Nichols is one of the pioneers of this place but still a young man, and he is making an elegant home on his one hundred and sixty acres. He has planted twelve acres to timber and the trees are growing finely, and in a few years there will be a splendid grove for a Freethought picnic. Numerous fruit trees and vines are also flourishing, and it is demonstrated that this country can be made a garden to vie with any other land in the richness of its products. I had a delightful visit with my friends, who are thorough-going Liberals. I am sorry to report that the little girl was sick Saturday and Sunday, and so the parents could not attend any of the lectures, which was a disappointment all round. Like our grandmother Eve, the little one was too fond of fruit, which, I suppose, is what the theologians would call "original sin." I am glad to say, however, that my little friend was drinking in the sunshine on Monday morning, and was evidently on the road to health. I found my jovial comrade, Peter Selde, hard at work raising a windmill, which is a great deal better than raising a prayer, and will do more—"raise the wind" and shower the parched earth. Selde's handshake and laugh make one feel good all over, for certainly he takes life at the best, and looks to the morning and not to the night. Saturday evening the hall is nearly full. There is an increased attendance upon last year, although not a single clergyman was present, while last year I was flanked by half a dozen.

Sunday morning, amidst showers of dust, but a bright blue sky above, I travel to the ever cheerful fireside of Mr. and Mrs. Ed. Ramm, where the Secular Pilgrim has the very best of entertainment, and can continue his journey with renewed courage. Mrs. Ramm has been on the sick list for almost all the past year, but is now better, having visited the golden atmosphere of California. But ill health nor anything else can quench her enthusiasm for Freethought, and Ed. Ramm is just the same, and his house is good as a Mecca for the pioneers of progress. Always a genial company is present and there is plenty of fun. Mine host relates the following: "A couple of little metropolitan bootblacks had passed three rainy days without a shine. One of them was pious. He prayed the first three days, 'Give us this day our daily bread.' On the fourth day it still rained, and no 'shine' and no nickel. As the prayerful gamin began the usual petition his companion nudged him, 'Say, Jimmie, put in a word for pie this time.'"

Sunday afternoon a fair audience was present. After the lecture I break bread and devour other good things at the table of Mr. and Mrs. Robinson, who know how to make the traveler happy without asking a particle of grace. Also we have a little gathering with Mr. and Mrs. Born and their three merry children, and the time flies with joyous wings. In the evening the hall is crowded and the series of lectures closes with a brighter outlook than ever. Davenport is rich in Liberal fellowship. They pull together here. It makes a kind of garden of Eden for the Infidel lecturer. There is not much up-hill work. One feels as if he had plenty of friends and that the world was moving in the right direction.

The Big Bend Country, as it is called round about here, is on the go, indeed. A year ago I had to travel into this country thirty-six miles by team. Now one railroad is already built into Davenport, and another is within four miles and in less than a month will be in the limits of the city. The population has more than doubled since I was here, and a large number of fine dwellings and business blocks have been erected. Everything is favorable for quite a city, and for the development of the resources of the splendid agricultural country in the vicinity.

Monday morning, behind the magnificent team of my namesake, John Putnam, I am whirled to his ranch, where I always find a royal welcome. Mrs. Putnam don't exactly like to be reckoned an Infidel. She likes to picture the Infidel as having horns and hoofs and a ring in his nose, and a brass collar round his neck. She has a fondness for the Christian name, but is no more of a Christian than I am. Her father was a Universalist and called an Infidel in his day, and I rather think that my cousin is more of an Infidel than her father. Her son and daughter, Frank Caverno and Mrs. Connelly, are radical from head to foot, and so we are cousins all around. "Uncle John" has the vim of a pioneer and has "blazed" his own path, and has no use for a sky-pilot. After dinner and farewells we have to hasten to catch the train for Cheney.

Our comrades of former campaigns, Frees and Anderson, could not be with us through all the lectures this time, but are always in trim for work.

Mr. and Mrs. Selde, children and grand-children, sons and daughters, do all make in themselves the color company of the grand army.

Mr. and Mrs. Whittaker were present from Harrington, and they are both staunch and true. I was glad to meet them and place their names upon the roll of honor.

Friend Simmons was with me on my journey to Cheney. His ranch is just outside the city limits, on high ground, making beautiful building-lots for the metropolis of the Big Bend.

Many other friends I meet at Davenport who must be nameless for want of room. Their cordial greetings and generous support will not be forgotten, nor the words of cheer. Always shall this bright land, where the waves of civilization touch its bosom to glittering promise, be a picture of hopefulness and delight, and in the hosts of freedom here are noble allies—devoted leaders who will always keep to the front—and over these breezy plains our banners shall never droop. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

HORACE SEAVER.

Last Sunday afternoon, says a brief dispatch in a morning paper, the funeral of Horace Seaver, late editor of the Boston Investigator, was held in Paine Memorial Hall. Colonel Ingersoll delivered the eulogy, according to the request of the deceased.

So passes away the oldest Liberal editor, and the editor of the oldest Liberal paper, in the world. We cannot say that he has passed to a higher life, because we do not know; but to us it seems there could be no higher life than that which he led as the advocate of religious liberty and the enemy of superstition.

Mr. Seaver left but brief records for the use of his biographers. He seemed averse to allowing his age to be known. He did not tell of his troubles, for during the past few years he suffered much more than the readers of his paper were permitted to know. In 1888 a volume of selections from his writings, edited by L. K. Washburn, was published under the title of "Occasional Thoughts." It would seem that this should have included at least a brief sketch of the life of so remarkable a man, but it did not. We know, however, that in early life Mr. Seaver learned the printer's trade, and that as long ago as 1830 he printed the first volume of the Investigator for Abner Kneeland; and that when in consequence of religious persecution Mr. Kneeland was obliged to sever his connection with the paper, Mr. Seaver and his associate, Josiah P. Mendum, assumed control of it, the one as editor and the other as publisher. For more than fifty years thereafter no issue of the Investigator appeared that did not contain something from the pen of Horace Seaver.

In early life, we are told, Mr. Seaver married a lady with whom he lived in unalloyed happiness until her death. At her death, he dispensed with the services of a priest, and conducted the funeral himself. He never remarried.

B. F. Underwood, who was a long-time acquaintance of Mr. Seaver, says: "His style had a natural dignity and a Ben. Franklin sort of simplicity. He was an admirer of Shakespeare, and quoted often from him in writing and speaking. Mr. Seaver was an eloquent and effective speaker, and had he cultivated his oratorical and dramatic talents, and exercised them in some popular field, they would doubtless have gained for him a reputation. The most touching funeral address I ever heard was one in which Mr. Seaver, over the dead body of a friend, paid a tribute to his memory. He never tired of dwelling on the great efforts of Webster and Phillips. The latter he thought the most polished and perfect orator of modern times. Mr. Seaver was a man of simple habits and unostentatious life. His naturally generous and charitable disposition made him ever ready to overlook the mistakes and infirmities of his fellowmen. Mr. Seaver's philosophy was that of 'common sense,' and he cared little for idealistic theories and metaphysical speculations. 'One world at a time' (an expression which Ingersoll and others have made familiar to the public the last few years) was Mr. Seaver's motto half a century ago, and he never changed it. During all these years the Investigator advocated unsectarian schools, the removal of disabilities on account of religious belief, the taxation of church property, and the complete secularization of the state. It spoke out boldly for many of the reforms that have triumphed, and for others that have passed through the period of execration, when it required rare moral courage to give them support. Even those who may think they have reason to regret Mr. Seaver's opposition to Christian beliefs and authorities, cannot withhold admiration of his character, loyalty to his convictions, and brave defense of many a struggling reform."

We hope that a full and faithful account of the life and labors of Horace Seaver will be written and published. It would be a most instructive and helpful work. He perhaps did not possess any surpassing powers either as a writer or an orator. He did not achieve what the world calls great success. He held no high office of position or power. Yet he had a broad and capacious mind, a good memory, the faculty to apply an observation where it would have the most force, a fidelity to facts, an equable temper, a ready pen, and a good address as a public speaker. He was as faithful as the sun, and these qualities won for him from thousands the high esteem and the love which the genius and talent of more brilliant men has failed to gain, though applied to upholding sacred errors and flattering the vanity and ministering to the prejudices of the world. As a lesson and an inspiration his life is not surpassed by that of any character which this century has produced.

INDIFFERENCE.

One of the contentions of Liberalism is that vicarious atonement is immoral, and that a person who shifts to the shoulders of another the burden which he should bear himself is neglecting his duty and shirking his responsibility, and is what in commercial language is known as a "beat." A good many men get through the world by beating their way from the cradle to the grave. There are an equal number who are willing to enjoy all the blessings of civilization and of liberty without doing anything for the promotion of either, and we call attention to this fact for the reason that some of the number are people who are Infidels and profess to be Liberals. We will not say anything about the particular species who take the Freethought papers and never pay for them. They belong to the class that take anything they can get for nothing, whether it is a Freethought paper or a religious one, and there is no help for them short of the grave. We received a notice the other day from one of these fellows who had been taking FREETHOUGHT as a gift for nearly a year. He stated that the sentiments of the paper were, in his opinion, highly dangerous, pernicious, and to be detested, and requested us to discontinue—not at once but—at the expiration of the time for which it was paid, unless the gentleman who had paid his subscription should renew for him! He would not miss a thing he got for nothing though it worked his eternal damnation.

But there is another class, a big class, a most respectable class, of so-called Freethinkers with whom, perhaps, it may be profitable to labor. These are the indifferent people who do not care to take a Freethought paper under any consideration. They say that the world is moving in the right direction, that it is growing more Liberal every day, and that a few years will see the last of the churches. They are partly correct. The world is moving in the right direction, but it is through no merit of theirs that it is doing so. They are passengers who neither work their way nor pay their fare. They are deadheads on the car of progress. They are willing to see others laboring hard, for poor pay, to keep the train in motion. They accept the vicarious atonement and the bleeding sacrifice of those who are crucified daily upon the cross of human selfishness.

Yes, the world is growing more Liberal; but why? For the reason that there are a few men and women who ask nothing but room to stand and work for the advancement of the world.

They do not want money and they do not want praise; they only want to see, before they die, some indication of the dawn of reason over the whole earth. Furthermore, it is for the reason that there are other men and women unselfish enough to give support to those who are doing their work. Because of these—the workers and their supporters and sympathizers—the indifferent man is able to say that the world moves in the right direction. Otherwise he would be either in the church or in the pillory, and there would be no progress.

These indifferentists vary in their activity from the condition of absolute repose to that of occasionally saying a good word for Liberalism or staying with a Freethought lecturer until the hat is passed. Sometimes, when cornered, they will subscribe for a Liberal paper, but they will not renew. Rather will they scratch the universe with a fine-tooth comb to find an excuse for discontinuing. They have "no time to read it." They are "going to move." They "take another paper and can't afford two." They are "obliged to retrench. Times are hard."

The man who does not have time to read a Liberal paper will flounder for three hours a day through columns of prize-fight news. The man who is going to move knows well enough that that is not the true reason. The man who takes the other paper probably owes for it, and the one that has to retrench does not retrench at all except by stopping his paper and discouraging the cause he professes to espouse. Of course there are persons too poor to take a paper, but such cases are rare, and for everyone of them there are dozens who could pay ten subscriptions each and never be inconvenienced by doing so. If what W. S. Bell calls the "half-breeds" would only be honest they would admit that they don't care; that they really don't take interest enough in enlightenment, and progress, and truth to get off the fence on either side; that they hold no particular principles, and are not sure that it pays to have any, and that so long as others are apparently willing to fight their battles for them there is no reason why they should waste their powder.

These conclusions are forced upon us by daily experience. We are assured that nine-tenths of the reasons given by indifferentists for not taking a Liberal paper are hypocritical ones. They are able to pay and they know it. They know that the publication of reform literature is unremunerative, but they appear to think that the publisher can do better work with his hands tied by lack of means and his mind perturbed by discouragement than he would be able to do if these cares were off his mind. They fear that if he can pay for one meal and have enough money left to insure the next one, his brain will do less effective service than it would if he were totally impecunious.

This indifference is the curse of the reform movement. It is the evil which must be overcome, and if every reader would turn his thoughts inward and inquire whether he is paying his way or not, and if not resolve that he will accept no more vicarious services, but immediately discharge his duty to the cause, we believe the battle would be more than half won.

A SECULAR UNION has been formed in Washington county, Or., with the following officers: D. C. Stewart, president; H. O. Hyde, Bruce Huston (Hillsboro), Martin Manning (Greenville), W. S. Hudson (Gaston), Joseph Bucher (Gales City), vice-presidents; Mrs. Sarah C. Todd, secretary; T. M. Hines, treasurer. The Washington County Secular Union will meet the first Sunday in every month, the next meeting being held at Vert's Liberal Hall, Forest Grove, September 1.

THE LADY AND THE PRIEST.

There is a man in Chicago who should have read the Decameron of Boccaccio, taken its lessons to heart, and kicked the Rev. Father Moysant, a Catholic priest, out of his house the first time he darkened its doors. The man's name is McDonald, he is a prominent politician, and the Rev. Father Moysant has run away with his wife. The woman, according to McDonald's statement, was not a giddy girl, and it was not a case of personal infatuation. The priest was scarce better than a tramp when he made her acquaintance—a greasy, ill-mannered reprobate. But the woman became little less than a fanatic in religion, and the brute brought a tremendous religious influence to bear upon her. He had an altar erected in the house, ostensibly for the purpose of worship, but really only as a blind to deceive the husband. The woman was weak mentally; the priest was strong mentally and physically, and with his powerful leverage, the church, she became an easy prey. The intrigue has been going on for two years, the priest having married the woman by talking off her husband's ring and substituting his own, and exacting from her an oath that she would be a wife to him only.

The exposure of this priestly intrigue is something of a new departure. It is generally understood that such performances are confined to the confessional box, and the priests are usually crafty enough to keep their counsel and avoid publicity. Perhaps it will set husbands to inquiring what the relations are between their wives and daughters and the impostors who extort from them their most sacred and private thoughts. If it does, the present deplorable affair may result in some good.

A GOOD WORD FOR JUDGE TERRY.

To the Editors of Freethought:

The inclosed resolutions will doubtless sufficiently refute your remarks in the last issue of FREETHOUGHT. I will, however, add that I have personally known Judge Terry for more than twenty years, and his reputation has not been that of a desperado or a bully. His private life and morals, like his official life and acts, were above reproach. He was not a Catholic, hence he had no claims for burial services by a priest of that church, were he ever so good. However, I am able to say of my own knowledge that his religion, like his politics, was that of Thomas Jefferson. His funeral was largely attended, and by friends. Fifty-three carriages and buggies followed his remains from the church to the cemetery. The watch-dog is dead and the sheep are at the mercy of the wolves. Personally I should prefer to be Judge Terry dead rather than Judge Field living. Yours, W. F. FREEMAN.

Stockton, Cal., Aug. 25.

We are glad to give the foregoing letter space in the columns of FREETHOUGHT; all the more so if our remarks have done injustice to the dead jurist. In stating that Judge Terry had the reputation of a bully and a desperado we wrote advisedly. There is a difference between a man's reputation and his character. His reputation is what the world has to do with; his character belongs to himself and his friends. The meanest man, the most cowardly man, and the greatest hypocrite may bear a spotless reputation, while the courageous and conscientious citizen may be misjudged and condemned to infamy because he will not bend to popular opinion. It is the verdict of history that the reputation of a man passes away with the few generations which succeed him, and that if he have character worthy of admiration it will be vindicated by posterity and will endure when his faults are forgotten.

We know that our friend Freeman is not alone in his estimate of Judge Terry. Other men for whose opinion we have equal respect have spoken of him as Chevalier Bayard was spoken of, as "a knight without fear and without reproach." Certainly he was no coward, and a clearer vision may reveal that he was less a willing law-breaker than a victim of circumstances which he was unable to control. We should not be at all surprised to learn, when the truth is known, that Judge Terry was the best man present at the shooting.

THE editor of the Truth Seeker, who has been suffering from an attack of typhoid fever, was at last accounts so far recovered as to go back to his desk, a thinner and twenty pounds lighter man.

SEND to FREETHOUGHT office the names of Liberals who might become subscribers, and we will send them sample copies. Get up clubs of subscribers where possible. Two subscriptions to FREETHOUGHT will be given for $3; three for $4, or four for $5. These rates are only for new subscribers for the first year.

THANKS are returned to Mr. John Dibble, of Santa Clara, for a pleasant call and a lift of five dollars for the benefit of FREETHOUGHT. We also acknowledge with gratitude a dollar from Mr. Frank Butler, of Oakland, and a similar sum from A. C. Smith, of Bakersfield, to be put "where it will do the most good."

SOME inquiry has been made as to the cause of Mr. P. O. Chilstrom's resignation as president of the San Francisco Freethought Society. The following from an Oregon paper furnishes the needed explanation:

"On Wednesday evening, August 7, 1889, at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. R. M. Porter, at Forest Grove, Washington county, Oregon, there were married Mrs. M. E. Floyd, of that city, and P. O. Chilstrom, Esq., of San Francisco."

It is not too late, we hope, to extend our congratulations.

CZAR ALEXANDER of Russia has done the best and most popular act of his life by extending a full "pardon" to N. G. Tcherny-chewsky, the poet and political writer, who in 1864 was sentenced to fourteen years of penal servitude in the mines of Siberia. The crime for which he suffered this punishment was writing socialistic articles for a magazine published in St. Petersburg, and his original sentence was prolonged in consequence of numerous attempts made by his friends to effect his escape. He is now sixty years old and broken in health and fortune.

JUDGE LEVY, of San Francisco, has created a law. A question arose in the case of Caroline Jackson, a negro woman born in slavery, for which there were no precedents, and Judge Levy had to make a precedent. Caroline Jackson was the daughter of a slave, and her right to her father's estate was contested on the ground that slaves could make no legal marriages and therefore could have no legitimate children. The court held that emancipation, by raising the colored race from the status of property to that of humanity, legitimized the children. Perhaps when the whole race has reached the status of humanity, some righteous judge will hold that in law, as in nature, all children are legitimate.

EDITOR OWEN, our Spiritual contemporary, gets his editorial matter by "secluding himself from the world and becoming passive and susceptible to those higher and better influences and thoughts which he endeavors to express through the columns of the Golden Gate." Here in Brother Owen has a large bulge on the rest of the fraternity, who have to wander through great piles of exchanges in order to find items worth commenting upon. Strangely enough, however, this process sometimes turns out as readable matter as the "passive and susceptible" method. The chief drawback of the latter is that while waiting for the "higher and better influences" to manifest themselves, the writer is likely to go to sleep. We have found by experience that an office full of visitors discussing with animation some subject foreign to that of which we are writing at the time, is necessary to the best results from the editorial pen.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK

A fire broke out in McNear's grain warehouse, at Port Costa, about 4 o'clock last Monday morning, and half a million dollars' worth of property was destroyed. The American ship Armenia, and the British ship Honauwar, two splendid three-masters, were caught by the fire and burned to the water's edge. The fine four-mast British steel ship Kenilworth was afire, but before she became a total loss she was scuttled. Besides the ships, the warehouse and thirty-two cars belonging to the Southern Pacific Company were totally destroyed. Port Costa is an important shipping-place for grain on the Central Pacific railroad at the point where trains are ferried across the strait between Suisun bay and the bay of San Pablo.—The United States Senate Committee on the Reclamation and Irrigation of the Arid Lands of the United States arrived in this city last Saturday evening by special train from Truckee. The party is composed of Senators W. M. Stewart of Nevada, John H. Reagan of Texas, and James K. Jones of Arkansas.—The lawyers in the Neagle-Terry case are still arguing the question of jurisdiction. The charge of conspiracy against Field is dismissed.—The Nationalists of San Francisco met in one of the parlors of the Palace Hotel last Saturday evening and organized a club. Burnett G. Haskell was the organizer. In his address he denied being a dreamer or a crank. The Nationalists are practically Socialists.—To keep up the price of muskmelons the commission merchants of this city dumped 1600 crates of that fruit into the bay last week rather than sell them for what they were worth.—Petaluma will suppress the Salvation Army and the gamblers during the fair.—The steam cruiser Charleston on her late trial trip developed a speed of 18½ knots per hour for six hours, and is voted a success.—"Bill" Higgins, the deceased political boss of San Francisco, was buried from St. Mary's Catholic church. The politicians are nearly all Romanists.—One man was killed and several injured by a collision of trains on the Oregon Short Line near Meacham station, Or., Aug. 22.—Leong Hang Tsang, the Chinese consul at San Francisco, is charged with embezzling $300,000 placed in his hands for charitable purposes.

Henry D. Shaw, the St. Louis philanthropist, died Aug. 25.—Statistics show that 84,000 less immigrants arrived in New York during the past six months than in the corresponding period of last year. The largest decrease is in Italians.—Mahone is nominated for governor by the Republicans of Virginia.—A monument to the soldiers of Indiana was dedicated at Indianapolis Aug. 22, President Harrison delivering the oration.—Graham, the cooper, passed through the whirlpool rapids of Niagara last Sunday in a barrel-shaped boat. He went four miles in ten minutes.—The trial of the Cronin murderers was begun at Chicago Aug. 26. Coughlin, Burke, Beggs, Kunze, and O'Sullivan were charged with complicity.

The sentence of Mrs. Maybrick, the woman who poisoned her husband and was condemned by the English courts to be hanged, has been commuted to imprisonment for life.—London dock laborers on strike held a meeting at Hyde Park last Sunday which is said to have been attended by 100,000 persons. The strike is growing and has almost paralyzed business along the river.—Dispatches from Egypt say that a terrible famine prevails at Khartoum and other river towns and that natives are dying by the hundred, the survivors feeding upon the bodies of the dead.—Edwin Arnold, author of the "Light of Asia," is on his way to America, and will travel homeward by way of California and Japan.

OBSERVATIONS.

I am told that I missed much through my inability to attend the last meeting of the San Francisco Freethought Society. Mr. Eastman presided, and it is always a pleasure to see our first vice-president in the chair. Then the Hon. F. B. Perkins delivered the address, and there is no speaker in the country I would rather listen to. Also Mr. Thomas Curtis spoke felicitously, and Mr. H. L. Knight wisely and humorously. They always speak in that way. Furthermore, Dr. O'Brock did not have anything to say, and I am one who can appreciate the eloquence of silence. Having felt the blows of sound, it is hard luck to lose the benefit of the poultice. The zither music by the Misses Haelke was unsurpassed; the attendance was large; the collection fulfilled the treasurer's highest hopes, and there was nothing lacking that goes so much to make a successful meeting.

Next Sunday evening the veteran Thomas Curtis will occupy the attention of the audience with an address entitled "Fifty Years of Freethought." Mr. Curtis has been acquainted with most of the reformers East and West, including the late Horace Seaver, and his reminiscences cannot fail to be interesting and instructive.

Horace Seaver, the late editor of the Investigator, owed his conversion from Christianity to Freethought to his contact with Robert Dale Owen sometime prior to 1830. He had been educated for the ministry, and was about to commence his career as a preacher, when he heard that the Infidels of Boston were holding meetings in that city. He thought these scoffers should be answered, and expressed that opinion to a learned professor of theology. The latter agreed with him, and said, moreover, that he had no doubt that the young Mr. Seaver was the very man called of God to confound and convert the unbelievers. Under this impression Mr. Seaver attended a meeting of the Infidels, and requested permission to speak, which was politely accorded him. He relates that he arose full of the confidence born of religious conceit, gave the meeting the most overwhelming evidence he had at his command, and sat down under the full conviction that he had dispelled the last illusion of unbelief. He remained of that opinion but a few minutes, for Robert Dale Owen followed him, took up his arguments one at a time, and scattered them to the four winds. When he concluded his remarks every prop was gone from under the young theologian and his case was lost. The more he tried to answer the arguments of Owen the more he became convinced that they were unanswerable, and he discovered that his learned professor of theology could handle them no better than himself, and could refer him to no one who was any better prepared for that task. This awoke in his mind a suspicion that he had been laboring under a delusion with regard to the truth of Christianity. Subsequent investigation changed the suspicion to conviction, the genuineness of which is attested by fifty years of devotion to the cause of Freethought.

SATURDAY, Aug. 24, 1889.—Perhaps one day recently I have been missed from my accustomed haunt. Perchance those who have called to see me have not seen me, but on the contrary I have been invisible to the unaided eye.

Friday is the day of the week that I give to leisure. My week's work begins Sunday morning, and I work hard until Thursday night, when the papers are wrapped and put in the mail sacks. The next day there is not so much strain upon my energies. I like to see visitors then, because I have spare time to devote to them; and whereas on other days I let them state and argue untenable propositions without rebuke, on Friday I debate with them. I strive to entertain all who come, and to put them at ease at once by entering into the spirit of their thought. It is entirely within my scope to discuss anything, from theology to mechanics or sailing a ship, and the other day when a man from Arizona and another from Capay marked out a triangle on the floor and went to playing marbles with the pigs-in-clover spheres, I looked on with interest and encouraged each as much as I could without appearing to display partiality.

So it was last Friday that when a muscular man desired to introduce me to a few feats of agility that he had become familiar with in the mines, I co-operated all I could to make it pleasant for him. There is an innocent trick with a broomstick which I used to perform when a boy, and in attempting to illustrate it on this occasion, something in my ankle gave way with a loud report, and my right foot has been in a state of disuse ever since. I travel now by means of an express wagon, though as I write these lines I am at home with the above member done up in strong liniment and resting idly but independently on a pillow. It knows its importance, and, if disturbed, resents the same by aching like the midnight tooth. The poet now might number me in his list of friends, for I would not needlessly set foot upon a worm, or anything else that is not large and soft. Thus I am a prisoner, with no show for bail, habeas corpus proceedings, or bouquets from my female admirers. Still I do not complain, for it is profitable to stay at home sometimes and see what the neighborhood looks like during business hours. Besides, the view from the window is pleasant. I can see the castle on Telegraph Hill; the Greek church with a dome that looks like an inflated bladder; the convent down in the hollow where the good priest repairs for that comfort which he cannot purchase at the store. I can look out also upon Alcatraz and Goat Island, and see the white-capped waves from the Golden Gate running races across the bay. My next door neighbor is practicing on the piano. Over the way the grocery man stands on the stoop waiting for a hoodlum to come along and paralyze him with a sandclub and go through his till. As I look a small child starts to cross the street with a loaf of bread under one arm and a large pitcher of beer in the opposite hand. Growing weary, the child sets the pitcher down, looks at its foaming contents, becomes dizzy, falls in, and, weighted with the loaf of pumpernickel, sinks to the bottom to rise no more. Neighbors and idlers gather around, and a hush falls over the assemblage when it is realized that the beer is spoiled. A zephyr from Russian Hill comes freighted with sand, and nothing more is visible for half an hour. Then I look again. Beyond the chimneys I see the water once more. There is the captain of a tug dumping in the bay a load of dredgings that he agreed to tow outside Point Lobos. There is a steamer bound for the South Sea isles. Her cargo is partly missionaries and partly whiskey. When the natives of Booloobooloo see her coming they will wade into the Pacific up to their necks to meet and greet her, but it is not the missionaries that they will go wild over.

It is pleasant to sit here and listen to my next door neighbor practicing on the piano, and to see the grocery man patiently await the hoodlum. A little canary skips about in his cage hung in the window. Occasionally he takes the cud out of his mouth and sings a bar from some popular opera. The setting sun reaches through the Gate and plants its banners upon the fortifications of Alcatraz. It puts red lights in the windows on Telegraph hill. It touches the patched sails of a scow wallowing in the bay and makes them as luminous as the white canvas of a yacht that goes careering by. Looking out thus upon sky and water and mountains, thinking whence such glory comes, wondering what may be beyond the purple twilight of the hills, I hear the sound of a silver-plated bell, and slide down the banisters to supper.

Brother Williams, from Utah, tells this story. It is new to me, though the reader may have seen it before: A soldier in the late war lay upon the ground, during a battle, with both legs shot off below the knees. An Irishman heard his groans, and accepted his invitation to shoulder the wounded man and carry him to the rear. He had the footless soldier across his back in a jiffy and started for camp, but he had not gone far when a cannon ball came along and supplemented the work of its predecessor by taking off the soldier's head. The Irishman, however, was insensible of the loss and kept up his march to the rear, until accosted by an officer who inquired where he was going with that trunk. "Faith," said the Irishman, "it's a poor fellow who has his legs shot off, and I'm carrying him to the rear for surgical treatment." "But the man is dead," said the officer; "his head is gone." Paddy looked around at his passenger, saw that the officer had spoken the truth, and then dropped his lifeless burden with an oath. "Be Jasus," said he, "it's the last favor I'll ever do that feller. His head's gone sure enough, and the deceivin' son of a gun told me it was his legs!"

THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

OFFICIAL CALL FOR THE THIRTEENTH ANNUAL CONGRESS.

The next annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held in Philadelphia, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 25, 26, and 27, 1889. It is deemed expedient to hold this meeting where our society was organized in 1876, and where the so-called "National Reform Association" has its headquarters, and has recently held an important convention, and for many historic and other reasons.

All charter and life members, all vice-presidents, all chairmen of state executive committees, and all duly accredited delegates from local Secular societies are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress. Each local society is entitled to send its president, secretary, and three other delegates. Annual members by payment of one dollar are entitled to seats.

Particulars as to the place of meeting, speakers, and their subjects, etc., will be announced hereafter.

Buddhism in Japan.

Hierophant Olcott, according to the New York Sun, is said after all to be creating a veritable furor on his Buddhistic tour through Japan. At first some of the Buddhist priests gave him the cold shoulder. Then he began to excite popular interest, which was intensified as he went through the larger provincial towns. At Nagoya, a large commercial town between Tokio and Kioto, he had audiences at each lecture of about 4000 people, and it is said that the wildest applause everywhere greets his declaration that the closest relationship exists between the stable progress of the nation and the maintenance of true Buddhism.

The Buddhists who control his tour, seeing the effect he is producing, are hurrying him about, so that he is delivering lectures and orations in three or four different places in the same day. He does not speak a word of Japanese, and his lectures are, therefore, delivered in English and translated on the platform by an interpreter, sentence by sentence, as he goes along. Yet he arouses great enthusiasm. Not only the common people hear him, but also the high officials. In many of the large towns through which he passed special meetings were held at times suitable to officials, at which they alone were present.

A Bruno Anecdote.

It would hardly be reasonable, says the London Globe, to expect a martyr to be extremely prudent in language while the fagots were being set alight for him, and for that reason just before the burning must be a bad quarter of an hour for secret accomplices. At least that is the idea suggested by a story of Giordano Bruno. As he was being led to the stake he cried out to his friend and co-believer: "My ideas will not perish with me. To thee, Ventimiglia, I address a last appeal. Forget not our projects; continue my work." On hearing his name thus publicly proclaimed, Ventimiglia, who was in the crowd waiting to see the spectacle, was sorely agitated, and hastily stole away from the scene, the Campo del Fiori, and after hiding for a few days, managed at last to get away from Rome. He did not quite appreciate the distinction Bruno was conferring on him.

W. F. JAMIESON is announced for a week's lectures in Hay Springs, Nebraska. His address is Coryell, Col. At the close of his Nebraska engagements he goes to Kansas.

THE WASHINGTON CONSTITUTION.

The work of the Constitutional Convention is so far completed that the provisions of the Constitution in regard to secularism may be considered settled. They are:

1. A recognition of "the Supreme Ruler of the universe." This is a bid for the church vote, on the part of Judge Turner and others.

2. That an oath or affirmation may be administered in the form most binding on the conscience of the witness. This is the statutory provision in force to-day.

3. Freedom of conscience.

4. "No public money or property shall be appropriated for or applied to any religious worship, exercise, or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment."

5. "No religious qualification shall be required for any public office or employment, nor shall any person be incompetent as a witness, or juror, in consequence of his opinion on matters of religion, nor be questioned in any court of justice touching his religious belief to affect the weight of his testimony."

The question of the taxation of church property was disposed of by an amendment which left the whole question of exemption with the legislature. Hence if a legislature favorable to the exemption of church property is elected, legislation of that kind can be enacted. Nor need the exemption stop at that point. All property owned by religious societies, and used for school and benevolent purposes, can be exempted. The plea is made that these organizations are devoted to charitable purposes, and thus save the public treasury. But it is equally true that they are under private ownership, subject to private management, and so long as the private individuals who control them choose to limit their aid or charity to a part of the community, the state has no control. The fact is that every homestead which is exempted from sale on execution so far protects the family from being thrown upon the poor fund of the state. The extension of this principle of exemption from taxation to homesteads is demanded quite as much as church exemption. The capital invested in the home is dead capital. It is for the public good that families have a roof-tree they can call their own, where they can feel secure, and from which they cannot be forced upon the street, either at the will of a creditor or of the collector of taxes.

The new Constitution authorizes the legislature to exempt any property used for church or private benevolent purposes. On the other hand it provides for only partial homestead exemption. The article on that point reads: "The legislatures shall protect by law from forced sale a certain portion of the homestead and other property of all heads of families."

This provision is only for the "heads of families"—a phrase which has been construed by our conservative judges to apply only to married men. Only a "portion" is exempt.

In the article on "state, county, and municipal indebtedness," section 7 provides: "No county, city, town, or other municipal corporation shall hereafter give any money, or property, or loan its money or credit to or in aid of any individual, association, company, or corporation, except for the necessary support of the poor and infirm; or become directly or indirectly the owner of stock in or bonds of any association, company, or corporation."

The design of this article was to prohibit subsidies to any private business. It was claimed that it was so sweeping that it would prevent aid to the poor, and the words in italic were inserted. As it now reads a county or other municipal corporation can grant to any sectarian institution which is caring for the poor whom it chooses to care for, any amount of aid it chooses, either in direct grants or in a loan of its credit. The provision was unnecessary, and provides an easy way for sectarian societies to live at the expense of the public treasury.

The article on elections shows the greatest illiberality. The adult women of this territory having the other qualifications of voters were electors under the election law of 1888. The Bloomer decision held the law unconstitutional on the ground that the legislature never had the power to permit women to vote. The opinion of the Supreme Court was founded on the false assumption that the organic law of 1853 was in force instead of the Revised Statutes of the United States, of 1874.

An appeal bond was filed, the record made up and filed in the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington, and citations issued. This transferred the cause to that court. This opens the judgment below.

"A case is to be heard in the appellate court as if no sentence or judgment had been pronounced below, such sentence, etc., being altogether suspended by the appeal."—Yeaton vs. U. S., 5 Cranch, 281.

"A judgment which has been appealed from cannot be pleaded as res adjudicata while the suit in which it was rendered is pending on appeal."—Byrn vs. Prother, 14 La. Anna, 653.

The question whether the election law of 1888 is a valid law, was a question not raised by the record below. It was an admitted fact upon the pleadings that Mrs. Bloomer was a qualified voter. The decision that she was not was contrary to the admitted facts upon the record. It was not proper for the court to go outside of the record to decide the case. If they did the decision only bound Mrs. Bloomer, and when the appeal was perfected in her name, it was not res adjudicata as to her.

It follows that the decision was and is wholly inoperative, and the female voters of this territory are now legal voters.

This point was distinctly made by Edward Eldridge, of Whatcom, in the convention, on his motion to strike out the word "male" from the article on elections. This amendment received eight votes: Messrs. Dickey, Eldridge, Joy, Prosser, and Winsor, Republicans; Messrs. Eskelmore and McCroskey, Democrats; and W. L. Newton, Labor. Among the fifty nays were thirty-one Republicans and nineteen Democrats. The article makes citizenship the basis of suffrage. Section 3 excluded idiots and insane persons, who in law are incapable of exercising civil rights, from voting. It also excluded "persons convicted of infamous crimes unless restored to civil rights." This recognizes the person who has civil rights to be entitled to vote to protect them. The exclusion of criminals is a relic of tyranny.

The convention refused to give the legislature power to provide that "there shall be no denial of the elective franchise at any election on account of sex."

A section providing that "no person except a qualified voter shall be elected or appointed to any office, civil or military," was opposed on the ground that minors in the military service could not be appointed to a military office, nor boys appointed as pages in the legislature. Hence it was struck out!

The question of striking out the word "male" from the article on elections is to be voted on at the same time the constitution is voted upon—the first day of October, 1889.

The Republican party, which had a large majority in the convention, has for the sake of party success disfranchised the women of this territory. It has declared in the bill of rights that elections shall be free and equal, and in the election article declared that only males shall vote. It has declared that "no law shall be passed granting to any citizen or class of citizens . . . privileges or immunities which upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens;" and at the same time struck down the right of female citizens to vote.

It has violated the old rule that private property shall never be taken for private use, by providing that it may be taken for private use upon the same terms it is taken for public use. This seizes the property of the women of this territory, and subjects it to private use at the will of the men, who will make the laws and execute them. A large minority of the convention were willing to allow the men to vote subsidies to corporations. This failed. But the limitations upon municipal indebtedness can be lifted by a vote of the men, many of whom do not own property to be taxed.

Nearly every reform measure proposed was voted down, and the Republican party has left behind its record as a party of principle and become a party of spoils. It has created a costly but defective judicial system. It has legislated in the constitution for the benefit of capital and failed to recognize the rights of the citizen. It has framed an apportionment clause for the purpose of securing the floating and purchasable vote of the large cities so as to control the election of two United States senators. The only course for men who honor principle seems to me to be to vote down the constitution if possible; but to vote for the "Woman Suffrage Amendment," as a matter of principle. If I did not believe in equal suffrage I would vote for the amendment as a rebuke to the men who have so unjustly disfranchised the women of this territory. In the election of state officers and members of the legislature, no vote should be cast for any time men, for any man who has not the courage of his convictions, for any man who is not willing to give others the rights he claims for himself.

Seattle, W. T., Aug. 21, 1889.

THE SABBATH UNION.

I have attended the meetings of the Sabbath Union, held at the Y. M. C. A. Hall during the past week, and have admired the unanimity of sentiment on the part of the speakers and auditors in regard to fitting their idea of the Sabbath to the shoulders of the rest of the nations. They complain bitterly that the state of California has robbed them of their Christian Sabbath and turned our state over to the Infidels. Inasmuch as the observance of the day is, under our laws, left to the individual conscience of each person, and the Christian has, equally with the Infidel, and the Infidel equally with the Christian, the right to spend the day as he pleases, so long as he does not interfere with the same right in others, it would seem that the only cause these Christians would have for complaint lies in the fact that they are not allowed to make a Sabbath for the rest of us. Their idea, and the one they advocate, is that all business shall be suspended on Sunday. The post-office shall be closed, the railroads stopped, the ferries cease running, and the street cars be left in the stables. No place of entertainment or amusement is to be opened, the innocent and instructive museum and art gallery must be closed, and the public parks, where the weary toiler can take a few hours' recreation, must be shut to him on the only day of the week that belongs to him. In short, every place of relaxation must close, and the only places of business allowed to run on that day are to be the churches. Now, why should the parson's place of business be the only one left open? Why should these men demand that other shops shall close in order that theirs may have business that does not go to them naturally? To gore the other fellow's ox, suppose the non-Sabbatarians of our state, who are in a majority, should call conventions to demand that the churches shall not be allowed to run on Sundays. It would be as fair to close one place as another.

Now I have a suggestion to make to these gentlemen who are so anxious to give the Almighty a day, which he does not seem inclined to take for himself, and that is that, inasmuch as the prayer of the righteous availeth much, and as these gentlemen are of necessity righteous, they call a vast national convention, to continue until their object is attained; that they offer up their prayers to the Almighty, the God whom they worship, and petition him to take one day in seven for himself, and give poor humanity the day of rest which they are so anxious we should have. On that day he could say the sun should not shine, the streams should not flow, the winds and the waves should remain quiescent, the flowers should not bloom, and the accursed digestive apparatus, that causes so much trouble to us all, should not operate; in short, all the operations of nature should be suspended, then these fellows would have just such a Sabbath as they seem to want. But while nature smiles and all out-doors is happy, while creation moves in all her courses on Sunday as on other days; in short, while God himself is a breaker of the Christian Sabbath, poor humanity can be pardoned for refusing to follow the Sabbatarians back to the awful Puritan Sabbath, the one damned day of seven, devoted not to God but to the devil. People to-day are worshiping God, worshiping him in the sunshine and in the groves, worshiping him in happiness and pleasure, and the occupation of the priests is going. They feel it, and know it, and their strong effort to force a dreary Sabbath upon us, to compel us by law to either attend their Sunday shops or waste our time, is the grasping at a straw of the drowning man. It will not succeed. Sunday in California is the poor man's day—the day on which he can enjoy himself with his wife and little ones, on the picnic or in the park, and the Sabbath Union might as well forego its labors, for they will never put the priestly yoke on the people's necks, after being free from it. When our places of Sunday amusement are closed by law, we will also close the piety shops with the other places of business.

SAN FRANCISCO.

DID JESUS CHRIST RISE FROM THE DEAD?*

IX.

That the graves opened when Christ was executed, but that the dead did not rise till he rose, is a curious incident, upon which preachers never preach. I think I could preach from Matthew xxvii, 52, 53, when I take to the Stiggins line of busines. I can quite see the reason why the graves opened when Christ was executed although the dead did not rise till he rose. It would, of course, take the dead some little time to get ready to rise, and the opening of the grave would give them the necessary light to titivate themselves and attend to their sepulchral toilet. If they implicitly depended upon Christ's promise to give them three days and three nights for this purpose, they must have been put to great hurry-scurry and inconvenience when he got up so long before his time. After a person has lain long enough in the grave to have mislaid one of his tarsal bones and lost sight of his patella, it is no joke to get up at an hour or two's notice. Christ, by not keeping his word (hell proving too hot for him), and by his coming back before his time, must have done these corpses a grievous injustice. If he had redeemed his promise and given the full three days and three nights, the thing might possibly have been managed. But, as it was, I have no doubt, in Jerusalem, one corpse could have been observed jogging down Jezebel street without his tibia, another hurrying down Rahab street without his vertebral column, another sauntering down Sarah street without his ulna, and yet another racing down Tamar street minus his radius and his pelvis. And all this for lack of sufficient time to prepare by way of getting their bones together in order to rise and give the resurrected "Lord" a proper welcome. You have a good deal to believe if you really intend to be "saved."

Paul states that Christ appeared to the twelve after his resurrection. The writer of the gospel of Matthew says he appeared unto the eleven. These writers are each divinely inspired. Although they contradict each other, they both tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and this you must believe in order to be "saved." Judas had previously hanged himself, "and, falling in the midst, he burst asunder, and all his bowels gushed out." But, apparently, after he knew that Christ had risen he had a search for his bowels, found them, stuck them in again, and went careering off to behold the resurrected party he had sold for the thirty pieces of silver! All this we are bound to believe rather than believe that the Holy Ghost was wrong when he inspired Paul to say that Christ appeared to the twelve. But, if you credit Matthew you are bound to believe that dead and eviscerated Judas did not make a search for his entrails and find them; but that Christ appeared to the eleven only. Both accounts, although they flatly contradict each other, you must believe in order to be "saved." In short, in regard to the affair of the resurrection, upon which the entire superstructure of Christism is built, you are compelled to adopt the patristic maxim, "I believe the thing because it is impossible."

Never were statements more notoriously unauthenticated than the statements upon which credulous and uncritical Christendom is to-day resting, or pretending to rest, its eternal weal or woe. No scholar submits that the gospels were written within a hundred years of the time of the events with which they pretend to deal. It is taken for granted that they were written in Greek, with the exception of the gospel of St. Matthew, the Hebrew version of which suspiciously disappeared, while a Greek version mysteriously took its place. The gospels, then, were written more than a century after the alleged occurrence of the events with which they deal, and in Greek—a language unknown to the people among whom the events are said to have taken place.

Is there any person in all the world, acquainted with the veriest rudiments of evidence, who will allege, in the face of this, that the gospels were produced under auspices that involved anything like historical accuracy. Institute a parallel case. Assume that the history of the Jacobite Rebellion of 1745 had never been committed to writing until the present year. The only materials extant for the compilation of the history are a number of vague and contradictory traditions circulating among the most ignorant of peasants and fishermen in the remote Highlands of Scotland. The historian is ignorant of the language of the people who were the actors in the rebellion. He does not know the Gaelic of Glengarry and Lochiel, nor the English of Sir John Cope, the Duke of Cumberland, or General Wade; but, from the mass of floating and conflicting traditions, he writes his history in Spanish. What would his history be worth? What could be relied upon as veracious and authentic in any statement made about Prestonpans or Falkirk, or Glenfinlas or Culloden? How far should we be justified in relying upon any account we might have as to the coronation at Holyrood, the halt at Derby; and what literal authenticity could be expected in any saying that this historian (writing in Spanish, and basing his work upon the more than century old traditions of the vulgar) might put into the mouth of General Hawley, Prince Charlie, Frazer of Lovat, Lord Derwentwater, Jennie Cameron, or Flora MacDonald?

And yet this hypothetical historian is fairly analogous with the writers of the gospels. He would know as much about Glenfinlas as they could do about Cana of Galilee; as much about the Duke of Cumberland as they could do about Pontius Pilate; as much about Prestonpans as they could about the garden of Gethsemane; as much about Culloden as they could about the crucifixion; as much about the execution of Balmerino as they could about the resurrection of Christ; and this person, writing in Spanish, could reproduce the sayings of Jenny Cameron and Flora MacDonald quite as accurately as the writers of the gospels could the words of Mary Magdalene or Martha the sister of Lazarus. Moreover, in the parallel I have drawn I have understated rather than overstated the difficulties that lie in the way of attaching the slightest credence to the gospel narratives. I have left out of account that we have not even the narrative in bad Spanish, but something more removed than even that from the original traditions. We do not read even the dog-Greek rendering of the gospels, but a rendering of the bad Greek into bad English. (The English of the New Testament is now, to a great extent, archaic and obsolete). According'y, to complete our history of the '45 rebellion on gospel lines we should have to wait till the bad Spanish became obsolete as a living language, and then set interested parties to translate it into, say, the Russian of two hundred and fifty years ago. Then, and not till then, we should have a history of the '45 rebellion as trustworthy as the gospels, and produced under very nearly the same auspices. "As true as gospel" the adage has been to run; "As false as gospel" would be a great deal nearer the mark.

Englishmen of to-day would consider a history of the Young Pretender, written under the conditions I have specified, too preposterous to call for a moment's serious consideration; but a history of Jesus Christ, written under analogous conditions, they deem so authentic that to question it is sacrilege and to assail it blasphemy. And this record of Christ's resurrection, written, say, a hundred and fifty years after the alleged event, and in a language of which Christ was ignorant, receives slavish credence, because the mass of mankind have neither the time, the will, nor the ability to investigate and think for themselves, and have entrusted their investigation to a tribe of Levites, rapacious Kohathites, who flourish in proportion as they contrive to make and keep men ignorant and superstitious.

"Matthew" is pre-eminently the resurrection gospel. It alone of all writings on the face of the earth knows anything whatever about the terrible earthquake which tore the veil of the Temple, rent rocks, and shook the dead out of their graves. It was so obliging and considerate of Jehovah to get up a rock-rending grave-emptying earthquake for the special advantage of the writer of the gospel according to Matthew, and keep the thing quiet from all the rest of the world. But God's ways are not as our ways. He hides certain of his earthquakes, open graves, and trotting corpses from the wise and prudent, and reveals them unto babes and sucklings and—liars.

As "Matthew" is the only gospel that gives the history of this strictly private and confidential earthquake, we will venture to give a history of the gospel according to Matthew, that all may see how the superstructure of truth is built upon the eternal adamant of truth.

Dupin, a high Christian authority, is candid enough to admit that "we have two versions of the gospel of Matthew in Hebrew—the one by Tilius, and the other by Munster; but it is certain that neither is the original of St. Matthew nor that of the gospel of the Nazarenes. The Syriac, published by Widmanstadius, is neither the original of St. Matthew, which was lost long ago, nor the gospel of the Nazarenes nor Ebionites."

The original of St. Matthew's gospel—not the original MS. is here meant, but also any copy therefrom—"was lost long ago." A fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind, and I sympathize with the Holy Ghost in the loss of his MS., as I once lost one of mine. I wonder whether an expression of my sympathy with him will induce him to try to have my work restored to me the way his was restored to him. If a man write a book and the MS. is burnt, all is over; but if a ghost write a pamphlet, it is far otherwise. It was generally recognized by the early church that none save spurious copies of the gospel according to Matthew existed. But, in the reign of the emperor Zeno, the bishop of Cyprus had, in a dream, a visit from St. Barnabas, who directed him to a certain plot of ground where he would find him (St. Barnabas) lying buried, and on his breast the original copy of the lost gospel in the handwriting of St. Matthew himself.

To the indicated plot of ground the bishop repaired with attendants with spades. They dug, and found a fresh corpse lying on his back, and clasping to his breast the correct version of the missing gospel. This tale is told by many of the fathers of the church, and gravely recorded by ecclesiastical writers (see Simon's "Critical History of the Text of the New Testament," vol. i, p. 36). It is an exceedingly useful recipe for finding a lost book. In plain English the recipe reads thus: Write the book over again, with little regard to what it was, but with every regard to what you think it ought to be. Then get a corpse, or, with an axe, persuade somebody to become one. Bury the corpse with the MS. you wish to find laid upon his breast. Then say you have had a dream, in which it has been revealed to you where a certain saint or devil lies buried with the volume on his bosom. Pick out a few interested and credulous spadesmen, dig out the corpse and MS., and the thing is done.

I could certainly have my lost romance restored to me on the lines on which St. Matthew's gospel was restored to the ghost; but I do not consider the game worth the candle. All the bother with pen and spade was necessary to be incurred to produce a gospel to save us from damnation; but the same cannot be urged on behalf of a romance which would possibly never have effected more than the relieving of a few hundreds of people from a few hours' ennui, even if it had ever effected that. The gospel of St. Matthew that was found on the breast of the corpse was taken to Constantinople for careful preservation, and it is the version upon which our "Authorized Version" is based to this very hour. Praise ye the Lord!

✕ "A WORD WITH PROFESSOR HUXLEY."

The above is the caption of an article in the North American Review of August, 1889, by Lyman Abbott, D.D. An essay emanating from the pen of so distinguished a scholar of national reputation as an author and a theologian, may, doubtless, very naturally interest a considerable portion of the reading public in its perusal, and especially so with relation to scientific investigators from the bold declaration of its heading.

When a foremost theologian, "accepting the challenge which Professor Huxley has thrown down, saying for himself, and also for the great mass of Christian believers," in thus gratuitously replying to a scientific criticism of the Christian religion, that "any argument will not be expected of him," he most glaringly and falsely denies the simplest of all self-evident truths; for never before has this world-wide controversy between science and religion attained the prominence and absorbing interest as at present; for it has now thoroughly aroused the critical attention of the civilized world, and especially are the English-speaking people of the two hemispheres intensely interested in it, and they do expect argument, to deny which is more than absurd—it is despicably silly. And for a champion to avowedly ignore argument is positive proof that his cause has none; and consequently, that such champion, in undertaking the defense without argument, is an ignorant bigot, or, by the evasion of it, a canting hypocrite. But the recognition by him of either horn of the dilemma is not at all likely to be disturbing to his self-complacency, as he explicitly and emphatically denies the validity and sufficiency of the scientific axiom: "That it is wrong for any man to say that he is confident of the objective truth of any proposition unless he can produce evidence which logically justifies that certainty."

To deny the validity and complete sufficiency of this scientific axiom, is to utterly ignore the plainest common sense conviction conceivable by the human mind. It is with amazement that one is impelled to ask, "Is it possible that a distinguished, scholarly theologian of our time has done this preposterous and immoral thing?" It is indeed true, and by the present pastoral incumbent of the far-famed old Plymouth Church, whose walls in past memorable days reverberated to the remotest confines of civilization the powerful eloquence of the advanced religious and scientific convictions, inspired alike by humane instincts, laborious research, and logical deduction, of the immortal Henry Ward Beecher.

And in lieu of argument, by the antagonist of Professor Huxley's scientific axiom as thus laid down, what are the grounds assumed as the sufficient denial of it? Here is the avowal, as comprehensive as it is extraordinary: "We avow, on the contrary, that all the certainties of the moral and spiritual realm are based on and attested, not by the logical faculty at all, but by an entirely different faculty, by a power of direct moral and spiritual vision. But they are logically incapable of demonstration to men who are lacking in the spiritual vision."

This certainly is the beatific vision by which the poet Cowper became supremely enlightened, and by incessantly singing the praises of which he lost his senses in chronic mania. And it is the same vision, doubtless, by which Milton acquired such a true knowledge of "spiritual certainties" that, in the heavenly war, he saw the archangel Michael, with those mountainous hand-grenades, hurl Satan over the celestial battlements and down to the bottomless abyss, there to "walk on the burning marl" till, not being entitled to the countersign, his opportunity should come to evade the vigilance of the angelic sentinels of Paradise, he clandestinely entered the "blissful seat" and, assuming the protean form of a toad, "ugly and venomous, who wears a precious jewel in his head," he—of course the jewel, not the toad—seduced "God's last, best gift to man," thereby bringing "mortal woe into the world." This enlightening "spiritual vision" in the case of Milton was so strong that

"The living throne, the sapphire blaze,
Where angels tremble while they gaze,
He saw; but blasted with excess of light,
Closed his eyes in endless night."

Had these two fine intellects, with the vast number of similar others, had less of this, Dr. Abbott's "spiritual faculty," and at least some of the "logical faculty," the "teaching by them of the ways of God to man" might have greatly advanced him in the true direction, instead of leading him astray and retarding his progress to a great extent, as undoubtedly their visionary teaching has done. "We take only a languid interest in the critical discussion as to the authority of the four gospels." In view of the charge, sustained by internal and historical proof that these gospels are, besides their positive anachronism and false authorship, the compilations, interpolations and forgeries of various anonymous persons, it is a direct aspersion of Christian intelligence and honesty to declare in these spurious writings—the gospel Jesus being a demonstrated forgery—that "we find in them a portrait of a character which transcends human limitations, and that is enough."

This is professional buncombe, and sounds like the stump harangue of the county candidate bamboozling the "dear people" in order to procure or retain an office.

But as the distinguished doctor of divinity, avowedly disclaiming all logical argument and scientific evidence, assumes to speak for all the "faithful," is it at all probable that the many honest, thinking believers among them will supinely acquiesce in the dogmatic and humiliating climax of the essay?—

"All argument is against the freedom of the will; we know we're free, and that's the end on't."

O shades of the fathers, and Paley and Butler, polemics and apologists, your mantles are spurned by your timid, prevaricating descendants! And, O noble champions, ye Blacks and Fields and Gladstones! though conquered in the unequal strife against science and the "logical faculty," in falling, it was with the heroic demeanor of your brave and loyal faces to the foe; and notwithstanding any attempted defense by your pygmy successors, in your fall the unjust cause of the "great superstition" has received its complete overthrow. Requiescat in pace. J. THE FEMALE SUPERIOR.

A friend says:

I see you have in a recent FREETHOUGHT number a short article trying to show that the male is an "arrested development." What a shout of derisive laughter must have gone up among the male inhabitants when they read that article. It was certainly an unusual article. You seem to have "soured" on the sterner sex, more because, as I think, one of them (your husband) has been found wanting. You will be a long time arguing, and fail in the end to prove that nature gave the female a better physical and mental status than the male. I have consulted with many a female and asked which sex, if the choice had been left to them, they should have chosen. The answer almost universally has been, "I could almost curse nature that I was conceived and born a female." I have the first man to see and give expression, "I wish I had been born a female." Women talk, and men act; women are governed by intuition, men by reason.

And in response I would say, it is not to be marveled at that men, who have so long lorded it over women, and called themselves the superior sex, should feel humiliated at being compelled to eat humble pie at last. But if it be a fact that the male is simply a case of "arrested development," why demur? It may be that woman is also arrested, and under favorable circumstances a race might arise superior to her.

But it is fast becoming a conceded fact among scientists that the female is the superior sex, and where the best conditions prevail, females are in the majority.

It is not at all that I have "soured on one man" that causes me to take this position, for I wrote my first article on the subject in one of the first issues of the Truth Seeker, long years before family troubles occurred. It would be little and childish to treat great questions from such a standpoint of personal feeling. Besides, it is not true that I have "soured" on men because one man chose to "go back" on me. I think just as much of man, as a whole, as ever I did. In treating of general questions, one should keep, as far as possible, outside of personal prejudices.

It is no wonder that many women would prefer being men, for woman is oppressed by so many unjust laws and regulations, and is deprived of her rights as man's equal before the law, and in the home. But despite this inequality, I never once wished I was a man, but am proud and glad to be a member of the superior sex, though knowing myself far the inferior, in many ways, to thousands of noble, wise, true, and learned men. To claim the female as superior, takes not one iota from man. It does not rob him of a single honor he merits. He is now, and will forever remain to be, all he can make of himself. It may take thousands of years to bring woman up to the full standard of her powers and capacities, for she has been so long dominated and enslaved, robbed and crushed, that she has a long way to travel ere she can educate and perfect herself in the arts and sciences as man has done. Remember, it is not so far back since women were shut out from all the high schools and professions, and if a woman happened to invent anything a man patented it. If she wanted a book to be recognized she signed some man's name to it. Many a woman has passed as a male by wearing man's apparel, that she might earn a man's wages, thus proving herself capable, despite her heredity of slavery and oppression.

As to her "intuitions," it is simply her quicker way of reasoning and coming to conclusions. These intuitions are flashes of suppressed mentality that only wait for chances of full development to prove the superiority of the mental calibre of woman.

That the female is really the most courageous is proved by the fact that it is the she-bear who fights most desperately for her young, and it is the female of all animals that are the most dangerous to encounter in battle. The male seldom fights, save for his own protection. It is only where there is male rivalry for the possession and ownership of the female that the male is physically the stronger. Among fishes the female is superior in weight and size, because there is among them no rivalry of this kind.

The great world of organized life is female. Motherhood is the first fact of the continued existence of species. The lowest forms of life are asexual, and yet are really females, producing through virgin generation. The female form is the type of all life. It was the first beginning of life-forms, and is now the supreme head and culmination of physical, mental and moral perfection, as I will try and prove in future numbers on this subject. What is must be accepted, whether it be what we prefer or what we most dislike. We want facts without fear or favor and regardless of personal likes or personal antipathies.

CALL FOR THE OREGON CONVENTION.

By virtue of the authority vested in us by the Oregon State Secular Union, we hereby call the FIRST ANNUAL CONVENTION of said Union to meet in Portland, Oregon, at Masonic Hall, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, the 12th, 13th, and 14th days of October, 1889; the object being to secure the total separation of church and state.

The advocates of this measure in Washington Territory are invited to join their Oregon friends in this Convention.

Done at Portland, Oregon, this thirty-first day of July, 1889.

C. BEAL,

J. K. SEARS, A. F. NEUNERT, } Board of Directors.
LEE LAUGHLIN, L. AMES,

SECULAR WORK IN OREGON.

Miss Elva E. Davidson, of Oswego, is the seventh vice-president heard from. This young lady has never been to school a day, and yet her letter is a beauty. Liberals, do not fear to give your children a secular and liberal education and training. It is the best thing you can do for them. "I am doing all I can to obtain as many signatures as possible to our constitution and will send you the list. I will notify the Liberals in this vicinity of the Convention and urge them to attend. I shall attend during the entire session."

R. D. Allen, of Silverton, is the eighth vice-president to write, who is the ever faithful. He says: "We will be represented somewhat bodily, and financially to the extent of our ability."

J. C. Snodgrass, of Eugene, is the ninth vice-president to respond. "I most cordially reciprocate your fraternal greeting and hail your worthy indications of zeal and hopeful anticipation in this supreme cause of humanity. I will at once present to the Liberals here the several phases of your communication and report as promptly as possible."

Prof. Geo. H. Dawes has settled in Oregon, at North Yamhill, and will speak at the Convention. He is at work for the cause.

A. F. Neunert, our honest and noble treasurer, stepped out and secured $16.00 as follows: Kuebler & Rometch, $1.50; F. Wildi, $1; C. W. Saunders, $2.50; A. N. Gambell, $1; J. Fleischer, $1; E. House, $2; Dr. W. Cotel, $1; M. Mesh, $1; J. H. Burke, $1; Charles Hegely, $2; Jennings Brothers, $2. Mr. A. Meier, who contributed to our funds, died the next day. He was a liberal Jew and highly respected.

The cause is fortunate to have the genuine help of Mrs. Carrie E. Haight. The ball will be a grand affair under her womanly management. She has selected a band of intelligent, noble ladies for assistants, who will give character to all that is done. Ladies will be admitted free; gentlemen one dollar, and a superb lunch free.

I have just received a letter from H. L. Wilson, of Davenport, Washington, saying Mr. Putnam gave two rousing lectures there which were greatly appreciated. He says C. B. Reynolds is writing all over the territory urging Liberals to attend the Portland Convention. If the Liberals of Washington will heed Mr. Reynolds it will become the first Liberal state in the Union.

Liberals of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and British Columbia, will you each one do our cause a favor now, as the Convention on the 12th, 13th, and 14th of October will soon be here? Ask, invite all persons you meet who might attend to come. Write a few letters around to friends to come. Write a communication to one or more papers about the Convention, urging people to come. This will be easily done, as Liberals are generally intelligent.

C. BEAL,

President Oregon State Secular Union.

SILVERTON, OR., Aug. 19, 1889.

DEAR MR. BEAL: Acknowledging receipt of your kind letter received some days ago inviting me to attend the Convention of the Oregon State Secular Union to be held in Portland next month, I regret to say that, owing to engagements in the East, I shall be unable to be with you on that occasion.

Of my deep interest in the objects of the Union I need not assure you. I hope the Convention will prove a great success, both as to attendance and the adoption of wise measures for educating the people in the principles of the Union, and convincing them of the importance as well as the justice of making government conform to these principles. Having been present at the organization of the Oregon State Secular Union, I shall feel especial interest and, I doubt not, pride in the work it is to do.

You ask for suggestions. I am not sure that I can offer any that have not already occurred to you. As to many details, of course, you will have to be governed by circumstances. You are president of the Union, and much will depend upon your own judgment, firmness, and tact.

I think it important that the speeches and discussions be confined to a consideration of the principles and purposes of the organization as stated in the constitution. The Union should not be committed by resolutions or in its administration to any theories or reforms (however good they are in themselves) which are not involved in state secularization. The Convention will, I trust, agree upon some definite plan and method of making the people generally familiar with the whole subject of state secularization, such, for instance, as the history of the exemption of church property from taxation, with the deplorable effect of this policy in France, England, Mexico, and other countries, and the evil and injustice of making schools and colleges sectarian, and restraining the freedom of the people by Sabbath laws and other puritanical legislation. This must be done by circulating good literature relating to the subject, and by lectures, which the people are ready to hear in almost any community in your state. It would be well, I think, if the Union raised funds to keep a lecturer employed constantly in Oregon (and perhaps Washington) to keep this subject before the people. He should be a man of ability and character, and a speaker capable of presenting the principles of the Union in a manner to command attention and respect. Such a man would have no difficulty in getting good audiences, and he would be treated well generally by the press, through which, indeed, he might present the principles and aims of the Union in many of the communities of the state. All these matters will probably be considered by the Union in Convention, and I feel rather like asking you to pardon me for mentioning them.

Hoping that the proceedings of the Convention will be harmonious and that valuable practical work will be done—such work as I know the Oregon Liberals can do if they undertake it—I subscribe myself with best regards, Very truly yours,

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

As It Might Be.

A beggar died last night, his soul went up to God, and said:
"I come uncalled; forgive it, Lord; I died for want of bread."

Then answered him the Lord of Heaven: "Son, how can this thing be?
Are not my saints on earth? and they had surely succored thee."

"Thy saints, O Lord," the beggar said, "live holy lives of prayer; How shall they know of such as we? we perish unaware."

"They strive to save our wicked souls, and fit them for the sky;
Meanwhile, not having bread to eat (forgive), our bodies die."

Then the Lord God spake out of Heaven, in wrath and angry pain:
"O men, for whom my only son hath lived and died in vain!" —Arthur Symons.

A Laborer in the Vineyard.

"Yes," said the evangelist, after biting a large chew from a plug of black tobacco and expectorating with marvelous accuracy in the eye of a sleeping dog, "I have been a-getting there with both feet lately. The last town I stopped at I raked in twenty converts in one night, and you bet that's big work. I get right down to 'em and let 'em know that if they don't waltz up to the mourner's bench and get religion they'll be everlastingly in the soup, and I generally fetch 'em. Of course there's always a lot of chumps you can't do anything with, but they don't count for nothing. I used to be a heavy-weight slugger, and I have had a book printed describing the scrapes I've been into. When the services is over I sell books to the chaps what's been saved, and make a little stuff that way, but there ain't no money in this preaching business. A feller's got to do it out of pure love for his fellow-men, just like I do it. I want to save as many as I can and give the devil the grand razzle-dazzle, and all the reward I ask is a front seat in heaven when I turn up my toes. Well, I'll have to leave you. I'm going around to see a back-sliding what was converted a week ago, and when I read the riot act to him you bet I'll snake him back into the fold. So long." The noble and self-sacrificing man then moved off on his mission humming a simple hymn the burden of which was to the effect that while the bed-bug had no wings at all he gets there just the same. Truly, the world can never be plunged into utter darkness while such good men throw themselves earnestly into the work of salvation.—Lincoln State Journal.

WHEN Wanamaker put up his money for the Republican party, success followed; but when he publicly prayed for the prohibitionists they went into the soup, which shows that money is more powerful than prayer in politics.

It is the skirt of a lady's ball dress that costs; the corsage doesn't come high.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmermann, which I have used and understand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future

Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously written. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been assailed and exposed by the press, but, Dr. Fellows, a specialist, in his line, stands foremost in his profession, and the encomiums showered upon him publicly as well as in private, are flattering evidences of the high appreciation and confidence his long and conscientious devotion to his specialties in his profession have so justly merited for him, and it is safe to trust him.

A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1888.
DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: The remedy you sent is working like a charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. Have only been using it one week, and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right. Yours respectfully, J. R.

REMARKS—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, but who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out-and-out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors.
DR. FELLOWS.

Woman's Career.

She was a fair girl graduate, enrobed in spotless white,
And on her youthful features shone a look of holy light.
She bent with grace her dainty head to receive the ribbon blue,
Whence hung the silver medal, adjudged to be her due.
I watched her face with rapture as she raised to heaven her eyes
And moved her lips in prayer as her fingers clasped the prize,
For I knew to education she had pledged her coming days,
To unclasp poor woman's fetters and free her from man's ways.

Time passed. Our pathways parted, but ever and anon
My thoughts would stray toward her, and I'd speculate upon
What my graduate was doing—if athwart the scroll of fame,
Among unselfish workers, had been written high her name.
At last I chanced to meet her, but her books were pushed aside,
While around a dainty garment she sewed the lace with pride;
And at her feet her baby, dimpled, happy, crowing youth,
Upon that silver medal was cutting his first tooth.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

Senator Hampton's Profane Story.

As far as is known, Senator Wade Hampton is up to this time the only man who has had the temerity to tell the president an impious tale, and General Harrison was actually much pleased with the narrative. "I always did like army stories," he says, "and you can't expect army stories to be good enough to tell a Sunday-school class. I forgive the profanity of Senator Hampton's story out of consideration for its wit."

The story Senator Hampton told was an army story—not particularly new and fresh, but new to the president.

"One day during the war," said the Senator, "the colonel of a South Carolina regiment was making a round of inspection. Sitting lazily on a rail fence whittling at a piece of shingle he found a man whose face was not familiar to him. The colonel was indignant. Approaching the loafer, he called out to him with all proper severity: 'Who the — are you, sitting here in this fashion?' 'I, sir,' responded the man on the fence, continuing his whittling, 'am the chaplain of the —st regiment. Now who the — are you?'"

THE Toronto Globe tells of a man who has cooked his own breakfast for fifteen years. He must like it very well done.

NEWS AND NOTES.

Cheney, like Spokane and other places, has suffered from the fire-fiend, but is gradually being rebuilt, and with improved appearance. I arrived here on Monday evening, and arrangements were made for a lecture in the school-house and a fine audience was present, much better than I expected. There are but few pronounced Liberals in Cheney, but a large number are evidently drifting out of the old ecclesiastical lines. My friend Mr. Sessions was chairman of the meeting, and introduced me with cordial words. He is deeply interested in Spiritualism, but that does not prevent a pretty clear outlook into the demands of this life, which is the main thing, of course. If we can make things right here, that will go a long way toward making things right hereafter. At the close of my lecture an opportunity was given for remarks pro and con. Rev. Mr. Marvin endeavored to deny my interpretation of St. Paul in regard to the observance and non-observance of Sabbath days. I affirmed that St. Paul was in favor of personal liberty, for he says, "Let everyone be fully persuaded in his own mind"—that is, there is no obligation about it unless one's own judgment makes the obligation. One can observe or not observe according to his individual conviction. Nowhere does St. Paul insist upon the Sabbath observance. The Rev. Mr. Marvin made one important admission, namely, that St. Paul was not talking about the Christian Sabbath, for at that time there was no Christian Sabbath. This is granted, for the Christian Sabbath did not come into existence until the reign of Constantine. This admission on the part of Mr. Marvin overthrows all the divine authority of the Christian Sabbath, and makes it simply of human sanction, which is what I contended for. If the Christian Sabbath was not in existence when St. Paul wrote his epistles then it could not be of divine origin. It is simply an aftergrowth of Christianity. Either way there is a dilemma for the Sabbatharians. If the Christian Sabbath was in existence when St. Paul wrote his epistles, then St. Paul distinctly asserts that its observance or non-observance is a matter of individual conscience, without any divine command at all. If the Christian Sabbath was not in existence at the time of St. Paul, as the Rev. Mr. Marvin asserts, then it is demonstrably of human origin. The Rev.

Mr. Marvin endeavored also to parry my rendering of the declaration of the W. C. T. U., namely, "Unless the Sabbath is observed we are on the way to Spanish bull fights after the Lord's Supper." I affirmed that "we" in the above meant the W. C. T. U. and was equivalent to a confession that the W. C. T. U. were so fond of Spanish bull fights that they would go to them from the Lord's Supper unless prevented by law. Mr. Marvin undertook to show that "we" in this case meant the American people as a whole. I answered that it couldn't mean the American people as a whole, since they did not, as a whole, attend the Lord's Supper. The word "we" could only mean those who attend the Lord's Supper, that is, Christians, and it is frankly admitted that these would go to the Spanish bull fights from the Lord's Supper if there was no legislation to prevent. Mr. Marvin was compelled to assent to the soundness of my statement. The Rev. Mr. Chase, Congregational clergyman of the place, at the close of the lecture declared to me that he was not in favor of the Blair bill, and that numbers of intelligent clergymen were opposed to it. He also put himself in favor of church taxation. This shows that a sense of justice is beginning to prevail among enlightened Christians.

I am well satisfied with the meeting at Cheney. The attendance and interest are a good sign of the future.

My friend S. B. Jewell is quite unwell, but he means to pull through and do a great deal yet for Freethought. He has a heart for any fate, and whatever happens he will depend on nothing but his own self and the truth as he understands it. My best wishes to this generous and suffering comrade.

Thomas Wilce and son, and other friends I find who will keep the flag on high and give heart and hope to the work.

Tuesday, August 20, I go to Rosalia, W. T. This place seems to be going ahead on quite a solid basis. It has a splendid agricultural country about it—one of the finest wheat growing sections on the coast. Rosalia has a bright prospect, and so has its vicinity, for it depends upon the unceasing wealth of the soil. Circling around here into the Palouse country to Colfax and to Lewiston are about eight million acres of land unsurpassed in fertility. The following is the yield of grain on the farm of G. D. Anderson this season, which is not a bad showing: One hundred acres of wheat yielded 3100 bushels or 31 bushels per acre; sixteen acres of oats yielded 1162 bushels or 72 bushels per acre; twenty acres of barley yielded 900 bushels or 45 bushels per acre, of extra fine grain which will weigh out about 48 bushels. There are no trees to be cleared off—the land is rolling, well watered, and the soil is deep and rich.

Abram Dorsey, of Rosalia, and Julius Schur, of Waverly, meet me at the station—comrades good and true. At Smith's Hotel I find liberal entertainment. Mine host and hostess believe in the good things of this life. My friend Schur brings cheerful news from Waverly. They purpose to keep the campaign going there. Friend Wm. Graham has gone up into the Colville country, and writes me that he has not yet found any Infidels there. But I guess they will come, even in that far-off land, with the railroads and the telegraphs.

Abram Dorsey is our wheel-horse at Rosalia, and goes right ahead, no matter how hard the pull. It is a busy season of the year now. Laborers are scarce and everybody must pitch in. Neighbors have to help one another, and so all are in harness, not as a matter of money, but as a matter of good fellowship. The harvest must be gathered and neighbor must join with neighbor until the rush is over. Under these circumstances I could not expect a very big turnout, but nevertheless the hall was about full on the first night, many of the audience being Christians. On the second evening not so many were out, for the Christians were a little bit afraid of another lecture. On the whole I am quite encouraged. These were the first Freethought lectures ever given at this point, and the results are beyond what friends expected, and the future is one of promise.

Peter Proff is a royal co-worker with Dorsey. He is ready with heart and hand, and gives generous support. He owns three quarter-sections on the edge of the town, and has raised a big family of boys and girls, nine living, and none of them walk within the shadow of the church. Friend Proff has made this life a gospel indeed, of industry, of good living, and earnest thought.

Our good old friend, Wm. Fisk, has plenty of youthful fire in his opposition to orthodoxy. What a pleasure it is to meet him, who is so earnest and devoted to the cause, although he might well leave the contest to younger men. But he is every inch an Infidel and proposes to stay at the front though the evening of life does advance. It brings no melancholy shadow with it, but still the richness of the dawn. With such self-sacrificing friends toil becomes easy, and broad and bright the fields of labor open. With all my heart I thank this veteran of Freethought for his untiring support.

The thanks of Liberals are also due to John Schloman, who generously donated the use of his hall for the lectures.

Miss J. H. West, postmistress of Rosalia, is also of Liberal and cultivated mind, and earnest for Freethought. It is a pleasure to meet with one who shows that the true genius of woman is on the side of liberty and progress.

Thos. Secrist, of Oakdale, gave me a good handshake and wants me at Oakdale next time, and I will surely be there. Dr. Baker, Wm. Howard, M. M. Walsh, also were present from the same place, and are ready for a campaign.

Harry Humphrey, H. W. Goff, Geo. Whaley, R. G. White, and others, are in our ranks and give a soldier's welcome.

Our Christian friends, Reynolds, Smith, and Williams, were not afraid to listen to the lectures and do a little thinking on their own account. If they remain in the fold they will be all the better for seeing "fresh fields and pastures new."

So Rosalia breathes of hope and progress. In the bosom of the hills it shall shine with the rose of dawn, and hail the glad to-morrow. If any friend who thinks of coming to the coast desires to know more about this part of Washington they can write to A. Dorsey, Rosalia, who is well posted and will give the facts of the case—not faith but knowledge.

Thursday I come on to Pasco. I find it quite deserted. Capt. Grey has not yet returned from the Constitutional Convention. Straub is up on the Sound, I hear. I have the pleasure of meeting J. W. O'Kiefe. Pasco still grows, and the sage-brush shines with boundless possibilities. The capitol of the state may come here. That would give it a boom indeed. The artesian well has not yet struck water, but they are still looking for it. The town is gradually improving and the lands are being settled. The magic of civilization is beginning to work, and the desert is transformed. A new railroad has recently been organized to extend from Pasco to Vancouver by way of Goldendale; Capt. W. P. Grey and J. W. O'Kiefe are among the directors. There is talk of establishing a foundry and machine shop at Pasco. I see plenty of vim among the citizens of this place, and they are bound to go ahead.

I missed meeting Frank Schuneman, who was ready to meet me the day before I arrived. The dates got mixed up somehow, and we were a day apart in our calculations. I had the pleasure of hailing friend Kahlow, who is about to take a trip to the old country and look upon the land of his birth. A happy voyage to our veteran while off duty.

Friday night I reach Walla Walla, where I must remain until Saturday for the Dayton train. So I have a chance to see old friends, and call upon Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds, who keep things lively upon this part of the coast. The Walla Walla Liberals are doing splendidly. There are lectures every Sunday evening and the Opera House is full. The ministers keep a discreet silence, except one Brown, who occasionally utters a shriek, but after Reynolds's reply he is "done brown" and the comedy ends. I had a hand-shake with Dr. Calder, Olsen, Rosenow, Niles Vincent, Mrs. Alice Sufferen, Martin S. Twist, Sol Center, etc. Sol Center has married since I was here in accordance with Wordsworth's idyl—

"A woman nobly planned
To warn, to comfort and command."

He is building a beautiful cottage and intends to sit under his own vine and fig-tree and have the cream of life. He deserves it, for he is a man among men always. May the orange blossoms bloom to the golden days. While waiting for the train he gave me a drive over the elegant city, which, after an easy fashion, is advancing to metropolitan proportions. A new railroad—Hunt's—has come in, and this is giving quite an impetus to business. The farmers complain of no harvest, and yet the average yield throughout the country is twenty-two bushels of wheat to the acre. But they are used to twice that, and count the present yield a failure. In the course of our drive we visited the brewery of Mrs. J. H. Stahl—one of the finest establishments in the territory, where they make snow and ice right along by steam. Mrs. Stahl was left a few years ago with a large family to support and a debt of thirty-five thousand dollars. By her own energy and business talent she has paid off the debt, improved the works, and the other day was offered one hundred and twenty thousand dollars for the plant. The president of the United States can't show any better record than that.

While here I heard of the death of Horace Seaver, and the shadow of death came into the midst of bright enjoyment, but a shadow shining with many a star. I shall always remember this man with deepest gratitude—so true and brave and honorable. His noble record of more than half a century gives courage and hope to our toils of to-day. Into the stream of life and progress, into the glow of freedom, comes his undying devotion, and the future of Freethought shall brighten with the rays of his unconquerable spirit.

After waiting seven hours for the train I am en route for Dayton, where I arrive in time for the lecture. I am greeted by a large audience, and I find Dayton to be alive with Freethinkers, although there are nine churches in the place to a population of about twenty-three hundred. It is the county seat of Columbia county, which is one of the richest agricultural sections in the territory. The yield of wheat this year has been as high as fifty-six bushels to the acre. The average throughout the county is twenty-two bushels to the acre. Dayton is delightfully situated among the folding hills, which stretch about it like shining ramparts, golden and grey glittering along the dark ploughed fields. These hills roll off for miles away, rising at times into steep buttes, but mostly productive of plentiful harvests. The city has many fine dwellings and handsome business blocks. The courthouse is one of the most magnificent in Washington, with a beautiful green sward and ranks of trees about it. There is plenty of water power in the vicinity. There are flour mills; also electric light. There have been two or three big fires, but the place constantly improves. It has the elements of solid growth—a country of unsurpassed fertility. Hunt's railroad will be built in here after awhile, and this will give competing lines for business and travel.

On Sunday and Monday evenings there was increased attendance. The Opera House was filled. The clergymen turned out in force and took notes rapidly. Not all the nine churches were represented, for there are only about two or three clergymen to the nine churches. When the Methodist minister came here he was surprised at the small attendance. He wrote to one hundred of the leading business men of the place inquiring the cause of this effect, or defect, as Polonius would say. He received only eight answers out of the one hundred. The chief reasons that transpired out of the correspondence were these: First—That trout bite better on Sunday than any other day of the week. Second—The vacuum in the pulpit was greater than the vacuum in the pews. The inquiring mind is now at rest.

The audiences were representative of the best elements of the city. Dayton might be put down as a Liberal city, for the majority of the people are that way. But they have unconsciously drifted in this direction, without as yet a thorough mental conception of what Freethought is, and at present only a few among the many are ready to take the laboring oar. But the large attendance is exceedingly gratifying as showing the tendencies of the time and the promise for future advancement.

The few who do take hold with enthusiasm and real understanding of Freethought have made my stay pleasant beyond words to express, and labor here has been a refreshment instead of a toil. I have felt as if I was going with the tide and the sunshine instead of fighting on the frontier against odds. There are veterans here, but the vigor of youth is in the ranks.

Col. W. A. George is beyond the seventies, but he has always kept up a running fire against orthodoxy which has been quite effective. He has been prominent in the affairs of the state as a lawyer and writer, and has taken the line of Gen. Grant—"keep the church and state forever separate."

W. E. Cahill, A. Roth, John Brining, who acted as chairman of the meetings, A. P. Cahill, and H. C. Griffith are of the color guard of our forces here, the young men who will stand by when the old warriors have passed from duty.

Among others who are not afraid to be counted outside the orthodox camp are J. N. Day, brother of our good Liberal friend of Walla Walla, Dr. Day; O. F. Clark, who can give the hand of fellowship although he does embrace more things in heaven and earth than I can find in my philosophy, for he reads the Truth Seeker and is not in subjection to the spirits; also George Orchard, who thinks that man can live without a brain but not without freedom and justice; Alex. Duffy, W. H. Burrows, A. J. Dexter, D. C. Gurnsey, Frank Gurnsey, J. A. Kellogg, Geo. B. Baker, J. N. Arnold, Mr. and Mrs. W. O. Boggs; Burns, of the Unitarian faith, but not enough to hurt; Hannan, the pioneer of the country, who sticks to the Bible through thick and thin and constantly quotes it to the clergymen, but somehow or other they don't seem to like his quotations any better than if they came direct from Ingersoll or Paine; Mr. Mexter, Dr. Day, S. M. Martin, who renounces orthodoxy but delights in Swedenborg and revels in the infinite consciousness as the source of all human consciousness, and the divine life and the god within, but is willing to leave these questions to science, the Christ of humanity; G. P. Wright, O. B. Logan, who has been on the battle-line of Freethought for many years; R. E. Peabody, of the Chronicle, a paper which dares to have a mind of its own and speak it even if the clergymen are hit and meanness exposed—all these, and more whose names I do not remember, have made a splendid company, so that the days have passed as quickly and brightly as though the harvest were already won. Such delightful associations, mingling with cultivated minds and earnest hearts, prepare for the sterner and darker fields of conflict. Like its beautiful hills, its rippling streams, its shining fields and trees, is the memory of these ardent and generous comrades, and from this happy past I look forward to nobler work, to grander results in the radiant future.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

THE LICK BEQUESTS.

The deed of trust of the Freethinker James Lick, who died October 1, 1876, charged the Board of Trustees to expend the sum of $1,650,000 for benevolent purposes, besides large bequests to the Pioneers, the Academy of Sciences, and other beneficiaries. The money left to the Society of California Pioneers has been expended in the erection of a handsome building on Fourth street, near the corner of Market, and the Academy of Sciences is in process of construction on Market street, near the corner of Fourth. These two societies are Lick's residuary legatees.

But of the $1,650,000, although it has been in the hands of the trustees for thirteen years, less than one-half has been applied according to the will of the testator. The trustees were charged to expend—

For a monument in San Francisco to Francis Scott Key (author of the "Star Spangled Banner") the sum of $60,000. This monument was erected in Golden Gate Park and dedicated on July 4, 1888.

For the Lick Observatory, to contain the most powerful telescope in the world, the sum of $700,000. The Observatory was completed and transferred to the University of California last year.

For a Home for Old Ladies in San Francisco, $100,000.

For Free Baths in San Francisco, $150,000.

For a California Institute of Mechanic Arts—a manual training-school for the boys and girls of San Francisco—$540,000.

These last three bequests have not been carried out. About once in six months a paragraph appears in the papers briefly mentioning the free baths. At similar intervals the Home for Old Ladies is referred to, and there are occasionally hidden allusions to a school of mechanic arts, but the institutions do not materialize.

And there is still another bequest—

For statuary to be placed in front of the San Francisco City

Hall and to be emblematic of three significant epochs in the history of the state of California, $100,000.

Considering the present condition of the new City Hall—which could be mistaken for either a ruin or a building in the process of erection, while it is neither, being in a state of arrested development—the trustees might be excused for not pushing the statuary to completion. Nevertheless two years ago competitive designs and models were advertised for, and prizes were offered—the contract for the execution of the group to the first competitor, $500 to the second, and $300 to the third. It is said that about twenty-four artists responded to the invitation. All the drawings and models were placed on exhibition and it was announced that a decision would be rendered in a very short time. Since then none of the competitors have heard a word; and the only answer to repeated questions on the subject has been that the trustees could not decide. Of late, however, the opinion has been circulated that none of the drawings were up to the expectations of the trustees.

Now the trustees have taken a new departure. They have offered four sculptors $750 each for designs, the amount to be paid whether the models are accepted or not. The first design is, in the language of the will, to represent the history of the state, from the early settlements of the missions to the acquisition of California by the United States; the second, from such acquisition by the United States to the time when agriculture became the leading interest of the state; the third, from the last-named period to the first day of January, 1874.

This does not look like business, but when it is considered that one of the parties who will get $750 for his work is in the employ of one of the trustees, suspicions are aroused that the contract is a job, though a small one. However, if within a reasonable time statuary of a satisfactory character is produced the public will not examine too closely into the way it was done. But if something is not done soon it will be necessary to add another group in order to represent the epoch which passed while the trustees were inactive.

Regarding the other bequests, it is not exaggeration to say that the public is impatient. The baths are badly needed; so are the Institute of Mechanic Arts and the Old Ladies' Home. The trustees have the funds at hand, and know the purpose for which they are intended. In the name of all that is reasonable, why don't they wake up and do something?

THE PORTLAND CONVENTION.

There was never in the history of Secularism in the West so promising and so important an event as the coming Convention at Portland. It will be held at a time when the city is full of visitors from all parts of the Northwest, and also at a time when many of the best Liberal lecturers of the country are able to be present, and these two facts in conjunction should insure large attendance and good enthusiasm.

The Oregon State Secular Union is fortunate in having for a president such a man as Mr. C. Beal. He evidently accepted the office with a view to doing the work which the position involves, and nobly is he performing his task. Nobody can read his weekly communications, reports, and appeals in FREETHOUGHT without feeling a deep interest in the Convention and a strong desire to attend. We hope to hear of an attendance of thousands; of grand speeches, noble enthusiasm, generous contributions, and the general evidences of renewed devotion to the cause of Secularism.

THE SAN FRANCISCO FREETHOUGHT SOCIETY.

The next meeting of the San Francisco Freethought Society will be held at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, Sunday evening, September 8, at 8 o'clock. Mr. W. O. Howe will speak on "Usury, and How to Abolish It."

FRIENDS OF FREETHOUGHT—and we count every reader as a friend—should remember that the present is the dull season for papers whose circulation is principally rural. Realizing this, they do not need more than an intimation that whatever they are able to do for this paper will be most timely if done now. Send us subscribers, renewals, book orders, or any other form of encouragement you may be moved to extend.

CONSIDERABLE space is occupied in this issue by letters on the coming Portland Convention. It is a timely topic, and full of interest.

JUDGE J. G. MAGUIRE has gone East, and will lecture there on the single tax. Henry George is coming West, and will lecture here on the same subject. Thus the equilibrium of the planet is preserved.

NEARLY half a million people visit the exposition at Paris on Sunday. The American exhibitors cover their goods from the profane eyes of the Sabbath-breakers, and get ridiculed for their puritanism.

IN the cases of fifteen men arrested at Kansas City, Mo., for violating the Sunday law, Judge Boland decided last Monday that the law was unconstitutional. The city attorney will appeal to a higher court.

J. M. WHEELER, of the London Freethinker, having made a trip to Beau'ieu, in an out-of-the-way portion of England, reports that he ran across laborers whose weekly wage, all told, amounted to seven shillings—about $1.70. At this place the people were so pious that they were afraid to give a drink of water to strangers on Sunday.

JUDGE GIBSON, of Oakland, gave some sage advice the other day to the mother of a girl who showed symptoms of religious dementia. The girl testified that she was never allowed to go anywhere except to church, and the judge admonished the parent to keep her from religious society for a while and let her attend parties and the theatre.

A YOUNG woman named Pennock was sent to the insane asylum last Monday, from this city, crazed with the delusion that God had cursed her and that she was "doomed." There seems to be no end to the number of victims of the mind-wrecking religion taught in our pulpits, and there will be none until the falsehoods of the church are destroyed by truth and reason.

WE have received a copy of the "Fritankaren, organ for Sveriges fritankare," published at Stockholm, Sweden, Viktor E. Lennstrand och Alfred Lindkvist, redaktorer. Not being familiar with the tongue of the Swedes we are unable to enjoy the many good things which the Fritankaren doubtless contains. Editor Lennstrand was at last report undergoing a trial for blasphemy.

WHEN Mr. Frank Dallam, editor of the Lincoln County Times (Davenport, Wash.), goes on a vacation he should be careful what kind of an animal he leaves in his editorial chair. The long-eared sort of biped who got out the Times of August 23 would ruin the reputation of any paper in a month. A writer who in one brief article can abuse the Freethinker and insult the Christian by saying the latter is no better, has the wrong qualifications for a successful journalist.

WE received last week this touching note:

BOSTON, Aug. 21, 1889.

FRIENDS PUTNAM AND MACDONALD: It is my sad task to inform you that our old friend Horace Seaver passed quietly away this morning at 11:25. Thus we lose a most worthy man. Yours in grief,

J. P. MENDUM.

So may we all pass—quietly, laden with years and with honors, and lamented most by those who knew us best.

STILL another "Christ!" Among the passengers of the Zelandia, which arrived from Australia the other day, was an Englishman who had excited the attention of the passengers by his queer conduct. When the vessel docked he went ashore, leaving his baggage to take care of itself, and wandered along the wharves softly humming and whistling religious tunes. A police officer found him at this occupation and took him in charge. At the city prison he kept his soft melodies going and refused to talk except to say that he came from Sidney and that he was Jesus Christ. He was booked as insane and sent to the Home for Inebriates.

THE Evening Post says:

"A Tennessee judge has instructed his grand jury 'to indict all persons who publicly express Infidel sentiments.' That judge's zeal outruns his judgment. He does not help the cause of Christianity."

The Post evidently never heard of such a thing as religious liberty, but judges the rightfulness of an act according to its effect upon "the cause of Christianity." If the Tennessee jurist's course should result in making a Christian of every person in the state it would still be execrable, as salvation from any possible terrors in the next world is of small account compared with salvation from bigotry and religious intolerance in this.

A WRITER in the Chicago Open Court makes this argument against the single tax: "In the summer of 1854 I belonged to a party of surveyors in California. We were employed by the state to run the section lines of five townships of land in Kern county, near Baker's Ferry. It was then a desolate country—covered mostly with alkali shoe deep, in some places a little sage-brush, and stunted cactus, with some willows by the alkaline pools. I would not have accepted the tract surveyed for my summer's work. The 'God-given right' to the whole 115,000 acres of land would not have supported a thousand jack rabbits. Within the last few years a company, seeing the possibilities of the situation, have flumed Kern river, constructed irrigating ditches, and made this desert productive. Baker's Ferry, a single cabin and a rope ferry, has become a city of 2,000 inhabitants, and the land, absolutely valueless at one time, is now worth say fifty dollars per acre. Now is there any justice in taxing the brains and pluck of these corporators or of those who are occupying these lands now, to equalize my lack of brains thirty-five years ago?" Leaving the single tax out of the question, would not the result have been more profitable to the people if the state or the government had reclaimed these arid lands and let them go to small purchasers at cost? This is a matter to be considered by the Senate Committee now in California.

OBSERVATIONS.

When I limped into the hall where the Freethought Society met last Sunday night Brother Schroeder kindly inquired how the sprained ankle was progressing, and said he trusted I would be in good form for the schaufest of the Turn Verein next month. Many others extended the hand of sympathy, so that I felt it was good to be there.

The meeting being called to order by Vice-President Lemme, the Misses Haelke played their zithers with pleasing effect, and Mr. Thomas Curtis was introduced as the honorable speaker of the evening. Mr. Curtis took for his subject "Fifty Years of Freethought." He said that he had been reared in the bosom and bowels of the Presbyterian church in England, a church known as independent. The members of that society were not numerous, but they were very firm in the belief that members of other churches stood a slim chance of being saved. Mr. Curtis was first led to doubt by being asked to name the father of Christ. He replied, "The Holy Ghost, of course." When solicited to furnish proof of this, he turned to the gospels, but there found that the evangelists traced the genealogy of Jesus to Joseph. He asked a minister about the matter. The minister told him he must not examine; he must believe, otherwise he would be damned. Mr. Curtis said he took the risk, and doubted. In his pursuit of truth he became acquainted with George Jacob Holyoake, Robert Cooper, Thomas Cooper, and O'Brien, author of a Life of Robespierre. At that time, over forty years ago, Bradlaugh was not known. There were meetings at St. John's Institute, where, in the coffee-room, the young men discussed theology.

In 1849 Mr. Curtis came to America and assimilated with the Liberals of Philadelphia. They had a Sunday Institute in the city, Thomas Ilman president, and Robert Walling and James West prominent members. A great convention occurred shortly in New York, with two hundred delegates from all parts of the country. Mr. Curtis went from Philadelphia, and at the convention he met Josiah P. Mendum, Horace Seaver, John S. Verity, and Gilbert Vale, author of the Life of Paine. Great crowds were in attendance, Mrs. Ernestine L. Rose being one of the speakers.

Mr. Curtis related his experience with Joseph Barker in Philadelphia. Barker professed to be a Freethinker, and the Philadelphia Liberal society engaged him to conduct one side of a debate with a local clergyman. The society agreed to pay him fifty dollars for four evenings, but the attendance was so large that they were able to give him nearly eight hundred dollars. Mexican quarters were in circulation in those days, and when they offered them to Barker he refused them because they were light. The society concluded that Barker was a Liberal for revenue only and declined to have anything more to do with him. Here turned to England, joined the Methodist church, and went to lecturing against Infidelity. He denied ever having been an Atheist, but Mr. Curtis had in his possession a declaration in Barker's own handwriting that he (Barker) believed in neither gods, devils, heaven, nor hell. This declaration Mr. Curtis forwarded to Charles Bradlaugh, who followed Barker over the country with it.

The speaker also gave some reminiscences of the antislavery agitators he had known, among them Garrison, Henry C. Wright, Stephen Foster, Abbie Gail Foster, Lucretia Mott, Chas. Birney, and Wendell Phillips.

Mr. Curtis called attention to the change wrought since fifty years ago. France was then in the hands of a mob with the Jesuits in power. Mexico was owned by the Catholic church, and the priests walked over the flag. Italy was ruled by the pope. These countries have since become free.

Within this same time the world has witnessed the growth of modern Spiritualism. Mr. Curtis attended a convention at Rutland, where he met many curiosities in the spiritual line. Elder Evans was there, and A. J. Davis, and a man named Hudson, who gave telegraphic communications from the other world at $2 per hour. Henry Seybert, who left a large sum of money for the investigation of psychic phenomena, spent $600 with Hudson for this spiritual telegraphy.

Mr. Curtis's lecture was one of the most entertaining yet given before the society, and he closed amid hearty applause.

The next speaker was Mr. Schou, whose remarks were accompanied by a collection.

Mr. Palanca followed with an address which he had well considered beforehand, and which he was therefore able to give with force and precision. It dealt with the antagonizing forces of authority on the one hand and fraternity on the other.

Mr. Knight spoke by invitation. Religions, he said, were like men. They are born, get old, decay, and die. They must not be changed. A change of the creed is equivalent to an admission that it was previously wrong; that those who accepted it believed a lie, and are therefore lost, although they died in the faith. For this reason creeds are left behind, the people growing away from them.

Mr. Paddon made some references to the unreasonable character of belief in a supreme ruler over the aggregate of nature; Mr. Knight recurred in order to chide Mr. Paddon for his severity, and Mr. Curtis closed the discussion by defending Mr. Paddon's method.

At the next meeting Mr. W. O. Howe, of Oakland, will give the remainder of his address on the abolition of usury.

Last Monday and Tuesday the Chinese residents of San Francisco celebrated the birthday anniversary of one of their deities. The celebration was preceded by a week of charity, during which any poor person in Chinatown could get all he wanted to eat by applying at the right place. The god's name is How Wong. Several hundred years before the Christian era How Wong was a general, and there was never such a prince in friendship or in war. When he fought he slew the Tartars by dozens, and in peace he established free soup houses. He does not profess to be a first-class high-power god, but like the Virgin Mary he does a fair business at prayer-answering, and awhile ago his devotees got so much luck from his influence that they came near being barred out of lottery games; but the gamblers imported a devil as an offset, and so were able to hold their advantage. How Wong is likewise a healer of the sick, and by paying his priest from four bits to a dollar the invalid is entitled to be cured. The god is preserved in the form of a wooden idol, and has a temple on Stockton street.

On Tuesday, attracted by the sound of Chinese music, I went up Washington street to see for myself the Mongolian method of giving vent to the religious emotions. A procession had formed on the street which for true gorgeousness surpassed anything to be seen in the world outside of China. It was gotten up absolutely regardless of expense. There were satin banners as large as the mainsail of a yacht, and requiring three men each to carry them, one holding the staff twenty feet long, and two others bracing it up with poles. There were horses caparisoned in embroidered silk; hundreds of men in silken robes; designs worked in flowers that no sane florist would make for a hundred dollars apiece; band-wagons with silk canopies; gonfalons of wonderful patterns; mimic theatres on wheels; soldiers with fearful but not dangerous weapons; groups representing something or other; living puppets enacting farces; bearded men and bearded women, with fantastic headgear, and everything glittering in all the gold, silver, and mirrors that could be fastened to it. Last of all came the great dragon, carried by about thirty men, whose upper parts were concealed in its body, and whose legs gave it the appearance of a big centipede. The dragon appeared to be a hundred and fifty feet long or thereabouts, and its bearers gave it an up-and-down motion by means of poles which they raised and lowered, and crossed and re-crossed the street to produce the serpentine effect. The head of the dragon would have given John the Revelator a fit of delirium jim-jams. It was mainly mouth, and the mouth was full of terrible teeth and a wallowing tongue. It had eyes made of big round mirrors, horns like barber-poles, and ears wherein a priest might stand and preach an effective sermon. The lunatics who had the head in charge were laboring under the greatest degree of excitement. They charged right and left, thrusting the dragon toward one side and then the other, reared and cavorted and perspired.

During all this the Chinese citizens who filled the sidewalk showed no enthusiasm. They looked on as became a race of stoics. To them the procession was what a procession of priests is to a lot of Catholics. It was Chinese high mass, or elevation of their host, and presented various other primitive aspects of Romish-pagan mummary. They even had the ark containing the sacred symbols and relics, while one man carried two buckets of hog's blood in which the sins of the people for the past year were supposed to be gathered—buckets and blood to be burned at night as an offering and atonement.

Here are two buckets filled with gore—
Your sins throw in the can,
And then Ah Sin may sin some more
The same as 'Melican man.

When the celebrants had borne the dragon around as long as there was any fun in it, they cavorted back to the temple with him and laid him up for another year.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

The laborers of San Francisco turned out about 5,000 in celebration of Labor Day, Sept. 2.—There was a $50,000 fire at Ukiah, Cal., on Tuesday, destroying the Palace Hotel, a portion of Odd Fellows' Hall, and other buildings.—The San Francisco Cremation Society held its annual meeting on the 4th inst. The society has purchased a lot on California and Laurel streets and contemplates erecting a $25,000 crematory.—A number of Sandwich Island converts to Mormonism recently passed through San Francisco on their way to Salt Lake.—Long Hang Tsang, the Chinese consul, denies the charges of embezzlement and malfeasance in office, and declares they are all newspaper talk.—Rain fell in Los Angeles, Orange, and San Bernardino counties last Saturday.—The Terry-Neagle-Field shooting case is being tried in the federal court. The question of jurisdiction will be settled later.—The United States Senatorial Committee upon the Reclamation of Arid Lands is inspecting California.—A Catholic priest named Quinn, of Spokane Falls, W. T., was fined $100 in the police court at St. Paul, August 29, charged with taking indecent liberties with little girls. He had been a teacher in the Spokane Falls Catholic school, and left there to go to Baltimore to defend himself against the charge of immoral conduct.—Tacoma, Wash., had a very narrow escape from a disastrous conflagration on the 29th ult. A fire broke out within the business portion of the city and for a time it looked as if the experience of Spokane Falls and Seattle was to be repeated, but the wind was light and the new engines got the fire under control after it had destroyed about $75,000 worth of property.

Last Sunday, it is claimed, Cooper Graham, of Philadelphia, went over Niagara Falls in a barrel. THE OREGON CONVENTION.

W. F. Benjamin, of Roseburg, one of her leading citizens, writes that he will favor me with a list of names, has published a notice of the convention free, and will do so again, in the Plain-dealer. The letter is good, intelligent, and practical throughout, for which our friend has the thanks of the many thousands of Liberals in the northwest. Dr. York and wife write that they will be at the convention and meet their many old friends. In the next issue we will publish a list of twelve to fifteen speakers. And here it would be well to remind Liberals of the reduced rates of fare. I am told they expect 100,000 people here from Sept. 26 to Oct. 26, at the great Industrial Fair. Fifty musicians will be here from New York city at an expense of $10,000. But the cheapest and best here will be our great re-union of the different branches of the Liberal family.

David Wittenberg, of East Portland, has taken a Life Membership in the Union. I crossed the plains with this honest man in 1862. He was a Hungarian patriot along with Louis Kosuth.

Eldridge Morse, of Snohomish, writes that a delegation will be here to the convention, and that Mr. Underwood will soon deliver seven lectures at this "village on the sound."

Prof. James Roderick Kendell will deliver an address before the convention. E. G. Caukins, of this city, one of Horace Seaver's patrons for thirty years, threw five dollars into the treasury as he passed our faithful Neunert on the street.

The contract is closed by which the grand ball will be furnished with music by Roos & Hodgson's Aerial Orchestra of six professors. Ladies will be admitted free; gentlemen one dollar, and a superb lunch is to be served free by the Portland and East Portland Liberal ladies. This celebrated orchestra will give some of its best selections on Saturday morning, and lead the audience in singing "America," "A Thousand Years My Own Columbia," the Paine song, and other pieces. Liberals should reach here on Friday evening to be present at this morning banquet of speech and song.

James Laird, of Roseburg, writes that he is doing all he can to make up the convention. He is one of our reliable vice-presidents. James K. Sears, of McCoy, Or., is doing all he can to make up the convention by inviting attendance and organizing his forces for that purpose.

The O. S. S. U. has a most excellent secretary in Brother Sears. Louise E. Bennett, of Corvallis, one of the mothers of Liberalism and a vice-president, says they are raising money, some giving five dollars, and will have it here for use in the great cause. She sends a fine list of needed names. We hope this good woman will say a few words at our convention for the encouragement of Latter Day Liberals. Mrs. Lois Waisbrooker will deliver a short address at our meeting, and we send her note for publication. Miss Mattie Blaisdell is at work on a most beautiful and costly banner to be presented to the convention with an address.

As the work proceeds the programme is growing on me, and I am so constituted that I cannot well do two things at once or work well when matters are mixed. Therefore I ask those interested to allow the six meetings on Saturday and Sunday to be devoted absolutely to speech and song. Do nothing else and think of nothing else. Then I have a speaker to open the conference on Monday morning, to be followed all day with five to ten minute speeches, and a ball in the evening. If these are made successful it will be easy to extend the conference one or two days more and have radical lectures at night by our many speakers. As the talk at the Union proper must be on the Nine Demands only, we will find a great desire to hear more radical thought on Liberalism. This will suit speakers and hearers. Let us strike while the iron is hot.

I will invite Liberals through FREETHOUGHT to formulate questions or propositions for discussion at our conference, and will give a few to introduce the matter:

Should Liberals take up public as well as private collections?

Shall we employ one or more persons to deliver lectures to the people on the Nine Demands of Liberalism during the coming year?

How shall we raise money to defray the expenses of the next annual convention?

Shall we select fifteen responsible and worthy persons to become incorporated under the laws of the state of Oregon to receive gifts, devises, bequests, deposits of personal, mixed and real property, to build halls, support lecturers, disseminate literature and support our Liberal papers according to the will of the donors?

Shall the Liberals of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and British Columbia purchase a piece of land in Portland and build a Free-thought Hall or Temple thereon for future use?

Will Liberals examine these and send in others and thereby virtually determine what they will talk about at the conference?

James Wardwell, of Emmett, Idaho, sends five dollars on expenses. It is a case of more dollars than words. F. Hauswirth, of North Yamhill, says: "The call is a good move and should have been done years ago. I am in favor of Liberalism and the secularization of the government. I will be present, give notice in local papers, and raise some money. Here are some names."

W. T. Booth, of McMinnville, says: "I will be at the convention and bring all I can with me. Will bring all the money I can, and raise some from others if possible."

Liberals, this communication is now too long, but a few words yet with you. If you do not come and bring your friends, or if you come to one meeting and go off on business or sight-seeing the next, then I cannot make this meeting. The cause in that event would be discouraged everywhere, as so many expectations have been created. Remember this convention comes in the middle of the great fair. A hint to the wise and conscientious is sufficient.

C. BEAL,
President Oregon State Secular Union.

So far as the question of a large attendance at the Masonic Hall, Portland, Or., Oct. 12, 13, and 14, is concerned, letters from all parts of Washington banish all anxiety; and the shrewd, excellent judgment of the Committee in presenting unparalleled attractions at the opening session, on Saturday morning, Oct. 12, will insure all making especial efforts to be present at the very commencement of the convention.

It is now certain that there will be lectures and addresses by the most able exponents of our principles; a great gathering; a grand rally of leading Liberals; a full report of the convention in all the leading journals of the northwest; the jolliest, merriest, most brilliant and enjoyable ball; the most social and superb supper (free), and the awakening of unbounded enthusiasm.

And yet there is reason for great anxiety, because all this will eventually count for naught, unless the opportunity is improved to fully discuss, decide, and harmonize on some practical plan to carry on the work.

The enemy is vigilant, well organized, provided with abundance of funds, and unscrupulous. Both our state legislatures must be sharply watched; the schemes of the foes of liberty defeated; the needed literature distributed, not alone among the members of our legislative bodies, but also among their constituents at home, so they will be induced to use their influence to insure just and prevent unjust and vicious legislation. The living voice of our representative must be heard, the face be seen, the presence felt, the irresistible arguments of truth properly presented.

Efforts should be made to insure our Liberal papers very large increase of their circulation; every able worthy lecturer receive ample encouragement, that others yet more able may be induced to take the field.

The churches receive over twenty-six million dollars a year for preaching Christianity, superstition, and intolerance, and to carry out their fanatical, liberty-destroying schemes. How needful that every precaution be taken that our limited funds are used wisely, and guarded from possibility of waste or misapplication.

Those powerful organizations, the National Reform Association, the American Sabbath Union, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, have joined forces; pledged themselves to more determined and persistent efforts to enforce rigid observance of Sunday, and to use every lawful means and influence to defeat every candidate for political office who will not pledge himself to do all in his power to secure "an acknowledgment and performance of the nation's duty to guard and protect the church, by suppressing all public violation of the moral law; by maintaining a system of public schools, indoctrinating their youth in morality and virtue; by exempting church property from taxation, and by providing her funds out of the public treasury for carrying on her aggressive work at home and in the foreign field." (Christian Statesman.)

Liberals of Oregon and Washington, what will you do to defeat these schemes? How much money shall we contribute? In what manner shall it be collected, and how shall our contributions be expended? We must depend on the wealthy Liberals to give generously of their abundance, but let the poorest wage-worker feel that in this struggle he or she is an honored helper, giving from scant store as freely, and more in proportion than the possessor of abundance, thus maintaining independence and doubling their interest in the work; while the wealthy, knowing that all are doing all they can, will be encouraged to come to the rescue in times of great or special need.

We have reached the critical time when every lover of liberty must do his or her full share in helping forward the work.

Come to the convention; let us have a grand, good time. But let the enjoyment of the grand ball and sumptuous banquet be intensified by the delightful assurance "so far we have done our duty—the plan of future work is decided upon, and is one on which all can unite." And then the enjoyment and enthusiasm of the convention will only be the precursor of that glorious celebration of the ultimate victory of Reason, Right, Truth, and Liberty, so soon to follow.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

TO THE LIBERALS OF OREGON AND WASHINGTON: Let every one who possibly can go to the Oregon State Convention of Liberals to be held in Masonic Hall, Portland, Oct. 12, 13, and 14. Railroad fares will be reduced one-half on account of the Pacific Northwest's great fair and exhibition held from Sept. 26 to Oct. 26, so our friends can attend both the fair and convention by paying fare one way.

Upon arriving at Portland I found Brother Beal, the president of the Oregon State Secular Union, overrun with business, getting ready for the meeting and doing herculean work to make it the biggest gathering of Liberals ever held on this coast. Some twelve to fifteen speakers have promised to be here from Chicago, Kansas City, and other places, and the best talent in the country. So let our friends all up and down the coast and over the mountains resolve to lend a helping hand. Come if possible; anyway, send in five dollars, two, or even one dollar, for it takes cash to run a big meeting like this. Several have given $20, $10, and $5, but it will need $500 at least to pay current expenses—advertising, circulars, preliminary work, etc. The church, the God-in-the-Constitution party, the W. C. T. U., the Y. M. C. A., and the Sabbath Union have appointed meetings here in October, and they are leaving no stone unturned to get control of our laws and bind us to observe their Sabbath and acknowledge their God Jehovah. Their agents are everywhere at work through the preachers and churches at the new states' constitutional conventions, sparing neither work nor cash to carry out their plans. If our friends do not want laws similar to those in Alabama and several other states where a man may be denied the right of suffrage, may be denied his evidence in court, or to sit on the jury, they must wake up to the needs of the hour. Our opponents are rich and strong, and are determined that Infidels shall have no rights that they will be bound to respect. Church power is increasing and concentrating by uniting, monopoly, trusts, corporations, legal steals; all are binding or trying to bind and gag the individual. Hence the need for this convention. We must meet and organize and lay plans, cut out our work so as to work together. We can accomplish but little except we unite and pull together. We want to get rid of the Comstock laws so far as they muzzle the press, the Sunday laws that would make every town and hamlet a sort of graveyard on Sundays, keep God out of the Constitution and hell out of the people, and preachers out of the halls of legislation. If we sit supinely by for this freedom-wrecking party to go on in their holy superstition, we will soon find that we, like the careless flies, are caught in the spider's web with no way out except by revolution. Carelessness allowed human slavery to be engrafted on this country, and see the cost and waste of life to eradicate it. A worse fate is in store for our grand, glorious country again if we do nothing to checkmate this monster, the united church power.

So, friends, one and all, far and near, take an interest, do your part, do all you can, be resolved to help fight the battle, for it must be fought, and the longer we put off the more bitter and more costly will it be. Come to the convention if possible, but send a remittance (for that will give you an interest) to C. Beal, president, Portland. Comrade Beal is an old man, but honest and capable, and is giving two months' hard labor, without pay, to work up this convention. He is a poor man, but has paid out hundreds of dollars for lectures here in Portland. This is the kind of stuff we want all our friends to show they are made of; so "on to Portland" now with the necessary lucre, and in person Oct. 12, 13, and 14.

D. C. SEYMOUR.

NORTH YAMHILL, Or., Aug. 29, 1889.

C. BEAL, Liberal Friend: I received your last letter some time ago, and let me say in reply that I appreciate the efforts you are making to make the convention a success, and I further know that your task is a gigantic one. I hope I can do something to aid in the work. I shall speak in Forest Grove Sunday and in McMinnville the following Sunday, and I shall exhort the Liberals to be in attendance, and assist financially. I shall write a notice of the convention for our county paper. I think there will be several from this place in attendance.

I do not agree with Mr. Bell about exacting pay for lectures at the convention; so far as I am concerned, I shall expect no pay. I am willing to give that much for the cause. I have made many such a "little sacrifice" for Liberalism, and expect to in the future.

You asked that I suggest methods how to make up and carry on the convention. Now, I am a novice in the business of organizations, either in religion or politics, and I am the most recent recruit in the Liberal lecture field, so I think I shall not be presumptuous enough to think I can instruct older and more experienced men.

Hoping that the convention will be a grand success and the work go steadily on, I am,

Fraternally yours,

GEO. H. DAWES.

EAST PORTLAND, Or., Aug. 8, 1889.

PRESIDENT BEAL, Dear Sir: In answer to your kind invitation to be one of the speakers at your convention in October I would say: I admire the liberality which leads you to "open communion" with those not of your faith—no, that does not express the idea, for so far as practical work here in this life is concerned I fully agree with you; but what in the eyes of some who call themselves Liberals is as bad as being a Christian, I believe in a future life—am what is called a Spiritualist, and though well aware that the remnants, and often more than the remnants, of church superstition are found in our ranks, I never go back on my colors, but hope to see the day when everything that has grown out of the idea of a personal God will be discarded by every sensible man and woman. Believing in another state of existence, I also believe that the best preparation for it is to live for this while here.

I am in full accord with the Nine Demands of Liberalism, as are all who are willing to do as they would be done by, and will be with you at your convention and do what I can to justify the honor you confer upon me. Fraternaly, LOIS WAISBROOKER.

P. S.—I hope and expect that you will have a grand meeting—one that will extend its influence all over the Pacific coast.

L. W.

DEAR MR. BEAL: Received yours, and I accept your kind invitation and that of the Board of Directors of the Oregon State Secular Union to be present at the annual convention to be held at Portland Oct. 12, 13, and 14. I regard this gathering as of the highest importance and believe that it will greatly help to advance the cause of Liberalism. The objects of such a convention are many. The first thing is to bring those Liberals together who are deeply interested in the work in their own localities, to become acquainted and join forces for larger action. Earnest Liberals have hitherto been isolated, and the organized power of the churches has not been resisted as it ought to be. If all the earnest Liberals would combine together throughout the state and the Pacific Coast the influence of Liberalism would be increased tenfold. The mere fact of coming together in one body would of itself be a mighty factor.

Again, we need to come together to talk up plans of organization and work—both for state and local purposes. So long as church property is exempt from taxation and Sabbath legislation is maintained there is a pressing necessity for action. But the local work, including not simply political but intellectual, moral, and social advancement, demands serious consideration. We want to know how Freethought can best reconstruct the world of thought, and virtue, and hope, on the basis of nature, science, and humanity. All the experience and wisdom of the best minds should here be brought into requisition.

But a further object of the convention is to arouse indifferent Liberals. Nine-tenths of the Liberals of the country are indifferent. They let things drift. A few in every community have to do the work, and more than half the Liberals will not lift a hand or give a cent in aid of lectures or papers. This is a most unfortunate state of affairs, and the object of the convention is to have so grand a gathering and to bring into play such means of impulse and attraction that beyond the earnest Liberals a power shall reach the indifferent Liberals to arouse them to a perception of the dangers of the situation, and also to kindle in them the enthusiasm of humanity, by which they shall realize that the highest life is not for themselves only, but for all the world. The convention is not, therefore, to be a merely business convention, but also a gathering for the creation of an impulse that shall stir those who are now indifferent to an active interest in the movement.

Furthermore, we want to reach the great general public. We cannot do this by business sessions or by talk among ourselves as to the best plans of work. There must be great gatherings and representative speakers. A business session is of importance, but it cannot reach the masses. The masses, the general public and indifferent Liberals, will not attend a business meeting however interesting and important it may be. Two hundred might attend a business meeting, while two thousand would attend a well advertised meeting addressed by able Freethought speakers. In our anxiety to formulate plans of action, to build an engine, we must not forget that we must make steam; we must create material, and this can be done only by public gatherings at which no business is transacted, but where thought, imagination, and oratory, the most brilliant presentation of our ideas, shall reach the masses, who could be reached in no other way, and if not reached in this way would always be in profound ignorance of Freethought. I refer to this because I notice a tendency to make most of the sessions of the convention business sessions. I think this a mistake. I think two business sessions would be amply sufficient. Methods and means have already been so fully discussed, and working Liberals are so intelligent in these matters that we know what we want and how to get it without much discussion; but I think the main force of the convention should be used to gain and influence the vast indifferent and inimical public by speeches from our best men and women; by a large attendance, those interested gathering from all parts to swell the concourse; by music, if we can have it, also a festival occasion. We want our convention to be reported in the newspapers, and looked upon as an affair of world-wide importance.

These are my ideas of what the convention should be—a little different from what have been given by others, but not so different but what the most thorough harmony can prevail. Our method should be inclusive and not exclusive.

The objects of the convention should be many, not one. The objects as I understand them are: (1) To make fellowship among earnest Liberals; (2) to discuss and adopt best plans of organization for state and local work; (3) to arouse the mass of indifferent Liberals to action; (4) to reach and interest and command the attention of the vast general public—the world itself—to our aims, purposes, ideas, and methods. A convention like this will certainly be a landmark in the now wonderful advance of Freethought. Yours truly,

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A FESTIVAL OF FAITH AT PLYMOUTH.

The two hundred and sixty-ninth anniversary of the embarkation of the Pilgrims for New England, says Moncure D. Conway in the Open Court, has witnessed the first celebration of their venture which can be called national. Festivities of Forefathers' Day have been kept up by societies of New England people throughout the country, but the nation has regarded Plymouth Rock as a partly sectional, partly religious symbol. But the Rock has had its national importance. It has an almost ludicrous physical smallness when one sees it, for the reason that it looms so large in pulpit and patriotic eloquence. It has witnessed the transformation of the first church founded by the Pilgrims to Unitarianism. The phases of political faith in the country may be gathered from the orations beside that Rock of Winslow, Webster, Everett, Choate, and Wendell Phillips. If my reader is puzzled about Winslow, let me say that Edward, son of Governor Winslow, delivered the first oration at Plymouth in honor of the Pilgrims. That was in 1774, and in 1775 the same gentleman was an ardent loyalist guiding Lord Percy against the people of Lexington. The "Old Colony Club" of 1769 consisting of seven members was germ of the Pilgrims' Association of to-day, which has managed to enlist the nation, to raise $200,000, to build a canopy over the Rock, and to set on a hill the colossal figure of "Faith." It bears the names of the Pilgrims to whom, the inscription says, it is "erected by a grateful people in remembrance of their labors, sacrifices, and sufferings for the cause of civil and religious liberty." The statue is made of 14 granite blocks, is 36 feet high, and stands on a pedestal 45 feet. I cannot find the name of the artist responsible for this figure, and thereat do not wonder.

In the absence of artistic merit one may give the figure a realistic-allegorical interpretation. A cynical critic explained that the downward look of "Faith" (though one finger points upward) signifies the godliness that is profitable for this world—exemplified in this instance by the expenditure of $200,000 for works that should not have cost a fourth of the sum. But Faith's earthward look fairly represents the fact that the Pilgrims meant to found their City of God in this world. The cumbrous blocky figure embodies Calvinism militant. The upward finger proceeds from a fist doubled to deal with the Indians, and also with any who should seek heaven otherwise than the one finger directs. This "Faith" founded Harvard College, and wears Greek drapery; but she clutches her open Bible as if about to hurl it at a Quaker. Her face is that of a Medusa who turned hearts to stone, until some rebelled and turned her to stone.

Supporting the monstrosity are four seated figures, each 14 feet high—Liberty, Law, Morality, Education. Liberty is a Hercules, with helmet and lion's skin, but somewhat Indian-like. Congress paid for "Liberty," and the American Law Association for "Law." This figure—manifestly meant to resemble Webster—holds a book and seems to be giving a judicial opinion, which the American Daniel never did. "Education" is a respectable school dame who favors the Bible in schools, as one may infer from her holding the Decalogue. "Morality" is a theological type, on her breast being the High Priest's jewel with its twelve stones. Beneath these heroic figures are panels of fair but conventional workmanship, representing the Embarkation, the Landing, the Treaty with Massasoit, and the Compact signed in the cabin of the Mayflower. Although the latter sculpture is just under a female "Education," no woman is present.

Plymouthian "faith" was much tried on August 1, the day of dedication. About daybreak something like a waterspout deluged the region, and was followed through the morning by a succession of storms. From a veranda where I found refuge, I looked out on this storm, and reflected that it was just such a southwestern storm that drove the Pilgrims, bound for Virginia, to this beautiful haven. So to the eyes of "Faith" it might appear an impressive part of the celebration; but to the citizens: who had taken such pains with their decorations, the storm was a fire-breathing dragon, roaring angry responses to the cannon:

at the Rock. However, the shining spear of the dragon-pursuer appeared in the west, about noon, and the decorative morning-glories expanded again. The decoration which most interested me was on the front of an old shop, which was overhung with quaint bits of colonial furniture. They appeared far away—as if fragmentary survivals of election and reprobation. In one such piece of colonial furniture, John Carver's chair, ex-Governor Long sat while presiding over the banquet. In a marquee sat some fifteen hundred people, their feet in water, dined and listened to the addresses. From the platform some expected faces were conspicuously absent. The president had not the historic sense to be the first chief magistrate to visit Plymouth Rock, though he was in the neighborhood; and Secretary Blaine passed by to Maine rather than play second fiddle to the Southern Democrat selected as orator of the day, on a platform inscribed—

"Plymouth Rock and Jamestown,
The Pilgrim and the Cavalier,
Once diverse, hereafter forever one."

The selection of Congressman Breckenridge, of Kentucky, as the orator was felicitous. He represents much more than Kentucky. He is perhaps the most historical Southerner living. His grandfather offered in the Kentucky legislature the famous nullification resolutions of 1798, afterwards made a little less radical by Madison for Virginia. His uncle was the states-rights' candidate against Lincoln. The family is from old Virginia, one of the earliest to embrace the Presbyterianism of which this congressman's father was a distinguished preacher. At the present day it is the Presbyterianism of Virginia and Kentucky which most nearly represents the "Faith" symbolized by that bit of Plymouth Rock under stony "Faith's" feet. The Pilgrims did not reach Virginia eight generations ago as they hoped, but they reached it. A Puritan Sabbath, a hard Calvinism, unknown in New England, are familiar in Virginia and in Kentucky—once one of its counties. It has even conquered the Episcopal church. The bishop of Virginia—a lineal descendant by blood of the first apostle of Presbyterianism in the South (Davies)—will not preach in a church where there is a flower. Thus it happens that these Plymouth folk had to go South for a Puritan orator. Mr. Breckenridge had to be preceded by a theistic prayer from the pastor of the first church, now Unitarian. These facts made the orator's figure almost unique. He is a very fine-looking gentleman, with silvered hair and a silvery voice, more eloquent than any orator which New York and the West have left in Massachusetts. No man of equal culture could be found in the North prepared to confess the "faith" of the Pilgrims.

But even this rather "blue" Presbyterian was compelled to repudiate the bigotry and intolerance of the Pilgrims and the Puritans—between whom his distinction was rather technical and antiquarian. He said: "It may even be that for opinion's sake death was inflicted; but no people can remain narrow who hold it to be of divine obligation that every child shall be taught to read and know the Bible." So it appears that even in the last refuges of Puritanism men are reading out of the Bible the many passages demanding death for opinion's sake. There was another suggestive passage in the oration. He spoke of the "freedom" of the Pilgrims as an essential part of their relation to God. "A soul brought consciously face to face with God is necessarily thereafter a free soul." I was reminded of the fact that in the early Virginia colony the clergy were inclined to maintain that the baptism of a negro liberated him. The question was referred to England, where it was decided in favor of the masters. If families of the rank of the Breckenridges in Virginia and Kentucky had earlier worked out this generalization, about the necessary freedom of a soul face to face with God, some modern American history might be less deplorable.

The way in which this impressive orator glorified the faith of the Pilgrims, but repudiated—albeit gently—some of the works by which that faith was shown, and told us that reverence for them meant progress, and that to act and believe as they did might be the most unloving return for their toil, was fitly followed by the singing of Mrs. Hemans's hymn about the breaking waves dashing high on a rock-bound shore. Dr. Channing once visited Mrs. Hemans and told her that there were no dashing waves at Plymouth, and no rock-bound shore. The poetess burst into tears. But she would have been consoled had she known that the Old Colony folk would go on singing her hymn all the same beside their placid beach. So also we go on singing the praises of the Puritans beside a new moral coast which knows not their rock-bound dogmas, nor their cruel theocracy. On my journey I stopped at Sandwich, eighteen miles from Plymouth, where about two hundred and forty-four years ago some earnest members of the congregation of Rev. Mr. Butcher came to the conclusion that ceremonies and sacraments were irreligious. They became Quakers before George Fox was heard of. These pious people were compelled to assemble in a sort of natural amphitheatre in the woods, where the very "whip-poor-wills" sang of their scourges. Among those persecuted people of Sandwich was an ancestor of Daniel Webster, and an ancestor of John G. Whittier. But we go on singing after Mrs. Hemans (herself a heretic) that the "Pilgrims left unstained what they found—freedom to worship God."

We have seen that the strong point with the ancient heretics was their denial of the Resurrection on the ground that there was no Crucifixion. Consequently, if we can establish the fact that the Crucifixion most certainly took place, we have gone a long way, if not the whole way, to establish the truth of the Resurrection. Here is testimony, such as it is, to the fact of the Crucifixion.

St. Helena, the mother of Constantine, "the first Christian Emperor," some three hundred years subsequent to the Crucifixion, found the very cross on which the third part of Omnipotence had been fastened with tin-tacks. It must be remembered that this cross was found by no common person. St. Helena was nearly eighty years old at the time; she had to deal with monks, and she had plenty of money; and, if you have plenty of money, there is but little difficulty in discovering the true cross, or any number of crosses, and a few Christs to take a six hours' turn upon them for fifty pounds a piece. Then winners in the fifty-pound stick-and-nail competition would come down and have a long pipe and a quarter of gin with their boon companions, among whom they would subsequently figure as "arf-crucified 'Arry 'Iggin and 'arf-crucified Bill Sykes." Well, besides being very old and very pious, Helena had the advantage of being the mother of "the first Christian emperor," also a very pious person, who murdered his son Crispus and his nephew Licinius, and suffocated his wife Fausta in a steam bath; and all this not when he was a Pagan, but after he had become a Christian.

Helena, mother of "the first Christian emperor," was as pious as her son; and when in her dotage—the very state of mind which predisposes one to "find Jesus"—she went to Jerusalem to ferret out the cross upon which a person had been crucified who, very probably, was never crucified at all.

The Jerusalem monks, who, according to Gregory of Nyssa, (see "Decline and Fall," chap. xxxiii.) were a disreputable gang wallowing in debauchery and general iniquity, found no difficulty in juggling up what she wanted, for the cash and smiles of an empress. She wanted one cross, did she? Bless your life, the monks found her three! The three crosses were those of Christ and the two thieves; but they had got completely mixed up, and it was impossible to tell which was which. But, if sufficient cash were forthcoming, that could be settled. For cash a monk can easily tell a stick to which a scoundrel has been fastened from a stick to which a God has been nailed. And all this can be effected the more readily if the person for whom it is done is eighty years of age, exceedingly pious, and quite imbecile.

There the three crosses were to be sure; but how were they to tell the cross reddened with the blood of an immortal God from the crosses horrible with the gore of a brace of scoundrels? This is how, according to Sozomen, the thing was done. There was a corpse lying at a convenient distance. The monks took one of the crosses and gave the corpse a thump with it; but the corpse took no notice. Then they took up another cross and gave the corpse a whack with it; and still the corpse took no notice. Then they took up the third cross and banged the corpse with it; but this time the corpse did take notice. Up it got with a hop-step-and-jump and a hallelujah, wondering how the Tartarus it had managed to get restored to life. The monks showed it the pieces of rotten stick with which they had reanimated it, and explained to it that the rotten stick was the cross of Christ, whereupon the corpse fell down upon its half-rotten knees, clasped its hands, turned up its eyes, and glorified the Lord.

Certainly this proves that Christ was crucified, and surely the discovery of the Gospel of Matthew (Resurrection and all) in the grave of St. Barnabas proves that Christ rose from the dead. What more does the skeptic want? He has the proofs of Christ's Crucifixion and Resurrection here placed before him; and all he has got to do is to believe and be "saved." The proofs are, of course, incontestable. Praise ye the Lord.

But should the skepticism of the skeptic be of so obdurate a kind that he still entertains some faint doubts as to the validity of the evidence for the Crucifixion and Resurrection, there are certain quite inexpugnable proofs behind of a nature drastic enough to overthrow the triple ramparts of Doubt. Verily God has not left himself without a witness. The true cross was not only found, but it still remains with us, so that the skeptical may go and see it and believe and be saved. Helena gave a piece of it to Constantine. Whether he used it as a weapon with which to murder his son Crispus and his nephew Licinius I know not. The remainder of the cross Helena left in the charge of the bishop of Jerusalem. The bishop realized a fortune out of it, far more than Christ and his father ever made at the carpentering trade, or his mother Mary ever earned at her business as a barber. ("The Virgin Mary" was a dresser of ladies' hair. See the Sepher Toldoth Jeshu.) The bishop set the cross up in a shed and ran a peep-show. He charged so much a head for a sight of the cross, and did the holy "Walk up, ladies and gentlemen," till the wealth of the Christian monks at Jerusalem enabled them to afford refinements in crime and subtleties in debauchery to which even they had previously been strangers.

By and by the bishop of Jerusalem got a nice handy axe, with which he knocked chips and splinters off the cross of his Lord to sell to the faithful. Faith was abundant, so the market was brisk, and the bits of the cross sold capitably. From bits big enough to make a snuff-box to logs big enough to make a gate-post, were soon scattered all over Christendom. But, in spite of all that was taken off it with axe and saw, the true cross remained intact and as big as ever, the church of Christ gravely putting forth the doctrine that the cross automatically and miraculously repaired itself as often as pieces were hacked or sawn from it. Calvin says of the true cross that a bare catalogue of the pieces of it, and the places where they were to be found, "would certainly fill a goodly volume." And he proceeds to say: "There is no abbey so poor as not to have a specimen. In some places larger fragments exist, as at Paris in the Holy Chapel, at Poitiers, and at Rome, where a crucifix of tolerable size is said to have been entirely made out of it. In fine, if all the pieces which could be found were collected into a heap, they would form a good ship-load, though the gospel testifies that one individual was able to carry it." (Calvin's "Tracts," vol. i, p. 301.) So you see that the cross upon which Christ was crucified was not only found, but there is vastly more of it on the earth at the present hour than poor Simon of Cyrene could carry, even if he had the strength of an elephant. There is in existence, or was until modern times, as much of that doleful tree as would have made a cross whose transverse beam would have been in the clouds. Christ could not have been raised to its patibulum or cross-beam by means of fifty of the longest ladders in Jerusalem tied end to end. In further proof I was going to deal with the Crucifixion nails and spear, and the crown of thorns, which the barons of Roumania pawned for thirteen thousand pieces of gold; but, after the evidence of the Crucifixion that I have already adduced, surely he who will not believe deserves all the burning he can get, the gnashing of as many teeth as he may happen to have, and the gnawing of as many never-dying worms as can conveniently be let loose upon him.

But in his anxiety that none should perish, but that all should turn unto him and live, the Lord has been graciously pleased to vouchsafe us still further evidences. He has heaped Pelion upon Ossa by way of proof, in order that everybody should believe, letting hell fall into desuetude and its furnaces smoulder down into cinders. The Empress Helena built a church over the spot from which Christ ascended to heaven. We have seen that he ascended both from Mount Olivet and from a mountain in Galilee at least fifty miles away. But Helena built the church over the spot from which his nether parts ascended, for on the floor of the church remained everlastingly the marks of his feet. It was no use attempting to pave the floor of that church. The marks of the feet tore up the flagstones and sent them spinning out of the way. It was found impossible to cover over those blessed footmarks (see Jortin, vol. iii, pp. 87, 88). No wonder they were ineradicable. What a dint they must have given the ground in their upward spring through the empyrean! The turf must have flown from the divine heels as far as Babylonia and Egypt. With what devotion the faithful climbed that hill and knelt down to kiss the footprints of their flying savior!

The ineradicable footmarks afford incontrovertible proof of the Ascension. The finding of the true cross is unassailable evidence of the Crucifixion; but if Christ was crucified, and if he afterwards ascended, he must, of course, have risen from the dead.

Those more warped by prejudice than conversant with history may object that I have mixed up Gospel and Tradition as if they were of the same historic validity. I reply, and am prepared to deal with all opposition that may be forthcoming, that gospel and patristic Tradition are alike invalid. The miracle of the corpse being re-animated by being brought in contact with the true cross is as well established as the miracle of re-animating Lazarus. The miracle of the ineffable footprints on the spot from which Christ ascended is as fully proven as the miracle of Christ walking on the waters. The patristic legends and the gospel fables belong in all essentials to the same class of religious fictions, the evolution of credulous Superstition and inventive Fraud. The gospels and the legends have alike been filtered to us through the most superstitious and fraudulent circumstances that mark the darkest ages of our race. They come down to us, as we have seen, from a time when religious superstition was in its zenith, and when pious fraud was a regular and recognized profession. Well might the early fathers, to whom we are indebted for Gospel and Legend alike, take up the words of Isaiah: "We have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves."

Paul was the leading Christian of the first century, and he makes the candid admission: "Being crafty, I caught you with guile," and remarks: "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie to his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner? (Romans iii. 7). Justin Martyr and Irenæus were the eminent Christians of the second century, and well did they sustain the mendacious notoriety of Paul in the first. Of Justin Martyr even the judicious and moderate Mosheim is constrained to remark: "Much of what Justin says is wholly undeserving of credit;" while Dr. Whitby admits that Irenæus "scandalously deluded the world with fables and lying narrations." The great lights of the third century—Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome—were no whit behind their pious predecessors as regarded "fables and lying narrations." Well may Mosheim inveigh against the "base audacity of those who did not blush to palm their own spurious productions on the great men of former times, and even on Christ himself and his Apostles." Well may Scaliger admit of the early fathers that "they distrusted the success of Christ's kingdom without the aid of lying." The Rev. Dr. Giles submits that "there is no evidence that either the gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, or the other writings as we have them, existed within a hundred and twenty years after the Crucifixion." Accordingly the canonical books, the apocryphal books, and the patristic legends are one and all the products of the same ages and the same pious forgers. So much, then, for the "Scriptures," which are the only record that Jesus Christ rose from the dead.

JOB.

A tragedy-comedy or vice versa.
SI SLOKUM, Dramatist.

Dramatis Personæ:

JAHVEH, of Blissville.
SATAN, of Sheol.
JOB, of Uz, a man of unbounded faith and unique holiness.
MRS. JOB, of Uz, off-color, religiously.
Sons and daughters at a distance.
"Sons of God," "Job's comforters (unique), messengers, boils, etc.

Scene: Uz, and contiguous territory.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Main street in Uz, Sunday morning.
Enter "Sons of God" on their way to church.
"And Satan came also."

[Enter Jahveh, who takes no notice of his "sons" but accosts Satan.]

JAH. Ah, Satan, is that you I see?

SAT. Am I

That I am, sui generis, or a Multiplication table, as it were?

JAH. (Aside) It is Old Nick himself. (To Satan) Whence comest thou?

SAT. From going to and fro upon the earth, And walking up and down in it, my lord.

JAH. A most extended trip, my lord of sheol.

SAT. Well, I should smile.

JAH. What gratifying thing Hast thou discovered in thy longish walk, Grim suzerain of sheol?

SAT. Many things And much have I discovered gratifying.

JAH. (tartly). As how, Satan?

SAT. Have seen that the great earth And fullness, as it were, thereof, are mine By a majority quite large, my lord!

JAH. Alas! I fear you speak too truly, Satan. I have but one, one chosen people, and On them I cannot bet for two straight hours Together—fact! And after all I've done For them, the stiff-necked ingrates. Satan, thou Art raising, sir, the devil here on earth! It must be stopped at once, forget thee not, Or I can't count on e'en a corporal's guard To rally round the flag incarnadined On Zion's mount.

SAT. I raising hell?—excuse The slip linguistic. Raising nothing I. Quiescent I and passive, as against Thy vigor, vim, and hot activity.

Nor reap do I, nor forage on the earth, Pluck not, but simply catch the ripened fruit As in my nets it falls. 'Tis you and your Lieutenants, sir—the fell besotted priests— Who do the scrambling act for human souls, O warlord mighty, yet, nonetheless, fail to Catch on to great extent, my lord.

JAH. Alas!

'Tis true, 'tis pity, pity 'tis 'tis true, That you corral full nine in ten of all These human souls, am I most painfully Aware, dread lord of sheol! More to me The wonder how the thing can be, when I Such mighty efforts, not to mention time, Put forth to capture and catch onto these Elusive souls. How is it, lord of Hades? What the cause?

SAT. Flies, great lord of Zion—flies!

JAH. What! flies on me? Great Scott! And after all

My princely offers to the stiff-necked chumps, That those who serve me loyally, nor bend The knee to other gods, shall live unto A good old age and with their fathers sleep? The same accorded unto Abraham, Et al. Eh, flies on me, Satan?

SAT. Aye, lord Of Zion, on thy person insects of The genus musca—flies by common call— Do e'en convene and hold high carnival! I could the cause of their engenderment Reveal, but with the swim, as it goes on, Am I content, my lord.

JAH. Ah! say'st thou so? Keep thine own counsel, Satan; I no odds Do ask of thee. But knowest thou of my Good servant Job, of this the bailiwick Of Uz? that there is none like him in all The earth? a perfect man and most upright Eschewing evil, fearing God.

SAT. Somewhat I wot of this man Job—may say, indeed, I'm onto him, my lord. But doth he fear Thee, God, for naught? I ask. Hast thou not made Him solid with the world? Hath he not much Of real estate, much cattle, and much grasp Of shekels, or the means collateral Assuring grasp? Give him a set-back now— Black-tongue his cattle, flatten real estate, Burst banks wherein his shekels lie—and hear Him curse thee to thy face!

JAH. Thou knowest not My servant Job. Wouldst't put him to the test? All that he hath is in thy power—smite, But upon him put not thine hand. To this Extent bank I on Job. You see, it costs Me naught; out of his pocket comes it all. Wilt put him to the trial?

SAT. I should smile Extremely. I'll attend to him at once. Will see you later. [Exit. Jahveh and his "sons" then go to church.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Job villa. Job on the back porch smoking.

[Enter Messenger.]

MESS. Say, poss, der Sabeans der ranch haf raited alretty, and gone aboud dere peesness mit der gattles scooped away, py tam!

JOB. Gread Scodd! You say dot, eh?

MESS. Honest Intian, poss, and more as dot alretty—I vas alone lefd der story mit, und dold you; der resd of der roosders haf der checks pass owet.

JOB (bouncing to his feet). Holy Smoke! bud dot was tough, py tam!

[Enter another Messenger.]

SECOND MESS. Golly, Marse Job, deh's be'n a red-hot rain storm—fo' de Lawd deh was—an' dq sheep an' herders was all roasted browner 'n yuh'd bake a 'possum, massa, an' ole Skipper Afrikanus, dat's me, was de on'y hamfat dat got of'n de field to kem an' tole de story; whuffo! Is'e yere, Marse Job.

JOB (prancing like a mad steer along the porch). Py chiminy cracious! bud dot was ruffer as nefer vas, py tam!

[Enter third Messenger.]

THIRD MESS. Begob, boss, them thaivin' spalpeens, the Chaldeans, hav saized an' roon arf the camels, an' done up the droivers, bad cess to 'em, an' arl alone I 'scaped to tell the tale, begorra! Bedad, it war awful, sorr!

JOB (knocked out). Gott in Himmel! Vas dere gomng soom more goot news, dis morning alretty, I don'd know?

[Enter fourth Messenger.]

FOURTH MESS. Hi, ya, bossee Job. Youl sons and dottels havee high ol timee at e wine palkee in youl bigee son's housee. 'Long come bigee cyclone, knockee house gallee west, killee allee evlybody only Bam Boo, he comee tell e talee alle same so, bossee.

(Tearing his jacket, Job lathers and shaves his head, then drops to his knees and worships the "giver of all good," concluding as follows:)

JOB. Py chiminy cracious! I gomes here midowet nodings, and I shall gone pack midout somedings alretty. Der Lort gifs, and der Lort shall dook away der dings he gif. Blessed der names be orf der Lort, vorefer alretty! Amen!

[In the background, enter Satan, looking more or less paralyzed.]

SAT. (solus) Great snakes! this Shepard beats, and Godkin, too, All hollow! Children killed, his cattle gone, Deadbroke, and yet this harried ranchman sticks To Javeh, as to Ethiopians Defunct sticks death! But wait till I shall get Carte blanche to touch him on the raw, as 'twere—

Himself afflicting sore. Then shall we see What we shall see!

SCENE 2.—Same as Scene 1, Act I. Sunday morning again, and "sons of God" on their way to "meetin'." "And Satan came also," as before.

[Enter Jahveh, looking pleased with himself.]

JAH. (to Satan). Whence comest thou?

(As though he didn't know.)

SAT. (Giving the same old careless answer.) From going to and fro upon the earth, And walking up and down in it, my lord.

JAH. And hast thou found my faithful servant Job

Of color fast, and warranted to wash?

SAT. Yea, skin for skin; but all that hath a man

Will he give up for life. Put forth thy hand And touch him on the raw, in bone and flesh, And curse thee, will this Job, up hill and down!

JAH. (confident). Behold, he is thy mutton, as it were, But save his life.

SAT. Agree I unto that, My lord. But, ah! for him so hot and humid Will I make it, that cheaper he'll sell out Than Esau did! My lord, I go, but soon Will I return.

I sing the hymn of the conquered, who fell in the battle of life—

The hymn of the wounded, the beaten, who died overwhelmed in the strife;

Not the jubilant song of the victors for whom the resounding acclaim

Of nations was lifted in chorus, whose brows wore the chaplet of fame,

But the hymn of the low and the humble, the weary, the broken in heart,

Who strove and who failed, acting bravely a silent and desperate part;

Whose youth bore no flower on its branches, whose hopes burned in ashes away,

From whose hands slipped the prize they had grasped at, who stood at the dying of day

With the wreck of their life all around them, unpitied, unchecked, alone,

With death swooping down o'er their failure and all but their faith overthrown.

While the voice of the world shouts its chorus—its pean for those who have won;

While the trumpet is sounding triumphant, and high to the breeze and the sun

Glad banners are waving, hands clapping, and hurrying feet

Thronging after the laurel-crowned victors, I stand on the field of defeat,

In the shadow, with those who are fallen and wounded, and dying, and there

Chant a requiem low, place my hand on their pain-knotted brows, breathe a prayer.

Hold the hand that is helpless, and whisper—"They only the victory win,

Who have fought the good fight and have vanquished the demon who tempts us within;

Who have held to their faith unseduced by the prize that the world holds on high;

Who have dared for a high cause to suffer, resist, fight—if need be to die."

Speak, History, who are life's victors? Unroll thy long annals and say,

Are they those whom the world called the victors—who won the success of a day?

The Martyrs or Nero? The Spartans who fell at Thermopylae's tryst,

Or the Persians and Xerxes? His judges or Socrates? Pilate or Christ?

VOLTAIRE'S ROMANCES.

A new edition, with numerous illustrations. "I choose that a story should be founded on probability, and not always resemble a dream. I desire to find in it nothing trivial or extravagant; and I desire above all that under the appearance of fable there may appear some latent truth, obvious to the discerning eye, though it escape the observations of the vulgar."—Voltaire.

The Patriot and the President.

Long after the hour of midnight on Friday an individual with an air of assertive dignity and an unsteady gait, might have been seen climbing the hill to Mr. Blaine's Bar Harbor cottage.

After making a circuit of the house he finally found what seemed to be an entrance and rang a bell at what happened to be the kitchen door.

He rang twice, then knocked, then rang again.

"Who's there?" a voice with saw teeth on it finally said.

"I'm here. Me. Bill Bugg of Buggville."

"What do you want?"

"I want to grasp the hand of the president of the United States."

"Well, you can't—get out."

"Who can't? Who get out? Not me, Bill Bugg of Buggville! No, sir. I'm a hero of the war and am entitled to recognition by the chief magistrate of a grateful country. I gave my heart's blood to my native land and the president of the United States. I bared my breast to the enemy's bullets, that the United States might be preserved!"

"Go 'long, confound you!"

"—and that Ben Harrison might get a salary of fifty thousand a year—and I want to see him."

"You can't."

"Can't see who? Who is it I want to see? Is it the haughty descendant of a line of kings? Is it a throned monarch? or is it the chosen servant of the people? Is this the abode of royalty or is it the lodging place of a citizen of the republic?"

"Get out or I'll call the dog."

"No, sir, it isn't the sultan of all the Turkeys that I want to see. The man whose hand I want to shake is plain Benjamin Harrison, a citizen of the United States, who has only one vote like myself, and wears no crown but the good-will of the people."

No answer.

Thump, thump.

"Say!"

Silence.

"Hi there! Is this a self-governed commonwealth, or are we ruled by an Asiatic despot?"

No answer.

"I say, gimme a piece of pie and never mind shakin' hands with the Oriental potentate."

Deep, double-bass growls from Margaret Blaine's English mastiff. A rattling of a chain. A sudden rustling in the bushes. A jump over the fence. A gallop down the hill.

The hush of night once more falls over Stanwood cottage.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and under stand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future

Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously written. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

He killed the noble Mudjokivis—with the skin he made him mittens—made them with the fur side inside—made them with the skin side outside—he, to get the warm side inside—put the inside skin side outside—he, to get the cold side outside—put the warm side fur side inside—that's why he put the fur side inside—why he put the skin side outside—why he turned them inside outside.

A REGULAR EDUCATED AND LEGALLY QUALIFIED PHYSICIAN, and the most successful (in his specialty) as his practice will surely prove. The Doctor treats all those peculiar diseases of young and middle-aged men such as seminal weakness, impotency, &c., resulting from indiscretion and ignorance of youth. Those who are ailing should send ten (10) cents for his book, "Private Counsellor," setting forth an external Application—

A POSITIVE CURE

The book is worth many times its cost, and should be read by the young for instruction and the afflicted for relief.

[From the Washington National View.]

Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, New Jersey offers his valuable services to all those in need of a kind, sympathetic and skillful physician. Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been assailed and exposed by the press, but, Dr. Fellows, a specialist, in his line, stands foremost in his profession, and the encomiums showered upon him publicly as well as in private, are flattering evidences of the high appreciation and confidence his long and conscientious devotion to his specialties in his profession have so justly merited for him, and it is safe to trust him.

A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1888.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: The remedy you sent is working like a charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. Have only been using it one week, and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right. Yours respectfully, J. R.

REMARKS—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle-aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, but who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out-and-out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors. DR. FELLOWS.

On Creation.

Prior to the great beginning,
When there was no heaven or earth,
When there was no starlight—sunlight,
When creation had no birth,
When a black and boundless nothing,
Harmless, lifeless, round Him fell,
What occurred to wake his slumber,
What was there to break the spell?

Breathless, cheerless, all-pervading,
Starless, worldless, boundless night
Was the nothing at beginning.
Out of which sprang worlds of light,
Out of which were made the heavens,
Countless worlds remote and near,
And all living, moving creatures
In the depth of sea and air.

Yet we know not what aroused Him
To begin the mighty plan
Of creation in its vastness,
Forming lastly sinful man.
Why did he not leave great nothing
In its harmless, silent space,
Rather than make man so sinful
As to damn the human race?

But 'tis said that man was sinless
Until tempted, when he fell—
Tempted by a subtle serpent
Crawling from the depths of hell;
Pure and spotless as the lily
In its early opening bloom,
Until tempted by the devil
To the shades of sin and gloom.

When that black and boundless nothing,
Harmless, lifeless, round him fell,
Why did God create the devil
Or conceive an endless hell?
If creation sent forth evil,
Or an evil comes of good,
Then where is the point dividing
Satan's works from works of God?

When there was no sunlight, moonlight;
When there was no heaven or hell;
When there was no place for sinning
Or for sinful man to dwell,
Why was silence ever broken?
Why was man to weakness born?
Why was devil made to tempt him
And then leave him here to mourn?

Vast and searching are these questions,
Piercing, probing to the core;
Peering back beyond creation
To great nothing, nothing more.
Vast, though simple, is the question,
Piercing, probing to the core—
Is it true there once was nothing,
Nothing, nothing—nothing more?

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

NEWS AND NOTES.

Returning from Dayton I enjoyed a vacation of one day at Walla Walla, which was not a waste of time by any means. A little throwing off of the harness now and then is good for man, beast, devil, and God. I don't wonder that God rested on the seventh day. It was a very sensible plan. Even the deity cannot change eternal nature, and play must come after work. The "Supreme Ruler of the universe"—a la Washington state constitution—needs a rest occasionally. I think he must have been delighted to take a rest after that flood of talk in his honor in the Olympia convention. Following the universal course I threw care to the winds and had a bit of a holiday. Friends Reynolds, Rosenow, Olsen, etc., helped to make the hours sparkle by. Of course we had to talk about the coming convention at Portland, with bright hopes of a royal gathering that shall give fresh courage to all. I find there is a widening interest in this matter in Washington as in Oregon, and a large number are saying that they will come. So far as the purpose of the convention is concerned there is no difference of opinion. We desire to organize, and make plans for larger enterprise. There may be some diversity of view as to the best means of accomplishing the end, but a good talk will settle the difficulty. Liberalism is so absolutely different from orthodoxy that it must have new methods as well as new ideas. Orthodoxy can be organized like a machine, but Liberalism is like a flowing river, a vast ocean, and can't be put into bounds. The law of attraction must be the soul of the organization.

Refreshed with genial intercourse and the splendid work going on at Walla Walla, I push on to the Grand Round Valley of Oregon. Fortunately I am not alone in my journey. Mrs. Reynolds takes the same train, going to the bright Columbia, Stella, and Skamokawa. Mrs. Sufferen is en route to Denver, and Mrs. T. S. Mabry to the more distant orient of Ontario. At Pendleton, Oregon, where we are delayed several hours, I have the pleasure of meeting, for the first time, Mrs. H. Wilbur, of Rud-dock, Or., whose father, Mr. W. R. Jones, of Weston, Or., is an old-time Investigator man, and has borne the brunt of battle for many a day. Waiting for the train was not quite so tedious as it oftentimes is. We could have a kind of Freethought picnic among ourselves. Besides, interesting and unique characters were among the patient and jolly crowd—a farmer and his wife and big cage with a melancholy bird in it, going back to Kansas. They did not like these sage-brush plains. Another family, with children too numerous to mention, were returning to Missouri, the land of paradise, after many wanderings—all but one, who cried as if her heart would break as she bade good-by. She was obliged to go to Portland to be under the doctor's care; a young girl with no one of her family to accompany. Thus tragedy mingles with comedy while the tide of life sweeps on. Little do we know of the suffering that is near us each day as we pursue the devious ways of this world.

The checkered hours, with light and shade, with smiles and tears, move on, and finally the whistle is heard, the ponderous train rolls into the station, and soon, with innumerable packages—my fellow passengers being women—we find our way to a seat, and feel sure that the train can't leave without us, and even the umbrella is not forgotten. At La Grande I bid good-by to my friends, and if the prayers of the Secular Pilgrim avail anything they will proceed to their destination without accident.

Our pathway is not always strewn with flowers, and sometimes in the twinkling of an eye we are in the desert lands. Such an experience was La Grande. I supposed arrangements were made for a lecture, but nothing had been done, and not a single friend put in an appearance. Huffman had been gone a month, and I guess he was all the Liberal in the place, and things went by default. All I could do was to make a few ejaculations on the uncertainty of human affairs, and take another vacation in the solitude of a hotel. Nothing so solitary as a hotel when you don't know anybody. Every dish has a most lonely appearance. I could have stood it a great deal better if I had been in the pathless woods. Under these circumstances all "solid reading" is impossible, and so I buy a novel and plunge into the world of romance and forget my unblest surroundings by a deal of sympathy with impossible heroes and heroines. How good people are in novels. Everything comes out right there. The train is not behind time. I let La Grande take its course, and I roam through dreamland, and find a lot of jolly friends, princes and princesses, music, poetry, splendor; and the Nine Demands are utterly forgotten as I behold virtue rewarded and crime punished.

I don't know what travelers would do, belated, knocked about here and there, connections missed in some out-of-the-way place, trains late, some smash-up on the road, bridges burned, etc.—with all these haps and mishaps, what would one do without a charming book? In an instant the cold reality vanishes and the golden gates of the universe of imagination are unrolled and we walk as if by magic into a land of enchanting wonder.

While at La Grande a solemn funeral procession entered the train. A young girl died suddenly, beloved of all. She was an ardent Christian and on her death-bed had ecstatic visions of Jesus and described his appearance in vivid language, as if she witnessed an actual glory, and yet her lover, who watched over her day and night, is now a raving maniac. Why didn't the blessed vision save the lover?

But the bright reality itself comes after a while, the warp and woof of life blend with brilliant colors, the desert disappears and the garden blooms again along our wandering steps. At Union everything is as pleasant as can be. Riding up to the hotel I greet, among the first ones, Judge Brainard and Jack Plummer, now of North Powder; and then the Jones Brothers, Vincent, Geo. A. Thompson and family, with another baby since I was here first, and the then baby proudly informs me that he wears dresses no more. It is trousers now, and he walks like a little man. The world moves indeed, for the little folks as well as the big folks, and the first pair of trousers and boots are as wonderful as the discovery of a new planet. I am fully repaid at Union for all the disappointments at La Grande. A good audience is present in the evening, and as some of them came eighteen miles to attend the lecture, I feel that generosity and devotion are as inspiring in real life as in the pages of romance. Besides Plummer, N. G. Blair, G. L. Castle, J. Newman, are present from North Powder; J. B. Eaton, from Cove; S. F. Newhard, from Hot Lake; N. T. Conklin, and others from various points; Mr. and Mrs. N. Tartar from "over the Rhine" long ago, are here, W. T. Goodall, etc. I have no reason to be discouraged with the outlook in this delightful place. Union at present is about three miles from the railroad, and that gives it a somewhat sober aspect, but Hunt's railroad is aiming for this point, and that will quite rejuvenate the place and give it bustle and progress. The scenery about it is fine. The hills stand about in beautiful and varied forms, and the long, wide valley stretches away, and fruitful fields and orchards, and charming dwellings intersperse the scene. The centre of a rich and handsome country, Union has an expanding future.

The Jones Brothers and the Oregon Scout are forward still. These editors have a mind of their own, and prefer to lead public opinion instead of to follow it, and they always give a good welcome to the pioneer.

Judge Brainard takes philosophy in the place of religion, and poetry in the place of piety, and with a large heart and cultivated brain enjoys the blessings of a sound mind in a sound body. He is of healthful ancestry and so will live to a good old age without being born again. It is quite a delight with such a friend, to send the plummet-line of thought into this infinite and mysterious universe.

I was pleased to meet Senator J. W. Norval, of Summerville—where there is quite a nest of Liberals, and the flag of free discussion has floated for many a year. Mr. Norval has never lowered his colors on the political field. His Freethought principles are at the front, and yet the people vote for him just the same.

Jas. Newman, of North Powder, was once a preacher of the gospel, but twenty years ago, as he says, he saw "great inconsistencies in the popular interpretations of the Bible," and he has been moving onward ever since. He has written and published several able articles from the advanced religious point.

I visited Mr. and Mrs. Tarter at their little home where, in the evening of life, amidst flowers and fruits, they have the gold and not the dross of life. Born in the Catholic church, they have left the shadows for the sunshine and the open sky.

Vincent believes in a good leather sole, but he don't seem to have much faith in the other kind, and so he prospers, and the world moves on. A well shod foot is better than a pair of wings.

I expect next time to visit G. A. Thompson's ranch and see how farming proceeds in this country. The product in this county (Union) has been about an average of twenty bushels of wheat to the acre, some running as high as forty-five and fifty bushels to the acre. There are no better farming lands on the coast than in this Grand Round Valley.

With a good-by to many friends, and bright anticipations of a return, I wait thirteen hours for a train, and at four o'clock in the morning find myself at Baker City. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A FREE RELIGIOUS UNIVERSITY.

A proposition which, we understand, had its origin with Professor Felix Adler, has been made to found in one of the large cities of the United States a school for the scientific teaching of philosophy, ethics, and the history of religion. This school is not to be pledged to any particular philosophy or to any special view of religion, but all the great systems are to be represented by their advocates. Thus the critical system of Kant will be taught by a Kantian, Spencer's philosophy by a Spencerian. At present there is no institution where divergent systems of thought may meet in free competition. Every educational institution is pledged to dogma. The Princeton college is bound to an antiquated creed; the president of Yale must be an orthodox Congregational minister; Andover must teach Christ and him crucified; Unitarian Harvard is free only in the direction of orthodoxy; that is, students may be more orthodox than their teachers, but not less.

The school of Philosophy and Applied Ethics proposed by Professor Adler is to be divided into three departments:

1. The Department of Philosophy; which will deal with philosophy, logic, psychology, and the theories of morals.
2. The Department of the Science of Religion; including history of the great religions—the Chinese, Egyptian, Hindoo, Persian, Greek, Roman, Mohammedan, Jewish, and Christian. In this department there will be classes for reading the sacred books—the Bible, Koran, Vedas, etc.—in the original or oldest forms.
3. The Department of Applied Ethics, which will embrace education, economics, and practical reform. Here, we presume, will be discussed such questions as rights of property, rates of wages, state rights, functions of government, Socialism, Prohibition, penology, pauperism, and kindred subjects.

It is argued that old beliefs are being given up, and that many who hold that morality gets its sanction from religion will be likely to feel themselves freed from moral restraint when they have escaped from the restraints of religious dogma. It will be the object of the new school to show how morality is founded in experience and may endure when the superstitions associated with it are abandoned.

On the committee who have in charge the plan of the school and the raising of funds for its endowment and maintenance we note the names of Felix Adler, O. B. Frothingham, W. M. Salter, Thomas Davidson, and B. F. Underwood, the last being a special agent appointed to collect money and obtain pledges in behalf of the school.

Every Freethinker must be heartily in favor of this enterprise; and when it is considered how the institutions of superstition are multiplying, how the forces of conservatism are exerting themselves to control the education of children and students, it is a matter for surprise that the friends of progress have not already provided such an institution as that now contemplated. We would like to see the movement for secular education begin with the exclusion of all religious teaching from our public schools. Then there should be in every large city schools of a secular character, such as that contemplated by Prof. Herbert Miller, designed to prepare youth for college or for the higher school of Philosophy and Applied Ethics of Professor Adler. In this preparatory school lectures on comparative religion, philosophy, and ethics might be introduced. These would fit students for higher courses in other secular institutions, and would forearm them against the dogmas taught in our present universities.

An endowment fund of $300,000 is considered necessary to make the proposed school a permanent institution. The Union of the Societies for Ethical Culture has already agreed to devote a part of its annual income toward the purpose, and several large amounts, one of $20,000, have been pledged toward the endowment fund.

RENAN.

To the Editors of Freethought:

About the 18th of September, 1888, at a meeting of Methodist preachers in this city, the Rev. Mr. Urmy read a paper intended to demonstrate that skeptics are inherently afflicted with disintegrating tendencies, which must result in their destruction, if left to their own devices, and advising a clerical boycott.

Without criticising this view (which Mr. Urmy is certainly entitled to hold and express), and without any suggestion as to the practical prudence of his advice, and avoiding all ugly comparisons, I wish to call your attention to certain statements said to have been made by the "Rev. Professor Mansfield," in discussing Mr. Urmy's paper. The newspaper cutting, which was, I think, from the Chronicle, states that he asserted that "he was personally acquainted with Renan, and knew him to be a blackguard, and an immoral man," and that he meant to be understood as saying that Renan was a licentious man.

I do not know the "Rev. Professor Mansfield," nor am I acquainted with M. Renan, but having read many of his best known works, and especially his "Memoirs," I believe the statements of the "Rev. Professor" to be utterly false. In justice to a good man, as I believe, you will do the public a service by learning and publishing the facts.

San Francisco.

Yours truly,

W. W. WINGFIELD.

The statement above referred to was noted in FREETHOUGHT about the time it was uttered, and the Rev. Professor Mansfield was asked to substantiate it, but he never took that trouble. The fact that a man is a Freethinker is deemed by the clergy to be sufficient grounds for slandering his character. We are not acquainted with any life of Renan except his "Memoirs." The charges of Mansfield were wholly new to us, and are not included in the biographical sketches of Renan in the numerous encyclopedias. Until further proof is vouchsafed they may be safely set down as falsehoods.

MR. GLADSTONE has written a letter to the leader of a Bible class in Manchester on the way to study the Bible. He says it must be remembered that the purpose of the scriptures are, "one, to feed the people of God in green pastures; and, second, to afford proof of doctrine. This last," he warns us, "is good and desirable, but not for us all. It requires external helps, more learning, and good guides." That is it exactly. We are to study and believe, and allow others to tell us what is meant by what we read. But why not let the priests read it for us, and take their word for both the matter and its meaning? In other words, why not be Roman Catholics?

PROFESSOR HUXLEY, in a late article contributed to the Nineteenth Century and republished in the Popular Science Monthly for September, takes a very effective way of answering Dr. Wace's contention that we should accept the Bible miracles on the testimony by which they are supported. He quotes from history an account of some miraculous occurrences written down and testified to by one Eginhard, a German historian who held a position in court under Charles the Great about the year 800. The miracles belong to the Catholic church, and are of course rejected by Protestants, but Professor Huxley points out that they are as well attested as any contemporary events, and inquires why he should deny these and accept those of the Bible which are wholly unsupported. Or, as he puts it, the practical question is this: "If you do not believe in these miracles, recounted by a witness whose character and competency are firmly established, whose sincerity cannot be doubted, and who appeals to his sovereign and other contemporaries as witnesses of the truth of what he says, in a document of which a manuscript copy exists, probably dating within a century of the author's death, why do you profess to believe in stories of a like character which are found in documents, of the dates and of the authorship of which nothing is certainly determined, and no known copies of which come within two or three centuries of the events they record?" We doubt if Dr. Wace can give any reasonable excuse for his discrimination in favor of biblical as against ecclesiastically-attested miracles.

THE New Hampshire legislature at its last session passed an act exempting parsonages from taxation to the value of $2,500, and a joint resolution appropriating $800 for the salary of chaplain of the state prison. Twenty-five hundred dollars is probably more than the average worth of farms and homesteads in New Hampshire, and $800 is more than the average wages or income of New Hampshire's workingmen and farmers. Why the discrimination in favor of preachers? In this place we may note the following report of a correspondent from the town of Westmoreland, N. H., to the New England Observer:

"Many are on the sick list.

"The hay crop is bulky, of inferior quality.

"There are very few apples and potatoes, and both of poor quality. The latter are rotting badly.

"The superintendent of highways has had a discouraging task in putting the roads in good condition, owing to their deplorable condition last spring and the washing of so many showers.

"Many fields of corn are now blasting, requiring immediate cutting. The crop will be below an average one.

"The Congregational choir has a supply of new anthems,"

New Hampshire's religion is in much the same state as its potatoes—"poor quality and rotting badly;" its path to Jordan is rough as its highways; and its ministers resemble its corn; yet the crops are taken by the tax-gatherer and religion and the clergy exempt.

THE following testimony to the efficacy of Christianity is extracted from the report of the Rev. T. B. Wood, LL.D., superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Missions in south-east South America: "All over South America the priests are, as a rule, contemptibly ignorant and notoriously corrupt. Many of them are, moreover, vulgar, filthy, and generally vile, avaricious, haughty, oppressive, and hypocritical. . . . The innocence of pious girlhood has no defense possible against the ravenous propensities that lie in wait for it at the confessional. If the anxious mother wishes to save her daughter from this fiendish power, what can she do? Shall she warn them of their danger, and train them to beware? Many a mother has tried that. But that is like warning them that God is wicked, and they must beware of him; for the priest is to them in the place of God."

THE Hon. Irving M. Scott, of San Francisco, talks like a true disciple of Huxley and Darwin. At the opening of the Mechanics' Institute Fair lately, he was the orator of the day, and the following is from his address:

"The mind was unfitted, as it ever must be, for the investigation of truth, so long as it was restrained by fear of overstepping the bounds prescribed by fancied supernatural beings. The properties and laws of nature may necessarily be intricate, and seem occult; but certain it is that nature not only does not forbid, but, on the contrary, invites the most searching investigation and closest scrutiny of all her laws and works. Prior to the voyage of Magellan around the earth, proving it a globe, the condition of society, the condition of the mind, was not adapted to correct thought and to advancement. False and arrogant doctrines pressed as with leaden weight upon intellect. With the achievement of circumnavigating the globe began the enfranchisement of mind; began true philosophy, and substantial progress. From that epoch the world, in the arts and sciences and industries, and in all things conducive to the welfare and happiness of mankind, has progressed with a constant, accelerating force. This force consists, in an eminent degree, of physical science and its practical application. Physical science, as determined and unfolded by the great master minds of the last four centuries, and as put in practice by the hands of skilled labor, has elevated, ennobled, and dignified individual and social man immeasurably above the highest degree enjoyed or conceived of in the more distant past."

CALIFORNIA has complained somewhat of being ignored by the present administration, and to quiet the murmuring the Rev Henry H. Hall, of San Francisco, has been chosen from among two hundred and fifty applicants to fill the position of chaplain in the United States Army. It is well for California to be recognized in some manner, but we protest that every chaplain is a humbug, and demand that their employment in congress, in state legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and in all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued, whether this state gets an office or not.

THE new constitution of Wyoming will "recognize the deity, but Infidelity shall not affect any privileges of citizenship or destroy the competency of a witness." This form of constitution is growing rather monotonous. Why not so change it that Infidelity will be recognized, but belief in the deity shall not affect any privileges of citizenship? It is not very flattering to the Christian's love of fair play that every constitution must expressly deny to religious people the privilege of persecuting or disfranchising those who do not agree with them.

OF the thirteen hundred policeman in Chicago eleven hundred and seventy-five belong to the Roman Catholic church. Chicago, in this regard, resembles New York to a great extent. The writer once knew a man who wagered a considerable sum that more than one-half the aldermen of New York were Catholics and owned liquor stores. He lost his bet. It turned out that nearly all were Catholics, but only twelve out of the twenty-four owned saloons.

It appears that some proposal has been made urging the clergymen of the country to preach in favor of civil service reform, and the New York Sun objects because it doesn't want them to "preach humbug." We would like to know if there is any greater humbug than the one the clergy have been preaching ever since they wore trousers:

THE SAN FRANCISCO FREETHOUGHT SOCIETY.

The next meeting of the San Francisco Freethought Society will be held at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, Sunday evening, September 15, at 8 o'clock. Capt. A. F. Scott will speak on "Catholicism: the Nation's Curse."

FRIENDS OF FREETHOUGHT—and we count every reader as a friend—should remember that the present is the dull season for papers whose circulation is principally rural. Realizing this, they do not need more than an intimation that whatever they are able to do for this paper will be most timely if done now. Send us subscribers, renewals, book orders, or any other form of encouragement you may be moved to extend.

News comes from Germany that the government has taken the salaries of clergymen in hand and fixed the lowest amount that may be paid as a preacher's stipend. It is a good thing. Let it be adopted in this country, and the minimum placed at a million dollars. It might reduce the number of theologians, as high license lessens the number of saloons, but the effect would be none the less salutary on that account; and the laborer is worthy of his hire.

MR. J. D. GRISMER, of Oakland, is more pious than courteous. Last week a man named Reed, living in this city, had occasion to write to him asking him to come to his (Reed's) house Sunday in reference to some business matters. In reply Grismer sent a postal card to Reed, on which he wrote that he would not meet an "infamous blackguard" on Sunday. Reed had Grismer arrested for violating the mails with improper language.

At the second public reception of the Nationalist Club in this city, held in the parlors of the Palace Hotel last Sunday evening, Mr. F. K. Blue is credited with having read a paper on "Economic Evolution as Related to Organisms and Their Adaptation to the Environments Surrounding Them." If Mr. Blue's subject was adapted to the environments surrounding the speaker, he must have addressed a very learned company.

THE sketch of the life of Horace Seaver which we publish in this issue of FREETHOUGHT is from the Boston Investigator, and was doubtless written by the dead editor's friend L. K. Washburn. The man whose career it describes was worthy the immortality given him by the unequalled oration of Colonel Ingersoll.

THE English government has carried its Tithe bill through by a reduced majority. It is a most unjust measure, says the London Freethinker, but there is one compensation—it will make the church still more odious, and help on the work of disestablishment and disendowment.

B. F. UNDERWOOD has just delivered a week's course of lectures at Snohomish, W. T.

OBSERVATIONS.

There were just fifty persons in the hall last Sunday night when the Freethought society's meeting opened, and the arrivals and departures kept the number about the same during the whole evening. One of two things will explain the small attendance—either the members of the society do not care much for the abolition of interest, or they have no confidence in Mr. Howe's ability to tell how it can be done.

Vice-President Lemme had the chair, and introduced the speaker. This was Mr. Howe's second lecture, being the sequel to the one delivered last month on "Our Common Foe." Mr. Howe began by saying that on the previous occasion there had been some severe criticism upon his arguments, and sickly attempts to ridicule his style. He did not think his present remarks would be open to either kind of censure.

The subject of the address was "Usury, and How to Abolish It," but the speaker did not develop his thesis very rapidly. At the other lecture I missed the central point of his discourse by not recognizing it when it was reached, so I was more attentive this time, but hardly more successful. At the end of forty minutes the speaker announced that he would define his system, but some neglected branch of the subject attracted his attention and he broke his promise. Ten minutes later he said, "Bear with me and I will shortly present the remedy." This was at 9 o'clock. At 9:15 the lecturer said, "Issue money without interest, and usury will be abolished." As the hour was late he did not have time to elaborate the scheme. A listener said to me:

"There is something wrong in Mr. Howe's method of presenting his subject. He does not feed the audience with ideas fast enough to keep their attention. His hearers do not know what he is trying to prove. His conclusions precede his premises. He spends his time stating well-known and accepted facts and in filling the room with words. He fails to present his case to the jury so that a verdict may be rendered. There is no sequence. The listener exhausts his mental strength in the endeavor to follow the speaker, and has none left with which to grasp his meaning when it is found. I once watched an aeronaut for half a day while he inflated his balloon. When it finally ascended it was out of sight in three minutes, and I was too weary to take much interest in it any way."

Mr. Phillips was the first critic. He said that people generally do not know what money is. They mistake gold and silver for money, whereas those metals are merely barter. He then related how the inhabitants of the island of Guernsey, one of the English channel islands, desired to build a market-house, but had no public funds. They therefore issued a script with which they paid off the workmen and built the market, afterwards redeeming the script with money received for the rent of the building. Thus they got the market without levying a cent of taxes. Mr. Phillips held that the people of the United States could have all the improvements they desired by proceeding in the same way.

A young gentleman, following Mr. Phillips, stated that he was a native of the island of Guernsey and had seen the market and the script. The latter passed current as a legal tender, and was even sought for, as there was a slight premium upon it. The market was a magnificent affair, the best building on the island, and a distinguished English churchman who saw it expressed surprise and grief that so much grandeur should be devoted to meat and vegetables and nothing to a cathedral.

Mr. Palanca made a rattling speech on the injustice of the possession of wealth acquired without labor. He was glad to see the matter under discussion before the Freethought society.

Mr. Knight made the remark that it was surprising how much one man might think he knew about the finance question, while everybody else was of the opinion that he knew next to nothing. Mr. Knight states to the writer that he failed to criticise Mr. Howe's system of finance for the reason that he did not learn what it was.

Mr. Howe, in closing, expressed himself as flattered by the slight criticism his lecture had elicited; also by the good attendance, which showed that people were interested in the subject despite its bony character.

The lecture next Sunday evening will be delivered by Capt.

A. F. Scott, his subject being "The Nation's Curse," in other words, the Catholic church. Captain Scott is an American, a patriot, and a Freethinker, and his utterances will have no uncertain sound.

About three months ago a correspondent of the Signs of the Times, the Second Advent paper of Oakland, called attention to the fact that the inhabitants of the Pitcairn islands, in the Polynesian archipelago, observe Saturday as the Sabbath. The correspondent thought there was something remarkable in these people "embracing the truth," and exclaimed: "Truly the Lord has gone before us and has done a work that is a marvel indeed." I remarked at the time that the islanders' observance of Saturday was probably due to a nautical error.

I have just had placed in my hands a little old book published long ago at Norwich, England, entitled "Catechism of the Terrestrial Globe," in which the following incident is related to illustrate a point:

In the year 1789 a mutiny took place on board a British vessel, called the Bounty, sent to convey bread fruit to the British Colonies in the West Indies: the Mutineers, after turning the commander, Lieut. Bligh, and 18 of the crew, adrift in the boat, proceeded to Otaheite and from that Island eight of the Mutineers with their ringleader and some Otaheitanes set sail, and were not heard of afterwards for twenty years. An American vessel touched at Pitcairn's Island in 1808, and there discovered the survivors of the lost Mutineers. Again in Sep. 1814, Sir Thomas Staines and Captain Pison, of H. M. ships Briton and Tagus, fell in with this Island. The day on which the two Captains landed was Saturday the 17th of Sep. but by John Adams's (the chief of the Colony) account it was Sunday the 18th, and they were keeping the Sabbath by making it a day of rest and prayer. This was occasioned by the Bounty having proceeded thither by the eastern route, and our frigates having gone to the westward; and the Topaz found them right according to her own reckoning, she having also approached the Island from the eastward. Every ship from Europe proceeding to Pitcairn's Island round the Cape of Good Hope will find them a day later—those who approach them round Cape Horn, a day in advance.

In this chain of circumstances leading up to the Saturday observance there seems to be nothing properly attributable to providence except the mutiny.

A lot of people met at the old Tennent farm, near Hartsville, Bucks county, Pa., last week to celebrate the founding of the Presbyterian church in this country. Benjamin Harrison, president of the United States, was one of the speakers, and among other things said:

I must say I have much pleasure in being here, for every impulse of honest pride which stirs your hearts moves mine. I am glad to stand here at the source of a great movement. I am glad to be here to help celebrate one of the most glorious impulses springing from a small beginning, and yet how far reaching in its results and effects. Let us take no backward steps. Let us continue to merit the favor of God and do his work until the world shall cease to move. Let us, my friends, continue to be steadfast to the faith nurtured and strengthened on this sacred spot.

The event commemorated may or may not have been one worth rejoicing over. We have to judge by the life of its founder and the doctrines which the Presbyterian church was organized to inculcate. John Calvin, who made Presbyterianism synonymous with Calvinism, was a murderer. He burned, tortured, and banished heretics, and was as perfect a fiend as the unintoxicated imagination can picture. A partial list of his crimes, published in this journal of May 4, 1889, shows that it was by no virtue of his own that he escaped the gallows.

The Presbyterian church is not responsible for the infamies of its founder, but it is responsible for the doctrines it teaches, which are as bad as Calvin himself. Imagine a crowd of American citizens meeting to rejoice over this, from the Presbyterian creed:

By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestined unto everlasting life and others are foreordained to everlasting death. These angels and men, thus predestined and foreordained, are particularly and unchangably designed, and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished.

Why should people congratulate themselves that God created them for everlasting death?

Think of the Presbyterians of Bucks county joining with President Harrison and Postmaster-General Wanamaker in a jubilee over this comforting assurance:

Men not professing the Christian religion cannot be saved in any other way whatsoever, be they never so diligent in framing their lives according to the light of nature.

We know that in the United States only twenty millions out of sixty millions of the population profess the Christian religion in the sense here meant, namely, as members of the Christian church. Why should General Harrison praise God for the founding of the faith that consigns to everlasting torment two-thirds of the men who voted for him?

Here is another precious truth from the creed whose founding on American soil has just been commemorated:

We cannot by our best works merit pardon of sin. There is no sin so small but that it deserves damnation.

According to that statement, unless a person be wholly sinless his damnation is assured, since the least sin deserves damnation, and God is just. I can see nothing in that fact to make me feel like celebrating.

Furthermore, says the Presbyterian Confession of Faith:

The souls of the wicked are cast into hell, where they remain in torment and utter darkness, reserved to the judgment of the great day. At the last day the righteous shall come into everlasting life, but the wicked shall be cast into eternal torment and punished with everlasting destruction. The wicked shall be cast into hell, to be punished with unspeakable torment, both of body and soul, with the devil and his angels, forever.

If that is a fact, it would be much kinder to conceal it from the world than to found a church to promulgate it, since there is no way of escaping from a fate which is so irrevocably fixed that the number of men predestined to everlasting life or to everlasting death "cannot be either increased or diminished."

But the beauties of the Presbyterian faith—given a local habitation in Bucks county—are not all told. Contemplate this beatitude:

At the day of judgment the righteous, being caught up to Christ in the clouds, shall be seated at his right hand and there openly acknowledged and acquitted, and they shall join with him in the damnation of the wicked.

It must be understood that "the wicked" here does not necessarily or impliedly mean those of criminal or reprobate lives, but unregenerate men, like yourself, dear reader, whose works, "although they may be things which God commands, and of good use both to themselves and others, yet not being done for the glory of God are sinful and cannot make a man meet to receive Christ."

The foregoing is the religious faith professed by the twenty-third president of the United States, in this year of grace 1889, and of our independence the 114th. It is enough to make an American citizen grieve that he was not born a foreigner. Fortunately for our sensibilities, we shall be dead and unable to blush when future generations, possessed of the common sense denied to us, write down our day and generation as an age of ferocious superstition, and condemn us for holding religious dogmas that would "shock cannibals feasting upon babes."

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK

The California State Fair opened at Sacramento on Monday last.—Sam Jones's converted stenographer, J. W. Lee, is in trouble again. While in San Francisco Lee stole an overcoat, and served sixty days for it. He then went to Honolulu, where he is awaiting trial for stealing a watch.—The Native Sons of the Golden West, with other citizens, celebrated last Monday the anniversary of California's admission into the Union. It is a legal holiday.—Governor Waterman pronounces the state prison investigation a farce.—A Sunday-law crusade is in progress in Los Angeles.—There is a movement on foot to erect a monument in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco, to perpetuate the memory of California's pioneers.—The Chinamen are digging up the bones of their defunct countrymen buried in this city for removal to their native soil. There is a tax of $10 on each body disinterred, and the present resurrection of over one hundred will net the city a large sum.—The fire at Ukiah last week burnt up $50,000 or $60,000 worth of property, but it will not weaken the boom in real estate which is now visiting the town.—The Salvation "Army" at Colusa, Cal., consists of only two men, but they were arrested last week for disturbing the peace and jailed in default of $50 fine.—Sylvestro Morales, the Mexican outlaw who has been committing depredations in the lower part of the state, was captured last week by a constable and party on the shore at the head of the Alamitos bay near Long Beach, Los Angeles county. There was a reward of $1,200 for his capture, which will be claimed by Constable Keno Wilson, who made the arrest.—The case of Neagle, who shot Judge Terry, is advancing as rapidly as could be expected, but there are no new developments.—Four men were killed by the explosion of a boiler in the California Sash, Blind, and Door Factory, Oakland, last Tuesday. The large engine-house was blown to atoms, and many employees were wounded.

It is denied that Cooper Graham went over Niagara Falls in a barrel, and we are now asked to believe that Steve Brodie has performed the feat in a rubber suit.—Henry Genet, the distinguished politician of Tweed-ring notoriety, died at New York last week.—John L. Sullivan, Massachusetts's favorite son, announces himself a candidate for Congress from a Boston district.—The United States mint at Helena, Mont., has just cast a gold bar weighing nearly 500 pounds. It is the largest ever cast. The bar is the property of the Montana National Bank; it is worth $100,000, and will be placed on exhibition at the Minneapolis Exposition, and then at New York.—Exercises commemorative of the founding of Presbyterianism in the United States were held in Hartsville, near Philadelphia, Sept. 5. President Harrison and Postmaster Wanamaker were in attendance, and the president delivered an address eulogizing Presbyterianism.—The Rev. J. K. Griffis, pastor of the Baptist church at Waconda, a village in Lake county, Ill., not many miles from Chicago, has eloped with Miss Anna Tidmarsh, a member of his flock, who lived next door to him. Mrs. Griffis is left with her two little boys, wholly unprovided for, her husband having taken every cent of money in the house, and even her jewelry.—Destructive storms are reported from the Atlantic coast at New York and vicinity. The Coney Island and Rockaway beaches suffered most. Great damage to property is reported, but no loss of life.—Congressman Samuel Sullivan Cox, better known as Sunset Cox, ex-minister to Turkey, died in New York on the 10th. He was 65 years old.

The employers of the striking coal-heavers of London assert that an agreement has been reached with their men on the basis of a raise in wages next January. The strikers held a meeting last Sunday and declared they must have the raise November 1. Many of the men have returned to work.—Three priests were recently arrested in the state of Guanajuato, Mexico, for preaching seditious doctrines. On the trial two were declared not guilty. The third was convicted and sentenced to undergo eleven months' imprisonment and to pay a fine of $1000. He has appealed.—The bishop of Marseilles, France, has issued a formal protest against the circular recently issued by the French minister of justice, in which the minister reminded the clergy that they are prohibited by law from taking part in the elections. The bishop affirms the rights of priests to intervene in elections and other political affairs.—A dispatch to the London Chronicle from Rome says: The pope has abandoned the idea of leaving Rome, the German government having mediated in his behalf and assured him that in the event of war Italy would strictly respect his position.—Maurice Sand, son of Mme. George Sand, the novelist, is dead, aged 66.—The explosion of a powder magazine in the old city of Antwerp, in Belgium, last week killed several hundred people and nearly destroyed the city by setting it on fire.

It is a fact worth thinking about in all its bearings that over 22,000,000 acres of the soil of these United States are owned by citizens of European countries. This vast acreage owned by aliens is equal to nine states of the size of Massachusetts. The alien English landlords in Ireland, who are charged with responsibility for nine-tenths of the miseries and oppressions endured by the Irish people, do not own half as many acres there as alien Europeans own in this country.—Boston Globe.

REST.

TO MY FRIEND HORACE SEAVER.

The summer's glory waxeth old,
The walnut leaves have turned to gold,
The golden-rod has kissed the sun
To say farewell, its work is done;
While Nature whispers every guest:
"The feast is o'er. A time for rest."

The oriole is clothed in brown,
The wild fowl skim across the town;
The russet leaves are crimson-specked,
The lazy clouds are silver-flecked;
A gray haze fringes east and west—
The song is sung: A time for rest.

The squirrel's hoard is in the ground,
The night owl's hooting echoes round;
The tented fields of garnered corn,
The maple trees of glory shorn,
The acorn's fall, the empty nest,
All tell the tale: A time for rest.

Aurora paints the northern skies,
The stars look down with brighter eyes.
The summer's moon, whose orb of gold
Gave magic power to seers of old,
Now wears the ice king's silver crest,
And soothes the tired earth to rest.

Great Nature first her bounty yields,
Then, guardian of the woods and fields,
Each tiny seed wraps in its cell,
Which snowy mantle hides so well;
And leaf and flower upon her breast
Lie slumbering through the time of rest.

Rest, too, for man, and over all,
Rest for the tired human soul;
Rest from all passion, rest from pain,
A rest to note the loss or gain.
A wintry sky, with moon and star;
The grave beneath the prison bar,
Where each may count for work well done,
And wait the coming summer's sun,
The harvest o'er, be this our quest:
Come calm at last, come time of rest.

San Francisco, Cal.

HORACE SEAVER.

Horace Seaver was born in Boston on the 25th of August, 1810. He was the second son of Nathaniel and Hannah Seaver, and as a boy was bright and promising, early giving evidence of the kindness and ability which characterized his after life and made him conspicuous among his fellows, in all that marks the superior man. He was descended from good old New England stock, and was proud that his ancestors were American and fought in the great Revolution. He was educated in the public schools, and may be taken as an illustrious example of the soundness of that instruction. He was greatly attached to these institutions, and was wont to attribute the love of justice, liberty, and fair play, that were prominent traits in his character, to the early training in equality and self-reliance which he received while attending the schools of Boston. Their safety and perpetuity he regarded as necessary to the stability of this government, and was ever ready to resist with his powerful voice and pen any encroachment on their rights.

He was named after the once famous Unitarian minister, Horace Holly, and his parents intended that he should follow in the footsteps of this popular man. But early in life, while at Plymouth, Mass., he had the good fortune to attempt the defense of the Christian religion before a debating club, of which he was a member, and was himself so swayed by the arguments of his companions that henceforth his faith began to wane. After listening to the noted Freethinker, Robert Owen, in Albany, N. Y., Mr. Seaver, who had now given up all idea of becoming a minister, renounced his former theological ideas, and—to use his own words—"dropped the ministerial part of my (his) name, Holly, and ever after retained the heathen part, Horace."

On his return from Albany, where he had worked several years as printer, Mr. Seaver entered the office of the Investigator in the year 1837, as compositor. Mr. Kneeland's trial for blasphemy was then in progress, and on visiting that worthy gentleman later in jail after his conviction, he was so impressed with the fanaticism that had imprisoned him, that henceforth he resolved to devote his life to the overthrow of all forms of superstition and tyranny over the human mind.

About this time, Mr. J. P. Mendum, who had also become a disciple of Freethought, assumed control of the Boston Investigator, and as Mr. Kneeland was unable to attend to all the editorial work, Mr. Seaver was invited to assist him, and in 1838, after Mr. Kneeland had left Boston to reside in the West, he became sole occupant of the editorial chair, thus vacated. Then began that remarkable partnership between himself and Mr. Mendum, which, having continued for over fifty years, has ripened into more than brotherly affection, and is now only severed by the icy hand of death. As one of our contemporaries remarked of him: "From that day to this present time, Mr. Seaver has diligently and heroically labored as compositor, editor, and lecturer, for the development and promotion of the good cause of Freethought, as he has understood its principles and objects. Both in season and out of season, in health and sickness, with scarcely a day's interruption for the last half century, he has stood at his post like a faithful sentinel and asked for no discharge from his warfare in behalf of Universal Mental Liberty, and against religious bigotry, priestcraft, intolerance, and superstition."

He was especially fond of debates, regarding free discussion as a prime factor in the promotion of truth; and every Sunday, before Paine Hall was established, would find him in Hospitalar Hall, the most brilliant and effective of the many able orators who used to assemble there ready to wrestle in debate with such men as Witherell, Verity, King, Burk, Babcock, and others. We are knowing to the fact that many a Christian who dropped into "old Hospitalar" from a spirit of mischief or curiosity, came away after listening to one of Mr. Seaver's forceful arguments, with ideas that led him forever from the faith of his fathers. It was the delight of his friends to find him pitted in debate against some Christian opponent, and unfortunate indeed was that individual to whom it was allotted to defend theology against his scathing attacks. On several occasions have we known these worthies to be so discomfited and dumfounded by the powerful and irresistible logic of Mr. Seaver, that they have rushed from the hall without a word, and left him undisputed master of the situation.

At the meeting held in New York City, May 4, 1845, where was under consideration the adoption of a name under which all dissenters could unite against the common foe, Christianity, it was the eloquent remarks of young Seaver, then in early manhood, that brought order out of chaos, and caused the word Infidel to be adopted by the Convention. H. L. Green, in referring to his appearance at the great Watkins' Glen Convention, held in August, 1878, says: "It was after nine o'clock when we arrived from Boston, and he was of course greatly fatigued, but a large meeting was being held in the town park, and when it was learned that the well-known editor of the Investigator was present, all clamored for a speech. Hundreds who had known him through the Investigator for years were present who had never before seen him. He came forward and spoke for fifteen minutes, and no more eloquent speech was ever before delivered. Every sentence was full of thought and wisdom and good common sense. He reached every heart before him, and if there were orthodox people present (and there must have been a great many) they could but have admitted that a good and great man was addressing them—one who was entitled to the respect of every true friend of humanity." At the State Freethinker's Convention at Albany, N. Y., September 11, 12, and 13, 1885, his remarks charmed the large audience assembled in the Opera House, and they left profoundly impressed with the worth and greatness of the venerable man who addressed them. Thus it was. He was one of nature's noblemen, and was possessed of qualities that in other and more popular walks of life, had he chosen them, would have covered him with wealth and fame, and ranked him among the fortunate of earth. But who shall say his reward is not greater in the consciousness of a duty well performed, and the impression he has made and is yet to make on the progressive thought of the country?

His life, though long, has been an exceedingly placid and quiet one, and except an occasional absence from home on a lecturing tour, has been mostly passed within the four walls of his sanctum, surrounded by books and the exchanges that he loved to peruse. During the long years of his editorial work—the longest, perhaps, of any living man—he met many of the leading reformers of this troublous period, and numbered among his personal friends such illustrious names as William Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Theodore Parker, Elizur Wright, Charles Bradlaugh, George J. Holyoake, Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, James Parton, Parker Pillsbury, and others. Blessed with a philosophic temperament, he was at home in any society, and possessing a rare fund of anecdote and personal reminiscences, was a most agreeable and entertaining companion. But he also loved solitude, and where “none intrude” could be always happy and occupied with his own thoughts.

In physique he was most commanding, his large head and dignified bearing securing to him naturally and at all time the deference of those with whom he came in contact. Personally he was the most kind and agreeable of men. Generous to a fault, he had little regard for money, and would cheerfully part with his earnings to anyone who might solicit assistance. In fact, so heedless was he of his own interests in this respect that it was found necessary for his friends to be constantly on the watch for those who, knowing Mr. Seaver's weakness, were always waiting an opportunity to bother him with their sorrowful tales. He was considerate and good-natured always, easily approached, and would reassure with a smile and a kind word those who might otherwise be disconcerted by his imposing presence. All the employees in the Investigator office loved him and cordially accorded to him that admiration which true greatness ever inspires.

Since the death of his wife in 1848, Mr. Seaver has resided in his brother's family, and to his sister-in-law, Mrs. Lydia Seaver, is due the thanks of all Liberals, for the kind care she has taken of Mr. Seaver during his last illness. He was one of the promoters of the Paine Memorial Building enterprise, and was president of the Paine Memorial Corporation at the time of his death. It was chiefly owing to his hearty and disinterested support that Mr. Mendum was enabled to save the building for the purposes for which it was intended. This will always remain a temple for him as well as Mr. Mendum, and as long as it stands will reflect credit to both. But his greatest monument will ever be the Boston Investigator, for whatever the paper has been for the last fifty years, he has made it. To this work he has concentrated the energies of his intellectual life, the force of his genius, the value of his experience. The effect these efforts have had in moulding Liberal thought and modifying Puritanical ideas it is impossible to estimate; but if the eloquent Ingersoll's words be true, he and his associate have helped to Liberalize a continent. As brave and true men as Mr. Seaver have stood for the right, as honest hearts have suffered for the welfare of mankind; but in our opinion, no philosopher has lived in whom wisdom and courage, firmness and courtesy, have been more happily blended than in the noble one whose life has just ebbed away.

As his life was brave and good, so was his death calm and philosophic. For although he has known for some weeks that death was inevitable, it has caused him no trouble beyond the natural regret that he must part with Mr. Mendum, and was forced to leave the scenes of earth which he so heartily enjoyed. When he learned that his old friend Colonel Ingersoll would speak at his funeral, he manifested a positive pleasure and more than once alluded to it in the days preceding his dissolution. He died as he lived, a Freethinker. He had no faith in religions of any kind, which he always looked upon as but different forms of superstition, but he did possess in a rare degree that larger faith that, whatever happened, living or dead, would be natural, and therefore right. The complaint from which he suffered was dropsy, and since his first attack, last January, he has been gradually failing, till the end, which came peacefully and calmly.

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S ORATION.

Horace Seaver was a pioneer, a torch-bearer, a toiler in that great field we call the world—a worker for his fellow-men. At the end of his task he has fallen asleep, and we are met to tell the story of his long and useful life—to pay our tribute to his work and worth.

He was one who saw the dawn while others lived in night. He kept his face toward the “purpling east,” and watched the coming of the blessed day.

He always sought for light. His object was to know, to find a reason for his faith—a fact on which to build.

In superstition's sands he sought the gems of truth; in superstition's night he looked for stars.

Born in New England—reared amid the cruel superstitions of his age and time, he had the manhood and the courage to investigate, and he had the goodness and the courage to tell his honest thoughts.

He was always kind, and sought to win the confidence of men by sympathy and love. There was no taint or touch of malice in his blood. To him his fellows did not seem depraved—they were not wholly bad—there was within the heart of each the seeds of good. He knew that back of every thought and act were forces uncontrolled. He wisely said: “Circumstances furnish the seeds of good and evil, and man is but the soil in which they grow.” He fought the creed and loved the man. He pitied those who feared and shuddered at the thought of death—who dwelt in darkness and in dread.

The religion of his day filled his heart with horror.

He was kind, compassionate, and tender; and could not fall upon his knees before a cruel and revengeful God! he could not bow to one who slew with famine, sword, and fire—to one pitiless as pestilence, relentless as the lightning stroke. Jehovah had no attribute that he could love.

He attacked the creed of New England—a creed that had within it the ferocity of Knox, the malice of Calvin, the cruelty of Jonathan Edwards; a religion that had a monster for a God; a religion whose dogmas would have shocked cannibals feasting upon babes.

Horace Seaver followed the light of his brain—the impulse of his heart.

He was attacked, but he answered the insulter with a smile; and even he who coined malignant lies was treated as a friend misled. He did not ask God to forgive his enemies; he forgave them himself.

He was sincere. Sincerity is the true and perfect mirror of the mind. It reflects the honest thought. It is the foundation of character, and without it there is no moral grandeur.

Sacred are the lips from which have issued only truth. Over all wealth, above all station, above the noble, the robed, and the crowned, rises the sincere man.

Happy is the man who neither paints nor patches, veils nor veneers! Blessed is he who wears no mask!

The man who lies before us wrapped in perfect peace practiced no art to hide or half-conceal his thought. He did not write or speak the double words that might be useful in retreat.

He gave a truthful transcript of his mind, and sought to make his meaning clear as light.

To use his own words, he had “the courage which impels a man to do his duty—to hold fast his integrity—to maintain a conscience void of offense, at every hazard and at every sacrifice, in defiance of the world.”

He lived to his ideal. He sought the approbation of himself. He did not build his character upon the opinions of others, and it was out of the very depths of his nature that he asked the profound question:

“What is there in other men that makes us desire their approbation, and fear their censure more than our own?”

Horace Seaver was a good and loyal citizen of the natural republic, a believer in intellectual hospitality, one who knew that bigotry is born of ignorance and fear, the provincialisms of the brain. He did not belong to the tribe, or to the nation, but to the human race. His sympathy was wide as want, and like the sky, bent above the suffering world.

This man had that superb thing which we call moral courage—courage in its highest form. He knew that his thoughts were not the thoughts of others, that he was with the few, and that where one would take his side, thousands would be his eager foes. He knew that wealth would scorn, and cultured ignorance deride, and that all believers in the creeds, buttressed by law and custom, would hurl the missiles of revenge and hate. He knew that lies, like snakes, would fill the pathway of his life, and yet he told his honest thought, told it without hatred and without contempt, told it as it really was. And so, through all his days, his heart was sound and stainless to the core.

When he enlisted in the army whose banner is light, the honest investigator was looked upon as lost and cursed, and even Christian criminals held him in contempt. The believing embezzler, the orthodox wife-beater—even the murderer, lifted his bloody hands and thanked God that on his soul there was no stain of unbelief!

In nearly every state of our republic the man who denied the absurdities and impossibilities lying at the foundation of what is called orthodox religion was denied his civil rights. He was not canopied by the ægis of the law. He stood beyond the reach of sympathy. He was not allowed to testify against the invader of his home, the seeker for his life. His lips were closed. He was declared dishonorable because he was honest. His unbelief made him a social leper, a pariah, an outcast. He was the victim of religious hate and scorn. Arrayed against him were all the forces and all the hypocrisies of society.

All mistakes and lies were his enemies. Even the Theist was denounced as a disturber of the peace because he told his thoughts in kind and candid words. He was called a blasphemer because he sought to rescue the reputation of his God from the slanders of orthodox priests.

Such was the bigotry of the time that natural love was lost. The unbelieving son was hated by his pious sire, and even the mother's heart was by her creed turned into stone.

Horace Seaver pursued his way. He worked and wrought as best he could, in solitude and want. He knew the day would come. He lived to be rewarded for his toil—to see most of the laws repealed that had made outcasts of the noblest, the wisest, and the best. He lived to see the foremost preachers of the world attack the sacred creeds. He lived to see the sciences released from superstition's clutch. He lived to see the orthodox theologian take his place with the professor of the black art, the fortune-teller, the astrologer. He lived to see the best and greatest of the world accept his thought—to see the theologians displaced by the great and true priests of nature—by Humboldt and Darwin, by Huxley and Haeckel.

Within the narrow compass of his life the world was changed. The railway, the steamship, the telegraph, made all nations neighbors. Countless inventions have made the luxuries of the past the necessities of to-day. Life has been enriched and man ennobled. The geologist has read the records of frost and flame, of wind and rain; the astronomer has told the story of the stars, the biologist has sought the germ of life, and in every department of knowledge the torch of science sheds its sacred light.

The ancient creeds have grown absurd; the miracles are small and mean; the inspired book is filled with fables told to please a childish world, and the dogma of eternal pain now shocks the heart and brain.

He lived to see a monument unveiled to Bruno in the city of Rome—to Giordano Bruno—that great man who 289 years ago suffered death by fire for having proclaimed the truths that since have filled the world with joy. He lived to see the victim of the church a victor—lived to see his memory honored by a nation freed from papal chains.

He worked knowing what the end must be—expecting little while he lived, but he knew that every fact in the wide universe was on his side. He knew that truth can wait, and so he worked patient as eternity. He had the brain of a philosopher and the heart of a child.

Horace Seaver was a man of common sense. By that I mean one who knows the law of average. He denied the Bible, not on account of what has been discovered in astronomy or the length of time it took to form the delta of the Nile, but he compared the things he found in the inspired book with what he knew.

He knew that antiquity added nothing to probability—that lapse of time can never take the place of cause, and that the dust can never gather thick enough upon mistakes to make them equal with the truth. He knew that the old, by no possibility, could have been more wonderful than the new, and that the present is a perpetual torch by which we know the past.

To him all miracles were mistakes, whose parents were cunning and credulity.

He knew that miracles were not, because they are not.

He believed in the sublime, unbroken, and eternal march of causes and effects—denying the chaos of chance and the caprice of power.

He tested the past by the now, and judged of all the men and races of the world by those he knew.

He believed in the religion of Freethought and good deed—of character, of sincerity, of honest endeavor, of cheerful hope, of sympathy—and above all, in the religion of love and liberty—in a religion for every day, for the world in which we live, for the present; the religion of roof and raiment, of food, of intelligence, of intellectual hospitality, the religion that gives health and happiness, freedom and content—in the religion of work, and in the ceremonies of honest labor. He lived for this world; if there be another he will live for that.

He did what he could for the destruction of Fear—the destruction of the imaginary monster who rewards the few in heaven—the monster who tortures the many in perdition.

He was the friend of all the world, and sought to civilize the human race.

For more than fifty years he labored to free the bodies and souls of men, and many thousands have read his words with joy. He sought the suffering and oppressed. He sat by those in pain, and his hand was laid in pity on the brow of death.

He asked only to be treated as he treated others. He asked for only what he earned, and he had the manhood to cheerfully accept the consequences of his actions. He expected no reward for the goodness of another.

But he has lived his life. We should shed no tears except the tears of gratitude. We should rejoice that he lived so long.

In Nature's course his time had come. The four seasons were complete in him. The spring could never come again. He had taken life's seven steps. The measure of his years was full.

When the day is done, when the work of a life is finished, when the gold of evening meets the dusk of night, beneath the silent stars the tired laborer should fall asleep. To outlive usefulness is a double death:

Let me not live after my flame lacks oil,
To be the snuff of younger spirits.

When the old oak is visited in vain by spring, when light and rain no longer thrill, it is not well to stand leafless, desolate, and alone. It is better far to fall where nature softly covers all with woven moss and creeping vine.

How little, after all, we know of what is ill or well! How little of this wondrous stream of cataracts and pools—this stream of life that rises in a world unknown and flows to that mysterious sea whose shore the foot of one who comes hath never pressed! How little of this life we know—this straggling way of light 'twixt gloom and gloom, this strip of land by verdure clad between the unknown wastes, this throbbing moment filled with love and pain, this dream that lies between the shadowy shores of sleep and death.

We stand upon this verge of crumbling time. We love, we hope, we disappear. Again we mingle with the dust and the "knot intrinsicate" forever falls apart.

But this we know—A noble life enriches all the world.

Horace Seaver lived for others. He accepted toil, and hope deferred. Poverty was his portion. Like Socrates, he did not seek to adorn his body, but rather his soul with the jewels of charity, modesty, courage, and above all, with a love of liberty.

Farewell, O brave and modest man!

Your lips, between which truth burst into blossom, are forever closed. Your loving heart has ceased to beat. Your busy brain is still, and from your hand has dropped the sacred torch.

Your noble, self-denying life has honored us, and we will honor you!

You were my friend, and I was yours. Above your silent clay, I pay this tribute to your worth.

Farewell!

CALL FOR THE OREGON CONVENTION.

By virtue of the authority vested in us by the Oregon State Secular Union, we hereby call the FIRST ANNUAL CONVENTION of said Union to meet in Portland, Oregon, at Masonic Hall, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, the 12th, 13th, and 14th days of October, 1889; the object being to secure the total separation of church and state.

The advocates of this measure in Washington Territory are invited to join their Oregon friends in this Convention.

Done at Portland, Oregon, this thirty-first day of July, 1889.

C. BEAL,	} Board of Directors.

A. F. NEUNERT,
L. AMES,

SECULAR WORK IN OREGON.

The North Pacific Conference of the Seventh-Day Adventists sends Elder Alonzo T. Jones, an orator from Oakland, California, to address the Convention. He writes: "I thank you for giving me your very best session, and I assure you I will do my best to show my appreciation of the favor. I will try and reach there Saturday if possible." "I will give you good notice in the Sentinel."

G. W. Tiffany, a business man of Salem, Oregon, writes: "Anything in my power to do will be done. I have advertised the Convention in the Polk County Advertiser for the month of September, and in the Weekly Capital journal for the same time. I pay the papers regular rates, and glad to do it. There is too much apathy and indifference among Liberals, and in this is our danger."

D. R. Sutton, knowing that the Secular Union would soon need a little more money, obtained five dollars from H. B. Nicholas, an attorney of Portland, and four dollars from J. H. Fisk, the chemist and assayer.

A letter comes from L. Ames, of Silverton, chairman of the finance committee. He says he has sent out about fifty letters, and that one good brother sent in thirteen dollars. Brother Ames urges that the Convention be confined to the separation of church and state, and all other issues left out. "We will try to have Mr. Watts here at Christmas; have a grand festival and a jolly, good time." Mr. Underwood stopped while at Silverton with this excellent Liberal family.

W. W. West, of Scappoose, says: "I will be at the Convention and bring all I can with me."

B. W. Dunn, of Lafayette, writes: "I will be with you at the Convention; will do all in my power to assist you in the cause, for it is one in which I feel a great interest. Hoping to meet you and other brothers and sisters at the meeting the 12th of October, you may rely that I will do all I can to help make it up."

R. H. Scott, of Scott's Mills, sends five dollars and a good business letter.

Charles A. Stewart, of Cascade Locks, Oregon, sends a fine list of names. Charley has "devotion of soul" in what he undertakes. "There are many Liberals in this place and surrounding country; will notify as many as I can. Will be traveling after to-day and will do all I can for the cause and Convention. Inclosed find a large list of names."

J. Henry Schroeder, our intelligent Liberal brother, of Arago, Coos county, writes: "The cause is progressing and I will send in a list of names. Will make arrangements to publish the Convention in our local papers. I believe it would be well for those who can to meet before the Convention and mature plans. A caucus the day or evening before would be beneficial. It would accomplish, if nothing more, a better acquaintance and understanding among the workers."

G. R. Higgins, of North Yamhill, says: "I hope the Convention will be a grand success, and it will be if the Liberals do their duty with money and brains. If conducted properly, the meeting will be a blessing to generations yet to come."

There is a man out in Jackson county who has a soul as big as a meeting-house. His name is Wm. H. Breese. He sends thirty-two signers to the constitution and five dollars as follows, from Talent: H. C. Stock, 50 cents; H. Aumerman, $1; Wm. H. Breese, 50 cents; Rosetta Walters, 50 cents; from Ashland: John Holton, 50 cents; Mrs. H. C. Holton, 50 cents; J. B. Plummer, 50 cents.

Now, my brother and sister Liberals, in all earnestness let me make a direct appeal to you. If you fail to come to this Convention, or come to one meeting and then go off on business, it will be impossible for me to make it up. The cause will be discouraged everywhere, as there have been so many expectations created in regard to it. Come as a matter of duty, conscience, patriotism. This cause can only triumph through devotion of soul. If it fails the word Liberty should be handed back to the person who first spoke it. By devotion of soul humanity can bring to themselves every blessing that it is possible for them to possess. If the inspiration is burning in you it will light your footsteps to the Convention. Confucius said that he did not talk of extraordinary things, feats of strength, disorder, or supernatural beings, but of morality, learning, truthfulness, and devotion of soul.

"Come as the waves come when navies are stranded, Come as the winds come when forests are bended."

C. BEAL,

President Oregon State Secular Union.

DOWIE, THE FAITH-HEALER.

The oft repeated saying that "Truth is mighty and will prevail," may be an axiom to an ignorant person, but to people who have knowledge of the operation of the forces of nature and have observed the actual results of the world's efforts, it is perfectly plain that truth is not mightier, neither is it more likely to prevail than error. It has been truthfully said that a falsehood by continued repetition will often grow into an established fact, and an erroneous idea freely circulated and allowed to pass undisputed, will finally become an accepted truth.

The history of the world shows that error has held sway as often and quite as much as truth; that error has controlled the destinies of nations as often as truth; that millions of martyrs have been slaughtered in past centuries as the result of the prevalence of error instead of truth; that dynasties and kingdoms have been founded on erroneous theories, and still others destroyed under erroneous apprehensions.

Any profound mind must necessarily comprehend the fact that there is no law directing the forces of nature in the way of truth in contradistinction to the way of error, and that only knowledge of cause and effect will aid us in distinguishing the difference between error and truth.

Ignorance is the mother of superstition, and mother and daughter go hand in hand ever after the birth of the latter.

Ignorance of astronomy gave rise to the worship of the sun through fear engendered by its majesty and evident power. Ignorance of the laws of gravity, attraction, and the law of combinations gave rise to the idea of creation, and the ignorant assumption of special creation gave rise to a mass of error that has retarded the progress of truth for ages and enslaved the mind of man in a bondage worse than the tyranny of all the despots on earth.

In addition to all this we have another phase of error which is error based upon a foundation of truth in disguise; ignorance of cause and consequently a false imputation of effects. This brings me to the subject of this essay, Alexander Dowie, the so-called faith-healer. However, we must not elevate him to the position of a standard-bearer, for there are many such, but simply use him to illustrate a subject that is just now convulsing the minds of the intellectual and metaphysical world. We have long been cognizant of the existence of certain physical forces so subtle in their natures that the ordinary mind could not grasp their intricacies; but the tendencies of the age, in giving us enhanced mental insight into the intricacies of natural workings, have opened to those who are not cursed with superstition to such an extent that they cannot investigate a knowledge of their force, in a degree sufficient to allow a dawning of the light of electro-magnetic science. I give it this name for want of sufficient technical knowledge of the various qualities of this, the vital force of life, intending to cover all its peculiar phases, or at least to apply its specific qualities called by some animal magnetism, as shown to be that peculiar life-giving principle which uses the system of nerves of the body through which to transmit its forces. The brain is the trunk of the tree of which the nerves running to every part of the body are the branches, and a touch of any of these branches instantly telegraphs a message to the home office in the head. This base of operations has a great variety of functions or sub-offices located in different parts of the brain cavity. Dr. Buchanan has proved that by the application of the hand of a highly magnetic person to certain localities on the cranium, moved in certain directions, certain effects may be produced at the will of the operator; anger, laughter, hate, love, mania, ecstasy, or the exhibition of any of the passions may be produced.

The effect of the magnetism of the mesmerizer on a person susceptible to him is well known, and the effect of the magnetism of a compact body of people upon susceptible persons in that body has been illustrated thousands of times in such audiences as gather around Dowie, Cullis, and others, and especially has it been exemplified amongst the negroes of the Southern states, where, in their meetings, as the result of a free, all-around shake of hands to the music of a hymn, the free flow of magnetism often produces a state of overpowering ecstasy, which results in a dead faint, when the subject is picked up and laid on a bench to recover as soon as the ecstasy passes off.

These so-called "faith-cures," "divine healings," "mind-cures," etc., are all "off the same piece," and are nothing more nor less than electro-magnetic effects. This being the vital force of life has the effect to accelerate and stimulate the sluggish vitality of the system, and thereby throw off diseased conditions, and in the case of slight maladies in a person of negative receptive electro-magnetic conditions, a sudden influx of vital force will have a tendency to suddenly restore them to normal conditions, or at least to start them on the road to recovery, which, if persisted in, will naturally effect a cure, even in chronic cases. Our best physicians recognize the fact that to assist nature to restore normal conditions is the acme of professional accomplishments, and to stimulate to activity the sluggish organ the proper practice. In many cases this is done by the application of electricity generated by a battery. The failure of this kind of an application in many cases has led to the discovery that the quality of electricity is an important factor, and experience has taught that the quality generated by the nerve forces of mankind, when stimulated into active operation by contact between persons possessed of the requisite positive and negative qualities, is best adapted to restore vital action in the system.

Given, then, the premises that electro-magnetism is the vitalizing force of all life, we have a simple formula for supplying the demands made on the system by the decay and death of cellular tissue. It is beginning to dawn on the minds of humanity that the nerve system of the body performs a very prominent function in the life of the individual. Instead of being of secondary importance it is the foundation of all energy, and without which there can be no life. We know, although we do not understand how nor why, that certain persons possess a nerve system of greater power than others, and possibly of different quality in some important respects, and that they can operate that system to produce certain effects on others, and that by augmenting this vital current in those in whom it is weak the energy in the functional organs is increased and the building up of tissue becomes commensurate with the demands of the natural waste occasioned by the wearing out process. We die as the result of sudden or rapid destruction of cellular tissue, through disease or accident secondarily, or primarily by the sudden destruction of the nerve system by rendering it incapable of action through accident, and if the motive power—electro-magnetism—remains sufficient to keep up the building process under all circumstances then there need be no death; but unfortunately accidental conditions are so numerous that sudden demands for a great increase of vital power cannot be provided for in our present ignorance of these laws of our being, hence death, decay, and disintegration take place and the matter of which we are composed returns to the material universe from whence it came to supply the demand for new forms.

Now, such men as Dowie and hundreds of others possess this power of not only powerful electro-magnetic force, but the power and knowledge of gathering from others and concentrating the whole upon susceptible or negative subjects in a manner to produce powerful effects and hence cure some maladies; but to ascribe this power to a mystical supernatural being and thereby operate on the ignorance and credulity of a superstition-cursed people is not only wrong but it is criminal, because if the truth concerning these things was taught, enlightenment and general benefit would be the result instead of a degrading superstition operating to lessen knowledge by retarding study of and investigation into the source of life, health, and happiness.

The "livery of heaven to serve the devil in" was never more perfectly illustrated than in the operations of Dowie to make money. He shows himself to be a charlatan and full of the sharp tricks of the juggler and the shrewd advertiser. In the first place he uses the medium of prayer and music, which, in an audience trained to believe in the efficacy of prayer, emphasized by a fear of the God to whom they pray, is found to be the best possible medium through which to concentrate the mental and magnetic effect of the people now known. By this means he produces a free and liberal flow of electro-magnetism, which, when directed by him to the susceptible subjects, will necessarily produce a vital effect; but unfortunately it requires conditions in the subject that are peculiar to certain constitutions and not applicable to all, either from the lack of the necessary quantity or quality or condition of the magnetism of the individual. Now, to get rid of these cases, which his knowledge and susceptibilities soon detect by scanning his audience, he resorts to questions, such as, "Do you believe that God made the world in six days?" or some such foolish question, to which, judging by their look of intelligence, he is sure they will answer no, when he will angrily tell them to go away for he can do nothing for them. This is only one of his ways of getting rid of persons he knows he cannot effect, but he is fertile enough to find a way to dispose of all unsusceptible applicants. When he has gathered together a goodly number of those he has had under his eye and voice for several days, and weeded out the positive and unsympathetic ones, he proceeds to work them up into a state of electro-magnetic ecstasy by exhortation, singing and prayer, and then lays hands on the subject, when they are expected to jump to their feet and proclaim the cure. Now, one would suppose that with all the professed goodness of this "angel in disguise" a magnetic influence from him would lead the persons to at least be truthful in their statements made in these states of ecstasy; but, on the contrary, if the witnesses of the miracles of Jesus Christ lied as badly in their statements as to what happened as some of Dowie's chroniclers have, it is no wonder that such miracles are not believed now-a-days. As a sample: One woman said she had been instantly cured of a malady affecting one arm so she had not been able to use it for a long time. I am told by a lady living in the same house with her that she has been doing her own work and carrying a child up and down stairs for the last six months without anyone knowing of any trouble with her arms.

Another woman said she was instantly cured of catarrh which was so bad that she had not been able to speak above a whisper for seven years. One of this woman's neighbors says she has been such a notoriously noisy person that the owners of the house where she lodged had contemplated turning her out of the house several times. Another good old mother in the church, under electro-magnetic excitement, testified to a wonderful cure, and her pastor hearing of it called on her the next day and found her in bed completely prostrated from the effects of the excitement.

Three-fourths of all his cures, when investigated, turn out like these, and go to swell the proofs that all miracles are substantiated by very doubtful proofs, and that the liars in all ages have not all been disbelievers in Christianity.—RANFORD WORTHING, in the San Diego Union.

The Evils of Religious Superstition.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Inclosed please find $1 as payment for another six months' subscription to your most excellent and welcome paper FREETHOUGHT.

What can be more ennobling to the human soul than Freethought? It is stepping from the darkness into light. Ever since I learned to reflect and reason for myself I have, step by step, endeavored to free my mind from superstition and, as far as I had the chance, tried to prevail upon others. You therefore may judge that, mindful of my duty as a Free-thinker, circumstances bettering themselves, I shall not fail to assist in the good cause you are so ably advocating; where often, I notice, you are expending mental dynamite to make a breach into the beclouded skulls. Superstition begets errors and wrongs, and the former, universally prevailing, naturally produces the errors and wrongs in that line universally. Most of the woes and misery humanity is suffering from can be fairly traced back to that monster of all evils—religious superstition. It destroys the clear vision of the intellect, corrupts the moral status of man, prevents the free development of his better being, and fosters and creates ignorance, ill-will, and hatred between man and man.

I am pleased and entertained by the correspondence of Professor Seymour "On the Trail." Respectfully yours, Santa Quin, Utah.

ROBERT NAGLER.

Um!

To the Editors of Freethought:

I received your paper of August 3, 1889, from a friend last night, and have been reading it. On page 40 is some questions, up to 25 kinds. I will answer them all collectively.

1. "The Lord God formed (created) a man of the dust—his body, and then breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." Gen. 2, 7.

From these we understand that a man with a body and a spirit, unitedly is the soul. When the spirit leaves the body, the body is dead. Hence, that body is not a soul, and will not become a soul again until the resurrection day; for the spirit will enter his body, and the body will be resurrected to make it a soul, for salvation or for condemnation. Sometimes the spirit is called the soul in the Bible, but that is only because the spirit is the life of the body, while it is in its body.

2. "Where are the souls—spirits, made?" Answer: At the birth. That is, when the child is born, the spirit enters the body: That child becomes a living soul.

But "when was the spirits made?" I answer that God is the father of the spirits. They are all living spirits, and were so from before the world was made. Job 38, 7, etc. I could say much more of this, but have no time at the present.

3. "In what part of the body is the soul—spirit located?" Answer: In the brain of the head; the spirit is also called, "The mind." Hence, all "Idiots" are "Idiots," or "Ignorants." They with the children are not responsive to any laws, or in other words, they are not under any law. See Rom. 4, 15, 5, 13, 7, 8

4. The spirit—"soul," must first enter its body at the resurrection day, when Christ comes to give every man his dues. Luke 14, 14. Job.

5, 29. Acts 24, 15. Rev. 20, 5, 6., etc. Then she will receive "pain" or the other way.

5. The spirit is in the shape of the man's body, and is of matter as well as the body; a tangible substance, and have a nature as well as man. God himself has nature. See Heb. 2, 16. 2 Pet. 1, 4.

These answers will be sufficient to Mr. W. C. C., of "Hillisboro," Or.

Respectfully,

J. A. STROMBERG.

Dr. Foote Revisits Salt Lake City.

Dr. Foote, senior, would announce that he contemplates making a brief visit to Salt Lake City in October. In the spring of 1885, it will be remembered by the readers of The Health Monthly, we visited Salt Lake City for the purpose of exposing and dislodging a pretender who was using the name of Dr. Foote, Jr., and representing himself as the son of Dr. E. B. Foote, of New York. He had established a large practice on the strength of these misrepresentations, and it took several weeks to collect such evidence as would lead Judge Zane to grant an injunction restraining this impostor from continuing to impose upon the community in the way mentioned. But the injunction came at last, and the "Fraud Jr.," as we called him, precipitately fled early one Sunday morning before honest people were out of their beds. While in Salt Lake City we met hundreds of our correspondents and patients of former times and formed many new friendships which led us to promise that we would some day repeat the visit that proved so agreeable to us and so beneficial to many. This time the trip will be made more with a view to recuperation and change than to business considerations, but if those who would like to meet us there would address us to that effect, we will keep all such correspondents posted in regard to our movements and appoint time and place, when and where, we will see all friends, correspondents and patients who may desire an interview whether of friendly or professional character. Professional interviews as usual will be free, no fees being charged except for medicines. Therefore, friends and readers of our publications in the West, write at once, those of you who would like to meet Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., addressing your letters to 120 Lexington avenue, New York, and if no unforeseen circumstance occurs to prevent the contemplated visit you will be duly notified. All, indeed, in Utah and the adjoining states and territories, who have physical ailments which home skill has failed to relieve, are invited to place themselves in correspondence with us, and when we can appoint time and place for interview we will notify by personal letter. We rarely leave home for recreation, and scarcely ever on professional business, the last time being in 1885 as already mentioned. Patients are visiting us from time to time at our office here in New York from Utah, Idaho, Nevada, Arizona, Wyoming, Colorado, Dakota, Montana, and other western states and territories, and doubtless there are hundreds more who would be pleased to have the opportunity for a personal consultation if it could be had without a long and expensive journey to New York. To all such we send greeting this brief announcement. Send in your names and addresses right away, or as early as possible, and you shall have due notice when the senior editor of this paper arrives in Salt Lake City. Appointments for interviews can be arranged by letter as already stated.

During the brief absence of the senior the junior will take charge of the affairs at home. The genuine Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., author of Health in the Sunbeam, Radical Remedy in Social Science, Bacteria, in their Relation to Disease, Gynecology, etc., who has been constantly engaged in professional work with the senior since 1875-6, at which time he was graduated from the college of physicians and surgeons in New York, is well-known to the readers of the Murray Hill publications and our patients hereabouts. He will be assisted by Dr. L. Cohn who, for fifteen years, has had charge of the German Department in Dr. Foote's office, and by Dr. Hubert T. Foote, brother of the junior, who is at the head of the Sanitary Bureau. In such hands no one is likely to suffer in the temporary absence of Dr. Foote, Sr.—From Dr. Foote's Health Monthly for September.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Job at home wrestling with a sudden and surprising eruption of boils, such as no fellow ever heard of before. Groaning as he squats in the ashes of the fire-place, he scrapes himself with a potsherd—a singular way in which to caress boils!

[Enter Mrs. Job.]

MRS. JOB. Olt mans, vy you don'd gurse dot Gott in himmel, und die alretty? Id vas der mosd sensible dings you nefer cood done, I declare do cracious it vas!

JOB. Was ist los mit dir mein frau? Dir pe der mosd voolisher olt vomans I nefer pefore seen alretty. Vy you don'd vall down mit yourselluf? und den got oop and jump yoursellufs ubon, don'd id? Shood der gifer of all goot gif us nod some efls, I don'd know? Shood der sweets he always gif us, und nod soomdings bidder, you voolisher olt voman?

MRS. JOB. Vell, I don'd gare—now. I don'd dook some stocks in der gootnes oof a Gott dot mek pad peesness by der beeples, like haf dit your Gott mit you alretty.

JOB. Dere's vere you vas off der nut kvestion, olt vomans. Now der mout oof you shut oop, und don'd soom silly dings say soom more. Dis vas meinselluf's vunerat, und nod yours, olt vomans.

MRS. JOB. I'd vasn'd eh? Ach! I like do know how dot vas, if it vasn'd soom vunerals of mein alretty. You pe tead proke pusted, wid-owet a gamel, ox, ass, sheeb, goad und nodings; und der kinder vas killed alretty, und here you vas mit more as dwo hunnerd poils your poty ofer, and can'd efen saw some woods do subbort oursellufs mit—it ain'd soom oof mein vunerals, ain'd it? Vell, I dink it must look like dot alretty py dis time.

JOB. Vell, don'd you gone und poil ofer, olt vomans, because all ofer vas I mit poils, und doing meinselluf der heafy peesness—ach!—ouch!—e-o-u-g-h!

MRS. JOB. Und braise you dot Gott vor dose ackes und bains, eh? Und you py him vas true as the hairs py your head, und he serf you like dot! JOB. Haf soom batiene, mein frau, py yoursellufs. Id come owet vill all righd py der ent—oh!—ouch!—ouch!

MRS. JOB (sarcastic). Ach! it vill eh? Ven you pe gone deat alretty, und I vas der lone vid-ders midowet a shekel py my names—vas dot all righd, olt man? Subbase dot Gott mek id all righd again mit der gattles und gamels und dings, where vas der kinder dot vos killed by der cyglone I don'd know? Would dhey come pack py us alretty? Soom udder gattles vas der same, but soom udder kinder vasn'd, I guess nod.

JOB. Mein frau—ouch!—I vill marry some young vomans, oof der Lort sbare mein life, und der kinder—

MRS. JOB. Ach! und dot's how all righd in der ents id vill pe, eh? Dot seddles id, olt man.

You dook gare oof dose poils mit yoursellufs und dot young vomans alretty, because mein name vas Valker, you bets sweet your lifes!

[Exeunt in flaming passion.]

SCENE 2.—Same locality. Enter Satan wearing a magic ring, rendering himself invisible to Job.

SAT. By Jove! though cursing he his day of birth,

And growling like a bear with a sore head,
On Jahveh Job doth weaken not a hair!
Such loyalty is most remarkable,
And nothing if not sui generis!
Now, how to shake this man's fidelity,
I'm damned if I do know, that is a fact—
Not knowing, I am damned, but damn the odds!
O for a volume of Talmage's sermons—
Forcing the man to read the sermons through;
Companionship with Gotham's famous crank,
Say for a day—almost too cruel, that—
Ha! that would break him quite all up, I'm sure!

But I, alas! can't bring the thing to bear.
Incorrigible man is this man Job,
And hard to catch, I reckon. Verily,
There is none like this man in all the earth!
Jahveh hath one that he can bet on sure,
And I am beaten out and out! I here
Am wasting time, and will at once light out.

[Exeunt Satan, with his tail between his legs and feeling very cheap—Satan, I mean, not the tail—well, was ist los mit der tail, too, feeling cheap?]

Job's "comforters," three in number, now arrive on the scene. They emphasize their coming by tearing their jackets, rubbing dirt on their faces, and otherwise acting like idiots. Then they squat on the ground about Job, and for seven days and seven nights not one of the four speak a word, the groans of Job—possibly the others groaned in sympathy—only breaking the silence—what a cheerful picnic that must have been!

At the end of the time mentioned, Job got his talking tacks aboard and broke out into such a wild and preposterous cursing of the day of his birth, that we decline to continue the drama—tragedy-comedy or vice versa. The way he and his "comforters" went on was too insufferably ridiculous for anything, to say nothing of the absurd conundrums propounded to Job by Jahveh, as, for instance, "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth?" "Who laid the corner-stone?" "Whereon are the foundations fastened?" "Who can stay the bottles of heaven?" [Aha! "bottles" in heaven, eh? What is in those "bottles?" Some of the "ould stoof?"—the "O be joyful," eh?] "Who gave the wild ass his sweet soprano voice?" "Canst thou catch the whale with a pin hook?" "Canst thou pull him out of the soup by the nose?"—and a hundred and one others quite as ridiculous.

If the reader yearns for the dreary drivel that emanated from the mouths of Job and his "comforters," after that cork-up of seven days, let him turn to the book of Job, and revel and wallow in said drivel and those remarkable conundrums.

It is well enough to say, that it "came out all right in the end" with Job, as he gave it out to the old woman—more to shut up her clack, than because he believed it would—he recovering from the effects of that remarkable visitation of boils, and rapidly recovering his losses in cattle and shekels, and by a hundred per cent the better, thanks to his patron, Jahveh. He "got there," too, in the matter of "kinder," raising seven sons and three daughters—what good was this to the ten sons and daughters killed, eh?—as he had lost; but whether they were born of that "young woman," whom he said he would marry, of divers wives and sub-wives, or of the old family wife—if she came back—the Holy Queer does not state, and it is of no consequence, as Toots would say.

And Job lived to enjoy things, putting in one hundred and forty years after that remarkable experience with boils and remarkable "comforters." It goes without saying that he was true to Jahveh to the last, and that there was "none like him in all the earth"—never has been since, I reckon, baring possibly, Talmage, the theologastical tumble-bug of Brooklyn.

THE banana is a great promoter of the national game. It will make almost any man slide to his base.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and under stand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

FREETHOUGHT BOOKS

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

NEWS AND NOTES.

Delayed thirteen hours, and arriving at Baker City at four o'clock in the morning, I was agreeably surprised to meet Dr. H. J. Fuller, who, with true hospitality, was awake at this uncomfortable hour to give me a welcome to his own fireside. The doctor came, about a year ago, from Kansas and has already built up a large practice. He is an open unbeliever and has not the slightest regard for the humbugs of the church. His wide experience of human nature gives him an opportunity for the exposure of pious hypocrisy whose comedy conveys a valid argument. The doctor is respected throughout the community, and his skill is not the less recognized, even by the deacons and clergymen, because of his Liberal opinions. They like to be cured by science in this world, whatever may be the methods of soul-cure hereafter. The doctor has a delightful family, and although Mrs. Fuller is a Methodist of gentle type and the children do go to Sunday-school, there was not much religious gloom in that bright Sunday-morning family circle. There was the joy of humanity. The doctor is wisely generous in his convictions and believes that the freedom of nature will settle all the questions of orthodoxy. In early life he lived at Peoria, Ill., and was among the first to listen to the brilliant lectures of Ingersoll. While the church bells rang we had our Sunday of bright reminiscence and glorious hope.

J. L. Baisley joined company for the dinner hour. His ranch is alongside the mountains and the golden mines, and he himself has been one of the lucky ones, and his cottage where I visited two years ago is beginning to put on the appearance of the palace. All round about Baker the mining industry is increasing, mills are being built and there are many excellent prospects. The wheel of fortune has not forgotten Baisley in its curious twistings and turnings; Freethought comes in sometimes for its share of the glittering treasures.

P. C. Conde was also with us in the afternoon. He is a big-hearted Freethinker, and our thanks are due him for his efficient work. John B. Coleman, president of the Secular club here, has done his level best to keep things agoing, but Freethought is not all dreams and hopes, it is toilsome work, and the ardent desire meets with many disappointments. Friend Coleman, however, wont give up as long as there is a gun to fire. Baker is a peculiar city. It has the ups and downs and the ins and outs of a mining camp. The people come and go. Still the growth is steady. Baker City has signs of permanent prosperity, and the generous efforts of comrades like Coleman, Conde, and others, will keep Freethought to the front.

Geo. L. Hayes was present and he brings good news from the camps round about. B. W. Carrington, formerly of Montana, is lying on his back, having received severe injuries in a late railroad accident, his engine being thrown from the track. He takes it cheerfully and means to get well by his own pluck; I hope this will be before many days. He invested in Freethought literature as the best medicine for mind and body.

Judge Schofield presided at the Sunday evening meeting. A veteran in the cause, he is always ready for duty.

The hall was nearly full and the reception of the lecture was encouraging. If I could have remained a day or two longer greater results would have been attained, but I was obliged to leave at seven o'clock on Monday morning, by stage, for Cracker City, and I had but little chance for acquaintance and consultation. The elements are here, but it takes time and patience for the combination. I expect to return and devote a week or so to this important place. Giving but one lecture I only had the opportunity to see what could be done but could not do it. The friends I meet here are so cordial, so earnest, and generous in support of Freethought, and Baker City being the centre of an increasing population and trade and industry, I can but look forward to success and progress, and the establishment of a splendid and powerful organization.

I leave the railroad and Baker City for a month's stage journey through eastern Oregon, with happy anticipations.

My first trip of forty miles, through clouds of dust, is to Cracker City, born twelve months ago in the bosom of the hills. Tom McKewen, proprietor of the line, and stage driver, is the jolliest of companions and the journey is by no means lonesome or wearisome as it otherwise might be. At noon we strike into the beautiful broad valley of Sumpter. McKewen owns four hundred and eighty acres in this valley, which is rapidly filling up. He has built the Sumpter Valley Hotel, and big barns about it, and intends to get married in a few weeks, and so I give him all the blessings and good luck that can fall to the lot of a liberal and whole-souled man. We take dinner at the hotel, or station, as it is called. From here I have the fortune to ride in a single rig, with Griffin, McKewen's partner, to Cracker City, where I arrive about two hours ahead of the stage, and have a chance to rest for the evening's lecture.

Cracker City is on Cracker Creek, that tumbles through a wild canyon amidst the shadows of noble pines. An old hunter traveling with crackers, fruit, and sardines, ate his crackers here and called it Cracker Creek; pursued his journey, and on the banks of another stream disposed of his fruit and called it Fruit Creek; at the next station the sardines disappeared, and this was called Sardine Creek. So runs the legend. At any rate these names are here and Cracker City is now becoming a famous place. It has the largest stamp mill in the state, and the mines are said to be exceedingly rich. It has every appearance of lively business. The white tents mingle with wooden houses, and the big teams come and go laden with brick, lumber, and machinery. A vast building, at a cost of $150,000, is going up where twelve months ago towered one of the densest forests on the continent. By next Christmas the music of the ponderous wheels and hammers will be heard and the golden streams will pour forth, the star-spangled banner will float over the roof in the brilliant sunshine, and flaunt against the shining hills. The flagstaff was being raised when I visited the mill, but I did not have a chance to witness the unfurling of the stars and stripes. What a wonder these mills are, with their mighty and delicate machinery by which the rough ore, crushed with iron hands, is made to yield, as if to a fairy's needle, its subtlest wealth of yellow gleam! Mr. Donaldson and Mr. Fisher, superintendents of the mill and mine, are a kind of miracle workers in the way they have made this huge building grow from the forests and the rocky earth. My thanks are due to Mr. Donaldson for his kindness in showing me over this superb temple of industry.

Mr. Jas. F. Cleaver and his family, formerly of Prairie City, are here. What is the loss of Prairie City is the gain of Cracker City. Our friends are always ready to work, and wherever they are the fires of Freethought will kindle. The fatigue of the toilsome journey is forgotten when I greet these cordial allies. I am happy to say that in my lecture here I was ahead of all the clergymen in the country. So far not a single religious service has been held in the place, and, of course, no church building has yet mocked the glory of these hills. It is a pleasure once in a while to get ahead of the armies of superstition. Cracker City at present has no magnificence to boast of, but it is beautifully situated and is a fine place for a summer resort, with its brawling brook, inclosing hills that sweep into noble sceneries, embowering forests that make enchanting nooks in moonlight and in sunlight. The bright day-time is exhilarating in its delicious splendor. I enjoyed my stay on this wild frontier where humanity is real, and nature attractive. I gave two lectures to crowded houses, and the results are every way favorable. If the gold only pans out according to calculation, on these heights will float the brightest banner of freedom.

I was pleased to greet Mr. and Mrs. Armstrong, formerly of Prairie City, and the little baby, Robert Burns, born the last Fourth of July, a patriotic son of the soil, and the first baby born in Cracker City.

Mr. and Mrs. Hazeltine, of Baker City, are out here camping, taking pictures of the city and surroundings and the face of man, my own among the number, and I find them good Freethinkers in art and humanity.

John Trudell, John Heafon, A. F. Oelrich, J. C. Shelby, are enrolled for FREETHOUGHT. Many others have contributed to the pleasure of my visit and the success of my work, and I hope to greet this vigorous infant city again, with the gold upon its brow.

On Wednesday morning, down the canyon of Cracker Creek, I go to Sumpter Valley Hotel, where, a solitary passenger, I await the buckboard for Prairie City. I am aroused at half-past three Thursday morning. A ride of fifty miles is before me. The dust is about a foot deep along the road, and rolls so heavily at times that we can't see our way. We eat our peck of dirt without flinching. Three vast ranges have to be crossed before our journey's end. Over the Burnt River Mountain we descend to Middle Fork—to Austin's, where a dinner is provided. In the parlor of this lone hotel hangs the portrait of Ingersoll, and I realize that civilization has put its mark on this wilderness country. At about four o'clock in the afternoon, the beautiful John Day Valley opens to view, with its wide expanses and glittering rampart of hills. Strawberry Butte towers amidst the faint smoke in wild grandeur. I don't suppose anybody would recognize me as the stage drew up at the post-office of Prairie. I was literally incrustated with dust, and whether I was black or white nobody could possibly tell. I began to understand how Lot's wife might have been turned into a pillar of salt. She must have traveled on a buckboard. I myself was almost a pillar of alkali, and it took nearly an hour for me to recover my identity, and find out that I had flesh and blood beneath the dusty embrace of Mother Earth. If Mother Earth would only weep a little in Grant county, her appearance would be wonderfully improved. As it is now, I could almost sell myself for a corner lot, I have so much real estate on my person at the end of each day's ride.

Friend A. S. Blinn was on hand to greet me, the first one. He knew me through thick and thin of Grant-county soil. His welcome is so hearty that I get renewed strength for the campaign before me. He was bound to come to the lecture, although he could stay but one night. He had to return to Granite the next day. Whatever fortune betide him he will stand by the colors. He is a Freethinker from head to foot, and will spend his last dollar to keep things agoing. I hope he will strike it rich sometime, for he deserves it, and I believe he is on the path to nature's golden store.

W. B. Davis has been a good worker here, and I find things in splendid shape. At the first lecture in Prairie, the hall was full. I lecture again on Sunday afternoon. Arrangements are made at John Day and Canyon City, and then I go on across country to Arlington—nearly two hundred miles of staging, but I feel assured of friendly greetings along the way. No Freethought lecturer has ever been through this country, but there is a big Liberal element. Nature and humanity are here, and I have no doubt I can give good reports from point to point.

Our friends at Cracker City and Prairie have adopted what I think, in some places, is an excellent plan. After the lecture comes a sociable and dance. This brings the people together, especially the young folks. Festivities are a part of Liberal development. The sterner duties of life can be better performed after a good play. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

THE CHARITY OF THE FUTURE.

The National Conference of Charities and Corrections held its sessions at Union Square Hall, in this city, during the past two weeks. The purpose of this association is to develop the best plans of charitable work and correctional state training, and to unify state and denominational methods. Its members are clergymen, state officials, and private individuals. Its purposes are laudable and it has done some good. Scientific charity is a term heard in its discussions and understood by some of its members.

Christianity pauperized Europe. Science is gradually re-establishing the self-respect and independence of the individual.

Christianity still teaches that to give alms "covers a multitude of sins" and "lays up treasures in heaven." This teaching encourages the vices of the rich, who think that a gift of money will atone for an ill-spent life, and increases the obsequiousness and dependence of the poor.

Christianity has covered Europe and America with work-houses, reformatories, and asylums, and glories in the work. She has made a great mistake. They are a disgrace, not a credit to civilization. Early Athens had no citizen in want and none disgraced the nation by begging. Modern civilization might aim at least as high as pagan Athens.

Poor-laws which give large relief to the people have always been a curse. "England," says Fawcett, "was brought nearer the brink of ruin by the old poor-law than she ever was by a hostile army." Under the operation of this law one-thirtieth of the people of England were paupers.

In 1877, 46,350 people received outdoor relief in the city of Brooklyn. The next year that relief ceased. As a result there were fewer paupers in the city institutions in 1881 than in 1877—in 1877, 1,371; in 1881, 1,171. Yet the city was growing at the rate of 18,000 people per year.

California appropriates $2,000,000 a year for the six thousand inmates of her state institutions—one two-hundredth of her population, and she a new state that has not half utilized her natural wealth.

We are proud of our asylums and reformatories. We should be ashamed of them. To herd young children in orphan asylums is unnatural and demoralizing. They are branded with the stigma of public dependance; close crowding engenders vice; worthless parents throw their offspring upon the public care. The family is the only proper place for the training of the child. Adoption can protect orphanage. For foundling asylums there is no apology. They are premiums upon vice.

The number of the insane is upon the increase. Asylums do not cure them. Mutual intercourse increases their aberration. They should be kept apart from each other. In the model state marriage will not be contracted where there is strong probability of hereditary insanity. Neither will marriage be entered into by the deaf and dumb. Better the sacrifice of the individual than injury to the mental and moral physique of the nation. The stern Spartan destruction of deformed, diseased, and idiotic children has for us a lesson, if not worthy of imitation, worthy of study. The citizens of the model state should be healthful in body and mind from birth. Prevention is better than cure—which is often impossible.

The sentimental and short-sighted altruism of Christianity has taught mankind to sacrifice its best members for the sake of its worst. To the masses it has taught dependence, instead of self-help; it has made them weak when they should be strong.

Modern science teaches his own work to every one, some work for every member of the state, and self-reliance. It discourages state aid where no equivalent in work is given. It provides work for all, and those who will not work neither shall they eat. No beggars, and no tramps. Neither should be tolerated. The scientific knife cuts to the root of the evil of public dependence, whether it be the growth of poverty or disease. The future will have few public institutions of charity. The reasons for their existence will have largely disappeared. It may be a distant future, but it is a possible one.

GOD OR THE UNKNOWNABLE.

The most refined conception of the anthropomorphic god worshiped by the religious world presents him as infinite and eternal, but still personal, and possessing the highest of mental qualities—consciousness, will, and intelligence. From this conception the mind parts most unwillingly, for with it departs all power to conceive the great unknown in any terms that are common to it and man. But, if we examine closely the terms consciousness, will, and intelligence, we shall see that they cannot be attributed in any proper sense to the infinite. For consciousness consists of successive states of feeling, caused by the successive impressions of different objects and occurrences. But the omniscient cannot have successive states of feeling and successive impressions. It knows all objects and occurrences at the same time. Divine consciousness is impossible in any such sense as that in which we use the term.

Will, again, implies a motive, but eternal omniscience can have no motive. What can move it or induce in it desire? Will implies an end to be achieved. But an end must be achieved in time or space, and excludes for an interval the willing of other ends; it is therefore inconsistent with that omnipresent activity which works out at the same time an infinity of ends.

Intelligence presupposes existences independent and outside of itself. The changes in it are caused by activities other than itself. Its states of consciousness are successive, caused by the successive impressions made upon it. But the infinite can have nothing external to itself to impress it. If it be said that it created out of itself objective activities which have since produced upon it that series of impressions which are essential to intelligence, then, previous to such creation, it was without intelligence—at a time when intelligence was most needed. The more closely we analyze our own higher mental powers the more impossible we find it to ascribe anything of like nature to the infinite. For this reason this power is justly called the Unknowable and is devoid of all personal qualities.

Man lets go with great reluctance this last conception of God as a possessor in a sublimated degree of his own highest qualities. Is he not a Father? he cries. Can that power which has created in us love and pity and sympathy be devoid of them? Can intelligence come from unintelligence? Can the world proceed without a guiding mind? The heart grows lonely and the mind appalled at the idea of an unsympathetic, unintelligible power driving on the forces of the universe, itself those forces; ever weaving and untwisting the web of life, but touched by no prayer, no suffering; of a nature so removed, so different, that any feelings or mental qualities of man are not possible to it. And yet our own reason convinces us that this is true; that neither will, consciousness, nor intelligence can be ascribed to the infinite and eternal, that have any likeness to the qualities we call by those names, and, if we ascribe them, they must be mere names without intelligible meaning.

And fatherhood, love, and sympathy are equally impossible terms to the infinite, since they imply changes of state and limitations of space and time, that cannot be applied to infinity. Man has always found it hard to part with his gods, and this may be the hardest wrench. But with every idea of God which he has discarded, his own intelligence has enlarged. Neither is it necessary to be appalled or sad at letting go our faith in a personal God. It may be a salutary lesson in humility to be convinced that we are not made in the image of God. But the infinite becomes no less real nor is our part in the universe of less importance. We may have exaggerated that part; our vanity naturally leads us to do that. But we are of no less value, and, as our intelligence grows, we seem to be of more; though, as compared with infinity, of course, as nothing.

Yet this is certain. We are a part of the eternal energy. Every molecule of our frame is eternal, is a center of force, acting on and acted on by all other forces. The forces of the universe pass into us and pass out. We are part of those forces and they are a part of the infinite. This intelligence of which we think so highly forms, grows, and dissolves. It is one of the many structural forces of nature. That the infinite thinks highly of it (if we may say thinks) is not at all clear. At all events there is no evidence that the individual continues, though the type does. Yet that type had a beginning and will, no doubt, have an end. But the power that is in the type—that is in ourselves, that manifests itself in consciousness—is but a differently conditioned form of the power that manifests itself beyond consciousness. We are a mode of manifestation of the infinite. We always have existed, if not arranged and compacted in structure as at present, yet though scattered far through space still then a part of the infinite, from which we cannot be separated. And, if we value highly our consciousness and intelligence and are loth to part with them, we may remember that they are only one manifestation of the infinite, and all the force and matter that composes them has always existed and will always exist as some manifestation of the same infinite. Instead of crying out because we cannot live forever, we have but to realize that we have lived forever and will live forever. We cannot escape it. Essence of essence, substance of substance, the conditioned power in consciousness of the unconditioned beyond consciousness, and inseparable from the infinite, we have been, we are, and we ever shall be. Is not this a relation closer, more enduring than fatherhood and sonship? It is eternal, and if its conditions before and after what we call life are not understood, neither is the infinite understood, which was before and will be after life, and of which we were and ever shall be a part.

THE RELIGIOUS VIEWS OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

William H. Herndon, for twenty years a friend and law partner of Abraham Lincoln, has written a life of that great figure in American History, the sixteenth president of the United States. Unlike many biographies, this appears to be a natural and truthful one. It makes the reader acquainted with the man as well as the president. As Ingersoll says: "Nearly all the great historic characters are impossible monsters, disproportioned by flattery, or by calumny deformed. We know nothing of their peculiarities, or nothing but their peculiarities. About the roots of these oaks there clings none of the earth of humanity." Herndon might have had these words in mind when he wrote his life of Lincoln, so little does their criticism bear upon his work. With regard to Lincoln's religious views particularly the author seems to have been perfectly honest, and as those views are of especial interest to Freethinkers we will make some extended extracts from Herndon's testimony. He says:

Inasmuch as he was so often a candidate for public office, Mr. Lincoln said as little about his religious opinions as possible, especially if he failed to coincide with the orthodox world. In illustration of his religious code, I once heard him say that it was like that of an old man named Glenn, in Indiana, whom he heard speak at church-meeting, and who said: "When I do good I feel good, and when I do bad I feel bad, and that's my religion." In 1834, while still living in New Salem, and before he became a lawyer, he was surrounded by a class of people exceedingly Liberal in matters of religion. Volney's "Ruins" and Paine's "Age of Reason" passed from hand to hand, and furnished food for the evening's discussion in the tavern and the village store. Lincoln read both these books and thus assimilated them into his own being.

He prepared an extended essay—called by many a book—in which he made an argument against Christianity, striving to prove that the Bible was not inspired, and therefore not God's revelation, and that Jesus Christ was not the son of God. The manuscript of these audacious and comprehensive propositions he intended to have published or given wide circulation in some other way. He carried it to the store, where it was read and freely discussed. His friend and employer, Samuel Hill, was among the listeners, and seriously questioning the propriety of a promising young man like Lincoln fathering such unpopular notions, he snatched the manuscript from his hands and thrust it into the stove. The book went up in flames, and Lincoln's political future was secure.

But his Infidelity and his skeptical views were not diminished. He soon removed to Springfield, where he attracted considerable notice by his rank doctrine. Much of what he then said may properly be credited to the impetuosity and exuberance of youth. One of his closest friends, whose name is withheld, narrating scenes and reviewing discussions that in 1838 took place in the office of the county clerk, says: "Sometimes Lincoln bordered on Atheism. He went far that way and shocked me. I was then a young man, and believed what my good mother told me. . . . He would come into the clerk's office where I and some young men were writing and staying, and would bring the Bible with him; would read a chapter and argue against it. . . .

"Lincoln was enthusiastic in his Infidelity. As he grew older he grew more discreet; didn't talk much before strangers about his religion; but to friends, close and bosom ones, he was always open and avowed, fair and honest; to strangers he held them off from policy."

John T. Stuart, who was Lincoln's first partner, substantially indorses the above. "He was an avowed and open Infidel," declares Stuart, "and sometimes bordered on Atheism; . . . went further against Christian beliefs and doctrines and principles than any man I ever heard; he shocked me. I don't remember the exact line of his argument; suppose it was against the inherent defects, so-called, of the Bible, and on grounds of reason. Lincoln always denied that Jesus was the Christ of God—denied that Jesus was the son of God as understood and maintained by the Christian church."

David Davis tells us this: "The idea that Lincoln talked to a stranger about his religion or religious views, or made such speeches or remarks about it as are published, is to me absurd. I knew the man so well; he was the most reticent, secretive man I ever saw or expect to see. He had no faith, in the Christian sense of the term—had faith in laws, principles, causes and effects."

Another man (William H. Hannah) testifies as follows: "Mr. Lincoln told me that he was a kind of Immortalist; that he never could bring himself to believe in eternal punishment; that man lived but a little while here; and that if eternal punishment were man's doom, he should spend that little life in vigilant and ceaseless preparation by never-ending prayer."

Another intimate friend (I. W. Keys) furnishes this: "In my intercourse with Mr. Lincoln I learned that he believed in a creator of all things, who had neither beginning nor end, possessing all power and wisdom, established a principle in obedience to which worlds move and are upheld, and animal and vegetable life come into existence. A reason he gave for his belief was that in view of the order and harmony of all nature which we behold, it would have been more miraculous to have come about by chance than to have been created and arranged by some great power. As to the Christian theory that Christ is God or equal to the creator, he said that it had better be taken for granted; for by the test of reason we might become Infidels on that subject, for evidence of Christ's divinity came to us in a somewhat doubtful shape."

Jesse W. Fell, to whom Lincoln first confided the details of his biography, furnishes a more elaborate account of the latter's religious views than anyone else. In a statement made September 22, 1870, Fell says: "If there were any traits of character that stood out in bold relief in the person of Mr. Lincoln they were those of truth and candor. He was utterly incapable of insincerity or professing views on this or any other subject he did not entertain. Knowing such to be his true character, that insincerity, much more duplicity, were traits wholly foreign to his nature, many of his old friends were not a little surprised at finding in some of the biographies of this great man statements concerning his religious opinions so utterly at variance with his known sentiments.

"I have no hesitation whatever in saying that whilst he held many opinions in common with the great mass of Christian believers, he did not believe in what are regarded as the orthodox or evangelical views of Christianity. On the innate depravity of man, the character and office of the great head of the church, the atonement, the infallibility of the written revelation, the performance of miracles, the nature and design of present and future rewards and punishments, as they are popularly called, and many other subjects he held opinions utterly at variance with what are usually taught in the church. I should say that his expressed views on these and kindred topics were such as, in the estimation of most believers, would place him outside the Christian pale. I will not attempt any specification of either his belief or disbelief on various topics, as derived from conversation with him at different times during a considerable period; but as conveying a general view of his religious or theological opinions, will state the following facts. Some eight or ten years prior to his death, in conversing with him upon this subject, the writer took occasion to refer, in terms of approbation, to the sermons and writings generally of Dr. W. E. Channing; and, finding he was considerably interested in the statement I made of the opinions held by that author, I proposed to present him (Lincoln) a copy of Channing's entire works, which I soon after did. Subsequently the contents of these volumes, together with the writings of Theodore Parker, furnished him, as he informed me, by his friend and law-partner, William H. Herndon, became naturally the topics of conversation with us; and, though far from believing there was an entire harmony of view on his part with either of those authors, yet they were generally much admired and approved by him. No religious views with him seemed to find any favor except of the practical and rationalistic order; and if, from my recollections on this subject, I was called upon to designate an author whose views most nearly represented Mr. Lincoln's on this subject, I would say that author was Theodore Parker."

The last witness to testify before this case is submitted to the reader is no less a person than Mrs. Lincoln herself. In a statement made at a time and under circumstances detailed in a subsequent chapter she said this: "Mr. Lincoln had no faith and no hope in the usual acceptation of those words. He never joined a church; but still, as I believe, he was a religious man by nature. He first seemed to think about the subject when our boy Willie died, and then more than ever about the time we went to Gettysburg; but it was a kind of poetry in his nature, and he was never a technical Christian."

No man had a stronger or firmer faith in Providence—God—than Mr. Lincoln, but the continued use by him late in life of the word God must not be interpreted to mean that he believed in a personal God. In 1854 he asked me to erase the word God from a speech which I had written and read to him for criticism because my language indicated a personal God, whereas, he insisted, no such personality ever existed.

It will be seen from the foregoing that, religiously, Lincoln followed closely in the footsteps of Thomas Paine. So much, indeed, do the religious views of the one resemble those of the other that it would be almost impossible to point out any difference. Paine said that his religion was to do good, and Lincoln echoed the sentiment. Paine wrote a work against Christianity; Lincoln did the same, though prevented from publishing it by the means which Herndon describes. Both believed in an overruling providence, Paine's conviction being perhaps the stronger, and the same is true regarding their notions of a future life.

It is hardly necessary to call attention to the disparity between the position accorded Lincoln and that given Thomas Paine by a thoughtless people. Paine was every inch as great a man as Lincoln, and the latter in issuing the Emancipation Proclamation only carried into effect the words of Paine: "Man can have no property in man." Had Lincoln produced and published as able a work as the "Age of Reason" he would never have been president. The church may overlook unbelief, if held in private, but it never forgives the making it known. But as Lincoln became president, as next to Washington he is "first in the hearts of his countrymen," the church cannot afford to repudiate him, and has no other recourse but to claim him as a good Christian, which she has assiduously done. In exposing this pious fraud Mr. Herndon has done a service both to Lincoln and to Free-thought.

THE SAN FRANCISCO FREETHOUGHT SOCIETY.

B. F. UNDERWOOD, the distinguished Freethought lecturer, of Chicago, will speak at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, next Sunday evening, Sept. 22, on "Religion in the Light of Evolution." There is no admission fee.

UNDERWOOD'S OAKLAND LECTURE.

B. F. Underwood will lecture in Oakland next Sunday afternoon, September 22, in the Jewish Synagogue, corner of Thirteenth and Clay streets, on "What Shall We Give in its Place?" Admission will be free.

At Hay Springs, Nebraska, while W. F. Jamieson was addressing an audience one evening, during a series of lectures on "Genesis and Geology," the hall building was bombarded with stones from the hands of little sprouting saints for Christ's sake. The Congregational clergyman, who was present, arose and humorously claimed that the missile which had just crashed through the window was aimed at himself and hence could not have been thrown by any of the members of his church. After a few good-natured exchanges between the preacher and the lecturer, as to the "influence of Christianity," everybody conceded that the influence within the hall was better than the Christian influence outside.

MR. E. A. STEVENS has resigned the office of secretary of the American Secular Union, and the office of the society has been moved temporarily from Chicago to Philadelphia, in order that the correspondence and business may be under the direct supervision of the president until the meeting of the Congress the last of October. All letters relating to the affairs of the Union should be addressed for the present to R. B. Westbrook, president of the American Secular Union, No. 1707 Oxford street, Philadelphia.

If children while at Sunday-school are liable to be struck by lightning and killed, as happened to two little girls near Columbia City, Ind., September 15, what greater danger would they incur through staying at home or even going fishing? It is time that Sunday-school story books were revised in accordance with facts.

THE fate of William Gooderham, the millionaire philanthropist of Toronto, will not have a tendency to encourage promiscuous praying. Mr. Gooderham was attending a prayer-meeting in the Home for Fallen Women, September 12, and dropped dead while addressing the throne of grace.

At the laying of the cornerstone of a new church in Washington, D. C., last Sunday, Cardinal Gibbons said: "I rejoice in the growth and progress of the Catholic religion, because I am convinced the growth of the Catholic faith in this country will, more than any other means, promote the welfare and stability of our American institutions." This shows the hypocrisy of Catholic priests. Cardinal Gibbons knows, as everybody knows, that Catholicism has never promoted the stability of any institution except the Catholic church. The growth of the Catholic church in France led to the Revolution; it led to war in Italy, to confiscation of church property in Mexico; it threatens civil government in Canada; and as for Ireland, it has prevented that country from ever having any national institutions. The pope is jealous of all civil rulers who hold office without his sanction, and he looks forward to the time when no president of the United States can take his seat until the papal hands have been laid upon his head. Cardinal Gibbons and some of his priests are endeavoring just now to gain a little cheap popularity by spreading the American eagle, but they are not sincere. The Catholic church is an imperium in imperio, a state within a state, and is eating the heart out of this republic.

A MAN named Conklin, whose arrest in Forsyth county, Ga., on a charge of Sabbath-breaking, was noted recently in FREETHOUGHT, has just been tried, found guilty, and fined $25 and costs, which amount in all to $46.80. Conklin's offense was cutting wood on Sunday to cook a meal of victuals with. It was shown at this trial that all the people of that section are accustomed to work up their wood as they use it, on Sunday or any other day, but Conklin is a Seventh Day Adventist. He observes Saturday religiously, and the neighbors thought that he was trying to displace the Sabbath of their forefathers, and therefore informed upon him and had him arrested. Conklin is described as a good and industrious citizen who pays his honest debts and is respected by all as a man. It seems that works of necessity are allowable on Sunday in Georgia; that Conklin performed no other work than such as was admitted by all to be necessary, but the state's attorneys took a purely religious view of the matter, and prosecuted him not so much for his offense against the state as for being a Seventh Day Adventist.

In her paper before the Conference of Charities just held in San Francisco, Mrs. Cooper stated a fact which should give religious philanthropists food for reflection. She said that it was not for lack of religious teaching that the convicts in our public institutions first became criminals. Statistics showed that they had pious training, attended Sunday-schools, heard sermons preached, and knew all about the celebration of the mass. What they lacked was not religious instruction but a trade. The lesson is that boys should be taught how to live in this world, not the next.

REPORT says that Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore has issued a pastoral letter calling attention to the allocution of Pope Leo on the unveiling of the monument in Rome to the memory of Bruno. The letter was to have been read in the Catholic churches last Sunday, but we have seen no report of its contents.

PROF. A. T. JONES, Seventh Day Adventist, and the Rev. G. W. Bothwell are debating the Sunday Rest question this week in the Adventists' church, Oakland. Jones argues against Sunday laws, with casual references to the fact that Sunday is not the Sabbath.

FRIENDS of FREETHOUGHT—and we count every reader as a friend—should remember that the present is the dull season for papers whose circulation is principally rural. Realizing this, they do not need more than an intimation that whatever they are able to do for this paper will be most timely if done now. Send us subscribers, renewals, book orders, or any other form of encouragement you may be moved to extend.

THE Freethought Society hopes to see a large attendance at its meeting next Sunday evening. The hall is commodious, handsome, and comfortable, one of the best in the city. There will undoubtedly be good music and cordial welcome, and Mr. Underwood's lecture may be depended upon as something the residents of San Francisco are treated to only at rare intervals. Readers, subscribers, friends, give the society the benefit of your presence and make this a big gathering.

THE Calvary Presbyterian church of this city has secured a pastor whose orthodoxy is above suspicion. He is the Rev. Dr. Easton, who was pastor of a church in Belvedere, Ill., during the celebrated trial of Professor Irving, a popular Presbyterian minister in Chicago, some years ago on a charge of heresy, and took a prominent part in ousting the heretic. Professor Irving is thought to be the clergyman referred to by Colonel Ingersoll in his lecture on "Heretics and Heresies."

THE residents of Granville, Wis., came near witnessing, last week, the unusual spectacle of a Catholic priest tarred and feathered by his congregation, nothing but veneration for the priestly garb preventing. The priest's name is Seeley, and several young girls who attend the parochial school told their parents that the priest had been conducting himself in a decidedly improper manner toward them. Seeley had to leave town, and his effects were burnt by his parishioners.

JOHN L. SULLIVAN, the bruiser, is scanning the political horizon to see if he is not the coming man for representative to Congress from a Boston district. He is willing to be elected alderman first in order to acquire parliamentary training. Mr. Sullivan is a trifle too precipitous. He should become converted and serve a term as a "reformed" pugilist first. He could then command any position within the gift of the people.

THE work from which we extract the facts as to Abraham Lincoln's religious views, printed in this issue of FREETHOUGHT, is "Herndon's Lincoln," a three-volume biography published by Belford, Clarke & Co. The price is $4.50, and we are prepared to fill orders.

A COMMITTEE at Berlin is revising the German Bible. The author of the book, though said to be alive, is not assisting in the great work. Possibly he does not understand the German language.

OBSERVATIONS.

There was a good audience of truly good people at Captain Scott's lecture before the Freethought Society last Sunday night, who had come to hear about "Romanism, the Nation's Curse." Vice-President Eastman occupied the high-backed, plush-covered chair, and introduced the speaker.

Captain Scott is one of the old settlers of California, and took part in the events that made the early days in this state so exciting. He was, I believe, a member of the vigilance committee that the late Judge Terry exerted his influence to discourage.

The lecturer declared that neither of the old political parties met the requirements of the time. "We want," he said, "a new party, imbued with something of the spirit of '76, to avert the danger threatened from an influx of a foreign population; and when I say foreigners I mean those who come to this country and swear to uphold the constitution, but who do not give up allegiance to a foreign power—a foreign population inimical to the welfare of the country, and that must be absorbed and converted into good citizens." He quoted numerous Roman Catholic authorities showing it to be the avowed purpose of that class to overthrow our republican form of government as soon as it had acquired the power; and added: "The American party suggests a remedy—exclude foreigners from the right of suffrage."

The lecturer closed with an original and stirring poem, of which the following are the last two stanzas:

Awake, ye sons of patriot sires,
Renew the oaths your fathers gave;
Kindle again heroic fires
That light to glory or the grave.
No tyrant lords, no priests nor kings,
Shall blot our fair escutcheon o'er;
Our lives, our hopes are offerings
In freedom's cause forevermore.

Mr. H. L. Knight, when opportunity for discussion was offered, remarked that if twenty people out of one hundred avowed the intention of suppressing religious liberty as soon as they could get the power to do so, it was the part of prudence for the eighty to put that power forever beyond their reach.

Mr. Lund sharply criticised that part of the lecturer's address which advised the exclusion of foreigners. He said he was unfortunately born on the other side of the water, and not having been consulted in the matter he did not think he should be made to suffer for it.

Mr. Curtis revived the motion that caused the slight ripple in the proceedings of the state convention last January. He called attention to the rising generation receiving their education in parochial schools and being taught to vote away the liberties fought for by our forefathers. He suggested as a remedy that all children be held as belonging to the state and be educated in public unsectarian schools.

Professor Miller closed the discussion with some animated remarks on the dangers that had been pointed out.

A business meeting followed. Mr. Schou announced that the next lecturer would be Mr. B. F. Underwood, a man who, on account of his reputation for learning and ability as an orator, would probably draw more audience than the small hall would hold. It was therefore moved that the large hall be engaged for the occasion. The motion was carried, and nearly enough coin to pay the additional rent was collected on the spot. Mr. Underwood will speak on "Religion in the Light of Evolution."

I hear that the editor of the Truth Seeker, who is just convalescing after an attack of typhoid fever, is not getting his strength back so rapidly as he could wish. The fever has left him full of rheumatism, neuralgia, and toothache. I understand that Dr. Monroe, of the Ironclad Age, has sent him a bottle of his Blood Feeder, which the sufferer is unable to take on account of its being put up in a solvent prohibited by total abstinence principles. In view of this state of affairs, and in view of this state of California, I have extended to the editor of the Truth Seeker a warm, or semi-tropical, invitation to visit the coast and recuperate. We offer many inducements. Just at this season of the year the weather is full of attractions. The winds have blown themselves out, and the sand dunes are no longer in a state of eruption. The atmosphere is full of smoke; the sun, penetrating the haze, tints everything to the color of red-and-gold, and opaque objects cast purple shadows on the ground. It is a trifle too warm to wear a coat, and too cool for shirtsleeves, so that the resident is afforded all the varieties of sensation that lie between a sweat and a sneeze.

If the editor of the Truth Seeker will come here I will extend to him the freedom of the city. He can make ascensions in the cable cars, or take a voyage to Oakland and see Mr. Schou. I will have the Salvation Army sing for him in front of the old Adelphi theatre. I will show him the picturesque ruin we use for a post-office, and other ruins which are not picturesque who came to California to make their fortunes and failed to realize on their expectations. He shall go with me for a sail on the bay, where the porpoises gambol away their hard earnings, and to the Stock Exchange on Pine street, where that other kind of fish known as the sucker gambles away his hard borrowings. He shall see the hoodlum hoodling in his haunt; the government mule from the Presidio; the pig-tailed heathen from the orient. I will show him the vaquero galloping through Kearny street, the rampant cowboy and the terror from Tuolumne clubbed into a docile frame of mind by an insignificant policeman. He may view the audacious seagull reincarnated in the chicken tamale. He may revel in peaches, grapes, watermelons, and jamaica ginger. He may hunt the alert and fugitive flea, dare the tarantula with a club, and stand off the church beggar with an arquebuse.

So shall his mind be diverted and his body strengthened. He will return to his scorched and frozen and stormy island home, full of flea-bites, enthusiasm, and tender recollections.

In the accompanying issue of FREETHOUGHT, Col. H. L. Knight, DD., LL.D., mentions a few theological points which he is free to maintain. His propositions are not, strictly speaking, original with him. I have heard them before and have also met several persons to whom they are more or less familiar. I have no doubt that, when the prehistoric troglodyte sounded his bazoo to call his fellow-trogs together while he enlightened them concerning questions of which he knew nothing, his remarks agreed substantially with those of Mr. Knight. Ever since that comparatively early day the world has been wearied more or less with these propositions, and their upholders have been rather more energetic in making them than in adducing the proofs by which they are supported. Peradventure it remains for Mr. Knight, in the hind-quarter of the nineteenth century, to supply the evidence with which his predecessors have been so reticent. I therefore take pleasure in offering him space in these columns to spread his facts before the public. I would accord him first a column of space to prove each of the following propositions:

1. That there is a wise, just, and beneficent God.
2. That there is a human soul destined to survive the funeral.
3. That the above soul will, in its subsequent existence, be rewarded for the good deeds performed in this life, and punished for the evil done.
4. That those who believe as Mr. Knight does have reason, and are likely, to be more virtuous than those who do not.

In the event of any of Mr. Knight's arguments seeming to me fallacious, or his evidence insufficient, I would reserve the privilege of pointing out the defects. This not for the purpose of controversy, but to enable my instructor to re-cover the ground gone over and to strengthen the weaker places.

Mr. Knight, I have reason to know, would prefer an oral debate, which form of discussion would give him a great advantage, since, being afflicted with deafness, he would be forced into the common position of theologians—that of hearing only one side. At best I am sufficiently handicapped. He can overwhelm me with the plea that I am forty years his junior, and that he was in the field of law and letters before I was born—an argument which I shall be wholly unable to answer. In spite of all, however, I cheerfully invite him to approach and spread his proofs upon the pages of this journal. If he can instruct its readers, they will be glad to have him do so; and if I fail to make my part of the discussion as interesting as his, I merely ask credit for the good intentions with which the road to our future residence is said to be paved.

My friend Mr. A. N. Miller, of Puyallup, asks me this question: "Can you tell how many miles it is from where Jonah was thrown overboard to the place where the whale spewed him on dry land?"

Problems like this should, more properly, be forwarded to the Presbyterian paper, the Occident, or to some of the religious sharps doing business in the pulpits of our land, though of course I know just as much about the facts of the case as they do.

There is so much of the miraculous connected with the voyage of Jonah that I have often been led to doubt its historical accuracy. I even doubt sometimes that the word of the Lord came unto Jonah as related in the tale. I should sooner believe it to be the vox populi, and that it was not so much to escape the presence of the Lord as the attentions of the vigilance committee that Jonah lit out for Tarshish. My unbelief is augmented when I read that Jonah paid his fare. Being a professed man of God he was entitled to a reduction under the Interstate Commerce act, and if we admit that he paid full fare we are straining at a gnat and swallowing a rhinoceros when we deny the other miracles. There is a limit to human credulity, and I draw the line here.

Jonah was dropped overboard, at his own request, somewhere in the Mediterranean sea, and the fish which the Lord had prepared, according to what is known in San Francisco as the family style, took him in. Three days later Jonah went ashore near Nineveh on the east bank of the river Tigris. If the Suez canal had been open at that time the fish might have gone from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea, thence around the coast of Arabia and up the Persian gulf and the Tigris to Nineveh. That would have been a fair three days' trip, but it was only a Sunday excursion compared with the voyage made. I ask friend Miller to believe that this big fish went westward the length of the Mediterranean sea—2,300 miles—and out into the Atlantic ocean, where, turning himself by a slight fluke of his tail, he took a southerly course to the cape of Good Hope—4,475 miles, and then steered northward to the upper end of Africa—another 4,475 miles. He had in the mean time traveled the distance across the continent of Africa, which is 4,225 miles or thereabouts. Adding these distances up, we have 15,475 miles covered by the fish in three days. Such—15,475 miles, approximately—is the answer to Brother Miller's question. The gentlemen of the clerical sex who make a business of explaining this miracle say that Jonah was landed back on the shore he originally sailed from, and that he then made the journey to Nineveh overland, but it furnishes a better story to have the fish go around the cape of Good Hope; and furthermore, people will naturally have more respect for a God who can cause a fish to travel five thousand miles a day than they would for one that merely had the fish swallow a prophet and throw him up again near home. I have no sympathy with those who would make miracles appear reasonable. I am just as confident that the fish covered fifteen thousand miles in three days as I am that the Lord spoke to Jonah, or that any event recorded in the Bible ever occurred.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

Judge Sawyer has decided that Neagle was justified in killing Judge Terry and has set him at liberty.—Last Sunday was Switzerland's Independence Day—its five hundred and eighty-second anniversary. The Swiss of this city celebrated with guns, picnics, and a great dance in Irving Hall.—More than one hundred prominent citizens of San Francisco have tendered a banquet to Justice Field, who, owing to his engagements in the East, is unable to accept the honor.—It is estimated that as many as 20,000 residents of this city broke the "Sabbath" last Sunday by going on excursions and picnics, and visiting Golden Gate Park. The weather was above criticism.—Destructive field and forest fires are raging in San Mateo and Calaveras counties.—St. Helena, in Napa county, was scorched by a $12,000 fire last Sunday. An efficient fire department is credited with saving the town from almost total destruction.—Sylvestro Morales, the horsethief and general desperado captured recently in the southern part of the state, has been sentenced to prison for life.—Mexican war veterans commemorated last Saturday evening, by a banquet and speeches, the 42d anniversary of the entrance of the American troops into the City of Mexico. Our correspondent, H. L. Knight, was one of the orators.—The supervisors are considering an ordinance calculated to do away with sparring matches and other forms of bruising in this city.—Mortality reports for August received by the State Board of Health from over 100 localities in California, with an estimated population of 830,415, give the number of deaths during that month as 809, or a percentage of 0.97 a thousand, which would be an annual mortality of 11.64. This is believed to be the lowest death rate ever recorded in the state.

The new U. S. cruiser Baltimore, which made her trial trip last week, is said to have shown herself to be the fastest war vessel afloat.—A train laden with Mormon converts picked up in the south was wrecked near Lynchburg, Va., Sept. 15. There were nine Mormon elders and 160 of their dupes aboard, and though the train was thrown into a creek and some of the cars stood on end, nobody was killed.—While Sunday-school services were being held in a church near Columbus, Ind., Sept. 14, lightning struck the spire and coursed down through the roof, striking and instantly killing two girls, both aged 17, who were sitting together in the center of their class. The other ten children in the class were badly stunned, but not seriously injured.—Corporal James Tanner, U. S. commissioner of pensions, has tendered his resignation, which President Harrison accepts. The indiscriminate granting of pensions is said to constitute Tanner's offense.—The Sunday law is enforced in Cincinnati by the arrest of theatrical managers and performers for giving concerts on Sunday night.—Mike McDonald, the Chicago politician, has sued his wife for a divorce. It will be remembered that the woman eloped with a Catholic priest a few weeks ago.—A lively church row between the German Lutherans and the German Evangelicals, who heretofore held meetings in the same church, terminated in a free fight at St. Cloud, Minn., one night last week, when the Lutherans found the Evangelicals had possession of the building. One of the disturbers was fined $10 next morning.

The great strike in London is settled, the employers having made important concessions.—It is stated that a majority of the French cabinet disapproves the circular recently issued by Minister of Justice Thevene, in which the clergy are reminded that they are prohibited by law from taking part in elections.—During the celebration of a religious festival at Rohtak, India, a few days ago, the Mussulmans and Hindoos became involved in religious disputes, which led to rioting. The police were compelled to interfere. Many of the rioters were shot by the officers.

LITERARY NOTES.

The "Psychology of Attention," by H. Ribot, is No. 112 of the Humboldt Library. Price, 15 cents.

Thanks are due to Brother Moses Hull, of New Thought, for an extended and very favorable review of S. P. Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity."

The Freethinker's Magazine for September is a valuable number on account of its articles and illustrations relating to Bruno. Copies can be obtained at this office for 20 cents.

The Modern Science Essayist for July contains "Evolution of Society," by James A. Skilton; for August, "Evolution of Theology," by Z. Sidney Sampson. Price, 10 cents each.

One of the best contributions to "Sabbath" literature is Dr. George Brown's "Historical and Critical Review of the Sunday Question," a fifteen-cent pamphlet which we have for sale at this office.

"God and the Universe" is an essay of 20 large pamphlet pages by James W. Stillman, Esq., in which the author, after an able Atheistic argument, concludes that "the whole problem of the existence of God and the origin of the universe is entirely above and beyond the scope of the human intellect." Price, 10 cents.

The addresses of the Rev. M. C. Lockwood, Mr. Samuel Bernstein, Hon. Emil Rothe, and Benn Pitnam, Esq., at the dedication of the Cincinnati crematory are printed in pamphlet form. They embody many convincing arguments in favor of the cinerary process.

Mr. James H. Barry, charged with contempt, in that he criticised the character of Judge Lawler in the Weekly Star, has published "Points and Authorities for Respondent" in a pamphlet. The arguments of his counsel make the charge of contempt appear ridiculous.

The address in memory of Thomas Paine by Florence Kelly Wischniewetzky (daughter of Congressman "Pig Iron" Kelly) is essentially the labor reformer's estimate of the Author-Hero. It is issued by the Truth Publishing Company of Pittsburg, Pa., and may be had at this office for five cents per copy.

Mrs. J. M. Kellogg, a medium of Ensenada, Lower California, has received a "communication" from D. M. Bennett in the spirit world, and published it in pamphlet form. The "communication" is a valuable one, and is undoubtedly the work of Mr. Bennett, being copied bodily from essays which he wrote while alive.

"We have received from Brother Moses Hull, of New Thought, Chicago, a copy of a remarkable lithograph, the ideal conception of Dr. Newcomer, representing the moral, intellectual, and spiritual development of man, from the prehistoric savage to the highest type of humanity imaginable. The picture is indeed a study."—Golden Gate. Those who desire to view the above mentioned picture may do so by visiting this office and making the necessary inquiry.

"The Glory of Infidelity," by Samuel P. Putnam comes to us from its publishers, Putnam & Macdonald, of San Francisco, California, in a beautifully-gotten-up pamphlet of twenty-four pages. The pamphlet also contains a poem by the same author on Thomas Paine. "The Glory of Infidelity" is one of Mr. Putnam's most popular lectures, and is full of bright, inspiring thoughts, characteristic of the enthusiastic author. There is not a dry sentence in it, and at the low price of 10 cents it ought to have a large sale.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Dr. George W. Brown, of Rockford, Ill., has written and published one of those books which arm the skeptic with unanswerable facts concerning the origin and falsity of the Christian religion. It is entitled "Researches in Oriental History." It also includes chapters on the rise and development of Zoroastrianism. We indorse the words of William Thorpe of Ballston, Spa., N. Y. "It is a perfect gem, and no library can be complete without it. No Infidel can afford to go without this grand intellectual treat. I would not do without it for ten times its cost. With its facts I can hold my own against any 'sky pilot' in town, and it is a wonder to them how I gained my information in regard to the dim past." The price of the work is $1.50, and orders for it may be addressed to this office.

MR. KNIGHT'S DEFIANCE.

To the Editors of Freethought:

It is manifest to all thinking persons that the Christian religion, as now taught in the churches, is not suitable to the people of a republic, to a free, brave, and intelligent man who knows his rights, and knowing dare maintain them. It is daily growing into disfavor. The churches are empty, the pastoral influence has gone down to zero, and the collections are hard to gather. Not one-tenth of the people of San Francisco ever go to church, and all other cities of the Union complain of the same state of things. It has become a standing question at the preachers' meeting, What shall we do to awaken a religious sentiment? And it is not answered satisfactorily. The people will not go to church.

Why? Because the church, its dogma, organization, discipline, and sentiment are all imperial, autocratic, aristocratic, removed from the people, and in the hands of priests who are not elected and in no sense represent the popular mind. These men are educated to a stern conservatism and high authority that resists progress, and will not regard the layman as free, equal, and in all respects entitled to just and equal rights in all matters.

Now, the republic is at war with all such doctrine. The constitution of our country denounces it as all wrong, unjust, unequal, and intolerable. This constitution accepted, almost worshiped, is the basis of all human action and sentiment. We no longer think as slaves, with masters, or pastors. Habit has confirmed principle, until now any attempt to coerce a man in his opinions, or to persecute him for them, would be regarded as un-American, inhuman, brutal, and ignorant in the last degree. And even our clergy would not now think of proclaiming that any man should be punished for heresy. The whole of that sentiment has been eliminated from the intelligent mind. We are republican free-men, with no slaves, no superiors, no privileged class, no mental shackles, and no man placed above another by the grace of God. We are scientists who grasp at once all that invention can do for us, all that science reveals to us, and all the just and inalienable rights that belong to us. We are jealous of all claims of superiority or authority. We look with no favor on kings by the grace of God, or priests by the grace of God, or anything that is unjust or unequal. In our courts daily all these things are admitted, set out, argued, and enforced, that all law shall be just and equal to all persons without regard to religion, race, color, or condition.

The religion of the republic must be in harmony with the republic. It must walk hand in hand with science, now the guide of our people. It must utterly discard all claims to the unjust and unequal, to place, power, or emolument, save as the people may approve. It demands a revise of all the work of the imperial council of Nice, and of all other councils from that day to this, and a pruning therefrom of all that is inconsistent with the republic, with science, with perfect human equality.

To this end a crucial test is at hand that will eliminate from the Christian religion all that is indefensible, but leave the pure gold and diamonds of solid and demonstrable truth. The trial is at hand. The republic arraigns the religion of emperors and kings; science arraigns the dogma of the Dark Ages, and human equality demands a religion that enthrones the rights of man, and not the privileges of priests.

With a view to this purgation from error and establishment of demonstrable truth, the author of this paper has carefully looked over the whole field and selected what he deems the wheat to be saved and the chaff to be thrown into the fire. In this work he finds two adversaries—

The Agnostic, who would live without God in the world and holds "eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow you die," to be the true faith; and

The clerical party, who still cling to all these old imperial authorities and the errors and superstitions that so materially tend to enrich the church and degrade and enslave the people.

He draws the line distinctly. He stands in the centre, between two fires. In former articles published in your paper he has invited and challenged both to a trial of skill in debate on these issues, and he begs here again to repeat his challenge to one and all. It has not been accepted on either side. It is still open to any adversary of ability, good manners, and accredited character.

To the Atheist he declares and will hold that this much of the Christian religion is true and sustained by the weight of evidence furnished by science and history: That there is a personal, wise, just, and beneficent God; that there is a human soul that will not die with the body; that there is a future life in which the good or evil done in this world will find its reward or punishment; that so to believe is the best inspiration to moral heroism and the best deterrent of crime and evil ever presented to the mind of man.

To the clerical side he will affirm: That to this simple faith approved by science and inspiring to noble life the false prophets and clergy of the world have added a thousand errors that drown, cloud, and obscure these sublime truths, and tend daily to demoralize and degrade mankind; that God, being good and wise and just, no teaching can be true that is inconsistent with this character.

It is not true that belief or unbelief in any dogma whatsoever is essential to the approval of God, or the salvation of man. It is not true that God ever inspired or authorized any man or book to speak for him in other than the language of true wisdom, exact justice, and pure benevolence. It is not true that there is any other plan of salvation or way to be saved than to seek the truth and the right, and to do them, and love and serve our fellow creatures. It is not true that any church or man should be obeyed, or believed, or supported, or any ceremony performed, or act done or left undone, except as it is right and may benefit mankind; or that the same will tend to attain heaven or avoid hell. It is not true that any men or set of men are nearer to God than others, or may bless or curse, or in any manner effect the salvation of other men, except by persuasion to good works for the benefit of man. It is not true that the consequences of sin or crime can be effaced by prayer, or by any mere ceremony whatsoever. It is not true that Christ was born, lived, and died in the manner set out in the churches, or was the son of God, or one jot more than any other man to be believed and followed when he was right. It is not true that there is any other way to be saved for the future life than to be good and do good continually. That an American sovereign, free, equal, thinking bravely for himself and acting for the good of mankind, his true thoughts is, above all others, eligible and fit for the kingdom of heaven.

It is believed that the best form of discussion of any question is that of a trial in court. The complaint will affirm the point at issue. Attorneys for either side will present all the testimony as evidence. The argument will be confined to the evidence before the court. Improper, irrelevant, redundant, and immaterial testimony will be ruled out. It is thought that in this manner the sum of human knowledge on each point would be adduced, so that all men might know just what it is, and form their own conclusions. But, however, this form will not be insisted upon; but any form admitted that is fair and equal and honorable to both sides. The object is the disclosure of the exact truth for the benefit of all concerned.

Believing that the time has come for the great republic to have a religion consistent with itself, I am yours to command,
San Francisco, Sept. 12, 1889. H. L. KNIGHT.

CALL FOR THE OREGON CONVENTION.

By virtue of the authority vested in us by the Oregon State Secular Union, we hereby call the FIRST ANNUAL CONVENTION of said Union to meet in Portland, Oregon, at Masonic Hall, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, the 12th, 13th, and 14th days of October, 1889; the object being to secure the total separation of church and state.

The advocates of this measure in Washington Territory are invited to join their Oregon friends in this Convention.

Done at Portland, Oregon, this thirty-first day of July, 1889.

C. BEAL,		} Board of Directors.
J. K. SEARS,	A. F. NEUNERT,
LEE LAUGHLIN,	L. AMES,
SECULAR WORK IN OREGON.

To the Liberals of Oregon:

I wish to call your attention to the importance of the convention to be held at Masonic Hall, Portland, Oct. 12, 13, and 14 next. This will undoubtedly be the largest gathering of Liberal men and women ever held on this coast. Arrangements are being made worthy of the occasion. Eminent speakers from abroad will be there. Liberals from the whole Northwest will participate. Railways leading to Portland will issue half-fare tickets, and everything is favorable for one of the grandest meetings ever held in Portland. It will represent the noblest cause that ever thrilled human hearts, or ever inspired men and women to lay down their lives: that cause is liberty. Wherever liberty is secured, there is freedom of thought and action, free speech and a free press, whether in the Alpine range or in the noble Italy of to-day. Wherever freedom is, there you will find the noblest minds unfettered by creeds. Every patriotic breast should be filled with enthusiasm in contemplating the grand results that in after years will come from this Oregon State Secular Union convention.

Now, in regard to the means to carry on this work. This is not a free gospel, to be obtained without money or price, let down from heaven ready made; it requires both labor and money and some sacrifice of time. This is especially the case with the executive officers. We cannot expect them to furnish the money for the necessary expenses of the convention. How shall it be raised? Quite a goodly number intend to become life members. The membership is $25; honorary membership, $5. Contributions for any amount the donor wishes to make will be thankfully received by C. Beal, president of the O. S. S. U., Portland, Or., and credited up in the great book of the association opposite your name. I had rather have my name there than any other place of honor in the state. The names of the founders of the Oregon State Secular Union will be honored and revered in years to come little less than the signers of the Declaration of Independence. Be there in person to register. Send your remittances at once or, as far as possible, during the month of September. Not one dollar will be squandered, and any surplus funds will remain in the hands of finance committee for future secular work.

Salem, Or.

G. W. TIFFANY.

QUERIES FOR DISCUSSION AND DECISION.

Nothing can be done without money. Can we avoid constant begging? How shall the needed funds be obtained? Is it best to have a real society with a genuine membership with payment of membership fee and semi-annual dues in advance? If so, what shall be the amount of membership and semi-annual dues? How shall the formation of local Liberal unions be encouraged? What is the best plan for their organization? What shall be the duties of their officers and committees? How should local unions be conducted? What is the best means to keep up interest? Can science schools on Sunday be successfully conducted without professional teachers? How can we best promote sociability? How best develop home talent? How most surely interest and enlist women as earnest workers? What shall be done to make provision for the aged and totally disabled, and for the widows and orphans of Liberals left otherwise unprovided for? Shall we elect an executive committee who will execute, in whose judgment all can feel perfect confidence (as in the case of the Oregon executive committee), who will carry out the plan or methods of work adopted by the convention, and will aid and encourage the secretary to faithfully carry out instructions?

Shall the executive committee consist of three or five? Do we need a secretary for the joint state union, who shall be held to strict accountability for the performance of his duty, one who will cheerfully and conscientiously devote ten hours (and when necessary 20 hours of the 24) 365 days in the year to practical work for the cause, not self-laudation; who will give us results, and not resolutions? On whom shall we inflict the position? Are we willing to evince equal self-sacrifice and insure to such a secretary fair remuneration? Should it be the duty of the secretary to keep a daily corrected list of the names and addresses of the earnest workers in the two states, cultivate their acquaintance, keep in correspondence with them and induce them to send him reports of all items of interest and the needs of the cause in their vicinity?

Should the secretary cull the articles of greatest interest from all sources available, especially articles in the leading daily newspapers favoring any of the Nine Demands, thus gathering a weekly budget of interesting items, and send copies of such items every week to Liberals throughout the two states who have influence and interest to secure their publication in local newspapers? Should he solicit Liberals of ability to write articles on each of the Nine Demands, and himself gather, from all sources, facts and arguments that shall make short, bright, incisive leaflets so written that they can be handed to Bible devotees, awakening them to thought while lulling their prejudice, yet of such interest that they will be preserved, shown to friends, read and reread with avidity by all classes? (Published without advertisement of the society or any names of known Liberals that would only scare Christians from reading them.) Shall the working members be supplied with such leaflets for gratuitous distribution? Should the printing of such leaflets be paid for from the funds of the union? Should the secretary send them with hints as to the best methods of distributing them in the strongholds of the enemy, and thus force people to discuss these issues, and educate the intelligent to full comprehension of the justice of our Nine Demands? Would not the leaflets intensify the interest in the items furnished the local newspaper? and would not items in the local newspaper give increased value and interest to the leaflets?

Where there is interest and desire for lectures, but the Liberals so few they are unable to meet the entire expense, should the secretary under the advice of the president and executive committee arrange with a lecturer who may be in that vicinity or can make it en route, to deliver lectures, organize local unions, etc.; and should the treasurer pay such lecturers the balance due for such services from the funds of the Union? Should the president, vice-president, secretary, and executive committee each and all keep wary watch on both state legislatures and be prepared to counteract the nefarious schemes of the various combinations of fanatics? And whenever they attempt to influence legislation should the secretary promptly send out leaflets on the question at issue to all the workers for immediate circulation, and urge each and every member of the union in that state to write urgent letters to the member of the legislature from their district to oppose the schemes of the fanatics, and use every influence to induce friends and neighbors to do likewise?

Should it be the duty of the secretary to prepare and with all possible dispatch send to all the workers short, able, telling articles on the question in issue, suitable for the local newspapers? Should it be the duty of the secretary to personally appear before the legislative committee and defend our rights and defeat the schemes of the enemies of liberty?

In case of religious persecution of any member of the Union, should the secretary under advice of the president and executive committee flood the place and adjoining counties with leaflets giving the argument on the issue involved; go himself to the place, deliver speeches in hall or, if need be, in public square, day and night? Should the executive committee secure able counsel to defend the persecuted member and make the power and influence of our organization felt?

What shall we do to secure competent persons to deliver orations and conduct funeral services, and thus avoid the insults to our dead, so often the result of ministerial presiding?

Liberals of Oregon and Washington, these are among the momentous questions awaiting your consideration and decision. Come to the great convention at Portland (Oct. 12, 13, 14) prepared to give us the benefit of your best judgment. Come resolved to decide and adopt the best, most practical plan presented, so that all can in perfect harmony zealously work to secure the greatest good to the greatest number.

CLARK BRADEN AGAIN BRANDED.

From Secular Thought.

We apologize to our readers for again referring to this person. But the unmistakable manner in which the Summerside, P. E. I., friends have convicted him as an unmitigated slanderer should be known by the innocent dupes of this utterly unprincipled and wicked "theological tramp." When he was recently in Prince Edward Island he did his little best to defame the noble character of Colonel Ingersoll, and among the witnesses whom he fraudulently brought forth to support his infamy were Mr. John Warner, mayor of Peoria, Ill., and Judge Puterbaugh, of the same place. Our friend, Mr. John McKenzie, of Summerside, wrote to those two gentlemen to ascertain if they were aware of the vile purpose for which their names were being used. The following conclusive replies were received:

FROM THE MAYOR OF PEORIA, ILL.

JOHN MCKENZIE, ESQ., Dear Sir: You ask me to state what the standing and character of R. G. Ingersoll was in this city during the many years he resided here—let me say briefly that Colonel Ingersoll was one of our most respected and esteemed citizens. While differing from myself and many others in politics and having independent opinions upon religion which he fearlessly expressed, he had the respect of all those who traveled upon a different line, for the reason that it was conceded he acted and spoke according to conscience and aimed to give no offense to those who controverted his opinions. As to character, his every word and act proved that he was guided by the highest order of character. Mr. Ingersoll was noted for his religious devotion to his family, his open-handed charity to those in need, and his sympathy with those in distress. His life there was that of a sober, truthful, honorable, and upright man. Mr. Ingersoll was not a perfect man (to find such we must look to his defamers!), but he was as near being a perfect man as any man I have ever been acquainted with.

We Peorians hold the name and fame of Colonel Ingersoll as things to be cherished, and among us no slanderer can attack him without being rebuked and silenced.

Had Mr. Ingersoll remained in Illinois he could long since have held a seat in the United States Senate, and in our opinion he merits even a more exalted post.

It is unfortunate for mankind that the world has not more men like Colonel Ingersoll. I consider his life a blessing and sunshine on the highway of life, and that his detractors would mend their lives by following his example. Respectfully yours,

Mayor's Office, Peoria, Ill., July 25, 1886. JOHN WARNER.

FROM JUDGE PUTERBAUGH.

PEORIA, ILL., July 27, 1889.

JOHN MCKENZIE, ESQ., Dear Sir: I notice the correspondence published in the Peoria Transcript between yourself and Colonel Warner, mayor of this city, relative to the slanders of one Professor (?) Braden against Col. R. G. Ingersoll, formerly of this city. Whatever may have been Colonel Ingersoll's views in regard to Christianity, no reputable citizen of Peoria, where he so long resided, questions his sincerity, honor, and integrity. He was always generous, charitable, and loyal to his friends and country. It is only a few cranks who are unable to cope with his arguments that seek to break down his influence by slander.

If I remember the man Braden, while he resided here he was a crankish dead beat. Not able to earn an honest living, he became an itinerant preacher, and in order to impose on the public got up a book made up of forged affidavits and pretended statements of reputable citizens, and is selling it throughout the country. Several years ago he went through Texas and other Southern States, preaching and selling his book. He carefully keeps away from where he is known and where Colonel Ingersoll is known, as he knows his words would be taken for naught, and he would not be able to sell his infamous book and dead-beat on the people.

I understand my name figures in his book as making absurd and false statements in regard to Colonel Ingersoll. If anything of the kind appears in the book it is false and forged.

This Braden is either a great rascal or demented, and ought to be in the penitentiary, or insane asylum, according to the condition of his intellect, if he has any. Respectfully yours,

S. D. PUTERBAUGH.

ON THE TRAIL.

After a week's work with the hearts and heads at Empire City, I traveled by stage to Newport, the place where all the Coos Bay coal comes from that is sold in California. Newport is situated in a deep canyon, and connected by a coal railroad—the only railroad in the county—with the waters of Coos Bay. It is entirely a mining town, of perhaps 300 population, of very mixed origin, fully two-thirds being foreigners. I found many of them intelligent, but all crushed by the giant hand of corporation, working only part of the time, and then for paltry wages. The railroad runs underground, perhaps a half mile, to the mines, then out on a very high trestle into the bay, where the cars are unloaded into a large house or chute. Here several large steamers are often seen loading for San Francisco. It is but a few hours' work to load the largest vessel from these coal-bins built so high in the air. They nearly load themselves when the gate is once raised. The coal here is worth about two dollars a ton, but with millions of cords of wood all around going to waste, coal finds but little sale; hence it is shipped south.

I gave one lecture here to a good audience, but as the school-house was the only lecture-room, and school was in session, I could not conveniently stay longer. One night while at Newport, just as we all had retired for the night, and everything was quiet on the Potomac—I was stopping at Mother Corrigan's boarding house—we heard ringing out clear and strong on the midnight air, the ominous call of, "Help! help! Murder, murder!" which created a terrible excitement, as the double murder at Coquille, near here, had taken place but a few days before. Everybody ran in the dark, mostly in their night-clothes, expecting another foul and hideous crime had been perpetrated. The sound came from a shanty where a man lived alone. It was found that he was dead drunk, with "snakes in his boots," and imagined he was being killed by some unseen foe, which is pretty near the truth. All went back to their deserted beds, hoping "the snakes" might make a good job of it, which I suspect they did, from the noise the rest of the night.

A short stop at Marshfield and Empire to say good-bye to the splendid folks we made friends with, there, and thus to bid farewell to Coos county, where I had labored continuously for three months; then a twenty-mile ride north by the sounding breakers and along the sands of the sea, in an over-loaded stage-coach, was the lot of ye humble correspondent. My fellow-travelers were a "show troupe" that had showed every night for a week, and traveled every day, so they were wrapped in slumber as we jolted easily along o'er the shiny sands. At the mouth of Umpqua river, tired with our land-ride, and chilled nearly to death with the cold fogs and wind from the ocean, we left the old wagon, with tires six inches wide, and clambered into a skiff, and were "paddled" out to the steamer in the river that soon carried us up among the hills again, to Gardiner's in Douglass county, where, after a good dinner, I was soon booked for a lecture in the little white church around the corner, and was greeted by a full house. The next day being the Lord's day, I was making myself comfortable out on the piazza of the hotel, dreaming of "what might have been," if God had never taken that big butcher knife (wonder where he got it, as that was before the age of metals) and carved out the rib from Adam, when one of the trustees came and informed me that I could not have the church longer for lectures; that the ladies were terribly shocked at my awful pictures. Why, their dear little church was desecrated or vaccinated, I hardly know which, by such sacrilege. I offered to take them down, but no, I could not have the church another damn bit. I pointed to a man about twenty feet away lying dead drunk under the shade of a protecting tree, and three saloons open Sunday in full blast, and asked him if he did not think they needed my lectures for a higher, more moral and temperance life, and my pictures to illustrate it, to make the town what its religion had evidently failed to do. He said he should think so, but the women were running the church, so I had to "mosey." I could have had the hall or the school-house, but concluded to let the ladies and their great big God run the town, so I sailed away for a more open bay, up the Umpqua to Scottsbluff thence by buckboard to Drain's, and the railroad, where, once more the "keers" were a welcome sight. I found Mr. Putnam aboard enjoying all the "Glories of Infidelity," as it was midnight's solemn hour, and Put. was snoring the notes of the righteous right royally. The next morning, as we neared Salem, our long train of thirteen cars ran over a poor old man, seventy years old, going into town with an old horse and wagon loaded with plums. A shriek from the engine, a crash, a chill of horror ran through the passengers, for no one knew what had happened. The train quickly came to a stand still, and we all rushed out. A wagon in kindling-wood, a horse dying in mortal agony; the old man lying a hundred feet from where the train struck him, with two terrible gashes in his head, asking what the matter was; plums scattered for rods around; blood of both man and beast everywhere, filled out the sad picture, and called for the strongest sympathy of the hundreds of passengers. The poor victim's head was soon washed and sewed up by a physician who was on the train; the old man carried into a house near by, and again we rolled on for Portland. Such is life in this fast age of steam and lightning.

WHY THE CHINESE REMAIN PAGANS.

Wong Chin Foo, an Americanized native of China, contributes the following to the press:

Lieutenant Wood, U. S. N., nearly hit the mark when he said that Christian missions in China are "a failure," but he did not give the reasons of that failure. In one respect the Christian teachers in China have been a great benefit to the commerce of their fellow-citizens at home, by showing the "heathens" how to live in style, and how to employ "Christian" methods to obtain modern luxuries, and by sowing discontent among the masses generally. If they could only "convert" the emperor of China, as they have the mikado of Japan, they would probably lend him enough money on his property to own a portion of the throne.

Already the consumption of American petroleum has greatly reduced the profits of the bean-oil manufacturers of northern China nearly 25 per cent. within the past few years. American cotton goods produced by their labor-saving machines are fast supplanting the native hand-loom, and firearms are taking the place of the primitive bows and arrows. These results are principally brought about by the talented missionaries who have learned the native tongue. Otherwise, the English-speaking traders would have had a hard time in introducing their wares, no matter how useful. But spiritually their mission is undoubtedly a grand failure, and here are some of the reasons as seen from a Chinese point of view.

First—The Christians have not been able to give the Chinese anything new in the vital principles of their teachings, save in some few unimportant points of the main doctrine which cannot be understood by the Chinese.

Second—The manners and ways of the missionaries as a rule are looked upon as extraordinary at all times. They lack the austerity and dignity that become a solid Chinese sage. Such qualities are imperatively necessary in China for a propagandist. For this reason the Catholic priests are making more headway there than those of any other sect, and also because the priests are all wifeless.

Third—The majority of the missionaries attack or hold in ridicule the doctrines of Confucius and Buddha, which form the pet religions of the people.

Fourth—Their strong patriotism at home causing their teachings of religion to be blended with social and political reforms abroad, they try to make Chinamen become Americans, and act and think like one of themselves. One of these social ideas with which they try to imbue the inmates of the mission schools under their charge is that when a youth becomes of age, twenty-one years old, he is his own master, meaning that he is no longer under the control of his parents. Notwithstanding, this is a direct violation of their teachings, that "thou shalt honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord giveth thee," and yet this is the very doctrine which is alone practiced in China for thousands of years to the very letter by all classes, and the missionaries tried to make them break it by a social peculiarity of their own. This idea of American juvenile independence alone is enough to prevent their doctrine from taking root in well-regulated Chinese families, where the family ties are so sacred that no matter how old a son may be, he is yet the son of his parents and must serve under them.

Fifth—The only new idea that the missionaries can present to the Chinamen, spiritually, is the vicarious atonement of Jesus Christ, or the cruel torture of the son of God for the sins of men, which doctrine the Chinamen believe was manufactured by a Yankeeized Jew. A heathen who has been there before,

THE PRIZE MANUAL ASSURED!

To the Editors of Freethought:

I am proud to be able to announce that the full sum of $1,000 (as a premium for the best paper on "How to Teach Morality in Girard College and the Public Schools without Teaching Religious Dogma") has been paid into my hands and is now in bank—in trust, for the object contemplated. The offer of this prize, with full conditions, will be made public, with the names of the donors, about Sept. 15, or sooner if practicable.

Now, I wish that a few others of our friends would send me $500 to pay the expenses of printing circulars and advertising, and for the services of a stenographer and type-writer, to get the matter before the world—at least before American, English, and French writers and educators. I have already many letters of inquiry from persons who propose to compete for this prize, not only for the sake of the money, but for their love of the cause. The correspondence growing out of this project must be very large. Friends, please send me $500 more, in such sums as you think proper, and you shall be numbered with the elect, whose names are sure to go down to posterity as promoters of this great object.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and under stand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

The Unknown Great.

Full many a column rises high
To tell the conqueror's blood-bought fame,
And many a dome smiles 'gainst the sky
To guard an emperor's waning name.

Statesman and hero, priest and sage,
Abide awhile in tale or song,
As weary age succeeds to age,
And right still fiercely strives with wrong.

And many a lord of serf and thrall,
Favored by half-forgotten kings,
Is hurled from fame's proud pedestal,
When time its riper wisdom brings.

While those who bravely strive for right
Are still recalled with love and pride;
And still we hear, with fond delight,
The tale of how they lived and died.

Yet not to-day our song shall tell
Of earth's true leaders; for awhile
A humble strain our tongues shall swell
To those they led—the rank and file.

The unknown great—great in their aim,
Great in their noble hope and faith—
Who, with no dream of place or fame,
Were true, ay, even to the death.

Vain were the leader's call to arms
Did not the people heed the cry
And dauntlessly, despite alarms,
Flock round the banner raised on high.

And not alone of those we sing
Who boldly strove in battle strife,
But unto all who sought to bring
More freedom to the people's life.

Who 'gainst foul superstitions spoke,
Who dared the prison and the rack,
Who struggled 'gainst whatever yoke
Kept men from higher progress back.

Those too, we praise, of whate'er creed,
Who helped the fallen on their way;
Who strove to aid the world's sore need,
And spoke of hope when skies were gray.

To-day we sing a faltering strain,
Recalling these—earth's unknown great;
But threatened is the rulers' reign—
The coming years are big with fate.

Haply, when Mammon's bitter sway
No more shall curb earth's fuller hope,
When the glad light of freedom's day
Succeeds the mirk in which we grope,

To heaven shall rise a radiant shrine,
The glory of the years to be—
Glad years, when none through want shall pine
Nor dudge in hopeless misery.

And through that temple, fair with flowers,
Shall sound a sweet memorial song
To those who strove 'gainst kings and powers,
Nor doubted, tho' the strife was long.

It is not all a poet's dream;
Nobler, we trust, will grow the state,
And on that fame shall brightly gleam
The inscription: "To the Unknown Great!"
—LEONARD WELLS, in Reynold's Weekly.

A ONCE superstitious Albanian, who consulted a "dream book" for every dream he had for a period of fifteen years, says that if they had all been verified, according to the book, he would have met with six violent deaths, married eleven blonde-haired and six dark-haired girls, inherited nine fortunes and made fourteen trips to foreign lands. He is still living, an old bachelor, has never been more than ten miles from the town in which he was born, and hasn't got a shilling laid up.

"A REMARKABLE BOOK," SAYS DR. EADON, of Edinburgh, Scotland: "a graduate of three universities, and retired after 50 years' practice, he writes: 'The work is priceless in value, and calculated to regenerate society. It is new, startling, and very instructive.' It is the most popular and comprehensive book treating of

MEDICAL, SOCIAL, AND SEXUAL SCIENCE.

Proven by the sale of half a million to be the most popular, readable because written in language plain, chaste, and forcible. Instructive, practical presentation of "Medical Common Sense" made valuable to invalids, showing new means by which they may be cured. Approved by editors, physicians, clergymen, critics, and literati. Thorough treatment of subjects especially important to young men. Everyone who "wants to know, you know," will find it interesting.

4 Parts, 36 Chapters, 936 Pages, 200 Illustrations, and

A NEW FEATURE. Just introduced, consists of a series of beautiful colored anatomical charts, in five colors, guaranteed superior to any before offered in a popular physiological book, and rendering it again the most attractive and quick-selling.

Maginnis's Confession.

Patrick Maginnis went to confession, and, among other sins, confessed to the good father that he had stolen Mrs. Mulcahy's pig, the loss of which had been a great blow to the poor woman. The priest looked at Pat very severely and said:

"Stole Mrs. Mulcahy's pig, did ye? That's very bad, Patrick—very bad. Don't you know, Pat, that to steal a pig is a haynious sin, and to steal Mrs. Mulcahy's pig is worse? What will ye say on the day of judgment when Mrs. Mulcahy confronts ye before the Lord and charges ye with stealin' her pig—what will ye say?"

Pat looked rather glum at this onslaught, but at this point he perked up and said:

"Sure, your riverince, Mrs. Mulcahy won't be there."

"Indade; and why not, Pat Maginnis? Mrs. Mulcahy will be there an' the pig'll be there, an' when yer asked why ye stole the widdy's pig what'll ye say, I'm wantin' to know?"

"Will Mrs. Mulcahy be there?" asked Pat, a great idea illuminating his face.

"She will," said the priest severely.

"And will the pig be there?"

"Certainly."

"Then, begorra," said Pat, triumphantly, "I'll say: 'Mrs. Mulcahy, there's your pig!'"

A REGULAR EDUCATED AND LEGALLY QUALIFIED PHYSICIAN, and the most successful (in his specialty) as his practice will surely prove. A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1888.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: The remedy you sent is working like a charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. Have only been using it one week and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right. Yours respectfully, J. R.

REMARKS—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle-aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, but who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out-and-out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors. DR. FELLOWS.

The Present and the Future

Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

NEWS AND NOTES.

My friend W. B. Davis devotes himself to the campaign at John Day town, and Canyon City, and I am not left to travel alone, nor by the "slow coach." The good team of greys is harnessed for the occasion and we journey according to our own sweet will, on the winding road from Prairie to John Day. When the refreshing rains are come, no more beautiful prospects could spread before the eye than in this valley, where the mountains in vast variety, on every side, stretch away, and the fields and meadows between shine with green and golden garniture, mingled with river and wood. Just now, however, the smoke rolls over the heights and the dust is almost impenetrable as the winds blow it along the highway. About the middle of the afternoon we get to John Day, and in the comfortable hotel of friend Cobb we clean up and rest until the supper bell rings. There are some few Liberals in John Day—Shelley, Knight, Combs, etc.—who keep this remote station in the line of reform. L. T. Eddington was present from Mt. Vernon, fifteen miles away. He is seventy-nine years of age. He was bound to come to the lecture, and traveled over thirty miles to do it, which is more than many a younger soldier would undertake. It was a pleasure to shake hands with our veteran comrade and to feel the thrill of youth in his untiring spirit of loyalty. I did not have a full house at John Day, but enough to insure progress for the future. It is not a large place, a kind of a "four corners" where travel from various points converges and teams are wont to sojourn for feed, etc. A little village has sprung up on this frontier line which some day may assume quite large proportions, for the wealth of the country about is by no means exhausted.

Saturday afternoon we go over to Canyon City. Our faithful comrade at this point is John Smith, who does almost all the work, and prepares the way, so far as it is possible to do so in such a peculiar place as Canyon City, which seems to live upon the traditions of "forty-nine" and clings to the old prices and "two-bits" a drink, with fond reminiscence. Canyon was once a famous mining camp, and I guess more gold has been taken out to the acre here than from any other place on the continent, and still there is gold left, enough for many a fortune if the machinery were here to extract it from the "tailings" that lie scattered about in infinite confusion and desolation. The immense rush has passed by long ago, and but little is now carried on, as the old methods will not secure any paying results. The future of Canyon City is not near so bright as its past. It is the county seat, and has some wealth and but little enterprise. Its prospects are altogether uncertain. It is in a narrow valley between high peaks, and the scenery about is bare and rocky. It is located at the extreme verge of civilization. When you pass through its one long street, and reach the end you can go no further. You must turn back. The pathless wilderness of volcanic wastes is before you. It is court time when I arrive and there is quite a lively aspect. I meet friends from many points. The lecture is given in the court house. The attendance is not very large. I am introduced by deputy-sheriff Mr. McCulloch, who is not afraid of his colors. Something is done by the lecture, for the audience is attentive, but I feel that there is a vast amount of indifference in this community. The churches certainly do not flourish. They have very scant power, and perhaps this is the cause of the apparent apathy of those who don't believe in the popular theology. They think there is nothing to fear, and don't care to put themselves out much for Liberal work. There is undoubtedly a sturdy element of Freethought which would manifest itself if a direct issue were forced, but at present, in the "struggle for existence," that which is universal and simply humanitarian is forgotten. However, while I did not accomplish all I desired at Canyon City, I was pleased to meet with some good friends, and to realize that even at this last outpost, on the border-land of humanity and nature, there is the pulse of freedom, and the generous heart. With such allies as John Smith, and others who do their level best, while so many are indifferent, there is hope and always a look ahead.

Sunday morning Davis and myself return to Prairie City for a lecture in the afternoon. I call upon Mrs. H. A. Thompson, whose husband was one of the foremost in our ranks two years ago, when I was here. He died about a year ago. He was an unswerving Liberal and his record is honorable as friend, neighbor, and citizen. His death is a severe loss to the Liberals of this country. He was always ready to do his share. Freethought to him was a conviction, a noble ideal of life. The flowers of sweet memory are his, and the glory of his virtue is immortal with the advancement of man. His wife and children rejoice in his own noble belief, and home is beautiful with the remembrance of his generous toil.

Julius Le Bret has also died since I was here, a soldier in our cause, upon whose grave shall fall the flowers of love and hope. "Tears for the dead, help for the living," are the words of Ingersoll. Our ranks grow thin, but still the morning comes and the music of childhood breaks upon the tomb and it becomes a monument to virtue and an impulse to nobler deeds.

Major Magone is traveling on towards a hundred years, but the spirit of youth is in him still. He presided at the afternoon lecture. He made the opening address and closed with the following, which shows that he looks forward and not backward:

"I live for those who love me,
For those who know me true;
For the heaven that smiles above me,
And awaits my spirit too;
For the wrong that needs resistance,
For the cause that lacks assistance,
For the future in the distance,
And the good that I can do."

Prairie City always gives a warm welcome, and the Sunday afternoon audience was of that kind which makes hope and good cheer for the laborer, and I leave this bright camping-ground, in the heart of the hills, with a better outlook for to-morrow's journey. Sam French is in our ranks still, a splendid pioneer, and it is one of the luxuries of life to take a drive behind his magnificent steeds. There is no orthodoxy in the horse-flesh which he raises, but the swift forces of Freethought that will not lag in the rear. I was also pleased to meet with M. Howell, who places himself upon the roll of Freethought; Dr. Pruden, who has just located in town, an earnest social and scientific reformer; E. R. Driver, who, with his seven brothers, is in the Liberal corps, and so, by a majority vote, "Driver" is no longer orthodox; Schuman, who is not afraid to stand in the door of the wicked unbeliever's tent; Thompson, who can keep the baby from crying and take in the Liberal lecture likewise; Geo. W. McHaley, F. W. McCord, and many others of Prairie City and vicinity, whose good fellowship gives refreshment along the dusty way.

I miss the stage for Canyon City. It comes along just as I am beginning the lecture. There is no help for it, and I have to let it go by and trust to chances for getting to my appointment at Canyon City in the evening. "Mine landlord," J. W. Bates, is the one to put me through when the time comes. He is a Freethinker from head to foot, and always ready to stand by when money or help is needed. He takes me to Canyon City with his own team, which covers the distance in less than two hours. It is almost as good as going with a locomotive. I reckon this is about the best span of horses in the county. They came from Sam French's ranch, and their pedigree is good. Gurney, the "schoolmaster abroad," was with us—a keen dialectician—and, fortunately, also H. B. Nicholas, of Portland, one of our Freethought workers in that city, and the swift journey is one of pleasant companionship, and "hope" and "luck" mingle in the warp and woof of life. But what is hope and what is luck even the schoolmaster cannot always decide. We "hope" for a safe journey, and "good luck" brings us to the goal.

The stages start early in this country, for they have long miles to traverse. I get up at half past three Monday morning, and at a little after four am on my way via John Day town, over the big hills, to Fox Valley. It takes six miles of winding travel to reach the top of the range. On every side are indications of vast volcanic eruptions, but more than six thousand years must have passed away since that tumultuous and fiery period. It was a peculiar and wonderful view that spread before me in the dusk of dawn. The sun was not yet up, but its coming beams made a luminous gloom in the far valley below. I could just discern the houses, the trees, and the course of the river. On all sides the mountains towered and seemed to inclose the little city from the world. It was so silent that one might imagine that this were a buried city and that the hills were giant sentinels in black robes, to keep off the profane intruder. It looked like a tomb—that mighty abyss amidst the lava peaks. Up we climb and the light increases, and the dark red smoke leaps to flames, and the heights take on the dazzling flush of day, and soon we are in the midst of the gorgeous dawn itself, while the valley sinks away into purple shadows. Over the topmost ridge we plunge again into darkling forests and gullies, and somewhere towards noon strike into the broad extending fields and sand hills of Fox Valley. This valley is about ten miles long and eight miles wide. At present there is no village in it—no store, or saloon, or steeple, or even blacksmith shop. The post-office is a lone building about a mile off the road. As the postmaster has about fourteen children the only lodging-place for the Secular pilgrim would be the hayrick. However, the Liberal bishop of this diocese don't allow me to be stranded thusly. O. P. Platter is on hand, and before the dinner hour I am at his domicile, four miles from the post-office. Here I am laid up for a twenty-four hour's rest, for there is no lecture on Monday evening, and I don't object to the program. I am at home in this little cabin on the frontier, and, free from dust and care, I can look forth upon primitive nature; the beautiful encircling hills, the undulating bosom of the valley golden with harvest fields and dotted with prosperous homes. About eighty families are in here now, and all seem to be doing well. The Christians and the Liberals don't quarrel much about creeds. The school-house is called the church. Religious services are held there, and my lecture was advertised to be given in the "church in Fox Valley." The days are delightful here, provided one can sit still and keep out of the dust. The weather is cool, the water freezing at night. The sunshine in the middle of the day is just warm enough to be comfortable and not oppressive. The sky is deep blue and flecked with shining clouds. There is no monotony in the view. The broad sky bends above the broad valley. Earth and heaven mingle in splendid peacefulness. I let the stream of life flow on, with drowsy contemplation. I have a chance to study civilization in its original elements. I am in the midst of genuine pioneer associations where the waves of progress beat upon savage solitudes.

Mr. and Mrs. Platter are old residents of Oregon and Washington, and have experienced the changing fortunes of a new country. Thirty-three years ago Mr. Platter was fighting the Indians on White River, Washington. He was among the first to locate near Olympia. Thirty-one years ago he went by canoe from Olympia along the Sound to Frazier's River during the immense gold excitement. Afterwards he traveled into the Walla Walla country, near Dayton, and from thence to Fox Valley, about three years since, where Uncle Sam's domain had not yet been fully taken up. At present, however, no valuable lands are left.

Apparently there was not much Freethought in the valley when Mr. Platter first came. The Christians were somewhat shy, and afraid of the Infidel. The feeling, however, is passing away, and Liberalism is beginning to be recognized as an intellectual and moral movement. Our friends have pursued the even tenor of their way and the evolution of time has vindicated the value "of deed and not creed."

The lecture was given on Tuesday evening, and the "little church" was crowded to its utmost capacity. Many of the Christians promised to come, and they did come. Also there are quite a number of Liberals in the valley, and all these were present. Both sides were well represented. It was a meeting that gave good indication of popular interest and advancement, and is a favorable opening for greater results in the future. Along with Mr. and Mrs. Platter I find a noble company of friends here who have come to stay; who are builders of the new civilization, not only on the breast of earth but in the living fields of humanity.

Over twenty names joined the State Union, and this shows great progress during the last two years. If I had come here two years ago I hardly think a corporal's guard would have attended the lecture.

John Born, B. M. Burton, W. O. Gentry, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Short, of Mt. Vernon; C. E. Lyon, L. W. Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Wainscott, J. D. Hanna, A. R. Cobbs, N. Born, Anna M. Born, Chas. Born, W. H. Shank, Chas. Wood, Robert Kincaid, and others, are on the roll with the thousand names which now represent the Oregon State Secular Union.

I had quite an experience at Long Creek. The Christians at that place had the "dog in the manger" fit on with a vengeance, and were not going to allow the Infidel any chance at all. They had built a church, by popular subscription, which was to be for the benefit of all, yet, being under the control of the Methodist church, its pious directors would not allow Freethought the use of the building although Freethinkers had contributed liberally to its fund. But these had no rights that the church was bound to respect. It was against its principles to permit a Secular lecture within its walls, but I understand that, under the sanction of the clergyman, it had been used to furnish a supper for a dancing party, and that the clergyman pocketed the proceeds of the said supper, said supper consisting in the main of stolen chickens, to which the clergyman himself lent a hand, and unto this day the supper is named the "bob-tailed chicken supper" by the irreverent, for the stolen poultry was bob-tailed for the express purpose of preventing theft. When the clergyman, in his anxiety for a good supper for the profane dancers, laid hold of a "bobtail" he was told by his churchly coadjutor to "chuck it in, it's all the same." Nevertheless they had to pay for the chickens afterwards or take the consequences. Such was the religious material that refused the building for a Freethought lecture. It was altogether too sacred for that, but not too sacred for a "bob-tail flush." The same element also had control of the school-house, and refused the use of that. The proprietor of the only hall in the place was a member of this pious fraternity and would not rent his hall. They expected to shut us out altogether, and on Tuesday evening word was sent from Long Creek for me not to come over, for there was no place for a lecture to be given. This, of course, aroused our indignation, and it was determined that I should go and that a lecture would be given in spite of the Christian tactics.

I was on the sick list Wednesday morning and if it hadn't been as it was I should have remained in bed. I was in bed until noon. Maxwell Ramsby, of Haystack, found me on my back. He was going to Canyon City on court business, but expected to return for the lectures. He was formerly of the Molalla country and was one of the first Infidels of the coast; crossed the plains in 1846 and brought Paine's works with him, and I guess that his was the first copy of Paine's works that reached this new country. Ever since then he has stood by the colors. It was a pleasure to meet this gray veteran of the primeval forest and plain.

Friend Platter had a big lumber wagon, and he forthwith fixed me up a palace car accommodation, and I took up my bed—but I got ahead of the scriptural fellow. I didn't "walk," I rode. It was as comfortable as could be, and the jolting of the wagon over the mountain road cradled me to slumber and enabled me to take the dust with dreamy quietude, so that by the time Long Creek heaved in view in the midst of a wild, uneven valley, with its church on an eminence something after the New England style, I began to feel better. I have an idea that the dust of this country is healthful if taken in sufficient quantities. Like all medicines, "when taken to be well shaken," I myself was well shaken and the dust was too, and, taking it all round, the shaking effected a cure. Or was it a "faith-cure?" I arose from my bed, took the front seat, and was in excellent trim when we arrived in front of the hotel at Long Creek.

Charlie Sweek, of Hamilton, is one of the indomitable kind, and like the sturdy father of all the Beechers, "When he gets ready to let go, then he holds on." He will snatch victory out of defeat. With the church, school-house, and hall shut against us, he arranged with A. Blackman, the "village blacksmith," who believes in the "Rights of Man," to hold our meeting in the upper part of his dwelling, occasionally used for dancing purposes. Lumber was procured, seats were made ready for the occasion, and by evening everything was in full blast for a successful Freethought lecture. They all came out and the room was overflowing. The Fox Valley people sent a good delegation—Lewis Lyons, Wainscott, etc., besides Mr. and Mrs. Platter. The Christians were entirely defeated. When, in the course of my lecture, I said that I had not the slightest objection to the Christian taking his aerial journey, but that I wanted him to buy his own ticket, the lady in front of me, an earnest Christian, who held the keys of the church, and who had charge of the stage-line, couldn't help bursting out, "Well, he'll have to pay his stage fare when he leaves Long Creek." How she did revel in the idea of making me pay fare, and especially for excess of baggage on about five hundred pounds of Freethought literature. What a sweet revenge. But it didn't come. My transportation was via Freethought lines, from Long Creek, and her purse was not made the richer by my stage fare, nor three cents per pound on Freethought books. Even the satisfaction of "cinching" me was denied the saints. I escaped all their clutches.

Long Creek is one of the most unfavorable places along the road, but there are a few who stand gloriously by the flag. Mine host Waterbury, of the hotel, is as full of Freethought as a grape is of juice, and it has to come forth whether he wants it or not. He must express himself. He is generous too, and did his share toward the expenses of the lecture, besides giving me entertainment.

Ed. C. Allen, the leading merchant of the place, and who has done more than anybody else to build up Long Creek, is a splendid ally indeed. He is our mainstay at Long Creek, and one such good friend is an offset against all the difficulties which the Christians can furnish. I enjoyed the campaign at Long Creek. It cured me of all the ills that flesh is heir to, and on the following day I left it as well as ever. All the threatening aspects of the day before had vanished like a cloud in summer sky.

I had a couple of days' rest before me, and these I intended to spend in the delicious solitude of Platter's ranch, where I had all that heart could wish, of books, friendship, talk, etc.; where the shining sky is blended with the shining earth.

On our way home we met Joseph Putnam, of Monument, who is arranging for the lectures there, and he consented to turn back and take dinner with us, and I was glad to shake hands with such an enthusiastic worker in the cause. They are going to have a good time at Monument, and "trip the light fantastic toe," and make melody along with the march of human progress. Alas! as Burns says:

"The best laid plans of mice and men Of gang alee."

We had planned Friday to have a good time among ourselves in Fox Valley, and on Saturday and Sunday go over to Hamilton. But who should put in an appearance, Friday, almost before daylight, but the deputy sheriff, who had a summons for Platter to serve on the jury at Canyon City, nearly thirty miles off, and he must be on hand Friday at one P. M. That spoiled all the fun. But there's no resisting the law, and our friend must go. He started on "Jacky," and I don't think "Jacky" liked the trip any better than we did, but he went that thirty miles in about four hours. Mrs. Platter and myself went over to Wainscott's, and here we had a jolly time, children and all. Mrs. Wainscott is of Silverton, of the family of Jack, near Butte Creek. Wainscott used to work with our Freethinking friend Kline, of Silverton, so Silverton and Fox Valley, though separated by many a league, can give greeting. Mr. and Mrs. Short were to be with us, but were obliged to drive to Mt. Vernon that day. Mr. Lyons joined the company, and the children, Agnes, Delia, and Ralph, went in for a big romp, and declared emphatically that they did not believe that Jonah swallowed the whale, and they were also in sympathy with the little boy who wanted "once in awhile to go down to hell and play with the little devils." The shadows of superstition did not disturb us at all, and the bright afternoon flowed on to golden evening.

In the middle of the night, Friday, as I rolled over to take a fresh sleep, I heard a weird voice at the corner of the house crying, "On for Hamilton." It was Platter's. He had just got back from Canyon. They didn't want him on the jury. It was a most cold-blooded murder case. There was no defense. Mr. Platter was asked if he objected to the insanity-dodge. He said that he did. The council for the defense instantly excused him. That is the way they make up juries in this county. The very atrocity of the murder, I suppose, gives an excuse for the insanity plea. Two years ago only a jury of cow-boys could be impaneled to try a murder case. It was a most outrageous, wilful killing, and yet the perpetrator was acquitted. No wonder that lynch-law is resorted to when justice so miscarries.

Well, we were all rejoiced that Platter had got back, and now to-day, Saturday—a day of soft, warm sunshine, sweet gales, and bright, blue sky, and earth luminous—we are going out of this shining valley to new scenes, and if all is as good as my experience here, I shall not regret that I have taken my chances in this far country, where the locomotive whistles a hundred miles away. If I am caught in a storm, there is no knowing when I will get out. I might have to stay all winter. There has been a foot and a half of snow here by September 1, some years. So far, fair weather holds the fort, and I hope it will until I am safe in Arlington. If I am lost I shall be found somewhere between Fox and Arlington, covered with dust or shrouded with snow.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

NOW FOR PORTLAND.

Old residents inform us that the programme offered by the Oregon Secular Union's Convention at Portland, October 12, 13, and 14, will be the best ever afforded a Portland audience. In the morning of Saturday, at 9 o'clock, a celebrated band will render its best selections while the audience is being seated. At 10 o'clock the orchestra will lead the audience in singing "America," "A Thousand Years, My Own Columbia," and other patriotic songs. Miss Mattie Blaisdell will then present to the Convention a beautiful and costly banner with appropriate address and reply. After music by a select choir, Mrs. Krekel, of Kansas City, will deliver the opening address.

The following eminent speakers will address the Convention: Elder Alonzo T. Jones, an orator delegated by the North Pacific Conference of Seventh-day Adventists; Rev. Dr. Bloch, a Jewish rabbi; Ada Ballou, Prof. Geo. H. Dawes, C. B. Reynolds, Dr. J. L. York, Hon. P. O. Chilstrom, W. S. Bell, and S. P. Putnam. Mrs. Seip will give some choice recitations. Professor Seymour has consented to open the Conference Monday morning. Other speakers have been invited. On Monday evening there will be an immense sociable and ball under the management of Mrs. Carrie E. Haight, of East Portland, and her band of lady assistants. The orchestra of six professors will furnish the music. Ladies will be admitted free, gentlemen one dollar, and a superb lunch furnished free by the ladies.

This Convention, too, comes in the middle of the great fair, and visitors will be entitled to reduced rates on the railroads and rivers.

This is about the last call that will be of avail to the Convention. It is addressed to each and every person who can possibly attend the meeting, and urges them all to do so. Also talk the matter up and get recruits. Those who cannot attend may show their desire to co-operate by sending financial support to C. Beal, President O. S. S. U., Portland, Or.

THE SAN FRANCISCO FREETHOUGHT SOCIETY.

The next meeting of the San Francisco Freethought Society will be held at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, Sunday evening, September 29, at 8 o'clock. Mr. Anderson will speak on "Humanity's Needs."

A story comes from Baltimore to the effect that Dr. Samuel Garner, professor of languages at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, who several years ago was a confirmed Infidel, has lately been brought to see the error of his way, and is now a Christian. His conversion came about through intercourse with a minister in the "far West," whither he had fled to bury in forgetfulness the memory of a young Christian woman who refused to marry him as an Infidel. After his second birth Dr. Garner corresponded with the young lady, with the result that he returned to Baltimore and married her. The story reads well and makes a good romance, but we do not believe there is any truth in it.

INGERSOLL's definition of morality is this: "That which increases the sum of human happiness is moral; that which diminishes the sum of human happiness is immoral." Now the question is, do Colonel Ingersoll's teachings increase or diminish the sum of human happiness? Are they moral or immoral?—Lead City Tribune.

We should say that the teachings of Ingersoll do increase the sum of human happiness. Nothing he ever wrote can make any person unhappy except a minister.

THE Nationalist Society of San Francisco appears to be in a way to achieve success as an organization. One hundred people are reported to have been turned away from its meeting in the Palace Hotel last Saturday evening, for want of room.

ANOTHER Christ is reported. Frederick Gray was arrested in Berkeley last Sunday and taken to the county jail as insane. He imagines that he is the messiah and spent the day in the county jail preaching to the prisoners.

THE Sunday crusade in the southern part of the state is actually doing good, chiefly by the opposition it has awakened, but also in letting the people see just what the Sabbatarians are after. Under the latter head comes the confession of W. F. Wheeler in the Los Angeles Tribune, that "when Sunday rest to all classes of society becomes the law of the land, then many discouragements and hindrances against the growth of the Christian church will disappear." Certainly; and those "discouragements and hindrances" that happened to be in the form of Freethinkers would "disappear" behind prison bars. That is what the Sabbatarians are praying for.

THIS paragraph occurs in the National Reformer, Charles Bradlaugh's paper:

"The strike of the printers' laborers promises to be successful. They struck for 20s. a week, and 6d. overtime. Several leading firms have agreed to the demand, and the men are returning to work under the new rates. A Union is being formed, and members are joining rapidly."

Wages must be low when men have to strike to get five dollars a week.

THE Rev. James Woolford and Isaac VanSickle, trustees of the United Brethren's College at Hartsville, Ind., are an unscrupulous pair of rascals. During the absence of Charles Snyder they visited his insane wife, locking themselves in a room with her and remaining there until they had induced her to give them a $20,000 check for the benefit of their college. Snyder has begun suit in the courts of Columbus to recover the amount.

OBSERVATIONS.

"Alastor," the able writer whose original and adapted articles form so attractive a feature of the Toronto Secular Thought, has paid FREETHOUGHT the compliment of copying the larger part of an editorial that appeared in this paper three weeks ago. Mr. E. C. Walker has also shown his appreciation of the same article by reprinting it entire in Fair Play. I am none the less flattered by this tribute because the matter copied was from my pen and is by "Alastor" credited to my noble coadjutor, Mr. Putnam. I judge that it is a pleasing event in the career of all young authors when they accomplish a thing sufficiently "remarkable," "timely," and "weighty" to be mistaken for the work of somebody else.

B. F. Underwood lectured last Sunday evening before the Freethought Society in Union Square Hall. In making arrangements for this lecture Mr. Underwood, to avoid giving me any trouble about it, corresponded with other parties. The other parties sought my advice and counsel, and finally left the matter with me altogether. I sent notices to the papers, caused dodgers to be distributed on the streets, executed large posters to place in front of the hall, advertised in the Sunday journals, and secured a gentleman of age, dignity, and ability to preside. It was therefore quite gratifying to me, when I reached Union Square Hall on the evening of Sunday, to find an audience of fully three hundred assembled there. Some had come in from out of town, Mr. Philip Cowen, of Petaluma, and Mr. T. L. Grigsby, of Napa, among others.

Professor Joran gave an improvisation on the piano, which he brought to a graceful close as the Hon. F. B. Perkins took the platform to introduce the speaker.

Mr. Underwood was received with applause. He spoke upon "The Evolution of Religion," referring first to evolution in its other aspects—organic evolution, the evolution of language, and social evolution. Theologians admit the presence of evolution in these departments, but hold to a different dispensation in matters of theology. To be consistent, however, they must apply the same process in all cases, including religion. Christianity is a natural modification of pre-existing religions, all of which have a genetic kinship, as Mr. Underwood remarked.

The discourse lasted for an hour and a half. Mr. Underwood is a pleasing speaker and engages the mind with profitable reflection, while the ear and eye are attracted by his fine rhetoric and graceful delivery. He has a substantial appearance, with his broad shoulders, rotund form, and intellectual countenance. He has less hair than many smaller men, but his juvenile moustache preserves in him a suggestion of youthfulness. Mr. Underwood called several times at this office, renewed his subscription, and had a smoke with me, he using a cigar which he had brought with him, while I lit a pipe I had often used before. He reports a wide circulation of FREETHOUGHT in the localities he has visited, and that the Liberals feel a just pride in their Pacific coast paper. From here he goes to Tulare county, and will lecture at Lemoore, Hanford, and Tulare.

On Sunday afternoon Mr. Underwood spoke in Oakland. I was unable to attend, and Mr. Schou has not reported the occasion, but I learn from other sources that though the attendance was small the audience was attentive and intelligent, and everything passed off enjoyably. Mr. Underwood will always be warmly welcomed whenever he can return to this vicinity.

A subscriber in National City has offered a prize of two-bits for the best metrical composition on the "railroad section boss." He says he is surprised that the subject has been so long neglected, and in the hope of atoning in some measure for the injustice done he offers the above tempting reward. He kindly gives me the initiative, which I take thus. I have seen the section boss myself:

Who has not had the fortune in this world to run across
That noble specimen of man, the railroad section boss,
Has lived in vain and cannot know the greatness of his loss.

The Boss he is a modest man of unassuming mien,
The expression of his countenance the humblest ever seen,
And in his eye there's naught of that denominated "green."

You will find him at the crossing, with his gang of two or three,
Like a Standish and his army in the Plymouth colony,
And when he gives an order he begins the same with D.

At smoking he is regular, and likewise at his meals,
And when the time to quit arrives he stops because he feels
That promptness is a virtue which no faithful man conceals.

On the morning of election he gathers in his men,
And takes them to the polling-place upon the gravel train,
And in the afternoon he comes and votes them all again.

He draws his monthly stipend in an ostentatious way,
But lives a vague, uncertain life made dubious day by day
'Twixt the fear of a reduction and the hope of better pay.

If you have never met the man you cannot know your loss,
For he's the noblest specimen you'll ever run across.
So sayeth one who's worked beneath the railroad section boss.

It has been said frequently that one-half of the world is ignorant of how the remaining moiety exists, and I often think it is well for the peace and happiness of the better-conditioned that such is the fact. I have lately had occasion to see something of life among those who are poorer than I am. It came about through the arrest of what I believe to be an innocent man, and I will proceed to relate the circumstances. The story promises to be long, but it is truthful, and may give some insight into the workings of justice and injustice. So here it is:

John Doe Bushrod is an elderly and eccentric man who for the past three years has resided at No. 13 Cannibal Place, a short alley leading off one of San Francisco's unfrequented streets. There is a grocery upon one corner of Cannibal Place, where it joins the street, and a bakery upon the other. It is made up of stables, the rear ends of Chinese laundries, and a few cheap tenements. No. 13 is at the foot of this alley, and is occupied by Fortune Legru, a Frenchman, and his tenants. John Doe Bushrod lived in the rear of No. 13, in a room on the ground floor of a two-story shanty with stairs on the front. The shanty bounds one side of a court sixteen feet square, reached by an alley-way running out of Cannibal Place. The upper story is occupied by Ignacio Moleros and his family; the ground floor by Mrs. Maria Harry and, up to a few days ago, the aforesaid John Doe Bushrod, their apartments being separated only by thin board partitions. Bushrod is a bachelor, living alone and cooking his own food.

Nearly all the other residents, with the exception of Mrs. Moleros, are absent during the day.

On the morning of Wednesday, September 18, 1889, Mrs. Moleros heard screams in the court, and looking out of her second-story door in the shanty, saw John Doe Bushrod standing in the court below with a knife in his hand. Mrs. Maria Harry, the author of the screams, had gone out into Cannibal Place for a policeman to arrest Bushrod, whom she accused of assaulting her. Bushrod thereupon locked up his room and absented himself during the day.

In the evening he called upon me at my home and apprised me of his expected arrest. He told me that the boys of the neighborhood, and he suspected Mrs. Harry's boys were among them, were in the habit of waiting for him in the alley and mashing his hat down over his ears. He showed his hat dented and broken by their blows. On the morning in question, while washing his breakfast dishes—a knife and plate—at the common hydrant in the yard, he was accosted unpleasantly by Mrs. Harry. He turned toward her, but before he had time to do more than look at her with a severe glance, she raised a cry of murder, or words to that effect, and ran out for a policeman. Bushrod calmly put away his utensils and decamped. He was unable to say whether the knife which frightened Mrs. Harry was a common table-knife or a meat knife that he had been sharpening for the butcher on the corner; but he denied any intent to use either upon the person of his estimable neighbor.

I advised Bushrod to go to a lodging-house and stay until the affair blew over, offering him two-bits to pay for his bed. He declined to take anything except the advice. The next morning at 7 o'clock he was waiting for me in front of the house, and when I emerged informed me that, according to the butcher on Cannibal Place, there was no more danger, as the police officer had declined to make the arrest.

The following morning at 9 o'clock Judge W. D. Sawyer, a venerable lawyer practicing in the police court, came to this office and said a man named Bushrod was at the station house, charged with assault to murder, and desired to see me. The man, he said, appeared to be without friends or counsel. At 10 o'clock I went to the station house, interviewed Bushrod, and engaged Judge Sawyer to look after his case. Bushrod intrusted me with his keys and valuables.

The turnkeys and attendants at the station house impressed me as a good-natured lot of men. They were certainly polite and accommodating. The jail is not a pleasant place. If it were cleaner, lighter, and dryer, it might look like a menagerie, but the illusion would be dispelled at sight of the evil and ghastly faces peering forth between the bars. Blear-eyed drunks, beetle-browed perpetrators of assaults, sharp-faced sneak thieves—every species of criminal was there; and in one cell sat a bedizened female, in a loud costume and feathered hat, as if posing for a photograph. She returned the gaze as scornfully and independently as though she had been outside the bars and the looker-on a felon behind them. I did not enjoy myself at all while looking at these people.

I next repaired to Cannibal Place, with a note from Bushrod to Mrs. Harry saying that if she would drop the prosecution he would return the favor by leaving her neighborhood. Mrs. Harry was out, but Mrs. Moleros was at home and testified that she had witnessed the assault. Didn't see the knife, the plate, or the dishcloth, but believed the knife to have been one borrowed from the butcher by Bushrod with a view to carving Mrs. Harry. I asked her where she stood at the time of the assault, and where Bushrod stood. She explained the situation, but upon experimenting I found she must have been entirely out of sight of the parties. Antone Moleros, aged 10, knew nothing about the case, but was in the habit of playing with Bushrod, who treated him kindly. George Moleros, aged 4, could speak no English except "gimma da mon," which I responded to with a nickel, when he immediately disappeared. I interviewed P. B. West, who described himself as a hash-slinger, and occupied a room across the court from Mrs. Harry's. He knew the boys mashed Bushrod's hat over his head; knew nothing more and preferred to talk about himself; was out of work and despondent. Had a poor opinion of hash-slingers like himself who worked in fifteen-cent restaurants for $25 a month. Thought he was of slight account in this wide and unfriendly world. Sighed deeply.

Fortune Legru, landlord, knew nothing of the case, but hoped Bushrod would move. Didn't know how Mrs. Harry earned a livelihood, but she called herself a dressmaker. Mrs. Legru could not speak English, and I found no one else to talk with except a small shaggy dog with a large bark, which, proving to be ill-tempered, I jabbed with my stick and then kicked off the stairs. All the inhabitants of the place knew me, as I had been referred to often by Bushrod as a person who would protect him and avenge his wrongs. Other residents of Cannibal Place were dirty children, coarse young girls, bold, slangy, and prematurely depraved; and fleas of enormous size, whose gambols would be interesting if their bite were not so dangerous. The place made me sick.

My next interview was with the butcher, who ridiculed the arrest, and denied that Bushrod had had his (the butcher's) knife in his possession at the time of the alleged assault.

In the mean time Bushrod's case had come up in court, and been continued upon motion of counsel, Judge Sawyer, who advised me to interview the prosecuting attorney and state the probable facts. The prosecuting attorney was not to be found in the court building, court having adjourned, and Mr. Sawyer and myself set out to hunt him up, taking in all the hostleries of the neighborhood. We found him at last—an agreeable young man of pleasing address, no superfluous airs, and with plenty of good hard sense. He listened to my defense of Bushrod, and inquired his habits and calling. I was able to testify that the accused was a teetotaler, of industrious habits, and earned his livelihood by selling reform literature. The attorney remarked that if he got his living that way he must be industrious, and a crank to boot, to which I readily assented. The attorney was reticent and made no promises, but Judge Sawyer, who had heard our dialogue, congratulated me upon having made a good impression. At this point I stimulated our counsel with a piece of coin, and he extended courteous acknowledgment. I also interviewed the captain of the precinct, with a view to having Bushrod removed to the hospital. The captain promptly summoned a physician, who examined the prisoner and pronounced him sound in mind and body, and the removal scheme fell through.

On the following day I saw the arresting party, Mrs. Harry, with the intent of inducing her to withdraw the suit. She declined, not so much on account of the offense charged as because Bushrod was an uncongenial neighbor. Her boys aged 12 and 14 were learning to play the cornet and bass horn. They practiced about three hours every evening to the discomfort of Bushrod, who, failing by entreaty to persuade them to desist, procured a large tin receptacle and thumped it industriously while the boys blew their horns. Mrs. Harry had evidently long cherished a desire to be avenged on the old man, and improved the first opportunity offered. "Nong, nong," said Mrs. Harry; "he vair bad man. How can my sons play when he make so much noise? Nong, nong."

When the court opened Saturday morning I was present; Counsellor Sawyer was at his post; Bushrod looked at us appealingly from the prisoners' pen; the presiding judge beamed benignly from the bench. "Hear ye, hear ye!" cried the clerk, but nobody heard what he said. The cases of drunks, thieves, thugs, and juvenile delinquents were settled rapidly, and then that of Bushrod came on. The clerk read the indictment charging that John Doe Bushrod had assaulted Mrs. Maria Harry intending to commit a felony, said assault being made with a deadly weapon, to wit, a knife, with intent to cut, stab, carve, etc., there being malice aforethought, and other evil designs. Then the bailiff shouted for the arresting officer and the witnesses. Their names rang through the corridors, but there was no response. This did not surprise me, as I had reason to suspect that they would not be present. Then Counsellor Sawyer arose and in a few words set forth the facts as I had told them to the prosecuting attorney and the police captain. The judge smiled. I came forward and was presented as the employer of Bushrod. Counsel moved that defendant be released on his own recognizance. The judge looked at prosecuting attorney; attorney nodded assent, the gate of the prisoners' pen swung open, and John Doe Bushrod was free for a few days. As I passed out the attorney said that he depended upon me to see that the defendant kept away from his uncongenial surroundings in Cannibal Place, which responsibility I shouldered at once. Bushrod took a good long pull of fresh air; then he chartered an express wagon, and in a few moments we were loading his effects aboard the same. Mrs. Harry was at home. She evidently experienced surprise at seeing her prisoner, and inquired how much it had cost us to bribe the court. The children all bid Bushrod goodbye, and the butcher came out to wave him an adieu as he rode triumphantly away.

Next week I will relate what might be called the denouement of Bushrod's remarkable case. M.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

E. H. Platt and John Allen, all the way from New York on horseback, reached San Francisco last Saturday, after riding nearly 4000 miles. They were 131 days making the journey. —The State Fair, which closed at Sacramento Sept. 21, is pronounced the most successful ever held. —Italian citizens of San Francisco celebrated last Sunday, the 19th anniversary of the downfall of papal power in Rome. —Justice Stephen J. Field is on his way east. He is accompanied by two marshals, one of whom is said to be Neagle. —John Slater, the Mediumistic Wonder, was shot at on the streets of this city one day last week by a man who claims to have lost money by trusting in spirit messages obtained through Slater. —The new steel cruiser San Francisco, now in course of construction for the United States Government at the Union Iron Works, this city, is rapidly nearing completion. She will be launched about the 26th of October.

Priest Butler, a Catholic clergyman who eloped from Jersey City, N. J., and got married four years ago, has deserted his wife and petitioned his bishop to be let back into the priesthood. —Fifty-one persons were killed by a landslide at Quebec, Can., last week. —A wealthy man named Matthews experimented with an opium pipe in a Chinese joint at Butte, Mont., on the 21st, and died from the effects of his smoke. —The adherents of a rebellious priest named Marcil, of Polk county, Minn., who had been unfrocked by his bishop, set fire to the church last Saturday night and burned it to the ground. —Two members of the United Brethren church at Columbus, Ind., recently visited Mrs. Snyder, an insane woman of that place, in the absence of her husband, and induced her to give them $20,000 for their church college. —Jurors are being slowly secured for trying the Cronin murder case in Chicago. —The survivor of a prize-fight which resulted fatally in St. Louis last week is to be tried for manslaughter, and several sports are under arrest as participants in the crime.

Wilkie Collins, the English novelist, is dead. —At the French elections held last Sunday Boulangists and Monarchists were defeated. Boulanger received strong support from the Catholic church. —Latest advices report recent floods in Japan which have drowned 10,000 people.

If I had lived in Palestine, a contemporary of Jesus, I feel morally certain I should have acknowledged him as leader; for, where a definite picture at all flames up from the blurred canvas of the gospels, it is that of a high-souled and enthusiastic mystic and visionary, whose kingdom was not of this world. I care not about the historic personality; I care for the divine ideal. What means the fearful irony of fate which makes this pure and unselfish Galilean nominally responsible for the most corrupt and selfish system that ever befooled and cursed mankind? This is a poor world and era for the aspirant for righteousness—for him who yearns after spiritual purity, and who, ascending to divine heights, is the dreamer of prophetic dreams. But yet, over the gulf of sordid meanness and spiritual blindness, there can be descried the promise of the faint dawning of a day when the Christ shall live because the priest is dead.—Saladin.

HOW LONG?

Is it not a serious thought, that after a life of toil and strife of nearly sixty years, one must soon lay it down with the knowledge that we are but little nearer that goal for which we have so long striven, Universal Mental Liberty. Is it possible that we too, Christlike, must soon lay down this life in agony with the sad, sad thought that time must roll on, and the battle for liberty to speak one's honest convictions be fought over by generations yet unborn?

How long, oh, how long, must suffering humanity, cringing slavely, bow the suppliant knee to politicians, priests, popes, and potentates—drones in the hive of industry, which even the poor insects have the instinct to destroy when they have fulfilled their usefulness; while we, the most exalted of all earth's creatures, are willing, generation after generation, to bow down in meek submission, to fawn over them and feed them on the fat of the land. May God (if there is a God) speed the day where man shall be loosed from the chains and fetters of the mind, and be allowed to soar in the realms of Universal Mental Liberty is my devout prayer. What is life to the honest, noble-minded Freethinker, denied the privilege of at all times expressing his honest convictions without the eternal fear of having his bread and butter cut short? "I know not what course others may choose, but as for me, give me liberty or give me death," and above all, liberty of the mind. B. B. Rockwood.

THE Freethinkers' Magazine for October will be a "Horace Seaver Memorial Number." It will contain Colonel Ingersoll's oration, obituary articles and notices by James Parton, Thaddeus B. Wakenan, Parker Pillsbury, Dr. R. B. Westbrook, Susan H. Wixon, and Harry Hoover; also a fine portrait of Mr. Seaver and an editorial article on Horace Seaver, including numerous selections from his writings. The magazine will be on our table, to be sold at 20 cts. per copy.

B. F. UNDERWOOD, after giving lectures at Hanford, Lemoore, Tulare, and Healdsburg, Cal., goes to Salt Lake City, where he will speak the first Sunday in October, and where he may be addressed in care of Mr. H. P. Mason.

OBITUARY.

DIED:—In Diamond Valley, Sept. 2, John Warren, only child of Mr. and Mrs. P. A. Clark, aged one year ten months and six days. Warnie was a bright little boy, the joy and pride of father and mother, and the household pet. He was just beginning to appreciate and return the love so lavishly bestowed upon him. Mr. and Mrs. Clark have the heartfelt sympathy of the entire community.—San Jacinto Register.

Friend Clark asks us to print the above and add what consolation there may be to offer. We can only say there is no consolation except the knowledge that merciful Time may lessen the acuteness of grief; that sorrow consumes itself at last; that whatever of trouble might have been in store for the little one, had he lived, is spared him now. "We cannot tell which is the more fortunate—the child dying in its mother's arms, before its lips have learned to form a word, or he who journeys all the length of life's uneven road, painfully taking the last slow steps with staff and crutch." "May be that death gives all there is of worth to life. If those we press and strain within our arms could never die, perhaps that love would wither from the earth. May be this common fate treads from out the paths between our hearts the weeds of selfishness and hate. The larger and the nobler faith in all that is and is to be tells us that death, even at its worst, is only perfect rest."

FRIENDS OF FREETHOUGHT—and we count every reader as a friend—should remember that the present is the dull season for papers whose circulation is principally rural. Realizing this, they do not need more than an intimation that whatever they are able to do for this paper will be most timely if done now. Send us subscribers, renewals, book orders, or any other form of encouragement you may be moved to extend.

AN OPEN LETTER FROM PRESIDENT WESTBROOK.

DEAR FRIENDS: I have so many letters of inquiry regarding the American Secular Union that I must reply in print. Yes, Mr. Stevens and Mrs. Freeman have resigned, and Foote, Wettstein, and myself are the only officers remaining. But we are firm and hopeful, and expect to make a good report to the Congress next month. I could say much of the mistakes of the past, but I prefer to speak of the future. As to the coming Congress, I am in favor of making it mainly a business conference, having little if any public-platform speaking.

The time has come for deliberate action. If our friends all over the country do not feel interest enough to attend this meeting, in the present crisis, I want to know it. Those who cannot possibly attend should write me fully and freely, as to their views and purposes, and let me know how much money they can afford to give for next year's campaign.

All our friends are cordially invited to take part in this conference whether they are regular delegates or not. I am in favor of amending our constitution by making it shorter and yet more explicit.

Several classes of Liberals, outside of "orthodox Infidels," should be interested and actively employed in promoting our "Nine Demands." The Spiritualists are probably the most numerous class of Liberals in the world, and would all favor Secular government if properly treated. So with the free Religionists, the Unitarians, Universalists, Hicksite Quakers, Progressive Jews, the various German societies, and Labor Reform associations, and last, not least, the Ethical Culturists. It remains to be seen whether we are wise enough and broad enough to enlist all these reformers. Indeed there is no reason why we should not enroll in the ranks of State Secularization multitudes of Catholics and orthodox Protestants.

But we must confine ourselves, as an organization, to the one object of a complete separation of church and state, while as individuals we may hold and work for our own peculiar views. We need more thorough organization, and in fact we ought to have a legal existence, by an act of incorporation. This I could get through the courts of Philadelphia.

There are other matters of practical importance that will be apparent in the proposed amendments to our constitution, of which the required notice will be given soon. Meanwhile let us keep things in motion, and come together next month in a good liberal spirit, prepared to bury the dead past, and to meet the situation in the true spirit of heroic patriotism.

R. B. WESTBROOK.

DID JESUS CHRIST RISE FROM THE DEAD?*

XI.

And then, as if heaven had gone out of its way to take special pains and had resorted to supererogation to make the "Holy Scriptures" absolutely and utterly untrustworthy and absurd, so that, for their want of belief, it might damn all mankind that were worth the damning, and thereby reserve its "many mansions" for fools exclusively, it managed to transmit these gospels to Christendom through the hands of the most pious forgers and devout liars that the best Ananiases of the earth ever begat, and the finest Sapphiras of the world ever bore and suckled. Wriggling to prominence amid the spawn of mendacity, we have lying Eusebius. Before the age of his master, Constantine, whose guilty and gore-stained hand he licked, Eusebius could find few or no Christian records. No library of Greece or Rome had opened its shelves to such literary floor-sweepings. But Eusebius was equal to the occasion. The recordless ravings of the illiterate were difficult to codify into three hundred years of history. But now Constantine, the murderer, debauchee, and dandy, had built the Christian howling house on the august site of the pagan fane; and something required to be done for the road-scrappings of a religion whose rabble at the Milvian Bridge had turned the tide of battle in his favor. The hour had come, and Eusebius was the man.

Eusebius, as we have said, licked the hand of the imperial criminal who first took Christianity under the protection of the state, and then commenced to write the history of three hundred years of pious fraud and superstitious chaos. On this subject, in case it may be deemed I misrepresent him as regards the character of the work he undertook, I will permit him to speak for himself. "I freely confess," he says of his work, "it will crave indulgence, especially since, as the first of those that have entered upon the subject, we are attempting a kind of trackless and unbeaten path. Looking up with prayer to God as our guide, we trust, indeed, that we shall have the power of Christ as our aid, though we are totally unable to find even the bare vestiges of those who may have traveled the way before us." (Ecclesiastical History, i. 1.)

A writer who looks back over the lapse of three centuries and is "totally unable to find even the bare vestiges" of the matter with which he proposes to deal, must evolve his facts out of his imagination, and weld them together by means of good, hard lying. For this task of dragging three hundred years of history all out of his own head, Eusebius was just the man, and he lived just at the proper time and among the proper people to enable him to launch such a history with success. Eusebius was not concerned to narrate what had the strongest probability to be true; but he was concerned to record whatever he deemed might best serve the purpose of the task he had set himself—viz., to write a history of Christianity full of the marvelous and the terrible, and suited to the taste and acceptance of the ignorant and superstitious masses over which it was now the business of the state to fling the ominous shadow of the cross. This Eusebius is candid enough to admit. "Whatsoever, therefore," writes he, "we deem likely to be advantageous to the proposed subject we shall endeavor to reduce to a compact body by historical narration."

In the hands of a writer like Eusebius there was no difficulty in raising Christ from the dead. The only wonder is that he did not make him jump into the air five miles high, with the stone sepulchre at his heels, and Mary Magdalene and "the other Mary" in his arms. He, quite as a matter of course, remarks, "the dead have been raised, and have continued with us many years" (Ecclesiastical History, v. 7); so with Eusebius it must have seemed a poor, stale, flat, and unprofitable thing for Christ to rise from the dead. Tertullian could tell a more clever story than Eusebius in the locomotive corpse line. He gravely relates how a certain corpse most obligingly moved aside in the sepulchre to make room for another corpse that was brought there to bear it company. (Uide On the Resurrection of the Flesh, chap. xlii.; De Anima, chap. xxxix.) Glorious persons these saints and early fathers. Be ye unmitigated liars, and by this shall all men know that ye are my disciples.

Paul, the very Coryphæus of Christianity, straightforwardly put the query, "If the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?" (Romans iii. 7.) Peradventure, this lie of his, in regard to the resurrection of Christ, is the particular lie he had in his head when he put the above extenuating query. When Paul lied to promote the glory of God he lied perhaps well, but certainly not wisely. He makes his phantom appear first to Cephas, then to the twelve, and then to "above five hundred brethren at once, of whom the greater part remain unto this present; but some are fallen asleep." (1 Corinthians, xv. 6.) Next the wraith was seen by James, and last of all by Paul himself, "one born out of due time." And this Canon Westcott, a great authority on lively corpses, asserts to be authentic history, and not a Pauline lie for the glory of God. Although "the brethren," at the time of the flight skyward, "together were about one hundred and twenty," yet over five hundred out of the hundred and twenty saw the party who had tired so soon of Joseph of Arimathea's tomb, and who took a trip to Galilee and a fly to heaven. He was seen by three hundred and eighty people that did not exist! And this Canon Westcott claims as veritable history! Then, as I have before pointed out, if he was seen by the twelve, he was seen by Judas, although Judas by this time had had his neck stretched a yard long, and was minus his entrails! A pretty party, indeed, to have a look at Jesus or any one else! And this,

*By Saladin, editor of the Agnostic Journal.

Canon Westcott contends, is veritable history! When Canon Westcott, or any one else, takes to the establishment and defense of a position so desperate, he too is deceiving in the service of Christ.

THE OREGON CONVENTION.

Adolph Roth, of Dayton, W. T., sends $5 on expenses. "Yours for truth" tells what is meant.

W. Wedeken, of Montesano, Chehalis county, Washington, sends $7.50 as follows: W. Wedeken, $1; F. Lessmann, 50 cents; J. Pike, $1; A. Radical, $1; C. C. Glenn, $1; J. M. Stratton, $1; C. C. Tunnick, $1; S. A. Lamb, $1. "I am glad to see the notices of the coming convention, and that Liberal lecturers will do their work this time without fee." This brother writes a good letter. If he gets to the meeting will tell us some truths.

Elder Alonzo T. Jones, of Oakland, writes us again that he will be here. "We stand upon principle and not upon policy. The principle is uncompromising opposition to ecclesiastical legislation."

This key-note has no uncertain sound. Let every Liberal paper in the world pass it around. Elder Jones will probably speak at two o'clock to accommodate his many church-members who live in the country.

To this date, I have only spent twenty-five dollars and fifty cents for the convention. The printers are at work now on two thousand letters and two thousand cards which will cost fifteen dollars more. Other expenses must be incurred immediately.

Reuben Wright, of Molalla, says, "I am with you in your efforts to make the meeting a grand success. Will send on five dollars, and be with you the 12, 13, and 14 of October, with all the funds I can raise, and pass the word to all who will come."

We receive many inspiring letters. This one seems a little suspicious. "President Beal, you are going to have a terrible big meeting. You are the right man in the right place. I am not able to go anything on expenses this year. Write and let me know when the biggest crowd will be there, as my business is pushing me so that I can't attend but one meeting. In fact, the talk will do me no good, as I am bald-headed and it will all slip off. My son has his money loaned out, and says he will not pay anything for dancing. Four or five of my daughters will be at the ball. They take a great interest in the cause."

W. H. Breese sends these names to the constitution from Talent:

H. J. Terrill, Lucy A. Terrill, Delbert Terrill, Charley Terrill, W. Beeson, H. C. Stock, H. Aumerman, George Anderson, W. H. Breese, Elizabeth Breese, Rosetta Waters, A. E. Howe, James Purvis, Samuel Culver, O. L. Stearns, I. K. Drake, Wm. High, E. K. Anderson, S. Carlile, Joseph Robinson, A. M. Clemens, Frank Spicer. From Ashland: L. E. Paine, Lucy E. Paine, Clifton Paine, Grace Paine, John Holton, Mrs. H. C. Holton, J. B. Plummer, John R. Hutchings, M. A. Carter.

See the friends of freedom coming,
Bid them welcome to our band,
Flaunt our banner on the breezes,
Let it float o'er every land.

Welcome, friends, we bid you welcome,
Brothers, sisters, welcome we;
Swell our numbers till our voices
Fill the land from sea to sea.

Look! the sun of freedom shining,
Filling earth with men who're free;
Freedom's host is still advancing
To the world's grand jubilee.

Dr. J. L. York and wife will stop while at the convention with A. F. Neunert, 141 South First street. Mrs. Addie Ballou and Mrs. Scott Briggs will call on Miss Blaisdell at 363 Third street, and be assigned places.

Jack Plummer, of North Powder, Union Co., Oregon, says he "will help some and be here if possible."

Reader, how easy it would be for you to send me some names of those who might attend if they had a letter of invitation. Will you do it? Do not forget side towns and little places where there has been no lecture. Let us extend our jurisdiction. Do not wait for officers and committees to do this needed work. Half of the vice-presidents have not answered my letters, and I am compelled to ask you for some help.

Now, good friends, gather together a few dollars for all expenses. Come to this great meeting and make for yourselves the happiest three days of your life. Read the program in this issue of FREETHOUGHT. One part of the program has not been written. We will raise one hundred subscribers for our organ, FREETHOUGHT.

C. BEAL,

President Oregon State Secular Union.

ON THE TRAIL.

Once more I send you a line from "off the trail." Having taken a few weeks' needed rest, after nearly three months on the wing—traveling, lecturing night and day, as our Spiritualist friends would say, this continual change of magnetisms is very devitalizing and often makes conditions out of such homogeneous incompatibilities that one's individuality is almost overcome. I have spoken three Sunday evenings here for the Spiritualists, by invitation, first in Music Hall for the World's Advance Society, and twice at the G. A. R. Hall for the First Society of Spiritualists of Portland. These halls are very finely furnished and carpeted, and are always crowded with a very intelligent people. Last Sunday night John Slater of your city was here and created quite an excitement. W. J. Colville, also from San Francisco, is giving a month here to occultism, theosophy, spiritual healing, and other fakes. This city seems very deficient in its number of mediums, compared to San Francisco, which is probably no great loss, as you know even the very elect are liable to be deceived. I think Elsie Reynolds would find a "phantom" in Portland.

Last Saturday, at 4 o'clock p. m., I took the train for New Era, Clackamas county, to attend the State Spiritual camp-meeting. The ride was very enjoyable along the beautiful Willamette valley among the magnificent orchards and purpling vineyards, the flower-bedecked gardens and yards, the continuous villages and cottage homes of these thrifty people—it was like a golden panorama in this sunset land blooming with life and the poetry of motion. Quite a number of Portlanders were aboard, and all enjoyed the transit from dusty, noisy streets to the camp grounds among the giant firs on the banks of the dark river called the Willamette. Steamers ply also on the river continually, so this valley, with the river in the center and two railroads on one side and one on the other, is alive with the hum of humanity. Arriving at camp, we find a small but jolly crowd gathered from various parts of the state, all bent on having a good time and to "try the spirits and see if they are of God or not." The association has a beautiful park all fenced in for the grounds and a good-sized pavilion for public meetings and circles; also a large dance hall for circles of a different kind, where, with fantastic step, they chase the spirits of each other all around the room till break of day. There is also a two-story eating and lodging house on the grounds, several small cottages, and quite a number of tents, wagons, babies, dogs, peanut stands, swings—in fact, all the evidences of civilized humanity.

I met quite a number of the army of FREETHOUGHT readers, among whom are Captain Miller and wife, of Canema, who have lived here for forty years, and the captain was the first man to run a boat on this river, but is now retired, living on his hard-earned laurels. They gave me a true Liberal greeting, inviting me to their tent and home. I also met Mr. William Haight, the artist and fanning-mill factory man, who is a prince of good fellows, has a level head and true Freethinker's twinkle in his eye, and is a humorist of no mean calibre; Mr. Thomas Buckman, president of the association; John Kruse, of Wilsonville, that solid, sturdy old radical from over the sea with a heart big enough to make doing good his religion and the whole world his country; Mrs. Holland, the secretary, from Salem, who is a jewel full of bright conceptions; Mrs. Cheney, formerly wife of the renowned astrologer, Prof. Cheney; Mr. Fuller and wife, from McMinnville; Mr. Phillips, wife and daughters, also son and family, from the town of Clackamas, and many others that I cannot now remember. I found a splendid stopping-place and home with Dr. Castro and wife in the hotel at New Era. These folks are not "one of us," but I think the doctor is almost ready to join the ranks of the new religion of Freethought and drop hide-bound creeds and mind-wrecking priests forever.

Saturday night, after the meeting, we all repaired to the dance hall, your correspondent with the rest, where all went merry as a marriage bell. I saw no spirits except those clothed in mortal garb, although we circled this way and that, forward and back, for three mortal hours with pretty girls and handsome dames for mediums.

Sunday, by invitation, I gave the 11 o'clock address. The pavilion was full, with many standing outside around the doors. My subject was "The New Religion and the Duties of Spiritualists and Liberalists in Working for the Good Time Now, a Heaven Here." I spoke for one hour with the best of attention.

Monday I returned to this city, and shall move down the trail to Stella, Wash., this week.

D. C. SEYMOUR.

Portland, Sept. 11.

THE TERRY CASE.

HON. A. SCHELL TO W. F. FREEMAN, ESQ.

FRIEND FREEMAN: I also have been acquainted with Judge Terry, personally, thirty-five years, and his history during this time. His killing David C. Broderick in a duel was the result of a conspiracy and little better than cold-blooded murder. Terry was elected a justice of the supreme court of the state of California by the Know-nothing party. At the breaking out of the vigilance committee in San Francisco he resigned his seat on the bench, and went to San Francisco armed with knife and pistol to put down the committee by force and violence, and cut the throat of Marshall Hopkins, near unto death. Had Hopkins died Terry would have been hanged—nothing could have saved him. He was in the hands of an illegal and irresponsible tribunal, but nevertheless he had to stand trial and plead for his life like a veritable criminal. Broderick was in favor of law and order, and contributed $1,500 a week to support the only newspaper in the city which dared to denounce the committee that was trying Terry for his life. To David C. Broderick, more than anyone living at the time, Terry owed his life. Gratitude, if he had any, should have prevented him from challenging Broderick to mortal combat—magnanimity, if he had any in his soul, should have prevented him shooting after the accidental discharge of Broderick's pistol, and when Broderick was at his mercy.

At the breaking out of the rebellion, Terry went East and joined the Confederate army. If accounts are true, he gained no distinguished reputation there for bravery on the field of battle, where grape-shot, canister, and shrapnel did deadly work. It was only when he had the "drop" that his bravery was conspicuous.

On his return to California he volunteered his services in the Sarah Althea Hill vs. Sharon case on the side of that notorious adventuress, out of hate to Sharon. After the death of Sharon, he married this desperate woman, ten-fold worse than himself. She led him to disgrace, prison, and to death. No one is to blame for the death of Terry but Sarah Althea. She hounded him on to his destiny.

After they were married, to the disgust of his friends, they traveled together as man and wife, and by way of amusement, Sarah, the wife, pulled the hair and insulted the justices of the circuit court of the United States, and Terry, the husband, enjoyed the fun. When Marshall Frank was ordered to take Sarah out of the court-room by Justice Field, for gross contempt of court, Terry would not permit this order to be executed, and dealt Frank a blow that sent him spinning; and presently was ready with knife in hand to carve Frank as he had Hopkins. Of course this sort of business had to be stopped, or the circuit court of California abolished. Both were incarcerated in prison for contempt of court. One would reasonably suppose that this would have had a quieting and salutary effect; but on the contrary it appears it made them ten-fold worse than ever.

From appearances, as disclosed by the tragedy which took place at Lathrop, I am constrained to believe that Terry and his wife had entered into a conspiracy to assassinate Field. Terry was to get into a squabble or row with Field, and his wife was to come to the rescue and shoot Field in defense of her husband. That this view is correct is corroborated by the fact that, so soon as she saw Justice Field in the dining-room, she ran for her pistol which she had left in the car. Why did she run for her pistol if not to shoot Field? Why did Terry make an unprovoked assault upon Justice Field if not for the purpose of giving his wife an opportunity to shoot Field? Terry was the aggressor. If Terry was not armed, his wife was, and it was all pursuant to the plan agreed upon. Terry was driven to his inevitable fate by this bad woman. Let the friends of Terry look to her as the evil genius that led him to the slaughter. Neagle did his duty well, and in my judgment did not shoot too soon. He only discharged the duty imposed upon him.

Friend Freeman, I beg leave to remind you that California has emerged into the dawn of a new civilization. The relics of a former civilization are disappearing one by one. But few, if any, now remain who are destined to die with their "boots on." Terry may be considered as one of the relics, and perhaps the last.

With the facts just stated you must be more or less familiar; and yet you "personally prefer Judge Terry dead to Judge Field living." At this I am surprised. That expression will live while you live, and go down and with you be forgotten in the grave. As for myself, I should prefer to be a dead cobra to a live Terry.

Albany, N. Y., September 17, 1889.

A. SCHELL.

THE CENTRAL IDEA OF NATIONALISM.

The principles promulgated in Edward Bellamy's wonderful book, "Looking Backward," have crystallized into living societies, which are being organized all over the country from Boston to Southern California.

The question is constantly asked by those who have not read the book, What is the purpose of the Nationalists? What do they want, and how do they design to accomplish their aims?

Their object is to readjust the industrial and economic systems, which have come down to us from semi-barbarous ages, and better adapt them to the wants of humanity in the present enlightened age.

How can this be done? By substituting co-operation for competition, and emulation for antagonism and rivalry. How can such changes be inaugurated? Through legal methods. How can we manipulate legal enactments? By educating the people to see the utility of these changes and also by the strength which comes from union. This is the object of organizing. But is not education a slow process for reforming evils which are already crying for redress? When reforms have been germinating in the minds of the world's sages and thinkers for ages, they sweep like a tidal wave over the thought centers of the world, and, "Lo! a nation is born in a day." So it is with the principles enunciated in "Looking Backward." The idea or grand principle of co-operation, as a result of the brotherhood of man and solidarity of the race, has been germinating in the minds of humanitarians for thousands of years. Now the world is ready to receive it; and it sweeps across the continent like a prairie fire, stirring all hearts with courage and hope. Those who oppose it are those who have not read the book, and those who oppose human liberty on general principles. We know when the hardest fight will come in before it can be established on the earth, and we hope all Liberals will wheel into line, and lend a helping hand. The cause of human liberty demands it.

The changes contemplated are evolutionary—not revolutionary. The following, being an extract from our declaration of principle, shows this. "No sudden or ill-considered changes are advocated; we make no war on individuals; we do not censure those who have accumulated immense wealth by carrying to a logical end the false principles on which business is now based.

"The combinations, syndicates, and trusts of which the people complain, demonstrate the practicability of our basic principle of association. We merely wish to push the principle a little further and have all our industries operated in the interests of all—by the nation, the people organized, the organic unity of the whole people."

The question arises, Are such changes practicable? The effective working of the universal postal union shows they are. A world's telegraph union would now be established but for the fact that in the United States the telegraph is run by private corporations. That it would be more efficient and more economical for the people if it were controlled and managed by the government, is made manifest by the example of those countries in Europe where it is under government control. In England, Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy, telegraphy is cheaper than in the United States.

Railroads could also be run better and cheaper under the general management of the government, just as mail matter is transported cheaper and quicker than it would be by private enterprise. It has been estimated, by those who are in a position to know, that men can be carried, with first-class accommodations, across the continent for one dollar apiece without loss to the railroad companies.

The admirable working of our public-school system shows the advantage of public management over private enterprise, in a matter in which the whole people are concerned. Like the postal service, this system ramifies to the remotest confines of the land; all are benefited by it, and no one finds it oppressive except those who are opposed to enlightenment on general principles or for the advancement of private ends.

To begin the application of the principles of "Nationalism" where it is most practicable, every city should own and control its own water, gas, electric lights, fuel, gardens, parks, museums, opera-houses, etc., and the state or general government should develop and distribute, at minimum cost, iron, coal, lead, crude oil, natural gas, and other of nature's products which should belong to all alike.

In this way, the millions which accrue from these industries would bless the people instead of making a few rich and the balance beggars. The solidarity of the race, or "brotherhood of man," is according to the laws of natural morality, and should be espoused as the central idea of Liberalism. Religionists will fight it as they ever have those things which tend to the uplifting of the masses. Then let us, as Liberals, wheel into line and make "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether," for the times are ominous that the liberties of the people shall be ground into powder beneath the iron heel of ecclesiasticism.

Such a sly, insidious speech as the "Sunday-rest" man, Crafts, made in San Diego last Sunday, should cause us to arouse ourselves and shake off our lethargy, for danger is in the air.

Industrial and economic freedom must keep pace with religious freedom, else there is danger of relapsing into barbarism. Do, Mr. Editor, recommend Bellamy's book as the best way out of danger.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY, Putnam & Macdonald, San Francisco, Cal. Price 10 cents. This is a Freethought publication, broad, liberal, generous, noble, as far as nobility lies in truthful statement, the expression of an honest opinion, in a candid and not obnoxious manner, especially as radical thought. It presents in strong light the happy idea that all good has risen from disbelief, from revolution of some sort. Happy America is an illustration of disbelief in old England. Nature in every aspect demands sacrifices. Blood drawn by a murderer, has made a nation free. Evil is made to work good. The bullet of an assassin made a glorious union. The devil's work in life has glorified goodness. The things we think should be condemned often work the greatest good. The good we look for frequently comes from the source from which only evil is expected. Freethought, which is synonymous to Infidelity, in a sense, is the parent of that which we glorify of great good, in great happiness and faith.—Scott-Browne's Phonographic Monthly.

I HONOR the man who is ready to sink
Half his present repute for the freedom to think,
And when he has thought, be his cause strong or weak,
Will risk t'other half for the freedom to speak,
Caring not for what vengeance the mob has in store,
Let that mob be the upper ten thousand or lower.

Good Work by Spiritualists.

C. BEAL, Dear Sir and Brother: Inclosed find $5 to use for the benefit of the convention and O. S. S. Union. I also send you a list of names as members of the Union. I have attended to your request to have the call inserted in our papers. I have had very poor success in money matters with our Materialistic Liberals. One dollar is all you can credit them with. The balance of four dollars is contributed by Spiritualists. Every Spiritualist I asked signed for the Union, but I could name you a dozen of Materialists and Agnostics who refused to have anything to do with it. Hoping that the convention will be a grand success, I am
Yours truly,

The Star of Empire Has Got Here.

To the Editors of Freethought:

I have been reading of the progress, on the Pacific Coast, of Freethought and universal mental freedom, and from what I can glean from the papers and lecturers I am impressed with the thought that it is time for us to cease using the stereotyped saying, "Westward the star of empire takes its way," for I am impressed with the idea that it has arrived, and banked up against the waves of the Pacific. Perhaps it has made some skips and jumps on its way westward; for instance, I think it missed Missouri, at least so far as Freethought is concerned, and that means a great deal.

The Pittsburg Congress did me the honor to appoint me chairman of the executive committee of the State of Missouri, and I tried to appoint my associate committee, but failed to get anyone to act. And so it is I am all the one there is of the committee. There are quite a number of Liberals in the state, of the indifferent kind that don't care to be known as such. I hope that sometime they will be willing to stand up and be counted, because the day is coming, and that very soon, when every Liberal in the land will have to do his or her best for the Nine Demands. The hosts of superstition are up and coming, and will destroy the liberties of the masses unless we can check them in their career.

I take great pleasure in reading friend Putnam's "News and Notes." I notice that among other names he cites one George Taylor in Oregon. Now I used to know one George Taylor at Niles, Michigan, and if it is the same one, I should like to hear from him through FREETHOUGHT; and if it is not the one I know, I am glad he is a Liberal all the same. I will close by wishing you and the Liberal cause unbounded success.

Rockport, Mo.

G. G. BECK.

Miss Davidson's Suggestion.

To the Editors of Freethought:

I wish to speak a few words to the Liberals of Oregon and Washington, in regard to the coming convention of the Oregon State Secular Union, to be held in Portland on the 12, 13, and 14 of October.

It needs work to make this convention a grand success, and if every Liberal in these two states would help even a little, the desired results would be easily accomplished.

I was in Portland one day last week, and called on our president, C. Beal, and had a very pleasant talk with him. President Beal is doing noble work. He is greatly enthused, and thinks the convention will be a splendid success. He said that several of the vice-presidents had not answered his letters asking them to aid him in making up the convention and our new organization; but he hoped to hear from them soon. We vice-presidents must all join hands and help all we can, for now is the time for us to work.

President Beal desires every Liberal to co-operate with him, and help as much as possible in their own localities. He wishes them to obtain as many signatures to the constitution of the O. S. S. Union as can be obtained; to collect a few dollars from their Liberal friends to help defray the expenses of the convention; to make the convention generally known throughout their vicinity; to write a short article concerning the convention to be inserted in their local papers; to invite all persons to come to the convention who they think might care to attend; and to send him the names and addresses of any Liberals they may know of in Oregon or Washington, to whom he may write.

Now I have a suggestion to make in regard to advertising the convention. Besides the notices in the papers, I think we should have large bills printed to send to each vice-president, and other prominent workers, to be posted in conspicuous places throughout their vicinity. The bills would be attractive, and would be read by many persons who might not observe the notices published in the papers.

Hoping that all will "lend a helping hand," and that the convention will be a grand success, I am most respectfully yours.

Oswego, Or.

ELVA E. DAVIDSON.

The Portland Convention.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Do the Liberals of Oregon and Washington realize the very great importance of making the convention, to be held in Portland, October 12, 13, 14, a success? The success of Liberal propaganda in the future will depend very much upon the success of the Portland convention.

For a few earnest, self-sacrificing Liberals to labor faithfully to carry on the work, and make our meetings a success, and then, not be seconded by those who should give their aid, their moral and financial support, is a cause of discouragement and vexation to those who have spent time and money to carry on an unpopular work. A large and successful gathering commands attention and respect. It is true that the truth or falsity of a theory cannot be affected by numbers; but nevertheless it must be confessed that there is truth in the old adage that "numbers make respectability." In the minds of a great many people there is nothing that succeeds like success. Then let every Liberal of Oregon and Washington who can possibly attend the convention determine to do so. And let us bear in mind the fact that in order to make the convention a success, it is not only necessary that we attend the convention, but that it is necessary to stay with the convention till the conclusion. We must not let the attractions of the fair, which will be held in Portland during October, divert our minds from the work of the convention.

We cannot expect to make our meetings a success if we attend one or two lecture-meetings, and then find entertainment in some other way, and leave the convention to run itself.

Our worthy president, Mr. C. Beal, is making an earnest, patriotic effort to make the convention a success. And now let us determine that the efforts of Mr. Beal and others, and our own sacrifices in the past shall not come to naught. Now is a time when the Liberals can prove their devotion to their cause and make a grand rally in behalf of Universal Mental Liberty.

Things as Mrs. Waisbrooker Sees Them.

To the Editors of Freethought:

I have been reviewing some of the tracks of Samuel. I wanted to find if all the beauty he talks of, all the cerulean blue and spangles of gold, really existed, or if he had been gazing at a mirage—to wit, a reflection of—well. I went to Stella, Tryon's, Ranier, etc., and I found plenty of beauty in sea and sky, in rock, hill, and deep forests of evergreen, but somehow I rebelled when I saw the cabins of those who have sought these solitudes; for instead of the beauty so exhilarating me as to make me think of wings, the fact of the labor of climbing the hills and thought of the labor of clearing those immense trees from the land ere corn and potatoes can be grown, made me tired from sympathy with the really intelligent men and women who live in crowded cabins, and are trying to subdue the earth.

The old Book tells of the ground being cursed with thistles and brambles, because of Adam and Eve's love of fruit, but really, I would rather dig over and subdue an acre of Canada or of Eden thistles than to root out one of those big cedar stumps; so, I repeat, my bones ached in sympathy with the poor strugglers after a home, instead of my ideality expanding under the stimulus, even, of the beautiful and rare flowers that were almost everywhere given a part of the space which has been redeemed from its native wildness, proof of the refinement of the women who cultivated them.

I was really surprised at the intelligence I found among these people, and when dressed in their Sunday-best they present a finer appearance than many city audiences. On Tuesday, September 3, two ladies of intelligence walked five miles, and reached my stopping-place at nine A. M., so as to spend the day and talk, and we had a feast of reason. In the afternoon there came another, who had ridden even further, carrying two half-gallon jars of honey and her little four-year-old daughter on the horse before her. She had been a Nebraska school-mistress, but is now living back in the deep forests of Oregon, raising babies and bees; has over 50 gallons of the best drained honey this year. Her husband is one of the county-school examining board.

Where do the bees find flowers? Some of the honey is gathered from fireweed blossoms which spring up in abundance where the fire runs through the fallen timber.

But I should make this letter too long should I try to tell half I saw to interest me during the nearly three weeks of absence. I met with kindness everywhere. A good bed and a good meal came as free as water in these country patches of civilization, but in the city, Astoria, I found no rest for the sole of my feet. All were full or at the seaside, or so disgusted with the way that they had been crowded upon, they had shut down on that kind of tramp.

I really think our larger places are often too full of those who should be out among the country people.

But your readers will be more interested in a Spiritualist's experience among Materialistic Liberals. At Stella they are nearly all of this class. Friend Lawson tendered his hall, but was not willing that a collection should be taken. Dr. Tryon said, What shall we do, go into the other hall? "No, I will speak in the hall I am advertised to speak in, and trust to Liberalist generosity."

I did so, and the owner of the hall bought $1.25 worth of books, and gave me $1 besides. Another liberal Liberal handed me $2. Others bought books and refused to take change, and so I did not trust in vain. Two nights after I spoke in the other hall, and took the best collection of anywhere.

I did not keep back the fact that I am a Spiritualist—told them I had genuine respect for the man or woman who said of another life, "I don't know," but thought those who tried to prove that there can be no continued life after what is called death, made a mistake. Told them in my first lecture, "The folly of worship, or the curse of (personal) Godism," was an inspirational lecture, and that if they could believe they had such strong help on the other side, I thought they would be glad.

Christian Spiritualists and illiberal Liberals are too far apart to harmonize very well, but I see no reason why Liberal Spiritualists and genuine Liberals may not go arm in arm in the practical work of this present life.

A Profane Narrative.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Recently I had an argument with a "follower of the meek and lowly," who for "pure cussedness" in sticking to the Bible text took the cake. He said that a falsehood believed in by the majority, was with them a truth. I asked him if the belief entertained by God's people sometime since, that the earth was flat, converted that falsehood into a truth. He said it did! I left off further discussion with the inspired idiot on that question, and related for his and the bystanders' amusement the following incident which occurred a few years since in Pennsylvania.

A member in good standing in the Christian church was the happy father of a very bright boy whose name was George Washington. George was four years old, and at this early age began to develop a mind having a tendency to Freethought. George had an uncle living close by with similar tendencies, and when an opportunity afforded, would let go a few swear-words in George's hearing. One day while George in company with his father attending a revival-meeting, and during a lull in the proceedings, the parson engaged George in the following "confab:" Parson—"What is your name?" "George," was the reply. The parson, wishing to have George give his full name, repeated the question. Again the reply was, "George." The parson came to the front again with, "What did you say your name was?" This was too much for the patience of the youth. It gave completely out, and he fired at the parson in plain English the following settler, "God damn it, I told you twice my name was George." The parson took a walk, and George and paternal-familias wended their way home. They arrived pretty late, and George, being somewhat fatigued from the day's exercises, retired early, but his nervousness and wakefulness attracted his father's notice. Said the parent, "I say, George, I know the reason why you can't go to sleep; you did not say your prayers before going to bed." Thereupon George tumbled out of bed, and upon his knees began his prayers. While he was proceeding, a dog that was lying close by began to lick his feet, which somewhat confused him, and stopping in the midst of his devotional exercises he asked, "Say, God, how can I say my prayers with this damned dog nosing around my feet?"

A great future awaits George Washington, and if he continues in the channel that he has started out in, he may yet warm up the presidential chair. "God bless our home."

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and under stand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

Orthodox Prayer in Plain English.

O incomprehensible Being,
Thou grand and mighty, allseeing,
From whom other Gods are all fleeing,
We come to thy temple to pray.
Although we believe thou art near us,
To help, and protect, and to cheer us,
We think more likely thou'lt hear us
If we hire a good parson to pray.

THE PARSON'S PRAYER.

O Lord! at thy feet we are crawling
In abject submission, and bawling
That our sins are great and appalling,
But thou art mighty to save.
We do not deserve thy blessing,
But our case is awfully pressing,
For in hell we risk a good dressing,
And for pardon we constantly crave.

There is no use in denying
We are frequently cheating and lying,
We are hypocrites living and dying,
But Jesus can pay for it all.
The murderer jumps from the gallows,
The crimes of the rogue it soon hallows,
As fast as each one of them wallows
In the blood that's to whitewash his soul.

We come in our rags and tatters,
And each one of us fawns and flatters
In talking of such pious matters,
Like a lot of heavenly tramps.

We claim for our revelation
That we are the favored nation,
With the genuine, true salvation
Sufficient for knaves and scamps.

We tell Thee the same old story
Of the young as well as the hoary,
How we'll give Thee great chunks of glory,
Which costs us nothing to say.

We ask in return to be able
To accumulate wealth that is stable
In exchange for this pious old fable,
And to Thee we'll constantly pray.

—THOMAS CURTIS.

"You poor little boy! On the streets in rags such a day as this. Have you no home?" "Yes'm, I live in that house on the other side of the street." "You have no mother, have you, little child?" "Yes'm, she and forty other women are in there making embroidered night-gowns for the Zulus."

THE prize fight was the only subject of conversation in pub and palace, and at a dinner party the world-wise bishop was asked by a lady point blank whether he did not consider prize-fighting a brutal and degrading pursuit? "On the contrary, I highly approve of it. You see, there is always the probability of two blackguards getting a sound thrashing."

A Scotch divine took to preaching out of doors in the summer afternoons. He used to collect the people as they were taking the air by the side of a stream outside the village. On one occasion he had unfortunately taken his place on a bank, and fixed himself on an ants' nest. The active habits of these little creatures soon made the position of the intruder upon their domain very uncomfortable, and, afraid that his audience might observe something of this discomfort in his manner, he apologized by the remark: "Brethren, though I hope I have the word of God in my mouth, I think the devil himself has gotten into my breeks."

A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1898.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: The remedy you sent is working like a charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. Have only been using it one week, and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right.

Yours respectfully, J. R.

REMARKS—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle-aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, but who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out-and-out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors.

DR. FELLOWS.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future

Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously written. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

NEWS AND NOTES.

The afternoon was just glimmering into dim gold amidst the abrupt and bare peaks and swelling mounds, when Indian valley, lying far down in the bosom of the shining scene, opened on the view like a smiling garden. No wonder that the Indians used to gather here, for this might seem like a happy hunting-ground to the tired wanderer among the hills, and a place of peaceful repose. Hamilton is now the name it goes by, after the oldest settler in these regions. The village is not very large, but it gives a pleasant aspect as we drive up to Franklin's, where the good host gives kindly entertainment. Just as we enter the inclined plane that leads from the mountains to the valley, Charlie Sweek and his little wife are hastening to the rendezvous, horseback, for that is the way much of the traveling is done in this country. About four miles from Hamilton his cabin gleams in the midst of the forest by the singing stream, where the mill is rattling merrily away, cutting off the giant trees and opening the fruitful soil to the sunshine. Mr. and Mrs. Sweek are Liberals whose enthusiasm is inspiring. So long as they are in the vanguard I know that failure is impossible, and with Mr. and Mrs. Platter bringing up the solid artillery in conjunction with this flying cavalry, of course the ranks are unbroken. Franklin, at whose house I stay, is one of the old settlers, and along with Hamilton's his ranch is quite a resort and camping-place for the stockmen, herders, etc., as they pass from point to point. The inhabitants of this country, like the sea, are ever in motion. There is very little of what is called farming. Hardly enough hay or vegetables or fruit is raised for home consumption. It is mostly cattle and sheep that make the wealth of the land. Within a radius of twenty miles of Hamilton are one hundred and twenty thousand sheep. In Grant county there are sixteen thousand horses and fifty thousand cattle. In one year twenty-seven thousand cattle have been sold and exported from Grant and Harney counties. The bunch grass, however, is being destroyed, and there are not more than one-half the number of cattle that were on the ranges ten years ago. The drouth has lasted two or three years. The crops, however, have been as good as the average throughout the state. Wheat, barley, and oats are produced quite abundantly. In some places this year seventy-five bushels of barley have been produced to the acre. If there was plenty of rain this would be one of the wealthiest sections of the coast. In many places the lack of rain has produced a desolating effect. Once-smiling farms are now like arid deserts along the Columbia and Snake rivers.

Maxwell Ramsby, returning from Canyon City, gives me welcome as we emerge from the dust of the mountain road. Schoolmaster Lewis, of Fox, is also at Franklin's. He and Lyons and Cobb come with a camping outfit prepared to follow the campaign through night and day. Altogether I found the scene quite a busy one in this secluded burg. There are not only brave men but fair women, and a gratifying audience fills the little hall where I speak. Here I meet for the first time Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Sweek, father and mother of my redoubtable comrade, C. V. Sweek, or Charlie, as the neighborly cognomen is. I lectured Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, and the reception was cordial. My friends, the Wainscots and all their children, are over from Fox. There was quite a representative gathering. After the lecture I say good-bye to Fox valley friends—a good-bye with bright remembrance and forward look. I expect to return next summer. They are to have three lectures at Fox instead of one. This and Hamilton are about twenty-five hundred feet above the level of the sea, and this is altogether too high for orthodoxy. These breezy, sunny plains and vales are for the splendors of Freethought.

Sunday evening, with Charlie Sweek and his wife and Willie Sweek, his brother, and Mr. and Mrs. Harvey Sweek, I journey to the ranch of the latter, a little house like a bird's nest hanging on the side of the hills. Before the eye spreads a beautiful and magnificent panorama of mighty hills and canyons. I could not have had a more delightful time if I had been in a gorgeous palace. Nature gives a splendid display, and as for humanity, I could not find a more glowing fellowship than in this family of Freethinkers. They are heart and soul in the cause. Mrs. Almira Sweek, the mother, was for years in the shadow of the churches, but now she stands in the broad mountain light of Freedom. Harvey Sweek crossed the plains with our friends, the Davidsons, of Oswego, and quite strange adventures he met with on that journey—traveling alone part of the time and meeting Indians and all sorts of white folk. Freethought is in his blood and brain. He was born to Radicalism as the bird is born to sing. He can talk and has half a century of experiences to pour forth. I enjoyed my night and morning on this mountain side. I had a good sleep, and my waking hours were filled with rattling reminiscences of frontier fortunes.

I was going to start from friend Sweek's after dinner Monday, but all at once by a sudden inspiration, I know not from where—it might have been from some guardian angel—it popped into my mind that I must be at Monument, twelve miles away, at 2 p.m., for lecture. Then there was "mounting in hot haste," and in about fifteen minutes the wagon was thundering down the hills to the bed of the John Day river with Charlie Sweek and myself. Mrs. Sweek could not go with us, for her little canary bird had been left all alone in the forest cabin singing its heart out in solitary confinement, and its gentle mistress must go and feed it and give it a chance to mingle its melody with the sunshine and flowers. The next time we will take that canary with us.

At about half-past two we heave in sight of the Monument school-house—not much bigger than a nut-shell, amidst the vast sand-hills. However, there were saddle-horses and wagons about, and evidently the people were gathered. I was just in time, and had to make my toilet outside, wash off the dust and comb my hair by the reflection of the sun, put on a clean collar and adjust my necktie without any reference to a mirror. In five minutes I was ready to proceed on “The Demands of Liberalism.” After the discourse we went down to Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Putnam’s for supper, for another lecture, and then for a dance. Passing through this mountainous country, where only occasionally a green spot is seen among the innumerable sand wastes and volcanic boulders, I was wondering how any audience could be gotten for a lecture, or whence the young folks were to congregate for the quadrille and the waltz. Joe Putnam could play the fiddle, and I could lecture if need be to the bare walls, but I could not do all the dancing, and I don’t think Grandpa Burston could do it either, although he is full of life and almost eighty years of age. But as the shades of evening begin to fall, the young men and maidens gather, and the elders followed suit, and like the men of Roderick Dhu, it seemed as if somebody sprang from every thicket. I had a room full for the lecture. After the lecture the crowd increased wondrously. The house could not hold all, and the company overflowed into the surrounding grove. Only about a forth could dance at a time, but they kept falling in, and the music flung its rapid strokes, and the building from roof to floor did not cease to shake with the merry-making until the dawn was on the hills. I went to bed about ten o’clock, and dozed off and on to the rhythmic measures. It was like trying to sleep on a ship where the waves beat in everlasting motion. About midnight I heard the cry for supper, and was fain, like the prodigal son, to arise and partake of the fatted calf—or deer, I believe, for Putnam had brought down his game the day before in the Rudio canyon, but I concluded to keep my appetite until morning, and dream the happy hours away. It was a jolly assembly. Nobody can know what a good time they have in the deserts of Oregon unless they go there and see. The people throng from twenty miles around, and make the most of the occasion as they

“Chase the glowing hours with flying feet.”

I am up early in the morning. I must be at Haystack the next day, and an awful journey lies before. I must climb three mountains on a bare trail, and hang midway between earth and heaven, ascending and descending the rocky declivities. Sometimes the horses tower above at an angle of forty-five degrees, and sometimes we bend over the horses at the same inclination as we roll down into the gullies. If the road was any worse we could not traverse it. If it was any steeper we should tumble pell mell. If it was any more “sidling” we should pitch over into the canyons beneath. It was quite interesting in diabolical situations, and just good enough to save our necks from breaking. It is the worst highway on the Pacific Coast. Like Topsy, it “grewed.” No mortal hand could construct a road like this. It is beyond human ingenuity. It could only come by a process of “natural selection.” I believe it is as near “total depravity” as nature ever got.

Before taking this venturesome journey I say good-bye to comrade Charlie Sweek, who returns to Hamilton. I thank him for his untiring devotion and cheerful help through the toils of the campaign.

I was glad to meet Grandpa Burston, in whose English veins flows the fiery blood of the Chartist revolution. He is vigorous yet in his old age, and the flame of thought is bright as ever. For half a century he has been in the ranks, and always on the alert. He introduced me at the lectures with the dignity and grace of a veteran soldier.

John McHaley and family I was also glad to meet. The McHaley’s are all Liberals, I believe, and are well-known throughout the county. They don’t seem to be afraid of their colors.

Tuesday noon, Joe Putnam and myself reach Long Spring, where in the shade of the willows we take lunch. This spring is perennial, and flows on, drouth or no drouth. Its twinkling path down the hillside is marked by a line of willows. The shade and cool waters are grateful.

My namesake, Joe Putnam, is a splendid campaigner. He came to this country ten years ago with just two dollars in his pocket. His father is of the Campbellite church, and like myself, he was brought up in the tenets of orthodoxy, but he didn’t take to it, and not having books to read he found consolation in the music of the heterodox violin, which he plays skillfully, and by whose strains the dance went on at Monument and Haystack. He grew naturally to Freethought, and has mastered nearly all its best literature. Paine was his first teacher. He has now a fine ranch and a band of about sixty horses where the famous Persian breed is mingling, and has both a poet and a philosopher’s delight in the strength and beauty of these animals.

Haystack is an odd-looking place. It is a kind of jumbled-up valley in the midst of scattered hills, and you hardly know when you get into it. It is named after a mound near the centre of it which has the form and color of a haystack. Around this the Indians and hunters were wont to camp, and gave the name. There are several haystacks however. This is a kind of series of valleys. You go from one to another as from chamber to chamber in some immense building. Vast rocky heights hem it about in grotesque shapes. The whole country through which I am now traveling is marvelous in its aspects. Its fossil remains are very wonderful and curious. The Princeton party has just been through here on a collecting tour. These vast canyons and precipitous hills hold the treasures of innumerable ages. Volcanoes have heaved here, and tremendous floods have rolled. The scenery has a desolate, weird character. The mountains appear like great walls with palisade after palisade built in their massive sides. Here are the debris of the tumult of immemorial years. Giant forces have met in the tug of battle, water and fire in magnificent battalions, each sweeping against the other, each defeating and each victorious, and leaving behind in scarred and broken cohorts remnants of the mighty combat. As I look upon these fierce and ragged forms mingling in indescribable confusion and grandeur, it seems as if the battle were not yet over; the ranks are threatening still, some with blood-red pennons, and gray and yellow and emerald flags interlacing in the frowning rocks. I imagine the primeval world before me, and that man himself has not walked amidst these superb ruins. One can scarcely think of civilization as he beholds this im-ment of wilderness that is like a statuesque ocean, its billows stopped in mid career.

I expected a good time at Haystack, for the Liberals have conquered this valley, but my hopes were surpassed by the reality. If I had struck Paradise, Adam and Eve, and all, I could not have enjoyed the prospect better, for they have eaten of the forbidden fruit here, and know a thing or two.

We went first up to the further end of the valley, where, amidst the orchards and beneath the tall poplars snugly held in by the gray hills, is the home of Mr. and Mrs. William Gates, and here I find royal welcome. In the evening Mrs. Hayden and her daughters, Miss Mary and Miss Lillie, visited us from their ranch near by and brought good news as to the way the cooking was going on at Ramsby's—the cake and pie and the mutton and turkey that were being made ready for the forthcoming picnic. I went early to bed, and never awoke until the refreshing dawn sent its glittering messengers into the room, and the breakfast bell was ringing. About noon Putnam and myself, "the other Putnam," arrive at Ramsby's. Already the friends are gathering. The peach orchard is laden and the luscious grapes are shining. On the way down we overtake Carl Wagner and his sister, Miss Lavinia. Carl, like the wise virgins, has his lamp full of oil. Miss Lavinia has the bouquet of flowers for the Freethought stand.

So both light and beauty are prepared for our way. The hall is beautifully ornamented with festoons and mottoes, among them Paine's, "The world is my country and to do good my religion." The ladies here are enthusiastically Liberal and give their best efforts for the grace and honor of the festival. They blend the beautiful with the true.

At two o'clock quite a crowd is gathered, and I discourse on the Demands of Liberalism. After the lecture I am invited to a leg of turkey and such other things as every wandering pilgrim delights to contemplate. After a free and easy social time, at early candle light I begin another discourse and keep on for an hour or two until it is time for the dancing to begin. The crowd increases, until at midnight I don't know how many are enjoying the brilliant scene. Really in the heart of the Oregon wilderness there is the style and eclat of metropolitan life. The women are as elegant as in the city, and the men have the fashion and polish of Broadway. They come from sixty miles off—from far Antelope—and never in these parts was there a more splendid assembly. It was called by our Christian friends an "Infidel dance," but it beat every other festive occasion in the valley within the memory of man. I concluded to keep awake until supper time, for I knew that Mrs. Hayden had cooked a very excellent cake, and I thought that was a good time to "take the cake." The table was loaded with grapes and peaches from Ramsby's own place, and California itself could not surpass the flavor of these delicious fruits. It was a feast fit for the gods. Nature's best and woman's most cunning hand contributed to the royal entertainment. The dance continued all night, and rosy morn- ing saw the bright company disperse.

I went to bed about midnight and arose with the sun. I must be on my way betimes for Lone Rock. I bid good-bye to com- rade Joseph Putnam at Haystack. Well, I feel proud of the name I bear and that it has such a staunch and generous repre- sentative where the Monument mountains stand, beaten by many centuries of wind and storm, with mighty histories written in their rugged hearts and pictured on their beaming fronts, greet- ing the morning and the evening sky with lustrous peaks—there shall the flag of freedom fly more glittering than all the arrows of the rushing dawn.

Maxwell Ramsby gave me a representative hand-shake. Fair friends who were calmly sleeping while the silver morn was waking had delegated him to give the farewell grip to the Secular Pilgrim, and it was given with good-will, and never has any wel- come and good-bye made my heart beat with brighter hope.

William Collins takes me over to Lone Rock, twenty miles away. But twenty miles here is equal to about sixty miles on ordinary roads. We have to walk most of the distance up and down the hills. We pass by the Haydens and Gateses, and once again say good-bye to these new friends, who seem like old friends in their warm-hearted entertainment. Down in a valley, Kahler Basin by name, we stop at the home of Dr. Hughes and brother, where we take dinner and discourse philosophy. The doctor is Liberal, but his brother don't like to give up the good old way; still he can give the right hand of fellowship to the In- fidel. A little further on we meet Postmaster McFlyng, who is not quite ready to fling our colors, but don't find much to differ with in the lectures. However, his boys have signed the roll. At sunset the Lone Rock valley appears. It looks like some dale hidden in the heart of the Alps, so closely do the mountains encompass it. It is a land of promise after our weary journey. As it is supper time and Collins is hungry and sleepy, having been up all the night before and traveled all the day, and as I am to lecture in the evening, I will drop these news and notes, "to be continued."

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Betwixt Haystack and Lone Rock, Sept. 19, 1889.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION FOR INDIANS.

So far as the masses are concerned, religious education stops just as soon as the aims of the church are reached. Whenever the pupil has been made perfectly subservient to the church, edu- cation ceases. The object is to make a devoted slave, and noth- ing higher. To make a free, independent, energetic, and self- reliant man is entirely foreign to its purpose. It is never attempted, and never achieved, save by some mistake.

So we find that the Jesuit fathers in California boast of having civilize the native Indian. They converted him, attached him to the mission as a vassal and worker, and there ended his educa- tional course. Not one ever rose above that. There was an ar- rested development. Had the missions stayed till now, there would have been only priest and slave.

When General Grant was president it was thought that our Indians would be the better for schools in the hands of churches and churchmen. The inspector-general now says it is not a suc- cess. The schools make Methodists, Baptists, or Roman Catholics, but nothing more. Just as soon as the Indian mind has been en- tirely subdued to the will of the church, there is the same arrested development, and no worthy specimen has arisen from these schools fit to be called an American citizen. The religion of abject obedience forbids an advance to the state of true man- hood.

Furthermore, the forms of religion are preferred and taught and acquired, rather than the principles of liberty, justice, and humanity. Sometime ago a small tribe in Arizona, under the tuition of the Catholic church, had occasion to make a warlike raid on their neighbors. They captured some women and young children, and literally followed the example of Moses, as set out in the thirty-first chapter of Numbers. They "slew all the males among the little ones, and kept all the young women for themselves." Their Christian training, however, led them to baptize the boys before dashing their brains out against the rocks.

What training! It had done nothing to prevent war, to save human life, even child life. It did not spare the captured women from sexual slavery. It did not suggest even a less cruel death than dashing their brains out against the rocks. But it did suggest a mere form and ceremony, baptism, before the bloody ordeal.

Yet this is the religion that professes to be the mother of morality, and the handmaiden of a just God! The history of Europe, from the tenth to the sixteenth century, shows that the church of Rome has been just like these Indians. Morality, humanity, and justice it had none, but it never failed to say mass and baptize the most obstinate heretics before killing them.

We should investigate these religious preachers for the Indians, and if we find them teaching any forms and ceremonies, instead of justice, liberty, independence, and humanity, we should say, "Away with them! Better the naked savage than the fanatic fiend that baptizes infants and then dashes their brains out."

THE CHURCH AND BRUNO.

It has taken the pope of Rome and his college of cardinals ever since the 9th of last June to decide what they are going to do about the statue of Bruno which the Freethinkers unveiled in Rome on the date mentioned, and it is becoming evident that they have determined to arouse such a state of feeling against the monument as will lead to its removal. The pope has issued his allocution denouncing the work, and now the cardinals and archbishops are at it. Gibbons of Baltimore sends this pastoral to his flock:

"A mingled feeling of righteous wrath and deep sympathy was bred in every Catholic heart when the news came that in Rome impious men dared to unveil the statue of an apostate monk to the admiration and veneration of the thousands assembled, dragging the memory of a wild theorizer, a shameless writer, and denier of the divinity of Christ, from the obscurity of a grave that had for three centuries closed upon its disgrace.

"These men, backed by mere brute force, have set upon a pedestal in the holy city the statue of the infamous Bruno.

"Such a proceeding is a flagrant outrage upon the Catholic and Christian world. It is a deliberate and well-aimed blow at all that is sound and wholesome in religion and morals. Its animus is clear, from selection of time and place and the unchristian and defiant language employed in the unveiling of a statue of a man whose whole life breathed cowardice, pride, and defiance of lawfully constituted authority. In their frantic efforts after mis-called freedom they have spurned the truth, which alone could make them free.

"Theirs is not the action of decent, honorable but misguided men, calmly, and with due regard to the feelings of others, promulgating a new belief. Their attempt is not so much to honor Bruno as to insult and vilify the vicar of Christ and his devoted children through Christendom.

"They have chosen, as the committee to further the movement, the champions of Atheism, the would-be destroyers of the very foundations of Christianity.

"It is proper that the Christian world, and especially this portion, and where the term 'religious freedom' is understood in a Christian sense, should brand with their indignant scorn an action such as this.

"We are not yet ready for processions in which the red and the black flags of revolutionists and Anarchists are defiantly flaunted."

If, in the face of such audacious lying and misrepresentation as the cardinal indulges in, one could keep his temper he might inquire why the Freethinkers have not the same right to erect statues to martyrs in their cause that Christians have to similarly honor those who have died to attest their sincerity of belief in religious superstition. What Freethinker ever justified the murder of Sir Thomas More, put to death by Protestants, or what Infidel ever objected to a monument being raised to him or any other Catholic martyr? Cardinal Gibbons states that the Bruno memorial was intended to insult and vilify the pope and his church. Well, it may go as such; but let us inquire of Cardinal Gibbons what object he had in view in writing the pastoral letter reproduced above. Is that letter free from any attempt to "insult and vilify" Freethinkers? If not, he is guilty of the same offense he charges upon the disciples of Bruno, and with less provocation; because the Freethinkers attack the church for murdering a hero, while the Christian world is called upon by this cardinal to "brand with their indignant scorn" the Freethinkers for honoring him. Is appreciation as great a crime as murder?

Archbishop Corrigan of New York has also issued a pastoral on the same subject. It is equally violent, and much longer than the cardinal's. Archbishop Ryan of Philadelphia follows suit. This last prelate denounces the Bruno celebration as an "insulting ceremony" and a "wretched expression of wounded envy," and seeks to prejudice the king of Italy by claiming that it was "as anti-royal as anti-papal." The pastoral is a plea for the re-establishment of the temporal sovereignty of the pope, and contains this significant declaration:

"We cannot help thinking that it does not become a mighty organization of over two hundred millions of people to look on quietly; to behold their supreme pastor on earth insulted in his capital."

This may be properly regarded as an exhortation to the two hundred million Catholics of the world to wrest the city of Rome from the dominion of the Italian government by force, and to place the vicar of Christ once more upon the throne of the Cæsars.

Cardinal Gibbons says we are not ready for revolution, but it appears that Archbishop Ryan is not only ready but anxious for it.

Other prelates are yet to be heard from. The "indignant scorn" called for by the American Cardinal will of course reach San Francisco. We may expect from our own Riordan a deliverance that will make the Catholics hate Freethinkers worse than they do now, and San Francisco Catholics are at present the most bigoted and hateful it has ever been our fortune to come in contact with. The pope's Irish, the pope's Italian, and the pope's Mexicans of this coast surpass those of all other sections of America in ignorance, bigotry, superstition, and crime.

We are ready to admit that in addition to honoring Bruno the Freethinkers who erected his monument desired to express their disapprobation of Roman Catholicism. But what is the object of the Catholic church? Is it to glorify God, as it professes? Is it to save souls? Is it to make the world better, happier, and more enlightened? We know, and these cardinals and archbishops know, that its object is nothing of the kind. These cardinals and archbishops know as well as we do that their God, their Christ, and their Virgin Mary are myths and inventions; that their hell, their purgatory, and their heaven exist nowhere outside their own imaginations. They know that the Catholic church is simply a big political machine, no more holy than other political machines. Their declarations of piety are hypocritical, like the patriotic sentiments of demagogues. Their ceremonial is mere claptrap, like the partisan demonstrations which precede elections. As Thomas Paine said, miracles are the hocus-pocus of religion, and parables are its lingo. The politician, the juggler, and the priest are the trinity that keep the simple-minded in open-mouthed awe; the first by working upon their prejudices; the second, their credulity; and the third their prejudices, credulity, and superstitions. And the worst of these is the priest. The politician will sometimes admit that he works for the interest of himself and party; the juggler does not conceal that he aims to deceive, but the priest practices a despicable hypocrisy that makes him ten times more execrable than the others.

While it is to be deplored that such sentiments as those expressed by the pope, cardinal, and archbishops exist in any human breast, it is fortunate for the world that this Bruno celebration has so angered the church as to throw its dignitaries off their guard and betray their real intentions. We now know what to expect. We may look for an unceasing attack of the Vatican upon the Bruno monument until one or the other disappears from Rome, and for perpetual warfare of Catholicism upon Freethought until one or the other disappears from the earth.

TAYLOR'S "DIEGESIS."

The following letter contains a suggestion worth being acted upon:

To the Editors of Freethought:

I have just read "Agnosticism," the discussion between Professor Huxley and the Rev. Dr. Wace. It seems strange to me that in all the discussions on that subject in late years, and among all the biblical critics quoted on both sides, not one has alluded to Taylor's "Diegesis," while both sides seem to concede the personality of Christ and his apostles as they do that of Cæsar and his generals. Is it possible that Taylor's argument is a failure, or is it another case where silence is the only answer possible? Seeing that Agnostics do not allude to it in any way, would it be presumptuous to think that even Mr. Huxley is not aware that there is such a work? Is it not likely that it has been out of print in England for at least fifty years?

Now if the editor of FREETHOUGHT were to send him a copy of the "Diegesis" with a request for his opinion of the value of the historical part of it, his notice of it would place it before the world as no other man's could. I have no doubt that if you send a copy, and if Mr. Huxley can find time in the intervals of his seemingly interminable brushing away of ecclesiastical mosquitoes (thirsting for his blood) to review it, that in two or three months we may get an answer. I will stand the expense.

Yours,

JOHN BEAUMONT.

Harris, Humboldt Co., Cal.

Our contemporary, Mr. C. A. Watts, of Watts & Co., publishers of the Literary Guide, 17 Johnson's Court, Fleet street, London, is or has been, we believe, in correspondence with Professor Huxley. Perhaps, as Mr. Beaumont surmises, Taylor's "Diegesis" is out of print in London, but if it is not, Mr. Watts is hereby solicited to procure a copy and forward it to Professor Huxley, together with this paper. If the "Diegesis" is not obtainable in London, Mr. Watts may communicate with its American publisher, J. P. Mendum, Paine Memorial Building, Appleton street, Boston, Mass., who will transmit the work to Professor Huxley and charge the same to our account. For all expense incurred by Watts & Co., they will be promptly indemnified upon reporting to us. Mr. Huxley, we have no doubt, will be pleased to learn that as far away as this western border of the American continent he is read with interest and appreciation, and that the dweller in London town is not beyond the watchful ken of the rancher of Humboldt county, California.

At the close of the Portland Convention Samuel P. Putnam will give his now somewhat celebrated lecture, "Moody and Sam Jones Reviewed," at Masonic Hall, Portland, Tuesday evening, Oct. 1

THE SAN FRANCISCO FREETHOUGHT SOCIETY.

The next meeting of the San Francisco Freethought Society will be held at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, Sunday evening, October 6, at 8 o'clock. Professor Miller will speak on "Matter and Spirit."

WHEN the National Conference of Charities and Correction was in session here, the Rev. Thomas Uzzell came as one of the delegates. We do not know where he hailed from, but he went away toward the East, and when he got as far as Denver he paused to remark:

"San Francisco is one great house of prostitution. It is the most abominable place I ever saw in my life. This great moral leprosy is devouring it as a whole. It is a wonder that God in righteous indignation does not open up the earth and swallow the city so that it may no longer contaminate the pure air of heaven. No wonder they have earthquakes there."

It always takes visitors, and clerical ones at that, to find out the real wickedness of this city. They generally point for Chinatown and Barbary Coast on the evening of their arrival, investigate Dupont street the second night, and wind up at Tar Flat on the third. Meanwhile they have not taken the trouble to make the acquaintance of the reputable portions of the city. As a rule they have come to San Francisco to see the elephant, and it is told on good authority that religious bodies like the conference of charities, moved by a sense of duty, spend much time in places which reputable residents never visit. The Rev. Mr. Uzzell should know that if he digs downward anywhere he will ultimately strike mud; while if he searches in the other direction he will reach a totally different and much more pleasing result. Which way a man habitually looks depends on his tastes and temperament.

EDITOR BARRY of the San Francisco Weekly Star was sentenced last Monday to five days' imprisonment and a fine of $500 for contempt of court. The contempt consisted in an editorial criticism of the ruling of a local judge, published in the Star. We cannot judge of the merits of the case, not being a lawyer, but it strikes us that the judiciary is carrying things with a tolerably elevated hand, and we beg leave to extend our congratulations to Mr. Barry—that is, we wish to congratulate him that he escaped being shot.

THE Annual Convention of the Canadian Secular Union, held September 14 and 15, at Toronto, is reported by Secular Thought as a most successful event. The following officers were elected: President, Capt. Robert C. Adams, of Montreal; secretary, J. A. Risser, of Toronto; treasurer, A. Earsman, of Toronto. A very full and interesting report of the convention is given in Secular Thought of September 21.

IN contrasting Mormons with Chinamen the Utah Commission has made a great mistake. The Chinese have none of the virtues of the Mormons, but they have all their vices and a lot more peculiar to themselves. And there is this further difference—that Mormon polygamy is based on a sense of religious duty, while Chinese depravity arises from innate cussedness.

THE California Athletic Club set a noble example in ejecting and disgracing the two pugilists who fought a "fake" fight for a draw last week. If compromising and bargaining are to be allowed in the ring, pugilism will soon become as corrupt as religion and politics, which now divide the stakes, in the form of taxes, which the people put up for them.

This language is credited to the Rev. Dr. Holland, of St. Louis, who spoke at the Cleveland meeting of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, September 27:

"All men are not equal. We are not born equal, and we never can be equal, and the idea that God created men equal grew out of the superstition and the infidel ignorance of an age that has passed away. It is God's law that some men shall be greater than others, and all the Anarchy and the Communism and the Atheism of the world cannot change it."

When a clergyman desires to make a notion unpopular he attributes its origin to Anarchy, Communism, or Atheism. The Rev. Dr. Holland should know, however, that human equality is the foundation of republicanism and democracy, and that to deny such equality is a more dangerous attack upon this government than was ever contemplated by Anarchists or Communists.

THE arrest of George Francis Train in Boston recalls events which were of considerable interest at the time they occurred. John A. Lant in 1875 published at Toledo, Ohio, a paper called the Toledo Sun, to which Mr. Train was a contributor, and when Lant wanted to borrow some money Train indorsed his note. Lant went to New York, and was arrested by Anthony Comstock for publishing obscene reading matter. It was about this time that one Dr. Spiller loaned Lant $321, Train indorsing the note. Lant couldn't pay it, Train wouldn't; and now, fourteen years later, Train is arrested on an execution. The principal and accrued interest of the debt reach the sum of $1,000.

JOHN J. PLUNKETT, formerly editor of the Christian Science Magazine, is said to be in San Francisco. When Plunkett was in the Christian science business in New York, a short time ago, he had a wife, also a Christian scientist, and a promising disciple named Worthington, likewise full of Christian science. A few months since Mrs. Plunkett and Mr. Worthington were discovered to be in close relations; Plunkett sued for a divorce, and his wife and Worthington fled. Thus it is that John J. Plunkett is a wanderer upon the face of the earth, and that Christian science, as represented by himself and family, has fallen into innocuous decay.

Two new reform publications are in the field—the "Golden Perhaps," and "Looking Forward." The former is a Liberal journal started at Denver, Col., and the latter a Nationalist magazine issuing from San Diego, Cal. We wish long life to both, but we are not expecting anything more than is reasonable.

THIS number of FREETHOUGHT will reach a thousand people who are not subscribers. All are invited to subscribe. Single subscriptions are $2 per year, but in order to get new patrons we will give two subscriptions for $3; three for $4, or four for $5. Address Putnam & Macdonald, 504 Kearny street, San Francisco.

DONORS will please accept grateful acknowledgements for the following sums advanced to help the cause: Frank Butler, $1; N. F. Griswold, $20; Samos Parsons, $10; A. W. Poole, $2.

OBSERVATIONS.

The following card explains itself:

An die Mitglieder des San Francisco Turn-Vereins:

GUT HEIL! Das 37te Stiftungs-Fest nebst Ball unseres Vereins findet Sonntag, den 6. October 1889, in Woodward's Garden statt. Nur solche Turner die am Ausmarsch betheiligen haben freien Eintritt und sind ebenfalls zu einer Eintrittskarte für Abends berichtigt. Abmarsch von der Halle punkt ½9 Uhr Morgens. DAS COMITE.

If there are any to whom the above does not explain itself they will find the nub of the matter in the advertisement on page 637 of this paper.

At the Freethought Society's meeting last Sunday evening Mr. E. G. Anderson spoke on "Humanity's Needs." Previous to the lecture Professor Joran warmed the piano into a state of activity, an eruption of brilliant music being the result.

Vice-President Lemme presided. Mr. Anderson, in his opening remarks, paid a high compliment to the speaker at the previous meeting, B. F. Underwood, whose name, he said, was known as far as the English language is spoken. Mr. Anderson felt the disadvantage of following so distinguished an orator and logician.

The burden of the discourse was industrial freedom. All had an equal right to the resources of the earth. No one, the speaker said, could be intellectually free who was economically enslaved. He thought it probable that a majority of his audience were slaves. Man had four natures to be looked after, physical, mental, moral, and spiritual. The first was the most important, because the others depend upon it, and were good or bad according to physical conditions. Mr. Anderson held that all classes of reformers should work together for physical improvement. He announced himself a Spiritualist, having scientific evidence of a future life, which no man who believed in evolution could deny; because, if life ended at the grave, progression thus ceased, and there was an end of evolution. The fact that evolution applies to the race instead of the individual does not seem to have entered into Mr. Anderson's consideration of the subject. After devoting the most vigorous language at his command to an argument against Materialism, and omitting to outline any system for the amelioration of human misery, the speaker closed by saying he hoped that we might sink our differences and co-operate.

Dr. O'Brock was the first critic, which is usually the case when he is present. He spoke rapidly and ramblingly for five minutes, when the chair called him to order and asked him to confine himself to the subject or to desist. Dr. O'Brock declined to do either, saying that all questions were related to one another; that what he had said had a world-wide significance and application to human needs, though everybody might not be able to see it, and that the chair had been very impolite in interrupting him. He then rambled backward over what he had previously said, and annihilated his full ten minutes. Dr. O'Brock is positively the worst public speaker I ever heard, and it seems to me it has been my luck to hear most of the bad ones. He is the terror of all societies in this city having an open platform. If he survives me I should like to have him make some remarks at my funeral. Then I would be sure that those who had to listen to him would regret the occasion that called him forth, and be sorry that I had died.

Other speakers followed, but interest in the proceedings was practically extinct. Mr. Curtis spoke briefly and pointedly. Mr. Knight moderately. Professor Miller learnedly. Then Mr. Anderson closed the discussion. He complained because the critics had assailed his notions on immortality, but he did not explain why he introduced them if he did not wish them to be discussed. He claimed that all present had immortal souls and would live forever in spite of themselves. Mr. Knight interrupted him to inquire if we did not have the privilege of committing suicide in the next world when we got enough of it, and Mr. Anderson replied that he didn't think we could do it.

I was surprised, as the audience was dispersing, to have several approach me and remark that the meeting had been one of the most interesting of the season. Vice-President Eastman claimed that he had enjoyed O'Brock's performance because he had heard him do so much worse before.

A very fine programme has been prepared for October. Professor Herbert Miller will open proceedings on the 6th with a lecture on "Matter and Spirit," with reference to the views of Dr. Jerome A. Anderson, who spoke before the society a short time since on "Good and Evil." On the 13th Dr. Anderson is expected to reply to Professor Miller; following, October 20, Mr. H. L. Knight will review both as a reconciler. On the evening of Sunday, the 27th, Hon. F. B. Perkins closes the month with an address on "Freedom and Slavery."

I made reference last week to the case of John Doe Bushrod, of 13 Cannibal Place, who, at the instance of Mrs. Maria Harry, was arrested on the charge of assault to murder; and told of his apprehension, imprisonment, examination, and release on my responsibility, pending trial.

The case came up for trial Wednesday, Sept. 25, in Old City Hall, the tumbledown ruin which fronts Portsmouth Square, on Kearny street, and which, when new, was the Jenny Lind Theatre. Judge Lawler sat upon the bench. Bushrod's attorney, Judge Sawyer, was at his post. He is almost as historical a figure as the Old City Hall itself. Years ago he was judge in the court where he now practices for moderate fees, and the other relics of those days who still hang about the place say that he was a great favorite with all and much respected. He had a habit of opening court at 7 o'clock in the morning, so that the cases of respectable citizens who had drank indiscreetly on the previous evening might be disposed of before reporters and spectators arrived.

Bushrod kept his word, and was present. I expect there are many courageous men who might have been tempted to leave the vicinity rather than face the charge of assault to murder, with several year's imprisonment to follow a possible conviction. Besides, he had no witnesses for himself except his own incoherent story, while there were two against him, and he had not the slightest confidence in the courts, which he regards as mere tools of monopoly and engines of oppression.

But the prosecuting party, Mrs. Harry, was there also. She made some mistake about the date, and came the day before and held down a very warm seat in the witness room from 10 o'clock in the morning until 4 in the afternoon, and her temper was high. Her principal witness did not appear, but the butcher and the baker from the corners of Cannibal Place did appear. They didn't go into court; they went into the witness room and labored with Mrs. Harry. The butcher had closed up his shop in order to come, and was losing his noon trade. The baker had three barrels of flour in the process of bread-making, and didn't know whether it was being spoiled or not. The butcher accused Mrs. Harry, in French, of ruining his business. The baker did the same in German, until the woman was ready to sacrifice everything, even to forego vengeance on Bushrod, for the sake of rest, and appealed to me to know to do. I gave the same answer about a score of times. I advised her to "withdraw the charge and go home." By the time the case was got before the court she had capitulated. The whole crowd of us gathered around the judge and prosecuting attorney. The woman said she would let Bushrod go if he would never speak to her again or come near her premises. Bushrod consented if she would let him alone, and the wearied judiciary dismissed the case.

I have given so much space to this affair, first, because it occupied two or three days of my time, and if I cannot get an item out of it, that time is a total loss. Secondly, it seems to demonstrate how easily a man without friends might be subjected to imprisonment and conviction of some infamous crime, even though innocent, for Judge Sawyer remarked to Bushrod that the latter owed more to my interference than to the argument of his counsel. At the same time it demonstrates how easily a man may be acquitted, even though guilty.

I do not know whether Bushrod assaulted Mrs. Harry with a knife or not. I don't believe he did, but on the testimony that she and her neighbor were prepared to give he might have got a year at San Quentin prison. It is not a very pleasant thought that the courts are employed every day in disposing of cases like this, and that possibly every day sees some harmless and innocent person lodged in the old City Hall station house, with the prospect that the building will fall on him before his case comes to trial.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

It is claimed that the Republicans carried the elections held last Tuesday in the four new states of Washington, Montana, and North and South Dakota. South Dakota adopted prohibition. Woman suffrage was defeated in all the new states.

C. A. Wetmore, of California, received the grand prize for wines at the Paris Exposition.—The monument executed by Sculptor Wells, of San Francisco, to be erected in honor of J. W. Marshall, the discoverer of gold in California, has been accepted by the committee, and will be unveiled at Coloma, El Dorado county, next May under the auspices of the native sons.—A vein of natural gas has been struck at Salinas, Monterey county. At last accounts it was filling an eight-inch pipe, and burning sixteen feet high.—Cigarmakers of San Francisco are worrying over the fact that the local cigar trade is falling off, ruined by Chinese cheap labor and Eastern enterprise.—Secretary Windom has informed the Collector of Customs of San Diego, Cal., that under the existing Chinese Exclusion Acts Chinese merchants doing business in the United States are not prevented from visiting Lower California and returning to the United States, as the Exclusion Acts relate solely to Chinese laborers.—Postmaster Bryan of San Francisco has applied to the postmaster-general for more assistants. It appears that the business of the office here has increased about 40 per cent in the past four years.—The steamer Alameda, which arrived from Australia last Saturday, brought about $2,250,000 in British gold. It represents a balance due on American products purchased in Australia. The gold will go to the mint and be coined into American money.—Jewish residents celebrated their New Year, last week Thursday.—It is proposed, by a company recently formed, to bring water to San Francisco from Lake Tahoe, over 200 miles away. The projectors offer to furnish a supply of 30,000,000 gallons per day for $15,000,000 in city bonds.—Major Powell, chief of the Geological Survey, who has been in attendance on the Senatorial Committee investigating the irrigation question in the West, says that the arid land that can be irrigated and made productive in states and territories visited will amount to over 100,000,000 acres. The work of the committee will conclude with the preparation of a report upon the advisability of Congressional appropriations for surveys in arid districts.

Butte, Mont., had a half-million dollar fire Sunday, which at one time threatened to destroy the whole business portion of the city.—The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has split over politics, and a non-partisan union will be formed.—Mrs. James G. Blaine, Jr., will sue her husband for a divorce.—It is reported that the commander of a United States war vessel asked to be relieved because Fred Douglass, the colored minister to Hayti, was to sail in his ship, and he objected to sitting at table with a negro. Douglass has sailed for Hayti in the U. S. man-of-war Kearsarge.—M. E. Billings, of Waverly, Iowa, upon retrial, has been found guilty of killing Kingsley, the alleged paramour of Billings's wife, and sentenced to imprisonment for life.—The Utah commission reports in favor of a constitutional provision against polygamy.—The Rev. George F. Pentecost, of Brooklyn, the evangelist, has been sued for $30,000 by Herbert T. Richards for alleged violation of contract. Richards alleges he engaged Pentecost to edit a magazine with the understanding that Pentecost would also quietly recommend its publication. The contract was made March 8, 1887. Pentecost, however, alleged he made a contract with the Rev. Joseph Cook of Boston some months later to edit a rival publication. Richard's magazine failed in consequence.—The number drowned in the Johnstown, Pa., disaster is officially placed at 3,000.—George Francis Train is in jail at Boston, Mass., for debt. He refuses to pay or take the poor debtor's oath.

Gladstone, in a recent speech, denounced land nationalization as robbery. This is directly contrary to the belief of many of Mr. Gladstone's strongest supporters.—A dispatch from London dated September 28 says: "To-day the ancient corporation of the city of London elected its lord mayor and two other sheriffs for the ensuing year. It is about as curious a combination as ever appeared at the head of any municipality in the world, as the new lord mayor, Alderman Isaacs, is a Jew, while one of the sheriffs is a Catholic, and his colleague an Atheist."—Eliza Cook, the poet, died at Wimbledon, Eng., Sept. 25. One of her poems best known in this country is "The Old Arm Chair."—The pope has appointed Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop Riordan, and another Western bishop to investigate the condition of affairs under Bishop Gilmour in the diocese of Cleveland, O. The state of things in the archdiocese of New York is unsatisfactory, too, and Archbishop Corrigan has been summoned to Rome.

THE PORTLAND CONVENTION, OCT. 12, 13, 14.

Alexander Hardy, of Lost Valley, sends in by Putnam five dollars. Mrs. Almira Sweek, fifty cents. William Sims, of Mill City, five dollars. S. M. Kelso, of Garden home, five dollars.

So many encouraging letters have been received that we feel unable to name them all. Moses Hull will not be able to reach here, and has gone East. I have invited Ex-Governor Robinson of Kansas, but have received no reply.

Liberals can do the convention good work by inviting persons on the way to join them at meetings, and hear and see.

Come resolved to block out work for another year. If not for yourselves, at least, for others to do who are ready and waiting to labor for the cause.

Remember the promise in our Gospel of Peace: "Where two or three meet together they may become filled with the religion of humanity, and be everlastingly saved from superstition."

C. BEAL,

President Oregon State Secular Union.

EAST PORTLAND, OR., Sept. 29, 1889.

C. BEAL, Dear Sir: I wish to say that we have secured a second hall for Monday evening to give ample room for the ball and lunch, and have arranged to give an entertainment in connection. The programme is not completed, but the music, so far as arranged, is:

Overture	ORCHESTRA
Chorus	DOUBLE QUARTETTE
Violin Solo	PROF. J. STEBINGER
Zither Duet	MESSRS. HAEKLIN and TURK

(Interspersed with numerous recitations.)

The floor managers for the ball are Dr. Semler, Captain DuBois, Mrs. Dr. Semler, Mrs. M. A. Buffington, and Mr. and Mrs. Justin.

On the Reception Committee are the following: Mrs. Judge Beal, Mrs. A. F. Neunert, Mrs. F. A. Saunders, Mrs. Lizzie Ewing, Mrs. Love, Miss Smith, and Miss Mattie Blaisdell, of Portland, and Mrs. E. A. Baylor, Mrs. G. H. McCord, Mrs. Alice Carver, and Miss Lettie Baylor, of East Portland.

On the Lunch Committee are Mrs. Taut, Mrs. Emma Neunert, and Miss Montgomery, of Portland, and Mrs. Sue Keenow, Mrs. Ella Payne, Mrs. Elsie Pierce, Mrs. Hattie Miller, Mrs. Tina Grant, Miss Laura Lucas, Misses Myrtle and Jessie McCord, Miss Maud Keenan, Miss Maggie McKinney, Miss Pearl Pierce, Miss Dora Powell, of East Portland, and Miss Wanda Bracht, of Vancouver, Wash.

Other names will be added to these committees, and the details will be arranged at the proper time. Mrs. CARRIE E. HAIGHT.

THE Glory of Infidelity. By Samuel P. Putnam. San Francisco: Putnam and Macdonald, 504 Kearny street. Price 10 cents. Mr. Putnam is proud to say he is an Infidel. The Infidel, he says, is he who is unfaithful. "Unfaithful to what? To that which is established, accredited; to that which almost everybody believes to be right. He is the unfashionable thinker; the minority of one." Mr. Putnam sees that it has been the doubter who has been the cause of all the progress of the world. Even orthodoxy he finds must thank Infidelity for keeping it "a live corpse," since such life as it has to-day consists in its efforts of defense. It shows its greatest activity in refusing to be buried. Mr. Putnam's essay or lecture has the right ring. It is crisp, healthy, and straight to the point. We hope it will have a wide circulation.—London Freethinker.

It is stated that there are no less than twenty-five Methodist ministers in Spokane Falls, W. T. Of these, nineteen are in business, three are teaching, two are pastors, and one is a presiding elder.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

To the Constitution of the American Secular Union.

PREAMBLE.

Whereas, The Constitution of the United States, in spirit and in letter, is framed in accordance with the principle of the total separation of church and state; and,

Whereas, Notwithstanding these facts, the administration of the National government, and the administration and constitutions of the several State governments, maintain numerous practical connections of the State with the Church, thereby violating the spirit of the United States Constitution; and,

Whereas, The welfare and peace of the republic, the equal religious rights and liberties of its citizens, require that all the political and educational institutions of the nation which are supported by taxation should be faithfully conformed to the spirit of the fundamental law; we hereby associate ourselves together and adopt the following

CONSTITUTION.

NAME.

ARTICLE I. The name of the association shall be the American Secular Union.

GENERAL OBJECT.

ARTICLE II. The general object of the association shall be to secure the total separation of church and state, to the end that equal rights in religion, genuine morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood be established, protected, and perpetuated.

ARTICLE III. As means for the accomplishment of this purpose the specific work of this society shall be to advocate,

(1) The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.

(2) The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.

(3) The repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution, rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons.

(4) The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character.

(5) The abolition of ecclesiastical chaplaincies paid out of the public treasury.

(6) The discontinuance of the practice of the appointment by the president of the United States and the governors of the several states, and other civil public officers, of religious festivals and fasts.

(7) The substitution of a solemn affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury in the courts and in all other departments of the government, in place of the common forms of a judicial oath.

(8) The defense through the courts of any American citizen whose equal religious and political rights are denied or who is oppressed on account of any opinions he may have held or expressed on the subject of religion.

(9) The promulgation by all peaceable and orderly means of the great principles of religious liberty and equal rights, devotion to truth for its own sake, and universal brotherhood on the ground of a common humanity; to secure the state from the encroachments of the church, and to foster the development of intelligence and morality, which constitute the all-sufficient basis of secular government.

NON-PARTISAN.

ARTICLE IV. The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both religion and politics. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but honestly welcomes all persons of whatever faith or party to its membership on the basis of "no union of church and state." The word secular is here used in the broadest sense, as applied to the state, and not to any system of religion or philosophy.

MEMBERSHIP.

ARTICLE V. Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the president and secretary, as an annual member of the American Secular Union, and shall be entitled to a vote in all meetings of the society, providing they shall have been members for three months immediately preceding. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury at once shall be entitled to a similar certificate, and shall have a vote without regard to the date of membership. All life members of the National Liberal League formed in 1876 shall be life members of the American Secular Union.

ANNUAL CONGRESS.

ARTICLE VI. The annual congress of the American Secular Union shall be held at such time and place and with such sessions as the board of directors may announce, and public notice of the congress shall be given at least one month previous. Other conventions of the Union may be held at such place and time as the board of directors shall appoint.

OFFICERS.

ARTICLE VII. The officers of the American Secular Union shall be a president, four vice-presidents, a corresponding secretary, and a treasurer, who together shall constitute a board of directors and shall hold their office one year or until others are elected. Four of these seven officers, on due notice to the whole, shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. The president, corresponding secretary, and treasurer shall constitute an executive committee, to act under the authority of the board. One or more field secretaries or traveling agents may be appointed by the directors to promote the general objects of the Union. Men and women shall be equally eligible to these offices.

ARTICLE VIII. The president shall preside at the public meetings of the association and at the meetings of the board of directors and the executive committee, and shall have the general direction and supervision of all business, under authority of the board.

SECRETARY.

ARTICLE IX. The corresponding secretary's duty shall be to keep the records and complete lists of life and annual members, and also full minutes of the meetings of the board of directors and of the executive committee, prepare and transmit to the newspapers of the country items of interest relating to the work of state secularization; keep a full list of auxiliary societies, and conduct such correspondence, under direction of the president, as usually pertains to such office, and shall make a condensed annual report to the society of the business of the year. His or her salary and the location of the office shall be settled by the board of directors.

TREASURER.

ARTICLE X. The treasurer shall receive and hold all funds of the Union subject to orders duly drawn by the secretary and countersigned by the president. He shall report the state of the finances of the Union at every annual congress, and oftener if required by the board of directors or executive committee; and upon the election of a successor he shall deliver to him all the property of the Union that he may hold.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

ARTICLE XI. The board of directors herein provided shall be entrusted with the direction and management of the affairs of the society, and shall make a condensed report of their doings to the annual congress. All appropriations from the treasury outside of fixed charges and ordinary expenses shall be by vote of the board of directors.

LOCAL AUXILIARY SOCIETIES.

ARTICLE XII. The executive committee shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by twenty or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars (or ten persons accompanied by five dollars), to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary union; and the committee in their discretion in special cases may issue a charter on application signed by ten or more names unaccompanied by the money in advance, but promised in the future. Auxiliary societies should adopt constitutions substantially similar to this constitution, but adapted to local wants. Local auxiliaries shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient co-operation of the freest kind with the American Secular Union and with other local unions. Neither shall the national society be responsible for the acts or utterances of local auxiliaries.

REPRESENTATION.

ARTICLE XIII. Every local auxiliary society organized in accordance with the provisions of this constitution shall be entitled to send its president and secretary and three other members as delegates to the annual congress, who shall have the right to speak and vote.

AMENDMENTS.

ARTICLE XIV. Amendments to this constitution may be made at any annual congress of the American Secular Union by a three-fourths vote of the qualified members present. But no amendment shall be made unless the proposed alteration shall have been published one month previous to the meeting.

Notice is hereby given that a motion will be made at the ensuing congress of the American Secular Union to strike out the preamble and constitution as they now stand and to substitute the above.

R. B. WESTBROOK, President.

September 19, 1889.

THE PROGRESS OF TRUTH.

The mind of man was born in darkness. For unknown ages it brooded in the gloom. It knew not its ignorance, or, if it had dim consciousness of something lacking, could not supply the want, and dully plodded on. Man had just escaped from beasthood and the beast clung to him strongly. Truth was to him only a true eye to draw an arrow, to dart a spear, to strike his late wild-beast brother a fair blow in a vital part. With unspeakable pity and a half-contempt we look back at that low-browed savage, whose highest ambition was to kill his prey or enemy, to glut his appetite and sleep away his surfeit. He seems an animal of another genus; but no, he was our progenitor!

And he was an enormous advance on his beginning. He had crept up through æons uncountable from the first germ of life to the stature of a man. One by one the senses were added to the growing form; one by one the organs of sense and motion were developed into greater power; step by step the growing brain mounted the throne of intellect. Man came forth from among his brother beasts and became their king. Once as they were, the gate of truth was opened and he entered a new world. He put his hand upon the lever of discovery and was suddenly whirled out into the land of knowledge. Yet then he knew not so much as does a child to-day. He seems almost as far away from us as does the ocean-ooze, in which he started, from himself. Knowledge in its revelation seems as indifferent to time as does the infinite to man. The pearls of truth drop slowly from the treasures of omniscience. For thousands of centuries man may pick and work at the rock of life and get but a bare existence; then comes a century when a bonanza of knowledge is struck, and he revels in his riches.

But no discovered mine of knowledge enriches the whole world equally, but chiefly the fortunate nation that possesses the discoverer and inherits his wealth. The discoverer may be neglected, be persecuted, may suffer unspeakably and perish because of his discovery. For the miner for truth, unlike the miner for gold, when he has found his treasure, by a strange paradox, may become impoverished, not enriched, impoverished of comfort, of friends, of all that pleases the taste and satisfies the appetite, of the approval of men, and the power that money brings.

For, singular fact in human history, while a few have desired truth, the majority have disliked it, and that is as true to-day as ever. The pure gold that was to enrich their understanding, they have spurned, cursed the finder, and flung him into chains or killed him. When Socrates told the Athenians that their gods were false, they condemned him to drink poison; when Galileo declared that the world moved he was imprisoned; when Giordano Bruno said that the fixed stars were suns, Rome burned him at the stake. Men have fought against the laws that brought them social order, have broken the machines that increased their personal comfort, have accused of trafficking with the devil the chemists whose researches have incalculably enriched mankind, have excommunicated the geologists who have explained the structure of the earth, have called blasphemy free speech which tore the veil from delusion, have always hounded, hunted, hated, and tried to kill that truth which was to make them free. The giant vanity of man has always wrestled fiercely and brutally with young truth. Again and again must knowledge pry away the boulders of prejudice that lie across its path. Opinion once formed changes slowly, and it is more difficult to cast out error than to make a fortune. We cannot think highly of the character of man's mind when we consider the opposition he has made to his own enfranchisement. The cause of this obstinacy in wrong is vanity, a disease of the understanding, the quicksand of reason, a wall against knowledge, the unforgiving enemy of truth. Man is ashamed to acknowledge his mistakes, and would rather persist in his errors than confess that he is wrong. This infirmity of the mind blinds his eyes and blocks his own pathway.

We need not pity overmuch that early savage man. He knew not his own ignorance. He was satisfied with his savagery, and thought it knowledge. So dense is man's self-conceit that he cannot see through it the sunlight of truth, or if he sees it, fears it as a fire that will consume the paper-dolls of his adoration. Man hugs his delusions, his governments by divine right, his paternal government, his party government, the dead corpse of his religions, his imagined god, his fancied heaven. He cherishes them long after life has departed from them, because habit has made them familiar, and pride chokes the breath of truth that would pronounce them false.

The last great struggle of our age was against the slavery of the body. The present war is against the slavery of the intellect. The prosperous middle class as a body, many of the rich, and great masses of the working people of this country, in particular the Catholics, are in a state of intellectual slavery to the power of the church. The minor dogmas of the church may be freely discussed where some degree of intellectual liberty has been gained. The numerous divisions into which the church itself is split by quarrels over doctrine compels this concession. But all must accept the great teachings of the personality of Christ and the necessary existence of the church itself.

The Unitarians, who deny the divinity of Christ, have by degrees compelled a social recognition in some of the larger cities and towns of the land, and have attained an established position. But in nine-tenths of the land they are unrepresented by organization, and condemned and denounced by ministers and priests and the great majority of the members of the Christian churches.

If such is the position of Unitarians, what is that of Freethinkers, who go much farther and accept only as true that which science, the highest organized knowledge, proves? At the name of Unitarian the orthodox church pulls a grave face, and prophesies solemn destruction, but at that of Freethinker it grows pale with horror, then boils with rage and charges like a bull that has seen a red rag. Freethought means the destruction of church domination, the absolute overthrow of the church itself as an institution, the abandonment of the principles on which the organization of the church rests. No wonder that the church trembles at the name, and brings forth every weapon in its armory to crush, kill, annihilate this foe to its supremacy. Reason it has not, though of sophistry and pretense an abundance. The prison-cell, the rack, the fire are no longer possible as punishments for its opponents, but there are mental and moral tortures which it can inflict upon its foes, and these it uses sparingly.

Freethought, it thunders, is not respectable. Respectability is a club that has dashed out the life of many a child of the brain. Many a germ of doubt that would have flowered into knowledge has been crushed by the weight of this weapon.

What is respectability? That to which respect is due. But is respect due to a church whose foundation principles are exploded errors? A church which is either intellectually dishonest or intellectually barren? A church which, to cover its own nakedness, denounces the garments of another as unfashionable? A church that passes as the refuge of virtue, and unceasingly attacks the highest of all virtues, truth?

Or is respect the due of character that refuses to countenance absurd dogmas, of knowledge that demonstrates the errors of the mind, of science that explains the true methods of the universe as opposed to those of delusion and ignorance? Which is the more respectable, the church or honesty? The church or knowledge? The church or truth?

Among themselves, in hours of confidence, men will speak quite freely their denials and their doubts. But in a mixed company the voice of Freethought must be repressed lest the tender susceptibilities of the religious may be wounded. He who expresses freely and openly his conviction of the falsity of dogma and the truth of science must expect dislike, unfriendliness, obloquy, and persecution. Social exclusion and the withholding of business patronage are two weapons that the church daily uses against Freethought with great effect.

Women are particularly sensitive to social influences, and when these are unfriendly, the budding thoughts of intellectual freedom are nipped by the religious frost, and the church holds them nearly all as willing slaves. Men care less for society's mandates; but their pockets are most sensitive, and few dare have the courage of their convictions. Business patronage is a fetish that they all worship most devoutly, and many would rather be Mohammedans, if that were popular, than lose a single customer. With them it is not a matter of principle, but of profit. The church plays skillfully upon this weakness and secures her pews and subscriptions by promising a greater equivalent in custom. She secures men's support to dogmas, in which they do not believe, by threatening the withdrawal of a livelihood as the penalty of refusal. This is not only intellectual bondage: it is but a modified form of bodily slavery. Men pay a portion of their yearly earnings to support these arrogant masters, and get in return a wearisome iteration of exploded mistakes. Labor taxes itself to support falsehood. The nineteenth century carries the church like an old man of the sea upon its back, feeds it with its wealth, and has not the courage or the vigor to shake it to the ground.

Occasionally a man is found who has managed to gain a competence in fair business without submitting his intellect to the chains of the church. I know one such Freethinker in San Francisco, who recently told me: "I never concealed my principles. The Christians tried to injure me, but I sold such good articles men had to buy them; they could not get their equal in the market." In this case my friend was a dealer in things eatable. The appetite of the Christian was stronger than the denunciation of the priest; and the honesty of the article prevailed over the opposition of the church—from which business men may take a lesson.

But more men are like the millionaire who told me when I asked his support for our society, "No; it is too early for this movement; I like to have the people enlightened, but there are a great many men in this city who dare not express their opinions openly," of whom evidently he was one.

This intellectual and moral cowardice is often vanity, a second chief obstacle in the progress of truth. Men fear the church. She threatens to deprive them of their livelihood and their profits if they do not assent to her dogmas and contribute to her coffers. The shrewd millionaire knows that he can find more victims within the church than without, and so does not care to stray beyond its pale or openly oppose its teachings. The general business man fears the church's power and is solicitous for her influence. Only the workman in large numbers seems able to think and speak as he will. If not a Catholic, he will have naught to do with the church, and plain labor has a greater freedom of speech than its richer employer. Yet it pays its tax to the church in the greater burdens borne because of the exemptions of the church, and the aggregate toll of Catholic workmen adds annual millions to the ecclesiastical treasury. Fear of the church prolongs a dominion that has always forbidden intellectual liberty and holds back a knowledge of the truth which would inestimably benefit mankind. Fear has always been the church's chief instrument of submission, and, as it was her first weapon, so it will be her last. But shall the men of the nineteenth century be afraid of a shadow, an invention, a fiction of the mind? Shall they bow down before untruth, and acknowledge the supremacy of error?

Men of America, are you cowards and dare not proclaim your own opinions? Are you afraid to declare the truth and prefer to submit to falsehood? Will you continue to support by your hard-won earnings an institution that conceals knowledge and teaches worn-out errors instead of certain truth? Shame upon your supineness and your ignorance! You lie trembling beneath the power of this giant pretension, when a few well-directed blows would crush in his hollow frame and level him with the dust. The church is mighty, numerous, strong in wealth, and apparently strong in numbers; but it is rotten at the core. It is eaten through and through with the dry-rot of hypocrisy. The whole structure must fall at last, when the life of its belief has departed.

If you have won mental freedom for yourselves, will you still allow the chains to shackle your wives and children? Will you permit your sons and daughters to endure the same distress and torture that you have endured through the teachings of a false creed? Is it manly, is it just, is it humane to allow their tender minds to be bruised by the harsh fetters of ecclesiastical dogmas? Is it not cowardly to have escaped yourselves, and then sacrifice your children beneath the wheels of this modern juggernaut?

Shall the women of America in this day of enlightenment still cling to a blind superstition? Shall they slavishly follow the teachings of a church that refuses knowledge and fears the light of truth? Will they still suffer their souls to be beaten by ecclesiastical rods heated in the fires of hell and God's displeasure; or will they turn with the unutterable scorn of womankind upon their tormentors and shut the door of knowledge in their face? Within that door you are safe, safe from future misery and much present anguish. And will the mother's heart allow her children's minds to be torn upon the like rack of suspense where she has suffered, to be defiled by the coarseness and nakedness of Old Testament story and language, to be taught a conception of God like that of an African savage, to have their intelligence clogged and confused by mythological miracles which they must accept as of divine working, though confuted by all the rest of their intellectual training? The women of America have not been lacking in the past to the needs of the nation or the cause of right. They stayed the hearts of our forefathers in the struggle of the Revolution. Their ears heard the cry of the slave beneath the lashes of his bondage. Their hands cared for the wounded, and their cheer buoyed up the soldier, the husband and the son, in the day of civil war. And shall woman's voice be silent, her sympathy withheld, and her heart averse in this conflict for knowledge, this last great battle of truth with ignorance and superstition?

A SINNER AMONG THE SAINTS.

Feeling a reverential calm stealing over me this blessed Sabbath day, occasioned by the chime of church bells and the street parade of the Salvation Army, I drifted into the meeting of the Y. M. C. A. on Fort street. And it came to pass as I entered the sacred portals of their new building, consecrated to Christ but uncompleted for want of cash, I beheld two young men with saintly smile and extended hand; and one stood upon the right and the other upon the left, for the purpose of extending a cordial greeting by a hearty grasp of the hand. The saint and the sinner shook; and the shake was as firm and hearty as muscle and piety could make it. I was then ushered into a seat, and soon after the services began. What was once considered sacrilegious music was then extracted in large quantities from a big bass viol, four fiddles, a flute, and an organ. As my soul is very partial to music, I enjoyed this part of the service very considerably, and keeping perfectly passive allowed it to thoroughly agitate my emotional nature. As the last note left the interior of the big bass viol, an unctuous individual from York state, back East, with alimementiveness large and abdomen the same, proceeded to bore us for Christ's sake the next forty-five minutes. During his exhortation to be saved from the wrath to come, before he left town and it got too late, the usual stock lies about Ingersoll were repeated, and the fearful rapidity with which his teachings were filling sheol was made known. I endured the ordeal of his "humble efforts" to save sinners in this manner until the agony was over, so as to hear the fiddles once more, when I took my departure without raising my hand to be prayed for. As I passed out, two more young and athletic men stood ready to bestow the Christian grip, and again we shook with earnestness and great vigor. This ended the programme, and I went forth to mingle with the world's people and associate again with sinners.

Los Angeles.

A GOOD WOOD FOR THE SECULAR PILGRIM.

We take the following from a two-column review in the Columbia Chronicle of Mr. S. P. Putnam's lectures at Dayton, Wash.:

In accordance with a previous arrangement, S. P. Putnam delivered three of his Freethought lectures in this city, beginning Saturday evening, Aug. 24. In view of the large and nightly increasing audiences with which he was greeted, of the thoughtful attention which was yielded him, of the expressions of pleasure heard on every hand at the close of each lecture, and of the favorable comments upon the street, one runs no risk of making a misstatement to say that these lectures were extremely good. Furthermore, any who would seek reason for their popularity need not seek in vain.

That qualification of a speaker which perhaps commends him to the largest number, is his style of delivery. In this Mr. Putnam is most happy. While in the introductory portions of his lectures his voice lacks modulation, and his manner is somewhat stiff, yet, when he warms with his subject he rises to the height of true eloquence, and is full of force, of energy, and of poetic fire. Though less of a humorist and less of a rhetorician than Ingersoll, he masses a formidable array of reason and evidence, which is to some extent enlivened by anecdote, and embellished with many beautiful periods.

What should still further commend Mr. Putnam to his hearers is the spirit of fairness and courtesy with which, to all appearances, he earnestly endeavors to treat. Not infrequently some of the most intolerant and fanatical people, are to be found among the class who style themselves Liberals; but the charge of intolerance and fanaticism cannot be truthfully preferred against the representative of Liberalism under consideration. Whatever of good the organized body of Christianity has done for humanity and for the world he recognizes and pays it tribute; he appreciates the value of the life of Christ as an example in human history. Whatever precepts of the Bible he thinks calculated to sweeten life and stimulate worthy endeavor, he is as ready to accept as the readiest. On the whole, he is truly conservative, thoroughly generous, and maintains an attitude and bearing toward his adversaries in every way worthy of the scholar and gentleman. Then add to his eloquence of style and fairness of treatment the vigor and originality of thought in which his lectures abound, and their claims to merit are at once established.

WE KNOW NOT WHAT IT IS.

We know not what it is, dear, this sleep so deep and still;
The folded hands, the awful calm, the cheek so pale and chill;
The lids that will not lift again, though we may call and call;
The strange white solitude of peace that settles over all.

We know not what it means, dear, this desolate heart-pain;
This dread to take our daily way, and walk in it again;
We know not to what other sphere the loved who leave us go,
Nor why we're left to wander still, nor why we do not know.

But this we know: Our loved and dead, if they should come this day—
Should come and ask us, "What is life?" not one of us could say!
Life is a mystery, as deep as ever death can be;
Yet oh, how dear it is to us, this life we live and see.

Then might they say—these vanished ones—and blessed is the thought:
"So death is sweet to us, beloved, though we may show you naught;
We may not to the quick reveal the mystery of death—
Ye cannot tell us, if ye would, the mystery of breath."

The child who enters life comes not with knowledge or intent,
So those who enter death must go as little children sent.
Though naught is known, yet I believe in equal good ahead;
And as life to the living is, so death is to the dead.

Mr. Clow Should Be Satisfied.

To the Editors of Freethought:

I think Bro. W. C. Clow, of Hillsboro, will be satisfied now, and ask no more foolish questions, since he is "answered" by J. A. Stromberg, "priest of the reorganized church of Jesus Christ, L. D. S." (Latter Day Saints, i. e., Mormons.) It reminds me of the little poem of Newton and the old woman:

Once upon a time, 'tis said,
Great Newton took it in his head,
That head so learned in nature's great economy,
To teach, oh task how very hard,
(Which few philosophers regard)
To teach an obstinate old dame astronomy.
The sage talked on, and showed such knowledge
As now would serve to endow a college.
How from almighty hands divine were hurled
To roll in space each circling world—
"Worlds!" cried the dame; "don't tell me so,
When I already better know.
Worlds! How you talk! Why, just look up and view 'em.
No; those bright stars which shine so high
Are holes, friend Isaac, in the sky,
An' God's bright glory shinin' on us through 'em."
"True," said the sage; "my good old soul,
God's glory shines all through the whole;
His mighty works omnipotent evince Him."
"Shines through the hole—oh, then, I find
The astronomer is not so blind
But good sound reason will at length convince him."
He who weighed worlds and nobly scanned
What the Architect divine had planned,
And in deep learning second was to no man,
Gave up as task too hard to teach,
(And even beyond a Newton's reach,
An obstinate and overwise old woman.

But it is the fate of the man of advanced thought that he must go on casting "pearls before swine," notwithstanding that they trample them under their feet and would "turn again and rend him" if they had the power. J. A. Stromberg is joined to his idols; let him alone.

Aumsville, Or.,

F. S. MATTESON.

Mrs. Krékel's Campaign on the Coquille.

To the Editors of Freethought:

We have enjoyed another feast. Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel finished her course of five lectures on Coquille River, given under the auspices of the Coquille Secular Union, last evening at Bandon. Her advent among us was at an inauspicious time. The Agricultural Fair held at Arago had closed only the day before, and two threshing-machines were busy from early morn till late in the evening in the neighborhood of Myrtle Point and Arago. On the lower river the fishing season was at hand, employing a large majority of the young men in the neighborhood, consequently her audiences were not so large as they would have been had these adverse circumstances not existed.

Coquille City, however, was an exception. There was a larger audience than attended any of our lecturers who preceded her. Her audiences in every instance were, however, attentive and appreciative, and were reluctant to leave the hall after the lecture had closed.

I cannot help but digress here from my subject and pen an idea that occurred to me in speaking of the threshing-machine. Is not the separator in active operation a fitting symbol of Liberalism? Liberalism, metaphorically speaking, separates according to present knowledge and experience "the golden grain," that which is good, useful, healthful, and beneficial to all mankind, from the chaff and dross of the past and present. The separation may not be perfect, owing to the persistency of the chaff to cling to the grain, or some imperfection in the machinery, or probably too heavy feeding by the managers on account of their enthusiasm. Mistakes, however, are stepping-stones to perfection, and time will cure defects.

The first lecture was at Myrtle Point on the 14th inst., in the evening. The Myrtle Point brass band was as usual in attendance to enliven the occasion. The lecturer, although fatigued from her long journey, did justice to the subject, "Natural Morality Superior to Theological Restraint as a Safeguard to Society," and was often applauded. The subject brings into contrast the two extremes, and Mrs. Krekel handles it without gloves, yet with due respect to those not in sympathy with her.

The next lecture was at Arago on Sunday afternoon, the 15th, the subject "Evolution of Thought and Progress of Ideas." This lecture is instructive and interesting. The audience was so interested and appreciative that by a rising vote they invited the speaker to deliver another lecture in the evening. The subject, "Woman's Equality Before the Law," was ably handled by the speaker and appreciated by the audience.

Circumstances prevented your humble servant from attending the lecture at Coquille City. We, however, learn from friends that the audience was large and appreciative and requested another lecture, which was granted, and Monday evening, Sept. 23, the appointed time.

Realizing that our guest was a stranger in a strange land and needed a chaperon to see that she was neither strayed, lost, nor stolen, we on Tuesday morning, the 17th, laid dull cares aside and hied ourselves to Coquille City to escort our friend to Randolph and Bandon. At Randolph the audience was small, but very appreciative. Judge D. J. Lowe, a hero of Liberalism, presided, and contributed over one-half the expense of the lecture.

Bandon, by the sea, was reached on the 18th, at 6 o'clock P. M. The subject for the evening was "The Religion and Church of the Future." J. M. Upton, of the Recorder, presided. This lecture is intensely interesting, full of logic, with now and then a full length knife thrust at the fallacies of the present religion, and closed with a peroration relative to the coming religion, grand and sublime.

The smoke and fog enveloped the little town by the sea with a thick veil that night as if to imprison the beautiful sentiments that had been spoken. The next morning, however, we concluded that it was intended not only for the sentiments but the speaker also. The dispenser of mists soon dispensed the fog, and we fearlessly sailed into the smoke, realizing that we must sooner or later become accustomed to it. Mrs. Krekel made a host of friends. The prevailing question is, "When will she come again?"

Arriving at Coquille City we bid our friend adieu until the Portland Convention, (no providential circumstances intervening), deputized our co-worker, Dal Cathcart, to see her safe with the friends at Marshfield, and came home to assume the duties of every-day life, realizing that our time had been well spent. Yours fraternally, J. HENRY SCHROEDER.

Friday Deaths Condemned.

The clergymen of Stockton have unanimously condemned the practice of holding funeral services on Sunday.

The above is culled from "Coast Notes" in Wednesday's Bulletin. It seems to us that if Stockton's clergymen intend to condemn Sunday funerals, they must also condemn the habit people have of dying on Friday or Saturday. Sunday, taking all things into consideration, is the best day for funerals, as it is more convenient for most people to attend than on any other day of the week. The world is growing exceedingly practical, and if we were anxious to have a very large funeral, we feel certain that our wishes in that respect would be more apt to be gratified if we died, say on Friday or Saturday, so our funeral could be held on Sunday, Stockton's divines to the contrary, notwithstanding. But then, perhaps Sunday funerals sometimes interfere with church, thus depriving the pastors of the "regular morning collection."—Lodi Sentinel.

Tribute to Rome.

I am informed that upon each monthly pay-day of city employes, especially the police, there is to be found at the city hall and police pay-stations from one to half a dozen nuns, or sisters of charity, seated at a convenient point where the men have to pass after receiving their pay, and into whose open palms each employee is expected to drop a portion of his salary as he passes out. To give the affair an air of authority, so far as the police are concerned, the police captain often acts as chaperon to these nuns, standing guard to see who contributes. Of course the patrolman knows the eagle-eye of his captain is upon him, and not wishing to incur his displeasure, stands and delivers for the benefit of the Roman Catholic church.—Americus in the Chicago News.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and under stand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

Before the Bar of Conscience.

I sat alone with my conscience,
In a place where time had ceased,
And we talked of my former living
In the land where the years increased,
And I felt I should have to answer
The question it put to me,
And to face the answer and question
Throughout an eternity.

The ghosts of forgotten actions
Came floating before my sight,
And the things that I thought were dead things,
Were alive with a terrible might,
And the vision of all my past life
Was an awful thing to face,
Alone with my conscience sitting
In that solemnly-silent place.

And I thought of a far away warning,
Of a sorrow that was to be mine,
In a land that was then the future,
But now is the present time,
And a thought of my former thinking
Of the judgment day to be,
And sitting alone with my conscience
Seemed judgment enough for me.

And I wondered if there was a future
To this land beyond the grave;
But no one gave me an answer,
And no one came to save.
And I felt that the future was present,
And the present would never go by,
For it was but the thought of my past life
Grown into eternity.

Then I woke from my timely dreaming,
And the vision passed away,
And I knew the far away warning
Was a warning of yesterday,
And I pray that I may not forget it,
In this land before the grave,
That I may not cry in the future,
And no one come to save.

And so I have learned a lesson
Which I ought to have known before,
And which, though I learned it dreaming,
I hope to forget no more.
So I sit alone with my conscience,
In the place where the years increase,
And I try to remember the future
In the land where time shall cease.

And I know of the future judgment,
How dreadful soe'er it be,
That to sit alone with my conscience
Will be judgment enough for me. —Star.

ONE of our Sunday-school teachers on a recent occasion told her pupils that when they put their pennies in the contribution box she wanted each one to repeat a Bible verse suitable for the occasion. The first boy dropped in a penny, saying: "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver." The next boy dropped his penny into the box, saying: "He that giveth to the poor lendeth unto the Lord." The third and youngest boy dropped in his penny, saying: "A fool and his money are soon parted."

Miss HAUTEUR (exhibiting a diminutive spaniel)—"This is one of the smallest dogs living. See, I can hold him in the palm of my hand." Bigsby—"That is nothing." Miss Hauteur—"Have you ever seen a smaller one?" Bigsby—"Yes, indeed, I've seen many a dog that could be put on a scent."

"A REMARKABLE BOOK," SAYS DR. EADON, of Edinburgh, Scotland: a graduate of three universities, and retired after 50 years' practice, he writes: "The work is priceless in value, and calculated to regenerate society. It is new, startling, and very instructive." It is the most popular and comprehensive book treating of

MEDICAL, SOCIAL, AND SEXUAL SCIENCE,

Proven by the sale of half a Million to be the most popular. Readable because written in language plain, chaste, and forcible. Instructive, practical presentation of "Medical Common Sense" made valuable to invalids, showing new means by which they may be cured. Approved by editors, physicians, clergymen, critics, and literati. Thorough treatment of subjects especially important to young men. Everyone who "wants to know, you know," will find it interesting.

Two Pictures.

The keen, fresh air and the sunlight sweet,
Dispel each weary, feverish mood;
With gladsome heart and footstep fleet
The pastor, treading the sunny street,
Murmurs with unction, "God is good."

But the tramp, as he leaves his haystack bed,
And feels the hunger within him swell,
Goes through his clothes without finding a red,
Solemnly waggles his shaggy head,
And mutters sadly, "It's cold as sheol!"

Right or wrong, says one, Senator Ingalls was very funny when he said: "Everybody in Kansas is satisfied with prohibition, because the Prohibitionists have their law and the boys have their whisky."

Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, New Jersey offers his valuable services to all those in need of a kind, sympathetic and skillful physician. Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. Fellows, a specialist, in his line, stands foremost in his profession, and the encomiums showered upon him publicly as well as in private, are flattering evidences of the high appreciation and confidence his long and conscientious devotion to his specialties in his profession have so justly merited for him, and it is safe to trust him.

A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1888.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: The remedy you sent is working like charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. I have only been using it one week, and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right.

Yours res, ectfully, J. R.

REMARKS—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle-aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, but who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out-and-out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future
Republic of North America
BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously written. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

NEWS AND NOTES.

Lone Rock is so named from a huge mass in the centre of its winding dales. Where this vast boulder came from nobody can tell. It is evidently the "oldest inhabitant," and had a ride of several hundred miles by flood and fire before it reached its present location. Around this relic a few houses are gathered. As friend Collins and myself rode in, Bob Brown was on hand to give the grip, and to announce that the school-house was in readiness for the lecture. Brown was at Haystack, where he camped out, and arose early in the morning and hied away to Lone Rock, to set our flag up there, right over the Methodist prayer-meeting. Brown is a brave and staunch Liberal. Along with him is Alex. Crawford, Lewis A. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Boone, and others. The school-house was quite full. It is used also for a church, and the class-meeting was just over as the Infidel lecturer began, but there was no apparent discord. Dr. Nicklin, a broad-minded Christian gentleman, introduced me to the audience. He calls himself "Christian," but as he wants to hear all sides of the question, and is in favor of inquiry and progress, I don't know how far that cognomen will suit. But of course each man can choose his own name, but as a friend and companion Dr. Nicklin pleased me, whatever title he may assume. In substance he is a Freethinker, and we can agree to disagree, and discuss theology to our heart's content. There was so much interest manifested in the first lecture that it was voted to have another on Friday evening, and so I remained over, and continued the discourse on the "Philosophy of Freethought," and meanwhile had an agreeable, sociable time with this frontier community. Lone Rock is pretty near the verge of civilization, where the cowboy and broncho meander in barbaric pomp. I expect to come here again, for I like the way people do things. They do their level best, have plenty of fun, and what more can one ask for in this fleeting world?

Saturday morning we are en route for Fossil. Collins is with me still, an old campaigner. He has been quite over the coast from Mexico to Columbia, has traveled by moonlight and starlight to avoid the Indians, has stood upon the mountain-top, like Jesus and the devil, and viewed the whole world, and he has a heart for any fate. No matter where we go he is ready for each emergency. About half way to Fossil we strike the timber. Here the roads are innumerable, crossing and recrossing each other into the heart of the forest, where the wagons go for lumber. We were directed to keep the "main traveled road." But it was pretty difficult to decide which was the "main traveled road," for all looked about alike. We guessed our way into the labyrinth, and for awhile it seemed well, but the wagon-tracks became fainter and fainter, and then vanished in the undergrowth, and not a sign of hoof or wheel could be discovered. We pressed on through the trees to the only open space we could find. This brought us to the edge of the steep hills. Looking down, Collins came to the conclusion that we had better go round instead of over, for the descent of the road which we could now trace in the ravine below, was somewhat intricate and perilous. So we again sought for the vanishing woodland roads that we might find some passable trail to the regions beneath. At length, we came across an ancient shepherd; he had his crook with him, and dog. It was like a picture of the forest of Arden, and I might imagine that the antique world was here. In fact, I never saw such a primeval-looking shepherd. He mounted the wagon and directed us on our course, and down the mountain side we crept, and soon glided into the "main traveled road," and kept it to our journey's end. It was along toward the middle of the afternoon when Fossil appeared in the far distance before us—a bright-looking village in the midst of vast and undulating hills. W. N. Putnam and his brother, J. H. Putnam, were the first to greet me. They are of the revolutionary stock, I believe, and are not afraid to go into the wolves' den, if need be. W. N. Putnam rode in twenty miles to be present at the lectures, and stand in the breach if need be, and it turned out that he was the man for the occasion. The church was built by all the citizens of the place with the understanding that it was for general use, but the Christians in control absolutely refused it for Liberal lectures. The school-house was also refused, and the Masons, not knowing but what I had horns and hoofs, and was really the devil in disguise, didn't want I should lecture in their hall until they had seen and heard me, and found out how harmless I might be, or otherwise. There was nothing to do but to make a hall for the occasion, and so the lumber was procured and in a little while Watson's store became Watson's Hall—thanks to the indomitable spirit of W. N. Putnam. Then things went on favorably, and our flag floated high. The meeting Saturday evening was crowded, and after the lecture there was a dance and sociable. On Sunday afternoon and evening there were good houses, and I have not visited a place where the outlook is more favorable than at Fossil. It is sixty miles off the railroad, but is one of the liveliest little towns on the coast. A big business is done with the ranchmen and stockmen, etc., and money seems to be plenty. Fossil keeps on growing, though the season is dull somewhat on account of drouth. It has a prosperous look all round, and its citizens are public-spirited. The Liberal element is strong.

A. J. Shrum and family came all the way from Burnt Ranch, fifty miles, to attend the lectures. This is the roll of honor of these Freethought travelers: A. J. Shrum and wife, Mrs. Nancy Shrum, Miss Anna Gertrude Shrum, W. H. Shrum, D. P. Shrum, J. B. Teller, Eugene Loony, and Mrs. S. Wells. Mrs. Wells is mother of Mrs. Shrum, and is nearly eighty years of age, but she has the spirit of "eternal youth." It is quite an inspiration to have a friend so well entitled to life's repose come this distance, not by railroad, for the railroads are a hundred miles away from this country, but by team, in order to give the gracious benediction of age to our toils. It makes us more hopeful of the unbounded future of humanity. Miss Anna Gertrude Shrum favored us with excellent and lively music, and Mr. J. B. Teller and W. H. Shrum and A. J. Shrum joined in the singing, which was received with enthusiastic approval by the audience. In every respect we had a good time. There was the best of comradeship, and the verdict was that we will keep the campaign going, and I expect to come back next summer, and all along the route there will be new openings and larger work. They have some queer names in this country. There is one place called "Shoo-fly." I have a great desire to lecture at "Shoo-fly." It strikes me I should have a very interesting audience there. I expect to go to Burnt Ranch and Prineville for a week's campaign, and also to Haystack for a big Fourth of July celebration, and it looks as if among these ancient fossils that orthodoxy would "pale its ineffectual fires" before the advancing banners of Freethought. The fact of it is, that these fossils tell a story far more antique and wonderful than anything in the Bible records. Right here is "creation's dawn" of a million years ago, and in the "crystal music" of these hills and ravines are caught the first strains of nature's eternal march, and wandering through the immensities of these parts, its awful chambers, and desolate palaces, we hear the "mystic and unfathomable song," which thereafter surged in Shakespeare's brain, and the rejoicing splendors of to-day.

W. N. Putnam, J. H. Putnam, Ed. Putnam, brother of Joseph Putnam, of Monument, S. G. Hawson, formerly of London, of the noble Secularist band there, and co-worker with Bradlaugh; C. Cook, Harvey Martin, and Jack Martin, who, like myself, were born into the faith beneath the roof of an orthodox clergyman, but didn't stay; C. Branson, Charles G. Millet, Benton Mires, the picture of whose handsome ranch I shall hang up in FREETHOUGHT office, and I guess I must also mention Harvey, who is like Tennyson's brook, "Men may come and men may go, but I keep on forever," etc.,—these with others have made Fossil a happy memory bright with morning's glow.

It rained a bit at Fossil, just enough to brighten the atmosphere and lay the dust Monday, when I start early for Arlington, sixty miles away. Good-bye to Collins, whose genial companionship had whiled away many an hour of dusty pilgrimage. Good-bye to Fossil, Haystack, Monument, and all these wild places of nature where man has planted his royal banner. I shall not forget these vast and splendid scenes and the rough journeys amid them, where toil has been mingled with delight, where picturesque wastes are radiant with the smile of freedom and the glow of intellect.

On to Arlington, down the wild canyons and over the rough ridges where if anything should break we might tumble hundreds of feet, and find no resting-place short of sheol. The vast plains stretch away, and the blue hills, like glittering billows, melt into the immense horizon. At Maysville, Wm. Keys and daughter increase the list of passengers from one, myself, to three. Mr. Keys is a jolly ranchman, and keeps things lively wherever he goes, for he has the blood of "Erin's green isle" and its jovial spirit. At Condon, Postmaster Darling joins us, and he is a staunch Freethinker, as it didn't take long to find out; and so "cabined, cribbed, confined," as we were by the four sides of the coach, we had a merry time, and the alkali dust, and horrible ruts that jolted us, a la Horace Greeley, when Hank Monk told him to keep his seat, these varieties of our journey didn't bother us much, for the jest went round and kept us continually in good humor. At six o'clock P. M., after twelve hours' ride, we rolled down the gully into Arlington. I found things ready for a lecture in the evening. I just had time to get my supper, change my clothes, and shake off the dust, when the audience was gathered, and a good audience it was, considering that only two days' notice had been given of the lecture. Mr. Harry Hawson introduced me with appropriate remarks as to the object of Secularism. Mr. Hawson is brother of our ally at Fossil, of England, one of the coadjutors also with Bradlaugh, and an earnest advocate of Liberalism. My address was well received, and arrangements were made for a lecture on the following evening.

Alex Hardie, of Lost Valley, who happened to be attending court, was our main stay at Arlington. He is a redoubtable Scotchman, and a true-hearted Liberal. He believes in work, and contributes generously to the cause. He sent five dollars for the Portland convention, besides bearing much of the burden of the expenses of lecture at Arlington. Arlington is now somewhat on the decay. It is not half as lively as it was two years ago. It has good deal of a floating population, and the prospects for permanent work here are not favorable. I did not have so many on the second evening as on the first. The court was in session, and the grand army had a parade, but the fact remains that there is general indifference concerning the importance of our work. But I found Arlington an interesting stopping-place; genial friends are here, and if only a few, they are of the loyal kind. Dr. Tournay I found to be an excellent co-worker. He has won an enviable position in his profession, and is well-known throughout the country for several useful inventions. He stands frankly by science and Freethought, and asks no favors of the churches or the priests. There is no "faith-cure" in his. It is all common sense and hard work.

Alex Crawford and Lewis Miller, of Lone Rock, and Joseph Frizzell, were also at Arlington, besides others from the county; and so by this uniting of forces I think that something has been done for progress at this point, and I shall hope for the best.

Tuesday night I leave for Portland. I had not heard the whistle of a locomotive for nearly a month, and it was quite pleasant to see the iron monster. He is a good friend indeed—better than all the angels. Early Wednesday morning I arrive at Portland. I find that everything is in good trim for the convention. President Beal is hard at work, receiving hundreds of letters, with money and good words. It will be a grand gathering, I think. Mrs. Haight is enlisting the ladies for the brilliant ball, and of course that will be one of the happiest occasions in the pathway of Freethought. Miss Hattie Blaisdell is preparing the beautiful banner. My ex-reverend Comrade Sutton is also hard at work, and also Treasurer Neunert, who wont give up, although it is not by any means easy sailing. The Christians boycott him, but they can't scare him.

Friday evening I lecture at Hillsboro. The friends here are ready and generous. They have kept the campaign quite lively during the summer. The county fair closing on Friday, and a dance in the evening, prevented a full attendance. But my listeners were attentive, and it was an enjoyment to speak to them. The Liberals of Hillsboro are doing all they can for the cause. There are not many of them, but they are true and open-handed, and their welcome is most cheering. S. B. Huston, who is coming to the top of his profession, has always the courage of his convictions, not only in Freethought, but in all things. He is an honest politician—if you can apply the word “politician” to one who won’t dodge any issue, be it Freethought or free trade. Our friend stands by his colors, and that’s what I like. W. C. Clow, with his family, is always at the front. He gave me a beautiful present when saying good-bye, and I shall always wear it in honor of his friendship, and its sparkling lustre shall ray hope upon every toil and dusty way. I visited T. S. Wilkes and brother, hard at work in the court-house making up for reference the records of the county, etc. They are the third generation of Freethinkers, and they keep the flag unfurled with every star upon its shining folds. I found an Israel Putnam here of the old stock, and I begin to think that all the Putnams are coming into the heterodox camp. A. A. Wolf is still with us on the roll of FREETHOUGHT; Jerome Wells, and others also. Every way I had a delightful sojourn at Hillsboro, and encouragement for work. Every effort possible was made to induce Rev. Campbell to debate. He had loudly proclaimed his desire to meet me. He was anxious for the fray. He was given three month’s notice, and yet when the time came, he backed down. He refused to debate, he had other engagements, etc. It is my opinion that the Rev. Campbell has had enough of it, and has come to the Fallstaffian conclusion that “discretion is the better part of valor:”

“He who fights and runs away
Will live to fight another day.”

Campbell is always ready for the combat, but like the Irishman’s flea, when you put your finger on him he isn’t there. Farewell, Brother Campbell. I thought to see thee in the list of battle, valiant, shining, thunderous, defending Zion in the sweat of thy face. I did not think that the last I should behold of thee would be thy far retreating coat-tails en route to “other engagements.”

On Saturday morning I went to where Charles Hagner and his little wife and baby, which of course is the grandest baby in the universe, are camping out, or rather camping in what he calls “the barn,” where he lives until the cottage is built. Well, we enjoyed it all the same as if it were a “palace fair,” and ate our dinner merrily, and after dinner started off—wife, baby, and all, with a spanking team, for North Yamhill, twenty-one miles away. It is a splendid ride over across the country, although it is cloudy and windy and rainy part of the time. This is a magnificent land indeed, and nowhere in the world are there more prosperous homes and ampler fields and pastures where the fat cattle roam, and the sheep flock the hills, and the slow battalions of swine are preparing for pork.

The mist is pouring down as we reach the pretty village of North Yamhill. The prospect is not very cheering for an audience, but a few gather together as the lights flash forth from the hall into the heavy night. I hope for pleasant weather on Sunday, but the vast masses of cloud remain, with now and then a streak of blue, and glorious bursts of sunshine. When the hour for lecture arrives, both afternoon and evening, there seems to be an extra dash of rain prepared especially for the occasion, and the hall is only about half filled. Nevertheless, I enjoy meeting our excellent friends here, and I could not find an audience better in quality than our veterans here. North Yamhill is known in the annals of FREETHOUGHT as always ready to do its duty, and I have been cheered both in storm and sunshine by these generous allies.

I was sorry to find Lee Laughlin on the sick list, and only able to attend one of the lectures, but heart and brain are true as ever to the cause. He has had quite an experience in the pioneer world of Oregon. He was snowed up one winter, about Umatilla, with James Wardwell, of Idaho, and they passed the long hours playing “old sledge,” etc. I guess Wardwell remembers this. He was also with Mayor Magone in the early wars. If all our pioneer Liberals could get together at Portland, what stories they could tell of flood and field, of mountain and plain, of all the wild romance of Oregon’s wonderful youth, when civilization first struck its vast solitudes.

Hon. R. R. Laughlin bore our banner in the last legislature, and did some effective work for the taxation of church property, which will be of great benefit as we push the battle. The beginning has been made, and results are favorable for the next campaign.

I was welcome at the hospitable home of Lee Laughlin, where the Secular pilgrim can sit by the happy fireside and find rest and inspiration for still further adventure, but George H. Dawes, whom I had not seen before, and who went twice to the train and missed me, and wanted to give me a little discipline—and besides we had a few things to talk about—took me to his domicile, where Mrs. Dawes and the children, Eva and Leland, make the new western home bright as merry noise and hopeful work can do. The little boy is named after our famous secretary, T. C. Leland, and he looks with his broad brow and sparkling eyes as if he would be worthy of his brilliant namesake. Mr. Dawes has charge of a private school here under management of Mr. Hauswirth. I looked in upon it for an hour or two, and the atmosphere of liberty and science is quite delightful. The school is entirely non-sectarian, and the scholars are co-workers with the teacher in the attainment of knowledge after the model of Spencer’s principles of education, where reason is developed, and not simply memory. Mr. Dawes lectures occasionally. He is able and earnest in his devotion to Freethought, and is a strong addition to our forces, and will undoubtedly do a noble work upon the platform. He is one of the kind who won’t give in. Like Horace Seaver, he has the gift of pertinacity, and will hold on in spite of difficulties. There is a splendid opportunity for our friends at McMinnville, Forest Grove, and other places to secure the services of a stated lecturer, and without doubt they will avail themselves of it, and consolidate and advance our forces in this growing country. Mr. Dawes is a welcome co-worker with our too few laborers upon the platform. I have had a most enjoyable visit with him, and find the true comrade and honorable soldier, who is not one bit afraid of toil and danger. Mrs. Dawes was born into the Baptist church, but Christianity has since disappeared, and she is now a brave and cheerful companion in the hard and rugged ways of pioneer work—ready for sacrifice, with no reward but that of honest thought and heroic deed.

My friend Hauswirth is always the same—a staunch supporter. He believes in building for the future. The school which he has established is prospering with noble possibilities of usefulness,

I found friend Higgins on the watch, keeping "time, time, time" to the march of human progress, and Miss Myrtle Higgins is likewise on the roll of honor.

I. L. Castle is almost always on the go, but he took time for two of the lectures, and would have been at the other if his orthodox horse had not taken a heterodox tumble. What he does, he does with all his might, and he is for Freethought through storm and sunshine.

J. W. Haines, J. Williams, Ivan Daniel, B. F. Wade, Frank Dudley, and others are ready to be counted for the Demands of Liberalism, and the good fame of North Yamhill, so early known, is still radiant as ever for Liberty, science, and humanity. The silver clouds sailing over the blue sky flash with the glorious sun, and heart and hope are brightened with the friends, both new and old, that I have met in this land, where beautiful harvests make golden the pathway of progress. S. P. PUTNAM.

TO THE FRIENDS AT PORTLAND.

By the time this issue of FREETHOUGHT reaches Oregon there will probably be gathered at Portland one of the largest conventions of Liberals ever held on the coast. At this convention, we cannot doubt, much good work will be done. There will be eloquent addresses, and, we hope, plans presented and adopted for continuing the influence of the meetings after the convention has adjourned. And among these methods we count first the distribution of Freethought literature. Large gatherings and fervent appeals from the platform arouse enthusiasm for the time, but the thoughts uttered must be crystallized in the printed word to become permanent, and these again must be renewed and reiterated, precept upon precept.

We therefore want to secure large circulation for the Liberal papers. Especially must the Liberals of the coast be interested in a large circulation of this particular Liberal paper—FREETHOUGHT.

There will be present at the Portland Convention several persons who will act as agents for us, and copies of this and other issues will be there for distribution. The senior Editor, S. P. Putnam, will receive new names and renewals, and supply specimen copies. President Beal in his leisure moments, if he finds any, may be applied to for the same purpose. Mrs. F. C. Reynolds and Mr. A. F. Neunert are also our authorized agents. But all these may at times be otherwise engaged, and so we have a further suggestion to make: Let all our friends and readers provide themselves with specimen copies, and constitute themselves canvassers for subscriptions, presenting the paper at all times and places, so that no one attending the convention may go away without having had an opportunity to subscribe. We trust that none who receive this suggestion will fail to act. We do not claim too much when we say that it is largely through the instrumentality of the paper and its field worker that Liberal organization in Oregon has been brought about. Then let the attendants at this convention reciprocate and give to FREETHOUGHT the support that FREETHOUGHT has given them. It is vital to the paper and vital to the cause of Liberalism upon this coast.

DOUBTFUL CONSOLATION.

In the Golden Gate of last week appeared the following:

The editor of FREETHOUGHT is asked to publish a death notice of the little two-year-old son of a friend, with the added request that the editor would "add what consolation there may be to offer." Here is the proffered consolation (?): "We can only say there is no consolation except the knowledge that merciful Time may lessen the acuteness of grief; that sorrow consumes itself at last; that whatever of trouble might have been in store for the little one, had he lived, is spared him now." If we had nothing better than that to offer a stricken heart, we would ask to be excused and say nothing. Why will our Freethought friends persist in repudiating evidence of the future life that is as palpable as sight, as positive as touch, and as clearly established as the proof of mortal existence—that is, to millions of the race? There is not a whit more improbability of a continued existence of the spirit of man beyond the confines of the grave, even were there no evidence of the fact, than there is that he exists here. There is no more mystery about the one life than the other. If there was no future life (and we know there is) then nature is an infinite cheat, as far as man is concerned. She completes everything else she undertakes; why should she make an exception of him? She brings him up to a point where his longing soul has just begun to aspire for knowledge, and then she snuffs him out of the universe! No, no, neighbor; you are on the wrong track.

Mr. Owen says that if he had nothing better to offer the mourner than the fact that time obtunds the point of grief, that sorrow consumes itself and has an end, and that the trouble which afflicts the living is spared to the dead, he would ask to be excused from saying anything. This is equivalent to assuming that to the Materialist no word of truthful consolation or sympathy should be spoken; he must bear his sorrow alone.

We do not believe that such a course is either honest or humane. It is not honest to conceal from a sufferer that his pain will sometime be healed, and it is not humane to withhold from him whatever truthful assurances there may be to lessen his anguish. When Mr. Owen says he knows there is a future life, we have to base our belief in that assertion upon our confidence in his truth and veracity; and for ourselves, we do not deny that such confidence is severely tested by his positive statement. We do not know that there is a future life, and we are not sure that it would be desirable. Certainly it is not a consolation so long as it is doubted. A child dying in infancy must enter the other world an infant. The parents never cease to think of it as such, and the mother expects to take in her arms once more the babe she placed in the coffin. She may live a half century in that hope; and here occurs a question which we would be glad to have Mr. Owen answer, since he "knows." Does the mother find her child an infant still upon the farther side, or will she find him or her a matured man or woman of fifty years? Will nature keep the child in a state of arrested development for two score and ten years to satisfy the yearnings of the parents, or will she disappoint them by permitting it to reach maturity and old age? Is the summerland a place of perpetual growth and development, or of eternal stagnation? If the former, then the experiences of this world, all its sorrows and partings, must merely be repeated. If the latter, it is an "infinite cheat" upon those who enter it in the undeveloped state of infancy. Either way, we fail to recognize where the consolation appears.

We know, if we know anything, that the dead do not suffer; that, if they are denied the pleasures of life, they are also spared its troubles. Better to leave them thus than consign them to an unseen world of whose locality, conditions, and desirability we have not the first iota of reliable information.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

To those who have never taken FREETHOUGHT we offer it at the following very low rates, in clubs:

One subscription one year.....	$2.00
Two subscriptions one year.....	3.00
Three subscriptions one year.....	4.00
Four subscriptions one year.....	5.00

In clubs above four in number the subscription will be uniform at $1.25. Try it for a year. Hand your name to our agents or address Putnam & Macdonald, 504 Kearny street, San Francisco.

THE SAN FRANCISCO FREETHOUGHT SOCIETY.

The next meeting of the San Francisco Freethought Society will be held at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, Sunday evening, October 13, at 8 o'clock. Jerome A. Anderson, M.D., will speak on "Materialism."

It looks to us as though a wrong had been done in the arrest, trial, and conviction of James H. Barry, editor of the San Francisco Weekly Star. Mr. Barry's offense consisted in criticising the ruling of Judge Lawler in the case of Supervisor Bingham. At the same time Mr. Barry "animadverted" upon the honesty and integrity of the judge. He was thereupon arrested for contempt of court, found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of $500 and to imprisonment for five days in the county jail. The injustice of this, as it seems to us, lies more in the charge than in the prosecution. We have never known before that a newspaper is forbidden by law to express an opinion on the judicial conduct of a judge. If such is the law it is broken almost daily by every journal in the city. In a case of libel a judge would have the same redress as any other citizen, and if this were the charge instead of contempt, we could have nothing to say about it until trial and investigation had revealed the facts. But in a contempt case there is practically no investigation, and the fact that a judge should be more desirous of vindicating his dignity than his official character shows that he regards the one as more defensible than the other. We have not a word to say in defense of libel, but we ought to have a good deal to say in defense of liberty of the press as regards criticism of the official acts of public servants. Our judges appear to have fed on some superior sort of meat, and to have grown exceeding great. The press is at perfect liberty to discuss the actions of the mayor of the city, the governor of the state, the president of the United States, or the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, but when it comes to a county judge the law claps on the muzzle. Opinion is divided in the present case, but Mr. Barry has many friends and supporters, and we would recommend that these now show their sincerity by contributing one dollar each to the number of five hundred and paying his fine. He may be able to spare the five days which he must spend in jail, but a fine of $500 is excessive, and out of all proportion to the alleged offense, but, since the law is inexorable, his supporters should rally about him, make his cause their own, and lift this burden from his shoulders.

SOME time ago we incautiously offered a few reflections upon the Field-Terry case. It looks now as though we must have treated the subject as fatally as Marshal Neagle did Judge Terry, for the ghost of it still troubles us. We do not often care to disclaim responsibility for the opinions of contributors, but in this case such a disclaimer may be only a measure of common prudence.

At a meeting of the Presbytery in New Brunswick, N. J., last week the Rev. Dr. McCosh, ex-president of Princeton College spoke strongly in favor of a revision of faith. He particularly pointed out the doctrine of the foreordination as not taught by the scriptures. There seems to be a sentiment generally prevalent among Presbyterians, that their barbarous Confession of Faith should be revised, and all intelligent people must be glad to see it. But supposing the creed is revised, and the doctrine of foreordination expunged, what effect will it have, in the minds of theologians, on the fate of those who have been damned for denying that dogma? Would the fresh evidence entitle them to a new trial?

THE American Sentinel makes this very good point against the Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts: "'Office is opportunity,' is the motto displayed on the letter-heads used by the field secretary of the American Sabbath Union. This is but another version of the standard political maxim, 'To the victors belong the spoils.' The constant display of this avowal may be taken as a declaration that the union seeks political power, and if successful will not be slow to use it for the furtherance of its schemes. A country that is fully awake to the value of liberty, will be slow to place official 'opportunity' in the hands of a party of religionists whose aims are expressed by such mercenary sentiments."

SAYS the Ventura Democrat: "If it be the intention to build up a marine commerce at Redondo Beach, the company had better eliminate the long-haired gentry from their midst. Sunday-school notions should not be allowed to interfere with trade. If our merchants order a bill of goods via Redondo Beach, and the vessel arrives on a Sunday they should not be compelled to wait until Tuesday to receive them. Last Sunday morning a freight steamer arrived at the Redondo wharf, laden with various kinds of merchandise for Los Angeles. The captain was not allowed to unload because it was Sunday. Bah! it makes us sick."

THE Adventists of Eatontown, N. J., passed a sad day last Monday, for it was the date set by their pastor for the end of the world and the wicked, and for the transfiguration of the godly. But the world failed to desist, and the righteous did not transfigure. The heavens did not depart as a scroll, nor the earth melt with fervent heat. The Adventists, however, are not discouraged. Their pastor admits the apparent failure of his prophecy, but he is still certain that the end is near. It may be, if the fool-killer should happen through Eatontown before long.

JOHN BURNS, the leader of the London dock strikers, was once a member of the Battersea branch of the National Secular Society, and is reported to be a Freethinker. Mr. G. W. Foote thinks that Burns made a big mistake in negotiating with Cardinal Manning and the Bishop of London. These clerical "friends of the people" proposed an impossible compromise, and afterwards as good as called the strike-leaders liars for saying they had not agreed to it.

A COMMITTEE consisting of two vice-presidents and the assistant secretary of the San Francisco Freethought Society sends the following circular to members and sympathizers:

"We desire to call your attention to our local Freethought Society, to interest you in its meetings, and to secure your support of the same. This society is almost self-sustaining, the collections at its meetings falling but little short of paying the expenses of hall rent and advertising. There is at present, however, a deficit, which we wish to make up, and if possible to establish a Fund for future occasions. There are no dues from members, and we therefore suggest an assessment of one dollar upon each member who can afford to contribute that amount, and upon every sympathizer with the movement. If you are willing to meet this assessment, and to pay one dollar, or more or less, for the support of the society, please advise the assistant secretary, G. E. Macdonald, 504 Kearny street, to that effect, or, better still, attend the meeting next Sunday evening, at 421 Post street, and see the treasurer, Mr. A. H. Schou."

To this circular the following responses have been received: C. E. Spafford, $1; Wm. H. Eastman, $1; Emil S. Lemme, $1; Putnam & Macdonald (postage stamps), $1; J. O. Scott, $1; Wm. Noble, $2; Mr. Augusteny, $1; J. E. Palanca, $1; L. Diamant, $1; C. F. Burgman, $1. The treasurer reports that there is still a considerable sum due the treasury for hall rent and advertising, and contributions are solicited from those who have not already responded. Such contributions may be left at this office or with the treasurer.

THE Rev. Mr. Harcourt, of San Francisco, makes some astonishing admissions, considered from the point of view of a Methodist clergyman. In his sermon last Sunday he said:

"Alexander Pope was scoffed at by the self-righteous bigots of his time because he said, 'An honest man is the noblest work of God.' In the light of a new civilization even churchmen are coming to see and believe this. But a still deeper and broader thinker than the poet has said, 'An honest God is the noblest work of man.'"

It must gratify Colonel Ingersoll, who is the author of the sentiment approved by Dr. Harcourt, to know that what was once deemed a blasphemous travesty has at last been accepted by a theologian as the best thought of the age concerning the deity.

SAYS the Alta: "The plague of fleas which closed the public schools of Troy, N. Y., has stricken the city, and public worship is almost suspended." Worshipers in Troy, if they are unused to the affliction, must feel somewhat like the Scotch clergyman who, after sitting upon an ant-hill, remarked that though he trusted he had the word of God in his mouth, he believed that the devil was in his trousers.

L. K. WASHBURN has accepted the editorship of the Boston Investigator, with Ernest Mendum as assistant. Mr. Washburn is a very able writer and lecturer, and Mr. Mendum has already shown his ability as an editor.

WE derive from the Evening Post the information that a Sunday law is being quietly prepared in this city, to be sprung when least expected, and that the struggle between Sabbatarians and their opponents is not far off.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

The first rain for many weeks fell copiously last Sunday night. —The 37th anniversary of the San Francisco Turn-Verein was celebrated on Sunday at Woodward's Gardens. In the morning there was a large parade through the principal streets; in the afternoon, athletic and musical exercises, and at night a grand ball. —Miss Ella M. Smith, who died at Portland, Or., a few days ago, left $200,000 for charitable and educational purposes. —The returns of the election of the 1st inst. show that Tacoma, Wash., is the largest city of the four new states. The vote of the largest cities of the new states was as follows: Tacoma 5324, Seattle 4560, Butte, M. T., including neighboring camps, 4109, Helena, M. T., 3553, Spokane Falls 3148, Sioux Falls, S. D., 2100. Washington cast the largest vote of any of the new states, except South Dakota, which was allowed two members of Congress. The total vote of South Dakota was about 80,000; that of North Dakota about 37,000. The total vote of Washington last November was 46,353. It will exceed 60,000 this year. —A prominent pillar of the church is missing from Seattle. His name is Morse, and when he went away he took a woman with him, but left his wife and children behind. —The Mechanics' fair in San Francisco closed last Saturday night. —The grand jury of San Joaquin county in its final report deals with the Neagle-Terry case, but no indictment is found.

The Germans of St. Louis celebrated last Sunday the anniversary of the landing of the German pioneers, Oct. 6, 1683. There were 30,000 men in line. —It is now conceded that the Democrats carried Montana in last week's elections. The other new states are Republican, and the Dakotas are prohibition. —At the convention of Theosophists in Chicago last week, resolutions were adopted expelling the noted high priestess of Theosophy, Mme. Blavatsky, and her New York representative, William Q. Judge. —Charles S. Pratt, the confidential bookkeeper, secretary and cashier of the H. Wales Lines Company, Meriden, Conn., is arrested for embezzlement of over $10,000. The affair caused a profound sensation, as Pratt was an officer in several local organizations, the treasurer of the First Congregational Society, and a city alderman. He confesses —While a prayer meeting was being conducted at the Presbyterian church, at Moss Point, Miss., Oct. 2, some one fired a load of buckshot through the front door of the building, instantly killing two worshipers.

Bismarck, the German chancellor, is credited with addressing the president of the Woodworkers' Congress pacifically as follows: "The foreign situation is so peaceful that you may set to work without the slightest fear. It was not always so. Not long ago England still hesitated whether to act as a mad bull or as a fat ox chewing its cud. To-day her resolution is taken, and I can assure you the maintenance of peace is certain."

OBSERVATIONS.

Probably the most instructive words uttered from any platform in San Francisco last Sunday evening were in the lecture of Prof. Herbert Miller before the Freethought Society. The house was not crowded, the weather being so warm and nature so attractive so as to prevent, but about eighty people, many of them engaging young ladies, made a very satisfactory audience. Professor Joran played the piano with extraordinary brilliancy, and the opening remarks of Vice-President Eastman were exceptionally happy.

Professor Miller had chosen for his subject "Matter and Spirit," his reflections on that theme having arisen from Dr. Jerome A. Anderson's lecture in August. The speaker began by saying that when he first commenced to think he inquired how he came to be in existence, and how the world was inaugurated. He received the orthodox answers, and was referred to Genesis and the six days of creation. This was the inside teaching of the church, but outside he learned quite a different theory —that known as the nebular theory—and discarded the theological explanation as regards the world. As to the beginning of life we are still ignorant, but it is in accord with all natural law to believe that life began to exist when conditions became such that it could exist. There is no time known to science when that principle called the soul was introduced. Religions are built upon the belief that there is a soul distinct from the body which lives forever, but there is no evidence that such is the fact, and it is denied by reason and experience.

With reference to Dr. Anderson's lecture the speaker said that within the last forty years or so it had been claimed that new ground is found on which to base a future life, called Spiritualism. Of this Theosophy is a branch, though with a different source. But there was nothing in Spiritualism not to be explained on natural principles, and Theosophy was an outgrowth of Buddhism with no more claims to credibility than Mohammedanism or Christianity.

Professor Miller recognized some great principle or energy governing the universe, but to ascribe will and consciousness to it would be like ascribing them to a circle or any other geometrical figure. The speaker closed with a fine peroration, wherein he said that in a certain sense all are immortal. The matter whereof our bodies are composed had no beginning, and could have no end. We are affected by influences coming from a beginningless past, and the influences which we exert proceed to an endless future. In this world we know that we live and love, and if there be another world worth the having we shall live and love again. Professor Miller resumed his seat cheered by the heartiest applause that any speaker before the society has as yet evoked.

Chairman Eastman next introduced Professor Joran, musician, and Mr. A. H. Schou, treasurer; and while the one drew music from the piano, the other extracted a substantial collection from the audience. Then Mr. Eastman said he would be pleased to hear any remarks pertinent to the subject of the lecture.

Dr. O'Brock was the first speaker. Readers of these reports will remember seeing the above remark before. Somebody applauded Dr. O'Brock as he took the floor, which unusual and unexpected demonstration quite overpowered him, but he proceeded and had got as far in his customary speech as Bellamy's "Looking Backward" and the defects of the United States constitution when the Chair called him to order, and requested him to speak to the subject. Dr. O'Brock claimed that "all sooppects hinch upon everytings," only the Chair was too ignorant to recognize that great truth, and denied the right of the said Chair to interrupt him. Mr. Eastman reminded him that he must appeal to the meeting if he wished redress, and the speaker thereupon inquired if his ten minutes had expired. Then a voluminous "Yes!" arose from the audience, and the doctor sat down.

Mr. C. F. Burgman followed, saying with reference to O'Brock, that he saw the necessity of limiting the range of discussion if any valuable results were to come from it. The lecture of the evening he regarded not as an exposure but as an exposition of Theosophy, one of the best he had ever heard, though he did not like Professor Miller's summary dismissal of Spiritualism. Mr. Burgman had not reached a satisfactory conclusion himself as regards a future life, but believed there was one.

Mr. Paddon pronounced the lecture the best intellectual treat he had ever enjoyed, and he had been in the Freethought ranks for about fifty years, and would reach the age of eighty in December.

A lady next arose to express her disapproval of Spiritualism, which she regarded as a disease of the brain and a most prolific source of insanity unless properly treated.

Mrs. Frost related that years ago she was a member of the Freethought society organized by Messrs. Battersby and Mackay, wherein Spiritualism was freely discussed. She was surprised to hear the Spiritualist denomination spoken of as it had been by the previous lady.

Mr. Parker, of Petaluma, said he was not averse to Dr. O'Brock, but believed in allowing a man to exhibit his idiosyncrasies without let or hindrance. He thought we could stand it for ten minutes, and preposterous persons injured themselves more than others.

Mr. Miller, in closing the discussion, said the fact that he had apparently pleased his hearers was less flattering to himself than to them, for he had addressed their common sense; had given them not so much his own opinions as the opinions of the best scientific minds of the century; and the audience had been discriminating enough to accept these opinions. The professor denied that his lecture was Theosophical, as Mr. Burgman thought, and explained that he had dismissed Spiritualism without debate as he would dismiss unargued the claim of an irresponsible person that a large stone thrown into the air, instead of returning to the earth, had continued to ascend.

Dr. Jerome A. Anderson was in the audience, and took notes. Next Sunday evening he will present the Theosophical aspect of "Matter and Spirit." From the interest manifested in the opening of the subject it is safe to predict a lively continuance and close. It will be no more than the fair thing for all who heard Professor Miller's address to attend Dr. Anderson's lecture also, and bring as many with them as the hall will admit.

Mr. Putnam will be happy when he reads the following letter:

OAK MILLS, Kan., Sept. 26, 1889.

S. P. PUTNAM, ESQ., Dear Sir: I hope you will allow a young Freethinker to express to you his warmest thanks for the great work you and your partner are doing. Before me on the table is a copy of FREETHOUGHT, one of the most ably conducted Freethought journals in America; and your great masterpiece, "The Glory of Infidelity," which I have just read with the greatest of pleasure. It is without doubt one of the most logical and most eloquent speeches ever delivered in defense of Freethought. Your poem on "Thomas Paine" is worthy to rank with the efforts of a Longfellow, a Tennyson, or a Whittier. Your able and brilliant companion, Mr. Geo. Macdonald, is also a fine poet. I read his "Decoration Day" poem, and I say "it is hard to beat." Accept this as my humble opinion of your efforts. With best wishes to you and Brother Macdonald, and with a hope that your grand journal will continue to send its mighty thunderbolts of Freethought and science along the Pacific Coast as well as across the whole continent, I am,

Yours fraternally,
GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

George J. Remsburg is the son of John E. Remsburg, the well-known Liberal lecturer and writer. He is a youth of rare precocity. Though not more than eighteen, he has been talking and writing on politics and theology for several years. He is a Fourth of July orator, Republican stump speaker, and the colored man's friend. He has written for the Truth Seeker and Investigator, usually in the way of eulogium on prominent characters in American history. His manuscript is faultless in legibility, punctuation, and orthography; and while there is a certain exaggeration about his style, his composition is remarkably ripe considering the age of the writer. It is safe to predict for George a successful career, whatever course he may choose.

It is not safe for any journalist to rebuke the typographical offenses of other papers, because his own is likely to be open to the same charge; but these inaccuracies often have a deeper significance than appears to the eye of the unreflecting, and for that reason I call attention to the following from a supplement to E. C. Walker's Fair Play (Valley Falls, Kan.) of Sept. 31-13-14:

A paragraph which appeared in No. 52 got made up in the fourth page of this, and to aggravate the trouble, was "off its feet." Through failure to look at the Calendar the date was set up "September 13," and by a typographical accident the figures were transposed on the first page, making the date line read "September 31"—a non-existent date, by the way. So we start Volume II. by dating on the inside September 13 and on the outside October 1, when we meant September 14.

Then in his next issue Mr. Walker added:

To help make complete the comedy of errors in last number of Fair Play we failed to credit the excellent article, "Indifference," to FREETHOUGHT, of San Francisco.

These errors are quite annoying, and doubtless troubled Mr. Walker more than anyone else who does not recognize, as I do, the ulterior significance previously noted; which significance is that prohibition in Kansas has not achieved the full results claimed for it by its friends.

In a world full of theological humbugs, bleached blonds, and other forms of deception, it is refreshing to occasionally meet with perfect honesty and candor. The appended communication will illustrate the above remark:

TURLOCK, Cal., Sept. 28, 1889.

To the Editors of Freethought:

GENTS: Stop this paper, for it is no Good. Yours forever, E. HILL.

Here we have an open declaration of disapproval of this journal. Mr. Hill does not hold his pen in suspense thinking how he shall let us down easy. He does not claim that he takes the county paper, four dailies, and all the Liberal periodicals published in the country, and is therefore already performing more than his share toward supporting the press. He does not say he is going to leave Turlock and doesn't know where he will locate. He fails to perjure himself by affirming that he is too poor to afford four cents a week for the spread of truth and enlightenment. He even waives the right to plead that he hasn't time to read. He ignores the great advantage to be gained by repeating the popular lie that Liberal journals are unnecessary. He does not criticise our advertisements, our correspondents, or our editorial remarks on the Barry contempt case. He has no objections, apparently, to FREETHOUGHT being subsidized by its friends. He views with equanimity an occasional typographical error, and a communication from an avowed Spiritualist does not excite his anger. None of these things disturb him, none of these excuses are deemed sufficient; but looking over the publication week after week, he decides that it is no good, and therefore orders it discontinued to his address upon the expiration of his subscription.

Mr. Hill, let us annihilate the space intervening between Stanislaus county and Yerba Buena, and shake. I extend my hand to you. Draw nigh. Give me your photograph, a lock of your hair, and a brief autobiography, including the name of the woman at whose knee you were taught to adore the everlasting truth. You are the man that Diogenes and I have been looking for ever since 413 B.C.

A ONE THOUSAND DOLLAR PRIZE MANUAL.

The American Secular Union, a voluntary association having for its object the complete separation of church and state, in practice as well as in profession, and in no way committed to any system of religious belief or disbelief, acting herein by its president, Richard B. Westbrook, A.M., L.L.D., as its special trustee and attorney, in fact, hereby offers a premium of one thousand dollars ($1000), lawful money of the United States, for the best essay, treatise, or manual adapted to aid and assist teachers in our free public schools and in the Girard College for orphans, and other public and charitable institutions professing to be unsectarian, to thoroughly instruct children and youth in the purest principles of morality without inculcating religious doctrines, thus recognizing the legal right under our Federal Constitution of all our citizens, Jews and Gentiles, Catholics and Protestants, Liberals and Agnostics, and all other classes, whether believers or disbelievers, to have their children instructed in all the branches of a common secular education in our state schools, without having their tender minds biased for or against any sect or party whatever.

It is desired that the manual for which this premium is offered shall not be a reading book for schools nor a mere code of morals, much less a system of ethical philosophy, but rather a concise yet comprehensive and suggestive exhibit, with familiar and practical illustrations of those universal foundation principles and axiomatic truths which underlie all sound morality and rightfulness, thus developing and educating that inherent moral sense which is more or less common to all rational human beings. In short, to show how to teach children the natural and essential difference between right and wrong, and the reasons therefor, without reference to sacerdotal creeds and sectarian dogmas, is the chief object to be kept in mind in writing for this premium; as it is the unquestionable right of every tax-payer and citizen of this free republic to have their children educated in our common schools without having their minds prejudiced on those disputed subjects which may safely be intrusted to the family, the churches, and the Sunday-schools, where they properly belong.

While each writer will be expected to confine himself or herself to the main object of this offer, the widest practical freedom in the form and range of treatment will be allowed, but all prejudice and partisanship regarding current controversies should be scrupulously avoided.

The manual should not contain less than 60,000 words, nor more than 100,000, though these limits will not be insisted upon in a work of special merit.

The papers should all be submitted by April 1, 1890, though more time will be granted if necessary; but the committee will be ready to receive manuscripts by the first day of January, 1890.

Each manuscript should be in type-writing, or at least should be very legibly written to insure a careful reading, and should have a special mark or designation, and the name and postoffice address of the author should be sent at the same time in a sealed envelope, not to be opened until after the award is made, bearing the same mark, and both addressed to R. B. Westbrook, No. 1707 Oxford street, Philadelphia, Pa., post or express prepaid. Unaccepted manuscripts will be returned to the writers at their own expense, and the accepted manuscript shall become the exclusive property of the Union, to be held in trust by the trustee herein named, and the premium of $1000 will be promptly paid, without discount, when the copyright is thus secured. The money is now on deposit, in trust, with the Guarantee Trust and Safe Deposit Company in Philadelphia, for the object contemplated.

A representative and impartial committee shall in due time be carefully selected by the subscribers to this fund or a majority of them, to act as judges of the manuscripts submitted and to award the prize. The trustee herein named shall be a member and the chairman of said committee, whether he continues in the presidency of the American Secular Union or not.

Writers of all nations are invited to join in the contest, and the award will be made without regard to nationality or sex.

R. B. WESTBROOK,

President of the American Secular Union,
1707 Oxford street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE INCONSISTENCY OF AGNOSTICISM.

"It seems to me as irrational to say there is no God as to say there is a God."—Editor Twentieth Century.

But, pray, why? Does not that proposition tacitly concede that it is irrational to say there is a God? If so, how can it be irrational to deny an irrational proposition or absurdity? Are not the two propositions antithetical? If so, one or the other is, of necessity, false. Concerning then the absurdity of the God idea, why will Mr. Pentecost persist, inconsistently, in maintaining that there is no difference between the rationality of Theism and Materialism, with its incidental Atheism?

Will he kindly tell us the difference in degree of rationality between the proposition that there is a personal devil and that there is a God? Are not both notions of the same origin and equally absurd? Are not both transmitted to us from the dark ages, from the same book, and must not both stand or fall together? Yet Mr. Pentecost would not, from pure deference and respect for our poor, non-evolved, pious friends, assume an Agnostic's attitude and concede that "it is as irrational to say there is no devil as to say there is a devil." Of course not. He simply denies the existence of "his Satanic Majesty" without equivocation, and the proof of his existence not being forthcoming his denial is equivalent to proof that such a being does not exist.

In law and equity the affirmative is obliged to prove its case. If then a proposition is self-evidently absurd, unnatural, and absolutely impossible, why concede to those affirming, without a shadow of proof, that their belief is equally rational with our unbelief, that "it may be so," "I don't know," etc.?

Having discarded as authoritative ancient traditions, there is absolutely no logic, no reason, no science, no analogy that will sustain or demonstrate the existence of a God. And in view of this fact a simple denial is all-sufficient to prove the negative. As the plea of the prisoner at the bar of "not guilty" is equivalent to proof of his innocence and bound to be respected by court and juror, unless, indeed, the affirmative, beyond a shadow of a doubt, establishes his guilt, so the Atheist's fearless denial, nowadays, must demand profound respect, and is equivalent to proof, unless, indeed, the church brings proof, outside of a discarded Bible, of the truth of its basic idea.

Now, though unnecessary to prove a negative, and the God-idea not having been established by history, revelation, science or reason, yet alleged arguments being continually advanced in the vain endeavor to resuscitate a vanishing religion, a few propositions are here advanced which prove there is no God:

There is a universe. This proves there is no God.

The universe is infinite. This excludes anything else of like character—two infinities being an absurdity.

The universe (nature) is here and there and everywhere. This proves that God cannot be here and there and everywhere.

Two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time. Matter (implying energy and force) monopolizes every point of space, nothing else can occupy it in addition.

The universe exists now. Something cannot come from nothing, therefore the universe has always existed.

Being eternal and infinite, this excludes anything anterior, exterior, or superior to it. Is God in the universe or the universe in God? If there is a God, either of these propositions must be true, yet both are glaringly absurd.

Can an engineer drive a locomotive and be a locomotive at the same time? If not, how can a God manipulate an infinite universe and be infinite "himself?"

Yet the universe, outside of God, is an absolute reality, as much so as a locomotive is a reality outside of the engineer. The world is a reality, our planets, the sun, all the countless millions of stars within reach of our telescopes, and the infinitude of stars and systems beyond the reach of our strongest lenses, which science infers to exist, all these are a reality and all these, yes, every object of knowledge is a reality, but all these are not God! How then, in the name of reason I ask, can a God of whom we know absolutely nothing, be infinite, when an infinite number of material objects, not God, fill all space?

But does the universe exist in God? If we but imagine for a moment the aspect of the universe to resemble a huge machine of infinite dimensions, eternally active in all its vast proportions, the idea of the universe existing within a God will appear equally childish and simple.

All phenomena are the results of energy co-existent and inseparable from matter. All cosmic motion, change, and life may be traced to this physical and chemical energy pervading all nature—never to a God.

Mind—the so-called infinite as well as the finite—implies limit, localization, conditions, etc. This fact tends to prove that while God, perchance, might concentrate his mind on the world or some particular sect or individual, considering their exhortations, the rest of the world and the universe for the time being would be Godless!

From a late scientific authority I quote in proof: "It is impossible for a person's mind to be in two places at the same time." Noted chess-players may play twenty games simultaneously, but it is done by speedy transfer of thoughts from one game to another, and not by considering two moves at once.

Thus "Omniscience" is impossible.

Again! Mind implies limit and necessitates organism, brain, nervous force, etc. Let the church demonstrate how a God without a brain can be a God, and all it implies, or how a God with a brain can be infinite, and I will kneel down and worship with them.

Is this dogmatism? The "dogmatism of the Infidel" we hear so much about? If it is, then asserting that twice two is four is dogmatism. Then to state all the facts of mathematics, all the truths of history, is dogmatism. We simply confine ourselves to fact, to knowledge, and to demonstrated truth. There we stop and refuse to accept the crude notions transmitted from our ignorant ancestors, which, it is dogmatically asserted, are true in spite of our knowledge and reason.

I protest against being accused of dogmatism, I studiously endeavor to be fair and make no pretensions to scholarship and learning. But I emphatically protest against the dogmatism of others who, assuming a superior air of knowledge, assert notions contrary to fact. Supposing some one should affirm that twice two is five, would it be dogmatism to deny the proposition, and would thinking minds be justified to assume the attitude of Agnostics, and concede that while in their own opinion twice two is four, yet twice two may be five, "I don't know," "one proposition is as irrational as the other," etc.?

We know a universe exists. Existing now proves it is eternal. This simple fact absolutely makes impossible, yes, needless, a God.

I simply assert that twice two is four, and cannot possibly be five. That the universe filling all space nothing else can fill it in addition. If this be dogmatism, all knowledge is a farce.

RECENT NEW JERSEY LAW.

Since the trial of Charles B. Reynolds in New Jersey for blasphemy, no one expected any liberality in the judicial opinions of its courts. A recent decision, however, shows some progress. The case is that of State vs. Powers, et al, 17 Atlantic Reporter, 969. The defendant tendered himself as a witness in his own behalf. The plaintiff objected to his competency on the ground that he did not believe in the existence of a supreme being, and in a future state of rewards and punishments. The defendant replied that he did believe in a supreme being; that he did not disbelieve in a future state of rewards and punishments; that he believed the only punishment for false swearing was that prescribed by the state laws. Upon this the court excluded him as an incompetent witness, and rendered judgment against him.

On appeal it was held: "Assuming the common-law rule to be that no person can be a witness in a judicial proceeding, unless he believes that God will punish perjury, it becomes necessary to consider the effect of that clause of our state constitution, which declares that no person shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right merely on account of his religious principles."

The assumption that at common law a man must believe that God will punish perjury, is unwarranted. The court held, however, that there were two questions in the case: "First, is the right of a party to testify in his own behalf a civil right? Second, is the belief of a person whether God will punish perjury to be ranked among his religious principles?" The court defined civil rights to be "those which the municipal law will enforce at the instance of private individuals for the purpose of securing to them the enjoyment of their means of happiness. . . . Among civil rights is the right to prosecute and defend actions in the courts of the commonwealth according to the established rules of practice. In the light of these statements, it seems clear that the statutory rights of a party to testify in his own behalf is a civil right."

On the second point, as to whether a person's belief as to the punishment of perjury by God is to be classed among his religious principles, the court held, "A person's sentiments on that subject must be deemed part of his religious principles. It is urged that disbelief cannot be called a religious principle."

This is an admission that belief is sacred; that a man has a right to doubt or disbelieve that God punishes perjury by any special or direct punishment. If his religion teaches him that the same rule follows disobedience of the law of truthfulness, which does of the laws of health, then his disbelief may go to the extent of the existence of a personal God. The court saw the tendency of its admission, and hedged by adding: "Perhaps, if one denied the existence of a supreme being, it might in a proper sense be said that he had no religious principles;" but that if one believed in a supreme being, that would influence his life; and "the mere fact that in those relations he has discovered no divine purpose of punishment for specific acts does not militate against his possession of religious principles, and among them are his belief, his disbelief, and his doubt concerning those relations." Hence he had a statutory right to testify in his own behalf. This is a narrow conclusion. The statute made parties witnesses in their own behalf; and this destroyed the dogma that only those who believed in an orthodox God were competent. The question of religious belief was not in question.

But the question raised by the objection and exception was whether religious belief or disbelief could be made a test of competency under that constitutional provision. The right to be competent as a witness for another is as important a civil right as the right to be a witness in his own behalf. The old idea was that no matter how religious a man might be, he would dare the wrath of God and perjure himself when his self-interest came in. Hence he was incompetent. The law changed with the progress of the times, and held that a man might be trusted as a witness in his own behalf.

The constitutional provision was intended for another purpose—to take away the stain of bigotry that had been borrowed from ecclesiastical law. It placed all men on a level so far as belief was concerned. If a man was untruthful, that was a fact—a fact to be proved, not to be inferred from his idea of God, or of an unknowable supreme being, or of hell, or of heaven.

The court, while it failed to make this distinction, ruled out the idea that the civil rights secured were only those recognized as in force when the constitution was formed. The opinion calls attention to the fact that the colonists insisted that their belief or disbelief should not debar them from rights accorded to other subjects. The court says: "Even up to the time of the Revolution, this doctrine had not broadened out into the principle which we now consider just; for in the colonial constitution of July 2, 1776, equality of rights was claimed for only those of the Protestant faith, the language being 'that no Protestant inhabitant of this colony shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right merely on account of his religious principles.'" . . . When, in 1844, a more enlightened spirit stripped the doctrine of its sectarian bonds, and developed it into a principle of liberty, assuring to all persons the enjoyment of civil rights irrespective of religious principles, there was certainly no purpose to lessen the scope or vigor of its operation. It was still to permeate every department of the government. The object in view was to guarantee to every one that his religious principles should never, under any circumstances, be made the ground of denying him any civil right which, with different religious principles, he might lawfully claim." The court held that the provision covered rights subsequently created, as well as those existing at the time of its adoption. Having thus laid down the broad principle that rights should be protected irrespective of religious principles, the court, with great inconsistency, held that the rule only applied to parties who offered themselves as witnesses. "It is, of course, not intended to imply by the foregoing opinion that the competency of witnesses generally will not be affected by their religious principles."

This opinion is somewhat in advance of the old dogma that this is a Christian nation, and only Christians have rights the courts are bound to respect.

W. S. BUSH.

Seattle, W. T.

A CLERGYMAN'S DEFENSE OF INFIDELITY.

The pastor of the Unitarian church, Rev. N. A. Haskell (says the San Jose Times of recent date), preached Sunday on "Infidelity and Skepticism," a reply to the controversy going on in the Nineteenth Century between Dr. Henry Wace and Professor Huxley. The preacher said:

Formerly there were few terms so opprobrious as Infidel and skeptic. But this has gone by, certainly so for all thoughtful people. The church has denounced as Infidels so many men and women of the highest intellects, the most spotless characters, the purest motives, that the term is no longer one of doom except to a circle of devotees growing smaller every day, who still worship the church as the vicegerent of God on earth.

These Infidels have pitched their camp outside these church walls and the whole world is going out to hear them as the people went out some two thousand years ago to hear that Jewish Infidel, Jesus, the Christ. The word skepticism is derived from a verb meaning to look into, to investigate. It is a good, honest word. Goethe said that "skepticism lies at the base of all truth." Very true. By investigation alone can man hope to come to a knowledge of truth.

How, then, did it come to have such an evil name in the church? This is easily explained. He who investigates carefully is quite certain to find very much commonly supposed, to be true that is open to serious doubt, so an inquirer—a skeptic—was regarded as a doubter; and to doubt anything the church affirmed to be true was denounced as the worst of sins.

The church claims to possess a revelation from God which is not open to human investigation. It is organized for the specific purpose of accepting that revelation and defending it against the attacks of reason, of science, of experience; defending it against the world. You see why it will not allow investigation. It will not allow any mortal man to ask whether its authority is superhuman.

But they who, heedless of its anathemas, have investigated this claim of the church to superhuman authority, find that its supposed revelation is made up for the most part, of certain articles of belief, which are rated to be true at various church councils convened in days of ignorance and superstition, long anterior to the coming of science.

In the church in which I received my early instruction I was repeatedly told by the good old parson that I must not expect to understand the orthodox faith, that the reason could not judge of it. I must have faith to believe it. All I had to do was to say, "I accept it." But how could I say that till I believed it, and how could I believe it till I was convinced that it was true, and how could I be convinced that it was true till I had investigated it freely and carefully?

I saw no escape from this conclusion, and so I did investigate it, and the result was I did not believe it, and in fidelity to my convictions was lost in infidelity, or what my "orthodox" friends consider infidelity.

I was and am now an Infidel to that system of faith, but underlying it and shining through it, I perceived a grander faith which was consistent with reason—faith in the eternal goodness and in human goodness. As near as I can judge the faith that brought peace to my soul was much the same as comforted the heart of Jesus when he was denounced as an Infidel to the Jewish system of faith.

THE OREGON CONVENTION.

G. W. Tiffany, of Salem, is the first member of the Union to take in full a life membership by the payment of twenty-five dollars. My opinion is that with needed organizations suited to all conditions, and with bold, conscientious, devoted leaders, the Liberals will outlive them all. It is a common expression with them, "I will use my money for this world only."

Mr. Foster, of Salem, and his good wife send ten dollars. H. L. Wilson, away up at Davenport, sends $2.50, and so does Peter Selde the same.

Our lecturers have strong individualities, and the members should have charity for the man whose duty it is to assign them position in battle. Do not forget the informal meeting at Masonic Hall on Friday.

O. Jeldness of Iron King Mine, sends ten dollars, and threatens to do it again; D. Priestley, of Milwaukee, $1, and walked five miles to give it; W. C. Clow, of Hillsboro, $1; M. Cheney, $1; T. Bramel, $1; W. Heath, $1; T. B. Huston, $1; C. Hagner, $1; C. McKinney, $1; J. Newport, 50 cents; Reuben Wright, of Mololla, $1; Mr. Frazer, $1; H. A. Frazer, $1; A. B. Klise, 50 cents; M. Klise, 50 cents; Silas Wright, $1. W. Kientoff, of Dallas, Polk county, sends $1—will send more if needed; C. Rodgers, away from Prineville, Crook county, sends $1. These Liberal brothers can't be here. Mayor James Fell, of Victoria, is sick and cannot be with us to speak. Herman Arnold, of Shed, $5; Mrs. Arnold, $2; Charlie Arnold, $1; Fred Arnold, $1; Robert Arnold, $1; John Roberts, of Portland, 50 cents; J. Blumheimer, 50 cents. John Phillips, of Zena, Or., sends ten dollars for the convention by Mr. Tiffany. He is old and deaf, and cannot be with us. A glorious character. Here it comes: Walla Walla Liberal Club, by Albert Rosenow, $25.

As this issue will reach us while in session, let me thank—for you all—our valiant hero, C. B. Reynolds, of Walla Walla, for the practical work he has done for this convention and secularization in the state of Washington. Thanks to all. C. BEAL, President Oregon State Secular Union.

A Scientific Memory-test.

"Now, children," said a teacher, after reading the old story of Washington's exploit with his hatchet, "write me all you can remember of that pretty story I have just read to you." The following was the result: Slate I. (Teddy, eight years old). "George Washington is our father did he tell a lie no he never did he did with a hatchet;" Slate II. (Ethel, seven). "George Washington was the father of is countre hes father sed did you do it he sed i wud not lie i did it with my Hathit and then he busted in tears;" Slate III. (Georgie, nine). "George Washington is the father of our country and he did it with his hatchit and he sed father I did it did the boy deny it o no did he try to put it on some other feller No He did not tell no lie he burst into tears."—Science.

Mr. Shaug, Take Notice.To the Editors of Freethought:

Mary A. White, San Diego, says, "Do, Mr. Editor, recommend Belamy's book," etc. Now, I want to say, Do, Mr. Editor, keep out of your columns matter like the "Profane Narrative" (FREETHOUGHT, Sept. 28). I often find articles in FREETHOUGHT I like to hand to friends to read, but when a number comes along containing something like this story I feel like putting it in the stove instead, however much I may wish to extend the reading of some other portion of the paper.

Such articles will not bring Freethought support, nor its friends respect.
Respectfully, MRS. CHRIS SCHOFIELD.

San Jose, Cal.

A Note from B. F. Underwood.To the Editors of Freethought:

Engagements East will not allow me to lecture at present in several places in this state from which I have received applications. Fresno, Hanford, and Lemoore, where I have just spoken, wish each to have a course of lectures, and other towns, in the vicinity and further south, have applied too late for me to visit them this trip. I have decided to return to California in January to give a month to speaking in the state. Societies or individuals that wish to arrange for lectures by me in northern, middle, and southern California, are requested to write me at once, addressing me Drawer 134, Chicago, Ill. Accept thanks for editorial courtesies.

Yours truly,

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Mrs. Krekel.To the Editors of Freethought:

Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel has just left us, after giving some very entertaining lectures. Mr. Henry Schroeder has given you an account of her success on the Coquille. Marshfield and Empire City are on this side, therefore I beg your indulgence for a few words.

Mrs. Krekel gave three lectures at Marshfield to good and appreciative audiences. She is on the constructive side of Liberalism. She comes with a modest enthusiasm and clear enunciation and lays her best thoughts on the altar of truth. She is a perfect lady in every sense of the word, and a scholarly lecturer. I am supremely happy to write this of one of my own sex; showing clearly the ability of woman to grasp knowledge, understand science, originate ideas, and stand beside man in advanced thought. Mrs. Krekel crossed our rugged coast mountains and lectured the same evening of her arrival, and then for ten more evenings, without rest. What man can do better? Of course we shall always remember S. P. Putnam as our pioneer lecturer, who came to blaze the way for the rest and set us all to thinking on the problems of life. He has his place in our memories, and Mrs. Krekel will have hers.

Marshfield, Or.

MRS. E. A. HILLBORN.

The Pope's Sovereignty.To the Editors of Freethought:

Under the heading, "Position of Pope Leo XIII.," the New York Sun of Sept. 20 gives a synopsis of the pastoral appointed to be read in the Catholic churches in his diocese on the Sunday following.

It commences with a condemnation of the proceedings at the erection of the Bruno monument at Rome, which it terms "an insulting ceremony" and "a wretched expression of wounded envy," and, furthermore, adds (what may be correct) "that it is as anti-royal as it is anti-papal."

The pastoral terminates with a long dissertation on the subject of the necessity for the reinstitution of the temporal sovereignty of the pope, and as it declares that "We cannot help thinking that it does not become a mighty organization of over two hundred millions of people to look on quietly; to behold their supreme pastor on earth insulted in his capital" (?) "and restrained in the exercise of his most important functions, and say or do nothing," this statement, it is submitted, may justly be regarded as a stimulus to two hundred million of Catholics to recover the city of Rome by force of arms from the king of Italy, and re-establish his temporal authority there, against the expressed will of the people of that country.

Surely there is a better way of accomplishing such a result than by the introduction of a universal war in so-called Christian countries. There are nations where the Catholic religion predominates, and of late it was reported that the papacy was about to remove to one of them, viz.: Spain. It would be very easy for the government of that country to establish the temporal sovereignty there of the papacy and introduce an infallible sovereign pope into the dominions of a fallible monarch, but, it has not yet been stated that the government of any Catholic country has deemed it advisable to make such a proposition. In the mean time, as his great predecessor, St. Peter, managed to do his work without asserting his need for temporal sovereignty, it is submitted that he who claims to be his successor would do well not to covet monarchical power.

A Letter from N. F. Griswold.To the Editors of Freethought:

Will you please send me the last three copies of FREETHOUGHT, which for some unaccountable civil service or other reason have not come to hand. I am very anxious to know more about our pioneer pilgrim Putnam's progress in spreading the gospel of Freethought throughout the great northwest.

I was in Portland and Oregon City in the winter of 1851, about two weeks, buying flour and lumber. From my limited observation and the acquaintance I then formed with the most generous and hospitable people it has ever been my good fortune to meet, I believe he has one of the best fields on the face of the earth to make good secular soldiers to meet and overthrow the vast army of the Lord in their desperate efforts to transform our natural republic of the people into a supernatural despotism of the fabled king, Jesus.

Herewith I hand you draft for the first payment of $20 for the privilege of joining the Pacific coast band of practical Liberals to encourage your paper. I would rather belong to that band than be counted with Ward McAllister's noted four hundred New Yorkers. Ever truly yours, Meriden, Conn., Sept. 20, 1889.

Mrs. F. C. Reynolds's Rambles and Ruminations.To the Editors of Freethought:

S. P. Putnam in his News and Notes of Sept. 14 refers to our long wait at Pendleton; and the young girl "who cried as though her heart would break at bidding her family good-by." She was to visit Dr. Darrin to undergo an operation on one of her eyes, which was drawn in and upward. Mr. Putnam and friends had a four, we had a fourteen hour wait at Pendleton. Mr. Hamilton, I think that was the name of the girl's father, asked me to look after his poor little girl on her long journey. I was glad to be of some slight use and comfort to the little lonely one. We arrived at Portland on Friday at 3 P. M., after many delays on account of burned bridges etc., and lost no time in repairing to Dr. Darrin's office, and persuaded him to perform the operation at once. The child fainted from nervous exhaustion. When, after a long time, she recovered, the doctor wanted to postpone further operation till the next day, affording her opportunity to rest and recuperate after her long, tedious journey. "No! do it now while Mrs. Reynolds is with me," she said, "to-morrow I shall be all alone." So in spite of her long faint, and exhausted condition, the doctor complied with her piteous pleading. I held her hands while the cord that drew the eye in was cut, and her eye made as straight as the other. She did not faint again, but bore the operation bravely.

The doctor, on account of her being a poor girl, made no charge. "When do you go back?" he asked. "Why! I thought I could go right back to-morrow," she said. "In your letter, doctor, you said I could." "No," said the doctor, "you need rest;" and seeing the blank dismay on the girl's face and, doubtless, truly interpreting it, added, "Here" (taking a couple of dollars from his pocket) "is money to pay your hotel bill. You are not fit to travel so far until you have had at least one night and day of perfect rest." I do not know Dr. Darrin's politics, nor his religious views, but he deserves to be a Liberal; for beyond question he is a skillful surgeon, and proved himself a kind, compassionate, true gentleman.

In the morning the happy girl saw in the glass her eyes were perfect, and her delight was nature's best invigorator. I had to bid her a hasty good-by for the "Telephone" always sails on time. I greatly enjoyed traveling by water, and was almost sorry when, at noon the next day, I reached my destination, Stella, where I was to speak that evening. A little misunderstanding about dates made our good friends do—to use a western phrase—some tall rustling to notify the people. The audience was not so large as it would otherwise have been. Sunday afternoon a goodly crowd congregated, and a still larger one Sunday evening. There are many energetic, whole-souled Liberals in this vicinity whom it was a delight to meet, and proud pleasure to make friends. Their cordial welcome and appreciation of my efforts in proclaiming the "Gospel of Humanity" I did greatly appreciate. Miss Lizzie Lawson discoursed sweet music before each lecture, attuning all hearts to reception of the glad tidings of redemption from the bonds of superstition. Many young people attended, and I think it would be hard for an orthodox minister to convince any of them that the Bible was of divine origin, or tended to elevate women. The young folks are bright, healthy, and vigorous, and intelligent, zealous Liberals. Here I met that sturdy old veteran of Infidelity—the father of Liberalism in this section—Fred C. Scharnhorst, ever ready with money, time, and influence to help forward the good work. Here, on the banks of the beautiful river, is the peaceful, happy home of good brother Henry Lawson and family, with whom I found delightful resting place. Very fully has Henry Lawson filled Robert Burns's ideal:

"To make a happy fireside clime for weans and wife
Is the true pathos and sublime of human life."

W. M. Anderson and family, D. F. Howard and wife, Jarrel brothers, and others, all most cheerfully do their full share to keep the car of progress rolling. I was delighted with Stella, her people, her mountains, and beautiful mosses, and her grand river.

Monday about mid-day found me once more on board the "Telephone" bound for Skamokawa. This place, to one from the East, is a startling surprise. The city is built on the river. All go by boat. The water is the only highway or by-way; to hotel or to post-office, go in a boat. The people here wanted my husband, and I fancied they were a little disappointed when they learned that the ex-reverend's engagement at the opera house, Walla Walla, prevented his accompanying me. Still I give them great credit for making the best of the situation. I spoke there on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Friday evenings to very large numbers—hall crowded. I wish I could describe the grand view that met my gaze, as a reward for climbing one of the highest mountains. The task of climbing was not easy, but the grand view well paid me for the exertion. The Misses Littens and little daughter of Mrs. Silverman accompanied me in my rambles. I filled my valise with choice mosses and ferns, Indian spear and arrowheads, etc. There is a noble host of Liberals at Skamokawa, with that enterprising young merchant, W. G. Thornburg, in the lead, gloriously sustained by Dr. Thessing, E. D. Brooks, James Jareld, I. N. Lott, P. O. Peterson, H. M. Bowman, C. C. Masten, W. S. Brooks, C. L. Silverman, Mat. Frederickson, I. T. Luts, Alvin Brooks, and H. Lowell, any one of whom it is worth a long journey to meet, but that pleasure is attainable, for nearly all will be present at the great Liberal Convention at Portland, Oct. 12, 13, 14, and at the grand ball and free banquet at the close of the Convention, at which all would be glad if the genial, humorous editor of FREETHOUGHT, and his wife, could be present.

MRS. F. C. REYNOLDS.

The Terry Case.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Mr. A. Schell's reply to W. F. Freeman, Esq., published in FREETHOUGHT of September 28, although eminently proper and correct in the main, contains—probably unwittingly—several very important and glaring misstatements.

First—That "the killing of David C. Broderick in a duel was the result of a conspiracy, and little better than a cold-blooded murder."

Second—That "he resigned his seat on the Supreme bench for the purpose of putting down the 'vigilance committee.'"

Third—That "had Hopkins died Terry would have been hung."

Fourth—That "he had to stand trial, and plead for his life like a veritable criminal."

The story of the accidental discharge of Broderick's pistol, etc., was evidently an invention of Terry's political enemies.

The remark that "it was only when he had the 'drop,' that Terry's (bull dog) bravery was conspicuous," seems to me smacks a little of prejudice.

Will some one who has the record of the facts in this case please set the public right in these matters?

Turlock, Sept 29.

J. C. P.

To the Editors of Freethought:

In your last issue is a letter from Hon. A. Schell to W. F. Freeman, Esq., on the case of Terry and Neagle in this state; though Mr. Schell writes from Albany. We are of the opinion that the letter, though perhaps true in the main, does not leave the readers of FREETHOUGHT well informed in this case. They should always be so. Freethought people cannot afford to be led astray on a single issue that affects the interests of liberty and humanity.

Mr. Schell speaks of Judge Terry as one who knows, and is not far from the mark, save in a certain animus thrown into all his words. Terry was not a man we admired. We are Republican to the core. He fought for slavery. We are for peace, at any price less than honor and liberty. Terry was for war at all points. He was our antipodes. He was a duelist, and we abhor the infernal code that calls that honor. Let us even grant that he was a bold, bad man.

Still the question is open, May the United States courts appoint and pay an assassin to lay a trap for, and kill, a bold, bad man? If so, who is safe? Thomas Paine was called a bold, bad man. So is Robert Ingersoll. So is the editor of FREETHOUGHT.

Then these bold, bad men sometimes do right. They are bad and bold for justice. They become a terror to evil doers. And the evil doers give them bad names, and take the first occasion to murder them. It has been done a thousand times, and the law is strained because he was a bad man. But, in the republic, all law shall be just and equal to all men.

In this particular case, Terry, the bad man, was the slaughtered victim of as vile a clique of unjust judges as ever cursed mankind and served fraud and villainy. We have known Terry, Field, Sharon, and all that ilk for thirty-five years, as Schell says he has Terry. We know Sarah Althea Terry. We know all the facts of her case against Sharon. We speak with a full knowledge, and challenge the state to deny one word of what here follows. We make no exception. Schell, if he pleases; the heirs or attorneys of Sharon, if they like; the judges—Field, Hoffman, Sawyer, Deady, Sabin, each or all; and the people of San Francisco, to be the jury:

Sarah Althea Hill Terry came to San Francisco a young American woman of education, means, of passable beauty of face and form, and with nothing to indicate vice either in manners or deportment. Nature is a liar if she is the bad woman her enemies represent. She met Sharon, a senator, a millionaire, a libertine, and now charged with being one of the cutest rascals in our state. They went together, as man and wife, though in secret; she said, on a contract of marriage to be kept secret for a time, and signed by both; he said, for the consideration of $500 a month, with no scrap of pen, and no term or assurance but his will.

She appealed to the courts to look at her contract, declare her Sharon's wife, grant a divorce, and give such alimony as the case called for.

Sharon, instead of a simple answer of denial, and asking for a fair trial, at once set all the machinery his vast fortune and influence could command in motion to slander and persecute, and even murder, her and her friends.

A simple daughter of the republic called on the courts of her country for justice, and found herself the center of a storm of abuse that no woman ever before endured. She was charged as a wanton, a conspirator, perjurer, forger, and suborner of false witnesses; her attorneys were fined, and her friends assailed by assassins. The judges, police, grand jury, all that could be, were suborned against her. The trial came, full, and exhaustive, and a learned judge said, "Yes, she is a wife, let her have her divorce and alimony." He was not bought, that is certain. If mistaken, it was an honest mistake.

On appeal, the supreme court of the state says, "This private contract and private living do not make a marriage in this state. It would never do. Let the judgment be reversed!" And so it stands, but there is not one word of imputation against the woman. She was mistaken, but a learned judge was also.

Then came the United States judges, Field, etc., as above, and took the case on a false pretense, intervened, treated the lady with indecent, un-American brutality, and fulminated against her this infamous scandal: She is a depraved woman, a forger, a perjurer, a conspirator. This was all gratuitous, called for by no complaint, supported by no evidence, and not necessary to the decree.

Perhaps she thought she needed a bold, bad man to avenge her of her enemies. She married Judge Terry. He was a "holy terror" to all these judges. He imprudently made threats against them, not to kill, but to insult, slap, and perhaps to provoke a duel. It was all wrong.

Neagle was appointed to guard Judge Field. If he simply did so, and obeyed orders, and the orders were lawful, he is innocent. If his orders were not so much to guard Field as to kill Terry; if he exceeded his orders, or at any time took the intent to kill rather than to guard, he is a murderer. And the state should know which it was. And all really Freethought people should be well informed, and declare that it is not a crime for an American woman to sue a senator and a millionaire for her just rights; and it is a crime for United States judges to brand her as a depraved woman for so doing.

Guying a Clergyman.

It is wrong to play jokes on the clergy and only very sinful people ever do it, says the Washington Post. There is an ex-newspaper man, well-known on the Row, who wears the smuggest face, the ministerial air, and the most clerical spectacles of any man in the business. During a recent convention, which drew several hundred clergymen to Washington, Mack (that isn't his name) got into a Fourteenth-street car full of ministers, stumbled half way up the aisle, and caught the eye of a fellow-newspaper man.

"Why, Brother Thompson, how do you do?" he exclaimed, grasping his hand and shaking it effusively. Mack sat across the aisle and started a running conversation which could be heard all over the car.

"Let me see, Brother Thompson, I haven't seen you since the Triennial Conclave at Chautauqua in 1875. How is your Buffalo charge getting along? Did you get your salary raised? No! That is too bad, really too bad. I did. I worked my congregation nicely. I had a friend in Cleveland who is on the staff of a secular newspaper, and he was unscrupulous enough to work up a boom for me there until I received an offer of $5,000. Of course my congregation wasn't going to be outbid—ha, ha—and they saw that $5,000 and went them one thousand better. That was in May, one year ago."

The whole car was attention by this time, and Mack was the focus of thirty pairs of curious eyes.

"Along in June I sat for my portrait. I got 40 per cent gross on those, you know. What do you get? Nothing? Oh, dear, Brother Thompson, you really neglect your opportunities. Let me see. I received from the church fair proceeds alone last year (the amount was lost in a whisper). But these portraits were very bad. They made me look quite thin and careworn. I sent four dozen of them around to the dear ladies, and it would have done your heart good to see how they worked and raised $500 to send their pastor off to Europe."

"I hear you are thinking of taking a new charge? Is it so? Want to have a chance to work over your old sermons. Been eight years in one place? Well, I don't blame you. I can't very well. You see I have made a good many investments in my city, and it would necessitate too many sacrifices to break the old ties. Still there are other ways. I succeeded in negotiating an exchange of 150 sermons for an admirable series by Dr. Jones of San Francisco. The good man was much pleased at the exchange."

"There, there, oh, dear, dear. I have just called to mind that a family which has been in my church for ten years has just moved to San Francisco, and is going to join Dr. Jones's church. They may remember those sermons. Oh, dear; it may make trouble for Dr. Jones."

Mack chuckled and poked "Brother Thompson" in the ribs with his umbrella. It was a rainy day.

"Where is your umbrella, Brother Thompson? Is that it? That is not the sort of an umbrella you ought to have. Look at mine. The finest of silk and an elegant silver handle. I don't know whether you ever noticed, but I always have nice umbrellas. You see mine is a fashionable church, and there are always a good many strangers at divine service. I have an arrangement with the sexton to pick out on rainy Sundays the best umbrella left in the vestibule and put it away for me. The regular pew-holders always take theirs in the pews, and only strangers leave umbrellas in the vestibule, so I never have any trouble about umbrellas. Ah, here is my street. Good-bye, Brother Thompson. Come and see me when you can. Good-bye."

A babel of whispers ran around the car, and indignant glares followed the pseudo clergyman. One venerable party came down to "Brother Thompson," and, notebook in hand, asked the name of "that clergyman." Brother Thompson struck his forehead with his clinched fist, but for his life could not locate the talkative preacher, and, to escape cross-examination, left the car at the next corner.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and under stand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

The Deacon's Evil Propensity.

An amusing incident occurred in a Down East church a few Sundays ago. The clergyman gave out the hymn beginning:

"I love to steal awhile away."

The regular chorister being absent, the duty devolved upon the old deacon to start the hymn, and he began: "I love to steal," and then broke down. Raising his voice a little higher he then sung, "I love to steal." As before he concluded he had got the wrong pitch; and deploring that he had not his "pitch tuner," he determined to succeed if he died in the attempt. By this time, all the old ladies were tittering behind their fans, while the faces of the young ones were in a broad grin. At last, after a desperate cough, he made a final demonstration, and roared out: "I love to steal." The effort was too much. Every one was laughing. The preacher arose, and with the utmost coolness said, "Seeing our brother's propensities, let us pray."

Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, New Jersey offers his valuable services to all those in need of a kind, sympathetic and skillful physician. Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been assailed and exposed by the press, but, Dr. Fellows, a specialist, in his line, stands foremost in his profession, and the encomiums showered upon him publicly as well as in private, are flattering evidences of the high appreciation and confidence his long and conscientious devotion to his specialties in his profession have so justly merited for him, and it is safe to trust him.

A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1888.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: The remedy you sent is working like a charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. Have only been using it one week, and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right. Yours respectfully, J. R.

REMARKS—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle-aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, but who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out-and-out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors. DR. FELLOWS.

The Present and the Future

Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

NEWS AND NOTES.

Wednesday I received notice from L. P. Howard and R. V. Short that arrangements had been made for lectures at Butteville on Wednesday and Thursday evening, October 1 and 2, and that I was to take the steamer Orient which left Portland at seven o'clock in the morning. As I received the notice at ten o'clock in the morning, I found it impossible to obey instructions, for Father Time was never known to go back on himself, and surrender three hours for the benefit either of the Christian or the Infidel. One might stop the sun or the hands of the dial, and delay the sun upon its course, but if time has once taken a step, not God himself could get the "eternal pilgrim" to turn round and go backward—as Hamlet says, "like a crab." It was seventeen miles to Butteville on the banks of the Willamette, and I didn't feel like walking. I thought I might strike L. P. Howard at Canby, and so I took the afternoon train for that place. Landing, and shaking hands with friend Knight, I was told that I must go on to Aurora, or "Dutch town," as it is called, and here, being but six miles from Butteville, I might make connection. I hastened with bag and baggage to catch the hindmost car, which I succeeded in doing, and in about twenty minutes was at Aurora. Just as I came in, Howard was going out en route for Butteville, not having the slightest idea that the belated lecturer was on the express train. However, heaven helps those who help themselves, and no sooner had I made inquiries for a train to carry me to my appointment, when I was introduced to J. S. Vaughan, who was on his way, not only to Butteville but to the lecture, and from that time on I knew I was in the best of hands, for Vaughan is a Liberal to whom the glory of Freethought is an enthusiasm. It is in his blood and brain. So my ride that evening, from the glowing sunset into the beautiful moonlight and shadowy and majestic woods, was a bright experience. We stopped at his house, but found that all his folks had gone to the lecture, and so we hurried on—our little horse covering the remaining distance, about a mile and a half, in ten minutes, and the village was alive with quite a crowd when we reached the hall, just at the appointed hour—half-past seven. The Grange Hall was lighted, the bell rang, and soon a full house was ready for the Demands of Liberalism, and I should judge from the signatures received that there was quite a gathering of Liberals in this quiet country-town—once an active river-trading point, but now in "desuetude," somewhat, on account of the railroads. If one wanted to live aside from the turmoil of life, he could do so, here on the banks of the deep and placid river that flows by this unpretending village.

On the second evening a larger number attended the lecture. Many were obliged to stand, but they patiently listened to the "New Heaven and Earth" of Freethought and science. On the whole, I was quite delighted with the outlook here, and I expect to come back again when the summer days are shining.

R. V. Short took the laboring oar this time, and right well did he do the work, and I thank him for his whole-hearted endeavors. Liberals like this good friend are what give sunshine to our toil.

Thursday morning, Vaughan took me to his tree-embowered college on the sloping banks. Tall trees are here which make a natural cathedral for the spirit that delights in beauty. Sitting in the sunshine, I watch the glittering prospects gemmed with the sparkling river, like a silver ribbon, in verdant trceries. Here, also, are the grapes, pears, and plums—luscious as ever grew in garden of the east, and if Mother Eve had such wealth of fruit as this, there was no reason why she should desire the apple, except for the reason that the apple was forbidden, and the grapes and plums and pears were not, and of course, to the genuine woman and man, there couldn't be a more potent reason for eating the apple. Reveling in all this luxuriance of wood and field and orchard, and also drinking deep of the perfume of the hops which grow here in vast quantities, who should come along to add to our enjoyment but Mr. and Mrs. John Kruse, of Kruse's Landing; and as we gathered around the abundant dinner-table there was not a more jolly company in the world. After dinner we wended our way to Butteville, and about the middle of the afternoon crossed the river to where, among orchards and vines, the antique home of Mr. and Mrs. L. W. Geer welcomes. Here the spirits are wont to congregate with mystic revealings from the upper spheres, but humanity loses nothing of its fervor and good sense. Here we take supper, and the golden sunset streaming through gorgeous clouds makes the river as we recross a flowing picture of marvelous splendors.

There is one lone church at Butteville—the Episcopalian. Once it was flourishing, but it is now deserted. The ministers only come now and then. The building has been sold, and will hereafter be used for secular and general purposes, with the ministers thrown in if they want to try their chances. Butteville is without a church, a happy sign of progress.

Friday morning Mr. John Kruse takes me over to Aurora for the Portland train, and I bid good-bye to the many friends I have met here. I shall go next summer to Kruse's Landing and other places along the river, and I look to a pleasant voyage up on the Willamette.

Saturday morning I speed down again the broad Columbia to Ranier. Landing I expected to find M. J. Kittering, but he was gone to California, and I suppose will drop into FREETHOUGHT office. However, good allies took his place—Lawrence and Vose. Better friends could not be found for the storm and sunshine of Freethought. The bills advertising the lectures had been torn down by the Christians almost as soon as they were put up, but nevertheless a fair audience was present on Saturday evening, and I found encouragement for future work. A lecture was advertised for Sunday afternoon at Hudson's school-house, four miles out in the forests and hills. I was obliged to go on horse-back, for the roads were in a somewhat disabled condition, and being corduroy; it wasn't very easy to get over them with a wagon, and it was preferable to go on foot, or horseback. Graham and Vose went ahead on foot to see that all was in order for the lecture, and I followed on horseback just as the rain began to pour. There are so many roads in this country that it is almost impossible to guess the right one without considerable instruction. I lost the track and was obliged to reconnoitre. I finally came out right, but wasn't sure of the way until suddenly, from out the vast woods, I dropped upon the school-house as if by magic. Teams and men were gathered about, and entering, I found women and children present also, and so my uncertain and stormy journey terminated with very cheerful surroundings. On this frontier line I met choice spirits of the forward ranks—Gertrude Vose Meserve, who walked five miles to attend the lecture, and Jennie Vose Graham, who started to go on foot the same distance, but was fortunate enough to secure a ride for part of the way. This shows that the heart and brain of woman are by no means in the control of the church; that she will do as much for Freethought as ever she has done for the religions of the past. Labor is a joy indeed, when in the wilderness, almost, we meet such earnest comrades willing to do service, and not wait for fair weather to fly the colors. Out in these Oregon woods by the sweeping Columbia, in "the land of sunset," do we see the bright morning's radiance, and the little school-house, the strenuous foe of the church, shines with hope amidst the falling mists.

Mr. Vose walks back to Ranier, although the rain still comes down. There is a lull about evening, and the hall is well filled, and quite a number join the Secular Union. F. C. Winchester, E. D. Lyons, Felix Debast, Juliette Debast, and J. E. Kittering, are among those on the roll of Freethought, and evidently there enough at this point to keep our flag to the breeze.

Monday morning the rain pours down in greater floods than ever, and it looks as if the "Oregon weather" was determined to assert its rights and rule or ruin. Friend Lawrence sees me off for Stella, amidst the gleaming drops, for the sun is mingling with the showers as the steamer comes puffing up, and there is some hope of a blue sky. Friend Lawrence has battled with the wilderness and the flood for many a year, and in the grandeur of nature's forces has learned to disdain the littleness of superstition. Like the veteran soldier, he has the generous heart and the hand of welcome, and I go on my way with golden cheer.

There is a bit of sunshine when I get to Stella, and for a while I can sit on the porch and view the waters and the shores skirted with silvery clouds. But the silvery clouds darken and I have to find refuge in the house. But it is always pleasant at the Lawsons', always something going on, and there is not a dull moment. Whether the sun shines or not there is the charm of liberal entertainment. Mr. Vose and John Kittering came with me, and they and the Lawsons are busy with the new building which gives quite a metropolitan aspect to Stella. Our old-time comrades, Schornhorst and Anderson, come down from the misty highlands, and the Douglass is also with us, and many other friends, and although the clouds regather and send the darkening showers, the hall is by no means deserted, and after the lecture the young folks dance for an hour or two.

This ends my campaign until after the convention at Portland, which I hope will be a kind of jubilee where fresh hope and enthusiasm will be given to us all. To come together in one grand host for social and intellectual entertainment is what is needed more than anything else in our pioneer work. We are to be moulded together by the laws of attraction, and not by any arbitrary force. Not having the fires of hell to scare us, we need the noble social impulse. This, to my mind, is the supreme purpose of the convention—to create the inspirations and enthusiasms of a deep and wide sympathy. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM,

THE NATIONAL SECULAR CONGRESS.

Our readers will bear in mind that the Thirteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union takes place at Philadelphia on the 25th, 26th, and 27th of this month. In organizing and preparing for this Congress President Westbrook is doing splendid work and proving himself equal to all the demands of his position. We hope, as all Liberals must, to hear of a largely-attended and influential gathering.

And we hope for two other things, namely, that President Westbrook will be re-elected, and that among the Freethought workers may be found a man for secretary as faithful and efficient as the retiring secretary E. A. Stevens has been.

SIR EDWIN AND THE CLERGY.

The San Francisco Examiner, inspired by the spirit of journalism, has taken advantage of Sir Edwin Arnold's presence in this city, to find out his religious views and to obtain the opinions of the clergy concerning them. Arnold is best known to Americans as the author of the "Light of Asia," a poetic exposition of Buddhism, in which the character of the Gautama is idealized and set forth as superior to anything reasonably to be expected of a human being.

In the interview published in last Saturday's Examiner, Dr. Arnold is reported to have said regarding the dogma of eternal punishment, that hell was "the idea of morose and dyspeptic men;" that he did not believe in it at all, and could not too emphatically condemn it. Dr. Arnold was then asked if he believed, according to the old and the present orthodox plan, that a man must be converted to be saved. "By no means," said he. "That idea is perfectly preposterous. There are a thousand ways to heaven." He said further that the universe forgives nothing. Men merely suffer consequences, which idea he illustrated thus: "If I stop at the Palace Hotel, as I do, I must pay my bill. My conscience tells me I must, and when that is done I am free. We suffer here for the wrong we do."

Mr. Arnold then passed to a somewhat lengthy and emphatic denunciation of eternal punishment, in which he evidently outstripped the speed of the reporter's pencil, for the scribe remarks, "Dr. Arnold grew very eloquent as he proceeded."

Having thus secured the heterodox bane, the enterprising reporter repaired to the doctors of divinity for the orthodox antidote. The very Rev. J. J. Prendergast, Roman Catholic vicar-general, declared at once his belief in hell, the necessity of conversion, and the fruitlessness of good deeds as a means of grace. He took occasion, at the same time, to ridicule the "Light of Asia," saying that the "Light of China" would be a good deal more appropriate title for the work, and added: "It strikes me, too, that we must have a very poor light after all these years and all our civilization, if we have to go to Asia for our light."

When we consider that the Catholic church looks to Asia for its "light;" that Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Jewish Jehovah are all natives of Palestine in Asia Minor, Mr. Pendergast's drive at Buddha hits the Christian savior as hard a blow as it does the Hindoo messiah.

The Rev. Dr. Harcourt, Methodist, was next visited. He at once gave his hearty indorsement of Dr. Arnold's views upon hell and the necessity of conversion, and quoted the words of the late Henry Ward Beecher as expressing his own convictions: "What's to become of all these millions that have never heard the gospel? They say that all of them will be swept into eternal punishment! You make me believe that and I shall call God, not my father but Thou Fiend." The Rev. Mr. Harcourt said further:

"Jonathan Edwards declared that God took the souls of the impenitent, as the housewife takes a spider, and holds it over the fire. Spurgeon said not long ago that the bones of the resurrected dead, i. e., of the lost, would become avenues on which would run the souls of those in torment, and that their nerves would be the strings, as it were, of violins, on which they would play their infernal music. All this is highly interesting and refreshing, but the Rev. Father Furness, if possible, went a step further lately, when he said that if an unconverted soul should return to earth, it would emit such terrible fumes as to destroy all human life."

Mr. Harcourt quoted these theologians in order to condemn them. He attributed their errors to false education and to a superstitious belief in the verbal infallibility of the Bible, which he repudiated.

The Rev. Dr. Jacob Voorsanger, a Jewish rabbi, said: "I particularly subscribe to Dr. Arnold's expressions."

The Rev. Dr. Barrows, Congregationalist, was emphatic in his denial of the English poet's assertion. Said he:

"I differ altogether from him, and cannot indorse his views. It is saying a great deal to say that conversion is not necessary, alone. And if Dr. Arnold knows it, or thinks he does, and we do not, why some time perhaps our ignorance will be developed into a greater truth and Mr. Arnold himself may find he is in error. He is certainly wrong. No, not for a moment could I indorse, or seem to indorse, what he has said. How does he know, I repeat, that there is no hell, and that conversion is not a thing to be bothered about?"

Sir Edwin might reply by inquiring how Dr. Barrows knows there is a hell, or how he knows conversion to be necessary. Both disputants must appeal to the Bible, in which case the clergyman would have the best of the argument; although, deciding the question by an appeal to common sense, the Englishman would have no trouble in vindicating himself.

The Rev. Dr. Horatio Stebbins, Unitarian, agrees, as might be expected, with Dr. Arnold. He does not see how the poet could say anything else, and wonders that all men do not enjoy the same belief.

Another Catholic priest, the Rev. J. F. Harrington, had not the patience to discuss the matter, since it had been decided for so many years. There is a hell, and the only way to escape it is through the Catholic church.

Rev. William M. Kincaid, of the First Baptist Church, intimated in no mistaken terms that to be asked at this late day if conversion was necessary was too absurd to be thought of. Inferentially, the doctrine of no future punishment was worse. He said he would not take time to discuss what was so obviously necessary. Elsewhere among the Catholic and orthodox clergy there were similar expressions of opinion. "Unless we believe each and all of the very things he strikes at," said the latter ministers, "we are not orthodox. The moment we say we don't believe in them, then we must go."

These "latter ministers" have certainly struck the keynote. If there is no hell, there is no necessity for them to preach salvation, and their occupation is gone. If "conversion" is an unnecessary process, then the church has no mission on earth. Why preach salvation from an imaginary hell? Why send missionaries, at great expense, to convert heathen who will be saved without it?

If Sir Edwin Arnold believes the Bible to be the word of God—and from his quoting it in support of his ideas we judge that he does—his expressed views are quite inconsistent with his belief. According to that work man must be "born again," which is conversion; and he is given his choice between baptism and damnation. Altogether, Dr. Arnold's deliverance is not very satisfactory. It puts him outside the pale of the Christian church, but it does not entitle him to the mild designation of Agnostic. He is practically a Unitarian.

It seems to us an oversight—probably, too, an intentional one—that the Examiner, after obtaining the guesses of the theologians on these doctrinal points, did not extend its courtesies to the representatives of Freethought. It is true that no Freethinker could have settled the question of the existence of a hell. None could have said with certainty whether or not conversion is necessary to salvation; but some might have been found to offer the valuable suggestion that the opinion of one man concerning the unknowable is as reliable as that of another, and that any discussion wherein the disputants appeal to ancient errors, instead of reason and experience, is mere vanity and a striving after wind.

THE SAN FRANCISCO FREETHOUGHT SOCIETY.

The next meeting of the San Francisco Freethought Society will be held at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, Sunday evening, October 20, at 8 o'clock. Col. H. L. Knight will speak on "Materialism and Theosophy."

THE FRUITS OF BELIEF.

There is one crop in this country that never fails, whatever drouth or flood may do to other crops. We refer to the harvest of religious lunatics gathered at all seasons by the commissioners of insanity. From a city paper of recent date we get these two items:

"Richard J. Lawless was to-day committed to the Insane Asylum. He lives in a cabin at Hunter's Point and sits for hours listening to the ticking of the clock, which, he claims, speaks to him through his father, and he believes that God teaches him in that manner.

"Mrs. Annie Gillovich was sent to a similar institution. She was breaking the doors and windows of her neighbors' houses with a hatchet, under the impression that the devil had told her to rescue her husband and children, who were in purgatory."

Other cases show that the product, besides ripening perennially, is common to all localities. A dispatch says:

"WILKESBARRE, Pa., October 5.—Miss Hattie Bartlett, a pretty and well known young girl living in West Pittston with her parents, was removed to the State Asylum for the Insane at Danville, Thursday. She had become violently insane on the subject of religion. About a month ago Evangelist Yatman began revival meetings here and Miss Bartlett was among the first to be converted. Since that time her desire has been to get away from the wickedness of this world and nearer to heaven. In her insane endeavors to do this she would climb to the top of tall trees in the vicinity of her home. On other occasions she walked miles in order to get into the attics of the tallest buildings. It was with great difficulty on being found that she could be induced to leave her supposed heavenly place of refuge. When her father and mother refused to follow her steps she termed them 'devils' and refused to associate with them, saying she was afraid she would be contaminated by their influence."

There are other causes of insanity besides religion, and some of them may be more prolific; but religion enjoys the distinction of being the only manufacturer in that line whose work is encouraged in this world and rewarded in the next.

A MODEL CATHOLIC INSTITUTION.

From Fort Worth, Texas, under date of October 11, comes a dispatch describing a Roman Catholic convent at Marionfeld, where J. H. Peters and Henry Andrews, two priests, preside over the convent boys. Two weeks ago, it is related, James Gross, a student, escaped and told of the murder last August of Lorenzo Esser, one of his fellow-students, by the two priests. The body was secretly buried by Father Peters, and four of the students. Soon after the murder Father Peters and the four students left for parts unknown. Justice of the Peace Coons held a private inquest at Esser's death, and found that the boy had killed himself by hanging. Coons claims that Esser was found hanging by an eight-inch piece of rope in his cell. The body was exhumed, and an investigation held before a judge showed that Esser's neck was broken, which could not have been caused by a fall of eight inches. Father Andrews and Justice of the Peace Coons have been bound over to the grand jury, and a search is being made for Father Peters. Gross says that other murders have been committed.

Whether all this is true or not subsequent investigation must show, but enough has already transpired to prove the danger of these religious prisons where all manner of crimes may be committed with slight possibility of detection.

A SERIOUS LOSS.

The Freethought Hall built by the Religious and Benevolent Association at Waco, Texas, in 1882-3 was destroyed by fire October 5. The loss falls chiefly upon Mr. J. D. Shaw, editor of the Independent Pulpit, who owned the larger part of the stock. The hall was erected at a cost of $4,000 mainly by the members of the Association. It was insured for but a portion of its value, so that Mr. Shaw is a loser by the fire to the extent of nearly $1,600.

This is a most serious blow to the editor of the Pulpit, and some men in his position might feel like giving up in despair. Mr. Shaw, however, writes us to say that he will continue to stand at his post and carry on the work. "I hope," he says, "to come from the ashes stronger than ever in zeal and determination to work for Liberalism. I will try to rebuild ere long, but cannot say with what success."

We certainly wish Brother Shaw the greatest success. The Waco Freethought Hall was the only building in Texas devoted to Liberalism, and one of the few in the country. May it rise again, and it will rise in better form than ever if the Liberals of Texas will put their hands in their pockets and support their leader as he deserves to be supported.

THE Portland Convention was a success. Let us give great credit to President Beal and the noble Liberals of the Northwest.

AMONG the many questions asked by Emperor William of Germany on his recent visit to London was one as to the percentage of illiterate persons in England. An approximate estimate being given him, he bluntly expressed his surprise at the existence of such a condition of popular ignorance in a country so wealthy and so high in the scale of civilization. His comments were repeated to the queen, who lost no time in laying the matter before her advisers and requesting them to suggest a remedy. Those to whom she applied complained of the open hostility of many who do not hesitate to proclaim education the parent of Socialism and Anarchy, and frankly say that the common people know too much already. This is an old plea that had its origin with the church, which holds that the best state of society is that wherein the learned few guide the actions and control the minds of the ignorant many. In saying that education leads to Socialism and Anarchy, its opponents have unwittingly made the best plea possible for those unpopular schools of thought.

In the Utah Commission's latest report this passage occurs:

"While we forbid the immigration of non-proselyting, peace-loving, docile Chinamen because we fear future danger from their coming; while we forbid the landing on our shores of contract laborers because they cheapen the wages of American-born citizens, and paupers because they become a burden, there is a far greater reason for closing our doors as a nation and forbidding citizenship to the hordes who are brought here to swell the ranks of an organized body which teaches them in advance to hate our government, denominates its executive, lawmakers, judges, and prosecutors as persecutors, and instills into every mind the constant teaching that their pretended revelations are more binding than the highest and best laws of the land, and that resistance to such laws is a virtue and the rendering of obedience to God. How far short of treason these teachings are we leave to those who can answer."

This was written to describe the Mormon church, but the most of it applies with equal exactness to the Roman Catholic church. The Mormons, however, have one thing in their favor, they owe no allegiance to a foreign potentate like the pope of Rome.

A CIRCUMSTANCE that occurred lately in the suburbs of Boston is thus related by the Advertiser:

"C. B. Botsford, who lives out on Garfield avenue, West Roxbury, is a prominent deacon in the Congregationalist church. He sold a lot of standing grass to Alvin Spear. Last Saturday the grass was cut, and Sunday, there being signs of rain, Spear, his father, and two other men, proceeded to shake the hay and store it away in the barn. This went against the conscience of Deacon Botsford, and; upon the men refusing to stop at his command, he had them all arrested. In court the next morning the judge ruled that they were not engaged in a work of necessity, and they were fined $10 each and costs for Sabbath-breaking."

Puritanism dies hard in Boston, where it is nursed and sustained by the statute. People on the coast cannot do much for these victims of blue laws, but they can keep awake and see that the superstitious leprosy is not implanted here by such purveyors of it as the emissaries of the National Sunday Union.

A NOTE in the Boston Investigator brings the regretful intelligence that Capt. Robert Davis, of Lunenburg, Mass., is very ill. Captain Davis is a true friend of the Liberal cause, outspoken in opinion, and generous in financial aid. Both these qualities entitle him to long life and the respect of our whole fraternity. We send best wishes and hopes to Captain Davis.

THE Catholic News, in referring to the large number of desertions from the regular army, tries to account for some of them by saying that "among Catholic soldiers there is also discontent at the want of proper provision for their religion." The News locates the discontent in the wrong quarter. It is not among the soldiers, but among the officers of the church, who want Catholic chaplains appointed in place of the Protestant ones now employed by the government. The soldiers testify, almost to a man, that they can get along without either.

THE editor of the Halifax, N. S., Evening Mail has invited destruction by engaging Mr. Charles Watts in a written debate on the merits of Secularism. Mr. Watts is as much stronger than his opponent as Freethought argument is stronger than religious sophistry, and the result of the debate is just about what might have been expected. The Secularist will get all the admiration or his ability, and the Christian all that undeserved sympathy which is felt for a man who shoulders more than he can carry.

"LET heathenism go," writes M. J. Caples, of Elk Grove. "The nineteenth century demands the truth. Superstition must abdicate—Reason must have the throne." Mr. Caples shows the sincerity of his sentiments as expressed above, by subjoining: "Inclosed please find money order for my own renewal and four new subscriptions." If there were a thousand Liberals like friend Caples on this coast we would declare the millennium, irrespective of the second coming of Christ.

AN International Congress of Freethinkers has just been held in Paris. The world's fair had brought people of all countries together, so that the congress represented many nationalities. The proceedings were conducted in French. Both the National Reformer and the London Freethinker contain extended reports of the proceedings, which included speeches, banquets, and visits by the delegates to the principal points of interest in Paris.

THERE is a cleryman in Tennessee who makes the denunciation of dancing a specialty. In a recent sermon he said: "Show me a young man who dances and I will show you a young man who is not worth the powder and lead to kill him." Whereupon the Alta inquires: "What has Rev. Williams to say about a young man by the name of David, who led the german in the streets of Jerusalem and was jawed by his wife for it?"

THAT overruling providence which watches the sparrow's fall and takes the "hair census" so accurately that all the capillary integuments of our heads are numbered, has allowed the Tabernacle of the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage to be destroyed by fire. Those who know that the Christian's professed trust in God is mere hypocrisy will not be surprised to learn that the structure was insured for all it was worth.

W. F. JAMIESON has been lecturing at Hay Springs, Neb., and the local paper, the Northwest News, observes that many Christians went to hear him, and "the opinion they have formed of the lecturer is not so flippantly expressed as it is by those who failed to hear him." It is generally that way. Those who have never heard the arguments of Freethought usually consider themselves best qualified to answer them.

By the way, what has become of the Rev. George Schweinfurth, the Illinois messiah? There was talk at one time of mobbing or incarcerating the impostor, but better counsel prevailed. Perhaps if the gentleman who once set up a similar claim in Judea had been ignored by the authorities he would have shared the oblivion into which Mr. Schweinfurth has relapsed.

THAT was a strange occurrence at Oneida, N. Y., last week, when a priest was poisoned by drinking communion wine at the celebration of mass. It seems that the miraculous power which can transform ordinary port into the blood of Christ does not possess the gift of rendering it innocuous when tampered with. This is the first case of pyæmia supervening eighteen hundred years after the patient's death.

THE Rev. William Kincaid, pastor of the First Baptist Church of San Francisco, has resigned and expressed a determination to go East. It is stated, however, that "an effort will be made to induce him to change his determination." If the effort takes the shape of a louder "call" from those who pay Mr. Kincaid's salary there is little doubt that it will succeed.

It is probable that the burning of the Freethought Hall at Waco, Texas, would have been used to point many a Christian moral and to adorn many a pious tale if it had not been so soon followed by the destruction of the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Thus Mr. Talmage's loss is the world's gain after all.

MORE than two hundred dollars has been subscribed toward erecting a monument to the memory of Horace Seaver. It is a good cause. Build the monument high and enduring—it cannot transcend the character of the man, or be more lasting than his influence.

THE OREGON CONVENTION.

The First Annual Convention of the Oregon State Secular Union met at Masonic Hall, Portland, Saturday, October 12, at 10 A.M. The meeting was called to order by President C. Beal, and music was rendered by Roose and Hodgson's Orchestra. As a preliminary measure Mr. Geo. H. Dawes moved the appointment of a Committee on Resolutions, which motion was carried, and the following committee chosen:

COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS.—Geo. H. Dawes, M. Fitzgerald, Robert Laughlin, Mrs. Jennie Voss Graham, and G. W. Tiffany.

Upon motion of Dr. J. W. McClure, of Silverton, the Convention appointed the following—

COMMITTEE ON NOMINATIONS.—Dr. J. W. McClure, S. P. Putnam, Mrs. S. C. Todd, B. F. Hyland, and H. Arnold.

Music by the orchestra ensued, and then Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, of Kansas City, Mo., was introduced and gave the opening address. After thanking the Convention for the honor of being its first speaker, Mrs. Krekel proceeded to a definition of Secularism; to point out its necessity and the causes which had brought a Secular party into existence, and finally to an exposition of its object. In closing she said, "In our deliberations of how most successfully to advance Secular work, let us be temperate, practical, and conscientious. Let us remember, as the French Convention declared, that 'one man's right ceases where another's begins.' Let us devise some method, adopt some system through which we can utilize means, energy, and ability, toward accomplishing work in the interests of which this Convention is called."

After this appropriate, eloquent address, which was frequently and heartily applauded, a banner was presented to the Oregon State Secular Union by Miss Mattie Blaisdell. In offering the beautiful symbol the lady said:

"MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: When FREETHOUGHT brought me the intelligence that the friends of freedom in the great Northwest would hold a Secular Convention in Portland, I asked myself what could I do to hurry on this mighty force which will yet break the chains on mind and body and set a captive world free? I said I would present them with a banner. Therefore this morning I ask you to accept a woman's offering for humanity.

"Friends, give me at this moment a mental pledge that you and your children's children will make an annual pilgrimage to some chosen place, and in convention assembled, with your eyes fixed on this banner of the brave, sing 'A Thousand Years, My Own Columbia.' And if ever war is forced upon us—as well it may be—let this banner wave at the head of your advancing columns, until every tyrant is removed, to make place for the sons and daughters of Liberty. Ladies and gentlemen, if you will work for the freedom of the race with the same devotion of soul as the illustrious persons here named, our cause of liberty, truth, intelligence, and justice will become victorious to the ends of the earth, and the people have but one religion—the Religion of humanity."

The banner was elegantly embroidered with gold on a dark background—the eagle with the stars—and those noble names of Freethought, Hypatia, Bruno, Paine, and Ingersoll, with the legend "Universal Mental Liberty," about the spread wings of the eagle. Below is blazing the torch of civilization, and underneath this flame are the words "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity." On the reverse side of the banner the Stars and Stripes float above the prostrate cross.

President Beal accepted the banner in behalf of the Oregon Union, with this characteristic address:

"Miss Blaisdell, on the part of the officers and members of the Oregon State Secular Union, I accept this beautiful and costly banner. The first inscription I see is 'Universal Mental Liberty.' If we should go to some distant country and find the people chained to stumps and trees, we would feel disgusted and return home. But on our return we would find most of the people chained to creeds and beliefs, some of them having taken a solemn pledge they would never believe anything else. Harriet Martineau was asked what she believed. She said she was a free rover on the breezy commons of the universe. She sought for truth wherever found.

"We find next the name 'Hypatia,' the daughter of Theon. Father and child were builders and patrons of the Alexandrian Library of three hundred thousand volumes, which was burned to make room for a new religion not Pagan. Teachers of mathematics and philosophy, they at one time had fourteen thousand students. As she was returning from the university a band of brutal monks dragged her from her chariot, tore her limbs asunder, scraped the flesh from the bones with shells, and threw them on the devouring coals. She was so pure, it is said, that a sweet smell arose towards heaven. Speak her name in whispers, or as you would that of a departed sister.

"'Bruno,' the young and beautiful philosopher, taught a science now accepted by a civilized world. Thrown into a papal prison, at the end of seven years he was taken out and burned unto death. The other day 30,000 Italians headed by their king, with a hundred bands of music and 1850 banners, marched into the field of flowers with their feet on the sacred ashes of Bruno, and there unveiled a beautiful monument to his memory. For three days neither pope nor priest was seen on the streets of Rome. If ever you intend to pray, pray now that this was the beginning of the end.

"'Paine,' the son of Liberty in three empires; the man who said, 'The world is my country; to do good my religion,' 'I believe in one God and no more, and I hope for happiness beyond this life,' the man who reproved every slaveholder from the president to the 'mudsill' by saying, 'Man has no property in man,' the man who first spoke the immortal words 'The free and Independent States of America,' the most abused man that ever lived—the best man that ever died.

"'Ingersoll,' the product of the ages past, the sample man of the ages to come. The world would be poor without him.

"'The torch.' Primitive man guided his footsteps in the dark, until the coming dawn, by his torch.

"'Liberty,' the word that all the good have spoken.

"'Fraternity.' Yes, brother, I will pull shoulder to shoulder with you.

"'Equality.' If you were unfortunate and did not secure enough for dinner, I will divide with you."

"Yes, Miss Blaisdell, while one of our torch-bearers faces the coming dawn this banner will be borne at the head of our advancing column."

The presentation and acceptance of the banner were the signal for loud and prolonged cheers. Mrs. Seip next gave a thrilling recitation, and repeating "A Thousand Years, My Own Columbia," that noble hymn was sung by the whole vast audience, with accompaniment by the orchestra.

Mrs. Lois Waisbrooker followed in a fine address to a most appreciative audience. A letter was read from B. F. Underwood and an address announced by Geo. H. Dawes on the "Principles of American Liberty."

It is now noon, October 12. A large number are present from all parts of Oregon. The hall was full this morning, and at the close of the meeting everyone was in a state of enthusiasm. There was handshaking all around. A lady remarked that it reminded her of the old camp-meetings. Well, we can have our gatherings and inspirations and welcomes and music as well as the churches, and this convention is a bright example of the social development of Freethought.

S. P. P.

Portland, Or.

OBSERVATIONS.

As neither of the vice-presidents was on hand last Sunday evening when the members of the Freethought Society convened, the meeting was opened by the author of these lines with a few well-chosen remarks which he has since forgotten. There was a full house, an increased number of ladies, and the consequent flutter of fans and ribbons.

This was the second lecture on "Matter and Spirit," Dr. Jerome A. Anderson being the speaker and representing the Theosophical side of the question. Dr. Anderson laid down the proposition that matter and spirit are coeternal and self-existing, matter being something in motion, and spirit a power that controlled such motion. Scientists called the controlling power force, but unless they were ready to admit that force to be intelligent the speaker could not agree with them. He also rejected the popular scientific theories regarding the process by which worlds are thrown off from a central sun, averring that science failed to explain how the central sun first came into position. Theosophy taught, on the other hand, that there was no original central sun, but a "laya" center produced by intelligent will—a point where there was no gravitation, and hence one toward which all the nebulous mass would necessarily gravitate, gravitation being only the expression of the cosmic will acting upon matter. Primary motion must also, the speaker held, be a direct expression of an intelligent force. Madam Blavatsky two years ago declared that gravitation was not universal in its action, and Professor Holden of the Lick observatory had lately confirmed her statement. Everything, Dr. Anderson held, was created to express an intelligent will—flowers to express beauty, mountains and forests to express grandeur, and so on. The doctor explained in a very interesting way his conception of the difference between the human soul and that of an animal. As to eternal life, Theosophy did not promise it to man as such. The spiritual monad in man was given individual persistence only during one manvantara, or cycle of material existence.

The lecture was followed by a lively discussion, participated in by Professor Miller and Messrs. Lund, Curtis, Burgman, Hannaford, and Knight, whose remarks are omitted for lack of space.

This meeting was pronounced, by all who were fortunate enough to be present, one of the best yet held. Dr. Anderson is a man whose abilities command respect whatever may be thought of his opinions. His achievements as a microscopist and his published works on physiological subjects place him among the eminent medical men of the country. Touching the unsolved conundrums of life he is an ingenious if not accurate guesser.

Next Sunday evening Colonel Knight will take up the subject of the two previous lectures, and do what he can to get at the truth. Admission is free to all without regard to previous conditions of religious servitude.

I heard a song the other day, the refrain of which was, "He's in the asylum now," and it suggested to me a parody that might be sung with good effect where people have the religious feeling highly developed. I have written this parody in the style of the popular ditty, and throw it uncopyrighted upon the world:

There are many good men you have known
Who were crammed with religion in youth,
When, if left to their judgment alone,
They had doubtless accepted the truth.
But their parents imagined them called
By the Lord to deliver his word
To all creatures by sin overhauled,
So their voice in the pulpit is heard.

They're preaching the gospel now
As their teachers instructed them how.
There is no other way
They can make so good pay,
So they're preaching the gospel now.

But some cannot plead this excuse,
They know they are guilty of fraud;
Their profession of faith is a ruse,
They deceive for the glory of God.
There are bummers and cutthroats and thieves
Who ought to be hung or in jail,
But each one has said he believes
The story of Jonah and whale.

They are preaching the gospel now,
For its easier far than to plow;
Though scarlet with sin
And sodden with gin,
They're preaching the gospel now.

There's the reverend Samuel Jones—
A minstrel come out of the South,
He gave up his tambour and bones,
To paralyze crowds with his mouth.
And the reverend Wilbur F. Crafts,
The Sunday-law advocate who
From each spot on the continent wafts
The sound of his Sabbath bazoo.

They're preaching the gospel now
With a halo upon their brow,
They're fanning the air,
This angelic pair,
And preaching the gospel now.

But I need not proceed. The professional balladist will at once catch the drift of my remarks, and can add to them from his own stock of religious knowledge.

The conversion of Mrs. Annie Besant to Theosophy has called forth the following from a Leicester poet:

THE BESANTARIA AND THE MOONBEAM.
(A Theosophical Fable.)

Once in the dungeon of an ancient dome,
Which rose where mystic flowers had found a home,
There dwelt some stunted plants, of dullish hue,
Called Besantarias; and, though strange, 'tis true,
These scentless flowers conceived themselves as fair
As those which blossomed in the garden rare.
One night a Moonbeam, wandering in the bowers,
Peeped through the dungeon's bars, and saw the flowers
Amid the gloom, grouped round their dusky queen;
But, whilst it gazed, its witching ray was seen
By that sad queen alone, for all the rest
Were hiding from the Moonbeam's loving quest.
Then to the dreamful queen wild longings came
To see the bright home of that lambent flame;
And when the Moonbeam's sacred magic threw
White wings upon her, Besantaria flew,
With new-found fragrance, through the dungeon bars,
And saw the garden gleaming 'neath the stars.
Thus did she learn at last that spirit-sight,
Though lost in darkness, is restored to light.

That is a remarkably fine piece of verse, but I should reproduce it here a great deal more willingly if it did not seem to deepen the popular impression that Mrs. Besant has been moon-struck.

QUERY (by Dramatist): Was it contempt of court?

Uncle Samos Parsons, of San Jose, comes to San Francisco about twice a year, and he never fails to call at FREETHOUGHT office and give us some advice and other material necessary to success in journalism. Two weeks ago he was in, and said he had ten dollars more than he cared to take home with him, and left it as a donation to the cause. He had a dozen envelopes and letters in his pocket, addressed and stamped, and containing blue postal notes. He gave me a list of the addresses. They were to the Truth Seeker, H. L. Green, J. P. Mendum, J. R. Monroe, J. D. Shaw, E. C. Walker, Ella E. Gibson, L. K. Washburn, Nellie Booth Simmons, Jeremiah Hacker, Elmina D. Slenker, Thomas Winter, and the Society of Moralists, Hannibal, Mo. Every one of these gets five dollars' worth of encouragement, while the Secular Society of San Jose, and the American Secular Union receive ten dollars each. In all, Mr. Parsons had just disposed of ninety-five dollars; and taking a general view of the recipients, and then looking in the glass, I do not know where persons and objects more deserving could be found. Mr. Parsons gets his income from a life annuity, and I often wish that half of the people who never do any good in the world were obliged to donate him ten years apiece of their useless existence to add to his already numerous years. It would well-nigh make him immortal in the flesh, but he deserves it.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK

The Italian residents of San Francisco celebrated last Sunday the discovery of America by their countryman, Christopher Columbus. It was one day later than the 397th anniversary of the event commemorated.—Dr. C. C. O'Donnell, the man who made so close a run for the mayoralty of San Francisco at the last election, is charged with being an abortionist, and one of his victims now lies in the county hospital.—Gen. Thos. B. Van Buren, who was for a number of years consul-general at Yokohama, died in this city last Sunday morning, aged 65 years.—Twelve thousand people witnessed a baseball game in this city last Sunday.—A railway station has been established at Summerland, the Spiritual colony on the Southern Pacific, five miles east of Santa Barbara.—The fall session of the State Convention of Fruitgrowers will convene at Fresno on Tuesday, November 5, and will continue in session for four days.—There were 99 deaths in this city last week against 100 in the corresponding week for 1888.

The Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage's Tabernacle in Brooklyn, N. Y., was totally destroyed by fire last Saturday night. The loss, including the big organ, is $150,000, covered by insurance.—The pastor of the Congregational mission church, Chicago, the Rev. C. H. Schuyler, has run away. He was formerly a resident of San Francisco, and is supposed to have become homesick and started west.—Connecticut has rejected prohibition.—It is charged that an attempt has been made by the friends of the Cronin suspects to bribe the jurors in the case, and six persons are indicted by the grand jury for embracery.—Judge Anderson of Utah has refused to naturalize a Mormon who would not renounce polygamy.—The Electrical Execution law is decided by Judge Day of Auburn, New York, to be constitutional. The counsel of the murderer Kemmler will appeal to a higher court.—Somebody poisoned the altar wine in a Catholic church at Oneida, N. THE REV. MR. CAMPBELL'S "OTHER ENGAGEMENTS."

Mr. S. P. Putnam gave us a brilliant lecture on September 27th. Everyone, with one exception, who heard the lecture, the subject of which was "The Bible and Modern Thought," was highly pleased. One Christian hearer whose bump of veracity is not yet developed, and who believes in lying for Christ's sake and is not a novice in the art, circulated a report that Putnam was a drunkard. Our local Infidel-smasher and Christian author, who was to have met Mr. Putnam in debate, made himself very conspicuous by his absence. Mr. Campbell agreed to meet Mr. Putnam, and afterwards found it convenient to arrange his business so that he would have an excuse to avoid a discussion. This is the way Oregon parsons demolish Infidels. A short time ago I saw an article in a California paper from the pen of a California reverend who had been on a visit to Oregon, and who spoke of his visit to Mr. Campbell and Mr. Campbell's abilities as an Infidel refuter. He told how Mr. Campbell delighted to meet Infidels in debate and how he routed them. That is news for people in this section, as it is a sublime Christian imagination. The writer must have been writing under the effects of a deep reverential calm. I am not aware of any Infidel being demolished by the redoubtable Campbell, outside of the straw man that he set up in his pamphlet, "Replies to a Skeptic," Mr. Campbell did pummel the poor straw man, the said straw man being a good Christian, a believer in a god, spirits, etc. It was a one-sided debate, as the straw or imaginary man could not reply to the David of Campbellism. It is easy for theologians to set up a straw man and with their little theological club of slander, misrepresentation, and sophistry demolish it; but when a real live Infidel puts in an appearance, where, oh where, are the Davids with their slings? Echo answers "where?" They take advantage of the advice of the old saying, "he that boasts and runs away will live to boast some other day." 'Tis sad to contemplate that in Hillsboro, a city of over 1000 people, Christianity has not one representative but what spurns the light of an oral discussion. The reason is plain. When Mr. Underwood was here he gave permission at the close of his lectures for any Christian to take the platform to reply to his lecture or ask any questions. Mr. Campbell was present. Some extracts from his pamphlet were given to Mr. Underwood with the request that he would state whether they were facts or falsehoods. Mr. Underwood replied that they were not true, and gave evidence to that effect. Why did not this celebrated Infidel demolisher stand up then and there and defend the statements he had made in his pamphlet? The reason is plain. These statements are indefensible. In that pamphlet of twenty pages every page contains statements that Mr. Campbell cannot and dare not defend in a public discussion with a representative Infidel. The gauntlet of Freethought has been thrown at his feet. Whenever he feels inclined to pick it up he can be accommodated by a representative Infidel. Christianity to-day wears the white feather. The statement that Infidelity has but one representative in America and he shuns discussion is another falsehood nailed to the cross.

Some time since I wrote a short article for FREETHOUGHT wherein I criticised some statements in Campbell's "Replies to a Skeptic." The idea of a little fish, as Mr. Campbell terms me, daring to dispute the statements of the great Infidel smasher seemed to irritate him, and he complained of the severe tone of my article—another case of "please don't hurt our feelings." In regard to my article, I simply stated facts. I charged him with making false statements—statements that he could not prove to be true. My charges I reiterate. Let Mr. Campbell disprove them if he can. Did Mr. Campbell consider the Infidel's feelings when he wrote his pamphlet? He did not even respect the feelings of his straw man. On page 10 Mr. Campbell charges the straw man with sophistry and misrepresentation, and Infidels with excessive depravity. On page 11 he charges the straw man with prostituting his God-given powers to a miserable purpose. On page 12 he charges Infidelity with cowardice; on page 13, with loving to read vile literature; page 15, the straw man is charged with dishonesty; page 19, Colonel Ingersoll is charged with being dishonorable; page 20, the straw man is charged with wilful misrepresentation; page 26, Mr. Ingersoll is classed as low in the mental scale and as being mercenary, not believing what he professes, lecturing for money; page 27, Ingersoll is classed as a fool, and it is also stated that it would be difficult for Mr. Ingersoll to prove himself honest; same page, the teachings of Infidelity are frogspawn; page 25, Mr. Ingersoll is placed within the sphere of heathenism. In the introduction to his pamphlet he charges the teachings of Freethought with being deadly poison. I will not speak of language used by Campbell in his street and church talks, but I think I have shown enough to prove that his assumed air of injured innocence comes with poor grace from one who does not respect the feelings of those who differ from him. One thing is certain—every candid reader of the so-called "Replies to a Skeptic" cannot help but admit that my charges against Mr. Campbell are proven. The clergy of this town have in the past written and spoken falsely and unjustly against unbelievers, and no one has ever, to my knowledge, dared to check them by uttering a protest, and they have been so used to having their own way that a protest against their insolence is horrifying to them. I propose to protest with all my power and endeavor to educate the black-coated gentry to be decent in their speeches against Freethinkers. The day for vilifying Freethinkers has about closed.

In conclusion I will say to our Christian brothers, If you have not the mental courage to meet Freethinkers in honorable discussion and sustain your cause on a free platform, try to give us justice when trying us on your church platform, which is not free, where Freethought has no rights extended to it to raise its voice in vindication.

OUR LOCAL SOCIETY.

A committee of the San Francisco Freethought Society sends the following circular to members and sympathizers:

We desire to call your attention to our local Freethought Society, to interest you in its meetings, and to secure your support of the same. This society is almost self-sustaining, the collections at its meetings falling but little short of paying the expenses of hall rent and advertising. There is at present, however, a deficit, which we wish to make up, and if possible to establish a Fund for future occasions. There are no dues from members, and we therefore suggest an assessment of one dollar upon each member who can afford to contribute that amount, and upon every sympathizer with the movement. If you are willing to meet this assessment, and to pay one dollar, or more or less, for the support of the society, please advise the assistant secretary, G. E. Macdonald, 504 Kearny street, to that effect, or, better still, attend the meeting next Sunday evening, at 421 Post street, and see the treasurer, Mr. A. H. Schou.

To this circular the following responses have been received: C. E. Spafford, $1; Wm. H. Eastman, $1; Emil S. Lemme, $1; Putnam & Macdonald (postage stamps), $1; J. O. Scott, $1; Wm. Noble, $2; Mr. Augusteny, $1; J. E. Palanca, $1; L. Diamant, $1; C. F. Burgman, $1; H. F. Ebers, $1; R. H. Nason, $1; John McGlashan, $1. Other donors have dropped the $1 in the hat at the meetings without divulging their names. Further contributions may be left at this office or with the treasurer.

THE FALL CAMPAIGN.

S. P. Putnam has the following lecture appointments in Oregon and Washington:

THE COMING CONGRESS.

The prospects are good for a large attendance from all parts of the country, and we intend to do something beside talk. Let all who have anything to say, come and say it, "or forever hereafter hold their peace."

The meetings will be held in Industrial Hall, on Broad street, west side, between Wood and Vine streets—a very central location. The building contains rooms of different sizes, so we can use smaller or larger ones as occasion may require. The first meeting will be held on Friday night, October 25, at 8 o'clock, and will be devoted to preliminary business, and probably the president's opening address will be delivered. On Saturday A. M. at 10 o'clock a general conference will be held, and the regular business of the Congress transacted. Saturday afternoon will be devoted to visiting Independence Hall, Girard College, and other places of interest unless it shall be found necessary to hold an afternoon session. On Saturday night and Sunday afternoon and evening, public meetings will be held and addresses delivered by able speakers to be announced as soon as the programme is complete. No arrangements have been made for reduced railroad fares or hotel rates. The Girard House (Chestnut and Ninth) charges $3 per day, and the Bingham House (Market and Eleventh) and the Washington House (Chestnut and Seventh) charge $2.50 per day, and the latter will make some reduction of rates if several persons come together. I recommend the Washington House as a rendezvous of the Liberal clans. We shall probably have five or six public-platform speeches, and several volunteer addresses. Let all our friends and enemies, if we have any, come prepared to speak. Let all our friends send forward their contributions toward paying expenses, at once, or write me what to depend upon. We have received less than $100 since September 1, and the treasury was empty then. "A word to the wise," etc. R. B. WESTBROOK.

CHRISTIAN CIVILIZATION.

SEC. 4,579. Violating Sabbath. Any tradesman, workman, or laborer, or other person whatever, who shall pursue their business or work of their ordinary callings upon the Lord's day (works of necessity or charity only excepted) shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be punished as prescribed in section 4,310 of this code.

SEC. 4,310. Punishment of accessories after the fact. Accessories after the fact, except where it is otherwise ordered in the code, shall be punished by a fine not to exceed one thousand dollars, imprisonment not to exceed six months, to work in the chain-gang not to exceed twelve months, and any one or more of these punishments may be ordered, in the discretion of the judge.

SEC. 4,582. Fines for violation of the Sabbath. All moneys arising from fines imposed for offenses, the gist of which consists in their being committed on the Sabbath-day, shall be paid to the Ordinary of the county, to be by him distributed for the purpose of establishing and promoting Sabbath-schools in the county.—Georgia Statutes.

That is, the money stolen from the victims of religious superstition shall be used to teach the creeds of superstition. We can imagine that a highwayman would use the money he had stolen from the helpless traveler to pay teachers to instruct his sons in the highwayman's art. These cases are precisely analogous. In each instance the "loot" is fittingly appropriated. The means are admirably adapted to the end. The church is the road-agent of the centuries, and the state has ever been her executive arm, and is the same to-day.

One thousand dollars fine for making a horse-shoe on Sunday! Six months in a filthy jail, shut out from the sweet light of day and the companionship of the loved, for playing a game of ball! Twelve months in the chain-gang, subjected to the terrible brutalities of the semi-savage Christian overseer, for stacking wheat on the priests' day! One thousand dollars fine, six months in jail, twelve months in the chain gang, all for selling a newspaper or pulling the weeds from his flower bed! Was barbarism ever more barbarous with less cause, savagery ever more atrociously savage, cruelty ever more vindictively cruel?

The father is in the chain-gang. He had the audacity to insult Rev. Illiterate by digging a ditch to carry off the foul water from his cellar instead of attending church, on Sunday. On Monday he was arrested on complaint of the offended Sunday monopolizer, tried before a superstition-saturated magistrate and sentenced to a year's companionship with thieves and assaulters.

There is no mercy for him. He is poor and so can get no justice or favor. In vain his wife intercedes for him, in vain his children cling to papa's knees as he is driven away in disgrace. Christianity is the state religion.

The poor mother must now toil alone to support her little ones. She can do no extra work nor can she pay others to do it. The slime in the cellar breeds foul miasma. Sickness comes as the sequel of the violation of natural law. The little golden-haired Jessie is laid low with fever. There is no money to get the doctor, and the distracted, over-worked mother can do but little. The days drag on; the malaria-tainted blood courses in fluctuating currents through the burning body of the little sufferer; she cries piteously for "papa," "papa," and stretches her tiny hands pleadingly forth, but, woe the crimes of Christian men, he comes not, he hears not his darling's plaintive call. He sweats and groans under the lash of the heartless taskmaster beneath the August sun. He has wronged no man nor woman nor child, and yet his limbs wear the manacles of the felon-slave and his baby daughter's lisping lips must close in death without the chrism of the father's kiss, the once sparkling eyes must fade into oblivion unblest by the sight of "papa's" worshiped face.

A fresh little grave on the hillside, above which the crow caws ominously. A heart-broken mother who sits among her other and half-famished children in the cheerless home. An iron-weighted father who starts fitfully and murmurs brokenly in his convict's sleep upon the wet, cold ground.

A sleek dragoon of the church who sits in his comfortable room and unctuously reads aloud from the book of Syrian legends the story of the poor man stoned for gathering sticks on the "Sabbath," and then this imitator of the Israelites rubs his hands in gleeful satisfaction as his imagination pictures John Clark chained in the convict camp, and he thinks how closely he and his parishioners are following in the footsteps of the "chosen people."

Here in his northern home Rev. M. A. Gault reads of this southern murder for the church's sake and grimly smiles as he confidentially whispers in the ear of Wilbur F. Crafts:

"Just wait until we get the Blair bill through, and many a profaner of the Sabbath on these prairies and in these valleys shall, as does John Clark, of Georgia, feel the chastising hand of the Lord's anointed. We are the Lord's anointed."—WALKER, in Fair Play.

"THE Glory of Infidelity" (San Francisco: Putnam and Macdonald, 504, Kearny street; 22 pp., 6d.), by Samuel P. Putnam, is written somewhat after the style of Colonel Ingersoll. The sentences are short and crisp, the meaning clear and unmistakable, and the illustrations striking and effective. "The Infidel," according to Mr. Putnam, "is he who is unfaithful. . . . to that which is established, accredited; to that which almost everybody believes to be right. He is the unfashionable thinker; the minority of one." This is cleverly put; but we should have preferred Mr. Putnam to define the word "Infidel" as synonymous with "Skeptic," which more accurately represents the popular meaning. We could cull from this pamphlet many passages pregnant with regal truth, but our space limits us to one excerpt: "Opinions are useless unless they are forged from the heat of our own personality—unless they are the direct result of our mental power. A man may wear liberal opinions as one wears a suit of clothes; but, for all that, his body, his soul, may be rigidly orthodox. Some people get their opinion as one does a dinner, by ordering from a bill of fare: he simply consults his taste, or perhaps the waiter, alias minister, who serves with immaculate apron and white necktie." Mr. Putnam has produced a most readable and useful pamphlet, soul-stirring because of its passionate earnestness, and irresistible because of its simple eloquence and manly heroism.—Watts's Literary Guide (London).

DID JESUS CHRIST RISE FROM THE DEAD? *

XI.

But we must not give Paul the credit of being the first to cultivate sedulously that fine art known as "Lying for the Glory of God." The art had been practiced with success and profit long before his time, and had in his age reached an acme of perfection to which it has hardly attained since; and of this the Christian scriptures and faith had the fullest advantage. "It appears from evidence superior to all exception that a pernicious maxim which was current not only in the schools of the Egyptians, the Platonists, and the Pythagoreans, but also of the Jews, was very early recognized by the Christians, and soon found among them numerous patrons—namely, that those who made it their business to deceive, with a view of promoting the cause of truth, were deserving rather of commendation than censure." (Mosheim, Early Christians, ii. 7.) Speaking of the early days of Christianity, a reverend churchman remarks: "There never was any period of time in all ecclesiastical history in which so many rank heresies were publicly professed, nor in which so many spurious books were forged, and published by the Christians under the names of Christ and the Apostles and the Apostolic writers, as in those primitive ages, several of which forged books are frequently cited and applied to the defense of Christianity by the most eminent fathers of the same ages as true and genuine pieces, and of equal authority with the scriptures themselves." (Rev. Conyers Middleton, D.D., in Introductory Discourse, p. 87.) And these books were, and are, "of equal authority with the scriptures themselves." I challenge any scholar living to point out any valid reason why the four gospels which we account canonical should be credited with being less spurious than hundreds of other early gospels, dozens of which are still extant. Church councils and ecclesiastical committees selected certain documents and rejected others, often with much doubt and wrangling; and often a very narrow vote decided whether a book had been written by the Holy Ghost or some forging saint, the Holy Ghost and the forging saint having written so amazingly like each other.

When the parson turns up his eyes and whines about the "Word of God," he knows that it is not the "Word of God;" he knows that it is only a jumble of pamphlets, selected in mere caprice from hundreds of other pamphlets, the product of ages of fraud and forgery. When he asserts that what are arrogantly called the "scriptures" have any except an accidental pre-eminence over the contemporary and competing mass of literature from which they were selected, he, like Paul and Eusebius, lies for the glory of God; and he certainly lies in a manner which should glorify God exceedingly when he asserts an impossible event—the resurrection of Christ, on the authority of books which he knows in his heart have no authority—a number of pseudonymous documents, purporting to be written by those who certainly did not write them, and coming down to us through an epoch exceptional for ignorance, superstition, fraud, and forgery. No sane scholar would trust such documents on a statement referring to any common mundane event; and yet, forsooth, we are asked, on such utterly discredited evidence, to believe in stars that never shone, an eclipse of which astronomy knows nothing, an earthquake in regard to which history is dumb, and a rising from the dead which is subversive of all experience, and which is incredible to all who, in pursuit of their faith, have not lost their reason.

It may, to some, seem a work of supererogation that I should, in the slightest degree, digress to elaborate my contention that the books of the New Testament come to us with the most questionable credentials. It may be urged that every intelligent and fairly well-read person is aware of this fact. But, with regret, it must be admitted that many intelligent and fairly well-read persons know nothing whatever of the exceedingly vague, dubious, and fraudulent sources from which the "holy scriptures" have been derived. In Christian countries the writers that deal with the historical evidences of the established faith lie a good long way out of the beaten path of the ordinary reader; so I feel it essential to give line upon line and precept upon precept. If I can shake the faith of the "believer" in his fetich book, and show him that its claims to authenticity are more doubtful, instead of more certain, than that of any other book in existence, I shall surely succeed in securing the assent of every candid mind to the proposition that a book whose own credentials are notoriously unsatisfactory is utterly unreliable as a voucher; and, for events lying on the very border-line between improbable and the impossible, like the resurrection of Christ, its testimony is not worth the paper it is printed on.

I have alluded to the insuperable difficulty of determining the books that were written by "holy men of God, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," and those written by possibly some exceedingly pious and fraudulent early father or monk, with no inspiration whatever, except what he might derive from the wine-cellar. To further substantiate this point, and thereby undermine the authority of the gospels that vouch for Christ's resurrection, I shall make only one or two citations on the subject of canonicity—not, mark you, from the writings of skeptics, but from those of eminent Christian scholars. The learned Dodwell, in his dissertation on Irenæus, tells us that, "till Trajan's time, or perhaps, Adrian's time, no canon was fixed; the supposititious pieces of the heretics were received by the faithful, the apostles' writings bound up with theirs, and indifferently used in the churches." "Everybody knows," says Causabon, "that Justin Martyr, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian, and the rest of the primitive writers were wont to approve and cite books which now all men know to be apocryphal." "The opinions—or rather, the conjectures—of the learned concerning the time when the books of the New Testament were collected into one volume, as also about the authors of that collection, are extremely different. This important question is attended with great and almost insuperable difficulties to us in these latter times. . . . For, not long after Christ's ascension into heaven, several histories of his life and doctrines, full of pious frauds and fabulous wonders" [possibly the resurrection was one of these fabulous wonders] "were composed by persons whose intentions, perhaps, were not bad, but whose writings discovered the greatest superstition and ignorance. Nor was this all; productions appeared which were imposed upon the world by fraudulent men as the writings of the holy apostles." (Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, p. 31.)

PUBLIC CHARITY AND PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

"The number of the insane is on the increase. Asylums do not cure them. Mutual intercourse increases aberration. They should be kept apart from each other."

These quotations are from a recent editorial in FREETHOUGHT entitled "The Charity of the Future," the key-note of which was sounded in another short sentence, to wit: "The future will have fewer institutions of charity."

Experience is teaching us that charitable institutions are curses rather than blessings. They augment the evils they were intended to remedy. The poor-house may be necessary—that is to say, like government itself, it is a necessary evil. If anarchy is ever able to abolish government, the alms-house will go too.

But if public charity is found to be a failure—and even worse, an evil, how about the public schools?

The belief is almost universal that education promotes morality. But is it true?

Education of the young at the public expense has been a cardinal doctrine of the six New England states from the very foundation of the colonies.

The six southern states, to wit: Maryland, Virginia, Delaware, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, all left the educational control of children in the hands of parents; and there were very little of the public-school system in these states down to 1860.

Now for some statistics from the census of 1860:

Proportion of illiterate native-born adult white inhabitants:

In the six New England States, one to 312.

In the six Southern States, one to 12.

Proportion of native-born white criminals:

In the six New England States, one to 1,084.

*By Saladin, editor of the Agnostic Journal.

In the six Southern States, one to 6,670.

Proportion of native-born paupers:

In the six New England States, one to 178.

In the six Southern States, one to 345.

As regards insanity the census report of 1870 shows, of the native-born white inhabitants:

In the six New England States, one to 800.

In the six Southern States, one to 1,682.

These figures are compiled from the census reports by the Hon. Zach. Montgomery, of California, now sojourning in Washington, who professes to be a Roman Catholic without sectarian bias. He not only elaborates the statistics through the three decades, 1860, 1870, and 1880, but shows the comparative results as regards the proportion of suicides, of paupers, and of deaths from syphilis. And these results are even more unfavorable to New England than those already given.

But what does Mr. Montgomery want to prove by these statistics? That education increases crime, pauperism, insanity, suicide, and deaths from syphilis? By no means. On the contrary, he starts out with this assumption:

"Can it be denied that an educated people are more moral and virtuous, more contented, happy, and law-abiding, than an ignorant people? . . . It is very true that ignorance is the mother of vice. It is also true that an educated people, if properly educated, are more moral, virtuous, contented, happy, and law-abiding than an ignorant people."

The italics are his own, and he adds:

"Thus far we think there can be no difference of opinion between the most inveterate supporter of the New England public-school system and ourselves."

And now what does Mr. Montgomery propose as a remedy for the frightfully vicious public-school system? As a Catholic he believes in a religious education; nevertheless, he is opposed to taxing the public for it. He would therefore restrict public secular education to the rudimentary branches, and allow only the children of poor parents to be instructed free of cost. Under this system he believes that private schools would be vastly multiplied.

Mr. Montgomery is opposed to all sectarian use of the public schools, and thinks it would be as dangerous to liberty for Catholics to get control of them as for Protestants. But believing that religion should be taught to the children, and mainly by the parent, he would practically abolish the present public-school system by reducing it to a minimum.

Before accepting the statistics of this country to prove the case as Mr. Montgomery states it, would it not be well for him to take other countries? To compare, for instance, Germany with Italy or Spain? Possibly he might not, after such a comparison, be able to dogmatically assert as he does on page 35 of his pamphlet:

The man or woman who believes in no God, no devil, no heaven, no hell, can never be trusted.

O ghost of Courtlandt Palmer! rise from the ashes of cremation and breathe into the soul of their benighted papist an infinitesimal attenuation of the essence of charity.

It may be, after all, a question whether "Ignorance is the mother of vice;" but with Agnostics it is no longer a question that "Ignorance is the mother of devotion." W. H. BURR.

DR. M'GLYNN ON THE CHURCH AND BRUNO.

In his address before the New York Anti-Poverty Society Sept 22, Dr. Edward McGlynn said:

"At this very moment in some of the churches of this city I believe there are to be special religious services to protest against the protest that was recently made in Rome largely against the burning of man at the stake because he would not retract what, no doubt, he must have honestly believed. I am not here to advocate the philosophical vagaries or the theological heresies of a man who was burned alive in Rome in the year 1600. I do not agree with his philosophy, still less do I agree with his theology; but it seems to me that he must have been an honest man. He suffered seven years' incarceration, and at the end was led out to be burned at the stake. During any moment of those seven years by a recantation, by retracting his errors, he could have saved himself from burning, and could have obtained his liberty. The fact that he did not recant made me feel that he was an honest man. It matters not so much to me whether what he taught was true or not, I do love to believe that as that man walked to the stake to be burned alive he went a martyr to that truth of truths, that a man must obey the dictates of his conscience, which is to him the voice of God. I would take my place rather with the man then and there at the stake than with the man who was applying the torch to the fagots; although, I make haste to explain, I would have agreed almost entirely with the theology of the man who was setting fire to the fagots, and not very much with the theology of Giordano Bruno."

The French ambassador at Rome has had the good fortune of a singular "find." A famous portrait of Voltaire has been missing for more than half a century. The most celebrated of his statues, and nearly all his likenesses represent the philosopher in his old age, but there was a portrait known to have been painted by Largilliere in 1718, when Voltaire was only 24—"the brightest young fellow in the world," as Carlyle describes him. This is the portrait that M. Mariani discovered and exhibited at his first reception in the Farnese palace a few nights ago. Its value is even enhanced; for a characteristic anecdote explains how it came into the possession of its late owner. Voltaire in his old age had a great desire to meet the Marquise de Vilette, one of the many flames of his youth. The lady had survived her beauty and did not care for the interview. Voltaire was piqued, and wrote first a quatrain on the refusal, which he followed up by sending a portrait of himself as the court-beauty may have remembered him when they were both young. Indeed, for the purpose, he took it away from his adopted daughter, to whom he had presented it fifty years before. The lady retained the picture and bequeathed it to her nephew, Baron Varicourt, from whom the ambassador acquired it. The pedigree, therefore, is without a flaw. A medallion head in Beauharnais' edition of Voltaire's works has evidently been inspired by Largilliere's portrait.—Fall Mall Gazette.

FOR REVENUE ONLY.

If churches are a "public benefit," and as such entitled to exemption from taxation, why should they not for the same reason be supported by a tax upon the remaining property? The new M. E. church now being built in Stockton is to cost $55,000—contract price. The corporation (individually wealthy) is itself a large real estate owner, and was incorporated about one year ago, as the papers stated, "for business purposes." This pious corporation will probably join in the holy crusade against the taxation of church property and ask for its exemption by our next legislature.

The Sunday-schools, it seems, are also to be organized as paying adjuncts to this all-devouring heavenly greed, as is shown by the following from the Stockton Independent of Oct. 4, 1889:

"The Sunday-school Board of the Central M. E. church, which holds its meetings once every three months, met in the church last Tuesday evening. The Sunday-school still owes on its pledges towards the building of the new church about $1300, which must be raised during the ensuing year. It was thought that the next Christmas entertainment would bring in some money that could be applied on the pledges. Accordingly a motion prevailed that a committee of five be appointed to arrange for the Christmas entertainment. A motion was also carried that a committee of four, aided by the pastor, be appointed to prepare a draft of a constitution for a Sunday-school temperance society. The pastor was allowed time to select the members for the above committees. After hearing reports of officers the Board adjourned."

The Secular Conquest of Wagner.

To the Editors of Freethought:

S. P. Putnam has come and gone, and, like Julius Caesar, can justly say, Veni, vidi, vici! No gospel drummer could ever draw a half-filled house at this place, whereas Mr. Putnam's audience could not all get into one of the largest houses of the settlement. His lecture was highly appreciated by nearly everyone present, and only under the promise of returning next summer was he allowed to depart. As a rule it don't take but very few meetings to freeze out a preacher, which I think is a very good recommend for the intelligence of the people about here. The last collection held here for the benefit of the so-called "Good Cause"—but which was in reality throwing away money to support a lazy gospel sharp better fitted to maul rails for a living than to insult an intelligent audience with his nonsensical and foolish doctrine—amounted to $2.25 and three firecrackers wherewith to celebrate his departure. How much different from this did we bid farewell to Mr. Putnam! During his short stay here, he won a place in the heart of everyone that heard him, excepting two, and one of them don't know whether to believe the Bible and take his chances of getting roasted or join the band that expects to go to a more moderate climate if there is a hereafter. The other one claims to have had an interview with the most high and holy one.

Nearly everyone present at the lecture joined the Secular Union, and the FREETHOUGHT is to be found in nearly every household, and no preacher could make us believe that our only salvation lies in his foolish and nonsensical doctrine.

Wagner, Grant Co., Or.

A Celebrated Scarecrow.

To the Editors of Freethought:

I will relate a somewhat amusing incident which occurred shortly after Mr. Putnam was here. Papa received a letter from Mr. Ahlberg (a Liberal friend, of Gray's River) stating that Mr. Lawrence (Ahlberg's brother-in-law) had slandered papa shamefully, saying that he had put up the Christian cross to ridicule, that he had Christ in effigy, and that he had made his children, Ella and I, go out and throw stones at Jesus, etc., etc.

How quick the Christians are to imagine things about the Infidel; however, they fooled themselves greatly this time. Mr. Lawrence pretended to be so very kind as to say he would do papa no harm, but that the Catholic church would take the case in hand, and they would punish papa for his dreadful doings. What do you suppose it is we have that the church people call Christ in effigy? Why, it is simply a common scarecrow. We have a woodshed near the fence, and last spring, when the gardens were being made, the chickens would fly upon the shed, then over the fence, and were quite a bother; so my little sister Ella asked papa if she could not make a scarecrow; papa said, certainly she could if she wished. So she went to work and made one without the assistance of anyone, and now the church people have turned it into a God. What surprised us is that the Christians would ever think of claiming such a looking object for their Savior, or that they would insult their God in such a manner as comparing him with a scarecrow, for surely it was an insult. For my part I prefer the scarecrow-god rather than the God of the Bible, for so far the scarecrow has done nothing but good. Perhaps Mr. Putnam remembers the now noted scarecrow, as it was here when he made his last visit. Mr. Lawrence is one of the orthodox ones who could not stand to be in when Mr. Putnam made his reply to Rev. Whitmore last July.

When Ella heard the story the Christians had made up about her manufacture, she said, "Well! does Christ look like that?"

We Have Not Seen It.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Have you seen the newly imported Christian Hymn-book for use in the State Normal School? If not, drop me a postal, and I'll send you one. It shan't cost you a cent. It will do your hearts good to see it. Oh, it is a daisy. We have just purchased one for our Infidel offspring, and I would not have missed seeing it for the dollar it cost. The author, Mr. H. C. Perkins, has properly christened it the "Climax," and I do not believe there is a Spiritualist, Freethinker, Liberal, Agnostic, Athiest, or Infidel in the state of California but will readily concede that it takes the cake, if not the whole bakery. If the professor of music in the Normal School don't commit suicide or fetch up in the insane asylum before he gets through this book, he should be presented with a gold medal for being the most patient and best-balanced man in the state. The following lines I have copied from this outrage on the rising manhood and womanhood attendant upon our public schools:

In the cross of Christ I glory,
Towering o'er the wrecks of time,
All the light of sacred story
Gathers round its head sublime.

Bane and blessing, pain and pleasure,
By the cross are sanctified;
Peace is there that knows no measure,
Joys that thro' all time abide.

Now don't let the following unseat your reason:

Thou dear Redeemer, dying Lamb,
I love to hear of thee;
No music's like thy charming name,
Nor half so sweet can be.

Oh, may I ever hear thy voice
In mercy to me speak;
In thee, my priest, will I rejoice,
And thy salvation seek.

The priestly devotion and reverence inculcated by this last verse would lead one to think that the Jesuits had been poking their sunburnt noses in it. I really believe if you'd take this pious songster, and inflict on your delinquents a few of these soul-stirring strains every week, in less than two months you'll not have one on your subscription list! Why, the very sight of this book caused me, four or five months in advance, to fish up the two bottom dollars to renew my subscription, as the inclosed note will show, and for which you will please give me credit. Anybody not thoroughly soaked in the orthodox superstition, who will waste a few moments examining this book, will readily understand the full force and meaning of Colonel Ingersoll's remark, when he said that a fellow had to swear a little sometimes in order to express his contempt for religious nonsense. I heartily agree with the colonel, and as the Missourian has it, "I have already gone and done it."

A Clergyman's Reckless Statement.

[The appended letter is self-explanatory. It also, up to the present time, remains unanswered by the clergyman to whom it is addressed.]

To the Rev. Mr. McWaller, Monmouth, Or.,

DEAR SIR: I presume you will have no difficulty in recalling the conversation I had with you in front of the court-house gate in this place on the first night that Putnam and Braden spoke here, the conversation being in the presence of Mr. Thos. Stewart, Jr., and others. During that conversation I had occasion to refer to Paine's "Age of Reason." You then made the statement that you "would defy any man to find another book in the English language, of equal size, containing the tenth part as many 'ifs' as that book." That it was a bundle of "ifs," or words to that effect. I replied that I never noticed it, and, as my attention had never been called to it, I could not at that time dispute it, but even if it were true it was no answer to the arguments therein contained. That no one disputes the truths of algebra and yet it contains many "ifs" and suppositions. You said, also, that you had read the work.

As soon as I had time I examined into the matter and I found that your statement in regard to the number of "ifs" was entirely and absolutely without any foundation whatever. In fact, I might go to the opposite extreme and say that for a book which is almost wholly argumentative it has as few ifs as any I ever saw. You have the appearance and reputation of being an honest man. The question then arises, Why did you make that statement? You must have made it knowing it to be untrue (which I don't believe at all) or else you made it without knowing whether it was true or not.

Believing, as I do, that you mean to be honest and fair, it is hard for me to understand why you did this. But I will hazard a guess, and it is this: You have never read the book, and you have heard some eminent defender of faith (like the Rev. Clark Braden, for instance) make this assertion, and you, in the innocence of your heart, have accepted it as "gospel truth." It certainly has as much truth as many of the statements made by that gentleman (?) and no more. Apologizing for thus addressing you, and assuring you that I never would have done so had I not believed you to be honest and sincere, I close by asking you if you will kindly explain to me how and why you were led into making such a misstatement; and hoping that your explanation will be such that I can still retain the good opinion I formed of you at our first acquaintance, I am yours very respectfully,

S. B. HUSTON.

Tennyson's Lates .

THE THROSTLE.

"Summer is coming, Summer is coming,"
I know it, I know it, I know it.
Light again, leaf again, life again, love again,
Yes, my wild little poet.Sing the New Year in under the blue,
Last year you sang it as gladly."New, new, new, new!" Is it then so new
That you should carol so madly?"Love again, song again, nest again, young again!"Never a prophet so crazy;
And hardly a daisy as yet, little friend,
See, there is hardly a daisy."Here again, here, here, here, happy year,"
O warble, unbidden, unbidden.Summer is coming, is coming, my dear,
And all the Winters are hidden.

CORRECTED BY THE PORTLAND ADVERTISER.

Lord Tennyson begins his new poem with the untimely assertion:Summer is coming, summer is coming,
I know it, I know it, I know it.This is undoubtedly true, but winter is coming first, oh blow it, oh blow it, oh blow it!

Immortal Nature.

Roll on, ye stars, exult in youthful prime,
Mark with bright curves the countless steps of time;Near, and more near, your beamy cars approach,
Or lessening orbs on lessening orbs encroach.Flowers of the sky! Ye, too, to age must yield,
Frail as your silken sisters of the field;
Star after star from heaven's high arch shall rush,

Suns sink on suns, and systems systems crush.

But o'er the wreck, emerging from the storm,
Immortal Nature lifts her changeless form;
Mounts from her funeral pyre on wings of flame,
And soars and shines, another, yet the same.A PARSON in the gloaming strolled,
About his garden path.The wheelbarrow someone had rolled
Right in his way, alas!His shins were very sadly barked,
His nose the earth had ploughed,These things——!!*——! "t ——!! which he straightway remarked
Would sound bad in a crowd."Mr. McClintock," she shouted, "I want you to take your feet off the parlor table." "Mrs. McClintock," he said, in a fixed, determined voice, "I allow only one person to talk to me that way." "And who is that?" she demanded. "You, my dear," he replied softly, as he removed the pedes.HOME Missionary—"Do you believe your prayers are answered, Uncle 'Rastus'?"Uncle 'Rastus—"Pends altogether on de prayer. When I prays de Lord to send me a turkey, it don't come, but when I prays de Lord to send me after a turkey,
I gen'ly gits it before midnight."A CLERGYMAN, consoling a young widow on the death of her husband, remarked that she could not find his equal. "I know
I can't," replied the sobbing fair one.
"But," she added, with a heavenly smile,
"I mean to try!"

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and understand well.A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

Young Man Brown.

There was a young man and his name was Brown,
And he wore a short frock coat;
His hair on his temples it was plastered down,
And his collars hung aside of his throat.
His hands were white and his pants were tight,
And his hair was the color of tan,
The ladies all said, whether widow, wife or maid,
"Lor me! what a nice young man."

THEN he came with a whoop and a howl,
To seek the editor's blood.

A brawny printer caught him foul,
And stabbed him through with the office towel,
And he fell with an awful thud.

A TEXAS gentleman being unwell could not attend church one Sunday not long ago, so he gave his little son a quarter to put on the plate. When the youth came home his father asked him what was the text, but he replied that he hid not know, as he had forgotten it. "Did you forget everything?" asked the exasperated parent. "No," replied the boy, calmly; "I remembered not to put that quarter on the plate." "Why, you are a regular little heathen." "I'm a little heathen, am I? Well, for once the heathen got the money that was coming to them, which is more than would have happened if I had put it on the plate."

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

Temperance and Prohibition,

BY G. H. STOCKHAM, M.D.,

Sets forth the merits of moral suasion as opposed to force in settling the liquor question.

Paper, 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts. Address this office

We are told that the following conversation actually took place between a parson and a boy: "What's a miracle?" "Dunno." "Well, if the sun were to shine in the middle of the night, what would you say it was?" "The moon." "But if you were told it was the sun, what should you say it was?" "A lie." "I don't tell lies; suppose I told you it was the sun, what would you say then?" "That you wasn't sober."

PUTNAM'S WORKS.

The New God. 10c. The New God was made by an artist hand, guided by a poet soul. It is as perfect as sculpture. The creator makes his "god" in his own image, and breathes into his nostrils the breath of his own life.—L. K. Washburn.

Golden Throne. A romance. Price, $1.00. "The author certainly has genius. The divine creative spark is within him. The book is filled with manly thoughts, expressed in manly words, the transcript of a manly mind. Every Liberal should read 'Golden Throne.'"—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Walls and Wanderings. A new American story. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00. "A prose epic of the war; rich with incident and dramatic power; breezy from first page to last with the living spirit of to-day."—John Swinton's Paper

Why Don't He Lend a Hand? And other Agnostic Poems. Price, 10 cents. "Mr. Putnam is a vigorous poet. His poetry rings like a bell, and stirs the reader like a trumpet."—Bulgarius.

Adam and Heva. Price, 10 cents. "A magnificent Agnostic poem, descriptive of the ever novel and ever mysterious legend of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden. The story is told with a wealth of imagination, a beauty of diction, and purity of thought which rank Mr. Putnam as a genuine poet."—The Universe, San Francisco.

The Problem of the Universe, and Its Scientific Solution. Price, 20 cents. "As a philosophical writer Mr. Putnam is always a success, and we delight to read him. His easy style and poetic expression make his productions very attractive."—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

Ingersoll and Jesus. A Poem. Price, 10 cents. "Written in a rather familiar style, but the sentiment is quite good, liberal, and sensible, and witty without being coarse. On the whole, it is a very clever dream, and very pleasantly related. It is well worth reading."—Boston Investigator.

Crucifixion: A Poem. Price, $1. "It is crammed with life, thought and profound emotion, poured forth, it seems to me, with extraordinary richness and beauty."—Dr. Henry W. Bellows.

Gottlieb: His Life; or, Love Triumphant. A Romance of Earth, Heaven and Hell. Price, 25 cents. "To describe all the beauties of this simple, yet touchingly told little tale, would be a work of which I confess myself utterly incapable. To realize what it is, you must read the book itself. I have never read anything so exquisitely beautiful and good in all my life before."—Elmina Drake Slenker.

SAN FRANCISCO, - - - - OCTOBER 26, 1889.

THE American missions to the Zulus cost $31,000 last year, and did not result in any converts, but the movement to send missionaries to Africa is just as lively as ever.

THE Rev. William Morrison, who married two couples before ten thousand people at the Portland exposition last week, sent the association a bill for $50. "You may think my bill extravagant," he wrote, "but you cannot expect a minister of God to make a holy show of himself for nothing."

IN the excitement over the daily issue of a thousand-page Examiner, the newspaper world and reading public should not forget to give a cordial welcome to "The Jury," a funny little paper edited by C. F. Davis and illustrated by Ed. M. Greene. The same is published at 126 Kearny street, and sold for five cents per copy.

THE recent address of Prime Minister Crispi, of Italy, has aroused the ire of the Vatican, and other nations are called upon to put some sort of restriction upon the utterances of Signor Crispi. This request is significant of the amount of freedom of speech to be looked for in Rome if the pope secures the temporal power which he seeks.

WHEN Postmaster General Wanamaker has made the necessary inquiries as to the religious status of San Francisco, he will probably take Postmaster Bryan's call for more clerks under advisement, and if the investigation result satisfactorily, comply with his request. Brother Wanamaker, we are waiting on the farther shore for a more efficient postal service.

THE editor of the Signs of the Times does not favor the Rev. Dr. Harcourt's adoption of Ingersoll's words, "An honest God is the noblest work of man," but on the contrary says that "only 2 Tim. iv, 3, 4, can adequately explain their approval by a professedly Christian minister." The passages cited refer to the time when people will not endure sound doctrine, but after their own lusts heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears. The refined expression, "itching ears," we interpret to mean a desire to hear something new, in which case Dr. Harcourt's congregation should be encouraged.

THE Sunday-law bigots are working to raise a fund of $25,000 to prosecute their object in this state. A finance committee composed of Dr. R. H. McDonald, of Vinegar Bitters fame; C. C. Clay, and W. H. Cubery have already collected $1,300. These sabbatarians do not care enough for Sunday repose to take it when left at liberty to do so and they are therefore anxious to have a law compelling them to rest. Like the hired culprit in the pulpit who defends the justice of his own imprisonment, they are forging shackles for themselves. Their object, of course, is to make people go to church, for, as we have before stated, the logical working of a Sunday statute would send people to church in obedience to the law, or force them thither in charge of a police officer.

HUGH O. PENTECOST observes in the Twentieth Century: "There is a poor, distressed Episcopal rector in this city (New York). He is the man who has been appointed by the Lord Jesus to rule over St. Clement's church. It appears that his church is being more and more surrounded by poor people, and 'respectable parishioners' are very liable to have to brush against 'immoral women' in going to and from church after dark. He has discontinued his evening services and says he will be obliged to move his precious flock and their fold out of that neighborhood. What would the good Jesus say to this wretch if he were here? We can only guess; but we know what he did say to similar humbugs in his day. He said: 'Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! Verily I say unto you, that the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you.'"

LABOR CONVENTIONS.

Messrs. J. A. Brooks, J. W. Robbins, and E. Evans have called a convention in Chicago to meet November 13, for the consideration of certain specified reforms; and in view of the same, Messrs. D. P. Rice, J. K. Phillips, and W. A. Bushnell have called a similar convention to meet in San Francisco the first day of November. The reforms sought after by the Chicago Convention are enumerated as follows: "The prohibition of the liquor traffic, tariff reform, finance reform, restriction of pauper and criminal immigration, arbitration for settlement of labor difficulties and national disputes, reform in civil service, non-sectarian schools, purity and secrecy of the ballot, and all other reforms." In addition to these the San Francisco Convention contemplates the advocacy of Woman Suffrage.

There are some reforms, among those mentioned, which will interest Freethinkers, although the majority of Liberals are a trifle suspicious of movements which start off with "prohibition" or "restriction." There is no reform contemplated by anyone the realization of which would ruin so large an industry as the prohibition reform. It is said by the prohibition advocates that nine hundred millions of dollars are annually expended for liquors, wines, and beer. If the men engaged in the manufacture of these products receive on an average nine hundred dollars per annum, then prohibition would throw one million of men out of their present employment. On the other hand, nine hundred million dollars' worth of liquor represents a great deal of human misery and some joy. It represents thousands of days' work and many days of idleness. It represents a tremendous influence in politics, in business, and in social life; but behind it all is the question of personal liberty—has one man a right to deny another man the use of liquor, wine, or beer?

Tariff reform is another question involving rights. Have customs officials, acting for a government, any more right to divest a merchant of a portion of his goods than had the pirates of Tariffa, whence the name is derived, or is the tariff as legitimate as any other tax? If, however, it is a violation of personal or property rights, the question of its expediency should not be considered. The American people ought to be above bribery and honorable enough not to desire ill-gotten gains, however much prosperity they may bring. As thinking people, Liberals are deeply interested in this subject.

We are also concerned with the question of financial reform, including the free coinage of silver, greenbackism, and other methods of improving our present system. These are purely questions of ways and means for providing a convenient circulating medium. The restriction of immigration, pauper or criminal, is more serious. The majority of us have no capital but our health, which is not unlimited; and if the Sunday law goes through we shall probably become criminals by breaking it. Besides, reformers who are clamoring for their share of the earth should be careful not to deny others enough to stand on, or they may be charged with inconsistency and not be able to defend themselves.

Arbitration for settlement of labor difficulties is a good thing, undoubtedly; and if it takes the form of arbitration between the employer and employee on the basis of what the one is willing to pay and the other is willing to work for, it cannot be otherwise than satisfactory. Between nations it is vastly preferable to war, which is a relic of barbarism.

We will pass over civil service reform, largely humbug, and say that Liberals are in favor not only of unsectarian public schools, but non-religious public schools. Schools are maintained to make educated men and women, and not for the manufacture of angels.

The purity of the ballot is certainly desirable, but not the secret ballot. Let every man vote openly and record not only his vote but the name of the candidate for whom his ballot is cast. Then if bad men are elected to office we may know who is responsible for it. We shall also know whether the men who talk so loudly for reform are sufficiently sincere to vote as they hurrah.

In consideration of the importance of these reforms we hope Mr. Phillips's convention will be largely attended, and we shall be glad to announce the location of the meeting whenever it is decided upon.

THE SAN FRANCISCO FREETHOUGHT SOCIETY.

The next meeting of the San Francisco Freethought Society will be held at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, Sunday evening, October 27, at 8 o'clock. Hon. F. B. Perkins will speak on "Freedom and Slavery."

We have received from Mr. A. H. Hoyt, El Monte, Cal., $1 or the San Francisco Freethought Society.

OUR SPIRITUALISTIC FRIENDS.

While the readers of FREETHOUGHT may not be convinced by the representations of the Golden Gate relative to a future life, they cannot help being pleased with the frankness and candor displayed by the editor. And here at the outset we wish to acknowledge the superior fairness of Spiritualists as compared with other next-world advocates. When we asked the questions quoted by the Golden Gate we had not the faintest confidence that Mr. Owen would attempt to answer them, but he has done so in apparent good faith. We cannot help contrasting his course with that of theologians, who, when requested to answer kindred questions, either ignore them or impute discreditable motives to the inquirer. The editor of the Golden Gate has won for Spiritualists the acknowledgment here made.

So much for the manner of Mr. Owen's reply, which is above criticism. Of the matter we cannot say as much. It affords little chance for argument. When Mr. Owen says that "it is difficult from the material plane of thought to comprehend spiritual things," we are obliged to agree with him; as doubtless he would be compelled to acquiesce in the statement that to the waking mind the dreams and visions incident to sleep are impossible. This, however, does not demonstrate the superior reliability of dreams over the conclusions reached with open eyes.

Again, when Mr. Owen explains that the spirit world is a reflex of this, we heartily concur. The image seen in a mirror is also a reflex of ourselves, but as the reflex disappears with that which is reflected, we see no reason for investing it with immortality. Mr. Owen's further statements touching the conditions of the future life are quite interesting, but we do not like to see these poor bodies of ours accused of causing all the troubles incident to humanity. There are a great many persons who would be much wicked than they are if their health would permit; so that, after all, the imperfections of the mortal body are not altogether unproductive of good. When the spirit is willing to do evil it is quite fortunate that the flesh is sometimes weak.

We wish to allay the fears of our valued contributor, Mrs. Schwartz, that discussion on the subject here touched is likely to divert our attention from the work of Liberalism, or to breed dissension between Spiritualists and non-Spiritualists. Because Brother Owen believes in another world he will relax none of his endeavors to make this one worth living in, and his confidence in the truth of the philosophy he has espoused, together with his good nature, will enable him to preserve an even temper, no matter how deep the conflict. If all Liberals and Spiritualists are not prepared to listen to both sides of every question it is their misfortune, and they should endeavor at once to put themselves in a receptive frame of mind.

"CHARLES BRADLAUGH is dying" is the mournful intelligence brought by cable from London under date of October 22. We are loth to accept the significance of these words, and until their truth is confirmed we wait in hope for better news.

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD's published utterances on the existence of hell and the necessity of conversion seem to have put new life into the old worm-eaten dogmas. The Rev. Father Sasia, of the St. Ignatius College, spoke thus in his sermon last Sunday:

"I am at a loss to understand what service is rendered to the moral tone of society by those who, taking advantage of their notoriety, scatter broadcast the seeds of unbelief and strive to undermine the faith of Christian people in the existence of eternal punishment beyond the grave. But the eternal truths of revelation cannot be swept away by gratuitous assertions even of so-styled learned men. I admit that some pretended scientists have succeeded in casting ridicule on this most fundamental tenet of the Christian religion; but everyone knows that it is easier to sneer and scoff at the witnesses than to disprove their testimony. It is unhappily a matter of frequent occurrence to hear expressions either of total denial or of hesitating doubts lightly and flippantly put forward on this momentous truth. Some men, when warned lest what they so confidently deny might after all turn out to be a stern reality, are heard talking of taking their chances. It is plain that no Catholic worthy of the name can hold such language without making shipwreck of his faith. It is rank heresy, downright impiety, for it implies a denial of revealed truth and of God's wisdom and justice. The authority of the Catholic church, commissioned to teach infallibly all things concerning eternal salvation, is amply sufficient to settle this question for every Catholic. Here I will content myself with remarking that the Catholic dogma has nothing to do with this or that idea which individuals may entertain or put forward. What the Catholic church teaches is that those who die in mortal sin shall suffer punishments without end. This is the dogma clearly defined. Whatever else may be said about the site of this place of torments or about the degree and quality of its pains is not within the domain of faith, and belongs to those points in which it is lawful to hold different opinions without wandering from the Catholic belief. What we do know for certain is that those pains are awful beyond description and without end."

What we know is that the Rev. Father Sasia does not know anything of the kind, and when he pretends, through the offices of the church, to save souls from the pains which he describes, he is a barefaced impostor. This is another thing that he knows, but neglects to state.

CONCERNING the Rev. George Jacob Schweinfurth, the Illinois messiah, we have the following information from a resident of Rockford, where the new incarnation now sojourns:

"Schweinfurth is said to be prospering grandly. He has a palatial home known as 'Heaven,' a few miles out of this city. A gentleman who recently paid him a visit told me the other day that Schweinfurth had a stud of some twenty fine horses; his home was gorgeously fitted up, and among the interior decorations were upwards of a hundred wingless angels usually called women. I have met him twice at one of our banks, where he was making deposits, and once at the post-office. He is a rather fine-looking man ('if it be lawful to call him a man'), somewhat below the medium height, of sandy complexion, auburn hair and whiskers; wears fine clothes and a silk hat, and would be mistaken for a prosperous clerk in a drygoods store if the observer did not know he was the 'Lord of life and glory,' the veritable God Almighty, reincarnated. It is very apparent that the gentleman has learned much wisdom since he left the earth upwards of eighteen hundred years ago, for now he seems a splendid business manager, and is accumulating a very large property, having several big farms, it is said, besides the one known as 'Heaven,' which is under fine cultivation. I should suppose him to be between 36 and 38 years of age."

There are several churches, we understand, founded on a belief in this impostor. At one of these in Kansas City, Mo., according to a writer in Modern Thought, the worshipers give in their testimony to the "saving grace of our Lord Geo. J. Schweinfurth." Really it seems that there are no religious pretensions so absurd that superstitious idiots cannot be found to accept them.

THE passage in the Presbyterian Confession of Faith that is making so much trouble, and which certain Presbyterians wish to modify, reads as follows:

"By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and some angels are predestinated to everlasting life, and others are fore-ordained to everlasting death.

"These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished.

"As God hath appointed the elect unto glory, so hath he, by the eternal and most free purpose of his will, foreordained all the means thereunto. Wherefore they who are elected being fallen in Adam, are redeemed by Christ, are effectually called unto faith in Christ by his Spirit working in due season, are justified, adopted, sanctified, and kept by his power through faith unto salvation.

"The rest of mankind God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his creatures, to pass by, to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice."

This Presbyterian creed is about the funniest old document in existence, and it would be a pity to change it. The idea that God has ordained a portion of his creatures to dishonor and wrath simply as an exhibition of his justice is a conceit so barbarous that, once lost, it could not be reproduced in the present advanced stage of civilization.

IN reviewing a recent work on Mormonism the Chronicle says:

"Why every believer in genuine Republicanism wishes to see Mormonism rooted out is because it places the orders of a church above the commands of the government. In other words, the Mormon will obey first the mandate of the head of his church and then the laws of the country. If the latter conflict with Mormon doctrine then the faithful believer will violate the laws rather than disobey the orders of the church authorities."

If the editor of the Chronicle would substitute Roman Catholicism and Roman Catholic in the place of Mormonism and Mormon, his remarks would apply just as truly to a much more powerful enemy of this republic than the one he has attacked. The only reason, evidently, why this substitution is not made is because the editor of the Chronicle is a Romanist instead of a Mormon. Both these sacerdotal organizations are founded upon the same species of fraud and superstition, and are making the same struggle for temporal power. We would as soon see the one succeed as the other.

E. C. WALKER writes in his paper, Fair Play, a very readable article on "Editors' Eccentricities and Publishers' Peculiarities," in which he criticises the habits these people have of republishing articles without giving due credit. There are plenty of offenses of this character, but some editors are altogether too conscientious. As an instance, we have recently seen Ingersoll's poem on the "Birthplace of Burns" published in a country paper and credited to Texas Siftings.

"We are purely and simply Catholic," says the Catholic World, "and profess an unreserved allegiance to the church, which takes precedence of and gives the rule to our allegiance to the state." If Catholics choose to own allegiance to the church—that is, the pope—before all other powers, they of course have that right, but they ought not to become citizens of any state. A man cannot serve two masters.

WE were promised the abstracts of several addresses delivered at the Portland Convention for publication in this week's paper, but as the writers have chosen to forward them in season for next week's, they are necessarily deferred.

THE American Secular Union Congress at Philadelphia October 25, 26, and 27, is to be addressed by Dr. Edward McGlynn, the Rev. Minot J. Savage, and T. B. Wakeman, Esq.

MOSES HULL will visit Oregon and Washington this winter, and, weather permitting, will lecture on Biblical subjects.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

The rainfall for October in this state beats all previous records. Thousands of tons of grapes are ruined, and the bean crop seriously damaged.—Postmaster-General Wamamaker has received a communication from the postmaster at San Francisco stating that the work in his office has increased 50 per cent within the last three years, yet the office has only been allowed six additional clerks. He therefore asks for fourteen more clerks.—A special from Washington to the New York Post says: "Of the silver bullion purchased by the treasury department, $200,000 is destined for the mint at San Francisco, which will be started again. It is denied that there is any political significance in the renewal of work there, but coinage is $1,000,000 in arrears."—The Brown-Sequard elixir has proved a failure in the case of ex-County Clerk Reynolds, of San Francisco, who was at one time said to be improving. Mr. Reynolds is as feeble now as before using the elixir.

Representatives of the Greenback party met at New York Oct. 21, and nominated Rev. Thos. K. Beecher for Secretary of State, John B. Sullivan of Westchester for Comptroller, and Joseph Madison Hall of Hamilton for Treasurer. The other nominations will be made later.—Gen. Green B. Raum has been appointed commissioner of pensions, vice Tanner, resigned.—Joseph Moysant, the Catholic priest who ran away with the wife of a well-known Chicagoan some weeks ago, and who is thought to have sought refuge in France, is wanted to answer for the crime of forgery.—The coffin containing the remains of Ralph Waldo Emerson, whose grave at Concord, Mass., was recently disturbed, has been placed in a securely bound box, which in turn has been deposited in a grave composed of blocks of granite cemented together and securely fastened with a granite covering.—The next census of the United States will include church statistics. Superintendent Porter says that the inquiry will be broad enough in scope to embrace every religious body, of whatever name or creed, however few or many its churches and members, and it will be conducted with the utmost fairness and impartiality. The information sought will be arranged under the heads: (1) Organizations or societies; (2) Church edifices; (3) Seating capacity; (4) Value of church property; (5) Communicants.

Louis I., king of Portugal, died at Lisbon, Oct. 19. The new king, who assumes the title of Carlos I., has issued his proclamation, in which he swears, among other things, to maintain the Catholic superstition.—The trial of Father McFadden, a Catholic priest, for participation in the murder of Police Inspector Martin, of Gweedore, began at Mayborough, Ireland, last week.—It is said that the Prince of Wales is incurably sick with Bright's disease of the kidneys, and will probably not outlive the queen.—The pope gave an audience to the French pilgrims the other day. He is so feeble that his voice is scarcely audible. As usual he reiterated his complaints against the Italian government.

COLONEL KNIGHT'S LECTURE.

In spite of the "unprecedented precipitation," as a local paper describes the late moisture, the usual audience gathered at the Freethought Society's meeting last Sunday evening to hear Col. H. L. Knight's lecture, the third of a philosophical series on "Matter and Spirit." Professor Miller had spoken on "Matter" and Dr. Anderson on "Spirit;" and so the colonel entitled his address "The Philosophy of God."

Vice-President Lemme occupied the chair and got along quite successfully with the introductory formalities.

Colonel Knight first reviewed the previous discourses, and spoke of the subject generally, with much force. He is an extemporaneous orator, and elaborates his points in so effective a manner that nobody can fail to understand them. He divided the schools of thought on God into four classes: 1. Those who hold to the God of the Bible, with all the concomitants; 2. The Atheists, who hold that there is no God, and no need for a God, but that matter is sufficient to produce all the phenomena we see in the universe; 3. The Bishop Berkeley class, who hold that there is no matter, but all is God, mind, and imagination, and that there is really nothing, only as we imagine it—nothing but pictures on the mind; 4. Those who hold that in the operations of nature, in the creation of the vegetable and mineral kingdoms, and in man, his race, form, mind, and make-up, God is seen, a Supreme Mind, with intent, and carrying out that intent.

The lecturer held to the last position. He characterized all the others as absurd, and argued that because they were absurd and inadmissible his must of necessity be the true one. He repeated his challenge to all and singular of the other schools to debate the matter in any fair manner.

Colonel Knight was followed by Dr. Anderson, of the Theosophical Society, who coincided largely with the lecturer, though offering some criticism.

Mr. Paddon addressed the audience on the Bible God with some warmth, rejecting entirely the monstrous idea of a God all-powerful, all-wise, and all-good, and yet preparing a hell for innocent unbelievers.

Dr. O'Brock next contributed himself to the occasion, and spoke for seven minutes. He might have occupied more time, but he wasted his opportunities by abusing the chairman of the present meeting and of all previous meetings, with casual caustic references to the writer of these reports, and so he was called to order and solicited to take his seat. The doctor means well, we trust, and awakens deeper feelings of regret than of anger; but as he has neither the ability to talk sense nor the discretion to keep still, his suppression is resorted to by the Chair, on behalf of the audience, in self-defense, which is the first law of nature.

To such points as had been raised in opposition to his own the speaker of the evening replied in a few words, and the meeting harmoniously adjourned. The next lecture is by the Hon. F. B. Perkins on "Freedom and Slavery."

THE OREGON CONVENTION.

[As last week's edition of FREETHOUGHT containing a report of the opening proceedings of the Convention is exhausted, we here reproduce what was then published, together with the remainder of the report, which is thus given entire in one number.]

The First Annual Convention of the Oregon State Secular Union met at Masonic Hall, Portland, Saturday, October 12, at 10 A.M. The meeting was called to order by President C. Beal, and music was rendered by Roose and Hodgson's Orchestra. As a preliminary measure Mr. Geo. H. Dawes moved the appointment of a Committee on Resolutions, which motion was carried, and the following committee chosen:

COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS.—Geo. H. Dawes, M. Fitzgerald, Robert Laughlin, Mrs. Jennie Vose Graham, and G. W. Tiffany.

Upon motion of Dr. J. W. McClure, of Silverton, the Convention appointed the following—

COMMITTEE ON NOMINATIONS.—Dr. J. W. McClure, S. P. Putnam, Mrs. S. C. Todd, B. F. Hyland, and H. Arnold.

Music by the orchestra ensued, and then Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, of Kansas City, Mo., was introduced and gave the opening address. After thanking the Convention for the honor of being the first speaker, Mrs. Krekel proceeded to a definition of Secularism, to point out its necessity and the causes which had brought a Secular party into existence, and finally to an exposition of its object. In closing she said, "In our deliberations of how most successfully to advance Secular work, let us be temperate, practical, and conscientious. Let us remember, as the French Convention declared, that 'one man's right ceases where another's begins.' Let us devise some method, adopt some system through which we can utilize means, energy, and ability, toward accomplishing work in the interests of which this Convention is called."

After this appropriate, eloquent address, which was frequently and heartily applauded, a banner was presented to the Oregon

State Secular Union by Miss Mattie Blaisdell. In offering the beautiful symbol the lady said:

"MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: When FREE-THOUGHT brought me the intelligence that the friends of freedom in the great Northwest would hold a Secular Convention in Portland, I asked myself what could I do to hurry on this mighty force which will yet break the chains on mind and body and set a captive world free? I said I would present them with a banner. Therefore this morning I ask you to accept a woman's offering for humanity.

"Friends, give me at this moment a mental pledge that you and your children's children will make an annual pilgrimage to some chosen place, and in convention assembled, with your eyes fixed on this banner of the brave, sing 'A Thousand Years, My Own Columbia.' And if ever war is forced upon us—as well it may be—let this banner wave at the head of your advancing columns, until every tyrant is removed, to make place for the sons and daughters of Liberty. Ladies and gentlemen, if you will work for the freedom of the race with the same devotion of soul as the illustrious persons here named, our cause of liberty, truth, intelligence, and justice will become victorious to the ends of the earth, and the people have but one religion—the Religion of humanity."

The banner was elegantly embroidered with gold on a dark background—the eagle with the stars—and those noble names of Freethought, Hypatia, Bruno, Paine, and Ingersoll, with the legend "Universal Mental Liberty," about the spread wings of the eagle. Below is blazing the torch of civilization, and underneath this flame are the words "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity." On the reverse side of the banner the Stars and Stripes float above the prostrate cross.

President Beal accepted the banner in behalf of the Oregon Union, with this characteristic address:

"Miss Blaisdell, on the part of the officers and members of the Oregon State Secular Union, I accept this beautiful and costly banner. The first inscription I see is 'Universal Mental Liberty.' If we should go to some distant country and find the people chained to stumps and trees, we would feel disgusted and return home. But on our return we would find most of the people chained to creeds and beliefs, some of them having taken a solemn pledge they would never believe anything else. Harriet Martineau was asked what she believed. She said she was a free rover on the breezy commons of the universe. She sought for truth wherever found.

"We find next the name 'Hypatia,' the daughter of Theon. Father and child were builders and patrons of the Alexandrian Library of three hundred thousand volumes, which was burned to make room for a new religion not Pagan. Teachers of mathematics and philosophy, they at one time had fourteen thousand students. As she was returning from the university a band of brutal monks dragged her from her chariot, tore her limbs asunder, scraped the flesh from the bones with shells, and threw them on the devouring coals. She was so pure, it is said, that a sweet smell arose towards heaven. Speak her name in whispers, or as you would that of a departed sister.

"'Bruno,' the young and beautiful philosopher, taught a science now accepted by a civilized world. Thrown into a papal prison, at the end of seven years he was taken out and burned unto death. The other day 30,000 Italians headed by their king, with a hundred bands of music and 1850 banners, marched into the field of flowers with their feet on the sacred ashes of Bruno, and there unveiled a beautiful monument to his memory. For three days neither pope nor priest was seen on the streets of Rome. If ever you intend to pray, pray now that this was the beginning of the end.

"'Paine,' the son of Liberty in three empires; the man who said, 'The world is my country; to do good my religion,' 'I believe in one God and no more, and I hope for happiness beyond this life;' the man who reproved every slaveholder from the president to the 'mudsill' by saying, 'Man has no property in man;' the man who first spoke the immortal words 'The free and Independent States of America;' the most abused man that ever lived—the best man that ever died.

"'Ingersoll,' the product of the ages past, the sample man of the ages to come. The world would be poor without him.

"'The torch.' Primitive man guided his footsteps in the dark, until the coming dawn, by his torch.

"'Liberty,' the word that all the good have spoken.

"'Fraternity.' Yes, brother, I will pull shoulder to shoulder with you.

"'Equality.' If you were unfortunate and did not secure enough for dinner, I will divide with you.

"Yes, Miss Blaisdell, while one of our torch-bearers faces the coming dawn this banner will be borne at the head of our advancing column."

The presentation and acceptance of the banner were the signal for loud and prolonged cheers. Mrs. Seip next gave a thrilling recitation, and repeating "A Thousand Years, My Own Columbia," that noble hymn was sung by the whole vast audience, with accompaniment by the orchestra.

Mrs. Lois Waisbrooker followed in a fine address to a most appreciative audience. The following letter from B. F. Underwood was read:

ON THE CENTRAL PACIFIC, Oct. 4, 1889.

DEAR MR. BEAL: I write, as you requested before I left Portland, a few suggestions to be read at the convention. Those that now occur to me are the following:

Since the clearly stated object of the Oregon Secular Union is to secure the total separation of church and state, and since in this work the co-operation of all, irrespective of religious belief, is invited, see that the speeches, discussions, and the action taken, are confined to this purpose.

After declaring in its constitution and in its public announcements that the sole purpose of the Union is to secularize the state—that is, to remove all vestiges of the union of church and state, and to resist all legislation inconsistent with secular government, and asking all in favor of this purpose to join the Union, it would be clearly inconsistent and even dishonorable to make the convention an occasion for advocating or assailing theological belief and institutions, as such. Whether the Christian, Jewish, Buddhistic, or other religions are true or not, whether Materialism or Spiritualism is the correct philosophy, whether Saturday or Sunday is more sacred than other days and should be so observed as a religious duty—these are questions beyond the province of the Union to decide. The object of the Union is to oppose governmental indorsement or discrimination in favor of any religious systems or dogmas, and to maintain that the function of the government in regard to religion is to have nothing whatever to do with it one way or the other, except to defend all in the expression of their views, and in their right to worship (or not to worship) as they see fit.

Some persons do not distinguish between state secularization and Secularism. One means the separation of the church and the state—making the state entirely secular in its character, leaving all religions to the voluntary support of their adherents. The other means a system of philosophy and ethics, which it is not necessary to accept in order to be in sympathy with state secularization.

The discussion of Secularism comes no more within the scope of the Union than the discussion of Spiritualism or Calvinism—that is, considered as systems.

The provisions for work during the coming year should be limited to such as is required to advance the cause of state secularization. The officers should be selected with reference to their qualifications for this work. To select men merely because they are zealous opponents of theological beliefs would be in violation of the spirit of the constitution of the Union. Most of the members are probably Freethinkers (in the common meaning of that word), but opposition to Christianity or Judaism is no part of the work of the organization. Christian and non-Christian are alike eligible to office.

The office of secretary is an important one. The person elected to this position should be unpartisan and fair-minded, one who knows the difference between the movement for secular-izing the state and the work of merely attacking theological creeds. To elect to this office a man who would make it serve his purpose of securing opportunities for himself and others to lecture for or against religious beliefs would be a great mistake. To make any particular paper the official organ of the Union unless that paper is devoted entirely and exclusively to state secularization would not, I think, be wise.

My own convictions on religious subjects are radical and pronounced, but I should not think of advocating or advancing them if I were to be present at the convention. An exposition of Adventism by Mr. Jones would be just as appropriate.

We cannot bring together people of different views on various subjects for a specific purpose, and expect harmony and success, unless the discussions and proceedings are confined to the purpose announced in the call.

There is a strong sentiment in Oregon in favor of secularizing the state, especially in favor of taxing church property, maintaining secular schools, and opposing restrictive Sunday laws. I hope the convention will serve to strengthen this sentiment, organize it, and make it powerfully felt in the legislation of the state.

Very truly yours, B. F. UNDERWOOD.

The Convention met at 2 P.M. Saturday, October 12, pursuant to adjournment. A motion by J. Henry Schroeder, of Coos county, that Messrs. Reynolds, Putnam, and Bell be appointed a committee on introduction, was adopted. Mr. Reynolds then read a letter from J. L. York, in which he regretted his inability to be present on account of ill health, and gave words of cheer to the Convention.

A telegram was then read, from Moses Hull, sending greetings to the Convention.

Geo. H. Dawes was then introduced and gave an address on "The Principles of American Liberty."

C. B. Reynolds, being next introduced, gave an animated and eloquent speech emphasizing the positions taken by the previous speakers, and defending the principles and acts of Liberals.

The Convention then adjourned to evening.

The evening session, Saturday, was opened with an address by Rabbi Block.

After the address of the rabbi, W. S. Bell gave his lecture on "Liberty and Morality," the Convention adjourning to Sunday.

The meeting was called to order Sunday morning at 9:30 by President Beal. Music was furnished by the band.

Short speeches were made by members of the Convention. Dr. A. K. Olds, of McMinnville, spoke enthusiastic words of encouragement and urged persistent action. The doctor is seventy-eight years old, and has been for many years a pronounced Freethinker.

T. S. Derrick, of Benton, made a short address on practical work.

J. Henry Schroeder spoke of the necessity of Liberal organization. He urged that efforts be directed solely in the line of state secularization, and that all elements be organized in harmony with this prime object.

Professor Seymour spoke of the strength and growth of Liberalism upon the Pacific coast, and urged vigilance in the protection of our public school system from the blight of ecclesiasticism.

The president read a letter from W. H. Breese, of Talent, Or., on the work of the Convention.

Mr. Priestly, of Milwaukee, spoke of the business and social tyranny of the churches.

Mr. Elliott, of Portland, spoke of the distinction won by Liberals in the defense of the union.

Dr. Olds said that he had been an Infidel ever since Hacker published the Pleasure Boat.

Mr. Rawson, of Olympia, said: "I stand before you an ex-preacher now sixty years of age. I spent forty years preaching Methodism." He gave an extended history of his experience, and of the work he had done since he espoused Liberalism.

B. F. Hyland, of Corvallis, spoke of the results he attained by investigation of the Bible itself.

Dr. A. D. Martis, of Ohio, said: "After organization what are we going to do? To a certain extent churches do a good work. The Liberals must educate in truth and morality."

Mr. Fuller, of McMinnville, said: "I agree in everything with my Liberal friend, Dr. Olds, except as to a future life. He says he doesn't know. I say, I do know. But in questions of right, of duty, of justice, we are one."

Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, being called upon, made an impromptu speech setting forth clearly and forcibly the situation and the demands of the hour.

Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds, being introduced, gave the address of the morning upon the objects of the Convention.

At 2 o'clock Sunday afternoon the hall was crowded to its utmost capacity, and the great audience, with frequent bursts of applause, listened to a masterly exposition of state secularization, from Rev. Alonzo T. Jones, of the Advent Christian church. He spoke for two hours, and it was a remarkable address, coming from a Christian clergyman. Following is an abstract:

True Christianity, as represented by Jesus, does not resort to force, but to persuasion. A union of church and state is destructive of its very principles. If the Bible is a divine book, it does not need any official recognition. Such a recognition degrades it. A government is for natural rights. It is only for this world. No state will survive and flourish in heaven. It is for the affairs of life as it now is. The natural rights of the non-Christian are equal to those of the Christian. No amount of belief in or attainment of the supernatural can alter natural rights. They exist with the man himself and are not the product of any faith. Government cannot distinguish between citizens on account of religion. It cannot go to the intentions of a man. It can only treat of actions. To the government, actions are neither religious or non-religious, moral or immoral, but simply civil and uncivil. The state can restrain uncivil action, but nothing else. It can prevent that which is an infringement upon the rights of any individual. It must therefore solely deal with the action. This is open and can be witnessed. But if government is to deal with intentions, with the heart and head, as well as the doing of a deed, it must resort to the Inquisition and by torture wring from a man his secret thoughts and then punish or acquit as these secret thoughts are judged to be good or bad. Can this be done? It is impossible, and if it could be done tyranny of the most cruel kind would be the result. God rules in righteousness, but he does not rule by the actions and opinions of men who profess to be his representatives. God rules, but he does not require the sword of state. These men, these Christians who are for the union of church and state, claim to stand for God. Their will is the will of God. They wish to judge and condemn, as if they sat upon the throne of the universe. The demands of Liberalism are just. They are measures of self-defense. They are not aggressions upon the Christian religion. They formulate justice between citizen and citizen. They are impartial.

I am a Christian. I believe in Christianity. I believe it is a divine and supernatural religion, but it must win by persuasion and by no other means. I grant the right of every man to differ from me. If I take away his right to disbelieve, then I logically take away my right to believe. If I take the right to punish one for non-belief, then I surrender my own right to protest when he gets the power and punishes me for belief. To maintain my right as a Christian I must equally maintain the right of the non-Christian. Rights are universal, and if denied to one are denied to all. To maintain my Christian liberty, therefore, I must maintain the liberty of all. If I use the sword against the Infidel, by that act I say to the Infidel, You can use the sword on me when you get a chance.

Justice is universal. It is not for one or for a part, but for all. Christianity can survive by justice and without destroying the rights of a single individual. Christianity that resorts to force is a human invention, and so imperfect and tyrannical. It professes to represent God by acts of despotism. This is not Christianity. The Christianity of Jesus is peace and good will. If one can be persuaded to become a Christian that is right, but to force one to be a Christian, or to act in any way publicly or privately as if he were a Christian, is an infringement of human rights and therefore wrong, and according to the teachings of the New Testament anti-Christian. The demands of Liberalism are as much for the protection of genuine Christianity as for the protection of Infidelity. They are for the protection of the rights of conscience. They are for the protection of religious belief. Christianity must accept these demands in order to be true to its own divine mission.

Sunday evening the hall was also crowded, there being scarcely any standing-room. Mrs. Krekel gave an able exposition of the principles of natural morality, the only basis of human legislation. Mr. S. P. Putnam followed with an address upon "The American Republic."

The Convention then adjourned until Monday.

The Convention was called to order at 10 o'clock Monday morning by President Beal, and motion was made by Dr. Calder, of Walla Walla, to receive the report of the joint committee appointed by the informal caucus of Friday afternoon. After some opposition the motion was ruled to be in order by the president. The motion being put, it was unanimously resolved not to receive the report of the committee.

Geo. H. Dawes, chairman of the committee on resolutions, made a report. A special committee of three—Mr. Bucher, Mrs. S. C. Todd, and L. Ames—was appointed to consider the report.

Professor Seymour, being called upon, made a brief speech against religious legislation; spoke of the dangers of the encroachments upon the freedom of the mails; of the persecutions of D. M. Bennett, Dr. E. B. Foote, Mrs. Slenker, Harman & Walker, and others.

After Professor Seymour's address the special committee on resolutions reported, and, after some discussion, the following were adopted:

1. Resolved, That the rights and dignity of labor are necessary for the perpetuity of the American republic, and this convention recognizes the great importance of all reforms the purposes of which are for the advancement of the working people. But the power of the government cannot be made conducive to the success of these measures until all Christian and ecclesiastical usurpations in the state are successfully resisted, and civil and religious liberty are secured to all, regardless of religious belief or non-belief.

2. Resolved, That the subjection of woman by the Christian and all other religion has been a gross injustice to her, and has hindered in countless ways the civilization of mankind, and therefore we, as lovers of liberty and equality, recognize woman to be the equal of man in all the relations of life; not only as a matter of justice to her as an individual, but as necessary for social purity and the further elevation of the human race and the establishment of equal rights and secular principles in our republic.

3. Resolved, That this Convention urges upon all Liberals the importance of organizing local societies, the building of Freethought halls, the establishing of libraries and reading-rooms, for the purpose of disseminating Secular principles and the advancement of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty. And also urges the generous support of FREETHOUGHT and secular papers and lecturers.

4. Resolved, That while this Convention recognizes the importance of working for all the demands of state secularization, it would advise that special efforts be made to secure the taxation of church property, and instructs the board of directors to provide, from the funds of the Union, petitions to be circulated among the people of Oregon for their signatures, asking the legislature of Oregon to repeal the law exempting church property from taxation. And it also asks the board of directors to outline for the next convention a plan of work by which the influence of the Secularists may be concentrated for legislative action at the next session of the state legislation, and continue the efforts already made in this direction.

5. Resolved, That this Convention pass a resolution of sympathy with the relatives and friends of, and respect to him who was the thinker of pure thoughts; the doer of good deeds; who was for more than half a century the intrepid torch-bearer of liberty; who was one of nature's noblest sons; whose genius has moved the intellect of two hemispheres; whose heart and sympathies were with the poor and the oppressed; who always sided with the weak against the strong; whose purity of mind and nobleness of character have given peace and joy to thousands of human hearts; whose memory will be cherished and revered as long as there are men and women who love the truth and battle for the right—the lamented Horace Seaver.

Putnam, Benton Mires, Fossil; Harry Hawson, Arlington; Alex. Hardie, Lost Valley; Alex. Crawford, Lone Rock; John B. Coleman, Baker City; I. W. Norval, Summerville; — Jones, Union.

Treasurer, A. F. Neunert, Portland.

Secretary, J. K. Sears, McCoy; assistant secretary, Elva Davidson, Oswego.

Executive Committee: Lee Laughlin, North Yamhill; R. Wright, Molalla; B. W. Huffman, La Grande; Gertrude Vose Meserve, Ranier; J. K. Olds, Lafayette.

Finance Committee: L. Ames, Silverton; O. Jeldness, Portland; Mrs. M. J. Olds, McMinnville.

A motion to pay the assistant secretary out of the funds of the union for work at the discretion of the board of directors was adopted.

A partial report of receipts and expenses was made. Receipts, about $500; expenses, about $200. Full report will be published in FREETHOUGHT.

The following motion of S. B. Huston, of Hillsboro, after some discussion, was adopted:

Whereas, The Liberals of Washington Territory in generosity have contributed a large amount of money to the funds now in the treasury of this organization. And whereas, there are probable grounds for believing that some of it was contributed under the belief that a joint organization would be effected, and the same has not been done; and

Whereas, It is the desire of this Convention to avoid all grounds for offense or ill-feeling and to display to our friends the same liberal spirit that they have shown, and which should and does characterize Liberals everywhere; therefore be it

Resolved by this Convention, That the treasurer of this organization be authorized to refund all money received from Washington Liberals who so desire, and that the secretary be instructed to notify them of this resolution.

Professor Seymour's resolution of sympathy with Harman & Walker was laid upon the table, action in this case not lying within the demands of Liberalism as understood by the Convention.

It was voted that the board of directors be authorized to fix the time for the next Convention.

A motion by J. Henry Schroeder that the Convention resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for the purpose of receiving the report of joint committee appointed by informal caucus of Friday afternoon was carried, J. Henry Schroeder being called to the chair. The report of the committee was called for. Mr. Bucher, chairman, reported that the committee was practically adjourned without date and he had no report to present.

A general discussion ensued, and a motion that the Committee of the Whole now rise was carried. The Convention then adjourned.

During the proceedings the following resolutions of thanks were unanimously passed:

Resolved, That the Convention tender its sincere thanks to Miss Mattie Blaisdell for her generous and beautiful gift to the Oregon State Secular Union of the Freethought banner.

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention be tendered to the officers of the Union, especially to our worthy president, C. Beal, for his untiring efforts to make the Convention a success; and also to all the speakers.

Resolved, That the Convention extends its thanks to the press of the city for their full and fair reports of the speeches and proceedings of the Convention.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Convention be tendered to Decker Bros. for their generosity in giving the free use of a fine piano for our meetings.

The Convention closed with a concert and ball. The following is from the Oregonian:

CONCERT AND BALL.

Last night Masonic Hall was again well filled for the concert and grand ball which closed the Secular Convention. The first number on the concert programme was an overture by the Aerial orchestra.

Messrs. Haehlen and Turk followed with a beautiful zither duet entitled "Echo im Thal," by Conrad. These melodious instruments were handled in a masterly manner, and the sweet, soft notes made such music as could be appreciated by the most critical listener.

Mrs. Reynolds, of Walla Walla, recited "The Tramp Soldier" with feeling and effect, and then Mr. Louis Dammasch sang "When the Quiet Moon is Beaming," Schondorff. Mr. Dammasch's rich tenor voice was displayed to the best advantage in this selection, and his efforts received the enthusiastic applause of the audience.

Professor Joseph Stebinger next stepped upon the stage with his violin, and in his own masterly manner he favored the audience with a composition by Henri Wieniawsky, entitled "Legende." He, too, received well-deserved applause.

Mrs. Seip recited a poem entitled "Questions," and S. P. Putnam closed the literary exercises with a recitation entitled "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?"

The chairs were then removed from the center of the hall and the orchestra struck up the grand march. A waltz followed, and polkas, lancers, schottisches, mazourkas, and quadrilles followed in quick succession.

The dancing programme consisted of twenty-four numbers, and the evening was pleasantly and happily spent. Lunch was served at Turn Halle from 11:30 to 1 o'clock.

The floor committee consisted of Dr. Paul Semler, Captain Charles DuBois, Mrs. Dr. Semler and Mrs. McCann.

On the whole the Secular Convention has been a success. Considerable interest has been awakened in the principles of Secularism and more active work in the cause will follow. Local unions will be organized throughout the state and a more largely attended Convention will be expected next year.

S. P. Putnam lectured on Tuesday evening to a large audience. At the close of the lecture the Portland Liberal Association was organized for the purpose of local effort in union with the state work. Great interest was manifested, and without doubt the Liberals of Portland will keep up an active campaign through the winter.

MAN A STRANGER TO HIMSELF.

Why is man a stranger to himself? Why does he not understand the laws of his own nature as well as the laws of intricate machinery and revolving planets? Why is his nature a mystery-land of phantoms, the source of wild hopes and strange fears?

A lamp has been lighted. It illuminates the surrounding world and universe. Things that looked ghostly and frightful in the darkness appear real and simple in its light. But man, who lit this lamp, has hung it on the outward wall and left the house of his own nature shrouded in darkness, haunted by the phantoms of superstition.

Man has done much to his surroundings, but little to himself. He has led the lightning from the skies to take another path than its own. He has made monsters of iron that move over the land and through the waters as though they were things of life. He sends his messages on the wings of the lightning thousands of miles in the wink of an eye; knows the distance of world from world and sun from sun. He knows the path of the morning star, and the hour when the sun will be obscured he knows years beforehand.

He is intimately acquainted with things far away, but a stranger to himself. His own being is wrapped in the shadows of mystery—a region of fables and fairy-tales. It is the center of all his hopes and fears—but unknowable, incomprehensible.

As the observing individual journeys on through the desert of life he is more and more struck with its incongruities and the wildness of his surroundings. His mind's sun, having mounted higher in the heavens of life, has dispelled the delusive mist of fear and superstition that surrounded him in the morning of life and now beats down upon him with the fierce heat of stern reality. The traveler pauses for a moment and does his first serious thinking. Here he is well advanced on a journey which means—he knows not what. The explanations given by his fellow-travelers are strangely conflicting and anything but calculated to nurse confidence in a thoughtful mind. There is a babel of confusion and contradiction. Somebody is wonderfully given to guessing or strangely wanting in seriousness.

Stand no longer perplexed, O wanderer! Can you not see that the object of your journey is the journey itself? The meaning of life is to live. Life is its own object. And as to death, it is a process of life. Your individuality shall dissolve, and the elements and forces of which it is made shall fulfill another duty in the eternal process of nature—you shall die the individual death to live the universal life.

Behold, the day of Truth is at hand! Announce it through the valleys and cry it from the hilltops! Already the high mountains are robed in his morning-glory. Away with the shadows of superstition, no need for the lanterns of religion. Truth himself will soon be here in all his glory to give a new light and a new life to all, "for we know that the whole creation together travaileth and is together in agony until now."

O that this night to an end had drawn,
And all its shadows passed away.
Our souls are longing for the dawn
Of Truth's eternal day.

Ex-CHRISTIAN.

MR. OWEN'S REPLY.

FREETHOUGHT requests us to answer the following questions: "Does the mother find her child an infant still upon the farther side, or will she find him or her a matured man or woman of fifty years? Will nature keep the child in a state of arrested development for two score and ten years to satisfy the yearnings of the parents, or will she disappoint them by permitting it to reach maturity and age?"

It is difficult from the material plane of thought to comprehend spiritual things. The spirit world is, in a wonderful way, a reflex of this world. It is governed by immutable law which no spirit can transcend. The spirit body is a counterpart of the mortal body, save in the imperfections of the latter. It is composed of the magnetic elements of the mortal, has shape, weight and tangibility.

A child, passing to spirit life, is taken to the heart and home of some mother spirit, where it is tenderly reared and cared for. There is no such thing as "arrested development" in spirit life, neither will the mother expect her child to remain always a child. It grows to maturity there as here. Mothers here, who are sensitive to spirit influence, are cognizant of the existence and growth of their children in spirit life. The spirits of very young children are brought to the arms of their mortal mothers for sustenance and strength. They sleep upon their bosoms, and many mothers are able to sense their presence. Besides, in our sleep our spirits often meet and mingle with the spirits of our loved ones on the other side. Hence, when parents awaken to spirit life, from the unconsciousness of physical death, it will be no surprise or disappointment to them that their children have grown to the full stature of being. The disappointment would be in finding that they had not so grown.

Another question by our materialistic neighbor: "Is the Summerland a place of perpetual growth, or of eternal stagnation? If the former, then the experiences of this world, all its sorrows and partings, must merely be repeated. If the latter, it is an infinite cheat upon those who enter it in the undeveloped state of infancy." And the writer might have added, as well, "the undeveloped state of manhood;" for here all is imperfection—undeveloped manhood, as well as infancy. Eternal progression is an immutable law of the universe. Just in proportion as man becomes adjusted to the harmonies of nature—is obedient to the eternal law—will he secure happiness for himself here or hereafter. The other life is a repetition of this life in this, that disobedience to law is punishable with sorrow and pain there as here; but the spirit disencumbered of the physical body, and its often debasing appetites and impulses, yields more willing obedience to law, and the teachings of wise spirits. If the desire of the spirit is for the better life, it soon attains to that life there, while here it is often overcome and dragged down by its unfortunate environments of the flesh, and of evil associations. In spirit life we find our own levels, and are not obliged to fellowship those for whom we have no attraction. There are no "partings" there of spirits who are mutually attracted to each other. Kinship does not always mean mutual attraction there any more than it does here. We shall have all that belongs to us in spirit life, and nothing more; and if we would find true happiness in that life or this, we must place ourselves in the way thereof by doing good to others, and seeking for the highest good in our own lives.

"When Mr. Owen says he knows there is a future life, we have to base our belief in that assertion upon our confidence in his truth and veracity; and for ourselves, we do not deny that such confidence is severely tested by his positive statement. We do not know that there is a future life, and we are not sure that it would be desirable. Certainly it is not a consolation so long as it is doubted."—FREETHOUGHT.

Very true; and further, what may be positive knowledge to us can only be second-hand testimony to our neighbor. Therefore, we blame no one for not accepting the truth until it is fully demonstrated to his individual consciousness. For many years the writer stood in belief just where our neighbor now stands. The idea of spirit existence, or a future life, was simply preposterous.

And he well understands how hard it is to give up one's cherished theories and beliefs. But he had to do it, to be honest with himself. The proof came to him in many ways, in his own home, in the privacy of his own room, with no other mortal than himself present, and many times elsewhere. Should he give the nature of some of the evidence he has received, we are quite sure FREETHOUGHT would think him a "little off;" but he is certain of his entire sanity, as he modestly thinks himself capable of demonstrating to any who doubt it.—The Golden Gate.

MRS. SCHWARTZ INTERVENES.

To the Editors of Freethought and the Golden Gate:

I read in the Golden Gate of last week, as well as in to-day's FREETHOUGHT, the article on "Doubtful Consolation." I believe that my old-time friend, J. J. Owen, as well as the editor of FREETHOUGHT, will pardon my criticism of this article.

Mr. Owen, in our hearts as well as in the "hearts of millions of the race," such consolation as was offered in the obituary referred to could find no response; but if it prove satisfactory to another portion of the same race, would it not be well to let them enjoy all the comfort they can find in such consolation? If you or I should attempt to console them with our views of death and the future state of existence, it would find no response in their hearts. You say, "Why will our Freethought friends persist in repudiating evidence of the future life?" I have conversed with a large number of Freethinkers—as I always lend my aid to carry on the work laid out by them—and I find none unwilling to know more of the philosophy of Spiritualism. They have given much time to the investigation of it; they have searched honestly, but have never been able to secure the evidence desired. You have been more fortunate; then why blame those who give forth the best and highest that they have been able to attain? Who can do more? The parents of the little two-year-old came to the editor of FREETHOUGHT requesting him to "add such consolation there may be to offer." He gave all that he had to offer. What more could he do?

The editor of FREETHOUGHT says, "We do not know that there is a future life, and we are not sure that it would be desirable." If life is desirable to-day, it is desirable to-morrow; if desirable next week, month or year, it is desirable through all eternity. Again he says, "A child dying in infancy must enter the other world an infant. The parents never cease to think of it as such, and the mother expects to take in her arms once more the babe she placed in the coffin. She may live a half century in that hope; and here occurs a question which we would be glad to have Mr. Owen answer, since he knows. Does the mother find her child an infant still upon the farther side, or will she find him or her a matured man or woman of fifty years?" Mr. Owen certainly needs no one to come to his assistance in answering these questions; he is fully equal to it; but as one who has given some time to investigation, as one who has succeeded in finding, through my own organism, my own spiritual senses, what has been sufficient evidence of a life beyond, to me, I want to say a few words to the editor of FREETHOUGHT. I have no fault to find with you if after honest investigation you have failed to find any evidence of a future life. This is a matter beyond your power of control, and you have a right to say you do not know, etc.; but when you tell us we do not know, when you say that "we have not the first iota of reliable information," then you are asserting things that you certainly do not know. I am surprised at the questions you have asked Mr. Owen, and let me advise you, as a friend of the cause of Freethought, to make it your first business to sit down with some honest Spiritualist and find out what they really do believe in regard to the future life. You say that "the parents of a child dying in infancy never cease to think of it as an infant." Spiritualists think no such thing. They believe in progression both in this world and the next, and when they think of their children who have passed on, it is a pleasure to them to think of the progress their children are making surrounded by better conditions than can possibly surround one on this sphere of action; and while they do not expect to meet infants, no more do they expect to meet them as old people, for we understand that the spirit never grows old, that it is only this material casket that becomes aged and decrepit. As far as any of us have gone we can testify that we never feel old excepting as our material condition makes the body helpless, but there is a living fire within that burns brightly, that never gets dim, and we forget that we are old; the heart is ever young. I cannot understand why you should imagine that if the summerland is a place of perpetual growth and development, it necessitates a repetition of the "experiences of this world, with all its sorrows and partings." But I will stop right here, for I have not written this with any view to change your opinions, but simply in defense of a philosophy that has proved a great consolation to me, not only when my loved ones have been buried from my sight, but when the ills of this life seem to almost overwhelm me. I am a Freethinker as well as a Spiritualist. I want to see each side do their very best. I want to see the time that is spent in criticisms of each other's mode of operation spent in opening up new avenues of good. Each fills his own particular niche, and there are certain lines of work that we should unite in doing without dissension. In the late war between the North and South, hand to hand our patriots fought; little did each care what the other believed. To-day our country needs our united efforts, and these criticisms on the part of Spiritualists and Freethinkers antagonize rather than unite us. What care I whether a man or woman believes in one or fifty worlds? And if he believes in none, it does not change the facts of the case in the least. It is too much like the fight between the different nationalities; each claims superiority. Let us be men and women—not children; let us take each as we find them regardless of belief. If we cannot do this we are neither true Spiritualists nor true Liberals. I have gone through life hampered on every hand; there has been by far more cloud than sunshine, and still I try to rise above all, try to improve my mental conditions; but if at any moment I may be cast into oblivion and all these efforts lost, if we were born but to suffer and die, then life is indeed a failure. But if on the other hand life is eternal, and the progress we make here will go with us as we pass on, our efforts have not been in vain and we still have an opportunity to overcome the mistakes we have made. There is hope. The Materialists say the Spiritualist can give no evidence of another life; what proof can they give that there is no other life?

Gentlemen, this criticism is made in a spirit of fairness, and I hope you will accept it in the same spirit in which it is given.

OUR CLERGY.

The clericals of the United States are, beyond all comparison, the ablest, the most learned, mannerly, and moral of all the world. They live in an atmosphere of freedom. They are wholly divested of all but moral power. The titles, bishop, elder, pastor, D.D., and all that sort of thing, import nothing, give no power, no pre-eminence, and no prestige, except with their immediate flock. They have all to earn by a fine person, good manners, talent, and eloquence. With these they may reasonably expect to earn a good salary, but without them they drop into the sere and yellow leaf of poverty and obscurity.

Then in our free atmosphere, where all men are sovereign, they acquire a modest decency of expression, in and out of the pulpit, that leaves the barbarous past in the shade; they lose the tone of dictation and anathema, and talk almost up to the age, in deference to public habit and opinion. Our Constitution forbids all forms of persecution for religion's sake. Our people have acquired the habit of doing the same, and the pulpit no longer dares to appeal to them in language of bitterness and hate. Even the Roman Catholic clergy, always the last to yield to culture and civilization, have taken on a new form here. They are no more like the burly priests of Ireland, Italy, Mexico, and South America than a domestic cat is to a Bengal tiger. They do but purr and whine, whereas in those more congenial regions they use their sticks on the flock, and curse all creation that does not believe and obey. A real, genuine, full-blooded Irish priest in San Francisco would fetch up in the police court every day for some offense against our decent law. So with the priest of the Greek church. They are much akin, and belong to infallibility and despotism.

But in California they have to temper the wind to the shorn lamb; or, rather, the priest, who is the shorn lamb in this case (shorn of all his power for ill), has to temper himself to the atmosphere of the republic. He must, or consent to serve his time in jail. So our preachers are the best in the world, the least assailable, the most conformed to science, civilization, and high culture. The utter stupidity of the pope and the college of cardinals is not found among them. The lordly arrogance of the English bishop has no place here. The dull ignorance of the parish curate or the Catholic monk would die of starvation. Our clergy must be capable and up and doing.

And some are eminent as great men even outside the church. Beecher, Starr King, and others have shone in the firmament of the republic as men of the first magnitude. Yet—strange is it not?—with all these advantages not one of any eminence is to be found who will stand up and say, "The Christian religion is true and right from turret to foundation-stone, and I can prove it against the ablest Infidel that can be produced."

Why is this? Do they know too much, or too little? Do they know that it is not true? Or do they feel that they are incompetent? San Francisco has some able men in the pulpit, and yet not one who dare accept a challenge even to prove that Christ lived and died as stated, or that the Bible is the word of God. Have they no faith? Bishop Kipp is as sturdy and full of the Holy Ghost as any man who sits on the bench of bishops in England, and as much opposed as they to the encroachments of liberty, heresy, and civilization; but he and his clergy have no stomach for a full free debate. The Catholic archbishop has a glib tongue and a hundred keen sophists at his disposal, but not one who cares to engage in this contest. What a victory would it be for his church if he could stay the champion of science right here in his own citadel! But no; they do not want the honor, or feel that they could not earn it.

Then there is Dr. Stebbins, really an able man, who follows the Christian funeral at a modest distance with a grave and solemn respect. He uncovers his head. He makes his science and learning bow down at the name of Christ. He sings a Te Deum Laudamus in a sort of watered way, but protests that it is the Simon-pure Christianity. But he also declines to put his watered stock before the public gaze for a fair trial. And all the lesser lights of the Evangelic churches hide their heads, from Harcourt to the Salvation Army. They can all talk in a corner to their lambs. They are all valiant for Christ in the face of ignorance, drunkenness, and crime. But all alike shun a meeting in the full blaze of day with intelligence and manhood. They are all told, "Your religion is a fable, a sham, a fraud, with no support in science, history, common-sense, justice, or humanity. Prove it or admit the soft impeachment." And they decline to prove. By that act they admit. All sensible men must hold that they admit, and their religion is the baseless sham it is declared to be.

Our challenge is not confined to San Francisco. It is world-wide. The raving Talmage, the pope himself, the Archbishop of Canterbury, all the prince cardinals, all the presidents of all the theological seminaries, all the D.Ds., or any other man or woman, all are invited. We will maintain against all comers that the fathers of the republic were right, and it should forever be maintained, when they said, "All religions are to our mind unproved, and every American shall think as he pleases about them."

H. L. KNIGHT.

The Exclusion Act Inimical to Missionary Work

At the Chicago Convention of the Interseminary Alliance, Oct. 19, a certain Mr. Hilliard introduced the following resolution:

Whereas, The United States law forbidding Chinese immigration is hurtful to missionary work in China,

Resolved, That the United States Congress be requested to repeal said law.

A dozen delegates wanted to speak at once and when order was restored many speeches were made in opposition to the resolution and not one in favor of it. It was tabled indefinitely.

GIORDANO BRUNO'S MARTYRDOM.

As the pope has carefully removed the records of the Inquisition from the Holy Office to the Vatican, probably with the view that they shall never be used save in the papal interest, and some Protestant papers here have fallen into the Jesuit trap of saying it is not quite certain that Bruno was burnt to death, it may be well to preserve the following summary of evidence given by Mr. C. E. Plumtre in the Antiquary for April. He points out that the evidences for the execution are the following:

1. A letter from Scioppius, giving a full and detailed account of the execution of Bruno, which took place on Thursday, February 17, 1600, in the presence of Scioppius himself. This letter having been conclusively proved to be genuine from internal evidence by Mr. R. C. Christie.
2. Mersenne's mention of Bruno as un athee brulle en Italie in a work printed in 1624.
3. The Imperial Ambassador, Wacker, residing at Rome in 1600, informing Kepler of the event.
4. The full detail of the trial and sentence contained in the Archives of the Inquisition.
5. The Avvisi di Roma (contained in the manuscripts of the Vatican, a sort of newspaper in those days) of February 19, 1600, records the execution of Bruno as having taken place on the previous Thursday, the 17th.
6. The Archives of San Giovanni Decollato, containing a notice of the execution of Bruno, given in all its details. The day of the week is said to be Thursday; the day of the month February 16; the year 1600.

Against this there is only the fact that the last mentioned archives gives the date as the 16th, instead of the 17th, of February, a mistake that might have easily occurred through a misprint, or from careless writing or copying. Yet, on so slight a foundation as this, the apologists of Rome endeavor to explain away this instance of her infamy.—The Freethinker.

LITERARY NOTES.

Thomas Herttell's "Spirit of Truth, an Exposition of Infidelity or Religious Unbelief," has reached its third edition, which has just been published by J. P. Mendum, Boston. It is only a 25-cent pamphlet, but it is neatly printed, well bound, and contains 86 pages of instructive argument and precept.

Rabbi S. Freuder, a Jewish theologian, has handed us a tract written by himself entitled "What shall We do to be Saved?" According to the distinguished rabbi the answer is, "Join the San Francisco Nationalist Club." Doubtless nationalism is better than damnationism, but we do not know how much.

THE Rev. Frank L. Phalen, pastor of the Unitarian church of Brattleboro, Vt., will accept our acknowledgments for his printed sermon on "Rocks Ahead." The "rocks" referred to are not Mr. Phalen's salary, but, in his opinion, (1) Socialism and (2) Romanism, which he regards with apprehension. On the whole, the Rev. Mr. Phalen's sermon is a good one.

Col. Garrick Mallery's address before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, on "Israelite and Indian," will be published in the Popular Science Monthly for November. It shows the remarkable similarity between the mortuary customs and religious beliefs and practices of the two peoples, but Colonel Mallery draws a conclusion from this parallel unfavorable to the suggested descent of the Indians from the "lost tribes."

We have previously mentioned Dr. George W. Brown's historical and critical review of the "Sunday Question," but here is a striking passage we cannot refrain from quoting: "The Prison Reports, showing the fate of Sabbath-Breakers, do indeed tell a terrible tale. Several of them before us as we write, prepared by the chaplains of such prisons, show that ninety-five per cent of the convicts had been attendants upon Sunday-schools, and that they drew their first lessons in morals from these nurseries of virtue." The price of the pamphlet is 15 cents.

There are two popular methods of explaining things—the theological and the evolutionary. The former may be found set forth by the Bible and Bible commentators; the latter by scientists. And among the exponents of science there are none who write more interestingly and instructively than the contributors to the Popular Science Essayist, published by the New Ideal, of Boston. The last numbers received treat of "Evolution of Morals," by Lewis G. Janes, and "Proofs of Evolution," by Nelson C. Parshall. Ten cents per number.

The "Transatlantic: a Mirror of European Life and Letters" is a magnificently-printed fortnightly publication issuing from Boston. The initial number just received contains several valuable articles drawn from European sources. The price of the Transatlantic is $2 per year, or ten cents a number, and it is worth the cost simply as a thing of beauty. Address the Transatlantic Publishing Company, P. O. Box 210, Boston, Mass.

THE TWO MEN.

There is a man who lives in Rome of the name of Pecci. This man is the pope of the Roman Catholic church, a large religious body that pretends to take for its Lord and master a humble peasant of Galilee who lived on earth nearly two thousand years ago. This peasant was a preacher, and among other things that he said we find this: "Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted." We should naturally expect to find a person who claimed to be a follower of Jesus, meek and lowly, living in plain manner, without ostentation or pomp, asking for no honor and treating his fellow-man like an equal and a brother.

Is the pope meek and lowly? Does the pope live in humble manner without pomp or show? Does he ask for no honor? Does he treat his fellow-man like an equal? Not a bit of it. The pope of the Roman Catholic church claims to be infallible; he is surrounded with more pomp than any monarch on earth; he asks for honor and demands that all men shall acknowledge his right to rule them; he treats his fellow-man as a tyrant does a slave; he must be approached with the utmost obsequiousness, and he considers that he bestows a divine favor if he allows an individual to kiss his toe. What mockery for this man to pretend to represent him who said: "I am meek and lowly in heart." The pope demands that the whole world shall kneel to him.

There is another man who lives in Rome. He is the king of Italy. This man sits upon a throne, and the trappings of royalty become his station. We should expect him to be proud and haughty, to look upon his fellow-men as tools of power, and to demand that they pay him undue homage. But we read that "the other day at Spezia, as King Humbert was re-entering his hotel after a naval review, he was met by an individual, who, kneeling down, presented a petition. 'Why on your knees,' said his majesty reprovingly; 'don't you know that a man ought never to kneel to another man?'"

What a difference in the two men! The pope demanding that men kneel in his presence; the king raising a man from his knees, and telling him that one man should never kneel to another. What a noble lesson has the King taught the Pope!—Boston Investigator.

A PIOUS MOB.

Some very curious facts in connection with the recent lynching of young Robert Berrier for the murder of his mother-in-law near Lexington, N. C., have just come to light. A party who witnessed the hanging says Berrier was taken from jail at 7:30 o'clock and immediately carried to the outskirts of town under a large oak tree.

Here the mob stopped and asked the prisoner if he was ready to die. Berrier said he would be if he knew he would meet his wife and babe in heaven. The mob then informed him that he would be allowed time to prepare for death.

About this time a drummer who was in town came upon the scene and asked to be allowed to pray with the condemned man. His request was granted and he knelt down by the side of Berrier and prayed very fervently that God would save his soul.

During the prayer many hearty "amens" and such responses as "Lord grant it," "Jesus receive his spirit," etc., went up from the mob. For more than three hours prayers and regular religious exercises were conducted.

A few minutes before midnight Berrier expressed a willingness to die. He was placed upon a horse, with a rope around his neck and then, as an appropriate hymn was raised, the horse was led from under him and his body left dangling in the air.

POPE PIUS IX. AND THE MASONS.

According to an article recently published in a paper called the Craftsman, Pope Pius IX., the immediate predecessor of Leo XIII., was at one time a member of the Masonic fraternity, but was expelled from the order for perjury. Following is the article:

"At the semi-annual meeting of the Grand Lodge of Masons, Scottish Rite of the Orient of Palermo, Italy, on the 27th of March last, Pope Pius IX. was expelled from the order. The decree of expulsion was published in the official Masonic paper at Cologne, Germany, and was preceded by the minutes of the Lodge in which he was initiated, and is as follows:

"A man named Mastai Ferretti, who received the baptism of Freemasonry, and solemnly pledged his love and fellowship, and who afterwards was crowned pope and king, under the title of Pio Nono, has cursed his former brethren and excommunicated all members of the order of Freemasons. Therefore, said Mastai Ferretti is herewith, by decree of the Grand Lodge of the Orient, Palermo, expelled from the order for perjury."

"The charges against him were first preferred in his lodge at Palermo, in 1865, and notification and copy thereof sent to him, with request to attend the lodge for the purpose of answering the same. To this he made no reply, and, for divers reasons, the charges were not pressed until he urged the bishops of Brazil to act aggressively against the Freemasons. They then were pressed, and, after a regular trial, a decree of expulsion was entered and published, the same being signed by Victor Emmanuel, king of Italy, and grand master of the Orient of Italy.

PREMIER CRISPI AND THE POPE.

At a banquet given to Premier Crispi of Italy at Palermo Oct. 4, he made a lengthy speech, in which he declared that it was necessary to combat all persons, high or low, seeking to undermine the political edifice of Italy. The temporal power of the pope, although it had existed for centuries, had been only a transition period. Rome existed before it and could continue to exist without it. Complaints or threats, either from home or abroad, would have no effect. He declared unassailable the utterance of King Humbert that Rome forms an integral part of Italy, just as law forms a part of the modern world. After asserting that the pope possessed perfect religious liberty, and was only restricted, and less harshly than in other Catholic states, from encroaching upon the sphere of politics, Signor Crispi exclaimed, "Let the church, now free, endeavor to frighten Prometheus with the thunderbolts of heaven; our task is to fight in the cause of reason."

The Motion Prevails.

The editor of FREETHOUGHT suggests that five hundred friends of James H. Barry contribute one dollar each to make up his fine. Yea, verily, and very cheerfully.—Hayes Valley Advertiser.

Complaints are heard from all parts of Germany of the increased disfavor bestowed upon church attendance. Particularly is this the case in the large cities. Berlin, for instance, has a Protestant population of over 1,000,000. Yet for the accommodation of this immense number there are only forty-seven churches and twenty-seven chapels, having a total seating capacity of only 50,000. Even this is too much, however, and only a small portion of the seats are occupied each Sunday.

W. F. JAMIESON gave two addresses before the Des Moines, Iowa, Secular Society on Sunday, October 13, on "The Strength and Weakness of Liberalism" and "The Conflict between Religion and Science." Des Moines is Mr. Jamieson's present address.

He Never Knewed.

Old Billy B. was a pious man,
And heaven was his goal;
For, being a very saving man,
Of course he'd save his soul.
But even in this, he used to say,
"One can't too careful be;"
And he sang with a fervor unassumed,
"I'm glad Salvation's free."

But the "means of grace," he had to own,
Required good, hard-earned gold;
And he took ten pews, as well became
The richest of the fold.

"He's a noble man!" the preacher cried,
"Our Christian Brother B.,"
And Billy smiled as he sublet nine,
And got his own pew free!

In class meeting next, old Billy told
How Heaven had gracious been,
Yea, even back in the dark days when
He was a man of sin.

"I's buildin' a barn on my river farm—
All I then had," he said;
"I'd run out o' boards, an' was feeden hands
On nothin' but corn bread."

"I tell ye, bretherin, that I felt blue,
Short o' timber and cash,
And thought I'd died when the banks then bust,
And flooded all my mash.
But the Lord was merciful to me,
And sent right through the rift
The tide had made in the river banks
A lumber raft adrift."

"Plenty o' boards was there for the men,
And on top was a cheese,
And a bar'l o' pork as sound and sweet
As any one ever sees.
Then I had bread and meat for the men,
And they worked with a will,
While I thanked God who'd been good to me
And I'm a-doin' it still."

A shrill-voiced sister cried "Bless the Lord!"
The whole class cried "Amen!"
But a keen-eyed man looked at Billy B.
In thoughtful way, and then Asked, "Brother B., did you ever hear
Who lost that raft and load?"
And Billy wiped his eyes and said,
"Bretherin, I never knowed!"

Bayville Visitor—"I would like to get you to teach me to sail a boat." Boatman—"Sail a boat? Why, it's as easy as swimmin'." Jest grasp the main sheet with one hand, an' the tiller with the other, an' if a flaw strikes, ease up or bring 'er to, an' loose the halyards; but look out for the gaff an' boom, or the hull thing'll be in the water, an' ye'll be upst; but if the wind is steady y'r all right, onless y'r too slow in luffin to; 'cause then y'll be upst sure. Jump right in an' try it; but, remember, whatever ye do, don't jibe."

On the Sunday following the visit of Forepaugh's circus to Wichita, Kan., a clergyman in the pulpit solemnly drew his handkerchief from his pocket and with it came a handful of peanuts. He will be called upon to tell the deacons where he got the goobers.

"MARIA," said the pious husband, "them Smiths are allowing their children to play in the yard on Sunday. To-morrow I'll sic the dog on their chickens. The judgment of heaven must be visited on 'em some way."

A system of easily-comprehended rules and Chart by which any one can readily learn to cut Dresses, Basques, etc., in the most perfect manner. It contains the best ideas resulting from thirty years experience with Dress Charts and Tailor systems. It is adapted to the modern requirements of dress, and is used and indorsed by the best professional dressmakers of the East. It is as far superior to old methods as the steam car is to the stage. Price of the Chart, with full instructions, $10. By special arrangement we are able to offer the readers of FREETHOUGHT a liberal discount, for a short time. Write for particulars if you are at all interested in matters of household economy. This chart will save any family five times its cost in a single year.

Send 25 cents with bust and waist measure and number of inches from natural waist up as high as you wish the dress underneath the arm, for a sample pattern drafted to order, with full directions for making up, if you wish to test the system. To take the first measure correctly, place the tape above the bust, underneath the arms, and straight across the back, drawing it very tight. Write figures plainly. ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and under stand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

And they wint at it right and tight,
According to their nature.

O'Grady and meself stood near,
Expecting bloody murder.
Says he to me: "Let's intherfere;"
But I, pretending not to hear,
Moved off a little further.

"Lave off, ye brute," says he to Tim;
No man would sthrike a lady."
But both the Doolans turned on him,
And in a whisht the two av thim
Were walloping O'Grady.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

NEWS AND NOTES.

The Portland Convention was a happy success. Hundreds were present from all parts of the state, and the Liberals of Washington were generous in their attendance. It was an event for Liberalism, a representative assembly that in itself would mean much, but in its relation to future work it has a much grander significance. It is the beginning of many such mass meetings by which there will be a more active union among Liberals and greater work accomplished. The impulse and attraction of this convention will be for practical advancement. Through the state organization there will be more prosperous local efforts, and everywhere there will be increased enthusiasm. I have not attended any national convention where there were greater numbers or more interesting addresses. The influence will be felt throughout the whole country.

The addresses of Rabbi Bloch and Rev. A. T. Jones were remarkable, and show the comprehensive nature of the Secular platform. All just-minded American citizens, of whatever creed or religion, recognize the necessity of equal rights and impartial liberty. To make the government in any sense a minister of the church is to degrade all citizenship. Even the Christian himself consents to the surrender of his birthright.

The next convention will be vastly larger than this. All who were present look with hope to the future. Cheered by this auspicious meeting, with better acquaintance, the forward movement, gathering volume, will be more popular and powerful than ever.

On Tuesday evening, October 15, the Portland Secular Union was organized. There are many Liberals in the city, and now is the time for work and progress. I expect to see hundreds in this local union by the meeting of the next convention. I leave Portland friends and Oregon friends and Washington friends with greater hope than ever. I do not think there ever was so much promise of real attainment as now.

I shall lecture at a few more places before returning to California. The fire at Linkville has compelled the postponement of my lectures there, and also at Talent. I expect to visit these places early next summer.

After the convention, with its splendid incitements, I could not drop into a more genial place than Coburg, where labor is so pleasant that it becomes a kind of rest. I landed at Eugene expecting to lecture there Thursday and Friday evenings, but no arrangements were made. Eugene is a thriving place, with plenty of Liberals, but many do not see the necessity of agitation and improvement. If John Diamond had not been on hand to greet me I think I should have left Eugene somewhat disappointed, but he won't allow anything like discouragement to exist, being so willing to do his level best himself, and pay the bills too. He introduced me to Dr. Patterson, Judge Scott, and others, and it was determined to have a lecture in the courthouse on Sunday night. In the evening I met Mr. C. W. Snodgrass, one of our most active workers here, who, being once an earnest Christian, is now equally earnest in the cause of Freethought. Friday morning, E. P. Coleman comes in from Coburg, and I have good company to my field of labor for Saturday and Sunday. Again I am at the home where the big logs burn in the fireplace and the sparkling flames give greeting. As the sunshine comes and the clouds roll by, and we know not whether it will be fair weather or not, frontier life mingles its reminiscence with glowing hopes. John Diamond tells of his "squatter's claim" somewhere near the "celestial city" where he affixed his pilgrim's staff about forty years ago. I guess no one else has visited that claim. It is covered with snow all the year round, and is named Diamond's Butte upon the maps. From some parts of the valley it can be seen, rugged and glittering along the horizon.

I lectured on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon to good audiences. In the morning I went to meeting and listened to the Rev. Mathewson, a local preacher, who preached a pretty earnest sermon on Christian unity. As Mr. Mathewson is an Advent, and therefore something of a heretic, I find him rather liberal. He attended my lectures and said he was a Freethinker.

Senator Coleman has been having quite a battle on the religion-in-the-schools question since I was here. The teacher, a young man from Brownsville, seemed to have an idea that he had a mission to subdue Infidelity by prayers and Bible-reading in the school, and introduced them without asking permission. Mr. Coleman, being school director, instantly objected, and the board passed a resolution that there should be no such services. A petition was circulated to call a public meeting in order that the decision of the school-board might be reversed. It was found, however, that in order to do so the constitution of the state would have to be overthrown, and the Christians wisely decided that it would not be best to enter upon any such crusade, and so Mr. Coleman was master of the field, and the Bible exercises are a thing of the past. According to the laws of the state of Oregon, if any of the patrons of the school objects, religious services must be omitted. It would be well if all Liberals without fear of public opinion would see that in every district this law of the state is respected.

When I was here before the landscapes were shrouded in smoke and I could not see their beauty, which was revealed to me in the bright shining of the October sun. Beautiful mountain views stretch away; the wooded valley and shining fields and pasture lands; the dim, snowy heights occasionally seen; the vast timber belt, and the winding, dashing river amid bending groves—these make variable pictures in the clear and gorgeous atmosphere. Morning glitters to noon, and noon melts to golden twilight and resplendent evening. Happy the days pass here with friends to whom Freethought is the religion of humanity. Around this sparkling fireside, with our generous hosts, Mr. and Mrs. Coleman, gather other noble friends, Mr. and Mrs. John Long, P. J. Blakiston, John Cochran, and the midnight hour catches us awake with the feast of reason and the flow of soul, for coming together only about once a year there are many things to talk about "while the great world spins forever down the ringing grooves of change."

Sunday afternoon John Cochran, with Blakiston and Coleman, drove me over to Eugene, and I find the court-house pretty well filled for the evening lecture. Eugene is a land of somewhat uncertain promise. The material is rich, but the crystallizing process is slow. I hope to return and find more favorable opportunity for work. I am especially under obligations to Judge Scott and C. W. Snodgrass for their generous support. I believe the lecture given and the interest aroused will result in more unity and action among the many Freethinkers here.

Blakiston becomes our hospitable host after the lecture hour, and the appetite is sharpened with jest and flashing thought; and then I say good-bye to these brave soldiers who have been so cordial in their aid, so ready for service and companionship. One can easily bear the brunt of battle when around the campfires gather such animating friends.

Monday morning the iron horse takes me from Eugene to Shedd, where friend Arnold meets me, and after dinner we go over to Brownsville. The morning was brilliant, but in the afternoon the clouds darken, and it is pouring when we drive up to the hotel at Brownsville, which is quite a village scattered along the winding valley. The woolen mills here do quite an extensive work. There are seven churches here, I understand, and orthodoxy has quite a sway; but there are a few Freethinkers, and they don't propose to go the wall. John Cushman has held on to the battle for many a year, and Mr. Rockwell is also of the veteran host. B. S. Martin is a young school-teacher, but he and his brothers are not afraid to say what they think. So the seven churches will not have it all their own way in this little burg. The rain held up a little while in the evening and there was a fair audience in the city hall to listen to the lecture on "Freethought and Civilization." I shall return to Brownsville again, for without doubt the seeds of heresy are growing and the harvest will come. The first man I met on my arrival here was John Diamond, who had come down from Coburg on the early morning train. He was bound to see me through this campaign. He is almost eighty years of age, but the spirit of youth has not deserted him yet. He looks forward and believes in the "good time coming," and means to reach his one-hundredth birthday.

I missed one pleasure on this trip which I hope to make up another time, and that was a visit to the ranch of John Long, where the sheep wander and the coyotes flee away. There are no truer friends to our cause and to anything that is for humanity's sake than Mr. and Mrs. John Long. They both possess rare intelligence with devotion to the high ideals of life. With such friends a day's companionship is an inspiration indeed. Early Tuesday morning Arnold and myself, behind the flying team, while the clouds roll off and the sunshine glitters, are en route to Shedd; and from there I pursue my way to Newport, one of the finest summer resorts on the Oregon shore.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

THE CONSTITUTION OF NEW MEXICO.

The late constitutional convention in the territory of New Mexico has resulted in the production of a document which as to length would easily fill twenty-five columns of FREETHOUGHT, being about twice as long as the Constitution of the United States. It contains full instructions for the members of the executive, judicial, and legislative departments of the government, and provides for elections, apportionments, education, land grants, taxation, incorporations, mining and water rights, and a long chapter of miscellaneous matters. The constitution is on the whole a good one, but, like all documents of the kind, it is not free from defects, for it contains some concessions to the religious world which might have been omitted to advantage.

The preamble, for instance, declares that the people of New Mexico are "grateful to Divine Providence for the liberties they enjoy;" whereas such liberties are referable to an entirely different source, having been attained by a prolonged conflict with the powers claiming to be ordained by this same Divine Providence. American independence should be accredited to the fathers of the republic, the most prominent of whom were Infidels.

Again (Art. XI., sec. 10), the proposed constitution provides that "lots with the buildings thereon, when such buildings are used solely for religious worship," shall be exempt from taxation. Here we have the old evil against which all Secularists protest—the exemption of ecclesiastical property from its just share of the burdens of the state. This same constitution declares that "public money shall never be used or appropriated for the aid or support of any institution not under the absolute control of the state;" yet to exempt church property from taxation is exactly equivalent to appropriating to it the amount of money drawn by taxation from other property of equal value. For that reason Article XI., Section 10, should be amended or stricken out before the new constitution is accepted by the people.

In Article II., Section 26, provision is made for the observance of Sunday, in these words:

"The natural right of the people to one day of rest in seven is hereby acknowledged."

We are not here to deny to anybody the right to "one day of rest in seven." On the contrary, we would uphold the right of every person to seven days of rest in seven; and we also contend that the right to work every day of the week should be held inviolable. Section 26 of Article II. should therefore be expunged. It will breed only dissension and religious persecution.

Another section of the second article is well-meant, but it ought not to be necessary in a land where religious liberty is acknowledged. It reads:

"Sec. 14. The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference is hereby guaranteed, and no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness or juror on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief."

It seems, however, that the framers of the section felt it needful to hedge slightly, for they introduce this saving clause:

"But the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not excuse acts of licentiousness or justify polygamous practices or other acts inconsistent with morality or the peace or safety of the state, nor permit any person, organization, or association, directly or indirectly, to aid or abet, counsel, or advise, any person to commit bigamy or polygamy, or any other crime. Bigamy and polygamy are forever prohibited."

That is to say, the free exercise and enjoyment of all religious professions except Mormonism is guaranteed. The Romanist may advocate the supremacy of the papal encyclical over the constitution; the National Reformer may declare that governments do not derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and endeavor to "change that feature of our fundamental law;" but the family affairs of the Latter Day Saints will be regulated by statute. Another clause might have been added to this effect: "But the restrictions here placed upon Mormons shall not interfere with the liberty of any man to have two or more wives, provided that he be married to only one and support none of them." But the question here arises, why should the framers of the New Mexico constitution associate religious freedom with polygamy? The "polygs" are not Free Religionists, but have always belonged in the ranks of the church, from David up to Joseph Smith.

The same article goes on to say:

"Sec. 16. Liberty of speech or of the press shall not be restrained, but for the abuse of such liberty every person shall be responsible."

Since the courts are thus left to decide what is and what is not an abuse of the liberty of speech or of the press, this section amounts to a suggestion and nothing more.

We have seen that in section 14 of Article II., practices or acts "inconsistent with the safety of the state" are prohibited, but another section provides that "No person shall be required to serve in the militia whose religious creed or discipline prohibits the bearing of arms."

It is true that "such person shall render an equivalent for such exemption," but must church property render an equivalent for its exemption; may Mormons indulge in polygamy for an equivalent; or do not the framers of the constitution accept the conclusion of the national document that "a well-regulated militia is necessary to the security of a free state?" If those whose creed or discipline prohibits the bearing of arms must render an equivalent in order to be exempt from military duty, why should not untaxed property render an equivalent in some form? Is the property of the church more sacred than its members? If not, then it is unfair to exempt the property and demand service (or its equivalent) of the member. Wood and stone should pay their tribute to the state, as well as flesh and blood.

On the question of Woman Suffrage this constitution is silent, dismissing the subject thus: "The qualifications of voters shall be ascertained and declared by law." Schools are to be "free from sectarian or church control;" and "no funds donated or falling to the state for educational purposes shall ever be applied toward the maintenance, support, or aid of any school or other institution in the management of which any religious or other sect has any part, or which is not under the absolute control of the state"—a most admirable provision, and declared irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of New Mexico.

It will be seen, then, that the spirit of the constitution of New Mexico is in favor of religious liberty, the only restriction it contains being placed upon the Mormons, who are prohibited from polygamy, a crying evil certainly, though paralleled by the "social evil" in large cities, pastoral privileges in the Protestant church, and the confessional in the Catholic sanctuary.

PROPOSED STATE ORGANIZATION IN WASHINGTON.

It was decided at the Portland Convention that an interstate Secular Union, including Oregon and Washington, would be unadvisable, although recommended and discussed, somewhat, previous to the Convention. The Liberals of Washington are therefore moving to organize separately, and a circular has been sent out by the Walla Walla Society with the object of securing the opinion of the Liberals of the state regarding the feasibility of such an undertaking. To further this end, the Wall Walla friends recommend that a State Convention be called at Seattle, on or about the Paine anniversary, January 29, 1890. All Liberals of Washington are solicited to advise and co-operate, addressing their communications and contributions to Dr. A. W. Calder, Secretary Liberal Club, box 696, Walla Walla.

Pending organization, the circular above referred to calls attention to the necessity of immediate effort. The legislature of Washington meets November 6, and there is every reason to anticipate that the church organizations will combine with private institutions to secure exemption of their property from taxation, and to gain other ecclesiastical privileges. It is therefore recommended that Liberals in all parts of the state write at once to their representatives at Olympia, urging them to oppose all such schemes. The Walla Walla Liberals have taken the initiative in the matter, and have provided forms of letters, to be copied by voters and forwarded to members of the legislature. The work of the Washington Liberals is thus made plain and easy. They should communicate at once with Dr. Calder, and receive in return copies of the letters for legislative use; write Dr. Calder what they can do toward making the proposed convention a success, and send him the names of all Liberal-minded persons in their vicinity.

THE POPE MUST GO.

Ernest Renan, the great French Freethinker, has recently been interviewed on the subject of the relations between the pope and the Italian government. Touching the exodus of pope and papal college from Rome he said: "I consider the ultimate departure of the pope inevitable. I believe the status quo will be maintained as long as possible. It is only natural that this important step should be delayed. The cardinals are conscious that their course in leaving Rome will be construed in anything but a favorable light by the enemies of the church. Their hesitation is quite excusable. I for one believe the abandonment of the Eternal City will be the signal for the breaking up of the hold which the papacy has upon the Roman Catholic world, and that the certain result would be a springing up of schisms in the church. Italy will not indorse the idea of receiving directions from a pope dwelling abroad, and the fealty of the Italians will soon weaken and die out when the supreme pontiff is no longer one of themselves and the old traditions of the Vatican have ceased to be a present fact. Italian Romanists will in this predicament, sooner or later, elect an Italian pope, a resident in Italy and one of their own people, and then would come a great catastrophe, for, following the example of Italy, every Roman Catholic country would want its own pope and the church would be split into many factions. The local national divisions might be followed by others based on doctrinal or administrative differences and the tremendous discipline of the Romish church would be a thing of the past."

Great weight is attached to this opinion of M. Renan, and it is regarded as a logical deduction from the speech of Premier Crispi, reference to which was made in last week's FREETHOUGHT. The government is uncompromising, and the pope will not yield in his demand for the political sovereignty of Rome. As a consequence, the latter must find refuge in some Catholic monarchy like Spain or Portugal.

FE, FI, FO, FUM.

A bell designed for a Catholic steeple in this city was "blessed" last Sunday in St. Peter's church. It was christened Paul, and bears this inscription:

"Gaudere cum gaudentibus, Et flere cum flerentibus,"

which means, we presume,

Exult with those who celebrate,
And howl with those who lachrymate.

The ceremony of consecrating this new disturber of public harmony is thus described by the Chronicle:

"Fathers Sasia, the celebrant, Brennan and Casey, the master of ceremonies, assisted by Fathers Vereker, Lynch, Cummins, O'Grady, and Breslin, formed a circle around the bell, which was hung on supports just inside the altar rails. They sprinkled it with consecrated water, specially blessed for the occasion. Prayers were read by the officiating priests. During the services the organ and choir rendered selections from Gounod, Hearn, and Verdi. At the end the bell was anointed with chrism, was struck three times, and formally christened."

The spectacle of a gang of priests cavorting around a piece of metal, mumbling their mummeries and performing their superstitious incantations, must have been highly edifying to the intelligent body of naturalized citizens who witnessed the exhibition.

BRADLAUGH.

Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, the English leader of Freethought, is now reported out of danger, though an attack of congestion of the lungs gave him what in this country is known as a close call, and his recovery is assured. Nowhere will this intelligence be more gratefully received than among Mr. Bradlaugh's many admirers in America.

THE following story from the Savannah News may not be a true one, but it serves to illustrate what a farce are the Bible-oaths taken in our courts:

Does it matter what kind of a book people kiss when magistrates swear them? If it does then a magistrate in a district in this county has gone beyond the bonds of law. Witnesses in his court have been swearing for a considerable time by a mutilated Latin dictionary.

"Some time ago," the justice said, "I borrowed a Latin dictionary, and it was just about the size of my Bible and looked for the world like it. The back was torn and mutilated and the edges were red. The dictionary, as I thought, finally disappeared and could not be found. I kept swearing witnesses right along with the Bible, I thought, when in fact it was nothing but the dictionary."

"How did I find it out? Why, the other day, just as I wound up a big case and was rendering my decision, the book fell out of my lap, open. There it was as plain as day, the old dictionary."

"Did you suspend the trial?"

"Suspend nothing. I just went right along as if it were a Bible sure enough. Nobody, you may be sure, in that office knew what I found but myself."

THE triennial pastoral letter of the church, read before the Episcopal Convention at New York, set forth that while the church does not undertake the warfare of a partisan, "it would leave an important duty undone if it did not exercise a care for the political as well as the ecclesiastical welfare of the state." We would like to know what the church has to do with the state, either politically or ecclesiastically. The professed mission of the church is to save souls; but the state has no soul, and never was designed to have a soul, any more than a corporation or a policeman's club. Can it be that the Episcopalians consider the state immortal, and that when governments die out on earth they are transplanted to heaven, there to live forever with the patriarchies of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob? If not, if the state is not immortal, how can the church be concerned in its spiritual welfare?

Ex-MAYOR AMES of Minneapolis has offended the pope's minions in that city, and is in receipt of the following letter:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., October 19.

A. AMES, Sir: By attacking the Irish Catholics I think you have done yourself a great deal of harm, not only as a politician, but the first you know of is that you will meet with the same fate as Dr. Cronin. You know that the Irish people will not stand such abuse without revenge, and the best you can do is to leave the city at once and go to some other part of the world. You have insulted not only the Irish, but the Holy Catholic Church and its priests, who are working hard in Ireland trying to help the people along. It is a well-known fact that the Irish are superior to any other class of emigrants coming to this country, not only as church members, but in everything, and in knowing this ourselves, we feel that you and Rev. Morrill and others of such stamp ought to be brought out of existence for your lying statements. Go out of the city at once.

AN IRISHMAN, CATHOLIC, AND A CLAN-NA-GAEL.

OUR oldest subscribers will bear us out in saying that FREETHOUGHT is not given to "blowing its own horn," but we feel like calling attention to the merits of this issue. Read it over carefully. There are several splendid contributions, any of which it would be unfair to mention without naming them all. We endeavor to get out a paper that is a credit to the cause, and the testimony of hundreds shows that success is crowning our efforts in that direction. Leaving out its literary excellence, there is not a neater looking paper published on the coast. Why, then, should not every reader and every subscriber use his best influence, as many are doing, to extend its circulation? There is a large field for such a paper. Friends all around, will you not make an effort to find at least one new subscriber?

A WEALTHY Englishwoman named Synge is in this country as a missionary. Her fanaticism takes the form of an endeavor to work up a religious boom among letter-carriers and messenger boys. She has succeeded in interesting Mrs. Harrison and Postmaster-General Wanamaker in her work. The latter consented to address one of her meetings in Washington a few nights ago. Just before the meeting Miss Synge went to the Western Union office and cabled her friends in London to pray for her and her work. "I really think the operator thought I was a lunatic," said Miss Synge afterwards. The operator may not have been far out of the way.

LAST spring the minister of education in Japan was assassinated by a religious fanatic because he was a Freethinker. A little later the opposers of Count Goto desired to massacre him because he accepted a public office, and only last week the foreign ambassador narrowly escaped assassination, having been shot at, and receiving a wound in the leg which necessitated amputation. These crimes, in each instance were committed by parties called conservatives in politics and religion.

THE trial of E. C. Walker and the Harmans, or Valley Falls, Kansas, which was set down for October 15, has been once more continued. This, we understand, is directly contrary to the wishes of the defendants, who, if they are to suffer fine or imprisonment, desire to have it settled and over with. But it does not seem to be the intention of the prosecution to bring the case to trial on its merits. They seem to prefer that the Messrs. Harman and Walker should be continually harassed by suspense and worry, and put to hundreds of dollars' expense, so that, guilty or innocent, they cannot escape punishment. It is a despicable business, this whole prosecution, and it ought to be thrown out of court and the records burned.

A GENTLEMAN residing in Southern California has read FREETHOUGHT for nearly a year, and, being a gift subscriber, it hasn't cost him a cent. Upon finding the paper will not be sent any longer free, he orders it discontinued, though he admits he has "been reading it to please a friend." A long series of sarcastic remarks might be made upon this method of pleasing a friend up to the point where the payment of four cents per week comes in, and then repudiating the sacrifice; but we will let the friend make them.

In one of the disreputable cases which crowd the court calendars and court rooms of San Francisco, the other day, the counsel for a wealthy young rake, subpoenaed as a witness and held in contempt for not appearing, contended that the subpoena was defective on account of its having been issued on Sunday. The judge had the good sense to decide that the point was not well taken, and that subpoenas could be legally issued on Sunday as well as any other day.

A SENSATION has been created at the National Temperance Congress, at London, by the disclosure that shares in a recently launched brewery are held by clergy of the English church. The buyers include the archbishop, two bishops, three deans, four archdeacons and six canons. There has been a strong bond of sympathy between the English church and breweries ever since Saint Guinness, the brewer, spent a million dollars to restore a cathedral.

An appeal for deliverance from earthquakes has been added to the Litany of the Episcopal church. This will not increase the height of buildings in San Francisco or other localities subject to quakes, and we do not believe it will do for this coast at all. For the devotee to have the ceiling drop on his head while repeating his litany against earthquakes would diminish, rather than strengthen, his faith in the efficacy of the incantation.

MR. FRED LUCE, a Los Angeles Liberal worker, has come to San Francisco and gone into business. He has taken the right course by at once inserting his card in FREETHOUGHT. We would be glad to have all our friends doing business in the city follow his example. They can help one another and the paper. Our advertising rates are low, and will be furnished to all inquirers.

MR. CHOYNSKI, editor of Public Opinion, seconds our motion that the friends of Mr. James Barry contribute one dollar each, to the number of five hundred, and pay the fine imposed for the exercise of free speech which has been construed into contempt of court.

READERS who recognize a good thing when they see it will take pleasure in perusing the story by ex-Sheriff A. W. Poole, which we begin this week.

PROF. GEO. H. DAWES, of North Yamhill, Or., will answer calls to lecture as soon as his school closes, which will be in March. Engagements will be made in advance, and the route marked out ahead for the sake of economy in traveling expenses.

"ROMAN Catholicism," says the Argonaut, "is not as rapidly increasing as Infidelity and Independentism, even in Roman Catholic circles." That is good news, and important if true.

OBSERVATIONS.

The hall was full at the last Sunday night's meeting of the San Francisco Freethought Society. Vice-President Eastman presided.

The address was by Hon. F. B. Perkins, on "Slavery and Freedom." The speaker said that there was a good deal of slavery even in California. We had many deities, the great high god being the American dollar. Then there were many organized tyrannies. We suffer from the tyranny of political bosses, of corporations, of railroads, of land grabbers, and so forth. Both production and distribution are controlled by monopolies and trusts. The telegraph unions and the Associated Press are tyrannies, and even our courts set themselves up as despots and censors of speech and press. Then there is the religious tyranny, the worst of all. It is the abettor of all other tyrannies, and instead of helping mankind to attain freedom, it warns us to obey our masters, to resist not evil; and offers us in the next world an eternal reward for having been cringing cowards in this.

The lecturer spoke for a full hour, rapidly and interestingly, and as usual covered a vast amount of ground, giving the listener much to think about as well as much to remember.

At the close of Mr. Perkins's address Mr. Thomas Curtis arose to a question of privilege. He stated that Dr. Anderson, in a late paper read before the society, had cited Professor Holden, of the Lick Observatory, as authority for the assertion that the law of gravitation was inoperative as regards the motion of some of the nebulae. Mr. Curtis had at the time denied Dr. Anderson's statement on his own responsibility, and had since written to Professor Holden and received a reply, which he read. Professor Holden corroborated Mr. Curtis and repudiated the conclusion attributed to him by Dr. Anderson.

Mr. W. S. Bell, upon invitation of the Chair, spoke briefly. He had a word to say about a free platform, which he did not regard as a success, having seen it tried in Boston and Chicago. Many promising societies had been howled out of existence by irresponsible cranks who cared for nothing but to hear themselves talk, while everybody else wanted them to keep quiet. As to the lecture of the evening, Mr. Bell pronounced it above criticism.

Colonel Knight arose to deprecate the popular custom of studying the law of Moses to the neglect of a proper understanding of the United States Constitution. He did not agree that there was any except voluntary slavery in this country. It was true that he was a slave of circumstances, and there was a woman at his house who to some extent curtailed his absolute liberty; but any man who should set himself up as a master would be violently opposed.

At a business meeting subsequently held, it was decided to discontinue the regular meetings of the society until January, the design being to give speakers and contributors a vacation and time to recuperate. In January it is intended to hold a state convention, to close with a grand celebration of Paine's birthday on the 29th. This adjournment is not had from any sense of failure or lack of interest in the society, the last month's meetings having been as well attended and supported as those of any previous month, but simply for the reason above stated, with the added one that rainy evenings are likely to prevail during November and December.

One of the members of the Freethought Society, Mr. J. L. Hatch, was sworn into the service of the United States last week. He has been appointed to an office in the custom-house with a salary of a hundred and fifty dollars per month attached. I am happy to see Mr. Hatch thus rewarded, but I am sorry he did not recommend me to the place he has just vacated—that of religious editor of the Chronicle. From what I know of him I am prepared to affirm that I have as much faith, piety, and reverential calm as he can boast of; and as these are the qualities which the religious editor needs, I hereby advertise myself as an applicant for the above position.

The longer I live the firmer becomes my conviction that no intellect, however great, is free from liability to weaken. When I got acquainted with Prof. H. Miller, of Berkeley; when I heard him speak eloquent words before our local society; when I read his manuscript, or assisted the compositor to do so, and when I published his articles as editorials, without credit, I believed I had discovered a man who could be trusted with access to our columns. I am always careful about inviting contributions, because most men, after doing a few good things in prose, generally drop into poetry, and there is where they fall down. To shorten this tale of woe, Professor Miller has surrendered to the enemy and written a poem. It refers to Dr. Anderson's lecture on Theosophy, and is appended:

GOD LOCALIZED BY THE TELESCOPE.

My friend, Dr. A., as he talked, t'other night,
Of science, religion, and that,
Said he'd found out the place where the world did begin,
Where dwells the Almighty Fiat.

Gravitation its source from this place does derive (So declared the doctor, cock-sure!)
'Tis a spot in the sky where that law is not felt:
O Sir Isaac! you should have been truer.

While I sat all agape and awaited with awe
Revelation of this dread abode,
Where lives the Almighty, when he's most at home,
Whence all things have started and "grewed,"

The authorities fell on my skeptical head,
With a weight that has crushed me quite flat;
'Twas revealed in a vision to Blavatsky the Seer,
Theosophy's prophetess pat;

Who Karmas and Layas, Mahatmas, and such,
Other Sanskrit cognomens and roots—
As from one who knows well the ineffable much,
We expect—pours forth as it suits.

And her vision unerring has been lately confirmed
By an astronomer gazing aloft;
Through a big telescope, California's pride,
He has seen the world's core, which is soft.

I can't tell you the place, but if you should wish
The Almighty in heaven to see,
Why, just drop a postal to Holden,
Director observatory.

Alas, alas! 'tis come to pass, that one who once was great, in my esteem, dispels the dream, and spoils the estimate.

Another man whom I have always confided in, and for whom I still retain sufficient hope to withhold his name, takes the downward path as follows:

Sing a song of sixpence, a Prohibition crank,
Addle-headed idiot, thin about the flank;
When the polls are open, vote her straight for dry,
Isn't it a funny thing to hear the party sigh?
Fanatic in amazement sees the cranky votes
Pious sentimentalist takin' of the notes;
God nor man nor the devil cannot teach the party,
And so, bull-headed as they be, let's dub each one "Old Smarty."

I do not object to this method of confuting the arguments of the Prohibitionists. The writer lives in Southern California, where moisture is a necessity, and it is better that the guilty publican escape than that the cause of irrigation should perish in the last ditch. I am no prohibitionist, but when it comes to an issue between the pro's and con's on the question of poetry, I go with the prose.

I met Judge W. D. Sawyer the other day near the corner of Washington and Montgomery streets, and in talking over the drift of business away from that aged quarter of the city he referred to the proposed removal of the post-office to some place east of Market street. The judge did not see any necessity for expending a big lot of money for a new site. "The whole scheme," said he, "is gotten up for the purpose of selling land of nominal value at a fabulous price to the United States government; and the more the owners of the land get for the site the less the people will get for a post-office building. There is always this sort of jobbery when Uncle Sam asks the opportunity to provide for the wants of commercial communities in the way of federal improvements. I would like to have some one state an objection to the continued use of the present post-office site as long as San Francisco lasts. It is near all the ferry landings, which receive the bulk of San Francisco's mail matter. It has more square feet that can be used for improvements than the city will need for centuries to come. This site belongs already to the United States, and structures can be extended upon it forty or fifty feet in two directions—to within ten feet of Washington street, and to within ten feet of Battery street. If necessary, the forty-foot driveway from Washington to Jackson street between the post-office and the Appraiser's building can be arched over, and then for post-office and custom house San Francisco will have all the room necessary. Retaining the present site, the liberal allowance of Congress could be used in the construction of a building that would not only be an ornament to the city, but all that is desired for federal purposes."

There seems to me to be weight in these words. Our post-office building stands on one corner of a site nearly large enough to accommodate the post-office of New York. The lawns and shrubbery and iron fence around it, and its broad avenues of approach, affording stands for candy merchants, ornamental card-writers, and traffickers in cement for repairing glass and crockery ware, are in no sense necessary to federal purposes. Besides, nearly all the printing presses in the city are within five minutes' walk of it, and newspapers are much more readily dispatched than they could be if they had to be carried two or three miles up Market street in an express wagon.

I received a written invitation last week from the Union Iron Works, saying that the pleasure of my company was requested, Saturday, October 26, to witness the launch of the U. S. cruiser San Francisco, which invitation I was directed to present at the gate of the Potrero. It was raining hard on Saturday, but rather than disappoint the Hon. Irving M. Scott I thought it best to go. Doubtless if Mr. Scott had known how muddy the last mile and a half of road was between here and his Potrero, he would have sent a carriage for me. I will not endeavor to work upon the reader's sympathies by saying anything about that last mile and a half of unfathomable mud, that men, women, children, and a flock of sheep were wallowing through. The rain fell in large wet globules, which coursed back and forth beneath the forerim of my hat, like the bubble in a carpenter's level. Progress was made by putting one foot forward of the other, then extracting the rear foot with a loud and mournful "sough" from the embrace of the mud behind, plunging it into the mud ahead, and then proceeding as before. A half hour of this exercise brought me to the Potrero gate, inside which a superior depth of mud was noticeable.

The cruiser San Francisco stood inside a frame-work at the edge of the water. She was ornamented with the flags of all nations, including that of the country in which we reside. These various emblems looked as if they had been put through the wash together, and hung on the cruiser's rail to soak. The San Francisco had her stern toward the bay and her bow far inland, which at first created the impression that she had crawled ashore to get out of the wet, but I learned upon inquiry that such was not the case. The rain still fell. A wet band played "Nancy Lee, ye ho," and when the artist who usually makes the most noise beat his bass drum, the effect was similar to striking a bag of meal with a soft club. The man with cymbals had his own way, interrupted only by the subterranean gurgles of the bass horn and other rain-water receptacles. Around about, many hundred people stood beneath umbrellas gazing earnestly at the umbrellas of other hundreds just in front of them. Tugs and steamers filled the bay and exposed their passengers to the wet.

A policeman who, I judge, owns the Potrero, occupied the only position where a good view of the launch could be obtained, and I engaged him in conversation. We spoke of the excessive rain, which, he averred, "beat the deck." I suggested that an awning stretched above the deck would prevent the rain from beating it so violently as to take the paint off; and while he pondered the above I passed him by an adroit sneak and stood within the stocks alongside the San Francisco. I observed that two long and sloping pieces of timber, profusely greased, and resting upon the floor of the stocks, ran from near her bow to the water's edge, one on each side. Upon these greased and sloping timbers rested a sort of cradle, and in the cradle, but not resting upon it, was the ship, supported by blocks underneath her keel. These blocks a lot of men were working up into kindling wood by means of mallets and wedges. When the last one had been nearly removed, there was a moment's rest; then a stalwart man hit the block a swinging blow with a sledge hammer that knocked it from under the ship. The San Francisco settled into the cradle; the timbers that held the cradle in place were knocked away; the greased ways received the weight of the vessel, which rode slowly and majestically down them into the sea. As she moved there was a crash of glass near the bow, and a shower of champagne sprinkled the planks below. When the vessel left the stocks a man standing near the water's edge jumped upon the ways which she had passed over, and, waving his hat, essayed to give the first cheer for the San Francisco. He never gave it. The grease on the timbers got in its work again and launched him as it had launched the ship. He sat down in the water, which surged up under his armpits; and when all the people hurraed, and the band struck up, and a cannon was fired, and a hundred steam whistles tooted in honor of the San Francisco's launch, he pulled himself on solid ground, and said they were all making a hell of a fuss over a little accident that affected no one but himself.

A channel had been dredged, reaching perhaps a quarter of a mile from the stocks. The momentum of the San Francisco carried her the length of this channel, and then she stuck in the mud, there to stay till high tide and more dredging permitted her to be docked.

It stilled rained hard, but the people stood and watched the new cruiser as she rested in the mud. The Hon. Mr. Scott was present, and with a rubber coat on and a wet hat resding down peacefully upon his ears he did not look the distinguished person that he really is. I should not have picked him out of a crowd for the patron of an Academy of Sciences, and a man who could talk off hand on the subject of the solar parallax and the radius vector. Nevertheless, Mr. Scott has been known to do so several times without experiencing fatigue.

When finished, and paid for, the new cruiser will belong to the United States, and be used as a yacht for government officers. She will be provided with side arms, a crew, a physician, a chaplain, and a locker where spirits for medicinal purposes may be stored; and adopted sons of the sea, who do not know a marlin spike from a garboard strake, will walk her decks and squirt tobacco juice over her rail to windward.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

The widow of the late Charles Crocker, railroad millionaire, died of apoplexy in this city, last Sunday afternoon.—The Rev. J. Saunders, of the Trinity Episcopal church in Newark, N. J., having quarreled with his flock, will take charge of a San Francisco church.—A seven-days' bicycle tournament in this city last week was won by a woman, who rode 884 miles.—The adopted daughter and heiress of Collis P. Huntington has married a scapegrace foreign prince named Hatzfeldt.—President Harrison has not yet issued his proclamation admitting the four new states, and the officers-elect are getting impatient.—The Rev. Dr. Winkler, of Oakland, after being missing for a week, turned up last Saturday and explained his absence by saying he was thrown from a horse, receiving serious injuries, and had been cared for by a friend. Mrs. Winkler is skeptical as regards the truth of her husband's statement.

Vicar-General Preston, a Catholic functionary in New York, has made a ruling which prevents the interment in the Calvary Cemetery of the body of one of Dr. McGlynn's most earnest workers, Theresa Kelly, on the ground that she attended McGlynn meetings since her last absolution.—Two prominent men of Butte, Mont., committed suicide last week on account of losses at faro.—Twelve jurors have been secured in the Cronin murder case at Chicago, and the trial is dragging slowly along.—A movement is being made in parts of Vermont to resettle abandoned localities with Swedes and other foreigners. Many once-valuable farms are now for sale at from $3 to $5 an acre, together with buildings.—The private bank of the Rev. J. W. Powell at Fostoria, O., has failed.—It is said that 20,000 families in North Dakota and 1000 in South Dakota are suffering for the necessities of life.—The first conviction under the Kansas prohibitory law for the sale of hard cider was secured in the district court at Topeka last Monday.

Germany will probably pass more stringent laws against the Socialists, and confer greater inquisitorial powers on the police.—Measures looking to the placing of surveillance over the press as touching the criticism of public officers are to be pressed upon the French Chamber of Deputies at its next convention.—A special train with 500 French Catholic pilgrims returning from Rome to Paris Oct. 25 came in collision with a goods train. Many passengers were injured, none fatally. The engineer on the pilgrim train was instantly killed. One of the guards was fatally injured.

BRADLAUGH AN HONEST POLITICIAN.

A member of Parliament, in a cablegram to the Press, dated October 26, speaks thus of Charles Bradlaugh:

I am far enough from agreeing with many of the opinions on social and religious questions held by Bradlaugh, but as a politician I do not believe there is a more upright or a more conscientious man alive to-day. I have often seen him take up a course which was directly opposed to his own interests, but I have never seen him do any underhand or unfair thing. His word is absolutely to be trusted, and he will take no part in discreditable tactics of parliamentary obstruction or mean intrigue.

More than once I have known him to incur great unpopularity with his party by himself adhering honestly to an understanding he had made with the government on some detail of business. He cannot be cajoled or bullied into doing what he believes to be a dishonorable or even an unfair act. He is perfectly candid, straightforward, and above board in all his transactions. Of how many leading men in Parliament whose pretensions and standing are much greater than Bradlaugh's could as much as this be truthfully said? I should be sorry to have to reckon them up. I have served on committees with Bradlaugh and have never failed to remark not only the great acuteness he displays in sifting facts, but the immense industry he has brought to bear upon the investigation of any subject to which he addresses himself.

That is one secret of his success with the House of Commons. He rarely speaks without having thoroughly mastered the question at issue or wastes the time of the House. Thus it has come to pass that many who had a bitter prejudice against him on account of some passages in his career which did not look well from the outside, at any rate now have genuine respect for his character as well as for his abilities. Did any man ever effect such a change in the feeling of the House of Commons toward himself? A few years ago Bradlaugh was hustled ignominiously out of it, seized by a policeman, dragged through the hall, and bundled neck and crop into the street. Now he is always sure of a good audience, and the cheers that greet him come quite as much from the Conservative benches as from those of the Liberal side.

There is no fairer body in the world than the House of Commons. It will listen to any man who has anything genuine to say and who does not trifle with it. If it did not listen to Bradlaugh sooner it was partly because he threw himself headlong against the stream and rashly set it at defiance. There were misunderstandings on all sides, but Bradlaugh has lived them down, and I venture to express the hope that a long and useful career still lies before him.

SECULARISM AND ITS OBJECTS.*

A Secularist, as the name indicates, is one who believes thoroughly in this world—believes in his age, his generation; one whose highest object is to realize "the greatest good to the greatest number," here, now. In view of the accumulated evidence offered in the history of the race, which is the history of man's efforts to overcome the difficulties of living, the struggle to conquer peace and establish justice—in other words, to attain a science of social relationship—the Secularist recognizes that natural and reasonable methods are the only ones through which the interests of men may be still further unified and advanced. He affirms that it is the duty of a citizen of the world's republic to make precedents, as well as follow them.

With the Positivist, he sees that what men have wrought and left is the immortality of the race, that it is the good men do which lives after them and becomes, as our own Longfellow said, "a light on the paths of men." Not only the splendid legacy of literature, poetry, and biography, but also the history, in part, of what wrecked governments and destroyed nations. And he proposes to put that heritage to practical use, as well by carefully avoiding its mistakes as in cherishing its truths and virtues. "One world at a time" is his motto, truth and justice his cause, happiness his goal.

Armed, equipped, and enthused with this avowal of principles, the Secularist finds himself at once confronted, under an avowedly representative government, with most flagrant abuses of public confidence; a prostitution of the people's rights and means to monarchically-descended institutions whose sole idea of authority, outside of and above man makes them at all times and in all places the enemy of free men; the granting of special privileges to special believers, whose tenets not only do not propose the happiness and good of all men, but in many cases the direct opposite, and taxing either directly or indirectly the public for their support, as in church and other ecclesiastical property, which is actually supported by government, since it is protected without paying any share of revenue for such protection, and to the detriment and injury of those whose property adjoins, who are thus compelled to pay double tribute-revenue to "Uncle Sam" and tithes and offerings to Jehovah; or again, paying a priest to intone prayers for a congress of citizens whose election to that place is upon the well-known and oft-repeated proposition that under this government citizens are the sole source of authority, wisdom, and power; appointing chaplains to the army and navy, whose business is war, as illustrating the mission of "peace on earth, good will toward men;" and once more, constrained to pay for Christian services in prisons in order to secure celestial passports for the wretched inmates to a practically unknown kingdom when, with all the ecclesiastical machinery of Christendom, claiming to be the conservator of public morals, unhindered and untaxed, they have failed to provide a better earthly abode than the iron sides of a cell, a larger gleam of sunshine than comes between prison bars. We believe that to tax these ecclesiastical institutions, whose value under our government has doubled every ten years, increasing more than twice as fast as our population, and apply that tax to the relief of our virtually outcast population—our thousands of homeless, friendless children—giving to them the accessories of a useful life—home, food, education—is much more practical and moral, for morality is largely a question of cleanliness, of food, of proper hygienic conditions, than to pay for prayers after the criminal is graduated from the streets to the prison, prayers to the unknown gods to forgive what we produce, wreck, and refuse either to reclaim or pardon.

Thoughtful men and women have become aware that the last court of appeal for humanity is where reason sits supreme; that the most binding obligation of civilized society is man's integrity and moral consciousness of right. Upon that civilized society rests to-day. Without it, it would cease to exist, and they have come to look with abhorrence and repudiation at the nauseating practice of touching human lips to and swearing by the authority of a book which, as the word of a god, was virtually repudiated by the Christians themselves when they revised it, and as a history of man's effort to solve his relationship to the universe, is so incorrect and incomplete that it is contradicted on almost every page by the books men have made, which we put into our children's hands at school whereby to develop intelligence, character and self-poise, the foundation of good citizenship. The Secularist believes that an affirmation resting on character is better than an oath resting on belief, and he affirms that man's highest need creates society's highest law, and to him the spectacle of a civilization which not only has caused the "desert to bloom as the rose," but has scattered the lilies of commerce, the white sails of our ships, over all the seas; which out of man's labor—theology's curse—has made luxury possible to the lowliest, has crowned plenty with freedom; that, in spite of priest and deity, has placed man at the summit of intelligence and power; a civilization so broad and fraternal that it has become the refuge of the religious believer driven from his own country by the legitimate fruit of his creed, religious intolerance; the spectacle of that civilization allowing such alien to become a menace to the liberty of opinion, a dictator to the government which shelters him, is both shameful and humiliating.

As Secularists, we repudiate as an encroachment upon our secular rights the attempt to fix our holidays by a pagan calendar; we repudiate as a violation of our secular constitution Constantine and his day of the sun, which Christians have palmed off upon the world as the Sabbath, and which they are now industriously working to amend upon our secular constitution, to the effect that the civilization of the nineteenth century shall legally and under penalties do reverence to the semi-civilization of the time which permitted the murderer of his own son to pose as one of the "Lord's specially anointed." We affirm that the people who have achieved free institutions are the joint guardians of such results as their own intelligence and labor have accomplished; that to the wage worker and the brain worker alike our libraries, our art galleries, our museums, our parks, should be free and open, with no other restriction laid against them than such as economy of time and health suggests; that to these belongs the right to dictate their own holidays, and that they are no more bound to observe as sacred days set apart to pagan deities than they are to observe as national holidays the birthdays of kings and emperors.

The Secularist sees with alarm that ecclesiastical bodies, made bold by privileges already granted under a government "not in any sense founded upon the Christian religion," as Washington said, propose now to take actual possession of such. Our government and schools are both declared to be "godless," and as such must be theologically inoculated. A trinity of experts—the National Reform Association, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and the Sabbath Observance Society—move with one accord to put "God" into our constitution, the Christian religion into our schools, and Constantine's "sun day" into legal force. They propose, as Jonathan Edwards, D.D., said at a meeting of the National Reform Association at Philadelphia in 1873, that "this government shall be a Christian government, and none but the man who has accepted heaven by the way of the cross shall have a vote." They propose to so amend the constitution under the Blair bill "that each state in the union shall establish and maintain a system of free public schools . . . in which shall be taught the common branches of knowledge, virtue, morality, and the principles of the Christian religion," "and the United States shall guarantee to every state the support and maintenance of such a system of schools as herein provided." And they propose to destroy personal liberty by fastening upon us legally under the guise of religious worship, under pains and penalties, one of the fete days of the pagan world.

Romanism has grown so arrogant that it dares from the ground of refuge insult publicly the memory of a man who, as a victim of the intense hatred of ecclesiasticism for everything progressive, served to show the world the way to freedom; a man whose devotion to truth was greater than his fear of death—Bruno—whose memory the whole civilized and enlightened world met this year to honor and crown on the very ground where he sealed his devotion to humanity and the cause of liberty by becoming a victim of that church, from whose altar, merciless and pitiless, Cardinal Gibbons once more denounces him.

*An address by Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel delivered before the convention of the Oregon State Secular Union at Portland, Oct. 12.

We believe that our free public schools are the fairest flower of personal freedom, that the fruit which follows the flower—intelligent citizenship—is the only possible ground upon which to build and perpetuate free institutions. We accept the ecclesiastical definition of both our educational and political creed. They are "godless," and we propose to keep them so. We believe with Robert G. Ingersoll that one of the grandest achievements of man was when he retired the gods from active participation in both the educational and political affairs of men.

SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.*

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN, FELLOW-CITIZENS: You were no doubt taken by surprise at the announcement that a rabbi consented to address you, and I am surprised to find myself in such good company—so much so that the question might well present itself, What, is Saul also amongst the prophets? I will answer you by saying that in the interpretation of the word "prophet"—in Hebrew "nabi"—I consider you or any man who feels himself honestly inspired to promote the welfare of his fellow-men a God's messenger, and if you stand united in the promotion of that humanity which is determined to grant and to secure freedom to all, I recognize in you the prophets of a great future. And speaking of the prophets of old, permit me to call your attention to the historical fact that all of these from Moses to Samuel, and from Samuel to Malachi, all were the strongest advocates of the separation of church and state, and opposed to a priestcraft or caste that would override the power of a free government. I have, therefore, the right to apply to you this mission, and with this understanding I agree to speak to you of the most paramount duty of every true citizen of our great and blessed commonwealth.

When your worthy president requested my humble services, I first hesitated to consent, principally for two reasons. Politically, I hold that no preacher should meddle with politics. There is enough work for all of them within the precincts of their churches and the pulpit, and as good citizens they ought to know the first duty, viz: the separation of church and state. The second scruple I found in the heading of your periodical, FREETHOUGHT, which to weak minds has a dangerous intimation, but to every serious thinker can it be aught but a challenge to think right and act right. In the declaration of your political principles I found clearly stated, I fully agree, and I do hold that it is the only platform upon which we can safely agree and must unite for the defense of the liberty of our land. That there are dangers ahead and attempts made to override it is known to everybody, and yet the greater danger is that we treat too lightly these vandalisms of our sacred institutions. The tiny snowflake drops but gently upon the snowpeaks of the high Alps, but as it falls its weight is sufficient to move the snowball, which in its descent multiplies its volume until as an avalanche it hurls death and destruction into the valleys beneath. The evil power which might be often checked in its conception by one individual opposition will require an army to be conquered or subdued.

A passing review of ancient history and a single glance over modern records will suffice to convince any man of the danger of a concentrated power, and none more dangerous than when priestcraft wields the ruling scepter. The warning of the prophets remained unheeded, and Judea was led away captive into exile, and only when freed of its priestcraft could Judaism rise again from the ashes of a temple which their priests had polluted. Greece had to see her beautiful arts mouldering in the shrines of demoralized priests; and both ancient and modern Rome had a priestcraft which, grasping the reins of government, made the seven-hilled city ring with the cries of the martyrs who sealed their lives with the cry for truth and liberty. Only a few days ago modern Rome reared a monument in memory of Bruno, the champion who dared to raise his voice against a degenerated priestcraft. And what wealth would be capable of erecting monuments for all those who fell victims to the bloody sword of the crusaders and the infamous Inquisition! These two causes were sufficient to stop the chariot of freedom for centuries and to check the advance of humanity, with the ills still lingering like an incurable disease in our advanced age, in the intolerance of creeds and in the fanaticism of sects these hollow echoes from the dark ages. Compare only the high civilization of Spain when the Moors excelled in science and art, with the national decay that followed its conquest by Ferdinand and Isabella, the helpless rulers ruled by Grand Inquisitors. Education and learning disappeared with the rise of priestcraft, and those proud colleges, once filled by the intelligence of the world, were turned into torture chambers, where the priest delighted in the contortions of dislocated limbs, torn muscles, and strained nerves—all for the glory of the church. Priest-ridden Spain is still a warning example to all who would chain the state to the church, while all Europe is slowly but surely trying, like Italy, to redeem itself. Socialism and Anarchy are possible only in Russia, where the emperor wears a pope's tiara—the very type of tyranny.

Already we must keenly observe that this virgin soil of our great republic is endangered to be invaded by these foreign thoughts, by selfish manipulators, who have nothing to lose and everything to win. The attempts of a religious coloring of the constitution, the multiplication of holidays, the Sunday-law, etc., are but the beginning of the tearing down of the fort of liberty, a plea of hypocrisy calculated to gradually bring church and state closer together. You have organized for the purpose of exposing these dangers, and, if need be, to defend your liberties by word and deed. To begin with, I believe we must first and foremost direct the attention of this world to our free schools. They must remain what they were intended for—the training-schools of the future citizen. Religion is able to take care of itself without the aid of government, and we have enough of good churches, eloquent pulpits, and Sunday-schools to attend to the spiritual wants and the morals of the people, and we can glory indeed in the best of all religious teachers—the mother of her children. The public schools being a part and portion of our great and free institutions, it must need be free of any and all sectarianism. If the Bible must be read in the public school, the question must be asked, What Bible—the Vulgate, the Septuagint, Luther's translation, the English, or the revised version? Every sect or creed has a right to select its favorite, and the Infidel to insist upon his own views. Who shall read the Bible? The Catholic church insists the priest only, and I say reading the Bible without interpretation is robbing the children of valuable time, and leaving it to the respective teacher his or her explanation must be sectarian, especially if we remember that in many cases that teacher was elected through church influences, and the school board are generally the pillars of the church. I have experienced the effect. Shortly after the war I was called to Arkansas to take charge of a congregation. There was no school of any kind in the place, and I volunteered to teach. I succeeded in establishing a non-sectarian school, but as soon as placed in charge of the trustees, notwithstanding my protests, they insisted that of course the studies must begin with the reading from the Bible. A young fellow about 21 years of age, who could not even master the A B C, I noticed would invariably turn about as soon as I commenced reading, until I questioned the reason of his ill conduct, when he frankly replied, "Well, sir, I do not believe in the Jewish Bible; I believe in the Methodist Bible." Being told that I should like to see once such a copy, he returned the next morning convinced that the Methodist Bible was a fiction in his mind. The truth is that prejudices are thus engendered, and the children instead of learning that in union there is strength are early trained to conceive differences. Ever since my arrival in Portland five years ago I have exerted my little influence to accomplish this reformation, and, thanks to our high-minded fellow-citizen and the truest friend which our public schools have, Mr. John Wilson, the Bible is no longer read; but sectarian prayer is still lingering.

Let us persevere in our watchfulness against any and all innovations directed against our freedom of thought and conscience; and should we sooner or later prevail and succeed, let us, on the other hand, not plunge into another extreme. Claiming the right of freedom and the protection of our liberty, we must not withhold it from others, and Liberalism, like any other ism, is apt to grow into fanaticism pregnant with the evil spirit of intolerance.

*An address delivered by Rabbi J. Bloch, of Portland, before the Secular Convention.

THE SHERIFF'S STORY.

A NARRATIVE OF ADVENTURE, IN THREE CHAPTERS, ILLUSTRATING THE INFLUENCE OF THE CHURCH IN RESTRAINING CRIME.

CHAPTER I.

Old residents of Providence, R. I., will remember the excitement prevailing in that city about thirty years ago, caused by burglaries of frequent occurrence during a period of several months that effectually baffled the vigilance of police and detectives. The writer, then a boy of seventeen, was visiting some relatives, a family residing there, who were among the sufferers. Their house had been entered a short time prior to my visit and a considerable amount of jewelry and silver plate stolen, one of the articles being a large ewer, or pitcher, that had been in the family several generations and prized beyond its intrinsic value. I had seen it during a former visit and admired its massive beauty. The family consisted of a widow and her two daughters. Their only servant, Mary, a bright, good-looking Irish girl, had, by her industry and correct deportment, won their confidence and esteem. She was found the morning after the burglary by the old lady, who went to call her thinking she had overslept, near her bedroom door bound, gagged, and apparently unconscious. Her story, when revived, was that she was awakened by a light rap at her door, which, presuming her services were required by some member of the family, she opened, and was instantly seized by two men, who demanded that she should show them where the valuables were kept; that she refused and attempted to escape and alarm the household, but was overpowered and fainted from fright. A brother of the widow was sheriff of the county, and he offered a reward of one hundred dollars for the recovery of the pitcher, and an additional sum for the detection of the burglars. The robbery was almost the sole topic of conversation. I was an eager listener. Mary, however, was not inclined to talk about it, invariably becoming hysterical whenever I asked her any questions. The old lady, hearing me ask her to describe the men, reproved me sharply, intimating that it was very presuming in one of my years to meddle with matters of such importance.

An old negro known as Uncle Pete occasionally came to the house to saw wood and bring in coal. He was formerly a slave, but had bought his own and his wife's freedom, migrated north, and was living in his own house on Nigger alley. He had learned to read and write to a limited extent, was shrewd, industrious, and respectful, but an object of great aversion to Mary, who invariably spoke of him as the "ould nagur." One day, as he was at work in the back yard, I said to him,

"Uncle Pete, I don't believe Mary's story of the burglary; do you?"

"Hush, chile," said he; "don't talk too loud. You's a cute youngster, but be careful. Come over to my house to-night and I'll tell you something."

I could hardly wait for darkness, so impatient was I to learn what Uncle Pete had to communicate.

In answer to my knock that night he opened the door and invited me in. There was no light in the room, and he cautioned me to speak softly. "You's right, chile, about that gal," said he; "she's a devil, and the old lady thinks she's a saint; she goes out one night, sometimes two, every week; tells the old lady she takes care of her sick aunt. She hain't got no aunt. She meets a big Irishman down by the cove and goes with him to the priest's house, Father Flannigan. I speck he's the priest's brother—looks like him—and they's the ones that's doing all this devilment. It's truth I'se telling you, chile, but I can't do nothing; the old lady wouldn't believe anything agin Mary; the sheriff wouldn't pay no 'tention to a nigger, and the d—d Irishers would murder me sure if I should made any fuss. You's a boy, but right sharp, and maybe you can find out something, but you must be mighty careful."

Uncle Pete's opinion was that the big Irishman, the priest's brother, as he suspected from their resemblance, was the active member of the gang; that information was in some way obtained by Mary as to the situation of the residence to be plundered, for the burglaries were confined entirely to private residences. The booty, he suspected, was taken to the house of Father Flannigan, who made frequent trips to New York for the probable purpose of disposing of their plunder.

He drew a rough diagram of the house, told me how to gain access to the back yard, and that from the roof of a shed that I could easily climb I could see into the dining-room and possibly obtain some evidence that would lead to their conviction. Of course this could only be done at night, and I laid my plans accordingly. Acting upon Uncle Pete's suggestion, I managed to find out during the day what evening Mary was to go out, and watched on the opposite side of the street for her. The streets being dimly lighted, I could follow her unobserved. She met a man at a distance of several blocks and went with him to the priest's house. I followed, keeping as near as I thought prudent. As soon as I heard the door close I went around to the rear of the house through an alley, climbed a high board fence inclosing the garden, in which the shrubbery grew thick, and got on the roof described by Uncle Pete by the aid of a convenient tree. The window blinds were closed, but through the openings I could get a partial view of the room. I could hear the voices of two men and occasionally distinguish a word. After apparently agreeing upon some plan, one of the men in a louder tone said, "Well, I'm d—d dry, haven't had a drink to-day." The other walked across the room to a sideboard, which he unlocked, and taking out the silver pitcher, that I instantly recognized, said, "Here, Mike, take a drink out of this; it'll taste good." I heard Mary make some remark, at which they all laughed heartily. After a drink all around the pitcher was returned to the sideboard, the door locked, and Mary and the big Irishman went out, the priest remaining. They were out of sight by the time I got down from the roof and out on the street.

It was late the next morning when Mary reached home. She told a sad story of the suffering of her aunt and her own fatigue. During the day we learned that another burglary had been committed. I ascertained that Father Flannigan's duties at the chapel occupied his time one and sometimes two evenings in the week. So, making such preparations as I thought necessary, I watched until I saw him come out of his house. I followed him a short distance to make sure he was on his way to church, then, as I knew he would not be long absent, returned, and again climbing on the roof tried to open the window with a chisel I had brought. Failing in this, I explored further and found the cellar door was not securely fastened, and soon effected an entrance. I had taken the precaution to bring a candle, which I lighted, found the kitchen door and the stairs leading to the dining-room. The sideboard was locked, but I easily pried it open with my chisel. The pitcher was there, about half filled with some sort of liquor, the exact kind of which I was at that time ignorant, but information subsequently acquired leads me to believe to have been a choice article of brandy. A drink that I imprudently took of it nearly strangled me, causing me to drop my candle, which was extinguished. I failed to find it, and, grasping my prize, endeavored to find the door in the darkness. While groping and stumbling against the furniture, I heard the street door open and voices in the hall. The parties must have been in haste to reach the sideboard, for before I could effect my escape the door was opened and Father Flannigan, with a lamp in his hand, and the "big Irishman" entered. For an instant we gazed at each other, then, dashing the contents of the pitcher in the priest's face, I sprang for the door, but in the darkness I had got on the wrong side of the room; they were nearer to it than I, and intercepted me. Of course it was an unequal contest and I was soon overpowered. I remember, however, with infinite gratification of getting a finger of the priest between my teeth and gnawing with the energy of desperation. His howls of pain, and ejaculations more fervent than pious, were the last of my recollection. I was beaten to insensibility. When I regained consciousness I was suffering intense pain and shivering with cold. My hands and feet were tied, and I knew by the mouldy atmosphere that I was in a cellar. After a while I succeeded in loosening the cords with which I was bound, and on looking around saw faint rays of light that I found came through the partly open door that I had gotten in at. Cautiously I crept out and, as speedily as my bruised limbs would permit, left those premises.—(To be Continued.)

A. W. POOLE.

SECTARIANISM AMONG THE GOOD TEMPLARS.

The Good Templars of Seattle, Wash., are all torn up over the question of religion, and the controversy threatens to disrupt the order. An attempt is being made to drive out all the members who do not believe in the God of the Bible, as defined by the stricter members, and many members in Seattle, as well as in other parts of the country, are about to resign rather than submit to sectarian domination.

The controversy began with a change in the qualifications for membership, so that they read, "the supreme ruler of the universe," instead of "a supreme ruler of the universe."

In his report to the right worthy grand lodge of the world last summer, Mr. Turnbull, right worthy chief templar of the world, defined this to mean God as defined in the Bible, and being a Presbyterian, he ruled that this definition meant the trinity. Thus all but trinitarian Christians were barred out.

This report was adopted, and thus became the law of the order. The decision was transmitted from the universal body to the right worthy grand lodge of the United States, and also to the grand lodge of Washington. That body met at Chautauqua last August, and, although Grand Chief Templar Bushell recommended that the rule be not enforced, he was overruled, and instructed to transmit Mr. Turnbull's rulings to the subordinate lodges to be acted on. This was accordingly done.

A printed circular from the right worthy grand lodge of the world came before Pacific Lodge, No. 94, of Seattle last week, and it was ordered that all members who could not comply with the religious requirements of Mr. Turnbull should resign, and to expel all who declined to do so.

A hot discussion followed, many members who could not comply with the rule, conscientiously, objecting to such a severe test, and contending that a religious test was inconsistent with the objects of the order.

No action was reached on the matter, as the consideration of it was deferred to a future meeting, but members declared openly in the meeting, and now declare publicly, that they will withdraw rather than submit to any religious test. Although Grand Worthy Chief Templar Bushell is a liberal and comes under the ban, he urges subordinate lodges to comply with the law.

The new law is of far-reaching effect, for in Christian countries it shuts out all Unitarians, Agnostics, and Atheists. As many members of the proscribed sects in the United States are closely wedded to the original principle of good-templarism, abstinence from intoxicating liquors, there is a strong feeling in favor of breaking away from the parent order rather than have the movement crippled by the sectarian test.

The Rev. Justin D. Fulton in England.

Dr. Fulton, an American, has recently given, at Brighton, under the auspices of the local branches of the Protestant Alliance, some lectures on Ritualism and Rome, which, for vigor of language, were remarkable. The Rev. J. G. Gregory, incumbent of Emmanuel church, presided at the Dome meetings, and the Sussex Daily News publishes a strongly-worded remonstrance which the bishop of Chichester has addressed to the reverend gentleman, in which he hauls the poor parson over the coals for his tolerance, and rebukes him for not defending the virgin mother from the lecturer's attacks, pointing out that Dr. Fulton "in attacking, and I must say vilifying, the Virgin Mary, did, in fact, attack the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ as holy scripture presents it. The whole scheme of man's redemption rests on the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of that incarnation, the greatest of all mysteries, the Virgin Mary was the pure and holy channel. God sent forth his son made of a woman, but that woman, according to prophesy, a virgin. The Word was made flesh, but in a new and strange way in the womb of the Virgin Mary by the operation of the Holy Ghost." The bishop calls upon his subordinate to publicly repudiate and condemn the sentiments uttered by the irreverent lecturer.—National Reformer.

THE Freethinkers' Magazine for November, Mr. H. L. Green announces, will be an extraordinary good one. A portion of the contents will be as follows: "Giordano Bruno," by Robert G. Ingersoll; "Why was Bruno Murdered?" by Geo. Jacob Holyoake; "The Source of Economic Law," by Prof. Thomas Davidson; "Only one World after all!—that Infinite," by T. B. Wakeman; "The Bruno Celebration and the Papal Allocution," by Edward Montgomery, M. D.; "How to be Good though Godless," by Hugh O. Pentecost; "Giordano Bruno," a poem by Emma Rood Tuttle; also a fine "Likeness and Life Sketch" of John E. Remsburg, and much other interesting matter. Price, 20 cents. For sale at the FREETHOUGHT office.

Mrs. Krekel at McMinville.

To the Editors of Freethought:

As vice-president of the A. S. U., I feel it is due to one of my own sex to speak a good word for Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, who has lately delivered three fine lectures here in this place. As I am not accustomed to writing notices of this kind, I fear I cannot do her justice, but will say I have often heard the remark that women make the best school-teachers for the reason that they have the faculty of explaining more distinctly to the young minds so they can easily comprehend the meaning of the thing explained. Thus in regard to the lecture she explained her points so wisely that the young could comprehend her meaning very easily. As my seventeen-year-old daughter remarks, I wish I could speak as well as Mrs. Krekel. Her audience was not large, but appreciative. I think if she should come here again it would be much larger. I am sure there are many here who would be very glad to have her come again, and hope she will be so remunerated for her labor of love for humanity that she can well afford to spend her whole time in the lecture field.

Yes, I admit that Mr. S. P. Putnam has done a great work in breaking the ice and paving the way for others who might come after, and I hope he will reap a rich reward; also Secretary Stevens. We cannot give him up, he has done so much for the Nine Demands; and now comes our Brother Geo. H. Dawes, who, we feel, will be sufficient for his day. May he be the means of reviving the milk-and-water Liberals here.

Faternally yours,

MRS. M. J. OLDS.

"Freethought" Needed in Local Affairs.

To the Editors of Freethought:

It is my good fortune to be possessed of a couple of numbers of FREETHOUGHT, which have, at the instance of one of its admirers, been cast in my way, as "seed scattered by the wayside."

I must say its writers are both descriptive and interesting and must put in all their time to make so readable a sheet with what would appear at first a limited field for labor. But as "to the patient in waiting all things come in season," a publication so fairly presented, opened to the expression of the honest convictions of all, cannot fail to find readers and subscribers that, in the end, will bring a just reward.

Freethought—the mother of free speech, the result of intelligent thinking and expression—is a magic word and tends to develop minds of the character of those who were the signers of the charter of American liberty—the Declaration of Independence. In whatever direction free and noble thought develops itself the tendency is to the enlightening and benefiting of all classes and races of people, and when a newspaper or publication furnishes the avenue for the promulgation of free and independent ideas it is capable of a power of good.

Go on with your work and prosper in your effort in trying to do good. He who labors day by day with all his might to do good, deserves and, in the end, will see his good labors meet with their just reward.

There is much of good that you can do, with your sprightly pen, in local matters. I hope to see you bend your energies in that way. S.

The Discussion of the Terry Case Continued.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Your correspondent in FREETHOUGHT under date of October 12, over the signature of "J. C. P.," regards my reply to Mr. Freeman as "eminently proper and correct in the main," but seems to think that I made "several glaring mistakes," and invites some one who has the records of the facts to correct the mistakes.

I had Terry's trial before the vigilance committee printed in pamphlet form containing something like one hundred pages or more, giving the history of the whole affair, confirming all I said in regard to Terry's trial. Perhaps I may be able to find that pamphlet among my papers at Knight's Ferry, where I resided at the time, on my return. As "J. C. P." calls for additional information from one who may have the records, I am content to await developments.

Mr. Knight's article deserves a more extended notice. He informs your readers that he is well and thoroughly acquainted with all the circumstances of the Sarah Althea Hill-Sharon trial, and particularly with Sarah Althea; much better than I could be, or should permit myself to be, however respectable and amiable she may be in the estimation of Mr. Knight. I may therefore have done her injustice. If I have it is unintentional.

Mr. Knight also seems to be of the opinion that my letter is true in the "main," but that it does not leave the readers of FREETHOUGHT well informed in the case, which would be unpardonable in me if true; and undertakes to inform them wherein I have failed.

As to Terry, he admits that I have shot near the mark, except as to the "animus" which I have thrown into my words. I do not see in what respect "animus" impairs the truth of a statement. I admit, with Mr. Knight, that I am no admirer of Terry, nor have I great respect for the virtues and amiable qualities of Sarah Althea, as Mr. Knight seems to have.

By way of prelude to his efforts to enlighten the readers of FREETHOUGHT, he tells them he is a "Republican to the core." Did he expect to reinforce and emphasize what he was going to say, by that expression?—for he speaks with confidence and assurance after that. "We know Sarah Althea Terry," he says. "We challenge the state" [think of that, readers of FREETHOUGHT] "to deny one word we have to say. We make no exception. Schell, if he pleases; the heirs or attorneys of Sharon, if they like; the judges Field, Hoffman, Sawyer, Deady, Sabin, each and all." To have perfected the challenge and made it a little more comprehensive, he should have added: WE "challenge all the world and the rest of mankind." This is ground and lofty tumbling. None but a "Republican to the core" could have made such an exhibition of himself. Would it not have been eminently proper and perhaps interesting to the readers of FREETHOUGHT, if he had told them what constituted a "Republican to the core?" Do Republicans with a core excel in any particular virtue? People usually excise the core from fruit when they use it, as no good. If the core is no good, and it were eliminated from Mr. Knight, would it not restore him to the condition of a normal Republican, and bring him from his "high soaring down?"

In the eulogy which he essays to deliver upon the much abused and persecuted Sarah Althea Terry, he says: "She came to San Francisco a young American woman of education, means, of passable beauty of face and form, [modest] and with nothing to indicate vice either in manner or deportment." But she brought a suit against Sharon for a divorce, alimony, and a division of community property, and to prove her marriage she introduced a secret contract of marriage which the court declared to be a forgery. The trial of the case was a disgrace to civilization, the magnitude of unmitigated perjuries during the trial was appalling, the lies sworn to were more numerous than the sands on the sea shore. The citizens of San Francisco were struck with "horror dumb," and paralyzed with amazement at the boldness, wickedness, and audacity of her attorneys, and at the close of each day's trial, excitedly asked, "What next?" Terry volunteered his services in the fight on the side of the woman, and the bullet that failed to hit him on the confederate field of battle, killed him. The troubles incident to the case hastened the death of Sharon, and Neagle's bullet killed Terry.

She may have been an amiable woman, and was one of courage, no doubt, for she pulled Judge Sawyer's hair in the case. She grossly insulted the court in San Francisco, for which she was incarcerated thirty days in prison. She ran for her pistol with which to aid her husband in his attempts to assassinate Field at Lathrop; and because Field objected to being thus assassinated, and Neagle, who seconded the objection in a decisive manner, she sent up a wail, that a cold-blooded murder had been committed.

Mr. Knight further says; "If she is a bad woman, Nature lies." Here is a question of veracity involved between Nature and Mr. Knight. I will not assume the province to determine the question. I leave it to the readers of FREETHOUGHT to determine.

Mr. Knight further asks the question: "May the United States courts appoint and pay an assassin to lay a trap for, and kill a bold, bad man?" The question is put in such a manner as to answer itself that they did. "If so, who is safe?"

The question is easily answered; all who are not bold, bad men, are safe. It would be a god-send to mankind if more bold, bad men were killed.

Mr. Knight goes on to say: "Thomas Paine was called a bold bad man." Not in the sense Terry was. "So is Robert G. Ingersoll." Not in the sense Terry was. "So is the Editor of FREETHOUGHT;" not in the sense Terry was by a "d——n sight." Pardon my profanity; it is a borrowed expression, and I trust in this case pardonable.

I beg to remind Mr. Knight that there is great difference between a bold, bad man such as he admits Terry was, and being called such, as he says Paine, Ingersoll, Putnam & Macdonald were.

To bedraggle the names of such men by associating them with the name of Terry for the purpose of illustrating a point, will not be approved, I apprehend, by the readers of FREETHOUGHT, who hold those names in esteem. Mr. Knight made a mistake in this particular, I think.

Mr. Knight virtually and impliedly accuses the United States court of appointing and paying an assassin to lay a trap for killing a bold, bad man—Terry. Why does not Mr. Knight enlighten the readers of FREETHOUGHT upon the points so pertinent to these questions and the truth of what he says! And he makes no exception to the charges and challenges which he utters; even "Schell, if he pleases." Well, Schell pleases. His charges, either directly or indirectly, by implication or otherwise, that the United States court had appointed and paid an assassin to lay a trap and kill a bold bad man (Terry), are without the least foundation in truth or in fact, and his accusations fall flat without the least evidence to sustain them.

Did Field or Neagle hunt for Terry at Lathrop; or seek a fight or row with him? How and in what manner did Field or Neagle or both set a trap? Both were sitting quietly at the table eating their supper when Terry and wife came into the dining-room. Neither of them even made faces at the Terrys. When they saw Field, without a word, Mrs. Terry ran in hot haste for her pistol which she had left in the car, and Terry rushed for Field and committed a brutal and unprovoked assault upon him. Pray, Mr. Knight, where does the Field-Neagle trap come in? Where or how commence? There was a trap there! But it was a Terry trap. Terry was to assault Field, get into a row with him, while Mrs. Terry, with the pistol she got in a hurry, was to shoot Field in defense of her husband. This was the trap. Every circumstance shows that it was.

But, Mr. Knight, fate had decreed that it should be otherwise. The sun of David S. Terry had set; his destiny was fulfilled; "thus far shalt thou go and no farther." Government at Washington had heard of the threats which Terry made against Field, and Attorney-General Miller appointed Neagle a United States marshal to protect the person of Judge Field in case Terry attempted to carry out his threats. And this constituted the trap and plan of assassination of Terry. It was well known that Terry was a desperate man; that in power, strength, and physical ability he was more than a match for three men like Field, and the only way to equalize brute force was the pistol. It could not reasonably be expected, under the circumstances, that Neagle would split hairs before he fired. And the general opinion is, as far as I can learn, that he did not fire a second too soon.

In England, a man who threw a brick at the judge who had decided a case against him had his right hand cut off and then was decapitated.

Mr. Knight, the truth is, a supreme crisis had arisen; the important question of survival must be decided. Either David S. Terry or the circuit court of the United States of America for the state of California must be abolished. Terry was abolished; and there the matter rests, and there let it rest. This communication determines the discussion so far as I am concerned.

A system of easily-comprehended rules and Chart by which any one can readily learn to cut Dresses, Basques, etc., in the most perfect manner. It contains the best ideas resulting from thirty years experience with Dress Charts and Tailor systems. It is adapted to the modern requirements of dress, and is used and indorsed by the best professional dressmakers of the East. It is as far superior to old methods as the steam car is to the stage. Price of the Chart, with full instructions, $10. By special arrangement we are able to offer the readers of FREETHOUGHT a liberal discount, for a short time. Write for particulars if you are at all interested in matters of household economy. This chart will save any family five times its cost in a single year.

Send 25 cents with bust and waist measure and number of inches from natural waist up as high as you wish the dress underneath the arm, for a sample pattern drafted to order, with full directions for making up, if you wish to test the system. To take the first measure correctly, place the tape above the bust, underneath the arms, and straight across the back, drawing it very tight. Write figures plainly. The Secret.

I have heard a fearful secret;
To the Shah I will not tell it;
I will hide it from my sweetheart,
From my merry, dear companions,
When they ask.

This it is: The clod I trample
Was the skull of Alexander,
And the waters of the ocean
In the veins of haughty princes
Once ran red.

And the dust clouds of the desert
Were the lips of lovely women;
Where are they, and they who kissed them?
Power dies, and beauty passes—
Naught abides.

Where is Jamshyd, and his beaker?
Solomon, and where his mirror?
Which of all the wise professors
Knows when Kaus and Jamshyd flourished—
Who can tell?

They were mighty, yet they vanished;
Names are all they left behind them;
Glory first, and then an echo;
Then the very echo hushes—
All is still.

Oh, my Shah, ask not my secret!
Sweetheart, I must hide it from you.
They who hear it are not merry:
Power dies, and beauty passes—
Naught abides.

—W. R. Thayer in Atlantic Monthly.

Fair Warning was Given.

Mrs. Gadd—Oh, Mr. Shrill, stop a moment; I want to speak to you. Have you been home since morning?

Mr. Shrill—No.

"Heard anything?"

"Why, no. What do you mean?"

"Oh, I can't be the first to tell you of it; indeed, I can't. The neighbors are sayin' that your wife and Mr. Hansom have eloped."

"Well, well! It's his own fault. I warned him to keep away from her."

In a Bad Way.

Fannie (who is engaged to Charles)—Charles, don't you remember you said that you would buy me the first real handsome ring you saw? Here in this window is a regular beauty.

Charles—Y-e-s; I haven't got my pocketbook in these pants, and they are the only pair I've got.

Fond Wife—"What are you so busy at?"
Young Physician—"I am writing a letter to the newspapers abusing Dr. Blank, the great scientist." "But Dr. Blank has never done you any harm, and you agreed with his theories." "True; but it's against the rule for physicians to advertise, and I must get myself before the public somehow."

LAWYER—Do you swear positively, sir, that you know more than half this jury?
Witness—Yes, sir; and now that I have taken a good look at 'em, I'll swear that I know more than all of 'em—put together.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and understand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

Ladies and Women.

The saleslady shines in a silken attire,
The price of scant comfort and long-hoarded hire;

The chambermaid lady in garments of white
And ribbons of scarlet appeals to the sight;
The bluest of plumes the cook lady shows,
And fills up the sidewalk wherever she goes;
And even the wash lady proudly steps by
In velveteen ruffles that startle the eye,
While the woman they wait upon goes about town

In a plain little, brown little tailor-made gown.

Ten years ago, Mr. Toole, the English comedian, while passing through Stratford-on-Avon, saw a rustic sitting on a fence. "That's Shakespeare's house, isn't it?" he asked, pointing to the building. "Yes." "Ever been there?" "No." "How long has he been dead?" "Don't know." "What did he do?" "Don't know." "Brought up here?" "Yes." "Did he write anything like the Family Herald, or anything of that sort?" "Oh, yes; he writ." "What was it?" "Well," said the rustic, "I think he wrote for the Bible."

"Bible Contradictions," 15 cents.

Adami and Heva. Price, 10 cents. "A magnificent Agnostic poem, descriptive of the ever novel and ever mysterious legend of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden. The story is told with a wealth of imagination, a beauty of diction, and purity of thought which rank Mr. Putnam as a genuine poet."—The Universe, San Francisco.

The Problem of the Universe, and Its Scientific Solution. Price, 20 cents. "As a philosophical writer Mr. Putnam is always a success, and we delight to read him. His easy style and poetic expression make his productions very attractive."—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

Ingersoll and Jesus. A Poem. Price, 10 cents. "Written in a rather familiar style, but the sentiment is quite good, liberal, and sensible, and witty without being coarse. On the whole, it is a very clever dream, and very pleasantly related. It is well worth reading."—Boston Investigator.

Prometheus. A Poem. Price, $1. "It is crammed with life, thought and profound emotion, poured forth, it seems to me, with extraordinary richness and beauty."—Dr. Henry W. Bellows.

Gottlieb: His Life; or, Love Triumphant. A Romance of Earth, Heaven and Hell. Price, 25 cents. "To describe all the beauties of this simple, yet touchingly told little tale, would be a work of which I confess myself utterly incapable. To realize what it is, you must read the book itself. I have never read anything so exquisitely beautiful and good in all my life before."—Elmina Drake Slenker.

NEWS AND NOTES.

Creeping through the vast, wooded defiles, around the base of Mary's mountain and Alsea, we strike the limpid, broadening waters of the Yaquina, glistening in the sunset that flashes from the massive pavilion of clouds. Fronting the bay, the city of Yaquina, with about a hundred houses straggling along the shore, opens on the view, the terminus of the railroad. Four miles across, the still larger town of Newport, on the coast of the Pacific, stretches, with "magnificent distances," from the waters over the surrounding eminences. At Yaquina Bay are the beginnings of an immense commerce. It is expected that a transcontinental route will be established from this point through Boise City to Chicago and the East. When the railroad is completed over the Cascades a vast grain-producing section will be brought into communication with the Pacific. Freight can be loaded directly upon the largest ships. Undoubtedly this will be a busy point, competing with Portland, Astoria, and the Sound, for the trade of the world. The inhabitants are dreaming dreams of the "good time coming." For twenty-five years, through varying fortunes, with the oyster beds for a "starter," this place has been struggling into the ranks of metropolitan prosperity. During the summer there are more people here than can be accommodated. Tents are put up, and some have to sleep out of doors, or wander about all night. It is indeed a lovely resort. There cannot be more beautiful sceneries in the world. The grandeur of the sea is before one in the splendor of sunshine and the gloomy pomp of storms. Far along the beach the waves come thundering in. The bay now runs seaward like a mill race, and then again is brightly placid as a lake inclosed among hills. From the midsummer atmosphere of the Willamette valley thousands rush to these refreshing scenes.

At Yaquina City I take the little steamer for Newport. The voyage across the bay, with mingling sunset and stars, and the illimitable sea dashing upon the faint horizon and the dark and circling shores, is one of picturesque beauty, and is a delightful finale of the journey through the mountains.

J. B. Hoss and J. L. George are at the landing and there is a hospitable welcome. No arrangements can be made for lectures

Tuesday night, and so I take that for a vacation. The lectures are given on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday evenings to good audiences. There is fine working material here—a bedrock of Liberalism upon which I believe a fair structure will be raised for liberty and progress. On this sea-encircled height shall blaze the lighthouse of immortal freedom, and the mighty waters shall sound forever the music of undying hope.

I met J. B. Hoss at Portland, the confrere of M. Fitzgerald, of Silverton, who, with Wright Forshay, was the first to start that movement which has culminated in the brilliant convention which three years ago would have been a dream and nothing more. Thus the world advances, and from many a remote source the glory of to-day is achieved.

J. B. Hoss arranged for these meetings, and on this frontier line, by the energy of one, a most successful campaign has been inaugurated. Something for the future has been accomplished. During the course of my lectures an organization has been effected with a membership of over thirty earnest men and women, and with such devoted and generous friends I believe the record of Silverton will find its answering ray upon these shores that look forth to the gorgeous East, amid the splendors of the far west. Mr. Hoss has only been a few months in Newport, but he intends to make it his home, and the fireside, also, of Freethought. He is known as an enterprising citizen, and has that kind of pluck which never thinks of failure. Mrs. Marilla Hoss was of the Methodist church, but has now come with all her heart and mind into the Liberal ranks, and the children, baby and all, have the baptism of divine liberty, and the dark creeds have vanished from this happy household. The days passed pleasantly by in this circle of reason and humanity, where the wealth of thought is more than gold and jewels.

Friend George is a pioneer from "away back," and has been a prominent actor in the romance of the early history of Oregon, and can tell many a story of the battles and marches of that eventful time. He is also an old miner and has invented a gold separator which, it seems to me, is just the thing. His active mind is busy with other inventions, and, naturally, he doesn't take much to orthodoxy. He is a staunch worker for Liberalism, and my thanks are due for his untiring efforts.

R. A. Bensell, president of the Newport Secular Union, is the man for the place. He is a leading citizen in the community; is not afraid to stand by his colors, and believes in making Freethought an intellectual and moral power and the defender of human rights.

Mrs. R. A. Bensell is also a talented representative of what woman can do in the world's progress. It is a pleasure to meet with one so free from superstition, and so brightly enthusiastic in real humanitarian work.

I met W. S. Ingall, secretary of the Union at Boston under the banners of the Ingersoll Secular Union. Like myself he has crossed the continent, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and here, also, he is the same ardent soldier of Freethought as at the "Hub."

H. Titman generously donated the use of his fine Opera House, for merely the expense of lighting, etc., which was a great help to the success of the meetings. Mr. Titman is an outspoken Liberal, a generous supporter. Mr. and Mrs. Geo. P. Walling, G. W. Ford, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Hamilton, E. M. Burch, H. S. Brassfield, J. W. Ball, John Petty, D. P. Clark, R. F. Collamore, J. McCullen, P. W. Miner, Mrs. M. Sollis, Emma L. Beach, M. Martens, S. McHogskin, etc., all these have put themselves in the front for the cause, and there will be four times as many on the roll, I am sure, when the next summer's campaign opens.

It was my fortune to meet with Bob Brown of Lone Rock, who helped to lift our flag of Freethought there. He expects to settle at some point in this country. Just now he is camping out, but wherever he goes Freethought goes too.

D. P. Clark is a comrade also, from Lodi, California. He is now located here with his daughter, Mrs. Dora Walling. He is "true blue" with every change and fortune.

I leave Newport early Saturday morning, feeling that good work has been done; that good friends have been enlisted in the work, and that around these shining waters where some day the multitudinous banners of commerce will wave; where the streams of trade from East to West will meet in busy music; where the flags of every nation shall flash, not war but peace and plenty; here, too, shall the beautiful and sublime in thought and hope fling its "orient colors waving" into these scenes of human toil and triumph.

At Corvallis B. F. Hyland meets me, and amid rain and shine takes me to the home of Mrs. Louisa Bennett, who is one of our best woman workers in the state, life member and vice-president of the Oregon Secular Union. She and B. F. Hyland are the backbone of our enterprise here, and under their auspices a meeting was arranged in the Opera House for Sunday afternoon, where Mr. Krekel and myself were to speak and do what we could to rally the forces of the place there. Mrs. Krekel arrived in the afternoon from North Yamhill, where she had been lecturing with excellent success. It rained all day long and all night and the outlook was rather hopeless for the meeting. Sunday morning there was a bit of sunshine and blue sky here and there, but the heavy battalion of clouds rolled over, and the floods descended, and the roads in some places were like a lake. In the afternoon it cleared off a spell, and no umbrella was needed as we went to "church." There was a chance that a few might gather to the lectures. It was discouraging, but of course nature doesn't care whether we go up or down, and we must take care of ourselves. At first, only about a corporal's guard was present, but as the sun began to shine out with more brilliancy and it did look as the storm was over, quite a good audience gathered—over a hundred, and more than twenty were attached to the roll of membership, and so, in spite of all, the prospect improves. Mrs. Krekel gave her lecture on "Natural Morality Superior to Theological Restraint." It was an able and eloquent exposition of our practical purposes as touching all the fields of human effort. Mrs. Krekel is just the kind of speaker we want. She is a thorough student, has mastered the best books, understands the radical principles of Freethought, and her discourses are logically connected. They are not mere talks, but well-wrought orations, full of common sense and ideas, with a beginning and an end leading to real attainment in knowledge and aim. She instructs as well as illumines and inspires. I am glad to announce that Mrs. Krekel has concluded to make her home on the Pacific Coast. She will reside at Portland, and devote herself to the field work mainly in California, Oregon, and Washington. This is fortunate for our cause here. There could not be a nobler addition to our corps of laborers than Mrs. Krekel. She will, no doubt, find a field of splendid activity.

Z. S. Derrick, of Eddyville, was at Corvallis. He was one of the vice-presidents of the Union, and he purposes to make things lively in his part of the field.

Lee Rycraft of Alsea was also of our company, and he is ready to open the lines of attack in his section. Next summer we shall push on from Corvallis to Newport, with the demands of Liberalism. New points are continually opening for work in advance.

This finishes my labors in the North until next May. Already I have applications for six months' work in this great country. Looking over the fall and summer campaign, I rejoice at the improvement in the cause, and in the noble assistance which has been rendered by many friends. There is more harmony than ever, more determination than ever, and wider and grander opportunities than ever. I look forward from present achievements by our increasing ranks to victories that shall make our vast republic the ideal republic indeed, the land of the free, the land of fraternity, the land of civilization, the land where poverty shall cease to be, the land of happy homes and industry, where labor is sweet, where charity is the child of justice, and justice is the throne of love.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A SURPRISING CRITICISM OF FREETHINKERS.

We are pained to read the following remarks in the San Francisco Weekly Star:

"RETROGRESSIVE FREETHINKERS.

"A person who has been lecturing for some months on Spiritualism, Freethought, etc., at a hall on Eddy street, recently denounced there the Single Tax and the Labor movement.

"While so-called Freethinkers and others fall into the arms of Mammon many of the clergy have organized to secure real freedom, both of thought and action, through industrial enfranchisement. This is not as it used to be thirty years ago, but the old is passing away, and we see in the distance, but coming nearer, 'a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.'

"Meanwhile, there are some Freethinkers who are not free, not thinkers, and don't know the world is moving all around them."

No doubt reference is here had to Mr. Charles Dawbarn, the Spiritualist lecturer of Washington Hall. Whatever Mr. Dawbarn's views on the single tax are, there seems to be no good reason why he should not express them; but in doing so, it must be understood, he represents nobody but himself. Freethinkers do not all think alike on this question of a single tax. Some of them believe that a tax on land values alone would be in the direction of a beneficial reform; while others see that all taxes are directly or indirectly paid by the worker and the producer, and that while Mr. George's scheme might simplify the work of tax-gathering, it would not shift the burden of tax-paying, nor necessarily bring about "industrial enfranchisement." Perhaps the clergy are organizing on the basis of the single-tax, but they are more conspicuous as advocates of Nationalism, a movement having its immediate root in a dream of novelist Bellamy, and of Christian Socialism, a sort of political economy deriving its authority from a dream of Joseph, the historic carpenter. And, by the way, the first men to take up the Henry George idea were Freethinkers. The names of Louis F. Post, Augustus Levy, Ed.

W. Chamberlain, T. B. Wakeman, Edward King, and a dozen other members of the Manhattan Liberal Club were conspicuous in the single-tax campaign of 1886, when Henry George ran for mayor of New York. The clergy who at that time organized for industrial enfranchisement were the Rev. Charles McCarthy, Hugh O. Pentecost, and Dr. Edward McGlynn. Thirty thousand, probably, of the sixty thousand who voted for Henry George on that occasion were Socialists, led by Schevitch, Jonas, and other German Freethinkers.

It is for these reasons, and on account of these facts, that we are surprised at the Star's drive at Freethinkers. There may be some, it is true, "who are not free, not thinkers, and don't know the world is moving around them," but that does not necessarily imply that they are opponents of the single tax.

THE NATIONAL SECULAR CONGRESS.

The thirteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union was held in Philadelphia, October 25, 26, and 27, with twenty-seven delegates present. The small number of delegates is explained by the fact that the congress was held in the far East.

LIST OF DELEGATES.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., "
E. W. Chamberlain, "

The Congress was opened by President Westbrook, and E. W. Chamberlain, of New York, was elected temporary secretary.

In his opening address the president sketched the work of the past year, which he believed was less effective than it should have been on account of the vast duties imposed upon the secretary, and the lack of power bestowed upon the president by the constitution. He recommended reducing the Nine Demands to five, simplifying the constitution, and selecting the officers in such a manner that they might live near together and be able to hold frequent consultations. In closing he asked the Congress to provide another person than himself to preside over the society for the ensuing year.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., read Secretary Stevens's report, which was accepted. Treasurer Wettstein's report, read in summary, was as follows:

REPORT OF OTTO WETTSTEIN, TREASURER AMERICAN SECULAR UNION, FROM OCTOBER 1, 1888, TO OCTOBER 20, 1889.

Dr.		Cr.
Receipts,	$1,408.39	Expenditures, $1,357.58
		Balance in treasury, 50.81
	1,408.39
Bal. brought forward,	50.81	1,408.39
	BRUNO MONUMENT.
Receipts	150.00	Remitted to committee, 150.00

The amended Constitution proposed by President Westbrook, after due discussion, was adopted. It is nearly identical with that published in FREETHOUGHT of October 5, but we shall reprint it as adopted, later.

For the purpose of nominating officers for the ensuing year the Congress resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and for president the following names of candidates were handed in:

R. B. Westbrook, T. B. Wakeman, and Leonard Geiger. The last two declined to run, and the vote when taken stood thus:

R. B. Westbrook.....	24
T. B. Wakeman.....	1

The election was made unanimous. The following candidates were named for the office of secretary: Miss Ida C. Craddock, Harry Hoover, John R. Charlesworth, and E. W. Chamberlain. The balloting resulted in these figures:

Ida C. Craddock.....	17
Harry Hoover.....	9

Two of the officers having been chosen from Philadelphia, it was decided that a resident of the same city should be treasurer, and the name of F. C. Mende being put forward he was elected.

These vice-presidents were placed upon the list in pursuance of Article VII.:

E. B. Foote, Jr.	T. B. Wakeman.
J. E. Remsburg.	Juliet H. Severance.

Afterward, upon motion of President Westbrook, the above article was so amended as to permit the election of prominent Freethinkers to the office of honorary vice-presidents, and the old list were re-elected, the name of L. K. Washburn being substituted for that of Horace Seaver. The list is:

Col. R. G. Ingersoll.	L. K. Washburn.
Samuel P. Putnam.	H. P. Mason.
T. B. Wakeman.	Mattie P. Krekel.
James Parton.	E. B. Foote.
Charles Watts.	Leonard Geiger.
A. B. Bradford.	N. D. Goodell.
Otto Wettstein.	Dr. S. S. McLeod.
Lucy N. Colman.	Daniel Aeri.
James Wardwell.	Roman Staley.
J. A. Smith.	H. L. Boyes.
Wm. Redfield.	J. H. Burnham.
M. M. Secor.	Maj. W. W. Forwood.
W. L. Willis.	Joseph Sedgbeere.
T. J. Truss.	Dr. G. F. A. de Lespinasse.
Photius Fisk.

Wm. Redfield, whose name is included in the list, died a few days ago, after a brief illness. Mr. Redfield was a sterling citizen of Stanley, Iowa, a noble and generous Liberal, and his death is indeed a great loss to the cause of liberty.

The Committee on Resolutions presented, through the chairman, E. B. Foote, Jr., a series of twelve resolves, in which fraternal greetings were sent to the Canadian Secular Union and to the newly formed Union of Oregon. Other features of the resolutions were: Congratulations over the erection of a Bruno monument at Rome; regret for the death of Horace Seaver and the illness of Charles Bradlaugh; denunciation of the Blair Sunday bill; opposition to the persecution of Messrs. Harman and Walker; condemnation of the proceedings against medium Walter E. Reid, of Grand Rapids, Mich.; the recommended removal of Postmaster-General Wanamaker for discontinuing Sunday mail service on minor routes; opposition to the National Reform Association in the matter of national marriage and divorce laws; recommendation that Secularists make testamentary provision for secular burial services; invitation to all Secularists to co-operate with the American Secular Union; and thanks to the Truth Seeker, Investigator, FREETHOUGHT, and Truth, for space devoted to the organization.

Addresses were delivered before the Convention by Dr. Edward McGlynn, the Rev. Minot J. Savage, Thaddeus B. Wakeman, Lucy N. Colman, and Miss Susan H. Wixon.

Something should be said of the personnel of the new executive. Dr. Westbrook is already well-known. Miss Craddock is described by the Truth Seeker (from which we obtain the foregoing details), as a native of Philadelphia, about thirty years old.

She may be called an educated woman in the best sense of the word. She made the fight for opening the University of Pennsylvania to women, single-handed and alone. She passed her examination in Greek and Latin, and was recommended by the faculty for admission, but was rejected by the trustees. She was teacher of stenography and typewriting in Girard College for a number of years, and held the position of curator in the Wagner Free Institute of Science, until she voluntarily resigned that position, two years ago, to visit California, Oregon, and Alaska. She is an expert correspondent in shorthand and typewriting, and has special qualifications as an organizer and business manager. She has a knowledge of German and French, and can correspond in those languages, and is a "Liberal of Liberals," though prudent and politic. She will accept the office of secretary, and return immediately to Philadelphia, where her mother resides. Her address for the present is the same as that of President Westbrook, 1707 Oxford street, Philadelphia.

Mr. F. C. Mende, the treasurer, is a retired Philadelphia merchant of wealth and responsibility, with German antecedents, and is an earnest and Liberal Freethinker, though, in his younger days, educated for the ministry. He resides at 1814 Greene street, Philadelphia.

The other members of the Board of Directors need no introduction to the readers of Freethought papers.

The results of the Congress are summarized by the Truth Seeker to be:

"1. Simplification of the constitution, so that all in favor of state secularization may join the Union, whether Agnostics, Materialists, Spiritualists, evangelical Christians, Free Religionists, Universalists, Unitarians, or Catholic rebels from church authority.

"2. A transfer of the active management of the Union from the secretary to the president.

"3. Election of officers who can reach one another for consultation and official action at a moment's notice."

It is safe to vote the Congress a most successful and promising one. We infer that it was harmonious throughout and that no dissatisfaction was bred by the proceedings. Liberals of this coast will send support and congratulations to the workers across the continent, as upon the success of the national organization depends in great measure the success of Secular societies all over the country. And they may well express their sentiments in the words of the poet:

"Sail on, O UNION, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate."

THE BIBLE AND ILLITERACY.

An Eastern clergyman preaching at Keene, N. H., makes this assertion:

"In Spain, out of a population of fifteen millions, twelve millions cannot read, and here the Bible has been interdicted for 5000 years."

The reason why the Bible has been interdicted in Spain for five thousand years is because it did not exist in any form doing the first half of that time, and was not printed until a few hundred years ago. The object of the clergyman who made the statement above quoted was to show that intelligence is the result of the Bible-reading; and he further says:

"Men may laugh at this old Bible and turn from it to the newspapers, but let the reading of it be forbidden in this country and our seminaries and schools would close their doors; our printing-presses would stop; of the making and publishing of books and magazines there would be an end, and we should become an ignorant and degraded people."

It is a rare treat to find such an irresponsible spouter as this reverend; and his assertion that the Bible was interdicted four thousand five hundred years before it was printed is scarcely more absurd than his prognostication of the dire results that would follow its abolition.

As a matter of fact, the Bible is not much read by the American people. This is proved by the number who believe it, for the Bible is the best evidence against itself, and those who have read it the most critically have the least confidence in its truthfulness. It is true that the believers in free Bible-reading are more intelligent than the advocates of a closed book, but it is not the Bible that makes them so—it is the principle involved, that of liberty of the press. There is really no information to be obtained from the Bible. Its history is inaccurate, its precepts are abominable, and its phraseology, in many cases, indecent. Reading the Bible does not make people intelligent; the ability to read it, however, does, as it involves the ability to read other books that are beneficial. Those who draw the conclusion that the interdiction of the Bible produces illiteracy will find that the people among whom it is interdicted could not read it if it were open. The book has this incidental relation to progress, and no more—that among a free people the Bible is free like other literature. Intelligence is the result of freedom to read all books, and among them the Bible occupies a minor position so far as education is concerned. This is shown by the fact that pupils who do not read the Bible in schools are as advanced as those who do. It might, indeed, be excluded from the schools without impairing the system of education. Children would still learn to read, write, and cipher; whereas, if the reading-book, the writing-book, and the arithmetic were excluded, and the Bible alone retained, pupils would leave school as destitute of any useful information as they were when they entered it.

In one sense if the reading of the Bible were forbidden in this country our seminaries and colleges and schools might be expected to close their doors, our printing-presses might stop, and the making and publishing of books and magazines come to an end; not because the Bible keeps these in existence, but because to forbid the reading of it would be to destroy a free press and religious liberty, which are the salvation of mankind.

MISS KATE FIELD has issued what is called a "hot broadside" against women politicians, in which Mormon women, Southern women, and the Women's Christian Temperance Union are roughly handled. She speaks of the latter as women who "mistake hysterical sentimentality for morality, and whose knowledge of the English language is as limited as their knowledge of human nature. Thus far," she declares, "women have exerted a baleful influence on politics, first as giving aid and comfort to the rebellion; second as consolidating a polygamous theocracy; third, as being prime movers in the passage of sumptuary laws as intemperate as they are un-republican, and which beget lying, hypocrisy, and cowardice. The Southern women during the rebellion were governed by sentiment, the Mormon women are actuated by a debasing religion, the female prohibitionists are controlled by personal suffering or by sentimental fanaticism." The indictment is drawn in strong language, but the women have the satisfaction of knowing that it applies to men as well as to themselves.

EVIDENCE accumulates to prove that Catholics regard the rules of their church as more binding upon their consciences than the laws of the state. A case in point has recently been on trial in Montreal. The Ville Marie Bank brought an action against the Hotel Dieu, and, during the proceeding, it was necessary to obtain the testimony of some of the nuns belonging to that institution. When they were subpoenaed, they made answer that they were cloistered nuns, and, as such, could not appear in court without an order from the archbishop. A commission was asked for, and the attorney for the nuns presented a petition supported by an affidavit of the lady superior, stating that they were cloistered nuns, and that the archbishop, having refused them permission to leave the monastery, their coming to court would be a violation of their constitution and an act against their consciences. This is a very simple and easy way for the deviltries of convents to be covered up, but that is a small matter compared with disobeying a good and reasonable law at the behest of the church.

WE ARE IN GREAT NEED OF THE MONEY DUE US IN ORDER TO INSURE THE CONTINUED PUBLICATION OF "FREETHOUGHT." THE EXPENSE OF ISSUING THE PAPER IS NEARLY $100 PER WEEK, AND UNLESS SUBSCRIBERS ARE PROMPT TO PAY THEIR BILLS WE CANNOT PAY OURS. THERE ARE MANY HUNDRED DOLLARS ON OUR BOOKS, IN ARREARAGES AND RENEWALS, THAT SHOULD BE PAID BEFORE THE FIRST OF NEXT MONTH. WE WOULD THEREFORE REQUEST THOSE IN ARREARS TO REMIT AT ONCE. AND AS A FAVOR, AND TO KEEP FREETHOUGHT ALIVE, WE ASK ALL TO RENEW WHEN THEIR SUBSCRIPTIONS HAVE EXPIRED. DO NOT BE CARELESS IN THIS MATTER; DO NOT BE BLIND TO THE FINANCIAL NECESSITIES OF THIS PAPER, BUT PAY US WHAT YOU HONESTLY OWE, AND LEND A HELPING HAND FOR THE FUTURE. WE ARE OBLIGED TO MAKE THIS CALL.

NEW HAMPSHIRE would not be a good field for Henry George to work in as a single-tax advocate, or for Mr. Pentecost to preach abolition of ownership of vacant land as a method of destroying poverty. The trouble is that nobody seems to want the land. A Cheshire county, N. H., paper has this item:

"Alstead has reported 18 deserted farms; Harrisville, 5; Jaffrey, 17; Marlow, 9; and Swanzey, 18.

Here are sixty-seven farms, fenced and improved, but not worth living on. Probably an average of three dollars per acre would buy them all.

THAT school-houses should not be used except for school purposes is a reasonable proposition, yet we learn that "much indignation is expressed in the church circles of Seattle, Wash., over the ejection of the Union Sunday-school from the school-building where it has been worshiping for three years past." To a reasonable being it would seem that the Union Sunday-school ought to be satisfied to pocket the three years' rent it has gotten illegally, and hold its peace about the matter in the future.

AT last accounts Viktor E. Lennstrand, editor of the Swedish Freethought paper, "Fritankaren," was still at liberty. He has recently made an appeal to the king of Sweden, who has the reputation of being a man of good sense, and it is hoped this will result in freeing him from his persecutors. An attempt was made to suppress the September number of his paper on account of a parody on one of the psalms which it contained, but no attention was paid to the matter by the authorities.

WE hope to hear from time to time reports of progress in the work of Secular organization in Washington. The Liberals of Oregon responded nobly to the call of Silverton. Now let those of Washington respond to Walla Walla. Write at once to Dr. A. W. Calder, secretary of the Liberal Club, box 696, Walla Walla, and offer the movement support and co-operation.

THE pope delivered an address on the labor question to the French pilgrims last Sunday. It is called a "conservative address," and the portion of it cabled to this country confirms the appropriateness of that description. Like the majority of conservative utterances, it means anything or nothing.

AFTER reporting that Charles Bradlaugh had recovered, we now learn that he has suffered a relapse, and that his condition is still serious.

OBSERVATIONS.

The testimonial banquet given by the Free Press Association to James H. Barry, editor of the Weekly Star, at Scottish-American Hall last Saturday night, had all the features of a roaring success. About one hundred and twenty-five men sat at the three long tables and ate turkey and partook of other luxuries from nine o'clock until half-past one. They made the most enthusiastic company I ever mingled with. The material feast, though abundant, was but incidental to the banquet of speeches that followed. Judge James G. Maguire sat at the head of the tables, as master of ceremonies, supported by Messrs. Barry and Perkins on the right and Counsellor Cole on the left, while a long list of distinguished and expectant orators occupied both sides of the groaning board. Mr. Barry, it will be remembered, is under sentence for contempt of court, having expressed through his paper the sentiments which many other citizens entertain privately but do not publish. Judge Maguire opened the meeting with an Emersonian quotation relative to low living and high thinking, and the entertainment began. There was plenty to eat, and numerous wine bottles bedecking the festive board made the tables look like the farther end of a bowling alley.

While partaking abstemiously of the leg of a turkey cold in death and a glass of water, I was addressed by an elderly, prayer-meeting looking gentleman at my left, who said he would gladly pass me anything within the sound of his voice if I so desired, and that his name was Cubery. I answered that I was obliged to him and was glad to know his name was Cubery, and only wished mine own were Huckleberry, in default of which I made him acquainted with the name that distinguishes me from others of my race. Mr. Cubery then inquired my business, and I did not keep him in suspense with regard to the same. He repeated the name of this journal several times as though he had never heard the word before, and continued the conversation by asking what we were driving at. It required but a moment for me to say that we were driving at priests, ministers, chaplains, National Reformers, and other excrescences on the body politic, especially the Sunday-law fanatics. He seemed pained at this, and with the remark that extremes often meet in violent collision, gave me his official card. It reads thus: "The Lord's Day Observance Association. Dr. R. H. McDonald, C. C. Clay, Wm. M. Cubery, Finance Committee."

Judge Maguire made the opening after-dinner address, in which he observed that eternal vigilance was the price of liberty; and when the applause had died away among the cold victuals, he spoiled the effect of the remark by saying that it was not original with him, though indorsed by Mr. Barry on his right and Counsellor Cole upon his left. Judge Maguire was followed by the audience, who said "Hooray, yay, yee-ay!" in a loud and distinct manner, and added "tigaar," after which Ex-Congressman Sumner had the floor. Mr. Sumner's address caused the audience to repeat its previous expressions, and so did the words of a dozen other gentlemen. Mr. Wm. M. Hinton, whose business card appears in our advertising columns, shook his gray locks and made a radical free thought, free speech, and free press oration that rather chilled some present with its earnestness, but the undersigned applauded with an athletic hand, and the old partner and patron of Henry George got rounds and rounds of cheers.

Mr. Barry's speech was terrific in its declaration of independence, to which he pledged his life, his fortune, and his sacred honor; and being the guest of the evening, his hosts did what they could to spoil his hearing with their vociferations of approval.

The affair reminded me of the receptions that were given to D. M. Bennett when he stood as champion of free mails. There were the same allusions to the broad ægis of our liberties, the great charter of rights, the sacred traditions of our forefathers, the grandest document ever written by the hand of man, the Constitution of the United States, signed by the fathers of the republic and sealed with the blood of patriots. And I wished the whole city could have been there to be reindoctrinated and rebaptized with those sentiments that are never heard except on the Fourth of July, when there is no necessity for them and when they have no application.

I left Mr. Barry struggling to escape from some over-demonstrative friends in the early morning hours; and then, the cars having ceased running, I walked home, a distance of several miles.

The new and respectable Socialistic order called Nationalists held one of their semi-monthly gatherings last Monday evening in the large hall on Union Square. The platform was profusely decorated with Japanese chrysanthemums; the floor and gallery were crowded with well-dressed people; Mrs. Ada Ballou, the president, beamed forth from behind the floral trimmings; Burnette G. Haskell sat statuesquely upon the stage; Mrs. Eugenia Clarke played a brilliant solo on the piano, and all was light and melody up to the introduction of the first speaker. This gentleman turned out to be Mr. T. Tucker, of Oakland, and the subject of his address was down on the programme as "The Relation of Individualism to Collectivism." Mr. Tucker proved tiresome. Dr. O'Brock, who was in the audience, would have been preferable. Like most bad speakers, Mr. Tucker was long-winded. Mr. Haskell twice presented him with a card which doubtless bore the written request that he should desist, but the plea was quietly ignored, and the speaker went on and on until the president's gavel brought relief. Here a well-rendered song was introduced, followed by a school-girlish lady with a composition on "What is Nationalism?" Mr. Haskell promised that this essay would be of fifteen minutes' duration, but it covered an æon of half an hour. A dialogue between a man and a boy, which ended with the man collaring the boy and marching him off the stage, was entertaining under the circumstances; and a closing address by Haskell furnished the first tolerable speaking of the evening. Mr. Haskell is tonguey if not profound, but his extravagance of speech is not rivaled by that of Sam Jones. Said he: "My mother sits in this audience, and she would disown me if I were not a Nationalist. My wife sits in this audience, and she would not marry me if I were not a Nationalist." Having thus misrepresented the female members of his family by attributing to them a degree of bigotry of which they could not have been guilty, since his mother must have owned him and his wife married him long before Nationalism was ever heard of, he demonstrated his lack of paternal affection by affirming that he would sooner see his son (who likewise sat in the audience) dead than living as men have to live in the contemporaneous state of society. The audience applauding this extraordinary sentiment, Mr. Haskell grew dramatic, and proceeded: "I see aged men before me, but their faces are flushed when they consider our present civilization; and I see aged women before me, but there are tears in their eyes," etc. As a matter of fact, the men were not flushed nor the women weeping. On the contrary they appeared fatigued, but such was the strain of Mr. Haskell's utterances. Then he mapped out the future under Nationalism: two hours' work per day; luxuries for the poorest equal to those now enjoyed by the richest; rare exotics in every man's front yard; carpets in the house ten inches thick; fare to New York, $12; fare to the Park, two cents; coal, sixty cents per ton; wages of the laborer, $10,000 per annum. This is not an exaggerated account of the speaker's address, nor a burlesque. He spoke as here reported. If Mr. Haskell could produce as much effect upon his audiences as he appears desirous of doing, he would soon have the Nationalist movement at San Francisco where Croasdale found the single-tax movement at New York, namely, in a howling-dervish stage of emotional insanity.

Just before the exercises terminated the main doors were closed, and egress was possible only by means of a doorway opening into an ante-room, where retiring visitors were given opportunity to sign applications for membership. Copies of Bellamy's dream-book were everywhere, and were bought as though they had been tickets to paradise. One thing is certain, the managers of this society have the gift known in our present barbarous era as the "business faculty," in a high state of development. A queer feature of Nationalism is the way it seems to appeal to all varieties of religionists. Rabbi Freuder, of this city, says it is synonymous with Judaism; the Christian Scientists say it is Christian Science; Theosophists claim it as Theosophy; Spiritualists accept it as harmonizing with the philosophy of Spiritualism, and even some orthodox ministers find in it the fundamental doctrines of Christ. Furthermore, as is well known, Nationalism is Socialism. The Individualists also use its textbooks as their own, and nearly all reformers except the Anarchists recommend "Looking Backward" as a remarkable book. Now it is a clear scientific proposition that any two things, each of which is equal to any other thing, are equal to each other. Thus Nationalism establishes an identity between Judaism, Christian Science, Theosophy, Spiritualism, Christianity, and Socialism. Truly Bellamy wrote a wonderful book, and truly black is white when it becomes popular to believe so.

"WHITHER?"

Under this title, Professor Briggs, of the Union Theological Seminary, New York, has published a book advertised as radical and startling. He says: "The process of dissolution has gone on long enough. The time has come for a reconstruction of theology, of polity of worship, of Christian life and work. The drift in the church ought to stop. The barriers between the Protestant denominations should be removed, and an organic union formed. An alliance should be made between Romanism and all other branches of Christendom!"

To this it might be answered, Why not? If doubt is to be shunned as the unpardonable sin; if faith in Christ as God is the prime factor in salvation; if the priest in some form is necessary as the mediator between man and God; it is perhaps as well to admit that all roads in the church lead to Rome. As a natural sequence to this logic, what is needed is not an alliance, but an absolute absorption into the Romish church.

Rev. Dr. Samuel T. Spear has commenced a series of articles in the Independent on "Christological Theology." He accepts Worcester's definition of theology as "the science which treats of the existence, nature, and attributes of God, and of his relations to man."

As all science is based on known facts, which have been noted and collected by different observers, the science of theology must be as precise, as exact, as critical, as the science of mathematics. There can be no place for assumption, conjecture, blind belief in what has been taught as science, or acceptance of fictions for fact no matter how ancient or plausible the fiction may be. Starting out with this theory of the science of God's relations to man, Dr. Spear at once violates all scientific methods in dealing with the subject. He says: "Doctrinal theology considers God as made known to reason by the constitution and cause of nature The opportunity to know God in this way is common to the race."

Natural theology, in this sense, is simply natural science. The earth moves, the seasons change, vegetable and animal existence have their course, and from the known and recorded facts as to life in this world, man has deduced the conclusion that general laws govern existence, that the world is not governed by chance or by an arbitrary despot who can set aside the operation of those laws at any moment. Just so far as man traces the relations of cause and effect, he traces the laws by which the operation of what we call nature is carried on. The higher the scale of intelligence, the more fully reason is brought to play; the more fearless, independent, and thorough the thinker is, the more clearly the relations of man to those laws are defined. This is natural science. It shows the reign of natural law. It tells man nothing of the personality of a Supreme Being—nothing of the God of the churches.

Dr. Spear then adds: "Revealed or biblical theology consists in what is in the Bible declared and thus made known in respect to God. . . . It is here, and here only, that the Christological element makes its appearance. We do not find this element in nature; but we do find it in the Bible. . . . Christological theology is hence the science of God under those aspects and in those revelations of God, that we find in the person and work of the historic Christ. It is the science of God in Christ and through him."

This is a candid admission that the science of nature and what is termed the Christological theology have nothing in common. It concedes that man must use his reason to develop the science of nature, and would not know God in the religious sense but through Christ, and him only. It compels the acceptance of the dogma that God once for all created a person as a medium of revelation, not of the laws of nature, not of the laws of mind, but of the plan of salvation, and that having created him as a tree of knowledge for that question, he has and will abstain from further revelations. This is Christological science. It is founded on pure assumption.

Having abandoned the scientific method Dr. Spear contrasts Christ with other teachers in this way:

1. The humanity of Christ was the result of a "supernatural conception."

According to the science of nature—the reign of natural law—there can be no supernatural conceptions. Facts cannot be set aside at the demand of a religious fiction.

2. He says this supernatural humanity of Christ made him a unique man, "on earth in a human form to be the Redeemer and Savior of men."

This assumption is based on the dogma of the fall of man; of his eternal damnation after death; of the awful wrath of God, who demanded the expiation in this world for punishment he might inflict in the next world, not only upon the dead, but on the persons then living, and the generations then unborn. Does science or reason lead to such a conception of a supreme being?

It naturally follows from such an idea of the nature and inexorable love for vengeance of God that, as Dr. Spear says, "God 'prepared' a body for the wonderful man of Galilee, and interposed a miracle in the production of that body. No other humanity ever existed in similar relations or for a like purpose."

Another fiction, necessary to sustain the plan of salvation that was based on a false assumption and required a series of false assumptions to explain and sustain it. Dr. Spear insists that Christ was sinless, because he and his followers said so; because "He never prayed for forgiveness, and never felt the compunctions of a condemning conscience."

Perhaps not. But as Christians are always preaching about being like Christ, the best Christian would seem to be the man who goes on believing in natural law; believing that punishment invariably follows the violation of law; that no miracle, no prayer, can save him from the penalty of law, and that it is useless to ask for forgiveness.

Dr. Spear, however, shuts his eyes to the final prayer of Christ, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

If that was truly reported, it shows that in the agony of death Christ admitted that he was simply a mortal whose faith in God and in his own mission as a representative of God, was swept away. This revelation of doubt and despair is a fatal blow which destroys the claim of Christ to divinity.

Christianity should have invented a miracle at his death as well as at his birth, so that the historical Christ might have met death as heroically as other men have done.

The article of Dr. Spear shows how little progress has been made in the churches. He is a Congregational leader, yet he clings to the old theology, to faith in a false and unscientific theory of the relations of man to nature, and to what is called a Supreme Being. While he is drawing the lines strictly on theology, he fails to see the narrow and bigoted nature of Christian life in his own denomination. Congregational ministers of Georgia have followed the other churches in organizing a white Conference in which no man of color can set his foot. If that is God's kingdom on earth, it must be based on some revelation of the existence of a color line in heaven. What evidence is there of race-prejudice there?

The colored Congregationalists declare that if the color line is drawn, they will join the Catholic church, which alone at the South knows no color. When the colored brethren go over to Rome, will Dr. Briggs and his white race colleagues of the South follow suit? Or will they form an alliance against Rome? The world may well ask "Whither?"

A MINORITY BUT NOT A SECT.

A Protestant minister in Oakland, Cal., in a recent address on the subject of the public-school system of the United States, expressed himself as follows: "In one of the schools of San Francisco Herbert Spencer's 'Data of Ethics' was introduced as a text-book of morals—as palpable a violation of the law forbidding sectarian instruction as the introduction of the Catholic or Methodist catechism; for Herbert Spencer belongs to that very small and narrow sect which promulgates the creed of Agnosticism." If the reverend speaker had taken the ground that the "Data of Ethics" was too abstruse a book to be placed in the hands of public-school pupils, we should have felt inclined to sustain his objection. But when he says that to introduce such a book is to give a sectarian character to the school in which it is used, we must enter a protest. Science is never sectarian; philosophy is never sectarian. Sectarian teaching begins when you ask a man or a child to assume what cannot be proved, for the sake of keeping within the dogmatic lines that fence around some particular creed. The followers of Mr. Spencer may be a minority, but they are no more a sect than were the adherents of the Copernican system of astronomy, or than are the believers in the Darwinian theory of selection. Mr. Spencer makes no appeal to faith, but finds his premises in the common experience of mankind. A pupil who was being taught out of the "Data of Ethics" would be quite at liberty to dispute either the premises or the arguments of the author; and he would not be silenced by the declaration that Mr. Spencer was infallible. But when catechisms are taught they are taught, not as containing matter for discussion, but as containing doctrines that must not be disputed on pain of more or less disagreeable consequences.—Popular Science Monthly.

ROMANISTS were never more alive than now; their priests never labored with greater zeal; they were never more successful in perverting souls. According to the Missionary Annual of 1889, recently published, Rome's increase in the missionary fields has been great. Since 1886 the increase of Roman Catholic church members in Europe has numbered 118,553 souls; in Asia, 87,113; in America, 486,861; and in Oceanica, 142,807.—Signs of the Times.

THE SHERIFF'S STORY.

A NARRATIVE OF ADVENTURE, IN THREE CHAPTERS, ILLUSTRATING THE INFLUENCE OF THE CHURCH IN RESTRAINING CRIME.

CHAPTER II.

I realized that I must not go to my relatives in the condition I was in; my hat was gone, my clothes torn, my face and body terribly bruised. I thought of Uncle Pete, and made what haste I could to his house. He was not up, but I aroused him by rapping on his bed-room window. When I made myself known he opened the door and admitted me. As it was not yet daylight, he lighted a candle and was horrified when he saw my condition. While he was kindling a fire, I briefly related my adventure. "I bleeves you, chile," said he, "and you's mighty lucky to 'scape alive." He called his wife and told her to get the bed ready in the small room upstairs. "There's awful sight of devilment going on over there," said he. "Deed there is," said his wife; "the poor gal the fisherman found in the river, below the bridge, didn't drown herself, and she ain't the only one." They helped me to bed, dressed my wounds and bruises, and did everything possible to make me comfortable.

I managed to write a short note to one of the girls where I had been visiting, stating that I had concluded to go home. Uncle Pete posted it, and on the following day brought a newspaper, which he handed to me saying, "There's awful 'citement down town; read that." The item he showed me read as follows:

ATTEMPTED BURGLARY! THE MOST AUDACIOUS OF ALL. SACRILEGIOUS WRETCHES BREAK INTO THE RESIDENCE OF FATHER FLANNIGAN AND ATTEMPT TO STEAL SILVER PLATE BELONGING TO THE CHURCH.

On the return of the holy father from his pastoral duties at the chapel Thursday evening, accompanied by his brother, a worthy mechanic of Boston, he found, on entering his study, three stalwart desperadoes in the act of leaving with their plunder. The plucky priest and his brother, providentially visiting him, made a determined effort to capture the villains, but were overpowered by numbers, and the holy father severely injured, one of his fingers being nearly severed by a knife in the hands of one of the desperadoes. The scoundrels escaped, but were compelled to abandon their booty. As Father Flannigan keeps no servants, it was not difficult to effect an entrance during his absence. He is held in high esteem by his congregation and the entire community, and we tender him and his worthy brother, our sincere congratulations on their heroic conduct and fortunate escape. There is evidently a well-organized gang of criminals 'infesting our city, that would hesitate at no crime. And we take this opportunity to suggest to our officers the necessity of constant vigilance.

Youth and a strong constitution were in my favor, and on the fourth day after my adventure, I told Uncle Pete that I felt well enough to take care of myself. We discussed the situation of affairs. I was strongly in favor of taking further steps to bring the guilty parties to justice, but he convinced me it would be useless, and certain death to him to prosecute the matter further. They urged me to remain longer, but could not conceal their apprehension of danger. They had no children, few if any visitors, and we hoped, and believed, that our secret would not be discovered. Aunt Rosy, as Uncle Pete called his wife, had mended my clothes and found a cap that fitted me. I had a few dollars, but they positively refused to accept a cent for their care and kindness. It was arranged that I should leave at night. Uncle Pete accompanied me out of the city, and several miles on the road, directing me to a station where I took the cars for the home of my parents. When I reached home, I found a relative who was going as second mate of a ship to California. He was to sail the next week, and came from Boston, whence he was to sail, to spend a day or two with his friends. After much earnest pleading, I obtained a reluctant consent from my parents to go with him. My preparations for the voyage were hastily made. The day we sailed I went up town to buy a few necessities, and on my way to the ship bought some magazines and papers which I rolled up and put in my chest. The weather was rough and I was seasick. We had nearly reached the equator, when, in looking through my chest, I found the package of papers. On opening it, the following was the first item I saw.

HORRIBLE MURDER IN PROVIDENCE, R. I.

The residents of "Nigger Alley" were horrified on Sunday morning, on finding that "Uncle Pete" Branch and his wife had both been murdered. The latter was still in her bed, her skull broken and her brains oozing out. Uncle Pete was on the floor. He had received several blows on the head; a hatchet still tightly grasped in his hand, and covered with blood, indicated that the old man had made a desperate fight for his life, and severely wounded his assailant. They were an inoffensive, industrious old couple, not supposed to have an enemy, and their death is as mysterious as terrible.

Information had evidently been obtained in some manner of their kindness to me, and I should doubtless have been a victim had I remained.

In course of time we reached San Francisco. In about a week after our arrival I went to the mines, where I worked with varying success, for several years, until I was elected sheriff of one of the mining counties. Soon after assuming the duties of my office, a rancher from the lower portion of the county called, and requested an interview. He informed me that he had a place on Pine Creek, where he had been living for a number of years; that he had been doing well until a man named Dennis Ryan, commonly known as "One-armed Dennis," had located on some government land near his ranch; since which time his horses and cattle had mysteriously disappeared, till he had but few left. He was positive that Ryan was not only a notorious thief, but that his place was a rendezvous for criminals. Thinking he had at one time sufficient evidence to convict him of the larceny of a valuable cow, he caused his arrest. Ryan proved an alibi by some of his friends; and soon after he was aroused one night to find his barn in flames. He said unless protection could be afforded him, he should be compelled to abandon his place, as he was already reduced to poverty. I promised to aid him to the extent of my ability. For the purpose of forming some plan of operation, I mounted my horse the following day, took my shotgun, and rode out to Pine Creek. I found the place where "One-armed Dennis" lived, and as the birds were plentiful on the Chemical hills, I dismounted, tied my horse, and soon had fine shooting. Some of my birds dropped inside the brush fence inclosing a small field in which stood the house, and while picking them up, a woman came to the door, and angrily ordered me to leave, saying her husband didn't permit any one to shoot in their place. I apologized and insisted upon her accepting the birds I had in my bag. This mollified her anger somewhat, and as I approached to give them to her, I recognized the servant girl Mary of former years. I was momentarily confused, but time had wrought changes in both of us, and I saw that I was not recognized. In the conversation I had with her she expressed much dissatisfaction with her situation; said Dennis could not do much work as he had but one arm, that they were not getting along well. There was no church near; they were living "like haythins intirely," and she wanted to go to San Francisco. Dennis, she said, was away looking for a cow that they suspected had been stolen. The effects of intemperance were evident in her appearance. She was untidy and repulsive. For the purpose of obtaining information, I prolonged the conversation a few minutes, but she was not communicative, and I mounted my horse and rode on. About a mile beyond their house, a road but little used turned off, leading to the hills back of their place. Here I noticed fresh tracks of horses; evidently two or more had gone along quite recently. One of them only was shod. This was a suspicious circumstance in a suspicious neighborhood. I therefore followed them until sunset, then returned home. On reaching my office, I found a telegram stating that a valuable horse had been stolen from the "Divide," giving description and requesting prompt action. Before daylight the next morning, I was in my saddle and again on the road to Pine Creek. I took the tracks where I had left and followed them to a dense thicket of young pines. Here they were difficult to follow, so I dismounted and tied my horse, which neighed before I had gone far, and was answered by another horse quite near. Proceeding in the direction whence the sound came, I soon found a small corral built of the young pines that had grown there. The thicket was so dense around it that at the distance of a few feet it could not be seen. It was an admirable hiding-place. As I suspected, the horse described in the telegram I had received was tied in the corral. I opened the gate, and while examining the horse heard voices, and presently saw two men coming toward me. I could see them through the openings between the trees, and as they came nearer I recognized Tom Harmon, a man of bad reputation that I had some acquaintance with; the other, as he had but one arm, was evidently Dennis Ryan, alias Mike Flannigan, for although several years had passed since we last met, I knew him, notwithstanding the changes time, dissipation, and probably remorse, had wrought. They were within a few steps before they saw me. Dennis was ahead, saw me first, and attempted to draw his pistol. I was on my guard, and, with my pistol pointed at his head, dissuaded him from further hostilities, and after a brief argument induced him to drop his on the ground. Harmon recognizing me, told Dennis who I was. Then a sentence of jargon passed between them, and Tom said:

"Well, sheriff, what have you got here?" pointing to the horse.

I saw through their ruse, and replied that I had been across the river after witnesses; that, in taking a short cut across the hills, I had missed the trail, and accidentally found the corral, where I had camped; that I was just ready to start for home when I heard their voices. The horse, I told them, appeared to answer the description of one that had strayed from a ranch down the valley. They both disclaimed any knowledge of or ownership in him. I however directed Tom to lead him out of the corral, and up the hill to the place I had left mine, making Dennis keep back of the horse, while I brought up the rear. They decidedly objected to such treatment, but I of course had secured Dennis's pistol, which gave me a great advantage in the brief controversy we had, and enabled me to force obedience. For some distance they kept up a conversation in the jargon previously alluded to, and although my education in that branch was limited, I understood enough to infer that they were discussing the practicability of creating a vacancy in the sheriff's office. I gave them no opportunity to execute their design, and when we reached my horse, I mounted and compelled them to preserve the same order of procession across the hills to town. When we reached my office, I locked them up, and telegraphed the owner of the horse, who was much pleased with my success. A. W. POOLE.

FREETHOUGHT IN AUSTRALIA.

In Australia, of late years, there has been quite a revival in Freethought, but free thinking is by no means a new thing in Australia; there were as many Freethinkers in proportion to the population thirty years ago when the goldfields were in full swing as there are to-day, but having no platform they disappeared for a time without recognition. The present revival is due to the propagandists who came out here under the auspices of the Bradlaugh association and founded what is known as the Australian Secular Association, of which, I believe, Mr. Joseph Symes of the Melbourne Liberator is president. Mr. Symes is an ardent and devoted worker, but he has had to contend against great odds. The clergy, or the government instigated by the clergy, have dreadfully harassed him from time to time and tried their utmost to silence his battery; but the bold Republican still keeps blazing away at them, right and left, from the Hall of Science, where he is fortified with the preparation of truth and challenges the whole host of superstition—I mean the clergy—to show one scrap of authority they have for bamboozling the people and stuffing their minds with holy lies to the prejudice of truth and progress. These gentlemen in black decline to accept the challenge, but still continue to issue passports to that hot country beyond the reach of mortal ken, for, as Mr. Symes truthfully remarks, according to their doctrine no one can get to the other place, wherever it is. Now, knowing this to be the fact, oughtn't they to be ashamed to stand up in their pulpits Sunday after Sunday introducing their congregations to the devil? It's an old saying that it is time enough to bid good-morning to the devil when you meet him, but they star the old fellow by ushering people into his presence unawares. Such nonsense might do to frighten European children to bed, but it won't wash in Australia. So much for pulpit ghost stories; they become as tedious and unmeaning as the literary algebra of the metaphysician, which goes to demonstrate nothing except it might be the pedantic stupidity of the writer.

We have here in Australia all classes and conditions of reformers—Republicans, Anarchists, and Socialists. All have a philosophy of some sort, but the Republicans have the advantage of experience as afforded by the United States of America, and the leading Freethought paper, the Melbourne Liberator, is their champion. The Anarchists have a philosophy teaching that at some immeasurable time beyond the reach of human calculation man shall have become so meek and docile, through evolution, that he will be inclined to mind his own business and not interfere with that of others, thus making him his own representative and governor; and for that matter we might consider each individual a nation, as they would then have to abolish commerce or represent themselves at foreign courts individually, which would be rather awkward, as they would leave no one at home. I have had a little experience with Anarchy. I was in California when it was governed by Anarchy, but it was co-operative Anarchy protected by the far-reaching arm of the Republic, which was a sufficient guarantee for its safety from foreign aggression. This is the sticking-point in which the individual is a failure. The California experiment, however, showed to the world that the hardy sons of toil could bring order out of chaos and make honest men of rogues and loafers, and govern themselves without the expense attendant upon government servants and institutions; but they may philosophize until they shall have exhausted the vocabulary of human thought and they cannot govern a nation without some diplomatic body, and the Anarchist liberty can exist only under the protection of a Republic. F. W. HARRIS.

* PRINCIPLES OF AMERICAN LIBERTY.*

When the fathers of the republic drafted the Constitution of the United States, it was their intention to effect a complete separation of church and state. For well the fathers knew what ecclesiastical rule was; what church domination meant.

In Europe, the church gained complete control of the temporal as well as the spiritual affairs; and what was the result? Intellectual gloom settled upon the civilized portions of that fair country; mankind became debased; Greek and Roman civilizations became extinct. Where once there had been enlightenment and wealth, there came ignorance and destitution. In the place of Aristotle, Plato, Archimedes, Euclid, there came a horde of ecclesiastics corrupting the people with their diabolical schemes for supremacy. In place of the Roman senate with its illustrious law-givers, there came the Vatican with its wicked, cunning popes. In place of the pagan schools, with their geometers and philosophers, there came church councils issuing ridiculous creeds. Instead of the farm and thrifty husbandman, there came the monastery with the monk and his crucifix. Europe was devastated by religious wars; witches were slaughtered, the Inquisition arose and flourished. The skies of Europe, for a thousand years were lurid with the flames of the auto-da-fe.

The founders of our government knew that if we maintained our liberties the church should be allowed no legal advantage—should be recognized only as an individual. The great principle of human rights, which the church did not know and seems to have not yet learned, that "all men are free and equal and have certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," was made the basis of American liberty. The great fact was clearly recognized that every individual has rights with which no government can, or should, tamper. These rights are liberty of conscience, free thought, free speech, freedom of religious exercises; the right to engage in such pursuits, seek such pleasures, as shall be consistent with the rights of others; with these principles: "That no person, no society, no government has a right to interfere in the natural rights of mankind; and that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

It is evident that our Declaration of Independence and Constitution of the United States are not based upon Christian liberty, but upon equality and justice. Our Constitution ignores the Christian religion. The Christian's God is not recognized; its savior is unknown; its holy book is not mentioned.

When our Constitution was before the states for ratification, it was then attacked by the over-zealous orthodox because in it there was no acknowledgment of the Christian's God—or in other words, because Christianity was not made the state religion. But under the leadership of the immortal Jefferson, who said it was the intention to found a purely secular government, our secular Constitution was adopted, and church and state were divorced. And as if anticipating the movement that is now going on among the churches, to supplant our secular government with a theocracy, an amendment to the Constitution was made which prohibited Congress from establishing any religion and granting freedom of speech and the press.

But at the present time a political party composed of a head, a body, and a tail—that is, the National Reform Association, Prohibition party, and Woman's Christian Temperance Union—is now attracting considerable attention. And the main object of this party is to secure a religious amendment to the National Constitution. That plank of their platform which demands the prohibition of the liquor traffic is only an ostensible object put forth to catch the votes of zealous but unsuspecting temperance people. But this party would far rather see its God in the Constitution than to see whisky out of the country. If these pious fanatics succeed in securing this religious amendment the wheels of progress will again turn backward; for the church is as much the enemy of "profane learning" and liberty as ever. The church opposes all learning, all science, which she cannot control and direct to her own benefit.

The Catholic church wants to engross the public education so that the child will advance in nothing but the catechism. The Protestants want to control our public schools so that astronomy will be taught according to Joshua, and geology according to Moses. As stupid as the church is, she knows that the next best thing to blissful ignorance, is a right good orthodox education. Give the church the power and she will become the same relentless persecutor as of old. The persecution and prosecution of the Spiritualists of Michigan, and the Seventh-day Christians and Infidels of Arkansas, Alabama, and Georgia, show too plainly what the intentions of the orthodox churches are, and what they would do had they the power. And what they expect to do when they get their religious amendment may be readily understood from quotations from "The Christian Statesman," which is the organ of the National Reform Association.

[Mr. Dawes then read several extracts from speeches and editorials from the Statesman which clearly proved that the intentions of the Christians are to establish a theocracy and directly at variance with the principles of American liberty, and urged the Liberals to arouse from their lethargy and oppose ecclesiastical interference in state affairs. Then he continued his address on the Demands of State Secularization.]

These demands are broad, liberal, and just. They recognize the rights of every one; they are in perfect harmony with the spirit of our American institutions and the strict letter of our Constitution, which recognizes religion as an individual affair, and as no concern of the state. It was never the intention of the American people to make the church a state institution. The state has no souls to save, no souls to damn. Churches are of no public utility. They are owned by corporations, and managed in the interests of these corporations. Why then should we exempt $1,400,000,000 worth of church property from just taxation? Church edifices are protected by the state. If a church building takes fire, the fire companies are on hand to save the building; if they chance to be destroyed by a mob, the state is responsible for the damage; why, then, should they not contribute their just proportion to the expenses of the state? When this vast amount of property is exempt from taxation it makes the burden proportionately heavier upon those who do pay taxes. Then people are compelled by taxation to contribute to the support of religious and sectarian institutions. The donations to the churches in exempting their property from taxation is not less than $20,000,000 annually.

If the population of the United States is in round numbers, sixty millions, then for every man woman and child there is paid from the public funds, for the support of the church, 33½ cents annually.

Mr. Dawes then showed the folly of supporting chaplains, and the injustice to the tax-payers by employing chaplains in the Congress, army, and navy of the United States, and the several state legislative halls, asylums, and penal institutions. And also the gross injustice of giving millions of dollars of the people's money to the various religious denominations for the support of sectarian institutions, under the guise of charities or educational establishments. That the amounts given to support the Christian religion by exempting church property from taxation, the salaries of chaplains, and the donations from public funds for the support of sectarian establishments cannot be less than $40,000,000 annually.

He further discussed that principle of state secularization, demanding that the Bible be excluded from the public schools; proving that the logical results of the use of the Bible in our public schools would be a complete breaking down of our public school system, and the establishment of sectarian schools; and also the necessity of abolishing the oath in all the departments of state, and establishing in its stead the simple affirmation under pains and penalties.

The oath does not make men truthful and honest, but the tendency of the oath was to make men dishonest and untruthful. The effect of the oath was simply to make a lie respectable. He quoted Christ's words regarding the oath, and also quoted from Peabody's "Moral Philosophy," proving that the oath in no sense enhances one's obligation to tell the truth or fill a promise. The form of the oath with "so help you God," expresses the idea which underlies it; it is therefore a religious custom and has no place in a secular government.

"Christian morality" assumes that there is one day in the week that is better than another, and the state has a right and should enforce the religious observance of this day. Here again the church establishes a false standard of right and wrong; that an act done on Sunday is wrong, though if performed on any other day of the week would be meritorious. It is not the day when an act is done that makes it either right or wrong, but it is the intrinsic fitness of the act. Under the mistaken idea of "Christian morality" and "Sunday observance" there have been furnished too many long-faced hypocritical Sunday pietists who would believe it wicked to enjoy themselves on the "Lord's day," but who have no compunctions about giving light weight or short measure, or otherwise cheating their fellow-men, on Monday. What we may expect if the "reformers" succeed in their theocratic schemes is a re-enacting of the barbarous code of Massachusetts and Connecticut, where a man could be fined for kissing his wife on Sunday, and every one was compelled to attend church or be fined, and the death penalty, according to the Mosaic code, could be inflicted for violation of the Sunday laws.

That the Protestant church looks upon all work or recreation on Sunday as criminal is evident from pulpit utterances, where the statement is often made that they "have more sympathy for a thief than for the person who desecrates the Sabbath." But Secularism, based upon equal rights and natural morality, says there is no day of the week better than another, no day too good to be devoted to the service of man. We say that those who wish to devote Sunday or any other day of the week to religious exercises, who wish to spend their time listening to the reading of impossible tales and nonsensical discourses, have the right and should be protected in that right. But we also insist that if we wish to go on pleasure excursions to the hills and groves where we can commune with Mother Nature in all her variations—to listen to the babbling brooks, the music of the leaves, the sweet caroling of woodland songster, or go to the theater, where human nature is represented in all its manifoldness, where truth and right are represented as triumphing over might and wrong, or go to the opera and listen to the soul-thrilling symphonies of a Wagner or a Beethoven, we have the right and should be protected in that right.

The desperate struggle of the church to enforce the Sunday laws is an admission on their part that they can neither entertain nor instruct. The Sunday laws are for no other purpose than to draw the people to the churches by forbidding them going elsewhere—to give the preachers a good fat living by working one day of the week while the great mass of toilers of the country manage to eke out a miserable existence by drudging through the other six.

There are thousands of people who will contribute to the support of the church and to a system they knew to be false—a system they know to be tyrannous and oppressive in its practice—but who in the privacy of their closets will whisper in your ear that they too are Freethinkers, but as Christianity is popular it is policy to countenance it; it would ruin their business to oppose it. Such as these are found among our business men, but most particularly politicians who are seeking notoriety through some petty office. They must pander to public prejudice; sordidly selfish, they are willing to sacrifice principle for profit, preferring the ephemeral praise of their "beloved constituency" to the lasting plaudits of a grateful posterity. Such men as these, wherever found, are cumberers of the ground; they are stumbling-blocks in the path of progress; they are to be feared, for they are treacherous friends and dangerous foes. For the sake of popularity they are willing, outwardly, to conform to the ceremonies of any religion. For the sake of wealth or power they would uphold the cross or kneel before the crescent, they would sacrifice to Brahma, or worship in a temple to the sun.

I do not wish to be understood that I would like to see Liberals raise a clamor on every street corner, or thrust their religious opinions in the face of every passer by. I would not have any Liberal bring the noble cause he represents into disrepute by letting his zeal outrun his discretion. But it is necessary that we be staunch and true to principle; never afraid to stand for the truth. We should ever be ready and willing to help along a cause we believe is right; ever ready to lend a hand, helping our fellow-men to a higher plane of right living and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.

Let us organize wherever possible, for organized effort may accomplish great work, while individual efforts only bring contempt and persecution. Let us give our moral and financial support to the Secular Union. We must also bear in mind that liberty can only be secured by a struggle and maintained at the price of eternal vigilance.

Let us press on in this intellectual contest bravely, firmly, courteously. To falter now would be to give up the fruits of a long and weary struggle; the scenes of that thousand years of midnight darkness would be acted once again, and the battles for freedom would have to be fought once more.

TOPOLOBAMPO.

Mr. W. N. Slocum, one of the Sinaloa, Mexico, colonists, writes as follows to the Carrier Dove from La Logia, Sinaloa, under date of October 3:

The season has been a good one for crops in most parts of this country, but the colony has not been fortunate. The colony farm at La Logia consists of four hundred acres, about one-third of which is low land near the river, subject to overflow, the other two-thirds being table land ten to fifteen feet higher than that in the bottom. The upland is usually too dry to produce crops without irrigation, and although there are ditches, the river seldom rises high enough to be of benefit to any but the low land. This season, however, we had copious rains, and the corn on the upland grew well. Before the time came for roasting ears, birds began to eat it. Worms were very plentiful, and woodpeckers first broke open the ears in search of worms, then blackbirds came in by thousands to finish their work. Every effort to drive away the birds was unsuccessful, and we were finally obliged to harvest it before it was ripe. Not one-fifth of a crop was saved. I do not think there were five bushels of shelled corn to the acre, and much of that is very poor owing to the must. The corn was planted in July. Early in September fifty acres of bottom land were planted in corn, but all of it was killed by water standing on it, the flood in the river remaining a week or more. A lot of barley and other crops were also destroyed.

More than half the corn used by the colony since I came here a year ago has been purchased from the Mexicans, and much of this has been musty, so much so as to be unfit for human food; yet corn and beans are our staple articles, and for months past we have had no beans, nothing but musty corn. Sweet potatoes and other vegetables are growing, but it will be a month or more yet before they will be ready for the table. If we had means for irrigation without regard to high water, we could, of course, raise vegetables at all seasons of the year, but as it is there are but two growing seasons, caused by the summer and the winter rains. The winters here are much like your winters in California, the weather being during January and February for days at a time cloudy and misty, with occasional gentle rains. The summer rains here are of short continuance, but very heavy, with thunder and lightning. Rain has fallen here this summer at the rate of one inch per hour for several hours in succession, and at Topolobampo on one occasion two inches fell within one hour. I spent one week there, about the first of September, during which time we had over seven inches of rain.

Recently a small irrigating pump has been erected on our farm which will enable us to cultivate a few acres in dry weather. Our orange orchard, seldom overflowed, is looking very well, but many other trees have died for want of water, or because of unfitness for this climate. Deciduous fruits do not seem to do well in this part of Sinaloa, which is about fifty feet above sea level, but they flourish finely in the foothills and mountains.

As I stated in a former letter, the success of this colony appears to depend upon the success of the projected railroad from Topolobampo through to the Atlantic coast. It need not depend upon that if we had capital to purchase land, and to construct an irrigating canal from the Fuerte river to the bay; but this colony has little money at present and none in prospective except such as depends upon the railroad. That is looked to as the coming savior. How long it will be coming is yet a question of doubt. Mr. A. K. Owen, the projector of the colony, still writes hopefully, but he is always hopeful, and as the people here do not know exactly what he bases his hopes on, they frequently become despondent. Then Mr. Owen writes them an encouraging letter, and they cheer up again; and so it goes from year's end to year's end. The last encourager is dated August 25 last.

In regard to the birds eating the corn, I do not mean to be understood that the birds here are a nuisance. If it were not for them we would be overrun with worms and insects, and could raise no crops at all, until we get irrigation facilities, so as to drown them out. We will have to fight the birds as they do in Egypt, not with shotguns, but with stones or some substitute. Egyptian fields are divided into sections, in the center of each of which a tower is constructed. On the top of the tower a man with baskets of stones, and sometimes a sling, keeps all birds away from his part of the ground without himself leaving his position. Here we follow swarms of birds round and round a large field, delaying but not preventing their breakfast. When they have eaten their fill they go away or take a rest, and all the difference I can see we make with their feed is to force them to work for it. As powder costs one dollar a pound and shot twenty-five cents, it is expensive business. Yelling at them seems to do no good. The Mexicans use bows and arrows, which are more effective than our mode, and arrows cast from the top of a tower would be still more serviceable. There are no stones on this farm. The soil is a sandy loam.

With regard to summer and winter crops, I believe the latter to be generally the better of the two. The sun is too hot in the summer for many plants, and the weeds too luxuriant. It is impossible to keep the weeds down. The sweet potatoes planted last March yielded well, but unfortunately they were dug before maturity through fear of the summer floods, and most of them rotted. They could not, on the bottom land, have been planted earlier on account of the winter floods. Those we now have growing are on the upland, but although the vines are rank, the prospect at present is poor, as the bulbs show no signs of filling. Perhaps they will come out all right later on. Tomatoes, squashes, pumpkins, and melons, all of which grew to perfection last spring, are not doing well as a summer crop. As we keep planting, however, we may mature a crop yet before January. The great trouble is that having no granary or cool warehouse here, nearly all vegetables rot as soon as they are out of the ground; the only remedy for which appears to be a constant succession of crops, which is something we cannot have until we construct irrigating ditches. On the whole this country does not seem to me equal to California as an agricultural region, although experience will, of course, teach better methods, and I do not forget that when Americans first went to California they considered the land worthless for agricultural purposes. Until we get irrigation facilities we can learn something from the Mexicans, although it is true that they live "from hand to mouth."

Most of them are miserably poor; nearly all are woefully ignorant, and the vast majority are virtual slaves. The landlords only are independent, and many of them live no better than the poorest laborers of California.

Our main article of diet here is corn meal, which for three months past has been almost invariably musty. Beans, the only other important article of food, we have for some time been destitute of, and when we have them they too are sometimes musty. Neither sugar, coffee, tea, rice, potatoes, wheat or rye flour can be obtained here by colonists in return for their labor credits; neither can such articles as soap, matches, coal oil, or in fact scarcely any of the things which poor people in California consider as the necessities of life. Since the settlement of the colony we have not had green vegetables to exceed three months in any year.

Those who have money can purchase supplies here or in the neighborhood, but nearly everything is high. Coal oil, for instance, is one dollar per gallon, and a very poor quality of soap costs double the price charged for a good quality in California. The same is true of nearly everything else. I know families who have expended over four hundred dollars for food alone since their arrival in the colony.

On the Trail.

To the Editors of Freethought:

As mapped out in my last letter, I took the steamer down the Columbia to Stella, Wash., where I arrived about noon and found my old-time friends and liberals, Postmaster Herring and his little true wife, still at the post of duty. Stella is a small "city" of two stores and one dwelling house, situated at the foot of a high, rocky bluff or mountain that juts up to the river, many hundreds of feet in height. The people to support the town or lectures live back in these woods miles away, but they come to all the lectures and support them well. Stella has had a feast of good things, as the church folks say, the present season. Underwood has given three lectures here; Mrs. Reynolds, three; Bell, two; Waisbrooker, two; Putnam, three; and "on the trail," two. This is the home of that old veteran of radical thought, Scharnhorst, who encourages and helps pay all our lecturers to come to Stella.

As it rained all the time I was there, I concluded to return to Portland and wait until the convention was over. At last the day came round and Freethought began marshaling its hosts, and by Saturday, hundreds were met together for the first time in Liberal conclave at Portland, to devise ways and means to unhorse superstition and to keep the red white and blue above the cross. Many had come three or four hundred miles, and it looked like a gathering of the faithful. I met many old familiar faces from my trail of last year in Oregon and Washington. These friends I was more than glad to see again. Friends are what give zest to life, and make it worth the living. Friends alone can make the lecturer's life a success, or his lectures either.

The convention was a big success in numbers and money donated to pay expenses, as it was announced at the first meeting there would be no fees charged at the door, nor contributions asked for, as there was cash plenty to pay all expenses. The speaking was fine and did credit to all our workers for Liberalism. The music was particularly good and everybody seemed to be happy.

The ball and banquet Tuesday eve was a royal success and lasted until golden dawn was about ready to climb the eastern hills. The guests will long remember Mrs. Carrie E. Haight's feast of good things, provided for this occasion. She was certainly the right person, in the right place for once. The day after the convention I boarded the train for Palouse country, in eastern Washington and Idaho. My first lectures were given at Garfield in the large new Christian church, where I was met by crowded houses, and all took Liberalism in the name of science, as if it was good for the soul as well as pabulum for the mind. I gave three lectures in Garfield, made many friends, and passed on to Palouse, a beautiful little "city" on Palouse river, which flows down from the mountains in Idaho. This is the great wheat country of Washington and Oregon. It is a hilly prairie country, but produces thirty, forty, fifty, and in some cases seventy-five bushels of splendid wheat to the acre. It is a very healthy country, having an elevation of some 2,500 feet above the sea, but is very cold at times in the winter; often old Mercury goes down 30 degrees below zero. I lectured here again in the Christian church to good audiences, but a theatre and steady rain interfered very much with my success. This morning, while at breakfast, I innocently called for "hot cakes for one," and when the waiter girl gave the order to the cook, a John Chinaman, he threw the rolling pin at her head, exclaiming, "Damma Melican man feelee head, me feelee you head." John was mad because I was late to breakfast; and thus am I ever unappreciated; even the moon-eyed celestial declares that I am "no goodee" and tries to "feelee head" of the innocent waiter girl.

Verily the lecture man sees both the fat and lean side of life, as he perambulates the country o'er, but we expect our crown and harp, not till we bid terrestrial life a kind farewell, and sprout wings for the flight up the golden stairway, to the beatitudes of celestial privileges. A few weeks more and I shall be with friends again in California. Liberals will please write me in care of FREETHOUGHT, wherever they want the "Trail" blazed for freedom in their vicinity, all without money and without price, and not too cheap to be good either.

Palouse City, Wash., Oct. 30. Yours ever, D. C. SEYMOUR.

Organization in Fresno.

To the Editors of Freethought:

It may be of interest to you to learn that on Sunday, Oct. 27, we organized a club here in Fresno, to be known as "Unity Club," and our bond of Union is the following:

"The undersigned hereby unite in the formation of an association to be known as 'The Unity Club of Fresno.'

"The objects and purposes of the club are mutual improvement, both moral and mental, the acquisition of knowledge and the promotion of the study of truth, and the practice of virtue.

"For the accomplishment of these ends we propose, when practicable, to have weekly meetings, and special meetings when necessary; to have lectures, sermons, essays, discussions, conversations, and such other methods as the club shall deem useful.

"All who wish to promote these objects are welcomed to this club, and become members thereof by signing these articles.

"It is not expected or required that all its members shall think and believe alike, in matters pertaining to religion or theology, any more than that they shall look alike.

"The object is to do good, and to make ourselves and our fellow-creatures better, wiser, and happier, as well as to promote virtue and lessen vice in the community."

Our meeting last Sunday was a remarkably interesting one. Next Sunday Geo. E. Church will lecture; and the Sunday following, Dr. Rowell will give us a Japanese sermon; so that we can compare the moral ideas of that people with our own.

The officers of the club are J. W. North, president; Mrs. Kellogg, secretary, and T. J. Kirk, treasurer. We hope to have singing next week and permanently thereafter. If you have any good suitable hymn or song book, please send me a sample.

We have Agnostics, Unitarians, Universalists, Spiritualists, and other saints, and they all agree in the objects stated in our articles. We have already over seventy members.

J. W. NORTH.

Fresno, Oct. 30, 1889.

M. RENAN, the distinguished French scholar, recently received at his country residence a visit from the Welsh Archeological Association, and in addressing his visitors he related this: "Here is an incident which happened, as I am informed, close by here, a few years ago. There was a little chapel dedicated to Saint Beuzec. That, I think, was the old name of Budoc. His stone statue having become almost shapeless, the priest started a subscription for its renewal. He raised about forty francs, and then bought, at an image shop in the Rue Saint-Sulpice, a Lourdes virgin, which he cunningly substituted for the decrepit statue. That is the way they suppress a saint to replace him with the effigy of dreary modern miracle."

A system of easily-comprehended rules and Chart by which any one can readily learn to cut Dresses, Basques, etc., in the most perfect manner. It contains the best ideas resulting from thirty years experience with Dress Charts and Tailor systems. It is adapted to the modern requirements of dress, and is used and indorsed by the best professional dressmakers of the East. It is as far superior to old methods as the steam car is to the stage. Price of the Chart, with full instructions, $10. By special arrangement we are able to offer the readers of FREETHOUGHT a liberal discount, for a short time. Write for particulars if you are at all interested in matters of household economy. This chart will save any family five times its cost in a single year.

Send 25 cents with bust and waist measure and number of inches from natural waist up as high as you wish the dress underneath the arm, for a sample pattern drafted to order, with full directions for making up, if you wish to test the system. To take the first measure correctly, place the tape above the bust, underneath the arms, and straight across the back, drawing it very tight. Write figures plainly. The Virgin Mary Powerless.

Dr. Charles Mackay relates the following incident:

"At a church in Halle is preserved a thigh-bone of the Virgin Mary, which has the reputation of working wonderful cures in case of female barrenness. Of this thigh-bone, or chasse, the following story is related: Once upon a time there resided in Ghent a couple who were blessed with all the riches of this world, but whose happiness was sore troubled for the want of children. Great was the grief of the lady, who was both beautiful and loving, and many her lamentations to her husband. The latter, annoyed by her unceasing sorrow, advised her to make a pilgrimage to the celebrated chasse of the Virgin. She went, was absent about a week, and returned with a face all radiant with joy and pleasure. Her lamentations ceased, and, in due course, she brought forth a son. But oh! the instability of human joys! The babe, so long desired and so greatly beloved, survived but a few months. Two years passed over the heads of the disconsolate couple, and no second child appeared to cheer their fireside. A third year passed away with the same result, and the lady once more began to weep. 'Cheer up, my love,' said her husband, 'and go to the holy chasse at Halle; perhaps the Virgin will again listen to your prayers.' The lady took courage at the thought, wiped away her tears, and proceeded on the morrow towards Halle. She was absent only three days, and returned home, sad, weeping, and sorrow-stricken. 'What is the matter?' said her husband. 'Is the Virgin unwilling to listen to your prayers?' 'The Virgin is willing enough,' said the disconsolate wife, 'and will do what she can for me; but I shall never have any more children! The priest is gone from Halle, and nobody knows where to find him!'"—Agnostic Journal.

It Tickled Him.

Friend—"Are you happy?"

Spirit (through medium)—"Perfectly so."

Friend—"What has pleased you most since you left us?"

Spirit—"The epitaph on my tombstone. It both amazes and delights me."

"I would have you remember, brethren," said the preacher, "the same master hand that contrived the celestial system fashioned the least of earthly atoms as well; the superb architect of the mountains arranged the minute threads of gold within them; and remember, friends, the God who made me made a daisy."

A LITTLE boy, hearing some one remark that nothing was quicker than thought, said he knew better than that; whistling was quicker than thought, and he had some marks on his legs to show for it. Being asked to explain, he said: "In school, the other day, I whistled before I thought, and got a licking for it."

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and under stand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast. G. W. THURSTON, Sr.

Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, New Jersey offers his valuable services to all those in need of a kind, sympathetic and skillful physician. Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been assailed and exposed by the press, but, Dr. Fellows, a specialist, in his line, stands foremost in his profession, and the encomiums showered upon him publicly as well as in private, are flattering evidences of the high appreciation and confidence his long and conscientious devotion to his specialties in his profession have so justly merited for him, and it is safe to trust him.

A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1888.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: The remedy you sent is working like a charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. Have only been using it one week, and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right. Yours respectfully, J. R.

REMARKS—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle-aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, but who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out-and-out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors. DR. FELLOWS.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future

Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously written. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

SAN FRANCISCO, - - - - NOVEMBER 16, 1889.

THE condition of the pope's health indicates that when he makes his next journey his destination may be some other place than Spain.

WHILE preaching in a schoolhouse near Eureka Springs, Ark., last Sunday evening the Rev. John Mayhew, a Free-will Baptist minister, fell dead in the pulpit. There is no moral to be drawn from the sad event.

EX-PRESIDENT CLEVELAND visited the White House at Washington the other day, and it is reported that after a visit with General Harrison the two parted in the best of spirits. The best of spirits should certainly be found at the White House, or none at all.

KATE DREXEL, the millionaire's daughter, has entered a convent and given five million dollars to the church. At the same time her brother enlists in the United States army at thirteen dollars per month, having squandered his inheritance in riotous living. Truly, the fools and their money are soon parted.

IF we may believe the cable, every tract society in Great Britain is deluging Charles Bradlaugh with religious literature informing him how he may be saved from damnation. We do not learn, however, that any of these societies, or any of his pious opponents in Parliament, have prayed for the recovery of his health.

THE editor of "The World's Advance Thought," a kind of Spiritualistic paper published in Portland, sends to a San Francisco journal the particulars of a colonization scheme on a large scale. He says that there are now enrolled one thousand heads of families and young men just starting out in life, having in hand $1500 per capita, or an aggregate of $1,500,000, who will next season emigrate and locate in a body (as nearly as practicable) in some county of California, Oregon, or Washington, and that others, through corresponding secretaries in various sections, are rapidly sending in their names for enrollment. The religious basis of the movement is called "soul-co-munion," a custom prevalent among its devotees of sitting in reverential calm at some appointed time and allowing their souls to commune with other souls in similar repose throughout the world. It is a harmless sort of lunacy.

"ALL days are alike holy" is good secular doctrine, but it seems that religiously the sentiment is equally true. Thus the Christians observe Sunday; the Greeks, Monday; the Persians, Tuesday; the Assyrians, Wednesday; the Egyptians, Thursday; the Turks, Friday; the Jews and some Christians, Saturday. The Christians, we believe, are the only sect in this country bigoted enough to try to enforce the observance of their holy day upon all the others.

"THE Devil is after me," said John J. Noonan, the other day, as he threw himself before the altar of a Catholic church in this city. He was a religious lunatic and was taken to the asylum. Michael Murphy followed Mr. Noonan to the same retreat under the delusion that he was St. Michael with a commission from heaven. Simultaneously Miss Fannie Leedham, daughter of an Arroyo Grande farmer, went to the same institution labeled "religious dementia."

THE Valley City, North Dakota, Democrat contains this suggestive item: "A few weeks ago Hon. John E. Remsburg lectured in the Academy of Music on the 'False Claims of the Church.' Next day the building was struck by lightning, no material damage resulting however. Some people said it was the wrath of God visited upon old man Olsen for allowing an Infidel to speak in the building. About ten days ago the Brooklyn Tabernacle was struck by lightning and destroyed—loss $150,000. Of course, there's no room for comparison in the two cases."

THE VICE-PRESIDENT AND THE W. C. T. U.

The proceedings at the convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, at Chicago, last Saturday, opened with a prayer and closed with a fight.

The trouble that is agitating this organization is of a political nature. There is a split in the ranks, and one division stands by the Prohibition party, while the other professes to be non-partisan. The Prohibition wing, however, charge that the non-partisans are working in the interests of the Republican party.

Last Saturday's difficulty arose from a desire on the part of a few members to condemn the whole Republican party as leagued with the rum power, because a hotel at Washington owned by our vice-president, Levi Morton, sustains a bar and has a retail liquor license. This raised a war at once, the non-partisan or Republican members denying that Morton had any connection with the liquor business. Where these pious ladies would have stopped in their warfare is uncertain if a man had not been appealed to. Ex-Gov. John P. St. John of Kansas gave the facts thus: Vice-president Morton fitted up a fashionable hotel in Washington and leased it to a man named Kernan. Kernan applied for a license. He had to get the consent of the property owners on each side, and they were Vice-President Morton and another man. Morton was the first to consent that liquor should be sold in the new hotel. Mr. St. John did not say that the whole Republican party should be condemned for the act of the vice-president, but he held that if Morton "had loved his country, God and humanity," he never would have signed that application, but would have forbidden the sale of liquor in his hotel.

Vice-President Morton was ably defended by a lady, who arose and said:

"I wish to say that there is such a thing as a necessity. The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, now in session, has its headquarters at the Palmer House. The Palmer House has a bar. It probably has a bar within its walls because it is a necessity. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union probably has its headquarters at a hotel where there is a bar because it is a necessity. We must also recognize that Vice-President Morton has a bar in his new hotel because it is a necessity."

This speaker was hissed down. Morton was condemned, and only the presence of mind of a member who moved that the matter be tabled saved the Republican party from being incontinently read out of the W. C. T. U.'s affections and esteem.

This quarrel, threatening as it does to disrupt the Women's Christian Temperance Union, should not be greatly regretted. It is a mischievous organization, and might be so regarded if it aimed at prohibition only; but it must be remembered that the W. C. T. U. includes, among its objects, enforced Sunday observance, God-in-the-Constitution, and the other religious encroachments contemplated by the so-called National Reform Association. Prohibition touches one of the outposts of liberty, but ecclesiastical legislation attacks its very citadel. We are not sorry, therefore, to see the movement given a set-back either by the quarrel at Chicago, or by the late election in Iowa.

THE ISSUE DECLARED.

Under the head of "California's Deepest Need—A Day of Rest," the "Pacific," a Congregationalist paper, says:

"At a recent meeting of the American Sabbath Association of California it was resolved to proceed at once with a vigorous and well-directed campaign against the present wide-spread desecration of the Sabbath. A large number of well-known and influential business men of this city showed their interest in the movement, not only by their presence, but by their remarks. The necessity of coping with the growing tendency towards indifference of Sabbath observance was discussed at length, and resulted in the determination to restore, by means of state legislature, the weekly day of rest to its proper position in the minds of the people. There is an evident and deeply-felt need on the part of all working men for at least one day's cessation from labor out of seven, and the sympathy and interest of the employers of labor in the present movement shows but the validity of the claim on all right-minded citizens. The object, indeed, is one which commends itself to the minds of all who have the well-being of their country at heart."

The above shows what Liberals may expect. It is a declaration of war by the enemy. Easy-going Liberals may think there is no chance for Sabbath laws in California, but the Christian churches are not of that mind. There is a set determination among them to uphold the Sabbath by legislation. The religious organizations are increasing in power and wealth. In several places they have already won the day at the ballot-box; they have enforced ecclesiastical domination. What they have accomplished in localities they mean to accomplish throughout the state. That they are growing stronger is evident, but it is not evident that they are growing more Liberal, and willing to respect the rights of the non-Christian. They do not conceal their purpose. A Christian political party is being formed in California. It is forcing the issue. The Sabbath is becoming a rally-cry. There may be some Liberal church members, but they will be brought under the party lash—they will vote according to the dictation of the priest. It does not follow that because Sabbath legislation has been repudiated in the past, it will continue to be in the future without constant agitation and enlightenment.

The people of California are changing. The population will receive an addition of hundreds of thousands during the next few years. Many of these will be Christians, perhaps a majority. It will not do to let things drift. Earnest action will be required. There is no doubt that the churches are in earnest; that they mean what they say and will push with all the power they have for Sabbath laws. Organization is absolutely necessary to meet this determined and unceasing effort. If Liberals do not unite for a common defense, they will find that the "vigorous and well-directed campaign" of the Christian party "will restore by means of state legislature the weekly day of rest to its proper position in the minds of the people."

The Christian party have outlined their work; they have made the issue. Shall the Liberals meet it, on their part, with a "vigorous and well-directed campaign?"

THANKSGIVING AGAIN.

Benjamin Harrison, president of the United States, has shown his lack of appreciation of the amenities of his position (as nearly all the presidents before him have done) by issuing the appended proclamation:

"Our highly favored people, mindful of their dependence on the bounty of Divine Providence, should seek a fitting occasion to testify their gratitude and ascribe praise to Him who is the author of their many blessings.

"It behooves them to look back with thankful hearts over the past year and to bless God for his infinite mercy in vouchsafing to our land enduring peace, to our people freedom from pestilence and famine, to our husbandmen abundant harvests, and to them that labor the recompense of their toil.

"Now, therefore, I, Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States of America, do earnestly recommend Thursday, the 28th day of this present month of November, be set apart as a day of National thanksgiving and prayer, and the people of our country, ceasing from the cares and labors of their working day, shall assemble in their respective places of worship, and give thanks to God, who has prospered us on our way and made our paths the paths of peace, beseeching him to bless the day to our present and future good, making it truly one of thanksgiving for each reunited home-circle as a nation at large.

"In witness thereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed."

It is prohibited to government officials to use government franks and stamps for any other than official business, and we would like to know where Mr. Harrison gets his authority to use the seal of the United States for business that is not official, but religious. A president is elected to exercise political, not ecclesiastical functions. His duties are prescribed by the Constitution, and that of acting as high priest to direct the religious worship of the people is not among them. A president should never be a partisan politician—he is not elected as a servant of his party, but of the whole people. Neither should he be a religious partisan. He ought not to take sides on the question officially. As a citizen he has the right to hold or express any religious views that he chooses, but as a president he is not called upon to deal with religious matters. But it seems that Mr. Harrison has chosen to take sides between those who believe in superstitious incantations before the name of a phantom and those who do not. An Atheist could not conscientiously join in the worship recommended, but he must do so or stand practically in contempt before the chief magistrate of the land. We maintain that it is unfair and unnecessary to place a citizen in that attitude, but at the same time, we hold that what a president says officially ought to go; it ought to be mandatory. When he issues a proclamation, that proclamation should stand and be obeyed. If he has a right officially to recommend a day of thanksgiving, he has a right to order one, and it is the duty of executives to see that it is heeded. The seal of the United States ought to be respected by every citizen, but as affixed to this thanksgiving proclamation it has no more legal force than the mark of John Doe or Richard Roe.

All this is apart from the matter of Mr. Harrison's proclamation, which contains some glaring misrepresentations. One unacquainted with the facts would judge from reading it that the past year had been a period of phenomenal prosperity and unalloyed happiness to all the people of the country; but on the contrary, the United States has been the scene of the worst disasters of the century. Floods have drowned thousands in a day; fires have destroyed whole cities; failure of crops in some parts has left the people in destitution; and the Divine Providence we are asked to thank has in no instance intervened in behalf of the sufferers. What have the people of Johnstown to be thankful for, except the relief fund? What did providence do for Seattle? What is it doing for the starving farmers of North Dakota? To thinking people this proclamation can suggest only things wherein providence has failed and it must seem like a grim piece of sarcasm to the hungry, the homeless, and the victims of a thousand ills. On the other hand, it is base ingratitude to those who sacrificed self to help others that they are not given honorable mention.

Taken all in all, the president's Thanksgiving proclamation is empty, absurd, and useless.

THE National Reformers, or God-in-the-Constitution party, are making overtures toward the Catholic church and seeking a union of forces in "resisting the progress of political Atheism." Evangelical Christians generally do not look with favor upon this scheme. The Catholic church, however, is willing. It will co-operate with Protestants whenever the Protestants are ready to become Romanists. We may some day see the Catholic tiger and her Protestant daughter in harmonious relations, but the conditions will be like those described by the poet:

"There was a young lady of Niger
Who smiled as she rode on a tiger;
When she finished that ride
Her place was inside,
And the smile on the face of the tiger."

THE last number received of the National Reformer contains this "Special Notice:"

"The 'Special Notice' last week will have prepared our readers for the announcement, which will be read with the sorrow with which it is penned, that Mr. Bradlaugh is lying dangerously ill. Prolonged overwork brought about its natural result, diminished vitality; and a cold, which would have been easily thrown off had he been in robust health, struck a weak point and brought on severe congestion. It is, of course, necessary that he should have absolute rest and freedom from all claims on his attention; correspondents must therefore be good enough to excuse silence, save where their letters can be answered by others. We have good hope that he will pull through this attack, and that a life so dear to his friends, and so valuable to the public, will be preserved. But in order that it may be so, he must have uninterrupted quiet. There is no possibility of his resuming his lecturing work on this side of Christmas, and it is likely that he will be ordered out of England as soon as he is strong enough to travel without danger. ANNIE BESANT."

THE Rev. Dr. Joseph H. Rylance, pastor of St. Mark's church, New York, is in the sort of trouble any clergyman may expect to get into who offends his congregation by being too Liberal. Dr. Rylance was a frequenter of Courtlandt Palmer's Nineteenth Century Club, and one of the talkers, we believe, at Stephen Pearl Andrews's "Colloquium." He is now the subject of scandalous charges, namely, consorting with Infidels, worldly conversation, profanity, and libidinous conduct. He has demanded a trial by the church committee, but failing to get one, has commenced a suit for slander against the authors of the charges, which are now reduced to two—swearing at a baggage smasher, and kissing some young women. The whole affair is almost too contemptible to be noticed.

IN London a parade called the Lord Mayor's show has been held. It was a medieval affair, and the people laughed and the press ridiculed. At Baltimore last Sunday a lot of Catholic priests got together and had a religious pageant. It was as absurd as the other, but the superstitious uncovered themselves, and the press slobbers over its "splendors," its "impressive ceremonies," and its "solemn services." This is of course done in subservience to the voting and moneyed power of the church; but we trust that where a fawning press gains the worthless patronage of one Romist it secures the lasting contempt of two American white men.

THE pastor and trustees of a Congregationalist church at Valley City, N. D., recently leased their church building to Miss Helen Putnam for the purpose of a lecture, and took the rent in advance, but upon discovering that she was a reverend of the Unitarian church they locked up their sanctuary and refused admission to herself and audience. North Dakota thus comes into the Union with good recommendations for bigotry in certain quarters. Perhaps that is why our pious administration gave her precedence over Montana and Washington.

ON October 6, Dr. Mary Weeks Barnett brought suit at Chicago for $50,000 damages against Frances E. Willard, president of the National W. C. T. U., Caroline E. Buell, and Esther Bugh, for circulating false and defamatory statements against the complainant, concerning the management of the National Woman's Temperance hospital. The members of this fanatical organization have more trouble with one another than with the wide and wicked outside world.

THAT most successful humbug, George J. Schweinfurth of Illinois, who has deluded many people with the belief that he is God incarnate, is a serious problem to the Christians of this country. They can easily prove him to be mistaken, but the trouble is that in doing so they perform the same service for his Galilean predecessor.

IN view of the spirited manner in which Colonel Knight continues the argument in the celebrated Terry case, the Hon. A. Schell might be excused if he reconsidered his determination not to write further on the subject.

Our Adventist contemporary, the Signs of the Times, argues:

"Just as surely as the prophecies relating to Christ's first coming were literally fulfilled, just so surely they will be concerning his second coming."

If the Signs would point out the prophecies foretelling the first coming of Christ, a skeptical world might be inclined to put more confidence in the alleged adumbrations of the second advent.

Why does Moses Hull exercise himself over the falsehoods of those two notorious slanderers, Braden and Bundy? Lies gain currency chiefly through the repetition necessary to their refutation. Let the dead past be its own undertaker. Remember that life consists of only four letters, and that three-quarters of it is "lie."

The advertisement of the "New York Dress Chart" in this paper should attract the attention of our lady readers. It is one of the kind of advertisements that we like to publish in FREETHOUGHT, because we can vouch for the truthfulness of its representations.

SIGISMUND DANIELEWICZ has been forced by circumstances to suspend the publication of the San Diego "Beacon." The paper has not appeared since September 1.

Nov. 2, 1889. A. F. NEUNERT.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Through your columns we wish to thank the ladies who so kindly gave their assistance and freely brought cakes for the ball and lunch given at the Oregon State Secular Union Convention. Especially we would thank Mrs. Geo. H. Dawes and Miss Nettie Olds, who sent cakes although unable to attend.

The Secular Union organized at Mr. S. P. Putnam's lecture by his zeal and energy has maintained its promising start, and bids fair to prove itself a thriving society. It gave on Tuesday evening, Nov. 12, an entertainment and ball as the first of a series. It has secured control of Central Hall for one year, and has come to stay. CARRIE E. HAIGHT.

OBSERVATIONS

"Do you know," said Judge W. D. Sawyer to me the other day when I met him on Montgomery near Washington street, "do you know there is a daily waste in our post-office department that few people ever stop to consider?" He lifted a handful of strings from his pocket, and continued: "I refer to the quantity of twine thrown away two or three times a day when the mail-carriers untie their packages to dispose of the mail intrusted to them for delivery. I would like to belong to the postal service long enough to get some figures about the number of yards of string run out to carriers every day, and then find out the contract price. Throughout the United States it must amount to a sum that has no insignificant effect upon the national treasury. When you and I were boys in New England forty or fifty years ago strings were not thrown away in this reckless manner. They would be gathered up, and if there was no other use for them they would go to the pedler for a piece of tinware. You remember how nice the water used to taste out of a new dipper that you could see your face in the bottom of every time you took a drink, and how often you would drink till the new got worn off. Think of the new dippers to be bought with the string thrown away in one day by our post-office department. If I were Postmaster-General Wanamaker I would make a ruling that every carrier should have a little satchel to deposit his strings in. This is a trifling matter, perhaps, but it is a good deal more necessary reform than stopping the delivery of Sunday mail on the star routes. I am in favor of economy in all public matters, national as well as municipal."

Brother Titus, of San Jose, has forwarded to this office a copy of the new hymn-book just introduced in the State Normal School of California, with the request that it be reviewed in these columns. If the reader will turn to the correspondence column of FREETHOUGHT for October 19, a review written by Mr. Titus himself will be found, which in a few terse sentences does the subject more complete justice than my feeble pen is capable of doing. I have examined the work, and it justifies the remark of Voltaire that things too foolish to be spoken are sung. It contains some old familiar hymns. The first one I ran across began thus:

Lord, in the morning thou shalt hear—

In my boyhood days the line following the above concluded the rhyme with

The cowbell on the brindle steer.

But I see it has since been revised. Brother Titus quoted some of the best of the book in his letter. He however omitted to make note of the anthems, which are indeed immense, one reading as follows:

Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Hallelujah! power and glory to the Lord Jehovah's name. Hallelujah to the Lord Jehovah's name. Praise our Lord, all ye who love the Lord, in holy songs of joy, in holy songs of joy. Praise our God, all ye who love the Lord—in holy songs of joy. Praise our God in holy, holy songs of joy.

Having repeated the foregoing until dizzy, proceed:

Praise our Lord in holy, holy songs of joy, in holy songs of joy.

In these extracts Jehovah receives all the praise he deserves, but the devil does not seem to get his due.

A hymn entitled "Longing" begins

"As pants the hart."

Upon due consideration I have concluded that, as pants, the hart would be a failure. Kids do as gloves, but the hart as pants has no claim upon our respect. If other reasons were wanting this hymn should exclude the book from our state normal school. We do not want our young ladies to say pants. Trousers is the accepted term in Boston, and California must not linger behind the East in these matters.

Again, we have:

Hark, hark, hark, Apollo strikes the lyre,

Which may be intended as a warning to the untruthful, though the writer's way of spelling is archaic.

I need not proceed further than to say that the indorsement of this hymn-book by the state of California is an act open to just criticism. Our schools, as I understand them, are designed to be secular, and to teach only such things as have been ascertained to be facts, but when in a school-book is found the statement that

Lord, when thou didst ascend on high
Ten thousand angels filled the sky—

We know that somebody has been drawing on his imagination. How does the state Board of Education know that ten thousand angels filled the sky when Jesus made his celebrated ascension? What authority is there for that statement? I pause for a reply which I do not expect to receive.

I picked up a country exchange that came in the morning mail, and after reading and admiring several paragraphs copied from FREETHOUGHT without credit, my eye rested on the following:

"THE WAY TO MASH WIDOWS.—There is a right and a wrong way to mash widows, and as this operation is generally dreaded, the following method will doubtless be appreciated, as it saves both time and labor: Choose a dull day, or at least a time when the sun does not shine on the widows, for when the sun shines on them it causes them to be dry-streaked. Take a painter's brush and dust them inside and out. It is not necessary to employ a hose, as that will soak off the paint. Take warm water diluted with ammonia—do not use soap. Wipe dry with a soft piece of cotton cloth. Polish with tissue paper or old newspaper, and your"—I take it all back. The above heading should have been read, "The Way to Wash Windows."

I trust that the following letters will serve in a measure to cheer Mr. J. H. Barry, under indictment for holding a court in contempt:

EUREKA, CAL., Nov. 3, 1889.

MR. MACDONALD, Dear Sir: I did not see your suggestion that five hundred friends of James H. Barry contribute one dollar each to make up his fine, but see it mentioned in your issue of Oct. 26. I remember the circumstances which caused the suggestion. Since an editor with backbone is an extreme rarity, I gladly contribute my dollar, which you will find inclosed, hoping that 499 who have the welfare of the human race more at heart than the fear of a puppet, will respond likewise. Should a smaller number respond, I am willing to double or triple the amount. I would rather go to hell on a cork leg than to see an editor in distress who has the moral courage to express his opinions and backbone enough to jump on the head of a rattlesnake irrespective of consequences.
Fraternally yours,
ROBERT GUNTHER.

SAN FRANCISCO, NOV. 10, 1889.

DEAR SIR: As I fully concur in the sentiments so forcibly set forth in the letter of Mr. Robert Gunther regarding Mr. J. H. Barry's eminent public services, I also cheerfully contribute herewith one dollar toward the fund therein referred to; and if it be necessary I shall send you four more, so as to make my subscription $5.

Mr. Barry's unflinching courage and unpurchasable honesty entitle him to the respect and support of all good citizens irrespective of creed or party. As a factor in the municipal life of this city he is invaluable. Silence his voice and how the rascals would rejoice! He is evidently a thorough believer in the axiom of Carlyle that "the best gospel of all is that no lie shall live."
D.

I presume it is understood with regard to this matter that no personal attack is made upon Judge Lawler. What this money is subscribed for is to defend the right of the press to criticise the acts of public officials. If that right can be exercised only at the cost of fine and imprisonment, the guarantees of a free press amount to nothing. I learn that subscriptions for Mr. Barry's defense are being generously made.

Lillian Harman, fellow-citizen of E. C. Walker, makes this sarcastic remark:

The editors of "E. C. Walker's Fair Play" are pleased to observe that George Macdonald frequently writes very entertaining articles for S. P. Putnam's FREETHOUGHT.

Herein is contained a rebuke to myself for having spoken of E. C. Walker's Fair Play without mentioning his associate, the fair Lillian. I beg such pardon as my contrition merits, both for the offense committed and for the many other offenses which I contemplate committing in the future. It is well for aspiring writers to be jealous of the credit belonging to them for good things done; but it is said that some at length grow weary of applause, and have but a languid desire even for recognition.

They learn to freight their little chip of desiccated wood-pulp with its printed thought and send it out upon the ocean of human indifference, regardless whether their name be borne with it or not, so long as its message gets where it will do some good. By disclaiming responsibility for their articles many eminent writers have kept out of jail, while the publisher served a long and laborious term of incarceration.

✕ BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

Mrs. Sara G. Lake, who recently died in San Francisco, was the widow of a Catholic priest.—An organization called the Church of Humanity was organized in this city last Sunday evening by Madam Delma Dusanne. Its creed is set forth as the Golden Rule. The Church of Humanity will meet Sunday evenings in the Alcazar building on O'Farrell street. It appears to be a Christian Socialist institution.—Senator Stanford's three-year-old filly Sunol trotted a mile over the San Francisco Bay District track last Saturday in 2:10½, beating the best previous record for three-year-olds.—At the rooms of the state board of trade in this city there is an onion raised in San Luis Obispo weighing eight pounds, and a ten-pound potato from Yreka.—One of the dives in this city which gave an exhibition representing Jesus Christ receiving the spirit of a dead child in heaven has been put under police surveillance. The second person of the trinity was represented by a man surrounded by female angels in tights; a doll did duty as the spirit, while the chorus sang "The Gates Ajar."—High license has closed forty saloons in Oakland, Cal., since Sept. 1.—The Rev. E. T. King, of Oakland, was in jail last week for being drunk and disorderly.—Washington is a state. The proclamation admitting her is dated Nov. 11.—F. J. Lee, who came to this coast as Sam Jones's private secretary, was sentenced at Sacramento last Monday to two years' imprisonment for burglary.—Orville A. Ross, at one time a Congregational preacher, and during the last few years a book peddler, murdered his wife and son last Monday near Lockeford, in San Joaquin county, and then committed suicide.

The Anarchists held a quiet celebration in Chicago last Sunday.—Dave Wambold, one of the original San Francisco Minstrels, died in New York Nov. 10, aged 54.—Kate Drexel, an heiress of $5,000,000, has entered a Catholic convent at Pittsburg, Pa. All her money goes to the church.—Robert P. Porter, superintendent of the census, announces that a portion of the statistics gathered will be issued in 1890, and the work completed in 1891.—The Rev. C. Hudson Smith, pastor of the Pilgrim Congregational church in Boston, who came to San Francisco on a tour last spring, has again disappeared, and his flock do not know where to look for him.—George Francis Train has been released from jail in Boston. Judge McKim decided that Train was not insane enough to be dangerous nor sane enough to be held for debt.—Montana has been admitted into the Union by a presidential proclamation dated Nov. 8.—The will of Samuel J. Tilden, who left $4,000,000 for educational purposes, has been broken and the estate goes to his nephews and nieces.—There has been a terrific blizzard and snow storm in southern Colorado and northern New Mexico. Passenger trains were snowed in for three days, and passengers and trainmen drew on the express and freight cars for food. Some loss of life is reported. Thousands of sheep were stampeded and lost.

Peter Jackson, the Australian negro, defeated the champion pugilist of England, one Smith, last Monday morning.—The Lord Mayor's Show in London Nov. 9 was witnessed by 2,000,000 people. It was a medieval pageant, and its antiquities were gazed by the crowd.—The pope of Rome is so feeble in health that his physicians have forbidden him to hold any more receptions.—Tchernychevski, the recently pardoned Siberian exile, died last week. He was a famous Nihilist.

THE SHERIFF'S STORY.

A NARRATIVE OF ADVENTURE, IN THREE CHAPTERS, ILLUSTRATING THE INFLUENCE OF THE CHURCH IN RESTRAINING CRIME.

CHAPTER III.

Dennis being very desirous that the "ould woman" should be informed of his trouble, I told him that I would go out the next day, which I did. When I came in sight of the place, the stone chimney was standing solitary and alone. The house was in ashes.

Near where the door had been, lay the upper portion of a human skeleton, the lower part burnt to a cinder. Near the right hand was a bottle, cracked by the heat. In the charred remains I recognized all that remained of Mary. Dennis manifested but little emotion when I informed him of Mary's fate, but asked if I had found anything among the ruins. I told him I had made no search. He said the "ould woman" had a few silver spoons and some trinkets in a trunk by the window. I caused the remains to be buried by the coroner, and during the week rode out, made a search among the ashes, and found a large lump of metal. It had evidently been a vessel of some kind, but was melted out of shape; still some of the chasing was visible, which convinced me it was silver and that I had seen it before. I took it home and sent it to an assayer in San Francisco. His return was, "silver 120 oz., 890 fine; value $145.00." "My one hundred dollars' reward has been a long time delayed," said I to myself, "and yet the interest is fair."

Dennis was indicted by the grand jury, but his trial continued until the next term of court. On my return one evening from a ride, my jailer informed me that a Catholic priest from San Francisco had called to see Dennis, had expressed a wish to see me, and would call the next morning. The jailer said that as he was a priest, and a very pleasant, affable old gentleman, he let him go with Dennis to his cell, where he remained an hour or more. He brought as a present for Dennis a package containing a prayer-book, some tobacco, and a pair of slippers.

"Was his name Flannigan?" I asked.

"Yes; do you know him?"

"I have heard of him; come with me." It was about the time for locking the prisoners in their cells for the night.

"You had a visitor to-day, I understand," I said to Dennis.

"Yes, Father Flannigan, God bless him; he knew me in the old country, heard I was in trouble, and came to see me."

I found the slippers in Dennis's cell, under his blankets, and, unnoticed by him, put them in my coat pocket, and took them to my office. There, with my knife, I ripped out the inner soles; underneath one was a saw; the other contained a thin file.

Early the following morning, Father Flannigan called upon me, and requested a private conversation. His obesity had increased considerably since our last interview, but I would have known him under any circumstances. His greeting was effusive. I closed the door, and placed a chair for him.

"You are not a Catholic, I presume," he said.

"No," I replied, "but I have had opportunities of observing the influence the church exerts in restraining crime."

At this reply the holy father fairly gushed. He expressed delight to find such intelligence, liberality, such absolute freedom from bigotry, assuring me that it would be the sole pleasure of his life to exert his influence in my behalf in any political aspiration I might have. I listened to his fulsome flattery, well aware of what would follow. After fairly deluging me with blarney, he settled down to business. He said he knew Ryan and his parents in the old country, and having been informed of his trouble, considered it his duty to visit him. He said he couldn't think it possible that he was guilty of the crime with which he was charged; thought it possible that he might have been a little wild in his youth, but that his reputation for honesty and industry had always been excellent. Pathetically alluding to his crippled condition, he implored me to deal leniently with him.

"How did he lose his arm?" I asked.

"While working in one of the Eastern cities he was attacked by a gang of nagurs, and struck with an ax on his shoulder; the joint was injured and he was compelled to suffer amputation," he replied.

"I see that you have met with some accident," I remarked, pointing to the index finger of his right hand. "May I ask how that occurred?"

"Oh, yes, it was a terrible affair; a gang of robbers broke into my residence one night, during my absence in the discharge of my sacred duties, and in entering my study on my return home I surprised them, just in the act of leaving with their plunder. They had taken some silver plate belonging to the church, and in my zeal to protect what the good Lord had entrusted to my care I rushed upon them and endeavored to effect their capture; but there being three stalwart desperadoes, I was overpowered, my finger, as you see, nearly severed by a knife in the hands of one of them, and I was beaten to insensibility."

"Would you be able to identify your assailants?" I asked.

"Oh, no, it occurred many years ago, and I was so brutally beaten, that I don't think I could have recognized them the next day."

"You damned black-hearted scoundrel!" said I, rising from my chair in my no longer controllable anger; "look at me! I am the three stalwart desperadoes. I am the man that nearly severed your finger with my teeth, and well I remember your howls and oaths, while you and your brother Mike, alias Dennis Ryan, were beating me to insensibility."

He turned ashy pale; his jaw dropped until his chin rested on his chest.

"Yes, I'll be lenient with both of you," I continued; "your crimes would not be expiated if hell's lowest level and hottest corner was reserved for you, and eternity multiplied by a million. Go and perform one decent act; commit suicide, and save the state the expense, and the hangman the unpleasant duty of breaking your brutal neck."

I opened the door, through which he tottered, pale and speechless. My jailer noticed him as he staggered through the hall, and assisted him to the hotel. I learned that he left the next morning for San Francisco.

The following week I saw in a San Francisco paper the following item:

We regret to learn of the death of Rev. Father Flannigan. He was found dead in his study, on Tuesday morning. It is supposed that he died in a fit of apoplexy. A solemn requiem high mass for the repose of his soul will be celebrated at the church of the Sacred Heart next Sunday.

At Ryan's trial, the district attorney seemed not to manifest his usual energy in prosecuting the case, accepting as a juror a man against whom I had cautioned him. The jury failed to agree, standing eleven for conviction, and one for acquittal.

The district attorney was a talented young man, and a candidate for re-election. He charged me with being unduly prejudiced against Ryan and his nationality, and advised me not to be too zealous in the case, as it might offend his friends, and affect my chances for re-election, should I again be a candidate. At the second trial a verdict of guilty was rendered, and when Dennis was asked by the court if he had anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon him, he arose and made a pathetic appeal for mercy, stating that perjury had been committed by the witnesses for the prosecution; that the sheriff—looking around reproachfully at me—appeared to have a spite "agin'" him; that he had always been an honest, industrious man, asserting with tearful earnestness that he was a victim of a plot, but absolutely innocent of the crime of which he had been convicted.

The judge, who was a very kind-hearted man, and a candidate for re-election, was moved to tears by his pathetic appeal and sentenced him to one year's imprisonment.

While crossing the bay with him, on the way to prison, I seated myself beside him and said:

"Dennis, we Yankees have the reputation of being good at guessing. Now I want you to tell me if I am right in the guesses I am about to make."

His countenance expressed wonder, but the expression changed as I proceeded.

"I guess that after you and your brother, Father Flannigan, caught me in the attempt to recover the silver pitcher you stole from the Widow Blank, beaten me nearly to death, bound and dragged me to the cellar, you intended completing your work by throwing me in the river; but you got drunk, and when you awoke from your drunken sleep and found that I had escaped, you traced me to Uncle Pete's; that you murdered him and his wife, as you would have murdered me had I remained; and I guess that Uncle Pete, in fighting for his life, struck you with his hatchet, from the effect of which you lost your arm."

The power of speech seemed to have deserted him. He gazed at me, apparently dazed with horror, without uttering a word.

On my next visit to the prison a few weeks later, the officials informed me that he died a raving maniac. They first suspected he was feigning insanity, and watched him. He would throw himself against the walls of his cell, begging piteously that the "nagurs" should not be permitted to kill him.

"One more angel," thought I.

GIORDANO BRUNO.*

THOSE WHO OBJECT TO THE MONUMENT JUSTIFY THE MURDER.

The night of the Middle Ages lasted for a thousand years. The first star that enriched the horizon of this universal gloom was Giordano Bruno. He was the herald of the dawn.

He was born in 1550, was educated for a priest, became a Dominican friar. At last his reason revolted against the doctrine of transubstantiation. He could not believe that the entire trinity was in a wafer, or in a swallow of wine. He could not believe that a man could devour the Creator of the universe by eating a piece of bread. This led him to investigate other dogmas of the Catholic church, and, in every direction, he found the same contradictions and impossibilities supported, not by reason, but by faith.

Those who love their enemies threatened his life. He was obliged to flee from his native land, and he became a vagabond in nearly every nation of Europe. He declared that he fought not what priests believed, but what they pretended to believe. He was driven from his native country because of his astronomical opinions. He had lost confidence in the Bible as a scientific work. He was in danger because he had discovered a truth.

He fled to England. He gave some lectures at Oxford. He found that institution controlled by the priests. He found that they were teaching nothing of importance—only the impossible and hurtful. He called Oxford "the Widow of true learning." There were in England, at that time, two men who knew more than the rest of the world. Shakespeare was then alive.

Bruno was driven from England. He was regarded as a dangerous man,—he had opinions, he inquired after reasons, he expressed confidence in facts. He fled to France. He was not allowed to remain in that country. He discussed things—that was enough. The Church said, "Move on." He went to Germany. He was not a believer—he was an investigator. The Germans wanted believers. They regarded the whole Christian system as settled; they wanted witnesses; they wanted men who would assert. So he was driven from Germany.

He returned at last to his native land. He found himself without friends, because he had been true, not only to himself, but to the human race. But the world was false to him because he refused to crucify the Christ of his own soul between the two thieves of hypocrisy and bigotry. He was arrested for teaching that there are other worlds than this; that many of the stars are suns, around which other worlds revolve; that Nature did not exhaust all her energies on this grain of sand called the earth. He believed in a plurality of worlds, in the rotation of this, in the heliocentric theory. For these crimes, and for these alone, he was imprisoned for six years. He was kept in solitary confinement. He was allowed no books, no friends, no visitors. He was denied pen and paper. In the darkness, in the loneliness, he had time to examine the great questions of origin, of existence, of destiny. He put to the test what is called the goodness of God. He found that he could neither depend upon man nor upon any deity. At last the Inquisition demanded him. He was tried, condemned, excommunicated, and sentenced to be burned.

According to Professor Draper, he believed that this world is animated by an intelligent soul—the cause of forms, but not of matter; that it lives in all things, even in such as seem not to live; that everything is ready to become organized; that matter is the mother of forms, and then their grave; that matter and the soul of things, together, constitute God. He was a Pantheist—that is to say, an Atheist. He was a lover of nature—a reaction from the asceticism of the church. He loved the fields, the woods, the streams. He said to his brother-priests: Come out of your cells, out of your dungeons; come into the air and light. Throw away your beads and your crosses; gather flowers; mingle with your fellow-men; have wives and children; scatter the seeds of joy; throw away the thorns and nettles of your creeds; enjoy the perpetual miracle of Life.

On the seventeenth of February, in the year of grace 1600, by the triumphant beast, the Church of Rome, this philosopher, this great and splendid man, was burned. He was offered his liberty if he would recant. There was no God to be offended by his recantation, and yet, as an apostle of what he believed to be the truth, he refused this offer. To those who passed the sentence upon him he said: "It is with greater fear that ye pass this sentence upon me than I receive it." This man, greater than any naturalist of his day, grander than the martyr of any religion, died willingly in defense of what he believed to be the sacred truth. He was great enough to know that real religion will not destroy the joy of life on earth; great enough to know that investigation is not a crime—that the really useful is not hidden in the mysteries of faith. He knew that the Jewish records were below the level of the Greek and Roman myths; that there is no such thing as special providence; that prayer is useless; that liberty and necessity are the same, and that good and evil are but relative.

He was the first real martyr—neither frightened by perdition, nor bribed by heaven. He was the first of all the world who died for truth without expectation of reward. He did not anticipate a crown of glory. His imagination had not peopled the heavens with angels waiting for his soul. He had not been promised an eternity of joy if he stood firm, nor had he been threatened with the fires of hell if he recanted. He expected as his reward an eternal nothing. Death was to him an everlasting end—nothing beyond but a sleep without a dream, a night without a star, without a dawn—nothing but extinction, blank, utter and eternal. No crown, no palm, no "Well done, good and faithful servant," no shout of welcome, no song of praise, no smile of God, no kiss of Christ, no mansion in the fair skies—not even a grave within the earth—nothing but ashes, wind-blown and priest-scattered, mixed with the earth and trampled beneath the feet of men and beasts.

The murder of this man will never be completely and perfectly avenged until from Rome shall be swept every vestige of priest and pope, until over the shapeless ruin of St. Peter's, the crumbled Vatican and the fallen cross, shall rise another monument to Bruno—the thinker, philosopher, philanthropist, pantheist, and martyr.

R. G. INGERSOLL.

A REMARKABLE SERMON.

The present industrial system was arraigned and adjudged faulty in a sermon by the Rev. J. A. Cruzan at the Third Congregational church of San Francisco last Sunday night. The subject was "Our American Barons and Their Serfs," and the discourse was the first of a series of three on the "Present Social and Industrial Condition" of the country. A large audience heard the sermon, in the course of which, as reported by the Chronicle, the Rev. Mr. Cruzan said in theory that the Americans were intensely democratic, but that there was a class who had all the power of the old barons without any of their virtues. Many men in this country named the governor of their state as they would their clerk, and chose United States senators as they do employes. Their will in the legislatures was as the will of the czar among his creatures. The currents of the time were sweeping us back; the development of the industrial system tended to make masters and slaves. The Pennsylvania coal baron voted his miners, the railroad magnate voted his "hands," the big farmer voted his men, and they perpetuated their bondage by their ballots. The dependent class was free in name, but in reality they were serfs. Pauperism was growing more prevalent in the older cities. The black man before the war was cared for by his master when old age overtook him. The poor man to-day had only the almshouse to look forward to. The wage slavery of to-day was therefore worse than that slavery that existed before the war. The conditions among the poor were very bad. In New York they were crowded worse than in Peking, and the blood of the speaker boiled when he thought of the manner in which his fellow man was enslaved. There would be a great struggle in the future. The industrial and wage system would have to be changed.

"The great change is coming," he cried; "hear it, men of millions, in your castles, having in your hands the destinies of your fellow men; hear it, ye miners working for 70 cents a day. The change is coming; peaceable means, we hope, but by some means. Will not one French revolution suffice, or must there be two? There will be two, if needed; there will be twenty, if needed; there will be just as many as are needed."

ROME IN AMERICA.

"From the immigrants neither national patriotism nor a sense of civic duty can as yet be expected; the pity is that they have been allowed civic power. Political opinions they can hardly be said to possess, for they have not had time to learn to know the institutions of their new country. Such of them as are Roman Catholics are ready to stand by whatever party may obtain the favor, or be ready to serve the interests of their church."—Prof. James Bryce, M. P., The American Commonwealth, vol. iii., p. 72.

The plea that onlookers sometimes see more of the game than the players must be my excuse for uttering a word of warning to our American friends on the growth of the Catholic church in their country. On any question of party politics or personal rivalries it might be impertinent to offer an opinion. Every country has its own difficulties with which it is itself fittest to deal. On such important questions as Mormonism, the Chinese immigrants, negro illiteracy and superstition, laws of marriage and divorce, our views, though definite, would be expressed to Americans with some reserve. But in the case of the Roman Catholic church in America we are dealing with a great religion, whose principles are clearly defined, have often been manifested in history, and are in blank opposition to those principles upon which the constitution of the great Republic of the West has been founded. No sincere admirer of the Republic can regard with unconcern the growth within her midst of an enemy, who, if strong enough, must inevitably destroy her, nor should the proverbial sensitiveness of our Transatlantic friends prevent us from asking them not to disregard with apathetic indifference the lessons gained by the experience of older countries. The danger may not be imminent. That is but the more reason for looking at it in time. A few figures will show that it is growing.

In 1776 the total population of the United States was 3,000,000 and the Roman Catholic population, 2,500, or 1-120th. In 1800, total population, 5,300,000, Catholic 100,000, or 1-53rd. In 1830, population had increased to 13,000,000, Catholic, 600,000, or 1-21. In 1876 with 40,000,000 the Catholics were 6,500,000, or 1-6th, and now they claim a population of over seven millions. In 1840 they had but 18 bishops, they now have 85. Increase of population and emigration is everywhere encouraged by the Catholic priests with a view of overwhelming by sheer force of numbers, the heretics, who restrain their population, and America is the great dumping-ground of what must, with all deference, be considered the scum of Europe.*

In 1883 there were, according to the official report, 6,546 fully ordained Romanist priests in the United States, but the seminaries at Baltimore, Milwaukee, Woodstock, Cincinnati, etc., are turning them out so fast that the number must now approach

8,000. There are also in Europe, American colleges at Rome and at Louvain for the purpose of preparing candidates for the United States. Many are also sent from the Missionary College of All Hallows, Drumcondra, Ireland. All these are virtually an army of occupation under orders from Rome and owing allegiance, by no means to the land of their residence, but to the pope at Rome.

The United States is considered not as a Christian but as a heathen land to be missionized. Hence the whole of the affairs of the Catholic church are legally conducted at Rome through the Congregation De Propaganda Fide. No parishes have been canonically instituted as in Canada and Mexico, and consequently there are, save in few instances, no parish priests properly so-called. The priests are ordained sub titulo missionis, and are bound in obedience only to the bishops, who, in their turn, are bound to Rome. They are citizens of the American republic in no other sense than that they dwell there in order to propagate their master's power. To this end they use without scruple the Roman Catholic vote.

Now the Roman Catholic voter is a factor in politics, which those who most dislike him cannot afford to leave out of account. He is a power to be courted and dreaded. His name is Legion. He votes en masse, and his vote can never be surely counted on until Sunday mass before the election, when the word is passed round "so and so is the man"—under penalty of spiritual censures. The man, of course, is the only one who has privately engaged to procure the largest subvention for the institutions of the church. Wherever the Catholic vote is a power there is political corruption. When the Tweed ring in New York was exposed, its managers were politely invited to subscribe to the Catholic cathedral. The invitation brought nearly $200,000, and, to the astonishment of good citizens, Tweed was, despite his exposure, re-elected to the state senate. The city contractors under Tweed received double prices from the public treasury for their work; but before they secured a contract they were invited to subscribe large sums to Roman Catholic institutions and did so. The condition of the Catholic vote is always the same. Aid to the church; grants of real estate and donations from the public funds to its schools and charities, many of which have been instituted with the express purpose of subserving the interests of the church under the pretence of benevolence. In New York alone, in one year, the Roman Catholic church obtained more than $400,000 or £80,000 from the public treasury, and throughout New England (which might now as appropriately be called New Ireland) the same practice of virtually establishing and endowing a sect extensively prevails.

The continual acquisition of real estate by the church, or indeed by any corporation, is a serious matter. Priests having no heirs among whom to divide the wealth, often gained by threatening the aged and sick with the terrors of the next world,* it accumulates in a rate altogether disproportionate with that of the rest of the community. All the old countries have experienced this. In England before the stringent statutes of mortmain, the church had got possession of one-third of the property of the kingdom, and Blackstone says that but for these statutes ecclesiastical corporations would have engulfed the whole real estate of the country. Once allow a church the right to acquire, hold, and use property without taxation and without limit, and resort must finally be had to confiscation to preserve something for the people. The Catholic countries, Italy, Spain, and Mexico, have found this, and have been forced in their need to fall back upon the stores accumulated by their black armies of non-producing priests, monks, and nuns.

An equally serious matter is the recognition of sects in the matter of public education, and the division of the public funds among sectarian schools. To this end all the efforts of the Catholic authorities in America are now being directed. The motto of the republic has been Free Religion, a Free State, and Free Schools. Break down the last and the former will soon follow.

* Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins of the New York bar gives figures showing that a child trained by Catholics is three and a half times as likely to become a pauper, and more than three and a quarter times as likely to get into jail as a child trained in the free public American schools.

* The instructions given in the secret manual of the Jesuits, are to be on the watch for aged people of large estates who have no children; or if they have children, then to excite prejudice against them, and obtain wills, if possible, giving their estates to the institutions of the church.

Here again America should heed the experience of Europe. Wherever the Catholic church has had the power it has permitted no schools to exist, and allowed no one to teach unless approved by ecclesiastical authorities. Indeed in all things it places ecclesiastical laws above civil ones, and anathematizes all who say the state has any authority over the church. On the all-important question of marriage it declares that no true union can be contracted without the participation of the church. Civil law holds it bigamy for a man to have two wives. The church holds that if the first wife is not a Catholic, and the first marriage not performed by the church, there has been no true marriage, and consequently no true bigamy. The first allegiance of the Catholic must ever be paid to his church. His duties as a citizen have a secondary and wholly subordinate position, as inferior indeed as man is supposed to be to God. It is just because Catholicism is the most consistent in its pretensions that it is the most dangerous of religions.

The church of Rome in America is, indeed, an imperium in imperio. Difference of religious belief holds the Catholics together and makes them retain a body of separate opinion able to resist the solvent power of its American environment. The proof is in the Catholic journals which, for instance, when recently the American Legation at Rome intervened to prevent the sale of the American College by the Italian government, boasted that Signor Crispi had been ordered to halt under threat of war, and declared that the concession was but a prelude to a crusade which would restore the pope his temporal power.

Our friends in the United States should note what the Jesuits have been doing in Canada. The recent act, by which four hundred thousand dollars have been paid out of the public funds to the Society of Jesus, as Professor Goldwin Smith points out in the current number of Macmillan's Magazine, but one of a series of steps having for their object the establishment of the Catholic church, with the pope as the recognized head. The act, indeed, by submitting the settlement to the pope for sanction, formally recognizes his authority in Canadian legislation, and no government is strong enough to exercise its veto against this innovation. Protestants and Freethinkers are divided or apathetic, but the church, which knows what it wants, can, barring its illiterates, show its power at the polls to the very last man.

I have called this a note of warning. It is not one of fear. America has the strength of youth. Let it but heed the experience of age, and it will soon grapple with and overthrow the power that threatens to nullify its grand experiment of a self-governing people.—J. M. Wheeler in the London Freethinker.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION OF THE A. S. U.

ARTICLE I. The name of this association shall be the American Secular Union.

ARTICLE II. The general object of this association shall be to secure the total separation of church and state, to the end that equal rights in religion, genuine morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood be established, protected, and perpetuated.

ARTICLE III. As means for the accomplishment of this purpose the specific work of this society shall be to advocate:

- (1) The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.
- (2) The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.
- (3) The repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution, rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons.
- (4) The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character.
- (5) The abolition of ecclesiastical chaplaincies paid out of the public treasury.
- (6) The discontinuance of the practice of the appointment by the president of the United States and the governors of the several states, and other civil public officers, of religious festivals and fasts.
- (7) The substitution of a solemn affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury in the courts and in all other departments of the government, in place of the common forms of a judicial oath.

(8) The defense through the courts of any American citizen whose equal religious and political rights are denied, or who is oppressed on account of any opinions he may have held or expressed on the subject of religion.

(9) The promulgation by all peaceable and orderly means of the great principles of religious liberty and equal rights, devotion to truth for its own sake, and universal brotherhood on the ground of a common humanity; to secure the state from the encroachments of the church, and to foster the development of intelligence and morality, which constitute the all-sufficient basis of secular government.

ARTICLE IV. The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both religion and politics, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but honestly welcomes all persons of whatever faith or party to its membership on the basis of "no union of church and state." The word secular is here used in the broadest sense, as applied to the state, and not to any system of religion or philosophy.

ARTICLE V. Any person who shall pay $1 into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the American Secular Union, and shall be entitled to a vote in all meetings of the society, providing they shall have been members for three months immediately preceding, and if the Congress shall so permit by a two-thirds vote. Any person who shall pay $25 or more into the treasury at once shall be entitled to a similar certificate, and shall have a vote without regard to the date of membership. All life members of the National Liberal League, formed in 1876, shall be life members of the American Secular Union.

ARTICLE VI. The annual Congress of the American Secular Union shall be held at such time and place and with such sessions as the Board of Directors may announce, and public notice of the Congress shall be given at least one month previous. Other conventions of the Union may be held at such place and time as the Board of Directors shall appoint.

ARTICLE VII. The officers of the American Secular Union shall be a President, four Vice-Presidents, a Corresponding Secretary, and a Treasurer, who together shall constitute a Board of Directors and shall hold their office one year or until others are elected. Four of these seven officers, on due notice to the whole, shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. The President, Corresponding Secretary, and Treasurer shall constitute an Executive Committee, to act under authority of the Board. One or more Field Secretaries, Lecturers, or Organizers may be appointed by the Directors to promote the general objects of the Union. Men and women shall be equally eligible to these offices.

ARTICLE VIII. The President shall preside at the public meetings of the association and at the meetings of the Board of Directors and the Executive Committee, and shall have the general direction and supervision of all business, under authority of the Board.

ARTICLE IX. The Corresponding Secretary's duty shall be to keep the records and complete lists of life and annual members, and also full minutes of the meetings of the Board of Directors and of the Executive Committee, prepare and transmit to the newspapers of the country items of interest relating to the work of state secularization, keep a full list of auxiliary societies, and conduct such correspondence, under direction of the President, as usually pertains to such office, and shall make a condensed annual report to the society of the business of the year. His or her salary and the location of the office shall be settled by the Board of Directors.

ARTICLE X. The Treasurer shall receive and hold all funds of the Union subject to orders duly drawn by the Secretary and countersigned by the President. He shall report the state of the finances of the Union at every Annual Congress, and oftener, if required by the Board of Directors or Executive Committee; and upon the election of a successor he shall deliver to him all the property of the Union that he may hold.

ARTICLE XI. The Board of Directors herein provided shall be intrusted with the direction and management of the affairs of the society, and shall make a condensed report of their doings to the Annual Congress. All appropriations from the treasury outside of fixed charges and ordinary expenses shall be by vote of the Board of Directors.

ARTICLE XII. The Executive Committee shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by twenty or more persons and accompanied by $10 (or ten persons accompanied by $5) to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Union; and the committee in their discretion in special cases may issue a charter on application signed by ten or more names unaccompanied by the money in advance, but promised in the future. Auxiliary societies should adopt constitutions substantially similar to this constitution, but adapted to local wants. Local auxiliaries shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient co-operation of the freest kind with the American Secular Union and other local Unions. Neither shall the national society be responsible for the acts or utterances of local auxiliaries.

ARTICLE XIII. Every local auxiliary society organized in accordance with the provisions of this constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress, who shall have the right to speak and vote.

ARTICLE XIV. Amendments to this constitution may be made at any Annual Congress of the American Secular Union by a three-fourths vote of the qualified members present. But no amendment shall be made unless the proposed alteration shall have been published one month previous to the meeting.

IS DIVORCE WRONG ?*

BY ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Question (1). Do you believe in the principle of divorce under any circumstances?

The world for the most part is ruled by the tomb, and the living are tyrannized over by the dead. Old ideas, long after the conditions under which they were produced have passed away, often persist in surviving. Many are disposed to worship the ancient—to follow the old paths, without inquiring where they lead, and without knowing exactly where they wish to go themselves.

Opinions on the subject of divorce have been for the most part inherited from the early Christians. They have come down to us through theological and priestly channels. The early Christians believed that the world was about to be destroyed, or that it was to be purified by fire; that all the wicked were to perish, and that the good were to be caught up in the air to meet their Lord—to remain there, in all probability, until the earth was prepared as a habitation for the blessed. With this thought or belief in their minds, the things of this world were of comparatively no importance. The man who built larger barns in which to store his grain was regarded as a foolish farmer, who had forgotten, in his greed for gain, the value of his own soul. They regarded prosperous people as the children of Mammon, and the unfortunate, the wretched and diseased, as the favorites of God. They discouraged all worldly pursuits, except the soliciting of alms. There was no time to marry or to be given in marriage; no time to build homes and have families. All their thoughts were centered upon the heaven they expected to inherit. Business, love, all secular things, fell into disrepute.

Nothing is said in the Testament about the families of the Apostles; nothing of family life, of the sacredness of home; nothing about the necessity of education, the improvement and development of the mind. These things were forgotten, for the reason that nothing, in the presence of the expected event, was considered of any importance, except to be ready when the Son of Man should come. Such was the feeling, that rewards were offered by Christ himself to those who would desert their wives and children. Human love was spoken of with contempt. "Let the dead bury their dead. What is that to thee? Follow thou me." They not only believed these things, but acted in accordance with them; and, as a consequence, all the relations of life were denied or avoided, and their obligations disregarded. Marriage was discouraged. It was regarded as only one degree above open and unbridled vice, and was allowed only in consideration of human weakness. It was thought far better not to marry—that it was something grander for a man to love God than to love woman. The exceedingly godly, the really spiritual, believed in celibacy, and held the opposite sex in a kind of pious abhorrence. And yet, with that inconsistency so characteristic of theologians, marriage was held to be a sacrament. The priest said to the man who married: "Remember that you are caught for life. This door opens but once. Before this den of matrimony the tracks are all one way." This was in the nature of a punishment for having married. The theologian felt that the contract of marriage, if not contrary to God's command, was at least contrary to his advice, and that the married ought to suffer in some way, as a matter of justice. The fact that there could be no divorce, that a mistake could not be corrected, was held up as a warning. At every wedding-feast this skeleton stretched its fleshless finger towards bride and groom.

Nearly all intelligent people have given up the idea that the world is about to come to an end. They do not now believe that prosperity is a certain sign of wickedness, or that poverty and wretchedness are sure certificates of virtue. They are hardly convinced that Dives should have been sent to hell simply for being rich, or that Lazarus was entitled to eternal joy on account of his poverty. We now know that prosperous people may be good, and that unfortunate people may be bad. We have reached the conclusion that the practice of virtue tends in the direction of prosperity, and that a violation of the conditions of well-being brings, with absolute certainty, wretchedness and misfortune.

There was a time when it was believed that the sin of an individual was visited upon the tribe, the community, or the nation to which he belonged. It was then thought that if a man or woman had made a vow to God, and had failed to keep the vow, God might punish the entire community; therefore it was the business of the community to see to it that the vow was kept. That idea has been abandoned. As we progress, the rights of the individual are perceived, and we are now beginning dimly to discern that there are no rights higher than the rights of the individual. There was a time when nearly all believed in the reforming power of punishment—in the beneficence of brute force. But the world is changing. It was at one time thought that the Inquisition was the savior of society; that the persecution of the philosopher was requisite to the preservation of the state, and that, no matter what happened, the state should be preserved. We have now more light. And standing upon this luminous point that we call the present, let me answer your questions.

Marriage is the most important, the most sacred, contract that human beings can make. No matter whether we call it a contract, or a sacrament, or both, it remains precisely the same. And no matter whether this contract is entered into in the presence of magistrate or priest, it is exactly the same. A true marriage is a natural concord and agreement of souls, a harmony in which discord is not even imagined; it is a mingling so perfect that only one seems to exist; all other considerations are lost; the present seems to be eternal. In this supreme moment there is no shadow—or the shadow is as luminous as light. And when two beings thus love, thus unite, this is the true marriage of soul and soul. That which is said before the altar, or minister, or magistrate, or in the presence of witnesses, is only the outward evidence of that which has already happened within; it simply testifies to a union that has already taken place—to the uniting of two mornings that hope to reach the night together. Each has found the ideal; the man has found the one woman of all the world—the impersonation of affection, purity, passion, love, beauty, and grace; and the woman has found the one man of all the world, her ideal, and all that she knows of romance, of art, courage, heroism, honesty, is realized in him. The idea of contract is lost. Duty and obligation are instantly changed into desire and joy, and two lives, like uniting streams, flow on as one. Nothing can add to the sacredness of this marriage, to the obligation and duty of each to each. There is nothing in the ceremony except the desire on the part of the man and woman that the whole world should know that they are really married and that their souls have been united.

Every marriage, for a thousand reasons, should be public, should be recorded, should be known; but, above all, to the end that the purity of the union should appear. These ceremonies are not only for the good and for the protection of the married, but also for the protection of their children, and of society as well. But, after all, the marriage remains a contract of the highest possible character—a contract in which each gives and receives a heart.

The question then arises, Should this marriage, under any circumstances, be dissolved? It is easy to understand the position taken by the various churches; but back of theological opinions is the question of contract.

In this contract of marriage, the man agrees to protect and cherish his wife. Suppose that he refuses to protect; that he abuses, assaults, and tramples upon the woman he wed. What is her redress? Is she under any obligation to him? He has violated the contract. He has failed to protect, and, in addition, he has assaulted her like a wild beast. Is she under any obligation to him? Is she bound by the contract he has broken? If so, what is the consideration for this obligation? Must she live with him for his sake? or, if she leaves him to preserve her life, must she remain his wife for his sake? No intelligent man will answer these questions in the affirmative.

If, then, she is not bound to remain his wife for the husband's sake, is she bound to remain his wife because the marriage was a sacrament? Is there any obligation on the part of the wife to remain with the brutal husband for the sake of God? Can her conduct affect in any way the happiness of an infinite being? Is it possible for a human being to increase or diminish the well-being of the Infinite?

LITERARY.

G. W. Foote, editor of the London Freethinker, is making it lively for Madam Blavatsky in England. He calls her the new Cagliostro, and has published an open letter addressed to her, in which the claims of Theosophy are subjected to close scrutiny, and shown to have no foundation except in Madam Blavatsky's unsupported assertions.

Two pamphlets have been received from Moses Harman, Valley Falls, Kan. They are entitled "The Kansas Fight for Free Press," being the four articles for printing which Messrs. Harman and Walker were indicted; and "The Voice of Labor, a Speech by David Overmeyer at Topeka on Labor Day." The price, presumably, is ten cents each.

The Marquis of Queensberry is best known in this country through certain by-laws governing pugilistic contests, known as Marquis of Queensberry rules. But it seems he is familiar with the rules of versification as well as the foregoing, and a poem entitled "The Spirit of Matterhorn" just published by Watts & Co. of London is a performance which no man, even though a marquis, need be ashamed to sign his name to. (Pp. 30, limp cloth covers, 50 cents.)

The curious subject of "Hypnotism," better known as mesmerism, is treated by Fredrik Bjornstrom, M.D., in No. 113 of the Humboldt Library. The work contains a historical retrospect of the subject, with chapters on the means and methods of hypnotizing, physical effects of hypnotism, hypnotism as a remedial agent, etc. Dr. Bjornstrom holds that the ancient classical dictum, "Investigate, but do not experiment," applies to this subject. The pamphlet costs 30 cents, and may be obtained at this office.

The Agnostic Annual for 1890 is out early, having been on the market for the past month. This Annual is not an almanac, but a magazine issuing once a year. It is edited by Charles A.

Watts, son of our Secular lecturer, and the present number contains thirteen contributions, two of which are poems with Greek titles. Mrs. E. Lynn Linton contributes an article on "The Comforts of Agnosticism;" W. Stewart Ross, a poem on "Above," and other able writers make the Annual one of the best published. Price 25 cents. W. Stewart & Co., 41 Farringdon st., London, E. C.

We feel like encouraging the new enterprise called the "Optimistic Library," No. 1 of which has just reached us. The publication is a neat pamphlet of 48 pages called "Optimism; or, The Bright Side of Life," by Aurelius. We do not know who Aurelius is, as since our old friend Marcus died we have not had an acquaintance of that name, but he has written a hopeful and helpful work, and deserves to triumph over the croakers. Address the Bright Side Pub. Co., 362 W. Madison st., Chicago, Ill.

J. P. Mendum has issued a splendid memorial volume to his life-time associate, Horace Seaver, editor of the Boston Investigator. The volume has 104 pages printed in large type upon elegant paper. It contains a portrait of Mr. Seaver, a preface by J. P. Mendum, a biography, an account of the funeral services, including Colonel Ingersoll's eulogy, an estimate of Horace Seaver's work by L. K. Washburn, tributes of the press, and letters of sympathy. It is sold at one dollar per volume, and could not have cost less.

A work written by Mr. Wm. Hart and published by the Truth Seeker Company with the title "The Candle from Under the Bushel," asks thirteen hundred and six questions which the clergy are called upon to explain. The questions are somewhat similar to those propounded by D. M. Bennett in his "Interrogatories to Jehovah," and the clergy are as silent as their God concerning them. We should be glad to stop the press to insert the announcement that one of them had been satisfactorily answered. (Pp. 205, price 50 cents.)

The Dignity of Death.

Here lies a common man. His horny hands,
Crossed meekly as a maid's upon his breast,
Show marks of toil, and by his general dress
You judge him to have been an artisan.
Doubtless, could all his life be written out,
The story would not thrill nor start a tear;
He worked, laughed, loved, and suffered in his time,
And now rests peacefully, with upturned face
Whose look belies all struggle in the past.
A homely tale; yet, trust me, I have seen
The greatest of the earth go stately by,
While shouting multitudes beset the way,
With less of awe. The gap between a king
And me, a nameless gazer in the crowd,
Seemed not so wide as that which stretches now
Betwixt us two, this dead one and myself.
Untitled, dumb, and deedless, yet he is Transfigured by a touch from out the skies
Until he wears, with all unconscious grace,
The strange and sudden Dignity of Death.

—Richard E. Burton in November Scribner.

North Yamhill Lectures.

To the Editors of Freethought:

I have been waiting for some abler pen than mine to report the late lectures of S. P. Putnam and Mrs. Krekel, but all have been silent.

When Mr. Putnam visited our little town, the rain was descending copiously, so much that all did not come that otherwise would have come. Mr. Putnam handled in a clear and concise manner the subjects of each evening, at times rising into almost sublime eloquence, and closed with poetical effusions. The Rev. James Campbell, V. D. M., was not here as before to defend the cause of Christianity vs. Infidelity; perhaps it was well that he did not, for he could not vanquish the Infidel. I think the reverend gentleman has learned by experience that Freethinkers have built upon facts and demonstration, and are not easily defeated. Mr. Clow, of Hillsboro, has proved conclusively how he has shown the white feather.

Mrs. Krekel lectured here on the 24th and 25th of October. She is a clear and logical speaker, and holds her audience as it were spell-bound to the close, and one feels to regret that the lecture did not last longer. Her lectures are constructive and her words ought not to wound the feelings of any, not even of the church member.

The Liberals of this place will be glad to hear these lecturers as often as possible; but I, for one, protest against a certain kind of lectures, in which a low kind of wit and ribaldry prevails; which, in fact, are made up in greater part of such matter. We are glad that we have on the rostrum, but few of this kind of lectures. Our cause is a grand, noble, serious one, and too much ribaldry degrades it. Sometimes a little wit is proper in its place.

Allow me to introduce to your many readers and those wishing lectures the name of our friend, Prof. Geo. H. Dawes, late of Wisconsin. The professor is able and a useful worker, an honor to the cause, an earnest writer and lecturer, a student and laborer in life's vineyard. That which he does, he believes in doing well. He is original and progressive. Progress is his watchword. With him the future is to be the golden age.

Yours for U. M. L., G. R. HIGGINS.

The Texas Sunday Law.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Noticing your editorial on the Georgia statutes, I would like to give you a sample of the Texas Sunday law, and will quote from the Sherman Daily Democrat of the 23d ult.:

"Dethery" Detheridge, who was arrested yesterday for selling wine on Sunday, was fined in Judge Hinkle's court this morning, his fine and costs amounting to $33.90. Detheridge is a farmer and makes home-made wine. A few Sun days since, a neighbor came to his house and wanted a bottle of wine for medical purposes. Detheridge sold it to him, and shortly afterwards this neighbor was summoned before the grand jury, where he told of the circumstance. An indictment was found and upon this the warrant was issued.

This is the way the "meek and lowly" do business in Texas. How strange it is that the grand jury so happened to call on Detheridge's neighbor? Now, if this is not legal robbery, what would you call it?

Sherman, Texas.

Yours truly,

LOUIS C. GILMORE.

FRED GARDNER.

The Terry Case Continued.

To the Editors of Freethought:

You have a letter in your late issue from A. Schell, in vindication of his first letter, and in reply to mine, on the Terry case. Mr. Schell, in his letter, reminds me much of the preacher's usual and easy method with so-called Infidels. He attacks a few side remarks of no moment, denounces the scurrilous unbeliever in good round terms, recites his creed, utters a crow of triumph, then washes his hands of the whole subject by declaring that he will listen to no reply, and say no more.

He says he pleases to accept the challenge, and in the next line declares off, and crawls into his hole to keep out of danger.

That is not the sort of discussion Freethought calls for. It is not the kind we deem useful, or would accept, or waste our time with. A war of words about "animus" or "apple cores" is not to our mind. The game is too small. We stated facts and propositions to be affirmed or denied. We expected them to be put in issue. We expect an opponent to specify which he denies; and go to the pith of the matter, propose his form of the debate, and go to work in earnest, on legal and scientific principles.

His letter is all assertion, claptrap, and mere supposition, away from the facts.

It is true that Terry went to the trap. So does the poor fish.

True that Terry was abolished; but not true that he or the United States courts had to be so.

The facts of this case, the propositions that form the challenge, are yet undenied and unquestioned; and are opened for fair debate with any competent person:—

1st. That Sarah Althea Hill came to California, young, beautiful amiable, in good circumstances and unimpeached virtue.

2d. That if she is changed in temper or manners, it is in consequence of the diabolical treatment of Sharon, his friends, attorneys and U. S. judges.

3d. That she went to live with Sharon as his wife, under a contract of marriage, as held by Judge Sullivan; and only questioned by the State Supreme Court, on a fine point, that leaves no imputation on her, or on the judge who decided in her favor.

4th. That she simply sued him to have that marriage declared, as the law directs, as any woman has a right to do.

5th. That at once Sharon raised a storm of wrath against her, and with all that money can do sought her destruction. Murder was attempted; police, courts, grand jury were suborned to persecute her and her counsel. There was no dependence on the facts and the law; but only one vile effort to defeat justice.

6th. That the United States courts, consisting of Judges Field, Sawyer, Hoffman, Deady, and Sabin, usurped jurisdiction in the case, under false pretenses, behaved indecently all through the trial, and made a finding uncalled for in the complaint, unsupported by the evidence, unnecessary to the conclusion, and a scandalous imputation on her character as a woman, to wit, that she was a depraved and abandoned woman.

7th. That Judge Terry who had married her, and espoused her cause, had good reason to be indignant at their conduct, and to resent it in any manner he might see fit.

8th. That he never intimated more than an attempt to provoke them to satisfaction, as the code of honor prescribes; and did no act to indicate anything further.

9th. That they laid a trap for him, hired a ready-handed homicide, disguised him for his purpose, lured Terry to the trap, permitted him to give a pretext, and slew him on the instant.

10th. Neagle was not there to guard the judge from murder. There was none intended by Terry.

11th. Neagle was not there to prevent a slap or an insult. He did not do it, or attempt to do it. He was there to watch the trap, let Terry nibble at the bait, and then kill him on the instant. And that is murder.

12th. The State Court had original and actual jurisdiction of the case, and the assumption by Judge Sawyer was neither lawful, sensible, nor conducive to the dignity and honor of our government.

If any competent or respectable person thinks proper to deny any one of these propositions, and will arrange for debate, there will be no hesitation on our side.

It is admitted freely that Judge Terry's conduct was imprudent and reprehensible in the highest degree. Had he been met by an officer appointed to guard the judge, who was taken by surprise, and knew not Terry's intent, but killed him trying to prevent the slap, or insult, or even his approach to the person of Field, it would have been justifiable.

But officers of the law are to prevent crime, and not to lay plans to murder.

The Terrys had no plan, no concert of action, no fixed deliberate purpose, and so failed in all. Neagle and Field had all of them—malice, deliberation, exact weapons, precise time, and full effect, and they succeeded and did murder.

Mr. Schell materializes several statements about what the Terrys intended that could have only come from the "spirits." Judge Sawyer has prevented all hearing of the testimony on that side.

It is confidently hoped that the national Supreme Court will so arrange that a full knowledge of the case may be laid before the whole country. Let us see who are right.

The Poet's Farewell.

It was characteristic of Sir Edwin to turn his face toward the East when standing by the Golden Gate and bid his hosts of friends good-night in the following lines, which he has sent to the Herald for publication:

A FAREWELL.

America! at this thy Golden Gate,
New-traveled from thy green Atlantic coves,
Parting—I make my reverence! It behooves
With backward steps to quit a queen in state.
Land! of all lands most fair and free and great—
Of countless kindred lips, wherefrom I heard
Sweet speech of Shakespeare—keep it consecrate
For noble uses! Land of Freedom's bird, Fearless and proud! So let him soar that stirred

By generous joy, all men can learn of thee
A larger life; and Europe, undeterred
By ancient wrecks, dare also to be free
Body and soul—seeing thine eagle gaze
Undazzled upon Freedom's sun, full-blaze!

Trying the Other Sort.

"Young man," said the bank president to an applicant for employment, "do you smoke?"

"Yes, sir."

"Chew?"

"Yes, sir."

"Swear?"

"Under adequate provocation."

"Play poker?"

"Yes, sir; quietly among friends."

"Drink?"

"Occasionally."

"Bet on horse races?"

"When I get a good tip."

The president scratched his head and looked thoughtful. After a pause he said:

"Young man, you just turn in and try your hand at being cashier of this bank for awhile."

THE story is told in a religious paper of a parish clerk who went to his minister with a proposal to improve a famous couplet of Dr. Watts:

O may my heart in tune be found
Like David's harp of solemn sound.

"Now," said he, "that was all very well once, perhaps, but the harp is an antiquated instrument, unfamiliar to our people. Anyway, we don't use it and we do have a violin in the choir. Besides, 'heart' and 'harp' sound too much alike. So I think it would be more life-like and appropriate to line it out like this:

O may my heart be tuned within Like David's solemn violin.

"Yes," said the pastor, "that is a good idea, but I can make it still better. You know that the violin is more familiarly known to our people by another name; so, to render the lines thoroughly realistic and bring them right home to everybody, suppose we try it this way:

O may my heart go diddle-diddle,
Like good old David's sacred fiddle."

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and under stand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, New Jersey offers his valuable services to all those in need of a kind, sympathetic and skillful physician. Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been assailed and exposed by the press, but, Dr. Fellows, a specialist, in his line, stands foremost in his profession, and the encomiums showered upon him publicly as well as in private, are flattering evidences of the high appreciation and confidence his long and conscientious devotion to his specialties in his profession have so justly merited for him, and it is safe to trust him.

A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1888.
DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: The remedy you sent is working like a charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. Have only been using it one week, and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right.
Yours respectfully,
J. R.

REMARKS—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle-aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, but who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out-and-out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors.
DR. FELLOWS.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future

Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously written. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.
JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."
J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

NEWS AND NOTES.

Up to date the San Francisco Nationalist Club is a marked success. The weather was rainy on Monday evening and there was lightning in the sky, but its seventh public reception at Union Square Hall was an enthusiastic affair. Every seat was occupied. The platform was profusely decorated with flowers, and the whole scene was a most animating one. The Nationalist Club is committed to woman's rights, and it has exercised its prerogative in the selection of Mrs. Addie Ballou for president, and it could not have chosen for the position a better representative of this bright and forward movement. She has the happy faculty of keeping the current of the meeting in the right direction, and can herself speak the eloquent word when the occasion requires.

The vocal solo by Miss Evangeline Ballou was exquisite, and received an enthusiastic recall. The piano accompaniment was by Miss Kate Hildebrandt. This charming melody of voice and instrument was a beautiful introduction to a lecture by the Rev. J. A. Cruzan, pastor of the Third Congregational Church of San Francisco. I expected a rather dull discourse and many references to the deity; and that the main remedy for labor troubles was prayer, and faith in Jesus. I was thoroughly disappointed, and delighted from beginning to end with this manly discourse. Mr. Cruzan—I don't like to call him Rev. Mr. Cruzan—is a most attractive speaker. He is master of his subject, and holds the deepest attention of his audience, and at the close he was greeted with round after round of applause, which he fully deserved. His subject was "Our American Barons and their Serfs." This will be published in full in the next number of FREETHOUGHT. It deals with facts and figures—with what is. The conditions of society which it presents do most certainly demand the thoughtful consideration of every man and woman who has a particle of love for humanity. It is seldom that a clergyman deals so honestly with the real case at issue. Mr. Cruzan is a student and a thinker. He does not indulge in platitudes. He goes to the heart of the matter and talks good sense. The first chance I get I shall go to hear him preach, for I wonder how such a clear-headed man can deliver himself in the mystical realms of theology. There wasn't a particle of theology in his lecture. It was absolutely scientific and humanitarian. If Mr. Cruzan represents any large element in the church, then the church has a chance for redemption.

I found that Mr. Cruzan and myself were almost theological chums. He graduated from the Chicago Theological Seminary in 1871, and I graduated in 1868. We were under the same teachers—Professor Bartlett, now president of Dartmouth College, and Professor Haven—men, in their spirit and work, as far apart as the poles. Bartlett is a kind of modern John Calvin. A more sternly bigoted mind I never met. I admired his intellect, but I think the whole Spanish Inquisition is packed in his obdurate theology. Professor Haven was a kind of modern Spinoza, a deeply comprehensive man, and one of the sweetest and noblest philosophers of the age. It was a privilege to listen to his genial and profound lectures. He was many-sided in his criticisms, and just to all modes of thought. I expect it was his delightful method of imparting theology that kept me for a year or two in the orthodox church. Mr. Cruzan expressed the difference between Bartlett and Haven when he said that if Bartlett affirmed anything he made up his mind not to believe it unless he had to, but if Haven affirmed anything he was ready to believe it if it were possible to do so. Mr. Cruzan wondered how it was that I got out so far, and I equally wondered how he stayed in. So we are both objects of wonder to each other, but comrades nevertheless, and we can shake hands without any "bloody chasm" between. I want every reader of FREETHOUGHT to peruse this sensible and admirable discourse. Let us look these facts in the face and realize that something must be done.

Often in my travels I have crossed and re-crossed the pathway of the famous singer, James G. Clark, but until this reception I have not had a chance to hear him. I don't wonder people like to listen to his sweet and pathetic songs. He touches the chords of hope and aspiration. The fount of feeling glitters as the soft melody of his voice flows on. He was assisted by Captain Corbett in singing the song "When You and I were Soldier Boys Together." He also sang

'Tis coming up the steep of time,
And this old world is growing brighter,"

And "Star of my Soul," his own latest and unpublished song. He was greeted with the rapturous plaudits of the audience, and he and Mr. Cruzan also received an ovation of flowers. The orator and the poet were worthy of these floral tributes.

Mr. John Gore is of renowned ancestry. His father was first vice-president of the anti-slavery society of which Garrison was president, and a price was set upon his head. He gave half his fortune to help redeem the slave. Mr. Gore is a pleasant man, a typical Bostonian, a business man evidently, and clothed with unimpeachable broadcloth, but the heart of man was beneath it, that which binds the world together, and his generous sentiments were received by the audience with every mark of approval.

Burnette G. Haskell is unique. I never saw his like before. I really don't know what to make of him. He is a first-class scolder and he does this with such delightful vim that the scolders remain and applaud him to the echo. He is an effective talker, a kind of bundle of electricity. As the urchins might say, "He is as smart as chain lightning." If he is a rogue, as some people say, he is the most intense rogue I ever saw. He is a man of feeling from the word go, and he makes others feel too. He stirs the blood. As to the soundness of his judgment, I am not quite so sure, but for the time I was quite carried away with his nervous oratory. He has large plans. He will revolutionize San Francisco. The Nationalist Club will carry the next election, and water and lights and car-travel and beef and butter and bread will be furnished to every citizen at cost. A daring dream, but I don't think there is anything in earth or heaven but what Haskell would dare to undertake.

Mrs. Ballou closed with a few appropriate words. She said that women were now going into politics, and as they are used to brushes and brooms they will certainly make a "clean sweep" of it.

There was then about half an hour's sociable, and the audience gradually adjourned.

I do not know what to think about the Nationalist Club. As an impulse, an agitation, it is certainly a splendid thing. These large crowds are inspiring. They show the "deep and sweeping thoughts" that are in the hearts of all the people. It is a "rising wave," as Burnette Haskell said, all over the land, but is it anything more than a wave? Is Bellamy's book anything more than a picture? Is it philosophy, is it science? It may be a religion, but religion of any kind will never save humanity. It must be knowledge and practical wisdom.

I, however, hail the advent of these clubs as a sign of hope, of progress. The meeting of Monday evening was simply exhilarating. One could not so much criticise as enjoy. It is pleasant amidst music and flowers and happy faces and earnest hearts to dream of man's mighty future. Certainly we could not endure the hard toil of to-day, the bitter disappointments, the burden, without these brilliant movements of joyous enthusiasm, these hours of generous comradeship, where whatever differences of thought or method there may be the same bright ideal floats before us, the paradise of the future. Call it God, nature, humanity, religion, what you will, it is the throb of universal feeling that dignifies and enlightens the struggle of existence.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

MISS EVA INGERSOLL, eldest daughter of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, was married November 13, to Walston Hill Brown, head of the banking firm of W. H. Brown and Bros. The wedding occurred at Colonel Ingersoll's residence in New York and was a quiet affair, only a few friends being invited. The ceremony was purely a legal contract and was performed by Judge Barrett of the Supreme Court, a life-long friend of Colonel Ingersoll and of the bridegroom's family. The pair started in the afternoon for a trip to California.

A LINE in FREETHOUGHT last week stated that Mrs. Lake, who recently died in this city, was the widow of a Catholic priest. Later information has it that Mrs. Lake has not lived in San Francisco, and has not died, but on the contrary is lecturing on Spiritualism. She is known as Mrs. H. S. Lake.

THE London Freethinker says that Christians have actually prayed for the recovery of Bradlaugh's health. At Northampton the Rev. R. B. Hull prayed for the sick Atheist in the parish church, and the same proceeding occurred in several of the Nonconformist chapels. One Father Ignatius, with whom Mr. Bradlaugh once debated in the Hall of Science, closed an eight-days' mission in the Kensington town hall by entreating Jehovah to restore the health of the Atheist. Mr. Bradlaugh has long espoused the cause of India, where his sickness was heard of with profound sorrow, and a telegram from Simla stated that "universal prayer" was being made in his behalf. Mr. Bradlaugh's recovery will doubtless be claimed by the believers as a result of these petitions to the throne of grace. The fact that providence should spare the Atheist Bradlaugh and allow a professed Christian like the late President Garfield to die beneath the bullet of an assassin, will not faze them in the least. They will merely remark that God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform, and then proceed as before.

A SLEIGHT-OF-HAND performer in this city issued the following challenge last week:

"I hereby challenge John Slater, the so-called spirit medium, that I will reproduce any of his manifestations on the Orpheum Theatre stage on Friday, Saturday, or Sunday evenings, November 15th, 16th and 17th, or at Woodward's Gardens on Saturday and Sunday afternoons, November 16th and 17th, in broad daylight, for any sum he may desire.
ALEX. HUME."

John Slater is the mediumistic wonder who performs at the Metropolitan Temple. Mr. Hume kept his promise the other evening by duplicating the slate-writing, materializing, and other phenomena of mediums, all which he professed to do by mechanical means. Slater himself was a member of the committee to watch Hume's tricks. He denounced the performer as a fraud, and otherwise created a disturbance upon the stage, until a policeman removed Mr. Slater. Medium Slater is accused of acting under the influence of other than departed spirits, but the timely interference of friends saved him from a night in the station house.

Two years ago George Hutchings, a New Jersey farmer, bequeathed $10,000 to Henry George for the dissemination of his doctrines, but the will was contested and set aside because the court held that the doctrines of Henry George, if carried out, would "cause an upheaval of society and disturb the common law and equity which govern the country." George appealed the case, and the court of errors reversed the decision, the judge holding that the writings are not hostile to religion, to law, or to morals, and may be circulated. The decision is just, but the excuse for rendering it is rather foolish than otherwise. Religion should be attacked if untrue, law should be demolished when unjust, and the morals accepted by many are open to criticism the same as anything else.

MRS. ANNIE BESANT, who was a candidate for membership in the London School Board, brought an action for libel against the Rev. Hoskyne, rector of a church in Stepney, who, at the time of the election, issued a circular in which he asserted that she regarded chastity as a crime and unbridled sensuality as a virtue. The case was tried November 15. The judge summed up strongly against the plaintiff, and the jury disagreed. Mrs. Besant's experience with English courts shows that there is no protection to be got from them for a woman brave enough to teach unorthodox truths.

VIKTOR E. LENNSTRAND, editor of the Swedish paper "Fritänkaren" (the Freethinker), is in prison for blasphemy, his appeal to the king having proved fruitless. He was committed October 28, on two prosecutions for three months each, and he expects sentences on three more accusations, which may terminate in three months each, making fifteen months in all. We learn from the London Freethinker that Mr. Lennstrand is as undaunted as ever. He lectured on October 27, the day before his imprisonment, and will be able to edit the "Fritänkaren" from his prison. His address is Langholmens, Kronohäkte, Stockholm, where he will be able to receive letters.

PRESIDENT HARRISON and Vice-President Morton, and several members of the cabinet, were present, October 13, at a banquet given in honor of the dedication of the new Catholic university at Washington. The president's health was drunk standing; Mr. Blaine was applauded, and then all hands cheered Cardinal Gibbons's toast, "The Hierarchy of the United States." We should have two objections to indorsing a toast of that kind. In the first place the United States is not a hierarchy, which is a government of the priesthood; and in the second place, if it were a hierarchy, a patriotic American should lament instead of rejoicing over the fact.

THE act of Russia in abolishing the transportation of political offenders to Siberia shows (provided the report is true which declares that system to be abolished) that even monarchy cannot always defy public opinion. It is about time barbarous punishments, and the governments that inflict them, were replaced by something more in consonance with the dictates of humanity.

THE pernicious idea that labor or any commercial enterprise is beneath the dignity of the titled gentry of England has borne its legitimate fruit in the abominable practices recently unearthed in London. If these noble toughs and exhausted old roues had had some honorable employment to engage their time and attention, they might have saved their reputations as human beings. That "a clergyman who holds a high position" is found among them is not at all surprising.

AFTER a successful campaign in Oregon, Mrs. Mattie P. Kregel will visit California during the coming winter. She will be at the State Convention in January, and will speak throughout the state. It is hoped that she will receive many calls to lecture. She is an able and eloquent advocate of Freethought. All Liberal friends in California who desire her services will please address FREETHOUGHT at once, so that the dates for lectures can be arranged without delay.

MARGARET FOX, one of the originators of modern Spiritualism at Rochester, N. Y., and who recently declared the phenomena to be fraudulent, now recants her confession, and takes it all back. She says she was bribed to expose Spiritualism by several clergymen and by some deceptive spirits. Whatever Spiritualism may be, there is pretty good evidence that Margaret Fox is a fraud or insane.

THAT is a model revolution which has just resulted in the establishment of the Republic of Brazil. The people did not kill the emperor; they simply deposed him with proper expressions of regret at losing so estimable a ruler, and in deporting their late sovereign gave him assurances of their distinguished consideration.

MR. F. C. MENDE, the new treasurer of the American Secular Union, is accredited with being a very wealthy man, and sports one of the best turnouts on Fairmount avenue. Furthermore, he is deeply interested in the affairs of the Secular Union.

BECAUSE Theresa Kelly was a follower of Dr. McGlynn, the Catholic authorities at New York have ordered that her body be removed from Calvary Cemetery, where she owned a lot and was buried. Not even the dead are safe from the malignity of Rome.

MR. BRADLAUGH's recovery is now thought to be assured, and he is probably on his way to India, where he goes both for a rest and to attend the National Congress at Bombay.

"FREETHOUGHT."

A PLAN TO INCREASE ITS USEFULNESS.

The time appears to have arrived for larger work in the way of extending the circulation of FREETHOUGHT and Liberal literature in the West. This paper was started January 7, 1888, with only sufficient capital to secure its publication for six weeks. At the end of the first year it had more than one thousand subscribers, and it will close the second year with more than two thousand. In the mean time we have sold, of our own and others' publication, above two thousand dollars' worth of books. In all, by means of the paper and books, we have circulated nearly ten thousand dollars' worth of Freethought literature. Surely that is something added to the general stream of tendency toward Liberalizing the country on matters of religious belief, and if we were to stop here we should still regard our two years' work in California as a success.

But we do not intend to stop here. There is room and promise for greater work, and in order to accomplish that work we have proposed the establishment in this city of an Association to be known as the FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY.

The object of this Association, as set forth in a Circular Letter which we have addressed to a large number of our subscribers, shall be to control and to secure the continued publication of FREETHOUGHT, and to establish in connection therewith, upon one of the principal streets of this city, a first-class Bookstore where all kinds of books shall be kept for sale, and especially books of a Freethought, Reform, and Scientific character.

The enterprise has many advantages, and there are many reasons why it should be inaugurated and why it should succeed.

First. There is no Liberal or Scientific publishing house on the Pacific Slope.

Second. There is no bookstore on this coast where a full line of Liberal and Scientific works are kept on sale, and the demand for these works is not supplied.

Third. The bookstore could be maintained in connection with the paper at a very slight increase of expense, while the receipts of the general business would easily be doubled.

Fourth. The paper and the book business would be co-operative; that is, the paper would introduce the books to its readers, while the store would call the attention of many to the paper and the Liberal movement.

Fifth. Such an establishment, by keeping on hand all the best works in this particular line, would not only receive the Liberal patronage of the Pacific Slope, but it would have a large local custom, and supply the local traders with the works not now kept by them.

Sixth. The Association will of itself form one of the strongest Liberal organizations possible. Two or three hundred, or five hundred, stockholders, every one of them interested in the success of the enterprise, will be both patrons and agents, and put failure out of the question. It will also exert an influence on the public greater than that commanded by a small concern, and secure the respect which is always paid to success.

Such are the objects and the results as we see them. Now for the method.

Our proposition is to organize a Company, to be incorporated under the laws of the state of California, and to issue one thousand, two thousand, or three thousand shares at $5 each, to be taken by the Liberals of the West, or by any who feel sufficient interest in the enterprise to invest. A Board of Directors composed of substantial and responsible men may be elected by the shareholders to direct the affairs of the Association, and a man of experience and ability will assume the business management. These details are to be worked out when a sufficient number of shares have been subscribed for to justify organization.

Simply as an investment, we feel certain that the Association offers good returns, but when we consider what it stands for, that it means the combination of Freethought forces throughout the great West; the building up of a great and influential paper; the increase of Liberal fellowship, and a power for the maintenance of political rights and intellectual liberty which otherwise could not be, it seems as if every earnest man and woman in sympathy with Freethought would invest what they could afford in an undertaking of such benefit to themselves individually, and of such advantage to the general cause, and to the world.

There is much more that might be said in favor of this method were it necessary to do so, but this outline will give the Liberal public the required suggestion, and it is for them to act. The affair is in their hands. The paper which we offer them is a solvent institution. The business has never ceased to grow, and when to the impetus it has already gained is added the impulse of combination in the manner here described, it cannot fail of attaining proportions equal to any similar establishment in the country.

Therefore let us act, and act at once. There is hardly a reader of this paper who cannot afford to take one share. There are many who could take ten, fifty, or one hundred shares. It should be remembered that no money will be asked for until the Association is formed, incorporated, and placed in reliable hands. What we desire now is an immediate response from all who read this or who have received our circular. By January 1, 1890, the enterprise should be in working order, and we therefore desire to hear from all interested, at their earliest convenience.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Although the above mentioned circular was mailed to none previous to November 13, responses are already coming in. The Freethought Publishing Company will be a success:

STOCKTON, CAL., Nov. 16, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Before receiving your circular I had given to Mr. Gage my own and my wife's names for one share each in the Freethought Publishing Company. It would afford me much pleasure, did my circumstances permit, to add more leverage to the enterprise. Hoping for its entire success, I am Very truly yours, WILLARD T. JONES.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Nov. 17, 1889.

To the Editors of Freethought:

You have outlined in your circular the grandest undertaking yet contemplated for the advancement of Liberalism on the Pacific Slope; namely, a Freethought Publishing Company. There could be no enterprise inaugurated in which I could take a greater interest. A Liberal or scientific publishing house is the one great need of the hour. By such an association as contemplated there could be built up such a liberal, liberty-loving sentiment on this coast, that every orthodox preacher would leap from his pulpit without stopping to look where he was going to land. In this grand undertaking you have my heart and hand, and if I had a soul I'd throw it in for luck. I only regret I have not the capital whereby I could measure my appreciation of this splendid move, or financially it would be a success in less than one day. But as I cannot do the one millionth part of that which I should be pleased to do, I'll do the next best thing, take one share now, and keep increasing the sum as fast as my circumstances will permit. Could anybody do more? With my best wishes for the success of the Pacific Coast Freethought Publishing Company, I am yours, L. R. TITUS.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Nov. 15, 1889.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, My Dear Friend and Brother: Having carefully read and considered the printed circular and propositions of Putnam and Macdonald touching the organization of the FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY, I hasten to express my approbation of the scheme, and my confidence in its success. You may rely on me to find a subscriber who will take at least thirty shares and pay in advance at ten days' notice if required.

I hope the organization may be perfected very soon, before I get my final summons, which may come at any hour, as I am nearly eighty years of age. Truly and sincerely yours,

JOHN RIGGIN.

GRUB GULCH, CAL., Nov. 15, 1889.

S. P. PUTNAM: Yours is at hand. I have read the circular to several Freethinkers. All think favorably of the enterprise. I have no doubt I can get quite a number of shares taken here. I will try for one hundred; if I fail in that number, will get fifty sure. I have no doubt that with proper management, the enterprise can be worked up to a big thing. Every Freethinker can not help considering himself an agent who is required to do all that lies in his power for both store and paper. I have been called on to send for quite a number of books lately, and am sure I would have given the store the preference, if it had been in existence. Yours fraternally, A. B. ANDERSON.

ALAMEDA, CAL., Nov. 17, 1889.

FRIENDS PUTNAM & MACDONALD: I have received your circular and I think the enterprise will be a success. Put my name down for one share, Mr. Furgerson will take a share; also Walter Eastman; and I think I can dispose of one or more other shares. I am glad you have hit upon so good an idea. If I wanted to buy a Catholic Bible or a Methodist sharp's hymn book in Frisco, I could get one at almost any book store. But when I want to get a book on investigation or a bible on truth and progress, I have to look around a long time before I can find a book store that keeps them, and for that reason we should have a book store where friends and strangers can buy Liberal books. If all Liberals will take one or more shares we may be sure of success, and a grand building up of Freethought on the Pacific Coast.

Yours for Truth and Justice, WILL ALFRED PINGREE.

GRASS VALLEY, CAL., Nov. 17, 1889.

MR. S. P. PUTNAM, Dear Sir: Hoping that your co-operative plan will succeed, we will give our mite and take one share each—Jos. Van Hoeter, one; P. Van Hoeter, one. Let us know when to send the money.

Yours truly,
PAULINE VAN HOETER.

NATIONAL CITY, CAL., Nov. 16, 1889.

FRIEND PUTNAM: I trust and desire to shape my business within the next ten days so that I can write you again that I will take some $5 shares. You not only need encouragement, but you must have it. I will write you again and I will take stock if I possibly can.

Yours truly, A. N. BURGESS.

STOCKTON, CAL., Nov. 17, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: Your proposition with regard to the issue of stock for the purpose of advancing free principles and free ideas is laudable and approved of by your humble subscriber. Put me down for a share, and call for amount as stated in circular.

WILLIAM SHINE.

U. S. RECEIVING SHIP INDEPENDENCE, }
MARE ISLAND, CAL., Nov. 17, 1889. }

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD, Dear Friends: I fully indorse the FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY. I shall be in the city soon, and will then pay my $5 for a share. I shall also try to induce others, who are not subscribers to your paper or any Liberal journal, to invest in this enterprise.

Yours in the cause, G. H. PURDY.

OAKLAND, CAL., Nov. 18, 1889.

G. E. MACDONALD: I think your plan of co-operation a good one, and you can put me down for four shares at least, and call on me for the money at any time that you want it. Hoping that every subscriber will do as much in proportion to what they are able, I remain, Yours for Liberty, FRANK BUTLER.

Nearly sixty additional shares have been subscribed for, the letters containing them reaching us too late for publication this week. E. A. Denicke takes one, Victor Heck one, W. S. Rodgers ten, John Robinett five, Ed. Wegner ten, Philip Cowen five, Fred McMillan two, A. W. Poole one, John Dibble four, R. W. Bancroft two, John Beaumont five, James Bidwell one, H. F. Ebers ten, N. R. Wilkinson one.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

Owing to recent abundant rains in this state, seeding will begin at once—Aramais Kalloch, a brother of the late mayor of San Francisco, died in Seattle Nov. 16.—Seattle has an unexpended balance of its relief fund amounting to $4000.—The grand jury has under advisement the case of Dr. C. C. O'Donnell, of this city, charged with criminal malpractice.—Portland, Or., is to have a $100,000 public library. A bequest of Miss L. M. Smith provides the means.—Bonner, of New York, has bought Stanford's three-year-old Sunol. It is said that the purchase price was $50,000.

The health of Jefferson Davis is failing.—There is said to be a movement against Jews among the Christians near Lake Providence, La. A Hebrew storekeeper's place at Tompkin's bend has been placarded with the warning, "No Jews after the 1st of January," and the building was fired into about fifty times on Nov. 15.—The Catholics of Baltimore, Md., are agitating for high license. Cardinal Gibbons leads the crusade.—Mrs. Delia Parnell, mother of Charles Stewart Parnell, is living in direst poverty and said to be near death. Her residence is Bordentown, N. J.—"White caps" have been terrorizing Galesburg, Ill.—The will of John Crerar, of Chicago, leaves estate worth $2,250,000 for a college to be erected in Chicago and named after him.—H. H. Miller, a young man of twenty-three years, treasurer of the Trinity M. E. church at Omaha, Neb., has disappeared, leaving debts for sums loaned by his fellow church members amounting to about $1000.

A revolution in Brazil has expelled the emperor, Dom Pedro, and established a republic.—A scandal worse than the "maiden tribute" of a few years ago has been unearthed in London. Titled personages and clergymen are implicated with boys.—The London dock strike committee have submitted their balance sheet. It shows that from the commencement to the end of the struggle the total amount of money received from all sources was in round numbers £48,000, of which £30,000, or nearly two-thirds, came from Australia. The various British trades unions subscribed only £4000. There is a surplus of £5000, in the disposal of which the committee will be guided by the general opinion of the subscribers. The sum of £1000 has been voted to the miners now on strike in Australia.—Newspapers report that the Russian government has succumbed to popular opinion and will abolish transportation to Siberia.—There is said to be a building boom in Rome, Italy.—At Petrovsk, in Hungary, the Greek pope, while preaching last week, flourished a dagger from the pulpit and exhorted the people to exterminate the Jews. The population was excited and the military called out, when the threatened uprising was suppressed.

OBSERVATIONS

Some remarks of mine on the proceedings at a recent meeting of the San Francisco Nationalist Club have called forth a letter from my esteemed friend W. W. Burgess, of National City, which will be found in another column. I wish to point out that Mr. Burgess's comparison between the Nationalist movement and the Secular Union is not strictly accurate. It is true that the Secular Union invites the co-operation of people of all beliefs, but it is not a proselyting body. It calls upon all who believe in a secular form of government and oppose an ecclesiastical one to unite for mutual defense against sacerdotal encroachments. It expounds no political creed. Its demands are not an affirmation, but a protest.

Nationalism is quite a different affair. It has a body of political doctrine which it asks members to subscribe to. Its declaration of principles and constitution are as far from the simple demands of Secularism as the Catholic church is from pure Deism.

The difference between Secularism and Nationalism is plainly this:

Religionists who accept the teachings of Secularism accept them, not as a part of their religious creed, but as distinct from it; but

The various religionists who adopt Nationalism profess to receive it as a part of their religious belief.

I hope I have either made myself clear on that point or proved myself guilty of untruth.

In his request that Bellamy's "Looking Backward" be attacked and demolished as Colonel Ingersoll attacked and demolished the Pentateuch, Mr. Burgess loses sight of an important distinction between a history of what is alleged to have occurred in the past and a prophecy of what is to occur in the future. If I were living in the year of grace 2000, where Mr. Bellamy's order of things is located, it is possible that by a close perusal of "Looking Backward" I might discover as many inaccuracies in it as Ingersoll found in the Mosaic record, though I should doubtless fall short of making them so conspicuous, owing to inferior literary capacity. There are two things in which I hold slight faith, namely, the paradise of Bellamy and the paradise beyond Jordan, though I have no objection to either.

The quotation made from the writings of my esteemed partner I read with an appreciation which could not possibly be exceeded by that of Mr. Burgess, yet I cannot accept it as a scientific outlook. I cannot realize that justice will beget charity. There is no kinship between the two. If justice ruled, charity would be unnecessary, and if charity universally prevailed, justice would have no function, as every offender would be acquitted. Neither can justice become the throne of love, because justice is an undeviating line, while love is erratic; justice is impartial, while love is the most partial of all things. Love excuses and pardons, while justice condemns and punishes. A mother's love overlooks all the faults of a wayward son, but the justice of a judge sends him to the penitentiary or the gallows.

Every good and noble sentiment is commendable. It would be cruel to crush one of them out from pure malice, but when they are offered as economical doctrine they should be analyzed before they are accepted and subscribed to.

The Nationalist Club is the biggest thing that has struck San Francisco since Sam Jones held his meetings here, and I have little doubt it will result in electing Mr. Haskell to some lucrative public office.

According to reports in a daily paper, Dr. A. H. Stevens, of Philadelphia, has made a discovery, which is nothing less than that the seat of the human soul is in the corpus callosum, a little spongy body situated at the base of the brain. Dr. Stevens may be eminently correct in thus locating the alleged soul of man, but he is hardly entitled to be called a discoverer. One Boutekoe is credited with saying "The soul is located in the corpus callosum." I do not know Boutekoe, nor what authority he can advance for the statement, but it appears in a small pamphlet published by J. D. Shaw in 1886. If Dr. Stevens of Philadelphia claims the discovery he is doubtless a fraud and unworthy of confidence. But it is not of much consequence where the soul is located during life. Where it will take up its residence after death is the question that should agitate sinners, the clergy in particular.

At a meeting held in San Francisco November 11 to commemorate the hanging of the Chicago Anarchists, these resolutions were passed:

Whereas, We believe after hearing the evidence concerning the trial and conviction of the so-called Anarchists in Chicago:

1. That the wrong men were convicted;
2. That none of the convicted ones were Anarchists in any sense.

Which should lead us to inquire, What is fame? May men take their lives in their hands for the sake of Anarchy, work for it, hang for it, and die with its name upon their lips, only to have their surviving admirers resolve that they were not Anarchists in any sense? "Hoch die Anarchie," if I spell them correctly, were the last words that came from the gallows before Parsons, Spies, Fischer, and Engel hung dangling by the ropes that prevented them from a further expression of their views. These men may not have been so near correct on the economic question as their San Francisco apologists, but they were more candid.

The appended letter will explain why Mr. Ed. Pickett, of Elk Grove, Cal., is no longer in receipt of this journal. It appears to have been penned by a female member of Mr. Pickett's family:

ELK GROVE, Nov. 10, 1889.

MR. PUTNAM AND MACDONALD: You will greatly oblige me by burning in place of mailing the balance of the FREETHOUGHT copies due my years subscription. I consider it the vilest and most degraded work I have ever read. Your chief aim seems to be to lower in the minds of the rising Generation the Roman Catholic church with all its Rev. Priest and associates. A religion that interfere's with none, but tries to teach and promote good works for the young and undeveloped minds.

When I subscribed for your paper I supposed it to be a liberal journal, but found it vastly different, and think it will be a great blessing when the last issue is made, as it is liable to form either a hatred for itself or a corruption to the morals of decent people. I ask it as a favor that you send no more of them to me. Yours,

ED PICKETT.

The request to burn instead of mailing Mr. Pickett's paper cannot be complied with. It will be sent out through the mails as a simple sample copy.

"JOHN WARD, PREACHER," has been issued in paper covers and can now be furnished for 50 cents.

A LETTER FROM FOREST GROVE.

To the Editors of Freethought:

As you require assistance both in your editorial department and financially also, I am willing to devote a few idle moments and a portion of my giant intellect to the first-named department, leaving the other to those generous brethren who forward from five dollars to five thousand to FREETHOUGHT very often—in their minds. There is nothing mean or selfish about me. I would assume entire control of the editorial department if it would be any accommodation to you.

Everyone else has had their say about the late Liberal convention at Portland, and now it is my turn. To say it was a grand success hardly does it justice, for the most enthusiastic among us did not expect it to pay expenses; and the last report from President Beal shows a balance of nearly three hundred dollars. Surely we ought to be very well satisfied with that. We were only organized last June, but we were organized by good men and true, and they had splendid material to organize a Liberal Union with. The list of officers comprises some of the best people in the state, and the first work was done in a good place. Silverton Secular Union ought to be a name that would send a thrill of pride and pleasure to the heart of every true Liberal. Had it not been for their call to the Liberals of Oregon last June, joined with the noble efforts of our lecturers, Underwood, Putnam, and others, we might still have been wasting our energies in unorganized efforts and accomplished nothing. But with the good work done last June, and the grand success of the Portland convention, we shall go forward with renewed energy for another year's work, and I certainly hope perfectly united in purpose and aim, with our good President, C. Beal, to make the Oregon State Secular Union a permanent organization of good men and women who will labor faithfully to establish what our constitution calls for—the absolute divorce of church and state, the taxation of church property, etc.

The last FREETHOUGHT brings good news of Mr. Putnam's latest work in Newport. Our local Unions are increasing and always include the best men and women in the place where they are located. The names of Mr. and Mrs. Royal A. Bensell are very familiar to me, through mutual friends, and no family stands higher than they wherever known. Mr. Bensell and his good wife will do splendid work for Freethought.

Among the many pleasant faces I met in Portland who will always hold a warm place in my memories of the past are Mrs. Jennie Vose Graham, who is one of our vice-presidents, a writer for the Truth Seeker, and a splendid worker for the Liberal cause, a young, bright, happy, frank-faced woman with two dear little ones, who were as bright and happy as birds. Miss Mary Forward is another staunch Liberal, a lineal descendant of Jonathan Edwards, but a good deal too far away from the old man to have any fear of his theology; a lovely girl with a well cultivated mind. She was one of the delegates from Silverton, being a member of the Silverton Secular Union. I had also the pleasure of meeting the president, Dr. J. W. McClure, a young physician with a splendid practice, who nobly stands by the Liberal cause, fearless and as enthusiastic as any in the ranks. Mr. and Mrs. L. Ames were also among the delegates from Silverton—strong, brave Liberals. We have good reason to be proud of the Silverton Secular Union. I met many other delegates from other parts of this state and Washington, but did not have the pleasure of becoming so well acquainted with them.

I would like to describe the beautiful banner presented by Miss Mattie Blaisdell to the O. S. S. U., but I cannot do it justice; neither can I do justice to Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel's short but eloquent address when she presented the reverse side of the banner with the glorious stars and stripes above the prostrate cross, the emblem of all the cruelties and tortures inflicted upon the human race for eighteen centuries. Her address was simply grand, and called forth a perfect storm of applause. She is a splendid speaker, and Brothers Underwood and Putnam will have to look to their laurels in this state if she remains with us, as the last FREETHOUGHT stated she intended to do.

One word more and I will close. I want to ask the lecturers who write for the different Liberal papers to not be quite so harsh in their criticisms in regard to Liberals coming out with money for them. It sounds just a little too orthodox, and we don't like it. Yours fraternally,

SARAH C. TODD.

P.S.—I have just been reading in the Truth Seeker of Nov. 9 an account of the efforts to be made by the Washington Liberals at the meeting of their next legislature, and also their intention of organizing a Washington State Secular Union. They have our cordial sympathy and hearty support in their efforts, and we hope they will have perfect success and as grand an organization as we have perfected here. They can do it if the Liberals will unite there as they have here, for they have plenty of good Liberals in that state—as Mr. Putnam says, “the woods are full of them.” Liberalism has come to stay and “grow up with the country.”

SARAH C. TODD, Sec. W. C. S. U.

THE PAN-AMERICAN CONFERENCE.

The occasion for the meeting of this convention or conference of all the states of the western hemisphere, now being held at Washington, is one of first-class importance to this side of the world, and it may be made so for all mankind.

The meeting is to set up and cement an American union, but with these objects only:

No secrets, or secret compacts, or alliances for evil to any state or nation under the sun.

All proceedings open to all mankind. The people of the United States have empowered no one to make a secret treaty in their name.

No compact, save for good offices with and for each other, to promote peace, commerce, and friendship, to open up a more intimate knowledge of each other, and light the paths of all to progress, security, wealth, and happiness.

These states have varied forms of government, from the empire in Brazil to the republic in the United States. This convention will not seek to change any of them, but accept them as they are now, and as they may be in the future, as changed by their respective people. It will not assume the attitude of a propaganda of any form of government, but leave all in peace. It will guarantee no form of government for a day. The United States could not do so, except so far as the people of each state may desire change. Our faith is that government should rest upon the will of the people. We might forbid outside interference with that will, but can never consent to guarantee any other form of government than such as the people approve.

For the benefit of the conference and the nations interested, we may modestly suggest to their attention all those great principles that we have found to act so well with us, and been the secret springs of prosperity. In doing so, without the slightest intention of coercion, we may direct their attention to the same progressive means:

1. We have demonstrated that hereditary or class legislation is not essential to national prosperity. Our whole people select and elect wiser and better men and law-makers than heredity can anywhere exhibit.

2. That absolute freedom of opinion, of speech and press, inspire genius, spirit, life, and enterprise in all our affairs, add to our wealth, and are dangerous only to error and wrong.

3. That an entire separation of church and state has been the source of a thousand blessings.

These consequences have resulted therefrom: The removal of all religious discussion from the councils of the state; the removal of all religious anger, persecution, riot and disorder, so disgraceful and disastrous to religion in other lands.

In our cities a hundred creeds worship in peace. Yet religion does not suffer. Churches abound, substantial, and even grand. Preachers are as numerous as elsewhere, as well paid and learned, and generally of better deportment than elsewhere, because they depend on the approval of the people. And our people, as a general thing, are as exemplary in their morals, faith, and practice as the most favored nations with established churches.

The common school, for the education of all, has been found to be the best guarantee against vice, crime, riot, and outrage, and for law, order, and just government, and is surely the nursery of a higher standard of humanity. To be complete, it should teach only the rudiments of learning, elementary science, and loyalty to the constitution and the country. Party politics should have no place there, or any form of religion. Moral science and example will always have a prominent place. Our country has been rich in illustrious examples, and the lives of Washington, Lincoln, Jefferson, Jackson, and Franklin, have no superiors as guides for youth.

The great principle, now made a part of our constitution, that “all law must be just and equal to all men, and all have equal protection of the law,” is the great charter of the people and of public liberty. It mollifies all our statutes, it rules in all our courts, it gives assurance of equal protection to all, and inspires all in times of public danger to rely upon the authorities and support them with all their power.

Our history has shown that a people thus educated and assured make willing and eager soldiers. We have had need of over two millions and found no difficulty in enrolling them. Principles thus tried and found so productive of good results cannot but be worth the attention of all the experimental governments of the New World.

H. L. KNIGHT.

POINTS APPARENTLY WELL TAKEN.

Dear FREETHOUGHT—Loveliest Paper of the State:

The account in your late number of a certain Nationalist meeting, held in your city, was amusing and doubtless accurate, but the winding up comment, wherein you picture Nationalism as establishing an “identity between Judaism, Christian Science, Theosophy, Spiritualism, Christianity, and Socialism,” causes me to observe that the same is true of the American Secular Union according to the recent Congress thereof reported in FREETHOUGHT. The first result of said body, says the Truth Seeker, was the “simplification of the constitution so that all may join the Union, whether Agnostics, Materialists, Spiritualists, evangelical Christians, Free-Religionists, Universalists, Unitarians, or Catholic rebels from church authority.” In that respect there does not appear to be such a wide difference between Freethinkers and Nationalists. And then your closing sentence, “Truly Bellamy wrote a wonderful book, and truly black is white when it becomes popular to believe so,” has the ring of irony and wit, but it is also conspicuous for its lack of argument.

When Colonel Ingersoll attacked the “mistakes of Moses” in the book divine, while he relied largely upon his ability to wield the weapon of sarcasm, he did not rely wholly upon that, for he was partially, at least, argumentative, and “done up” Moses in the first round. Now I would like Colonel Ingersoll, the editors of FREETHOUGHT, or some other equally able writer, to attack “Looking Backward” and “do up” Bellamy in the same masterly style. If it can be done in twenty rounds it will be worth the effort. One thing is certain, it has not been done as yet, and until it is done little side flings of sarcasm will only tend to make new converts for that “dream.” For Bellamy’s dream I care not a tinker’s dam, but for the principles he has so adroitly presented in that dream I have the most sacred reverence. They have long been a part and parcel of my religion—not so, perhaps, in every detail of plan or scope, but unalterably so wherein they stand for equality and liberty in fact, in contradistinction to contentment with all it implies in name. Those principles I allude to teach exactly, unless I fail to see them as they are, the beautifully expressed sentiment of Putnam in his last article in FREETHOUGHT. He says; “I look forward to victories that shall make our vast republic the ideal republic indeed; the land of the free; the land of fraternity; the land of civilization; the land where poverty shall cease to be; the land of happy homes and industry; where labor is sweet, where charity is the child of justice and justice is the throne of love.” Will such a sentiment be crushed? Not as long as Putnam and Bellamy survive; one the exponent of Humanitarianism, the other Nationalism. Each has the same identical aim, though they may be working under different auspices. Many of us are not Nationalists in the sectarian sense, but all Freethinkers and truth seekers who are Humanitarians are, and should be, Nationalists in the broad acceptance of the term.

Respectfully

W. W. BURGESS.

IS DIVORCE WRONG?

II.

Question (1). Do you believe in the principle of divorce under any circumstances?

The next question is as to the right of society in this matter. It must be admitted that the peace of society will be promoted by the separation of such people. Certainly society cannot insist upon a wife remaining with a husband who bruises and mangles her flesh. Even married women have a right to personal security. They do not lose, either by contract or sacrament, the right of self-preservation; this they share in common, to say the least of it, with the lowest living creatures.

This will probably be admitted by most of the enemies of divorce; but they will insist that while the wife has the right to flee from her husband's roof and seek protection of kindred or friends, the marriage—the sacrament—must remain unbroken. Is it to the interest of society that those who despise each other should live together? Ought the world to be peopled by the children of hatred or disgust, the children of lust and loathing, or by the welcome babes of mutual love? Is it possible that an infinitely wise and compassionate God insists that a helpless woman shall remain the wife of a cruel wretch? Can this add to the joy of Paradise, or tend to keep one harp in tune? Can anything be more infamous than for a government to compel a woman to remain the wife of a man she hates—of one whom she justly holds in abhorrence? Does any decent man wish the assistance of a constable, sheriff, a judge, or a church, to keep his wife in his house? Is it possible to conceive of a more contemptible human being than a man who would appeal to force in such a case? It may be said that the woman is free to go, and that the courts will protect her from the brutality of the man who promised to be her protector; but where shall the woman go? She may have no friends; or they may be poor; her kindred may be dead. Has she no right to build another home? Must this woman, full of kindness, affection, health, be tied and chained to this living corpse? Is there no future for her? Must she be an outcast forever—deceived and betrayed for her whole life? Can she never sit by her own hearth, with the arms of her children about her neck, and with a husband who loves and protects her? Is she to become a social pariah, and is this for the benefit of society?—or is it for the sake of the wretch who destroyed her life?

The ground has been taken that woman would lose her dignity if marriage could be annulled. Is it necessary to lose your liberty in order to retain your moral character—in order to be pure and womanly? Must a woman, in order to retain her virtue, become a slave, a serf, with a beast for a master, or with society for a master, or with a phantom for a master?

If an infinite being is one of the parties to the contract, is it not the duty of this being to see to it that the contract is carried out? What consideration does the infinite being give? What consideration does he receive? If a wife owes no duty to her husband because the husband has violated the contract, and has even assaulted her life, is it possible for her to feel toward him any real thrill of affection? If she does not, what is there left of marriage? What part of this contract or sacrament remains in living force? She cannot sustain the relation of wife, because she abhors him; she cannot remain under the same roof, for fear that she may be killed. They sustain, then, only the relations of hunter and hunted—of tyrant and victim. Is it desirable that this relation should last through life, and that it should be rendered sacred by the ceremony of a church?

Again I ask, Is it desirable to have families raised under such circumstances? Are we in need of children born of such parents? Can the virtue of others be preserved only by this destruction of happiness, by this perpetual imprisonment?

A marriage without love is bad enough, and a marriage for wealth or position is low enough; but what shall we say of a marriage where the parties actually abhor each other? Is there any morality in this? any virtue in this? Is there virtue in retaining the name of wife, or husband, without the real and true relation? Will any good man say, will any good woman declare, that a true, loving woman should be compelled to be the mother of children whose father she detests? Is there a good woman in the world who would not shrink from this herself; and is there a woman so heartless and so immoral that she would force another to bear that from which she would shudderingly and shriekingly shrink?

Marriages are made by men and women; not by society; not by the state; not by the church; not by supernatural beings. By this time we should know that nothing is moral that does not tend to the well-being of sentient beings; that nothing is virtuous the result of which is not good. We know now, if we know anything, that all the reasons for doing right, and all the reasons against doing wrong, are here in this world. We should have imagination enough to put ourselves in the place of another. Let a man suppose himself a helpless woman beaten by a brutal husband—would he advocate divorces then?

Few people have an adequate idea of the sufferings of women and children, of the number of wives who tremble when they hear the footsteps of a returning husband, of the number of children who hide when they hear the voice of a father. Few people know the number of blows that fall on the flesh of the helpless every day, and few know the nights of terror passed by mothers who hold babes to their breasts. Compared with these, all the hardships of poverty borne by those who love each other are as nothing. Men and women truly married bear the sufferings and misfortunes of poverty together. They console each other. In the darkest night they see the radiance of a star, and their affection gives to the heart of each perpetual sunshine.

The good home is the unit of the good government. The hearth-stone is the corner-stone of civilization. Society is not interested in the preservation of hateful homes, of homes where husbands and wives are selfish, cold, and cruel. It is not to the interest of society that good women should be enslaved, that they should live in fear, or that they should become mothers by husbands whom they hate. Homes should be filled with kind and generous fathers, with true and loving mothers; and when they are so filled, the world will be civilized. Intelligence will rock the cradle; justice will sit in the courts; wisdom in the legislative halls; and above all and over all, like the dome of heaven, will be the spirit of liberty.

Although marriage is the most important and the most sacred contract that human beings can make, still when that contract has been violated, courts should have the power to declare it null and void upon such conditions as may be just.

As a rule, the woman dowers the husband with her youth, her beauty, her love—with all she has; and from this contract certainly the husband should never be released, unless the wife has broken the conditions of that contract. Divorces should be granted publicly, precisely as the marriage should be solemnized. Every marriage should be known, and there should be witnesses, to the end that the character of the contract entered into should be understood; the record should be open and public. And the same is true of divorces. The conditions should be determined, the property should be divided by a court of equity, and the custody of the children given under regulations prescribed.

Men and women are not virtuous by law. Law does not of itself create virtue, nor is it the foundation or fountain of love. Law should protect virtue, and law should protect the wife, if she has kept her contract, and the husband, if he has fulfilled his. But the death of love is the end of marriage. Love is natural. Back of all ceremony burns and will forever burn the sacred flame. There has been no time in the world's history when that torch was extinguished. In all ages, in all climes, among all people, there has been true, pure, and unselfish love. Long before a ceremony was thought of, long before a priest existed, there were true and perfect marriages. Back of public opinion is natural modesty, the affections of the heart; and in spite of all law, there is and forever will be the realm of choice. Wherever love is, it is pure; and everywhere, and at all times, the ceremony of marriage testifies to that which has happened within the temple of the human heart.

Question (2). Ought divorced people to be allowed to marry under any circumstances?

This depends upon whether marriage is a crime. If it is not a crime, why should any penalty be attached? Can any one conceive of any reason why a woman obtaining a divorce, without fault on her part, should be compelled as a punishment to remain forever single? Why should she be punished for the dishonesty or brutality of another? Why should a man who faithfully kept his contract of marriage, and who was deserted by an unfaithful wife, be punished for the benefit of society? Why should he be doomed to live without a home?

There is still another view. We must remember that human passions are the same after as before divorce. To prevent re-marriage is to give excuse for vice.

Question (3). What is the effect of divorce upon the integrity of the family?

The real marriage is back of the ceremony, and the real divorce is back of the decree. When love is dead, when husband and wife abhor each other, they are divorced. The decree records in a judicial way what has really taken place, just as the ceremony of marriage attests a contract already made.

The true family is the result of the true marriage, and the institution of the family should above all things be preserved. What becomes of the sacredness of the home, if the law compels those who abhor each other to sit at the same hearth? This lowers the standard, and changes the happy haven of home into the prison cell. If we wish to preserve the integrity of the family, we must preserve the democracy of the fireside, the republicanism of the home, the absolute and perfect equality of husband and wife. There must be no exhibition of force, no spectre of fear. The mother must not remain through an order of court, or the command of a priest, or by virtue of the tyranny of society; she must sit in absolute freedom, the queen of herself, the sovereign of her own soul and of her own body. Real homes can never be preserved through force, through slavery, or superstition. Nothing can be more sacred than a home, no altar purer than the hearth.

Question (4). Does the absolute prohibition of divorce where it exists contribute to the moral purity of society?

We must define our terms. What is moral purity? The intelligent of this world seek the well-being of themselves and others. They know that happiness is the only good; and this they strive to attain. To live in accordance with the conditions of well-being is moral in the highest sense. To use the best instrumentalities to attain the highest ends is our highest conception of the moral. In other words, morality is the melody or the perfection of conduct. A man is not moral because he is obedient through fear or ignorance. Morality lives in the realm of perceived obligation, and where a being acts in accordance with perceived obligation, that being is moral. Morality is not the child of slavery. Ignorance is not the corner-stone of virtue.

The first duty of a human being is to himself. He must see to it that he does not become a burden upon others. To be self-respecting, he must endeavor to be self-sustaining. If by his industry and intelligence he accumulates a margin, then he is under obligation to do with that margin all the good he can. He who lives to the ideal does the best he can. In true marriage men and women give not only their bodies, but their souls. This is the ideal marriage; this is moral. They who give their bodies, but not their souls, are not married, whatever the ceremony may be; this is immoral.

If this be true, upon what principle can a woman continue to sustain the relation of wife after love is dead? Is there some other consideration that can take the place of genuine affection? Can she be bribed with money, or a home, or position, or by public opinion, and still remain a virtuous woman? Is it for the good of society that virtue should be thus crucified between church and state? Can it be said that this contributes to the moral purity of the human race?

Is there a higher standard of virtue in countries where divorce is prohibited than in those where it is granted? Where husbands and wives who have ceased to love cannot be divorced, there are mistresses and lovers.

The sacramental view of marriage is the shield of vice. The world looks at the wife who has been abused, who has been driven from the home of her husband, and the world pities; and when this wife is loved by some other man, the world excuses. So, too, the husband who cannot live in peace, who leaves his home, is pitied and excused.

Is it possible to conceive of anything more immoral than for a husband to insist on living with a wife who has no love for him? Is not this a perpetual crime? Is the wife to lose her personality? Has she no right of choice? Is her modesty the property of another? Is the man she hates the lord of her desire? Has she no right to guard the jewels of her soul? Is there a depth below this? And is this the foundation of morality? this the corner-stone of society? this the arch that supports the dome of civilization? Is this pathetic sacrifice on the one hand, this sacrilege on the other, pleasing in the sight of heaven?

To me, the tenderest word in our language, the most pathetic fact within our knowledge, is maternity. Around this sacred word cluster the joys and sorrows, the agonies and ecstasies of the human race. The mother walks in the shadow of death that she may give another life. Upon the altar of love she puts her own life in pawn. When the world is civilized, no wife will become a mother against her will. Man will then know that to enslave another is to imprison himself.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

A RENEWAL OF WITCHCRAFT.

Within two hundred years belief in witchcraft was general. It was taught by the Evangelical church, and to disbelieve it was heresy of the deepest dye. Even the unfortunates accused of practicing it believed in it, and confessed their guilt of feats unnatural and impossible, and therefore suffered death in some one of the many cruel fashions that were devised by the good and pious people to punish this sinister crime. All the rules of evidence were suspended and ignored on the trial of a witch or a wizard. The accused were usually women, and, alas! so were the accusers. If any member of the church did not believe in witchcraft, that disbelief was taken as the first symptom of entering upon the practice of it. Indeed, so thoroughly was this folly woven into the religion and religious teaching of the time, that it is surprising that the church survived the overthrow of this foul and revolting superstition. That it did survive is strong evidence of the deep-seated religious longings and instincts of the people. Those who are greatly emancipated in their ideas and free in their thoughts, have ever since shown a tendency to question and inquire and test the declarations of the church upon questions which affect the material affairs of the people. But while this freedom of inquiry has pushed far in one direction, it appears to have passed on the way, germinating centers of the old superstitions, and these are manifesting the old tendency to marvel and wonder and people the earth with awful shadows. In one of the Western states a man has accused his neighbor of bewitching his cattle, because they did not thrive, while the neighbor's herd was fat. In vain was it pointed out to him that he wintered his cattle on the north side of a hill, with insufficient access to water, while the thriving herd of his neighbor had sunny quarters and good water. He persisted, and at last, finding there was no law to punish his neighbor for witchcraft, he performed solemn incantations around his weazened steers to take the spell off of them. Recently the village of Graftschap, in Michigan, peopled by a Dutch colony, has become the scene of a revival of witchcraft in all its ancient force. The people are good, upright, religious folk, attached to the Lutheran communion, we believe, but if the whole country were like them we would have a speedy revival of the laws against witchcraft, and there would be drownings and burnings again. This village is wrought up to the highest pitch of excitement, and the testimony of its people to the doings of witches is precisely such as once secured the conviction and execution of hundreds of innocent victims. Disregard for simple sanitary requirements has produced at Graftschap many cases of stubborn illness, attributed by the doctors to bad drainage, but by the patients to witches. Medicine has been thrown away, while a committee of elders has ripped open all the feather ticks and pillows, in search of feather devils put therein by the witches to make the sleepers sick. They find, as in all feather pillows and ticks, bunches of partly felted feathers, which are taken out and put upon trial and convicted, in the belief that they are the forms assumed by the witches. They are then carried at the head of a procession to the place of execution, to be burned, and concerning the burning the most remarkable stories are told by perfectly reputable and sincere people. They declare that not even the feathers will scorch in the fire, and that while the crowd is looking the bunch disappears, which means, of course, that the witch has escaped and taken on another form. It is proper to say that the village pastor rebukes these proceedings, but his reprimand has no influence upon his intensely excited flock, and there are not many exceptions in the community, but nearly all yield themselves to a weird belief which seems to have planted in the midst of an American community a colony out of the dark ages.—Alta.

MORALITY.

[The following address, elucidating the eighth Demand of Secularism, was delivered by Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel at Portland during the late convention.]

We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality, as such, shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

Technically speaking, a discussion of morality is a discussion of those intentions of which right and wrong are predicated. Natural morality, as distinguished from Christian or any other special phase of morality, is the moral sentiment of the race as a whole, in contradistinction to some special feature developed under special conditions. Natural morality is the science of social relationship, which men have evolved through experience and association; the sum total of their efforts to adjust successfully and harmoniously the relationship of the natural world, to live together peacefully, in a world dominated by justice. It recognizes no supernatural methods for bettering the condition of men; it contents itself with, and confines itself to, the affairs of the natural world, and rejects as an infringement on men's natural rights the attempt to substitute an outside power for the authority alone reposing in men.

Christian morality, which claims in this country to be the conservator of public morals, and with which we as a Secular association have especially to deal, because it lies nearest to us in the development of special phases of moral sentiment, rests upon a basis the direct opposite of this. The basis of Christian morality is a belief in a personal God, and the further assumption that this personal God manifested himself in the flesh in the person of Jesus Christ. In him resides all power and authority, and absolute obedience to his dicta is the only way through which the conduct of men can be regulated into Christian morality in this world, the reward of which morality is the salvation of his soul in another sphere of existence, and it makes the salvation of men's souls the pivotal point upon which the whole system turns. It transposes the whole basis of natural morality. It sets up, in a practically unknown region, the standard which is to regulate the affairs of men. It regulates all authority, all responsibility in human actions, to regions inaccessible to human beings. The whole system rests upon the proposition that outside of man, somewhere unknown to him, unseen by him, unheard of him except through the voice of a priest, is an absolute monarchy in which resides all virtue, all power; that man himself has neither.

This system of Christian morality, as it names itself, sets up a system of rewards and punishments outside of and foreign to human relations through which men are to be rewarded for their denial of virtue by having another make vicarious atonement for their utter moral poverty.

Under this system, not to possess any virtue becomes the highest virtue, to utterly degrade human nature is to ennoble it; all man's obligations to society, all his crimes against it, are to be pardoned by declaring himself bankrupt and turning over the assets to his savior, who is not to remunerate society for its loss. Innocence despoiled, obligations broken, theft and murder even; but to inflict upon society still further, if our human courts do not at the bar of justice or the end of a rope, remove him, the insufferable presence of a creature who, after outraging all naturally moral obligations of society, can, by shifting the consequences of his conduct upon innocent shoulders, become allied to the gods. According to Christian morality, the ignorant and brutal black man who climbed through his wife's window at night and cut her throat from ear to ear, and who a few months after declared from the scaffold that he had "made his peace with his savior, and would in a half-hour's time be walking the streets of the New Jerusalem in company with the blessed angels," is better worthy the companionship of Jesus than Lincoln, Sumner, and Dickens. According to Christian morality, the salvation of these men is somewhat problematical, but the negro murderer is saved beyond a doubt, as was the thief upon the cross. W. M. Tweed, of the Tweed ring in New York, is consigned to prison and dies disgraced under the ruling of that natural morality which unites and protects the interests of men as one.

Thieves and murderers go to heaven as a reward for acknowledgment of their own wickedness and infamy, taking advantage of another's virtue. The benefactor of his race, who has faith in himself because his life and endeavor are clean, is suspended in doubt or remanded altogether to hell. The ways of justice among civilized and enlightened men are comparatively plain, the ways of Christian justification are mysterious and contradictory, and this proposition that man's responsibility is to other than the society of which he is a part, is the proposition which it has been the cruel heritage of the race to disprove. This is the proposition which created the Inquisition, filled dungeons with martyrs to the cause for which we stand to-day—free thought, the unfettered use of the mind, which raises man above the brute and makes him the arbiter of his own destiny. The virus of this proposition caused the cruel deaths of Hypatia and Bruno, whose names are written in gold on the banner of progress. Hypatia, teacher with her father of mathematics and philosophy, the lever which has moved the whole foundation of ignorant assumptions and put into its vacant place the methods of exact and proven quantities. Bruno, whose funeral-pyre lighted the race out of the darkness and cruelty of a priest-dominated world into the beauty and majesty of a universe whose prophets are in our observatories noting the procession of the infinite, in our signal service stations regulating and controlling the commerce and prosperity of the civilized world. Hypatia, Bruno, and Paine, names to whom every school-house in the land is a monument, a monument whose greatness is only adequately measured when contrasted with the church across the way. One stands as the emblem of useful knowledge in the name and by the authority of man; the other as an emblem of the decadence of usurped authority in the name of the dead gods. Into one press the happy children to gain such knowledge as will make them intelligent, successful men and women; into the other the funeral procession of the ages to kneel about the altars of an out-grown creed, the tomb of dead theology.

Natural morality declares that the virtue of good deeds resides within the deed; that the punishment for evil is the destruction which all evil works to the evil doer. Its fullest illustration is in the fact that virtuous and temperate lives create here and now, heavens; while intemperate and vicious living marks its victim for self-punishment, and sets him apart from the esteem and companionship of mankind; asserts that happiness, the aim and goal of humanity, is only to be attained by conforming to the laws of nature on one side, and the highest requirements of society on the other.

Says Edwin Arnold:

"Men perished in winter winds,
Till one struck fire from the flint stones,
Hiding what they held—
The red spark—from the kindling sun,
They gorged flesh like wolves,
Till one sowed corn, which grew a weed,
Yet makes the life of man,
They mowed and babbled,
Till some tongue struck speech,
And patient fingers formed the lettered words.
What good gift has my brother, but it came From search, and toil, and patient sacrifice?"

The beginning of the growth of naturally moral sentiment is where savage and primeval man felt the first faint throb of fellowship, overcame his savagery enough to extend the hospitality of his hut to his fellow-savage, divided his crude and simple meal with some one else. That was the first indication of the recognition of relationship and obligation. As this sense grew and intensified, civilization appeared. Morality, the sense of justice, which binds society together, developed. It does not belong to one age, or one people, not to India alone, though Buddha declared it; nor to China, though Confucius taught it; nor to the Christian world, though Jesus repeated it. Especially it does not belong to Christianity either in its robust or emasculated form. Robust Christianity for years declared that natural "morality was no part of Christianity," it repeats it now every time the evangelical creed professes to save men on a purely technical point of faith. Emasculated Christianity, which has partially displaced revelation by reason, put out the fires of a literal hell, and called the personality of the orthodox God in question, has no claims to it. Too Christian to be natural, and too natural to be Christian, it is a hybrid, which has the features of both, without being either. "The happiness of man," says Rabbi Wise, "depends on no creed and no book; it depends on the dominion of truth."

"The eternal Pan,
Who layeth the world's incessant plan,
Halteth never in one shape,
But forever doth escape
Into new forms.

It is the product of all time, the absolute assurance of the brotherhood of men.

As Secularists we object to being bound by a special and technical form of asserted morality, which is less than universal in its sympathies. We distrust its motives, we abhor its narrowness, and we repudiate its pretensions; and while we may admire and love the simple, childlike character of the man Jesus, of whom we get such vague and incomplete glimpses, we yet remember that the great system of Christianity, which exalts him to place of sovereignty and godship, destroyed almost literally the learning and civilization of the world. The morality of secular knowledge was the immorality of ungodliness; the usefulness, the morality, the dignity of labor, was the "curse of God." The immaculate tables of divine law were held above the agonized faces of the lovers of learning and toilers for men, by hands dripping human blood. And we, as Secularists, insist that the world is better morally; not as a result of organized Christianity, but in spite of it. To our world-workers, our race-lovers, and our Secular savior, we owe our freedom and greatness in this country. Our Secular constitution is the flat and uncompromising denial of the morality of organized Christianity in the affairs of men. And we demand that our Secular constitution shall be secularly administered, upon the basis of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

And this brings us to another point in our demands, where I should be untrue to the womanhood I represent upon this rostrum did I fail to call your attention to what is particularly involved in the phrasing, "equal rights and impartial liberty." Sometimes I have felt that it might be necessary to add a tenth demand to our Secular platform, calling attention of our Liberal friends themselves to the fact that after one hundred years of government, administered upon the basis of equal rights and impartial liberty, the intelligent, patriotic women of America have advanced no farther than to the vestibule of this temple of freedom. They have entered the college, the forum, the pulpit; they helped to break the chains of America's three million black slaves, by pen and voice; they bound the cruel wounds of whip and chain, and helped to settle the case against human liberty by giving with patriotic and ungrudging heart their dearest ones to the uncertain fate of war; they urged and applauded the political enfranchisement of men in no sense their equals upon the ground of political equality, which we declared so long ago, and still they—the mothers, wives, and daughters of America—are prevented by custom, which early became the custodian of the key of right, by that, and that alone, from taking their just and lawful places in the affairs of the state, in which they, equally with men, are the participators. "Rights not delegated are rights reserved." Let us move forward to equal rights and impartial liberty.

A MESSAGE.

MR. H. T. HAWSON, Arlington, Or., My Liberal Brother: I have much pleasure in informing you that your name was brought up before the Secular convention held in this city: October 11, 12, and 13, and that you were then unanimously elected a vice-president of the Oregon State Secular Union.

I take special pleasure in making this communication to you in view of your intended visit to the old country, and hope that you will carry to our transatlantic brethren the cordial expression of our warmest sympathies.

Recognizing the benefits which Mr. Charles Bradlaugh has bestowed upon his countrymen and the world at large by his outspoken advocacy of secular opinions, we should be glad if you would use every influence you possess to persuade him to visit the states next year, travel across this continent, and address the Secularists of the Pacific coast at our convention in this city in October, 1890. Wishing you a pleasant and prosperous trip, I am, most truly yours,

C. BEAL,

President Oregon State Secular Union.

On the Trail.

To the Editors of Freethought:

After finishing my course of five lectures at Palouse City, I boarded the train about midnight for Genesee, Idaho, where I arrived in about two hours, and found good quarters at the Latah House. Genesee is the end of the Palouse branch of the Northern Pacific railroad, and is located in a beautiful little valley—all prairie, no timber being in sight; not even a bush—right on the edge of the Nez-Perce Indian reservation. It is a small town of a few hundred people, and seems very lively and budding up fast. I failed to give any lectures here, as they seemed to think I had come to buy the town and demanded territorial and city licenses and $10 a night for the Opera House—a mere shell—but I was no relation of Vanderbilt and not Ex-Governor Seymour.

I then took the stage across the reservation to Lewiston, county seat of Nez-Perce county. This land is being allotted to the Indians in severalty, and the balance will soon be surveyed and thrown open to settlement. It is most all high prairie land and very broken, but free from rocks and very rich and productive, raising 40 to 50 bushels of wheat to the acre. The crop of the past season, however, is considered a failure, averaging only 15 to 20 bushels to the acre. Drovers of cattle have been herded here until the grasses are mostly killed out, giving the country a barren appearance.

Directly we come to the brink of a fearful gorge or canyon some 2000 feet in depth, through which runs the Clearwater river, that heads away up in the Bitter-Root mountains, whose snow-covered peaks seem to be but a few miles away, but in reality nearly a hundred. Winding down the mountain trail to the waters of the Clearwater was one of the most fascinating rides I ever made, for with lightning speed down, down, we sped o'er the steep rocky grade, for, as the driver said, if we went slow the stage might somersault over the cayuses. For once the proverbial slow stage was quick enough. In half an hour we descended the seven-mile grade and were at the ferry on the Clearwater, a lovely stream of about 600 yards in width, clear and rippling over its pebbled bottom of shining sands.

It was election day on the state constitution. We were all—six of us—urged to go in and vote, and all did except myself, as they wanted all the votes they could get to help Idaho to put on statehood. Verily, our government is becoming a farce great and strong. The judges of the election left the polls to take care of themselves while they ferried us across the river.

Steamers often run up the Clearwater twenty-five or thirty miles above here, and immense rafts of wood, logs, lumber, etc., are floated down to Lewiston, a few miles below, which is located at the junction of Snake river and the Clearwater, and in a treeless region. We arrived there about sundown and found what had been before the advent of the railroads one of the prettiest towns in Idaho, situated on the narrow, level bottom lands of these two rivers. The town contains about 1000 inhabitants, yet one-third of the business houses and dwellings are standing empty, while mold, moss, and decay are to be seen everywhere. This is the head of navigation for Snake river, and before the advent of the railroads was the great center for all this region. The town was laid out thirty years ago and named after Lewis, of Lewis and Clarke, the early explorers of the upper Columbia basin. The city is about a mile long, running up the gorge of the Clearwater, and densely shaded with poplars fifty to one hundred feet in height, that have been planted as a cooler, for it often becomes a sort of sheol, the thermometer going up to 115 to 120 degrees, while on the level heights above it is cool and pleasant; but these bald, grassless, gray mountains and hills reflect the sun back into the valley until it is almost unendurable, yet this little valley is one of the best fruit regions north of California, and is the home of the celebrated Idaho pear, that is said to far excel the Bartlett. Immense quantities of berries, peaches, and by all odds the biggest red apples I have ever seen on the Pacific coast grow here, and everybody is getting to be a "bloated aristocrat" that owns a fruit farm on this part of Snake river. It is a sure fortune, for it is close to the mining and lumber regions of Idaho and Montana and the high wheat lands of Washington and Oregon. Lewiston gets water for irrigation and family use by a ditch taken out of the Clearwater several miles above, running through the main street of the town, and driving a large flouring mill just before it escapes into the Snake.

This is not the same snake that got our poor old maternal parent to eat the crab, away back, and who gave the core to her "hubby," which in swallowing stuck in his esophagus and caused us all to carry "Adam's apple" as a birthmark, an inheritance from disobedient ancestry. This is another snake, with a mouth at one end and head at the other, but deals in big red apples that would tempt the best of us poor sinners.

The water is raised out of the ditch by wooden water-wheels ten or twelve feet high and four feet wide provided with automatic tin buckets at the ends of the paddles; the current turns the wheel by undershot force, fills the buckets, which empty themselves as they come up near the top into a box which leads into pipes and troughs that go to the homes and gardens. Nearly every house has its water wheel. I know this water is good and pure, for it comes from the melting snows and springs of the mountains that flow down through the Nez-Perce villages of dirty Indians; besides, I saw dozens of cattle and horses standing in the ditch feeding along its sloping banks, and yet these folks boast of their "wonderful clear and pure water." Most of these folks have from one to three acres for a house lot where they live, so the "city" is much scattered, and very cozy and healthy with the tall shade trees everywhere. The sidewalks are nearly buried up in leaves, for the trees are in the "sere and yellow leaf," as well as the village. I gave three lectures here in the Universalist church to very fair audiences.

At sunrise on Nov. 12, I got aboard the Annie Faxon for a hundred-mile trip down the classic Snake to the great Columbia river. The Annie is a fine boat, and as I was the only passenger, I could easily imagine how it feels to charter a special car or boat and be a money king. There seems to be not a tree and hardly a bush in sight from Lewiston down to the Columbia. The bare, brown, basalt-rocky hills and bluffs, from one to two thousand feet in height, are dreary after a few miles in the extreme. I could but exclaim with Robinson Crusoe, "O Solitude, where are the charms?" and yet occasionally a little nook is found where some one has made a beautiful home, with neighbors miles away, and a fruit farm worth $25,000 to $30,000. It does not get so cold here in the valley by the river by fifteen to twenty degrees as up on the level plateaus in the wheat country eight to ten miles away. We stopped but once during the entire day—that was to take on 600 sacks of wheat at a warehouse called Alamata. I saw one warehouse where a wheat spout many thousand feet long reached away up to the heights above, through which wheat is shot down from the farms and wheat ranches in glory-land to be loaded on passing boats.

Another new thing to your man "on the trail"—the Nez-Perce Indians' method of taking a Turkish bath. They have a little dug-out made in the bank near where they live, made nearly air-tight. When they feel anything the matter with them they heat some rocks very hot and throw them inside the dug-out; then they jump in the river a few minutes, and then crawl into their hole with the hot rocks, where the air has become very hot, and sweat beautifully; then out into the river again. Lo, the poor Indian might tally one ahead yet for nature's methods of cure.

But enough for this time. The boat speeds on from Alamata, and I must watch the ever-changing scenery of these mighty basalt bluffs and wondrous wind-swept water-torn gorges of the crooked, winding Snake.

I, like Paddy of the Emerald Isle, don't like snakes. This is the biggest one I ever saw or rode.

Liberal Work At Silverton.

To the Editors of Freethought:

The interests of Liberal thought are not being neglected at Silverton. While the Liberal fraternity of this place is not in accord with the so-called Liberal lecturer whose stock consists in vituperation, interspersed with buffoonery, the cultured advocate of Liberal ideas, who is not disposed to trifle with the hopes and fears of his fellow-men, will always receive recognition and encouragement at the hands of our people.

We have recently had a series of interesting meetings at Liberal Hall at Silverton. Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, of Kansas City, has just completed, under the auspices of the Secular Union at this place, a course of Liberal lectures to large and attentive audiences. The subject of her first lecture, "Evolution of Thought and Progress of Ideas," though a difficult one, involving abstruse questions in mental philosophy, was treated in a masterly manner, beginning with the first impulse to human thought manifested in primitive man, tracing it step by step through various stages as it developed in the process of evolution, until the lapse of ages gives to us the fruitage of this germ of thought, in the scientific discoveries and the mechanical and industrial appliances of to-day.

Her second lecture, "Natural Morality Superior to Theological Restraint as a Safeguard to Society," is a complete refutation of the claim that the principles of morality are the exclusive property of any religion, or that those principles have any necessary relation to theology. "Morality is natural. It is the necessary outgrowth of human association and the science of human relations." Theological restraint is a questionable restraint to society so long as theology relegates the benefactors of the race to perdition, and by the halter swings the murderer from the gibbet into paradise. But why remove the murderer at all? If he has become a fit subject for the kingdom of heaven, why is he unfit for citizenship here? If he has become a desirable associate for Christ and the angels, why should his presence be obnoxious to good people in this world?

The subject of the concluding lecture was "The Church of the Future." The lecturer prefaced her remarks by reciting one of Mackay's poems, entitled "The Three Preachers," which was well rendered and well received. She then proceeded to review the history of the church, comparing the church as it existed in the past with the church of the present time; pointing to the forces combined to circumscribe its mental and moral growth, indicating the influences which have forced it to follow though at a lagging pace (and at a great distance in the rear) the advance-guard of civilization; showing those influences to have been natural and not supernatural influences; and logically arriving at the conclusion that they would continue in operation to advance the church, step by step, to higher ground, and to a wider field of vision and of usefulness; until in the church of the future we shall have the "ideal church of humanity."

I am not attempting to give even an outline of Mrs. Krekel's lectures. Any effort of mine in that direction would do scant justice to this distinguished advocate of Freethought. To be appreciated, Mrs. Krekel must be heard. As a logician and as a brilliant platform orator, she has few equals in either sex. She is deliberate and self-possessed upon the rostrum; never losing herself in abstraction on anything not pertinent to the subject. She is sometimes very eloquent and persuasive, always argumentative, never abusive. She arraigns and convicts the inconsistencies of theology before the bar of reason, so logically and so conclusively as to leave the most unwilling without excuse; yet in language so dignified and so refined as to give the most fastidious no offense. Mrs. Krekel is doing much to dignify the cause of Liberal thought in this country, and should be heard in every town and city on the Pacific Coast.

The senior editor of FREETHOUGHT was present at Mrs. Krekel's second lecture, and made a short introductory speech, which was replete with pleasant thought and practical suggestion and was much appreciated by his many friends present. We would have been pleased to have seen more of him, but his star seemed to lie south, and with a hand-shake and a word all round, the "Poet Pilgrim" departed, with a promise that he would write our name on the beautiful sunshine of the golden state of California.

THE zeal of religious workers is always to be commended, but sometimes they lead their less zealous brethren to smile at their methods. In a recent advertisement of a camp meeting there is at least a business-like tone, though it might strike some people as being too familiar. A cordial invitation was extended to all to come and work for the salvation of souls, and it was added that "the presence of Jesus is expected." This is a reminder of a story which a Presbyterian clergyman used to tell of a preacher in Fulton, N. Y. He wanted to get up an interest in a protracted meeting and very much desired the presence of eloquent Brother Phinney. Brother Phinney, however, was engaged at a higher figure in another town, and it was doubtful if he could be secured. The earnest brother apparently wanted to be prepared for this emergency and so he prayed, "Lord, thou knowest what a wicked place Fulton is. Have mercy on us and send us Brother Phinney. Do send us Brother Phinney. But if thou canst not send us Brother Phinney, do come thyself."

HERE is a new way for a girl to get rid of a late beau who is impervious to all hints. She gives him a paper and pencil, with one of her sweetest smiles, and says, "Now make a row of eleven ciphers, and make a perpendicular mark down on the right hand of the first cipher, upward on the right of the fourth, downward on the right of the fifth, upward on the right of the seventh and eighth, downward on the tenth. The marks should be half an inch in length." Ask him what he has written. The effect is electrical.

WHEN Dublin Cathedral was reopened after restoration at the expense of a Mr. Wise, the archbishop took for his text, "Go thou and do like Wise." Not to be outdone, a clergyman in his diocese, when opening a church built by a brewer, said his text would be found in He brews xxx.

"Don't sleep with your mouth open," said Fred to his younger brother, "You should breath through your nose." "But I don't know when my mouth's open. What do you do when you wake up and find your mouth open?" "What do I do? Why, I get up and shut it."

"Do you see me?" said the colored man boastfully, as he passed behind the mule. "Yes," replied the mule, "and raise you."

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and understand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast. G. W. THURSTON, Sr.

A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1888.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: The remedy you sent is working like a charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. Have only been using it one week, and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right. Yours respectfully, J. R.

REMARKS—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle-aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, out who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out-and-out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors. DR. FELLOWS.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future
Republic of North America
BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened. JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth." J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

PUTNAM'S WORKS.

The New God. 10c. The New God was made by an artist hand, guided by a poet soul. It is as perfect as sculpture. The creator makes his "god" in his own image, and breathes into his nostrils the breath of his own life.—L. K. Washburn.

Golden Throne. A romance. Price, $1.00. "The author certainly has genius. The divine creative spark is within him. The book is filled with manly thoughts, expressed in manly words, the transcript of a manly mind. Every Liberal should read 'Golden Throne.'"—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Walls and Wanderings. A new American story. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00. "A prose epic of the war; rich with incident and dramatic power; breezy from first page to last with the living spirit of to-day."—John Swinton's Paper.

Why Don't He Lend a Hand? And other Agnostic Poems. Price, 10 cents. "Mr. Putnam is a vigorous poet. His poetry rings like a bell, and stirs the reader like a trumpet."—Bulgarius.

Adam and Heva. Price, 10 cents. "A magnificent Agnostic poem, descriptive of the ever novel and ever mysterious legend of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden. The story is told with a wealth of imagination, a beauty of diction, and purity of thought which rank Mr. Putnam as a genuine poet."—The Universe, San Francisco.

The Problem of the Universe, and Its Scientific Solution. Price, 20 cents. "As a philosophical writer Mr. Putnam is always a success, and we delight to read him. His easy style and poetic expression make his productions very attractive."—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

Ingersoll and Jesus. A Poem. Price, 10 cents. "Written in a rather familiar style, but the sentiment is quite good, liberal, and sensible, and witty without being coarse. On the whole, it is a very clever dream, and very pleasantly related. It is well worth reading."—Boston Investigator.

Prometheus: A Poem. Price, $1. "It is crammed with life, thought and profound emotion, poured forth, it seems to me, with extraordinary richness and beauty."—Dr. Henry W. Bellows.

Gottlieb: His Life; or, Love Triumphant. A Romance of Earth, Heaven and Hell. Price, 25 cents. "To describe all the beauties of this simple, yet touchingly told little tale, would be a work of which I confess myself utterly incapable. To realize what it is, you must read the book itself. I have never read anything so exquisitely beautiful and good in all my life before."—Elmina Drake Slenker.

SAN FRANCISCO, - - - NOVEMBER 30, 1889.

THE Congregation of St. George's Episcopal church, St. Catherine's, have found an effective way of dealing with an unpopular pastor. In order to get rid of their rector, they have voted that his salary shall be $1 per annum instead of $1,500. No clergyman will stand such a reduction as that without striking.

THE Rev. Martin Horensen, an Episcopal clergyman of Council Bluffs, Iowa, deliberately cut his throat in a woodshed in the rear of his premises November 23, and bled to death. We mention the case because it is charged by the Rev. Talmage, and echoed by ministers all over the country, that Infidelity leads to suicide, but Dr. Horensen's case and many other similar cases show that the paths of belief lead to the same end much more frequently.

ARE not the Mormon church, the Catholic church, and all other churches perfectly consistent in claiming supreme power? If God is supreme and if the churches are the custodians of his word, why should they not speak with authority? That is the question, but the truth is that the head of the Mormon church or the pope of Rome knows as little about the will of God as does the most ignorant Digger Indian. Convince people of this, and the matter of church supremacy is settled forever in the negative.

A RETURNED missionary, who has been many years in Japan, has just been showing some curious effects of culture in that country. It seems that the Japanese have seized upon the idea of secular education with great avidity. While only seven thousand children go to school where religious knowledge is a part of the curriculum, over three millions attend where the teaching is purely Agnostic. The young men develop a keen love for metaphysical doctrine and research, but their favorite authors are Mill, Spencer, Darwin, and Huxley. Japan is a mountainous country for missionaries.

THE "Messenger," organ of the Young Men's Christian Association, some time ago contained this recommendation of a representative Christian worker:

"Mr. E. Glencross Grant, one of our most active members, has recently entered into the firm of The Bull & Grant Agricultural Implement Company of San Francisco and Los Angeles, and has for the present taken up his abode in Los Angeles, a fact which is decidedly regretted by his many friends here, as we are sorry to lose him from our corps of workers. Mr. Grant was a member of the Devotional and Visitation of the Sick Committees, and had charge of the consecration meeting every Saturday evening at 9 o'clock for the past month."

Mr. E. Glencross Grant is now wanted by the police. He is a forger and embezzler to the amount of $30,000. He is sure of a harp in the next world.

ONE of our city clergymen has recently delivered a lecture on "Doubt and its Cure," in discussing which subject he declared that the foundation of doubt was ignorance, and that reason and experience both led to belief in Christianity. This answered just as well as anything better for the young Christians who heard it, but if any of them had been acquainted with facts or capable of reasoning, they would have known that what the clergyman said was the exact opposite of truth. This is proved by the indisputable fact that the ignorant seldom doubt, while the more intelligent disbelieve. The same reverend gentleman cited the antiquity of Christianity as evidence of its truth. It had, he said, withstood the assaults of two thousand years, and proved itself invincible. He should remember that ignorance has also withstood the assaults of learning, and still exists to a deplorable degree; and if the invincibility of Christianity shows it to be divine, how about the invincibility of ignorance? Is that also divine? In the language of another, "It won't do."

RELIGIONISTS IN POLITICS.

THE attempt of the so-called "Gentiles" of Salt Lake City to disfranchise the Mormons raises a question that, sooner or later, the people of the whole country will be called upon to meet. The question is whether men who hold any ecclesiastical law as more binding than civil law, and who will swear to stand by the laws of the church instead of the laws of the land whenever the two come in conflict, are to be recognized as loyal citizens and allowed to vote. In our opinion the church and the state are two hostile camps, with the difference that while the state is and should be on the defensive, the church is belligerent and perpetually endeavoring to encroach upon the state. The church rightfully resents the interference of the state in ecclesiastical matters. As a citizen of the state no man may have a voice in church affairs. Why, then, as a member of the church (we refer to that branch of the church which holds to ecclesiastical supremacy), should any man vote upon state affairs? To illustrate further, we will say that state and church represent rival powers—the one a republic, the other a despotism. In the autonomy of the despotism a member of the republic is a cipher, and has no voice; but every subject of the despotism, on the other hand, is given an equal right with all others to control the affairs of the republic. This strikes us as a wholly one-sided arrangement, and viewing the matter in this light the Gentiles of Utah are perfectly justified in questioning the loyalty and voting power of the Mormons.

But there is a wider application to be made than that which touches the insignificant sect called Mormons, and the "handful of American citizens" living in Utah. We must take into account the conflict between the nine or ten millions of Roman Catholics in this country, and the loyal people of the United States. These millions of subjects of the Romish despotism are as much opposed to state supremacy as are the Mormons of Utah. They place the pope at the head of all powers. In the declaration by a Roman Catholic prelate at the recent conference in Baltimore, that the pope should never be the subject of any government, the same principle was asserted that ruled before the Reformation; the principle under which the pope made and unmade kings. The pope now demands temporal sovereignty and political independence of the government of Italy. At present he must pay his taxes and observe the laws of Italy like any other citizen, but he desires to throw off these obligations and re-establish his sovereignty in Rome. He would have his ambassadors in every royal court and he would send his emissary to Washington to be recognized as the representative of a foreign power. He speaks of the members of his church in this country as his "children," but they are as much his subjects as an unnaturalized Englishman is a subject of the queen.

The Mormons can argue that they owe allegiance to no foreign potentate; that the head of their church is a resident of this country; and that in applying for naturalization papers they do forswear all other powers than that inhering in citizens of the United States. But the Catholic can make no such plea. The Irish Catholic, for instance, gladly relinquishes the protection of the British government under which he has lived in his native land, and against which he has been all his life in rebellion, and as cheerfully accepts that of his adopted country, but he merely transfers his person, not his loyalty. He was a subject of Rome in Ireland, and he is a subject of Rome in America.

Thus the question arises again, Can the subject of the despotism vote in the republic before he has renounced his allegiance to the despot? If this question is answered negatively in the case of the Mormons it must for still stronger reasons be answered in the negative when asked concerning Roman Catholics. We would like to see the matter discussed by the politicians if there is a politician with backbone enough to touch it.

SCHWEINFURTH THE CHRIST.

The editor of the Argus, Alpena, Mich., says under date of October 30:

"Schweinfurth, the man who claims to be the Christ, has been in the city the past week looking after his small flock in this place. It is his first visit in three years. In former times he made frequent visits here, but at present there is not much financial inducement for him to come, and the custom has been for the Alpena members of the sect to go to the headquarters in Illinois. There is one thing in regard to this peculiar sect, and that is, Schweinfurth has managed to make a first-class living out of his deluded followers, and is reported to be wealthy. We have frequently stated our opinion of the sacrilegious impostor in this paper, and know no reason to change our belief in regard to him. This is a free country, however, and if his followers are so weak-minded as to believe he is the Christ, it is their privilege. Schweinfurth has a good thing of it at the expense of the sect, and no doubt proposes to maintain his grip on them. It is likely he agrees with the motto of Puck: 'What fools these mortals be,' when he thinks of the manner he has fooled them in believing him to be Christ. Queer things are done in this country under the name of religion. A man with a fluent tongue can easily start a religion of his own, get it patented, and enlist weak-minded followers. The people like to be humbugged, and Schweinfurth is a first-class illustration as to how it can be done."

A RENEWAL AND A NEW NAME.

We are sending out reminders this week to some of our subscribers that their time has expired. In renewing it is hoped that each may make an endeavor to send in the name of a new subscriber.

THE PRESS AND THE COURTS.

Judge Shafter of the Superior Court of San Francisco, in sentencing a criminal a few days ago, gave utterances to these sentiments:

"In regard to the interference of the public press in this case, I must say that the articles published are all alike in tenor and effect. These publications are criminal on their face; they are disreputable to the public press and contemptuous to the courts and the officials elected to carry out the laws. The persons who publish and write these things claim exemption from punishment, but I denounce them as criminals under the criminal laws of this state, and no community which suffers them to exist can be called civilized or Christian. I cannot punish them in open court, but if the matter is brought to my attention in proper form by affidavits I shall mete out to them the severest punishment."

A great deal of discussion has been raised by this expression of opinion, as, if Judge Shafter is right, a court, however corrupt, is exempt from public criticism, and a paper lays itself liable to prosecution for contempt if it even reports judicial proceedings. Among the many who have spoken upon the subject none has come nearer, in our judgment, to a legal and just statement of the case than Colonel Ingersoll, and we here introduce an interview between the colonel and a member of the press:

"Suppose a reporter makes a report that he as well as others considers impartial, and the court differs from him; is he to be punished, if the court pleases?"

"Of course every court has a right to protect itself from interference from disturbance to the end that it may discharge its duties so far as protecting itself is concerned. But the expression of opinion by making any reports not in the presence of the court or in a way that hinders or interrupts its business cannot be called contempt. In such cases the court can do nothing by way of arresting and punishing for contempt. A judge has the same remedy that a private person has and no other. It is the duty of the court to guard the rights of the suitors, to prevent their cases being prejudiced by false or malicious reports of judicial proceedings, and there may be cases in which false reports might properly subject the maker to punishment for a contempt, but it can be no offense to make true reports and no offense beyond a technical one to make incorrect reports."

"Suppose a court is openly and notoriously dishonest and unfair, and a newspaper says so, do you think the court has a right to punish that editor?"

"If the court is corrupt, the editor of a paper, knowing that fact, has not only the right but it is his duty to say so, and no such court has the right to punish him. He would be entitled to testify and to show the truth of what he published, and if he did this, there certainly would be no offense. He would then be guilty of having discharged a public duty. Under the circumstances supposed, the editor would be in the right, and the court could do nothing except to resign. Every court ought to be able to stand the truth. No editor should charge a judge with dishonesty unless he had the best of proof. Neither should comments be made on trials calculated to prejudice the rights of either party.

"I believe that no man can be entitled to greater respect than a just judge, and certainly no human being can be lower than a corrupt judge. It is of immense importance to us all to have an independent, intelligent and honest judiciary, and it is also of immense importance to us all to have an intelligent, independent, and honest press. No editor can be technically guilty of an offense by publishing the truth in regard to courts."

THE DUNGEON'S GLOOM FOR SLANDERERS.

We hereby acknowledge the receipt of the appended letter, addressed to "Samuel P. Putnam and George E. Macdonald, Editors and Publishers of FREETHOUGHT, 504 Kearny street, San Francisco:"

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Nov. 25, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: I have just had handed to me a copy of your issues of November 9th and 23d.

In the issue of the 9th I read these words:

"Mr. Haskell is tonguey if not profound * * [the audience] appeared fatigued," etc., the whole account clearly showing a personal prejudice against myself.

In the issue of the 23d I see this:

"If he is a rogue, as some people say, he is the most intense rogue that I ever saw."

"I have little doubt that it will result in electing Mr. Haskell to some lucrative public office."

I do not know either of you gentlemen personally, and I do not think you know me. I am therefore at a loss to know what personal animus there can be between us.

You have stated in print, however, that "some people" say I am "a rogue." If you will be kind enough to give me the names of any men who have said that, I will attend to my own vindication, and with them.

Seven years in the Socialist movement in San Francisco has of course taught me that secret enemies must swarm in the track of any man who does his duty in that cause.

And though I have unearthed many of them, yet I never found one who would stand by what he secretly whispered, openly and above board to my face. Very truly yours, BURNETTE G. HASKELL.

P. S.—Of course you are at liberty to show this to "some people" or any people, and with this addition:

That if any man, here or elsewhere, will put his name to any written or printed statement involving my character as a gentleman, a man of honor, or an honest person, I will, through the law of libel, give him instant opportunity to prove his case publicly before the courts and go free, or to cool his imagination and malice alike, within the four walls of a cell.

That Mr. Haskell should have reached the conclusion that the editors of FREETHOUGHT harbor personal prejudice against him gives us deep pain. No such prejudice exists. We are perfectly willing to acknowledge his possession of all the talents and virtues whereof he is seized. We know him to be a man of great oratorical force and literary vigor. We have known of him as a shining light, albeit an ignis-fatuus, in the Labor movement for numerous years, but if he imagines that we intend to maintain that he is not a gentleman of honor and a distinguished scholar, he is much in error. There are, however, persons in this city who will say that Mr. Haskell is not all he should be, and if these choose to accept his challenge to prove the same and go free or enjoy the hospitality of the county jail, such is their privilege. For our part, we desire to see Mr. Haskell vindicated. If any gentleman knows aught to his credit he should speak at once, and not let concealment, like a worm in the bud, feed on his damask cheek.

It is regretted that our correspondent is under the necessity of having a copy of FREETHOUGHT "handed" to him. He should subscribe. Per annum, $2; six months, $1; sample copies free.

HUXLEY AND THE "DIEGESIS."

A few weeks ago a subscriber of FREETHOUGHT who had read the discussion between Professor Huxley and the Rev. Dr. Wace on "Christianity and Agnosticism" took occasion to inquire how it happened that both the disputants ignored the historical matter contained in the "Diegesis" of the Rev. Robert Taylor; and concluding that Huxley had never read Taylor's work, he suggested that the professor be furnished with a copy and his opinion of the work solicited. Through Mr. Charles A. Watts, of London, the "Diegesis" was forwarded to the great Agnostic, and the following reply is the result:

October 30, 1889.

DEAR SIR: I am much obliged for Taylor's "Diegesis." I do not wish to appear ungrateful to your American correspondent; but I must confess that, if he has any knowledge of the subject, and he has read Taylor's work, I am at a loss to imagine why he should want any one else to waste his time in the same way.

Taylor is not without learning and acuteness, and he has studied the older German rationalists to some purpose; moreover, a man who dates his letters from Oakham Jail may be forgiven for a great deal of strong language. Sixty years since such a book as the "Diegesis" was, to say the least, excusable; there could be no possible excuse for putting forward such absurd stuff—as a great deal of it is—now. I am

Yours faithfully,

T. H. HUXLEY.

If this is all Professor Huxley has to say about the masterly work of Taylor, he has hardly repaid the trouble of getting his opinion. Robert Taylor, in the "Diegesis," summed up certain alleged historical facts concerning the origin and evidences of Christianity, and explained the myth of Christ and his apostles on a very plausible and ingenious astronomical theory. Leaving the theory out of the question, the historical facts remain to be dealt with. If they are sound, Christianity is not left a peg whereon to hang its hat, and the "Gadarene pig story" and other miracles fall to the ground because the central figure, the gospel Jesus, is proved to have been a figment of the oriental imagination. What our correspondent desired to know, as we understood it, was whether, in Professor Huxley's opinion, Taylor had stated the historical truth or had stated things that were untrue. History is one thing, theory is another; and while Taylor's theory is not generally accepted as final, his statements are still to be impeached. Did the Rev. Robert Taylor tell the truth when dealing with matters purely historical, or did he not? That is the question for Professor Huxley to pass upon, and which he has not touched in his dismissal of the "Diegesis" as "absurd stuff."

MEETINGS for all who are interested in the discussion of economic and political questions will be held at 909½ Market street, San Francisco, on every Sunday of December, at 2 and 7:45 P.M. There will be free discussion.

NEWSPAPER correspondents in the new Republic of Brazil report that there is difficulty in sending accurate reports of the state of affairs to the foreign press, because "the government exercises a close supervision over all dispatches." It is evident that the leaders of Brazil's revolution have established a republic without knowing what it means.

Is Freethought conducive to long and happy married life? It would seem so, especially in California. In the brief existence of this paper we have had the pleasure of chronicling the golden weddings of Mr. and Mrs. N. D. Goodell, of Sacramento, and of Mr. and Mrs. L. Parker, of Anaheim, readers of FREETHOUGHT; and now come the cards for the fiftieth wedding anniversary of the Hon. A. Schell and wife, of Knight's Ferry. This latter event takes place December 5, 1889, and we extend our heartiest congratulations and best wishes to Mr. and Mrs. Schell. Long life and good luck!

A REPORT is in circulation in England to the effect that Gladstone has privately been received into the Catholic church. Mr. Gladstone maintains a deep interest in religious matters and is now engaged in a work on "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture," but it is not believed that he has reached the conclusion expressed in the above title through his recent discussion with Colonel Ingersoll.

THE lecture by the Rev. Dr. Cruzan on "Our American Barons and Their Serfs" appears in this issue. With the example of the Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost before him, Mr. Cruzan shows considerable disregard of known consequences in thus espousing a cause that is frowned upon by the orthodoxy which he represents. It is hoped that he has selected a soft place to light upon when he has to jump.

THERE is a decided ring of business in President Westbrook's contribution this week. We cannot agree with him in his declaration that the American Secular Union has accomplished little or nothing, because we know that it has accomplished a good deal; but when he tells us of the work to be done and of his determination to do it, every Liberal in the country must be with him in all enthusiasm.

AFFLICTION falls heavily upon our Liberal brother, W. S. Rodgers, of Boulder Creek. Less than a year ago his wife and infant child were buried together, leaving six young children to the father's care; and on the 21st inst. the fifth of the little ones died of acute bronchitis. Mr. Rodgers has the sympathy of all who know him through his open-handed aid of the Liberal cause, and of all his personal acquaintances, by whom he is held in the highest esteem.

SURELY THIS MEANS SUCCESS.

The responses already received to the proposition to form a Freethought Publishing Company show that a popular vein has been struck—that the right plan has been adopted. This seems to be the universal verdict. Business men acknowledge it to be a good business enterprise. Every one interested in the cause sees in this co-operative movement a chance to help, and to help effectually. There never was a better opportunity to build up a solid Freethought organization. It is not best that the paper should be in the hands of a few. Let a thousand Liberals own and control it. Let it be the representative organ of this great West. Let friends read the names of those who have already contributed, and their indorsement of the plan, and they will see an assurance of complete success. All that is now necessary is that every subscriber of FREETHOUGHT who desires the progress of the paper should stand side by side with these friends who have so generously come to the front. Over three hundred shares are now taken. With five hundred shares taken the company will be organized. This should be done before the beginning of the new year. Let those who are ready to join report without delay. This method of future work having been determined on, the sooner it is under way the better, for time is money in this as in every other enterprise. Read these letters:

MARSHFIELD, OR., Nov. 20, 1889.

DEAR SIR: Yours of Nov. 17 came to hand, and Mrs. Mark is willing to take two shares at $5 each, and I will take three shares. This will be paid any time called for. Yours truly, F. MARK.

STOCKTON, Nov. 22, 1889.

FRIENDS: I received your circular. If you carry the torchlight of FREETHOUGHT steadily along as you have the past two years, I think your two thousand subscribers will take shares enough to establish the Freethought Publishing Company and the book store. By request I send you the names of Mr. Willard T. Jones, one share; Mrs. Willard T. Jones, one share; Mrs. J. C. Gage, one share; J. C. Gage, one share. Yours truly, J. C. GAGE.

ALBANY, OR., Nov. 21, 1889.

DEAR SIR: Your circular of 17th inst. duly received. I understand you are going to organize an association to be known as the Freethought Publishing Company. I think it a good scheme and like to support it as much as I can. I am about broke at present, but you can put me down for five shares just the same. Your sincere friend, CHRIS. E. HOWLAND.

HELENA, MONT., Nov. 21, 1889.

DEAR FRIENDS: Inclosed find $10, five for my subscription for FREETHOUGHT, and the other five dollars for a share in the Freethought Publishing Company. Every Liberal should assist this laudable object. With best wishes for success, HENRY C. YAEGER.

ANAHEIM, CAL., Nov. 22, 1889.

DEAR SIR: The plan to establish a Freethought Publishing Company is excellent, and one that should meet with cordial support from every Liberal on this coast. I am in a hard streak at present and am unable to contribute as freely as I would like to, but I will strain a point and try to take five shares now, and when my affairs assume a better shape—if they ever do—I will take more. Truly yours, S. LITTLEFIELD.

SEATTLE, WASH., Nov. 21, 1889.

PUTNAM & MACDONALD: With the Freethought Publishing Company, which you suggest, in San Francisco, I am fully in sympathy. It would put our noble and enterprising FREETHOUGHT on a more solid basis and give us a Home House that would be a benefit to all the Liberals on the Pacific Coast. I shall certainly take one or more shares. Very truly yours, S. W. CLARK.

CHRISTINE, CAL., Nov. 22, 1889.

DEAR SIR: I think your plan of organizing a Freethought Publishing Company on this coast, such as you propose in your circular, will be a grand thing for Liberalism. I would like to take a good many shares, but in the mean time will promise to take one. JONAS MYERS.

PORTLAND, OR., Nov. 21, 1889.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 17th inst. I will say, put me down for one share. I may take more. I believe you will get the shares all taken; it's a good thing. Please drop a card stating what I owe on my paper account, and oblige, Yours for humanity, C. W. SAUNDERS.

EUREKA, CAL., Nov. 19, 1889.

FRIEND MACDONALD: Yours of November 14 came to hand.

yesterday. I approve of your idea and will take ten shares. I saw Mr. Quosig, who promised to take five shares. I am well aware that those who expect dividends in the near future may be disappointed. For my part I prefer the satisfaction of having done my share to help crush superstition, to dividends. Get as many interested as you can, the more the better. As a rule, joint stock companies are institutions where a few big fish eat up the small fry; but I hope that those who take stock in this are more interested in spreading the light than in accumulating pelf.

Hoping your enterprise will succeed, I am, as ever, yours fraternally,

ROBERT GUNTHER.

CALISTOGA, CAL., Nov. 22, 1889.

GEO. E. MACDONALD, ESQ., Dear Sir: Your letter is at hand. I was glad to hear a Freethought Publishing Company is to be started. I am good for two shares, and my friend, Dan. Macdonald, takes one. I am satisfied with the paper and will take it as long as it is published.

JOHN DUMBACHER.

SIERRA CITY, CAL., Nov. 21, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: Yours of the 17th is at hand. I am glad to say I am well-pleased with your paper. You can count on me for five dollars for one share. I hope that you will be successful.

GEO. W. WILSON.

OAKDALE, CAL., Nov. 19, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Your circular proposing to organize a FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY to hand, and contents noted. You may mark me down for two shares, ten dollars, to help the enterprise along.

Fraternally yours,
R. H. ENDICOTT.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Nov. 20, 1889.

MR. PUTNAM, Dear Sir: I am willing to take two shares of FREETHOUGHT stock, and if you should not get sufficient subscribers I might take five.

Yours in the hope of success,
L. MAGENHEIMER.

OAKDALE, CAL., Nov. 20, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: I have received your notice of organizing a FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY. I am pleased with the idea, and hope you will meet with success. You can put my name down for five shares.

Yours, JOHN HUBBEL.

UNIVERSITY, LOS ANGELES, CAL., Nov. 20, 1889.

To the Editors of Freethought:

In answer to yours I will say that I intend to take one share at least. I would like to see Liberal literature have a better chance for distribution. All the present book stores seem to be afraid of it.

Yours truly, L. SCHLEGEL.

OPHIR, CAL., Nov. 18, 1889.

PUTNAM & MACDONALD, Dear Sirs: Good enough. Book my wife and me for one share apiece in the FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY, and the money will be forthcoming when we are notified, or probably before.

With high hopes for your success, LEWIS AND ROSA KAISER.

STOCKTON, CAL., Nov. 19, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Your circular at hand. In reply will say that you can put my name down for one share in the FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY, and if I can possibly do more, shall let you know in due time. I am in favor of the proposed plan, and trust it will prove a grand success in promulgating Freethought throughout the land.

Wishing you every success, VICTOR HECK.

GRAFTON, CAL., Nov. 20, 1889.

FRIEND MACDONALD: Yours of the 13th is received. In reply I will say I think your proposition a wise one, and one that should get all the assistance necessary to put it on a firm foundation with a full stock of goods. I, though a laborer, will take $50 worth of stock, with the expectation of paying a few assessments until the business is established. I think all Liberals should put in what they can, as it is the only way that many like myself have of helping the cause of Freethought, which takes from them the superstitions of the past and gives them morality instead.

Respectfully, N. B. PARNELL.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Nov. 20, 1889.

S. P. PUTNAM, Dear Sir: You will please place my name on your list of subscribers to the FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY for two shares of its stock.

Very truly, FRED McMILLAN

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Nov. 20, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD, Dear Sirs: I hereby subscribe for four (4) shares in the FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY. I wish you success in the new crusade against superstition.

W. BOTSFORD, M. D.

ANAHEIM, CAL., Nov. 19, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: We will take two shares at present; may double it in time.

Yours in the cause of Liberalism, L. and K. PARKER.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Nov. 20, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: Your circular, Important to Liberals, to hand. Put my name down for one share.

E. A. DENICKE.

POMO, CAL., Nov. 18, 1889.

FRIEND PUTNAM: Your letter and circular are at hand, I will take one share, and perhaps more when the thing ripens.

Yours truly, JOHN MEWHINNEY.

LIVERMORE, CAL., Nov. 21, 1889.

PUTNAM & MACDONALD: I received yours in due time and have come to the conclusion that you may count on me for five dollars if you get enough subscribed. This will be given without your issuing any stock to me.

Wishing you success,
M. S. PALMER.

UINTAH, UTAH, Nov. 20, 1889.

PUTNAM & MACDONALD, Friends: Put my name down for a share in the FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY. I hope I may be able to take a few more after a while, and the enterprise be a grand success.

Yours as ever, CHAS. DE LA BAUME.

HORNITAS, CAL., Nov. 18, 1889.

REV. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Dear Sir and Brother: Your circular letter is received. I think the idea a good one and will take two shares. I will also make another effort to get new subscribers (which I have been unable to do up to the present). Nearly all are Liberals there, but most of them are of the indifferent kind. I hope yet to see them get their eyes open to the necessity of action. With best wishes for the success of FREETHOUGHT, and the health and prosperity of its editors, I remain, Fraternally yours, R. W. BARCROFT.

NIPOMO, CAL., Nov. 17, 1889.

FRIENDS PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Your favor received and considered. We think the idea a good one, and our hearts are with you. We will take five shares at $5 each, and wish we could take from twenty-five to fifty shares. However, we feel that you will have a hearty response to this, that will roll up the necessary amount.

Your true friend, JOHN ROBINETT.

OAKLAND, Nov. 23, 1889.

FRIENDS PUTNAM AND MACDONALD: It behooves every staunch Freethinker to render all assistance in his power in helping to build the temple of the religion of reason, part of which temple I consider that "voice in the wilderness," our St. John the Baptist, the San Francisco FREETHOUGHT; and such I would consider any auxiliary movement tending to help spread the gospel of U. M. L. on the Pacific coast. Such movement would be the establishment of a Freethought publishing company, of which I will take two shares now and add to them next year as my means will permit. The unholy father in Rome receives yearly a stream of gold from his believing dupes in the shape of Peter's penance, for which he sends his pretended blessings by letter or telegraph; said blessings are turned into curses in every land wherever disseminated. Surely we Freethinkers can at least do our own blessing and try to gather it not from heaven, but from the elements of the planet Earth. I remain Yours in the dawn of a higher light,

H. L. HAELKE.

BAKERSFIELD, CAL., Nov. 18, 1889.

FRIEND PUTNAM: I will subscribe for one share of the stock of the new enterprise, and only regret that I cannot do more. Wishing you success in all undertakings, I am, dear sir,
Yours,
N. R. WILKINSON.

LARGO, CAL., Nov. 21, 1889.

DEAR SIR: Your circular letter of the 17th inst. duly received. I am pleased to note the effort you are making to advance the cause of Liberalism on this coast, and regret that my present position will not admit of my giving more substantial aid than to take one single share in your proposed enterprise, for I assure you I am an out-and-out Freethinker. This is all, however, I can promise at present, and when called upon I will hand in the five dollars.
Yours truly,
L. F. LONG.

KIDD CREEK, Nov. 23, 1889.

DEAR FRIENDS: I received yours of the 17th inst., and I see no reason why your plans as stated in circular should not come out all right. As I am situated at present financially I can only take two shares, but in the course of a few months I might go a little better. I have induced Mr. Henry C. Ogle to take two shares. There ought not to be any trouble in selling as many shares as will insure the success of FREETHOUGHT. With the present editors at the helm it is bound to float. Yours, in the cause of truth,
W. M. FERGUSON.

KNIGHT'S FERRY, CAL., Nov. 18, 1889.

FRIEND MACDONALD: I returned to my home at Red Mountain Vineyard last night, and this morning was handed your letter and inclosed circular proposing a FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY in San Francisco. Put me down for ten shares, of $5 each. With you at the head I may perhaps be induced to take more in the future. I think well of such a plan, and hope there may be enough interested in it to insure its success. The more Freethought literature is distributed, the better for the cause. With Putnam in the field and you at the helm, it must succeed. You have made FREETHOUGHT one of the ablest papers in the United States.
Yours very truly,
A. SCHELL.

BOULDER CREEK, Cal., Nov. 17, 1889.

FRIENDS PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Your favor in regard to the projected Publishing Company is at hand, and in reply will say that I think it a good idea. The great trouble with the Freethought movement has been all along the utter indifference of Liberals. Giving those who are interested enough to help in this movement a direct interest in the paper ought to be an important step towards success. Nothing would please me more than to see a strong Freethought publishing house established here on the Pacific coast. It is what I have hoped to see all along. Hard times and many misfortunes will prevent me from doing all I could wish just now. You can put me down for ten shares anyway. I will also speak to all Liberals who will be likely to help, and do all I that can to help you.

Yours sincerely,
W. S. RODGERS.

SAN JOSE, Nov. 20, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: At a meeting of the San Jose Secular Union held on the 17th inst., five of the members present expressed themselves in readiness to take shares as follows: Miss Wehner one, R. H. Schwartz one, Mr. Pobritz one, L. Magenheim two, with privilege of more; Mr. Titus, "just as many as he could raise the money to take." There was a small attendance, or we could have sent more names. We meet again next Sunday to try and arrange for a public meeting in the form of a short musical and literary programme and an address, where this matter will be brought before the people. With best wishes for the success of your new and grand enterprise, which we feel confident will meet with a favorable response from all the Liberals on this coast, we remain Fraternal yours,

SAN JOSE SECULAR UNION.
MRS. R. H. SCHWARTZ, Sec., R. H. SCHWARTZ, Pres.

SAN DIEGO, Nov. 18, 1889.

MR. PUTNAM, Dear Sir: The enterprise you speak of is good. I think it will benefit Freethought and the world at large. I will take one share in the enterprise and forward money when arrangements are perfected. Very respectfully,
JAS. BIDWELL.

CAZADERO, Nov. 18, 1889.

G. E. MACDONALD, Dear Sir: I hope that the proposition you make in your circular will be well supported by the Liberals of this coast, and that it may be the means of breaking the shackles of superstition that have such control over the human mind. I will take ten shares.

Please send me one dollar's worth of FREETHOUGHT of Nov. 16. I like the way you gave it to the president about that Thanksgiving proclamation. Yours,
H. F. EBERS.

SONOMA, CAL., Nov. 18, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Received your letter, and see with pleasure your statement that FREETHOUGHT promises to be self-sustaining and its principles increasing. If everybody would help according to his means, there could be very easily a substantial company formed. Now, I for my part, don't calculate on any gains to be received, or I would say I have no money to invest, but I like to help the cause, and so put me down for ten shares at $50.
Yours truly,
ED. WEGNER.

LOTUS, Nov. 21, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: Your favor in regard to organizing the Freethought Publishing Company, came to hand a few days since, and I will say that it strikes me as a good idea, although it is something that is entirely out of my line of business and it may be that I am not qualified to form an opinion in regard to such matters, but am willing to take five shares on a risk. Have been afflicted with financial cramps lately or I would risk a few more shares, don't want to undertake more than I can carry through. Will try to induce some of my neighbors to invest in a few shares. Trusting that the undertaking may prove a grand success, I remain,
Yours in the cause,
G. W. RAMSEY.

FELTON, CAL., Nov. 18, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Your circular reached me to-day. I am very well pleased with the objects therein proposed. I write to say I sincerely hope it will be successful, as such a paper as FREETHOUGHT and a good bookstore are very much needed on this coast, and I hope the Liberals will come forward and help to build them up. There are plenty of Liberals around here, but many are of the do-nothing class, while others are afraid to say a word for fear of losing in business were they to avow their sentiments. For my part, I never intrude my opinions on any one, but when they are feeling round after my belief they very soon get it. There are a good many Liberals in the city of Santa Cruz, yet when Mr. S. P. Putnam was there lecturing they did not turn out, although I sent them word myself. The Spiritualists of Santa Cruz will always receive my gratitude for the help they gave us when Mr. Putnam was there. Now, gentlemen, you can put me down for five shares of stock. This looks small, I know, but I make my living by the labor of my hands, and money comes in very slow.

Hoping you will receive subscriptions enough to start and sustain the object you have in view, and with best wishes to all in FREETHOUGHT office, I remain,
Yours respectfully,
I. H. CURTIS.

DEL MAR, CAL., Nov. 20, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Yours of the 17th inst. is received, also the circular containing the proposition for the establishment of a Freethought Publishing Company. The idea of forming a joint stock company with shares at $5 each strikes me as one of the best and most practical propositions that you have up to the present time advanced. It commends itself to the necessities of the occasion as far more practical than did the "guarantee fund." I believe that the prospect of an investment that in time may yield a revenue to the stockholders will induce many of limited means to become stockholders. Another thing worthy of consideration, it will place the publishers of FREETHOUGHT on an equality with the stockholders (I mean in a business sense) instead of in the relation of beggars.

I did not like the "guarantee fund" proposition, but as that seemed to be the only method at that time to perpetuate FREETHOUGHT, and fearing that the "bust" of the boom might embarrass and burst the only representative paper we have on this coast, I felt it my duty to "lend a hand," and now we have the satisfaction of knowing that FREETHOUGHT has rode the billows and storm in safety. She comes into the glorious harbor of Freethought and common sense with her colors flying, ready again to take on more fuel for still heavier assaults upon the great enemy of mankind, superstition (commonly misnamed religion); not only ready for the fray, but eager. So, my dear warrior lads, put me down for twenty-five shares, with a favorable prospect of taking fifty more when the time comes for paying up.

That sterling Infidel, Wm. A. Allen, of San Diego, informed me that he would invest in five shares, and possibly more.

Hoping every Freethinker on the Pacific slope will make immediate application to the extent of his ability for shares, I am

Yours for the new order, H. L. SHAug.

SANTAQUIN, UTAH, Nov. 20, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: I received just now your circular of Nov. 17, and subscribe for two shares sure, and probably will take more if circumstances permit. I have no thought of deriving any benefit from the enterprise except—and that is fully satisfactory—the general good it will promote.

ROBERT NAGLER.

SUNOL, CAL., Nov. 18, 1889.

EDITOR FREETHOUGHT: I received your letter in which you inform me of the proposed Freethought Publishing Company, and in answer will say that I think the plan is a good one, and I will take three shares.

ANDY DERMING.

ESCONDIDO, CAL., Nov. 21, 1889.

DEAR GENTLEMEN: Yours of the 17th inst. is at hand. I am in favor of the noble cause and take one (1) share.

CHARLES HOTTENDORF.

THE "ORACLE" AND MISS FIELD.

EDITOR FREETHOUGHT: An up-country paper, which I shall call the Oracle, has taken occasion to criticise Miss Kate Field's late lectures. Miss Field, it seems, has the hardihood to think for herself, and says, "Women should not be allowed to vote or to participate in political affairs—on the ground that their intellects are untrained and their judgments faulty."

Upon this sound and logical proposition the Oracle comments as follows: "We shall not take issue with Miss Field on that point further than to remark that she herself furnishes abundant evidence of the conclusiveness of her argument." This silly school-boy's "you're-another" insinuation will hardly silence Miss Field. The Oracle declines to take issue with her on the woman-suffrage question, evidently because her arguments are incontrovertible, and also because the policy of that paper is to be on the popular side.

Commenting on Miss Field's woman-suffrage ideas, the Oracle indulges in a low fling at that lady personally, but has not the manliness to give her credit for indomitable pluck in facing the music of a senseless popular clamor. The Oracle's subterfuges will undoubtedly delight the ministers and the W. C. T. U., but Miss Field will still keep the lecture field, tingling ears to the contrary notwithstanding.

OUR AMERICAN BARONS AND THEIR SERFS.*

BY J. A. CRUZAN.

"In days of old, when knights were bold, and barons held their sway," the baron, in his moated castle, not only owned the land, but the men who lived upon it were his vassals; they belonged to the land. The common people were not slaves—far from it. They were free, only attached to the soil where they were born. A "lordless" man was an outlaw in those good old days. The villain, as the serf was termed, must serve his lord on the land, in court, in field of battle, and in foray. In return, his lord must care for and protect him; the soil to which he was attached must yield him support. The great folks in the moated castle lived in splendor, and enjoyed life in their beastly, brutal way. But they must care for the villain, and so there was no Lazarus, in days of old, perishing at the gate of plenty. The baron cared for his serf in his vigor and old age.

Have we barons in America? Well, not with moated castles, certainly, but let us glance at a single case.

Yonder, in Lebanon county, Pa., is the Cornwall iron mine or, rather, quarry. Three great hills of nearly pure iron rise from the plain, and all that is necessary is to dig it out and carry it away. Eight million tons have already been taken out; thirty or forty million tons yet remain above the plain, and below that borings have shown the deposit to reach to the depth of at least three hundred feet. Who owns this vast treasure? Most common people would say that this great store of rich iron was for the benefit of mankind. But in some way the right to dispose of it for all future time inhered, about 1680, in one James Stuart, now dead, who was awhile king of England, and then retired into France. This James Stuart, from whom, although he is now nearly two centuries dead, all rights to the use of this great state of Pennsylvania are still supposed to come, made a grant of a considerable part of the planet he was so soon to leave to William Penn and others. The Penns sold these valuable hills of iron to one Turner; he sold it to one Alden, and in 1737 Alden sold three hundred acres, containing these three hills of iron, to one Peter Grubb.

In 1786 one Robert Coleman bought five-sixths of these valuable iron hills from the heirs of Grubb. These interests have descended through the Grubb and Coleman families to the present day. Now four Colemans, two male and two female, practically own this property. One of the two male Colemans lives in Paris, where he prefers to enjoy the enormous income which comes to him, without work on his part, by virtue of the grant of James II. The other Robert Coleman, a young man of great enterprise and liberality, lives in Lebanon, and is the manager of the estate. It is true he never knelt before a king and was smitten on the shoulder with the words, "Rise, Sir Knight," but in all but the title he is an American baron of the very best English type. His interest in the iron deposit, rich as it is, is only a part of his estate. He has some 20,000 acres of the finest land stocked with blooded cattle, a railroad or two, which connect with the Pennsylvania and Reading systems, a splendid mansion, and nobody knows what else besides. On the day of Robert's majority, besides his three hills of iron and other real and personal property, his guardian turned over to him $1,200,000!

Baron Coleman, of Lebanon, Pa., U. S. A., does not make midnight forays followed by his retainers. No; he builds churches, makes good turnpikes of the slack out of his furnaces and plants them with shade trees, has given largely to the college in which he was educated, is kind and liberal to his tenants and employes, entertains distinguished guests royally, and seems to be, in short, the kind of a young prince that would delight the heart of a Tennyson—a genial, upright, and free-handed lord of the land and master of men who takes the world as he finds it.

But don't you suppose that he sometimes marvels at the hold which that old dogma, the "divine right" of kings, still has? Backed by our laws and courts and our industrial system, James II., dead two centuries, has the power to create these two American barons and to render this wonderful iron quarry and so much of the fair land about it as fully the private property of the Colemans as though they made it!

*Address delivered before the San Francisco Nationalist Club, Nov. 18;

Baron Robert Coleman is only one of many American barons, and one of the very best. He pays his miners $1.40 per day. He is not compelled to do this; he could compel them to work for less, as other neighbor barons do. For example, Baron Andrew Carnegie's castle or domain is in that same state of Pennsylvania. While he was writing his book entitled "Triumphant Democracy," and later, when he was taking that celebrated coaching trip through England with James G. Blaine, he was paying the "triumphant democrats" in his mines $1.10 per day; while the Lehigh Valley coal barons pay from 70 cents to $1 to miners, and from 80 cents to $1.15 to engineers. And this, remember, is not for continuous work. The largest number of days' work in the year 1887 given to any one miner was 265, and he was paid 70 cents per day. This gave this fortunate miner the magnificent income of $185.50 with which to support himself and family. It is perhaps useless to remark that this miner did not take a coaching trip through England that year, and if he had written a book he would probably not have chosen "Triumphant Democracy" as the title.

Take a glance at our present social and industrial conditions. To the most superficial observer certain appalling facts appear. The first is this: Our present industrial system, based on competition and the law of supply and demand, has produced a moneyed aristocracy.

In theory we are intense democrats. The proposal to set up idols in our churches would not excite greater horror and indignation than would the conferring by Congress of a distinction of rank upon our most eminent men. But is there not growing up among us a class who have all the power without any of the virtues of aristocracy? We have simple citizens who control thousands of miles of railroad, millions of acres of land, the means of livelihood of great numbers of men, who name the governors of states as they name their clerks, choose senators as they choose attorneys, and whose will is as supreme with legislatures as the czar of Russia's with his state council; others who fix the price of coal oil and gamble with the people's bread. That rural member, Backwoods County, in the Pennsylvania legislature, simply had not learned his lesson: "If Tom Scott has nothing more he wishes this legislature to do, I move that we adjourn sine die."

The United States is not only the wealthiest nation on the globe, but her wealth is concentrated as no other nation in the hands of a few. In the last number of the Forum, Thomas G. Shearman has a startling and suggestive article, in which he gives the names of seventy persons no one of whom owns less than twenty millions, and who collectively possess $2,700,000,000. Of these, eight were formerly or are now residents of this coast. And Mr. Shearman says that "the average annual income of the richest hundred Americans cannot be less than $1,200,000, and probably exceeds $1,500,000," while the average income of four-fifths of American families is less than $500. And he answers the question, Who owns the United States? in these words: "The United States of America are practically owned by less than 250,000 persons, constituting less than one in sixty of its adult male population." "Within thirty years," continues Mr. Shearman, "with the present industrial conditions unchanged, the United States of America will be substantially owned by less than 50,000 persons, constituting less than one in five hundred of the adult male population." A plutocracy is the most abominable form of aristocracy. The undercurrents of the times seem to sweep us back again to the old conditions from which we dreamed we had escaped.

The development of the artisan and commercial classes partially broke down feudalism. But now the development of our present industrial system, coupled with law monopoly, threatens to compel every one to seek a master. Nothing seems exempt from this tendency. Industry everywhere tends to assume a form in which one is master and the many serve. And when one is master and the others serve, the one will control the others, even in such matters as votes. Just as the English landlord votes his tenants, so the New England mill-owner votes his operatives, the Pennsylvania baron his miners, the railroad magnate his employes, and the bonanza farmer his hands. We have our American barons, and both their number and their power are increasing every year.

Here is another fact: Our present industrial system is producing a dependent class—free in name, in fact serfs.

Henry George states only a patent fact when he says: "Unpleasant as it may be to admit it, it is evident that the enormous increase in productive power, which has so marked the present century and is still going on with accelerating ratio, has no tendency to extirpate poverty, or to lighten the burdens of those compelled to toil. It simply widens the gulf between Dives and Lazarus, and makes the struggle for existence more intense. The march of invention has clothed mankind with powers which, a century ago, the boldest imagination could not have dreamed. But in factories where labor-saving machinery has reached its most wonderful development, little children are at work. Wherever the new forces are anything like fully utilized, large classes are maintained by charity, or live on the verge of recourse to it. In the United States it is clear that squalor and misery, and the vices and crimes that spring from them, everywhere increase as the village grows to the city, and the march of development brings the advantages of the improved methods of production and exchange. It is the older and richer sections of the Union that pauperism and distress among the working classes are becoming more painfully apparent." What does it mean to the man—the triumphant democrat—whom Baron Carnegie pays $1 per day, say, 200 days in a year? It means servitude and slavery in everything save the name. What does it mean to his children? Let a workingman who dipped his pen in his heart's blood when he wrote tell you. It means "to be born in a crowded and perhaps filthy tenement; to run the gauntlet of a thousand ills during infancy; to suffer the pains and, even to a child, the ignominy of poverty; to be scantily educated, and turned out into the world as a bread-winner for the family at an age when the children of those more fortunate are but just leaving the nursery; to be compelled to labor at something not your own choosing, and perhaps distasteful to you; to marry and to beget children; to still live in poorly furnished and ill-ventilated apartments; to struggle on through long years, sometimes years of panic when work is scarcely to be had at any price; to walk the streets idly in the winter time when your expenses are greatest; and then just when you become perfected in your trade, when your skill should make you more valuable than ever, to feel your sight grow dim, your limbs stiffen, your strength fail, and be cast aside as useless; to see the long years of labor wasted for a mere subsistence; to drag on by hook or crook a few years more of hopeless struggle and discontent, or perhaps, if you are so fortunate, to live on the charity of poverty-stricken or grudging children; finally, to have the grave close over you, leaving others as luckless to strive on as hopelessly."

Ceaselessly, during the past twenty-five years, a train of causes have been at work changing the condition of our working class from independence to dependence. Machinery, gathered in great factories, has driven to the wall the small shop and the craftsman with two or three helpers. The Wanamakers, Stewarts, Macys, and Field Leiters are making merciless and resistless war upon the small tradesman and shop-keeper. The great bonanza farms, containing fifty and a hundred thousand acres, with tens of thousands of dollars' worth of the latest and best machinery—paying $16 per month to a small army of hands in the busy season, and $8 per month to four or five hands in winter—are driving small farms into bankruptcy, and have compelled over eight hundred families in New Hampshire alone to abandon their farms for lack of return sufficient for their maintenance.

All these causes have combined to produce an ever-increasing class who have nothing but their labor to exchange for the necessities of life. They must accept the wages offered or starve. And hence the working class in many cases have fallen into a condition of wage slavery, which, in some respects, is worse than that of the black man before emancipation. They are, in stern reality, at the mercy of their employers; are compelled to stand in the market-place and sell their labor at a rate fixed, not by the golden rule, but by the ceaseless grinding competition of the hungry unemployed.

And this condition is becoming daily more aggravated. Five hundred thousand unemployed men—Mr. Powderly says one million—constantly recruited by the drift from foreign sewers, compete with those who are at work, content if they receive but a pittance for their toil. The iron law, that the tendency of wages is to the lowest point of subsistence, is, in our times, absolute.

I can but briefly state another alarming fact, the result of our present industrial system—the congested state of our cities. To-day one-fourth of our population live in cities. Do you know how they live? Dr. Lyman Abbott says: "Our people are gathered in very compact quarters. We wonder at the density of the population of Peking, but we forget there are wards in New York city in which the population is more dense than in any quarter in Peking. There are wards in our great cities where there are actually more men, women, and children to the square foot of land than there are bodies in any cemetery in the country."

We think of the Scotch as a sturdy, thrifty race, and yet, yonder in Glasgow in 1883, out of a population of 114,000 families, over 48,000 lived in homes of but one room each, and of these 7000 rooms had two families. We have nothing of that in America! Dr. Abbott, in the speech from which I have already quoted, tells us of families living in one room, in New York, and taking boarders. A newsboy who applied at the home for lodging, when asked why he did not stay at home, replied that they had but one room and only one bed, and there was no room in it, as seven persons were sleeping in it already.

Joseph Cook, from the platform of Tremont Temple, drew this picture of a Boston "home": "Come with me up the rickety stairs into the attic. Place your hand on your head and the upper part of the palm touches the ceiling. Note the bed with nothing on it except a mattress of straw, a blanket, and one or two indescribably filthy coverlets. Five persons, a father, mother, and three children plunge themselves into that straw at night, cover themselves in January with those rags, and bless God for the cold, for it seals the poisonous sewer under the house." This is how some of the people massed in cities live—no; they do not live—they exist. What is to be the outcome? The forces and causes which have produced the present conditions are still ceaselessly, remorselessly, at work. The rich are daily becoming richer. The dependent class are daily increasing in number. Our cities are daily becoming more densely crowded.

Says Josiah Strong in Our Century: "The extreme peril which will certainly come eventually, and must probably be faced by multitudes who are now living, will arise when, the conditions having been fully prepared, some great industrial or other crisis precipitates an open struggle between the destructive and conservative elements of society. As civilization advances and society becomes more highly organized commercial transactions will be more complex and immense. As a result, all business relations and industries will be more sensitive. Commercial distress in any great business will more surely create widespread disaster. Under such conditions industrial paralysis is likely to occur from time to time, more general and more prostrating than any hitherto known. When such a commercial crisis has closed factories by the ten-thousand and wage-workers have been thrown out of employment by the million; when public lands, which hitherto at such times have afforded a relief, are all exhausted; when our city population has been multiplied several fold, and our Cincinnati has become Chicago, and our Chicago New York, and our New York London; when class antipathies are deepened; when Socialistic organizations, armed and drilled, are found in every city, and the ignorant, vicious power of crowded populations has fully found itself; when the corruption of city governments has grown apace; when crops fail or some gigantic corner doubles the price of bread, with starvation in the home; with idle workmen gathered, sullen, desperate, in the saloons; with unprotected wealth at hand; with the tremendous forces of chemistry within easy reach—then, with the opportunity, the means, the fit agents, the motive, the temptation to destroy, all brought into evil conjunction—then will come the real test of our institutions—then will appear whether we are capable of self-government."

Such a struggle is in the future unless we change our present industrial system, and thus remove the causes which are incessantly working to produce that conflict. Our present wage system and industrial system, based on competition and the law of supply and demand, must give place to a better one.

Professor Ely, of Johns Hopkins University, speaks the truth when he says: "Our present form of society is a most imperfect one. Scarcely a political economist of note will deny this. One-half million of idle hands seeking employment; idle land and unused natural resources; millions upon millions of unused capital vainly seeking investment; people crying with hunger because too much wheat is grown; people shivering with cold because too much warm clothing has been brought on the market! Such is the undesirable situation. Strange phenomenon! Long ago John Stuart Mill, in opposing Communism, said that if our present forms of economic life could not be improved, and if it were necessary to make choice between that and Communism, all the difficulties, great and small, of Communism would be but as dust in the balance."

The present industrial system can be improved upon without choosing Communism. It must be improved. It will be, for the American people love justice, and will have it. As Matthew Arnold said, the Americans have a way of seeing clear, thinking straight, and doing right.

The great change is coming. By peaceable means I believe it will come; by some means I am certain it will come. Let all concerned ponder the pregnant words of Carlyle: "Will not one French revolution suffice, or must there be two? There will be two if needed; there will be twenty if needed; there will be just as many as needed."

WHAT ARE THE FACTS?

Several persons seem to have misapprehended the real action of the Congress of the American Secular Union recently held in Philadelphia; and I desire to set them right.

1. The preamble of the Constitution was not changed, save to affirm that the government and Constitution of the United States are founded upon "no religion"—least of all upon the Christian religion. No fault can be found with this.

2. ARTICLES I and II are precisely as in the old constitution, except that "American Secular Union" is substituted for "National Liberal League."

3. ARTICLE III was only changed so as to make the "Nine Demands" more emphatic, as regards the "not reading of any Bible" in the public schools, and considering Sunday, not as a religious, but as an economic institution, for which many "physiological and other secular reasons can be given." How can any one suppose that this can impinge upon the rights of a man to do just what he pleases on Sunday, provided he does not interfere with the rights of others, I cannot imagine.

4. But ARTICLE IV seems to be the great stumbling block, and needs to be examined very carefully. The whole article reads thus:

"ARTICLE IV. The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both politics and religion, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of any religious belief or disbelief, but honestly welcomes all persons, of whatever faith or party, to its membership, on the basis of 'no union of church and state.' The word secular is here used in the broadest sense, as applied to the state, and not to any system or religion or philosophy."

Certainly this is true. Are we sectarian or partisan, and are we in any way committed to a creed? Do we not welcome all persons, on the one condition of "no union of church and state?" But the objector's difficulty with this article lies in the closing paragraph. Let us look at this. Please to point out one single word in the old constitution at variance with this statement. Is not the whole object of our society state secularization? I said this at first, in accepting the presidency; and no man for a whole year has made any objection. There is not a word from beginning to end regarding Secularism as a religion, philosophy in our constitution, old or new.

If by Secularism we mean a system of religion or philosophy, why not say so in so many words, and not attempt to say one thing while we mean other? Let there be no disguises, no cloaking of our real faith by false pretense. I have no objections to make to those who regard Secularism as a religion and a philosophy; but, in the matter of the demands of Liberalism for state secularization, we cannot insist upon everybody else accepting this view, provided they are right on the question of state secularization.

I see no compromise in thus acting—no “retrogressive movement” nor “bowing of the knee.” Moreover, those who wish can have all of Secularism as a philosophy that they desire in their local organizations, as these are declared “absolutely independent,” and as the “effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient co-operation of the freest kind with the American Secular Union and with other local societies.” If Spiritualists, or Unitarians, or Jews or even orthodox Christians see proper to organize a Secular society, let them do so, without giving up any of their peculiar beliefs; and so long as they go for state secularization, we will fellowship them, without accepting their doctrinal tenets. Indeed, there can be no hope of secularizing the state, unless we can enlist those who are far from accepting Secularism as a religion and philosophy, as they are a very large majority, while those who do accept it are as but one in a thousand. Why take such a narrow view of this subject, and practically ruin a great movement, for the sake of that which we are at perfect liberty to hold as individual local societies? Already, in the city of Philadelphia, we have as an auxiliary a German society, who own their own building, and who have two thousand children in their Liberal Sunday-school! Instead of having one Secular society, we have two and shall have ten! Let others go and do likewise, instead of sulking in their tents, or openly throwing stones.

Some other amendments were adopted, all tending to unify and give greater efficiency to our society, and to none of which have any objection been made.

We have a great work before us. The Blair Bills will soon come up again, and we must be prepared to “beard the lion in his den.” The National Reform Association has seven district secretaries; and even the Women’s Christian Temperance Union has recently resolved in Chicago that “God in Christ is the King of Nations, and as such, should be acknowledged in our government, and his word made the basis of our laws.” If we cannot get the American Secular Union out of the rut in which it has accomplished little or nothing for the last several years, we might as well give up. We had two or three hundred auxiliary societies a few years ago. We have only a dozen or two that are alive—and doing nothing!

I did not desire the presidency of the society (as is well known); and Miss Craddock can command several hundred dollars more than we have agreed to give her. Give us a fair trial; and if we do not do something, you need not turn us out next year, but we will go out. I think it very unfair to criticise Dr. McGlynn and Rev. M. J. Savage, as they both planted themselves upon our platform, fair and square. Our congress did not cost us much more than $100, and our collections amounted to nearly one-half of this sum. Mr. Washburn was invited to speak with Mr. Wakeman, but was prevented by sickness from accepting. We did the best we could under the circumstances. We have the people with us and do not intend to make much notice of the soreheads!

HOW IT WAS MEANT.

Our esteemed, intelligent, and lively contemporary FREETHOUGHT, in its issue of the 9th, disapproves of our reference to a certain lecturer, as if we had criticised freethinking. But not at all. We only said (in substance) that some freethinkers don’t know much. We still fear that this is true—particularly of such as don’t believe in the Single Tax. And even of those, while we deeply regret their melancholy state, we fully agree with FREETHOUGHT that there is no good reason why they should not express themselves. We are in favor of the freest thought and the freest speech by, for, and against whom or whatsoever it may concern.—Weekly Star.

EX-REV. C. B. REYNOLDS’S TOUR OF WASHINGTON.

November 9. Under the auspices of the Walla Walla Liberal Club, I have agreed to make a tour of the new-born giant state, to awake honest hearts to investigation of the reasons of their “faith and hope,” and more especially to arouse the Liberals to the pressing need of practical organization, and induce them to elect delegates to the great Liberal Convention, to be held at Seattle for that purpose. I left my dear wife, and the true, generous friends of Walla Walla, who were full of enthusiastic anticipations of a grand success of the complimentary lecture benefit tendered to Mrs. Reynolds, to take place at the opera house there the ensuing Sunday. Duty called, yet with much reluctance I departed and took the train for Seattle.

One reads of the terrible fires in cities, like those of Seattle, Ellensburg, Spokane, and Vancouver, so vividly described in the newspapers, but the best description utterly fails to convey to the mind the stern, startling reality.

When in Seattle a year ago last May I was astounded at the push, the active energy, the enterprise everywhere manifested. In all directions buildings were in course of erection—rented almost before the foundations were laid—and streets were being graded. Eager, hurrying crowds thronged the streets. Each day came a stream of new arrivals who all imbibed the spirit of speculation and added to the irresistible momentum of progress and improvement. And yet that was “Sleepy Hollow” stillness compared to the energy and hustle of the Seattle of to-day.

A fine harbor, the terminus of great railroad lines, proximity to iron mines, vast coal deposits, immense forests, unsurpassed fertile agricultural region, and abundant manufacturing facilities, combine to make Seattle the queen city of the Northwest.

There is hardly a steamer on the waters of Puget sound which does not make Seattle a trading center. Steamers which have their headquarters at Seattle now penetrate to every portion of the intricate waterways of Puget sound and find their way up the numerous tributary streams, carrying supplies from and bringing the products of an immense and wondrously fertile state back to its queen city. Steamships and sailing vessels from Seattle find their way to every part of the world. There is absolutely no limit to the capacity of this, the safest harbor in the world.

On the 6th of June last the fire fiend in a few hours destroyed buildings and property to the amount of $20,000,000, on which the total insurance was less than $3,000,000. The burnt district included forty blocks, or over eighty acres, exclusive of the water front, comprising eighteen blocks, making the total devastation one hundred and sixteen acres. In this vast area not a single building escaped destruction. The loss, however, was confined entirely to the business portion of the city.

Before the great fire had ceased to burn, meetings of citizens were held, and the rebuilding of the city upon a scale of magnificence worthy of her proud pre-eminence as the queen city of the Northwest was decided on. And never was decision of a public meeting more fully and faithfully carried out. From arrangements already made buildings will have been erected within one year from the date of the fire amounting to $10,000,000. This is simply unprecedented by any city of its size in the known world.

Seattle to-day presents a marvelous, a most bewildering appearance. The black and charred remains are yet in many places discernible despite the at first sight seeming indiscriminate jumble of new buildings and canvas makeshifts. Bricks by the hundreds of thousands, lumber of all lengths, breadths, and thicknesses, immense masses of building stone, barrels of lime, cement, and heaps of mortar. Everywhere grand, imposing structures of brick and stone are in every stage of construction. The business of a great city carried on mainly under canvas; in many of the tents half a dozen separate and distinct concerns are carried on, every foot of space economized. Yet to speak of the cotton-covered business marts as tents conveys a false impression. I saw no center poles, but countless numbers of rough slat frames covered with heavy canvas, of every conceivable size. Restaurants, dining-room and kitchen, private supper rooms, all of cotton cloth; lodging-houses, barber shops, dry goods, hardware, and drug stores, and blacksmith shops all of duck.

Very many brick buildings are completed, and every week adds to the number of happy merchants who desert their canvas makeshifts for handsome, commodious brick buildings, and ere the last load of goods is fairly on the dray men are tearing down the tent, while others are digging the foundation for the stately three or five story brick or stone building to be erected on that site.

There is a very large force of men and teams engaged in grading the streets, an improvement which has resulted in leaving some buildings (houses beyond the burnt district) so high up from the new sidewalk that excavations have been made and large stores built under them.

The building work is not confined to the burnt district. Go back where you will for over three miles in any direction from the water front, and the eye rests on handsome dwellings in process of erection. The ladies go shopping, dodging from the sidewalk to the street, up and down, in and out, around great piles of brick, barrels of lime, huge stones, mortar boxes, parts of galvanized-iron cornices, and the dense throng of earnest, hurrying business-men, as serene as if promenading on Kearny street, San Francisco, while the sounds of many hundreds of hammers, axes, and tools of iron make loud, prophetic music, the overture to the great chorus of customers and clerks soon to be heard in each of the business palaces being hastened to completion.

Those desiring information in regard to business opportunities, investments in real estate, or starting any individual enterprise in Seattle will do well to write to that earnest, self-sacrificing worker for Liberalism and reliable, energetic young business man, R. J. Wilson, Horton block, corner Third and Cherry streets, Seattle, Wash.

Freethought keeps pace with the progress of the city; the best, most highly cultured and influential citizens of Seattle are Liberals. The fire broke up the very interesting and successful course of lectures by Dr. York. The Liberal friends are now arranging for me to deliver a lecture the Turners' hall on each Sunday evening during the winter. I shall make Seattle headquarters, and expect to visit all sections of the state in the interest of practical organization. When the distance renders it necessary for me to be absent over Sunday Mrs. Reynolds will lecture at Seattle in my stead.

The Liberals here, despite the great tax on their time and energies resulting from the rebuilding of the city, are quite enthusiastic over the proposed convention on Paine's birthday to effect practical organization.

There is only one rival to Seattle—Port Townsend. I will give an account of my visit there and state her claims to commercial and Freethought supremacy next week.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

AS MR. UNDERWOOD FOUND US.

I had but little time to spend in California, and that I put in lecturing at San Francisco, Oakland, Fresno, Hanford, and Lemoore. Application came from a dozen other places in the state, and since I could not visit them, owing to engagements East, I promised to return to California to give additional lectures in January. Mr. George E. Macdonald, editor of FREETHOUGHT, and Mr. A. H. Schou, of Oakland, made engagements at San Francisco, and I was greeted there by a large audience, which impressed me as being of fine quality also. I found Liberalism in the central part of the state very strong. I met many old friends who heard me lecture and debate with Rev. Dr. Parker at Visalia in 1874; then, Hanford, where I spoke to crowded houses lately, did not exist. An earthquake shock was felt during my second lecture there, and another soon after my arrival at Fresno.

While in San Francisco, I received friendly calls from many Liberals, including several who are well-known, and others who were known years ago. Among these were John S. Hittell, John A. Collins, Schuenemann Pott, F. B. Perkins, and W. E. Coleman. Mr. Hittell wrote a book, which was published in New York in 1855, entitled, "Evidences Against Christianity." It was an able and learned work, in two volumes, but the demand for the work did not come up to the author's expectations and he turned his mind to other fields of thought. For years he has been an editorial writer on the Alta California, and has written a book on the "Resources of California," and one entitled "A Brief History of Culture," which he informed me was soon to appear, revised and enlarged. Mr. Hittell is a well-preserved man of about sixty, and he is now doing valuable work. I received from him a copy of his latest work—a little volume entitled, "A Code of Morals," which ought to be widely circulated.

Mr. Collins is now, as he was when he issued "A Bird's-Eye View of Society," nearly half a century ago, if I mistake not, especially interested in industrial co-operation. He has had quite a varied experience, is now 79 years old and in feeble health. He is, and has been for many years, a Spiritualist. He spoke with interest of Messrs. Seaver and Mendum, and of meeting them at an Infidel convention in New York city half a century ago. Mr. Collins was well-known among the Abolitionists for his energy and ability in organizing societies in the West.

Mr. Schuenemann Pott looks scarcely older than he did when I saw him in San Francisco and stood with him on the platform of his society in 1871. The German Free Congregation is still sustained, and Mr. Pott speaks for it now as he has spoken for it for years acceptably. He expects to make a trip East next fall. A man of fine attainments, a radical Freethinker, and an eloquent orator, he is a great favorite among German Liberals. I first met Mr. Pott at the Infidel Convention held in Philadelphia in 1857. A few years later I had the pleasure of speaking before his society in the same city. In his conversation the other day he made a very touching reference to Mr. Seaver's death, and kindly mention of the American Freethinkers he used to meet in Philadelphia—Thomas Eastman, Robert Wallin, and others.

Mr. F. B. Perkins, for years librarian of the San Francisco Free Library, and formerly of the Boston City Library, is now editor of the San Francisco Star. He is at home among books. A nephew of Henry Ward Beecher, he goes far beyond his renowned uncle in rejecting the dogmas of theology. He introduced me to the San Francisco audience which I addressed. Mr. Coleman I had not seen since the meeting of the Liberal League at Philadelphia in July, 1876. He has been since that time a student, and seems to have read almost everything relating to scientific, historic, and religious subjects, and he is indeed a cyclopædia of information. He came to my rooms at the hotel, his pockets filled with recently published books which he thought, and rightly, too, I had not yet seen. Mr. Coleman has a splendid library, and he is equipped to do excellent work. A very thorough piece of work was his recent criticism of Madame Blavatsky's "Isis Unveiled" which appeared in recent successive numbers of the Religio-Philosophical Journal. Mr. Coleman is a Spiritualist, "but," as Oliver Johnson added after saying the same of himself, "not a damned fool."

At Fresno, I had long conversations with Judge J. W. North. He was forty years ago or more an anti-slavery lecturer in Connecticut. He founded the towns of Faribault and Northfield, Minn., the latter taking its name from him, and also the town of Riverside, Cal. He did good work as a member of the Constitutional Convention of Nevada, and has filled positions of trust and honor in other states. Judge North is a man of scholarly attainments and a good public speaker. He is a radical Freethinker, and has done much to advance the Liberal cause in Fresno county, and indeed in the state. He is now an old man, nearly 75, but full of intellectual vigor, and with his interest in reform unabated. He is one of the most intellectual and interesting men I have ever met.—B. F. UNDERWOOD in the Boston Investigator.

A Text Perverted.

One of the oddest typographical errors ever made in Boston was in a book published by the firm of Crocker & Brewster, which has just been brought to public attention by the death of Mr. Brewster. It was in one of the sermons of Dr. Nathaniel Emmons, the great orthodox divine. The doctor quoted the Scripture text "Cut Him Down, Why Cumbereth He the Ground?" The intelligent compositor put in type, "Cut Him Down, Like a Cucumber, to the Ground."

A SON OF BELIAL.

The Holiness Band planted its banner on Montgomery avenue yesterday afternoon, says Monday's Chronicle, and opened its services with a hymn of praise. When the spell that the music created died away with the last notes of the song, the leader began an earnest exhortation. He had uttered only half a dozen words when a wild war-whoop went up from Peter Peterson. The crowd was startled, and it was thought that the holy words had found lodgment in the heart of a sinner. It was true that they had struck a sinner, but had not taken the proper root, for Mr. Peterson was blindly making for the banner with the vigor of a crusader. He was intercepted by John Gazella, who did not belong to the band, but believed in fair play. The men grappled, and the Holiness people gave them room. First it was Mr. Peterson and Mr. Gazella, and then it was Mr. Gazella and Mr. Peterson. They rolled over and over on the sidewalk until they reached the California Hotel, when the champion of the cause of the band raised his antagonist up and by a powerful effort dashed him through a plate-window. Peterson did not desire to go in alone, therefore he pulled the defender of the faith in after him.

Inside the place they gouged each other in private for awhile, when Officers Cummings and Rainsbury came up and separated them. Gazella's head was badly damaged by the contact with the window, and his head was patched up at the receiving hospital. Both men were charged with battery and malicious mischief. A large piece of iron was found on Peterson, which he had used on the head of his antagonist to advantage.

"I haven't done nothing," said Peterson, when he was backed up at the prison desk.

"Didn't you try to break up that meeting on the street?" demanded the sergeant.

"No, sir; I only wanted to give them a pointer."

"What kind of a pointer?"

"That fellow said we all had immortal souls. He hadn't read the papers, I knew, so I was about to tell him of Dr. Stevens's discovery."

"Put him in No. 2 with the other drunks," was the order.

"You don't know yourself," he yelled, as he was being borne away. "The seat of the soul is in the corpus callosum. You bet it is—in the corpus—"

Bang went the cell door, and Mr. Peterson and his soul were left together in happy communion, with time to dream a story of explanation for Judge Rix.

REPEOPLING NEW ENGLAND.

New Hampshire has gone into the business of immigration as well as Vermont, but with less show of necessity for doing so. There are many vacant farms in and around the White mountains, as tourists know very well, says a writer in the Boston Herald, but the summer boarder has done for New Hampshire what he has not done for Vermont. He has made a market for the poverty-stricken farmer, and eaten his corn and potatoes at a fair profit for the tiller of the soil. No such happy luck has come to the Vermont farmer, and the deserted farms of that state are ten to one in number, as compared with those to be found in New Hampshire. This does not lessen the gravity of the situation, however, for there are large tracts in Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine, Connecticut, and even in Massachusetts, where to-day you can buy a farm for a song, and where Finns, Swedes, Icelanders, or French-Canadians are cordially invited to succeed the Anglo-Saxons, who have run away to engage in more lucrative enterprises. The restocking of the remote towns is one of the questions of our social economy. It is plain that fresh blood must be taken to them, and it is believed that the honest agriculturists of the Old World constitute some of the very best elements which can be transplanted to New England.

This teeth powder is not common thing, as be sold in the world, it is powerful to hold the health of teeth, and recover the teeth from its sick. If you only examine should find that it never tell a lie.—From a Japanese Paper.

AN OPINION FROM ABROAD.

FREETHOUGHT, of San Francisco, may in some sense be termed a western offshoot from the Truth Seeker, Mr. George Macdonald and Mr. Putnam migrating to the Pacific coast to meet the call for a Freethought organ in that quarter. It was started in 1888. A prominent feature is Mr. Putnam's "News and Notes" of his journeys to and fro through the Western States. Mr. Macdonald compiles a "Brief History of the Week," and takes care that due prominence is given to the humorous element. FREETHOUGHT is a vigorous little paper, and once over its early trials will, we predict, have a thriving career.—London Freethinker.

Corrections of Treasurer's Report.

To the Editors of Freethought:

G. R. Higgins donated twice. The last was 50 cents and not $5, as was published. C. V. Sweek, of Hamilton, Or., gave one dollar and Prof. W. J. Dean, of Talent, Or., gave two dollars. Are there any other mistakes or omissions? The last list published was not a list of all. The printer or myself made a mistake.

Liberals, you have the Treasurer's Report before you; wherein can the expenses of the next convention be reduced? Write me, privately, if you wish.

C. BEAL, President O. S. S. U.

It Therefore Follows.

To Dr. Juliet H. Severance:

GREETING: Whereas, The mighty kick delivered on the ribs of the A. S. Union, in Truth Seeker of November 9, drives the wind sorely out of some of the attendants to that Union, myself amongst the number, I humbly suggest the following:

That, whereas, Dr. Juliet H. Severance is by nature and practice fitted to be a leader on such occasions.

Whereas, There were several not satisfied at all, but deficient in talent, and lacking co-operation by being without leader.

Whereas, In case a good western attendance of Infidels had been there with Dr. Severance to lead the onslaught, the namby-pamby Liberal orthodox, or orthodox Liberal proceedings might have been severely sat down upon.

Whereas, The western attendance and Dr. J. H. Severance were very conspicuous by being absent:

It therefore follows that the kick in the ribs of the A. S. Union reverts as severely on those who by being absent allowed the namby-pamby, orthodox Liberal or Liberal orthodox course to be taken, as to those who were present but unable to stem the tide by lack of qualification and numbers.

That if Dr. J. H. Severance will do us the honor to be present at the next congress, she will probably find a good many loyal Infidels ready to follow her with a cheer, myself amongst the number.

DR. LESPINASSE.

THE late Andrew J. Geiger of Philadelphia left an estate valued at $250,000. His will provides for the erection of an obelisk over his grave. The panel on the east side is to contain his name, age, and date of death. The north side will bear this inscription: "Traveled 60,000 miles in America, Europe, Asia and Africa." The south panel is to read: "Young man, stop and think. See what has been the reward for honesty, industry, and economy. In 1840 I worked on Robert Martin's farm, near Jersey shore, for 25 cents a day. No fortune left to me."

The west panel will say: "Lived and died in the faith of the immutable and unchangeable, and Nature's God. Believed in the gospel of peace, right, and justice."

SOME "New Phases in the Chinese Problem" will be presented, by Willard C. Farwell, in the December Popular Science Monthly. The writer asks, in view of the wretchedness of millions of the Chinese at home, whether exclusion will exclude, and invites more thoughtful consideration of the Chinese problem, which is made especially serious by the peculiar constitution of the Chinese mind.

"In the controversy both sides are fairly represented and some new ideas advanced which clear the atmosphere of the clouds that frequently dim the honest mind."—Elite News, Chicago.

A REGULAR EDUCATED AND LEGALLY QUALIFIED PHYSICIAN, and the most successful (in his specialty) as his practice will surely prove. The Doctor treats all those peculiar diseases of young and middle-aged men such as seminal weakness, impotency, &c., resulting from indiscretion and ignorance of youth. Those who are ailing should send ten (10) cents for his book, "Private Counsellor," setting forth an external Application—

A POSITIVE CURE

The book is worth many times its cost, and should be read by the young for instruction and the afflicted for relief.

[From the Washington National View.]

Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, New Jersey offers his valuable services to all those in need of a kind, sympathetic and skillful physician. Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been assailed and exposed by the press, but, Dr. Fellows, a specialist, in his line, stands foremost in his profession, and the encomiums showered upon him publicly as well as in private, are flattering evidences of the high appreciation and confidence his long and conscientious devotion to his specialties in his profession have so justly merited for him, and it is safe to trust him.

A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1888.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: The remedy you sent is working like a charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. Have only been using it one week, and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right.

Yours respectfully, J. R.

REMARKS—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle-aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, but who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out-and-out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future

Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. "Come Off the Fence."

Lend us a hand! We are weary of striving;
Straining each nerve to win popular sense;
Why do you, when we need your assistance,
Placidly neutral, still sit on the fence.

Inwardly sure of the right of our pleading,
Secretly hoping success to our fight,
Step from your outlook, your neutral position,
Bravely and openly join us outright.

Deep in your hearts you approve of our wishes,
'Tis but a question of time, as you know,
Openly come to us, say you are with us,
Now is the time to encourage us so.

Are we not pleading for right and for justice?
Dare not deny it; it is no pretense,
Come with your influence, eloquence, wisdom,
Come down and help us! "Come down off of the fence!" —The Primitive Catholic.

Base-ball.

"He is out," said the man at the game of ball,
And he said it with half a sneer.
The player's chance was beyond recall—
And success had seemed so near.

He might have "come home" 'midst the cheering shout
That quenches ambition's thirst.

But now he is merely talked about
As the man who "went out at first."

There's many a youth who in life's great game
Starts in with a winning gait
Toward the goal where riches and tempting fame

For the chosen of fortune wait.
He fails, and is greeted with sniffs and sneers
Or with pity—by far the worst—
'Till a welcome grave hides the hopes and fears
Of the man who went out at first.

Making It Easier for Her Mother.

"May I have the pleasure of accompanying you on the straw ride, Miss Green?" said the young man, hopefully. "Your mother is going to chaperone the party."

She hesitated a moment before answering.

"Don't you think," she replied at length, "that if mamma is going as chaperone it would be much nicer to sit on the front piazza while mamma is away?"—Boston Beacon.

CALLER—"Why don't you try Christian science for Fido? You know how much it did for our baby." Hostess—"Yes; but I can't afford to fool with the life of that dog. Why, he cost $45."—Judge.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER (reprovingly)—"Boys, do you know what day this is?" Street Urchin—"Hi fellars. Here's a cove as don't know what day this is. Guess he's been out all night!"

A RELIGIOUS exchange says: "The Rev. Mr. Bacchus is conducting a big temperance revival in Laurel, Del.; the Rev. Mr. Smoker is preaching against smoking, and the Rev. Mr. Husband, of England, has come out against the clergy marrying."

In her remarks to Parliament the queen started off: "My Lords and Gentlemen." Even the queen is beginning to see that there is a distinction between her lords and gentlemen.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and understand well.

A model of the above drier is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast. G. W. THURSTON, Sr.

THE PAPER AND THE WORK.

It is a fact that nowhere in the country has Liberalism been so progressive and victorious as upon the Pacific coast. Two state organizations have been built up and the local work in many quarters has received a splendid impulse. Those who believe in Liberalism; who realize that it is an intellectual and moral power which the world deeply needs; that it means civilization, humanity, nobler dignity for human life and toil, the removal of superstitions from the minds of men, and the establishment of justice; those who thus see in Liberalism the glory of the future, will rejoice that so much has been done and that the way is opening for larger efforts and success.

Much of this improvement is due to the lecturers in the field, who have so earnestly devoted themselves to the advancement of Freethought. The importance of the lectures given from point to point cannot be overestimated. They stir the minds of the people as nothing else can. They create discussion, inquiry, investigation, agitation, which only personal power can do—the presence of the individual who stands as the embodiment of the cause. Vast masses of people can be reached in this way that cannot be reached otherwise. Many will not read books or papers, even if thrust in their way, but will come and listen to a speaker, and even if they don't come the lecture will be discussed in one's hearing, and some ripple be made in his mind. Every great movement has been carried on by this means, every great party has won power by meetings and speeches. There is an attraction, an excitement, in such gatherings which comes not simply from the orator, but from the people who are together animated by the same purpose, which purpose grows stronger because of this union of heart and hand. The living voice has ever been a mighty power, and those who with devotion and enthusiasm and special training can fitly express the grand ideas of Liberalism upon the platform should receive a constant and generous support.

But when it comes to the combination of our forces—to a union of work upon a broad scale throughout the state and the nation—the lecture field is inadequate. The lecture creates a local activity, many lectures create many local activities, but when it comes to the shaping of these local excitements into a comprehensive movement that shall make a grand army of all the scattered elements of Freethought, other means than lectures are necessary. The lecturer cannot speak to the whole state or nation at once. He is in a locality.

What is needed for a broad organized work is that which is not local—which can speak at once to all the Liberals, not from point to point as the lecturer does—and that power is the press, the paper. It is simply impossible to carry on any large organization without a paper. No party has ever succeeded or ever can succeed without it. No reform has ever been carried on without the influence of the press. Its power is this: That it is universal, it is constant, it can speak simultaneously to the masses. One issue reaches thousands and thousands of readers, and the same thought impels. No organization of any extent can be carried on without this means. Local organizations might be maintained, but there could be no general action, no united effort extending through large communities, through states, and the nation.

Those who have watched the course of events must see that FREETHOUGHT, as a Liberal journal, has been an all-important factor in the Liberal progress of the Pacific Coast for the last two years. The organization of the California Liberal Union, of the San Francisco local society, of the Oregon State Secular Union, and the late splendid Convention at Portland—all these have been the direct outcome of the establishment of the paper. It has made a bond of union which could not otherwise exist. It has enabled Liberals, though separated by thousands of miles, to communicate with each other and to act as one man. Through this paper two thousand Liberals are in constant association. A common purpose can be expressed and executed. This could not be done by lectures, or by the writing of letters. In addition to these individual methods of reaching one another there should be a universal method, and the press to-day is this method. Thousands of Liberals can be consulted at once, and action determined upon, and co-operation formed, which, without a paper, could not be done except by months of labor. To carry on the work of Liberalism, now so auspicious on the Pacific coast, the existence of the paper is absolutely necessary. The working power of the organizations already established depends upon the constant influence of the paper. The paper creates an atmosphere, a world of common thought and sympathy, which is the fountain of fresh enthusiasms. The soul, the spirit, of organization must be maintained by unceasing companionship. Suppose an army only drilled and acted as companies. The companies in themselves might be finely trained and, simply as a company, do excellent work. But the companies must be formed into regiments, regiments into brigades, brigades into divisions, divisions into corps, and corps into one grand army, every part acting harmoniously for a supreme purpose. This union of Liberals on a vast scale can only be effected by a paper. All the Liberals of California must act together for certain purposes. All the Liberals of Oregon must do the same, and all the Liberals of Washington. There are other purposes for which all the Liberals of the Pacific coast and the Great West must work together. Without the paper the great organizations now established will be shorn of their usefulness. The life blood will cease to sparkle. Liberalism grows by fellowship, by the attraction of like with like. It is a social movement. It is not founded upon dogma or authority, but upon common interests. That which impels is a living and progressive humanity. The powers of this cannot be brought into play in full measure except by the almost illimitable potency of the press which, like the sun, keeps upon its unwearied course. The living voice, magnetic in its sphere, cannot, like the amazing and fairy-like power of the press, reach all lands, and in one word arouse millions to a united determination.

In the vast growth of Liberalism, in the organizations and unity to come, the Freethought paper is an unquestioned necessity. It displaces no other instrumentality, but unites, utilizes, and broadens and deepens them all. It opens new fields to individual effort. The press, by its very nature, is democratic and can only exist by meeting the common demands. It is not for the benefit of one but of all. It must be the child of the people, of the people and for the people, or it cannot flourish.

Every Liberal who believes in Liberalism and its future glory—in the development of man—must believe in the Liberal paper. He will see the necessity of the paper, and he will be ready to support the paper.

Every one of the two thousand subscribers of FREETHOUGHT who knows what has been done in the past and what can be done in the future will realize the importance of FREETHOUGHT. There is not a Liberal who would not deeply regret the suspension of the paper. Such a misfortune would retard for years the noble work that is now going on.

The editors of the paper, so far, have put their capital and work into the paper for the sake of the paper itself, and are ready and willing to continue the sacrifice. They desire no personal advantage. They desire the success of the paper because its success is the success of Liberalism itself.

The way of success is open. There is no doubt of it. The labors of the last two years have shown the splendid possibilities of the Liberal movement; what energy, devotion, self-sacrifice, hard work, and unquenchable faith in freedom and justice can do. The fields are open and the harvests are shining, but the harvests cannot be gathered except by co-operative effort. The results of the two year's work upon FREETHOUGHT are in the hands of the Liberals of the Great West.

It is not best hereafter that there should be any chance for personal advantage in the success of FREETHOUGHT. Whatever the paper gains, let it gain for the Liberals as a whole. It should be a common property; a representative organ supported by a body of representative Liberals. All there is in it of influence and profit will then go to the cause.

This movement cannot and will not be a failure. The future of the Liberalism of the coast depends upon it. Think what that future will be; what the Great West will be ten years from now. When one looks upon the immense resources of these lands, so varied, so wonderful, with mountain and plain, with gold and silver and iron, with fruit and grain, under the brightest skies, the most genial sun, with streams of trade East and West increasing day by day, with ships from every shore, the gleaming iron horse from every mart of industry, and the "prairie schooner" floating by the thousands over vast deserts, laden with the best grit of the country, what a future of art, wealth, and splendor greets not simply the poet's eye, but the plain, business, common-sense view. These great states have just begun to grow. The long years of prosperity are still before. In the next decade millions of people will find a home in these regions of golden promise.

Never did Liberalism—Liberalism in the broadest and deepest sense, Liberalism in politics, in philosophy, in life, in home, in society—have such a splendid career before it, and the heart of every Liberal should thrill with joy at the opportunity he has, by united effort, of achieving for the future such a magnificent empire for justice and liberty and truth. Co-operation is the word of civilization to-day, it is the latest and best word of Evolution itself, it is the word of power. The churches co-operate against us; they have not only the churches themselves, but vast missionary associations and tract societies and publishing companies; they have secret organizations of which the world at large knows nothing, and with these vast instrumentalities they are working increasingly for the maintenance of superstition and slavery. Liberals must co-operate, not simply as a matter of fellowship but as a matter of business, of defense, of constructive work. The opportunity is now presented for the establishment of one of the most effective Freethought organizations in the country. It is an assured success, but the more there are in it, the larger the number of stockholders, the better. Let there be one thousand live Liberals in this movement. What a power they would be, having the manifold capacities of the press in their own hands, like Jove's thunderbolts or like the blessed power of light and heat, to be constantly used for liberty and the advancement of the world. Let not one single Liberal in the ranks of Freethought who can afford to buy a share, remain outside of this great movement.

HEAVEN'S LOCALITY.

In last Sunday's Examiner seven clergymen of San Francisco undertake to answer the question, "What is Heaven Like?" and not one of them succeeds.

The Rev. Dr. Harcourt owns up at once that "the attempt to localize heaven has been about as successful as the attempt to localize God"—that is, it has failed entirely. Nevertheless he asserts that "when we come into complete harmony with the laws of God we are in heaven. Heaven is harmony with God. Heaven is virtue and truth. Heaven is child-like confidence in our Father God. Heaven is love abiding. Union with God makes the true heaven." If any person desired a ticket for the heaven of Dr. Harcourt, it would be interesting to know just what language he would use in calling for it.

Rabbi Jacob Voorsanger falls back upon the faith that "Providence may be implicitly trusted to give divine care to the soul of man, after the processes of disintegration shall have obtained control of his body." This remark is about as wanting in definiteness as is Dr. Harcourt's description.

Dr. Stebbins, Unitarian, claims that "it is not a place at all, but a state of mind and heart. So heaven is wherever it is, and whenever it is." There seems to be no way of denying that conclusion.

The Rev. Thomas Easton says that "heaven is a place somewhere in the immensity of space." Naturally. It would be difficult to find a locality outside the immensity of space, but Dr. Easton's reply gives no information.

The Rev. John Gray observes: "When I am asked to tell what heaven is I feel that the best answer I can give is simply this: I have never been there; therefore I know nothing about it." That is candid if not satisfactory.

The Rev. William H. Scudder opens as follows: "That heaven is a place, goes with the saying; yet whether the generally received opinion about it, as a place, is not rather Miltonic than scriptural is a question that might be interesting to discuss were time and place afforded." Although Mr. Scudder occupies a half a column of space, he adds nothing to his exordium.

The last of the symposiasts is the Rev. P. J. Grey, who says: "When death comes and the spirit is separated from the body it goes to meet its reward, while the body is consigned to the earth. Thus the soul in its perfection may meet its maker and enjoy its reward before the resurrection of the body. Heaven is perfection, and only perfection is in heaven."

Here we have the best, presumably, that seven of what the Examiner calls San Francisco's ablest clergymen can say as to location and character of the heaven they preach; yet they tell us nothing about the future state of sufficient definiteness or authenticity to remove the Christian heaven from the realm of myths and fables. But we cannot blame them. They have told us all they know—and probably more.

In his "Sick-Room Notes," dated November 12, the first he has written since his late attack of illness, Mr. Charles Bradlaugh says:

"I am informed that several persons have circulated statements implying that some change has taken place in my opinions on questions of theology. There is not the shadow of foundation or excuse for any such statement. It would be ill-becoming to boast, but I may say that my convictions and teachings have not been with me subject of doubt or uncertainty. I note that the British Weekly states that 'on one occasion, he [Mr. Bradlaugh] said that he had almost been persuaded by a sermon of the Rev. Arthur Mursell.' There is no foundation whatever for this declaration. I received years ago many kindly attentions from the Rev. Arthur Mursell. I only heard him preach once, and that was very many years ago, in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester. I remember of that sermon only the concluding words: 'My subject next Sunday will be "Beware of the Dog!"' The editor of the British Weekly clearly knows me better than I do myself. He says: 'He [Mr. Bradlaugh] has the earthiest of minds, is without a touch of poetry, imagination or yearning.' For the sake of his general readers I trust that there are some subjects on which the editor of the British Weekly writes with knowledge."

We received an invitation to be present at the twenty-fifth anniversary of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. John J. McCabe, at their residence, 733 Broadway, Albany, N. Y., on Nov. 23, 1889. We are present in spirit to wish our friends all happiness as they pass the silver gates of love and joy. May they press on with flowers and music and happy labor to the golden gates. Mr. McCabe is well known throughout our ranks, a comrade who deserves honor and congratulation, and the wife also shall be crowned queen of the home. FREETHOUGHT gives its benediction to this delightful occasion.

A GREAT deal of space in this issue is given up to letters from those who wish to take stock in the Pacific Coast Freethought Publishing Company. No apology is needed for this course, because nothing can be more gratifying to our readers everywhere than such an exhibition of what Dr. Coman aptly calls "cash sympathy" with the movement. No one will therefore regret the less important matter crowded out.

"SOME of our Atheistic friends," remarks the editor of the Golden Gate, "seem so apprehensive that they might be betrayed into doing something that may squint at the recognition of an Infinite Overruling Intelligence, that they will hardly allow themselves to be properly appreciative of the real joys and blessings of life, lest such appreciation might be construed to the disadvantage of their materialistic claims." Brother Owen has a wrong idea of the matter he discusses. We have never known an Atheist who was opposed to a proper appreciation of the blessings of life. Atheists do not object to gratitude or thanksgiving, but they do most earnestly protest against state appointments of religious holy days marked by superstitious mummeries and prayer and praise addressed to a myth. To thank God for blessings referable solely to humanity is as unjust as it would be for Mr. Owen's subscribers to throw their money into the deep sea instead of sending it to the office of the Golden Gate.

THE three great fires of Thanksgiving week were a grim reminder of the foolishness of prayer and praise. At Lynn, in Massachusetts, ten millions' worth of property went up in smoke, and thousands of people were thrown out of employment and turned homeless into the streets. At Boston half as much property was destroyed by fire. At Minneapolis two-score persons perished in a death-trap called the Tribune Building. Meanwhile the people of the nation were thanking some alleged God for his goodness. An annual cursing day would be just as sensible.

MR. N. F. GRISWOLD, head of the Griswold, Richmond & Clock Company, Meriden, Conn., has notified us that he will take one hundred shares in the Freethought Publishing Company and forward draft for the amount thereof upon due notification. We trust that some of our local friends with plenty of means will see this raise of Mr. Griswold and perhaps go him a few better. Is California to be bluffed by Connecticut? Shall the Pacific take water from the Atlantic, and the orange bow to the nutmeg? We shall see.

We are pleased to receive notes like the following:

PROSPECT VALLEY, W. VA., Nov. 25, 1889.

PUBLISHERS OF FREETHOUGHT: I would be pleased to examine copies of your paper. I have preached the gospel of Christ for several years, but have lately abandoned the pulpit. I think we can get along without gospel preaching.

Yours truly, JAS. A. CHALFANT.

It is always gratifying to see the clergy abandoning the church provided they leave it head first.

THE courts have decided that the alien Mormons of Utah are not entitled to vote on account of their prior allegiance to the church. This is a great sketch of judicial authority, and if accepted as a precedent would disfranchise alien Roman Catholics and other sects.

OUR spiritual neighbor, the Carrier Dove, has suffered from fire in its printing office, probably in the absence of Dr. Schlesinger's guides. The sympathies of all good Spiritualists in this world and many in the next will be extended to our esteemed contemporary.

NEXT week we shall publish an extended account of the incorporation and proceedings up to the present time of the Freethought Publishing Company, including articles, by-laws, etc. It is believed that everything has been put in shape satisfactory to all shareholders.

SOMETHING LIKE A BOOM.

Shares in the FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY are being subscribed for with a readiness that is almost surprising, more than six hundred being already taken. This means nothing less than success, and the Company will be at once organized. The directors will immediately issue certificates of stock and be prepared to receive funds. Those who subscribe after reading this notice, may accompany their orders for stock with such cash installments as they are able to make; the amounts will be credited to the senders and certificates returned.

The following letters indicate the way Liberals in all parts of the West are taking hold of this enterprise:

SAN DIEGO, Nov. 29, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD, Dear Sirs: Your letter of Nov. 17, inclosing circular, is just received, forwarded to me from Denver. I think the new departure a good one. It will give the concern standing and enlist more persons directly in the cause.

I will take twenty shares at $5 each, and if you do not get enough in a reasonable length of time to start the business I will double the amount. I have come over to this coast to spend the winter, as I have done for some years past, excepting last winter. I intend going north later in the season and shall make you a call. Hoping you will have a good outcome in the present venture, I remain Yours fraternally, AUSTIN W. SMITH.

MERIDEN, Conn., Nov. 28, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Your circular of the 17th came duly to hand, and contents have been noted with pleasure. I earnestly hope that you will receive a prompt and efficient response to your call from at least one-half of your subscribers for one or more shares of the stock, or what would be better, if every subscriber to FREETHOUGHT could own one share of the stock. However, as you have no doubt found from experience that many good-hearted Liberals are poor in pocket and that many more who are rich in pocket are poor in spirit, and that our principles will not permit us to do business on the swindling vicarious-atonement-free-salvation plan, I will send you a draft on New York for one hundred shares of the stock when you advise me that you are ready for business. Truly yours, N. F. GRISWOLD.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Nov. 25, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: I hope your scheme for the circulation of Freethought literature will be a success, and to help it in my small way I will gladly take one share—would take more if I could. C. E. SPAFFORD.

PORTLAND, OR., Nov. 23, 1889.

FRIEND PUTNAM: If a company is formed and commences the publication of FREETHOUGHT, I will make it a donation according to my means. Yours truly, C. BEAL.

SHERIDAN, OR., Nov. 24, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Yours of the 17th inst. is at hand, and after perusing it, I am well satisfied it would be a grand scheme for the Pacific slope to have a concern of this kind and hope that it may prosper. I cannot do very much just now, but hope to do so. I am only a laborer for wages, but I will canvass around for the interest of Liberalism any and every time. JOS. BARBEAU.

PORTLAND, OR., Nov. 24, 1889.

MR. S. P. PUTNAM: Yours of the 17th is received. I think the Freethought Publishing Company is just what the coast needs. Mrs. Kreckel and myself will take shares. I will talk it up in our society and I think every Liberal will and ought to take shares. The Portland Secular Union, which you worked so hard to organize at the close of your lectures, bids fair to be one of the leading societies in Portland; we have at present fifty members, and before spring we hope to number one hundred. Much credit is due our worthy president, Dr. Semler. We have one of the nicest halls in the city, money in the treasury, and every one happy. We have meetings every Sunday, and every two weeks a social.

MATTIE BLAISDELL,

Secretary of the Portland Secular Union.

SAN PASQUAL, Nov. 23, 1889.

FRIEND MACDONALD: I think your scheme a laudable one, and am willing to help it on to the best of my ability by taking shares, just how much I will not now say, but nothing would please me better than to see it made a success. I have often thought we should have something of the kind on this coast. It will always be a pleasure to help on FREETHOUGHT and the cause.

Your friend and well-wisher, B. B. ROCKWOOD.

BUCKLEY, W. T., Nov. 26, 1889.

DEAR SIR: Yours concerning the FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY received. I hope the enterprise will prove a great success. I will take two shares at present, and may be able to interest others here if I can find the time. COKE EWING.

ARAGO, OR., Nov. 25, 1889.

PUTNAM & MACDONALD, Dear Friends: Your letter received. Your proposition strikes me as not only feasible but as one of the best means of organizing the Liberals of the coast, if they will take hold. Every Liberal should take at least one share. The more taking hold the greater assurance of success. Every stockholder will virtually be an agent, he will not only patronize the concern himself, but having a personal interest he will secure patronage from others.

I have spoken to several of the friends here, and I find that all indorse my opinions and will take stock.

You can count on me for at least four shares, provided the rest of the friends are not too greedy and take all before I get a chance. Save me one at least in this event.

I shall agitate this matter and write you again. Have started a subscription list. Yours fraternally, J. HENRY SCHROEDER.

EL MONTE, CAL., Nov. 27, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Your circular letter is received. I heartily approve of your plan to incorporate a joint stock FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY, and I will take two (2) shares now, and more hereafter. Yours truly, A. H. HOYT.

FORT BRAGG, CAL., Nov. 26, 1889.

PUTNAM & MACDONALD, Gentlemen: Relative to the circular you sent me, proposing the establishment of a Freethought Publishing House, I think it a great and splendid idea, and I am quite willing to do all I can. If I cannot subscribe for ten or twenty shares, certainly I can take one. Yours truly, HENRY HOUSTON.

OREGON CITY, OR., Nov. 23, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Yours of November 18 is at hand I would say, I will take four shares at $5 each, making $20, as I am satisfied we need something of the kind on this coast, either in San Francisco or Portland, Oregon, in conjunction with FREETHOUGHT; it would be a good scheme. Let me know when you want the cash. Yours truly, B. F. LINN.

BUCKLEY, Nov. 19, 1889.

DEAR FRIENDS: I am poor but will go one five dollars to down our common enemy, religious ignorance. Yours truly, A. WICKERSHAM.

KALAMA, WASH., Nov. 25, 1889.

PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Yes, put me down for four shares at $5 each. I hope it will be a success. I also expect to see some day a Freethinkers' Library (public or private) in San Francisco. It cost hundreds of dollars to muster any sort of a Freethought library. A person may not require to read volumes to understand the articles favoring the Nine Demands, but to gather books, and extract facts and arguments to awaken our sleepy Christian friends, has become a heavy load on some of our Freethought group. Yours for the Liberal cause, GEO. SVENSSON.

CALDWELL, IDAHO, Nov. 24, 1889.

PUTNAM AND MACDONALD: You may put my name down for one share, $5, which I will remit when needed. I will do all I can to help the association along. As you are aware I have poor material to work on in this orthodox town. I think I am the only one who takes your paper here. Hoping you will meet with success in your undertaking, I remain, Yours truly, MRS. M. PEPPERLE.

ELMA, WASH. Nov. 23, 1889.

To the Editors of Freethought:

In reply to your circular I will say that I will take one share after the 1st of January, 1890, and will take more if I can; will do all I can for you here. There are a good many Liberals here who, I think, will take shares.
Yours,
C. C. TUNNICLIFF.

SANTA BARBARA, CAL., Nov. 21, 1889.

DEAR FRIENDS: Your letter and circular of the 17th inst. is at hand, and I must say I am fully in sympathy with the enterprise, not that I would expect to be benefited financially, but it is just the kind of work I would like to see done. I wish I could do more, but I dare promise to take but one share.
Your friend,
L. P. LANGLEY.

TEMPE, ARIZ., Nov. 20, 1889.

DEAR FRIENDS: If the association is formed, I will take two shares and induce others to do something. I have spent but few dollars for mental liberty for the last year or two, for the reason that I have had but few dollars. It gives new hope to see your grit.
Yours,
W. A. CHESSE.

ROCKFORD, Nov. 23, 1889.

MR. PUTNAM, Dear Friend: Your letter in regard to establishing a FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY was received yesterday. I think it a good idea and I hope success will attend your efforts. I will take two shares. I am a great admirer of FREETHOUGHT. "News and Notes" describes many small places in the country that I presume we would not hear of in any other way.
MRS. S. B. MILLER.

HELENA, MONT., Nov. 24, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: You may enter my name for one share in the FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY. Yours in the faith,
CHAS. M. JEFFERS.

DEL MAR, CAL., Nov. 25, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: I will subscribe for two shares of stock in the Pacific Coast FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY, and may it live long and prosper. Respectfully yours,
A. H. SMITH.

FRESNO FLATS, CAL., Nov. 26, 1889.

S. P. PUTNAM, Friend and Brother: I have received your circular and I think the enterprise will be a success. Put my name down for five shares; T. G. Hayes, one share; Jo. Crane, one share; Geo. Merritt, one share; O. M. Beam, one share; and I think I can get as many more. Yours as ever,
R. LARAMORE.

ALHAMBRA, CAL., Nov. 24, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Your circular asking for support for a Freethought Publishing Company to hand, and will say in reply that you can count on me for a share. I will also induce others to take stock in it to the best of my ability. I should be much pleased if some Freethinker residing within a radius of twenty-five miles of Alhambra would communicate with me, as I am entirely unacquainted with any persons holding heterodox views, and, as the Christians would say, I want to come into the fold. I am desirous of having some lectures given in several small towns in this vicinity, in which I think good work could be done; and being entirely by myself in my views I feel unable to accomplish anything. Wishing your new enterprise success, I remain Yours for mental liberty, MURRAY HORNE.

TURNER, Or., Nov. 25, 1889.

FRIENDS PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Your circular of Nov. 17 is at hand. I will take one share. Hoping the enterprise will be indorsed by the many friends of FREETHOUGHT, I remain
Most truly,
W. H. NASH.

PALISADE MINES, Nov. 27, 1889.

FRIEND PUTNAM: Your favor is received. I will agree to take ten shares in the Freethought Publishing Company. Wishing you and FREETHOUGHT every success,
Yours truly,
R. F. GRIGSBY.

UNION, Or., Nov. 26, 1889.

DEAR PUTNAM: You can put me down for two shares in the Freethought Publishing Company. Yours truly,
E. C. BRAINARD.

BOULDER CREEK, Nov. 25, 1889.

PUTNAM & MACDONALD, Dear Sirs: You can count on me for one share. Wou'd like to take more, but am not able. I am one of those happy mortals that has to pay a happier mortal's debts. I think and hope your enterprise will be a success.
J. D. KAUFMAN.

STELLA, Wash., Nov. 22, 1889.

FRIENDS PUTNAM & MACDONALD: I like the idea; will help you all I can towards maintaining the institution you think of establishing; can't do much because I have not the means to do with, but I will take at least two shares. You will hear from other Liberals of this place about this matter in a short time. Success to you and FREETHOUGHT. Respectfully yours, JAMES JARREL.

BLOOMFIELD, Cal., Nov. 24, 1889.

MR. GEO. E. MACDONALD, Dear Sir: Mr. Doane directs me to say to you to put him down for one share, and also says that perhaps after a little he may take one or two shares more. We think well of the enterprise, and if I were to remain in the state I would surely invest. Very truly yours,
N. HUNT.

ORANGE CITY, Iowa, Nov. 22, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: I think the plan better than the guarantee fund. I have use for all the money I can scrape together at present in a venture of my own, but I will promise you a twenty dollar bill and take as many shares as that would bring. DELESPINASSE.

RAYMOND, Cal., Nov. 29, 1889.

S. P. PUTNAM, Sir: We have your proposition in reference to your institution. In the first place I will speak for myself. I propose to take four shares. Several others have expressed their resolution to take stock immediately. One or two more, under the circumstances, must wait awhile. I expect to be in San Francisco on the celebration of Paine's birthday and to have a list and the coin.
D. BUCKINGHAM.

McCanna, N. Dakota, Nov. 26, 1889.

EDITOR FREETHOUGHT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find two dollars for subscription to FREETHOUGHT. I will take one share of stock if the company is organized.
CHARLES BARTA.

HAMILTON, Or., Nov. 26, 1889.

KIND FRIENDS: As you have been good enough to offer me a chance to take part in your enterprise, the Freethought Publishing Company, I will take one share at five dollars.
Yours in the cause of Liberalism,
ALMIRA SWEET.

YAKIMA CITY, Wash., Nov. 28, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: I am pleased with the enterprise that you propose to go into and will do my best to help you on. I will take four or five shares in the business. I left the note I had from you with a friend in North Yakima, who approves of the scheme and has put his name on the list. He will take some shares and try to get as many friends as he can to take an interest. It is the best business plan that has been proposed to aid the cause.

Yours ever, T. McAUSLAN.

UNION, Or., Nov. 26, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: Put my name down for one share for the proposed organization of the Freethought Publishing Company. If it is necessary to make it go I will probably take a few more shares.

A. K. JONES.

SOUTH BUTTE, Mont., Nov. 27, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Your circular to hand and I hope the enterprise will be a success. Put me down for one share. I expect to be in San Francisco shortly, when I will call in the office. If not, I will forward the money to you.

W. S. BIRKETT.

SAN LORENZO, Cal., Nov. 30, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: In answer to your circular of the 17th inst., I will state that, though not very strong, we'll help as much as able to push the cause along. Put Geo. Hinrichsen down for one share; also the undersigned for one share.

Fraternally, HENRY DOPMAN.

PUTNAM & MACDONALD, Dear Friends: I have received the circular announcing your grand enterprise, and consider it the duty of all who have the cause of Freethought at heart to come to the front and take every share they can spare money to take. I am a poor man, working on a salary, but you can depend on me for two shares.

O. B. LOGAN.

BAKER CITY, Or., Nov. 25, 1889.

S. P. PUTNAM, Dear Friend and Brother: Yours of the 17th is at hand. I think that the enterprise will be a success, at least I hope so, as a Liberal and scientific publishing house is just what is wanted on the coast. I think that the Liberals of California, Oregon, and Washington will take hold of this scheme with their whole heart. For energy, enterprise, and go-ahead-iveness, give me a Liberal every time in preference to a moss-covered disciple of theology. I will take at least five shares in the company.

Yours fraternally, H. J. FULLER, M.D.

ASPEN, Col., Nov. 27, 1889.

DEAR MR. PUTNAM: Your favor of the 17th inst. received with circular proposing the establishment of a Freethought Publishing Company in San Francisco. The idea is good; it is something we need; and I pledge myself to take five shares at $5 each, and may be will take more in January next. I will try to induce others to invest.

Yours for success, JOHN ENGSTROM.

GEORGETOWN, Col., Nov. 25, 1889.

S. P. PUTNAM, Dear Sir: Your circular at hand. We think it a very favorable enterprise. You have hit on a splendid idea. I only regret not having the capital to take as many shares as I would wish. I will take one share, and you can call on me for the money any time you wish. If I can take more I will do so, but will not promise. A friend of ours, Mr. Thomson, will take one share. I will try to get others to take some. With our best wishes for the success of the Freethought Publishing Company,

Yours sincerely, MRS. T. S. OLD.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Dec. 1, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Your circular has been at hand ten days. I read it carefully twice. I think it would be a very good thing to organize and build up such an institution as you speak of, namely, the FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY, and Scientific Book-store; and to aid it on, put me down for one share of stock.

LORD A. NELSON.

DAYTON, Or., Nov. 30, 1889.

BROTHERS PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Yours in regard to the Freethought Publishing Company is received. We gave it our earnest attention and think it a grand idea, and if carried out as proposed, it will be a great and lasting benefit to the people, and especially to the people on the Pacific Coast. You can count on $10 from us (two shares), and call for the Vs when needed. We hope that those who are more able will take just as many shares as they possibly can.

Yours,

M. MILLER, SR., & M. MILLER, JR.

BERDAN, CAL., Nov. 24, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: I indorse the proposition in your circular letter in regard to FREETHOUGHT. Put me down for one share; also P. A. Jurgensen, one share. Call for money on or before Jan. 1, 1890. I would take a thousand shares if able. Wishing you success, I remain Yours for Freethought, JNO. DIX.

ELLSWORTH, KAN., Nov. 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: Put me down for one share in your Publishing Company. If money is plenty, I may take two, but will not promise now.

SARAH J. METZLER.

RANDOLPH, OR., Nov. 26, 1889.

DEAR SIR: I received your circular and shall be glad to take one share, as I consider the organization you contemplate is just what is needed.

ANDERS CARLSON.

BOULDER, COLO., Nov. 27, 1889.

DEAR SIR: Your plan meets with my approbation, and I must put myself down for one share, not that it will help much, but just to show my cash sympathy.

L. Z. COMAN.

SNOHOMISH, WASH., Nov. 27, 1889.

DEAR MR. PUTNAM: Your letter and circular were received some days ago. I will take two shares and perhaps more later on. With best wishes I remain,

Yours truly,

H. C. COMEGYS.

PUYALLUP, WASH., Nov. 24, 1889.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM: In answer to yours of the 17th, I like the idea of a stock company. I believe it will be a good investment. You can put me down for three shares and I may increase it to ten.

Yours truly, A. N. MILLER.

SILVERTON, OR., Nov. 29, 1889.

DEAR FRIENDS: Hoping your co-operative plan will succeed, as I think it a good one, I will take two shares, and I will trust to you to call for the amount as stated in circular, when you shall need it. I shall also try to bring in others who are not subscribers to your valuable paper, or any Liberal journal.

PETER RAUCH.

CORVALLIS, OR., Nov. 19, 1889.

MR. PUTNAM: Your note is received. I will take twenty-five shares, and one for Mr. Hickethies of Portland.

Your friend, LOUISA E. R. BENNETT.

SEATTLE, WASH., Nov. 23, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: Your circular of the 17th is at hand. The enterprise is a good one, and deserves success. Put me down for five shares. I inclose you a postal order for $2.45, which apply on my subscription to FREETHOUGHT.

Yours, W. S. BUSH.

BOULDER, COL., Nov. 22, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Your circular, also Brother Putnam's letter of the 17th inst., are both here. I read both and then passed the circular to my wife for her opinion. Her judgment is that it is a good move and I should help. Therefore put me down for ten shares of stock. Of course I do not expect you to neglect me when it comes to notifying stockholders that the whole amount of stock is taken. I more than ever realize the necessity for combined efforts of Freethinkers. Recently I have been barred out from the Rocky Mountain News in discussing a project of the Methodists, backed closely up by Romanists, to change the constitution of Colorado so as to exempt all sectarian schools, with their endowments, from taxation. A "pressure" was brought from both wings of our ecclesiastical octopus to bear on the managers of the News, which closed the door in my face, under circumstances peculiarly aggravating. But if the fools think any such scheme can be sprung on the people of Colorado without the most merciless discussion of not only it, but of the Nine Demands, they are badly mistaken. It may be possible that Colorado will meekly bow her neck for this additional load of ecclesiasticism but I don't believe it.

Be sure that what little I can do with tongue, pen, or limited means, to further the advance of religious liberty, will be done ungrudgingly.

Hoping for the full mid-day glare of a movement for mental emancipation now seemingly in the dawn, I am

Most sincerely yours, JOS. WOLFF.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Nov. 26, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD, Gentlemen: Mrs. E. H. Church wishes to express her approval of your plan to incorporate a stock company according to your circular of November 17th and her readiness to subscribe for one share of such stock, five dollars, whenever the plans are matured and the stock subscribed for.

E. H. C.

UNION MILLS, Nov. 26, 1889.

PUTNAM & MACDONALD, Kind Friends: Yours received. You can depend on me for $10. May the good work go forward. Cheerfully yours, D. L. TRULLINGER.

MILL CITY, OR., Nov. 22, 1889.

MR. S. P. PUTNAM, Dear Sir: I received your communication of 17th inst. regarding your disposition of FREETHOUGHT. I think that you have hit upon a good plan, one that should place it upon a substantial foundation from a business point of view, and I think that such a publishing house, in combination with a book store, would be a financial success, and do more towards bringing about a thorough organization of the Liberals of this coast than anything else could possibly do. You can put me on your list for four shares of the Freethought Publishing Company's stock.

WILLIAM SIMS.

CRESCENT CITY, CAL., Nov. 24, 1889.

PUTNAM & MACDONALD, Esteemed Friends: Your favor of Nov. 17 at hand and contents carefully noted. In regard to organizing an association to be known as the Freethought Publishing Company, it meets my hearty approval. It is a need that we have long felt. I am confident that it will be a success, and insure the prosperity of FREETHOUGHT and our noble cause. I will assist all I can; will take ten shares (that will be fifty dollars), and you can call on me for it at any time. Wishing you the greatest success in this undertaking, I remain as ever, Yours truly,

JOSEPH BLABON, JR.

INCORPORATED.

On Monday, December 2, holders of capital stock in the Freethought Publishing Company met in the law office of the Hon. John A. Collins, at 526 Kearny street, and framed articles of incorporation, which were filed and a copy forwarded to the secretary of state at Sacramento. At a meeting held Tuesday, the 3d, the following board of directors was elected: S. P. Putnam (president), F. L. Browne (vice-president), Geo. E. Macdonald (secretary), W. H. Eastman, Emil S. Lemme.

The amount of the capital stock of the Company is fixed at $20,000, divided into four thousand shares of a par value of $5 each. It was voted that two thousand five hundred of these shares be placed upon the market, and one thousand five hundred reserved.

The Freethought Publishing Company is therefore now in working order, and all subscribers for capital stock are invited to forward their money to the office, 504 Kearny street, San Francisco, Cal., addressing, and making all drafts, checks, and money orders payable to THE FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY.

Geo. E. Macdonald, Secretary.

TO THE LIBERALS OF CALIFORNIA.

All who are in favor of the total separation of church and state; of the American Republic founded upon the Declaration of Independence; of equal rights and impartial liberty, are cordially invited to meet in Convention at San Francisco on Saturday and Sunday, January 25 and 26, 1890, at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, for the purpose of discussing the issues forced upon the people by ecclesiastical encroachments, and preparing measures for the establishment of a purely Secular government in the state of California, and throughout the nation.

The main question which is now presented to the Liberals of California, and which demands, on their part, persistent and united action, is the Sabbath question. "At a recent meeting of the American Sabbath Association of California it was resolved to proceed at once with a vigorous and well-directed campaign to restore, by state legislation, the weekly day of rest to its proper position." This is the declaration of the ecclesiastical party. The California Liberal Union is opposed to any Sabbath legislation, and the purpose of its Convention is to arouse the people to the threatened danger and, by the force of an enlightened public opinion, to guard against the passage of any laws by the state legislature for the enforcement of the Sunday as a Sabbath.

All Liberals of other states who are visiting San Francisco at the time are cordially invited to be present; and will be welcomed as members of the Convention if they so desire.

There is no creed, no religious belief or non-religious belief in the platform of the Liberal Union. It stands simply and solely for human rights irrespective of creeds, and it expects the co-operation of every American, without regard to belief or non-belief.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, President.

Per Order of Executive Committee,

OBSERVATIONS.

In the whole of a long and somewhat bilious life, I have never passed a Thanksgiving day to which I could look back with less misgivings than I now experience in recurring to November 28th of the present year. The above date was passed in Sacramento at or near the house of N. D. Goodell, whither I proceeded in response to an invitation that I had never done anything to deserve.

There were three of us who took the dollar-and-a-half train Wednesday afternoon—Mr. Putnam, myself, and the member of my family who wears bangs. The journey as far as Port Costa was made without incident and without any cushions on the car seats which we occupied. I understand that the railroad company charges a dollar extra for cushioned seats and varnished cars. Just beyond Port Costa an episode occurred which might have made the thoughtless smile. The train ran onto the ferry boat that carries it across the bay, and the passengers got out of the cars to reconnoiter. On our right was a freight train, and on the farther side of that a coffee and doughnut dispensary. We went around the head of the freight train to the restaurant, and while gnawing a sandwich I saw a man take a cup of coffee in one hand and a plate of doughnuts in the other, and start out to carry them to a lady left in the car. But he made the mistake of going toward the stern of the boat instead of returning by the way he had come. It was perfectly dark; the way was narrow and rough, and the first thing the passenger discovered was that he had reached the end of the train, but couldn't get around it without going into the bay. His next discovery related to the coffee and doughnuts. The coffee was mostly in the saucer, and the doughnuts had slipped off the plate and got away. But all was not lost; some coffee remained, and this, with rare presence of mind, the passenger proceeded to drink. He then began a careful though not successful search for the delinquent doughnuts, but after colliding with the hard end of a coupling-pin and attempting to straighten up under the edge of the car, which nearly broke his shoulder, he gathered up his crockery, fired it back into the restaurant, and then went into the car to think over the events of the hour. He forgot to pay for the coffee and doughnuts, and considering that it was Putnam, I settled the bill myself.

It was 8:30 o'clock when we reached Sacramento, and at 8:31 Mr. Goodell had us in a carriage and making good time toward his house on some alphabetical street which I have forgotten. It is a cheerful and hospitable home where Mr. Goodell lives. It is full of large rooms and small rooms, papers, books, pictures, agreeable young persons, and other knick-knacks. And he made things pleasant for us without regard to trouble and expense. Thursday morning he placed a two-horse carriage at our disposal, gave me the reins and Putnam his blessing, and sent us out to enjoy ourselves. There were four in the carriage. It was the liveliest team I have handled since I drove Deacon Jonathan Shelley's steers, back in New Hampshire, and went to school in the winter of '72. We took in most of the city, some of which came over the sides of the carriage and lodged on our laps. All Sacramento was out to attend the unveiling of the Stevens monument, and we saw the musicians, and the poet of the day, and the orators, but did not hear them.

Mr. Goodell is the architect of his own fortunes and the greater part of Sacramento. The city is full of houses that existed in his head before the owners ever saw them or knew how they would look. His handiwork is shown in residences, schoolhouses, and public buildings. I believe he has no church buildings on his conscience.

We took a dash out into the suburbs, driving around the unique county hospital of Mr. Goodell's creation; through the park, the cemetery, and the principal streets; by the white capitol building; past the big pavilion that, among the handsome houses where it is built, looks about as appropriate as a dry-goods box in a parlor; and to various other places. At the Plaza we met Mr. and Mrs. Davies, of Brighton, and later on saw Mr. Davies upon the sidewalk expounding the gospel of unbelief to a man who had made the mistake of thinking Mr. Davies needed enlightenment on religious subjects.

After the dinner we sat upon the veranda and talked. In the part of the country where I was raised it was not the custom to sit out of doors after dinner on Thanksgiving day, with the woodbine twining overhead, with roses blooming all around, and oranges ripening in the adjoining yard. There I was more habituated to going skating on six inches of ice. But nevertheless I felt content with the soft atmosphere and the flowers and the music and the company; and only when Mr. Goodell called me in and snowed me under in a game of euchre could I realize that it was late in autumn.

We arose at half-past five on Friday morning and took a green-eyed horsecar that came jingling through the mist. Our good and venerable host left us at the turn of the road, and when we separated in the morning twilight, with warm good-byes, it struck me that I had never met kinder men than Mr. Goodell and his friend Davies, who joined their forces to make our visit to Sacramento pleasant, memorable, and inexpensive.

The friends and enemies of Mr. B. G. Haskell are informed by these presents that I keep a club. It is a twelve-pound sash weight, with gilded tips, and hangs suspended within easy reach of my good right hand; and I am keeping it for them. I have never said that Mr. Haskell was a rogue, nor have I ever said in print that anybody else ever said that he was a rogue. It is true that several highly-excited callers have been referred to me by Mr. Putnam, and I have accepted the situation because somebody's life appeared to be in danger, and he thought I would not be missed so much as he would; but as we are about to dissolve partnership in the conducting of this business he has no further claim upon my services as a bleeding sacrifice. Visitors are always welcome. They will find an extra pipe and a wad of plug-cut constantly on hand. They may read the morning paper until the evening journal comes in, and then peruse the latter as long as daylight permits. I will discuss with them the problems of finance, irrigation, base-ball, and Nationalism, or provide a person to do so, but allusions to the personal character of any one will be resented. I do not believe that Mr. Haskell is half as bad as a superficial knowledge of his career would prove him to be.

A subscriber sends this statement and query:

President Harrison has been in the habit of saying, "It was God's work," when people congratulated him upon his election. This made the politicians angry, as it gave them no credit for their work. Now, we understand, Mr. Harrison is angry over the result of the Democratic success and blames certain politicians. If he be consistent, why does he not blame God and say it was all his work?

If any man can answer the the above question, he can have it. I do not regard either a Democratic or a Republican victory as worthy of notice so long as the saintly figure of Postmaster-General Wanamaker looms up before our admiring gaze. Let us discuss Wanamaker.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

The Oakland baseball team, who hold the local championship pennant, surprised an audience of about ten thousand people last Sunday by playing as good ball as the Boston nine, whom they tied in a game of seven innings.—The Union Iron Works of San Francisco, as a penalty for lack of horse-power in the cruiser Charleston, must forfeit $33,384, and for the delay of completion $3500. The original contract was $1,017,500.—Dr. C. C. O'Donnell, ex-candidate for mayor of San Francisco, has been indicted by the grand jury on a charge of malpractice. He claims to have invited the indictment in order that he might vindicate himself.—An article in last Sunday's Chronicle accuses Burnette G. Haskell of fraud in conducting the affairs of the Kaweah Colony.—Dr. C. White practices dentistry at Los Angeles without the license required by law. He has been tried for it three times. The first two juries disagreed and the third acquitted him.—A dispatch from Winnipeg says: A brother of the late Judge Terry is on his way to Washington, where he intends to lay his side of the recent shooting before the Department of Justice.

The farmers in Kansas are burning corn for fuel, finding it cheaper than coal. Corn is sold on the farm at 20 cents a bushel, while the average price of coal delivered to the farm ranges from 21 to 23 cents a bushel.—The 51st Congress of the United States met at Washington last Monday. Reed, of Maine, is to be speaker.—Lum Smith, of Philadelphia, has been convicted of libeling Anthony Comstock.—It is thought that Fred Douglass, the colored Minister to Hayti, will be recalled, as the Haytian government refuses to treat with him.—Jefferson Davis was at last accounts alive but very weak, and sinking.—The eight-story building in which was published the Minneapolis, Minn., Tribune and several other newspapers, was destroyed by fire Dec. 1. Twenty-five persons lost their lives in the conflagration, and $350,000 worth of property was destroyed.—Boston had a $4,000,000 fire on Thanksgiving day.—Ten million dollars' worth of property was destroyed by fire in Lynn, Mass., last week.—The Rev. T. M. Little, of Elizabethtown, Tenn., shot and fatally wounded a well-known young man of that place Nov. 25 for betraying his daughter.

Dom Pedro, ex-emperor of Brazil, is in Portugal.—The London scandal, involving many titled rascals in the worst of practices, is being assiduously stirred up to the detriment of public morals.—Stanley, the African explorer, has written a book on "How I Relieved Emin," and sold the copyright for $40,000.—The reform in the administration of the Baltic provinces of Russia has gone into effect. Under the new administration, journalists are deprived of franchise and the Russian language replaces the German.

NEW YORK LETTER.

I beg to congratulate FREETHOUGHT on its improvement in form and matter since my last letter. The number now before me, Nov. 16, is full of the best thought. I do, however, miss the sparkling letter of my old friend Putnam. I hope the dear boy is not ill from his arduous work in the lecture field. I am delighted to see that he has found so many congenial spirits on the Pacific coast. A friendship dating back to our school-days, never clouded, never weakened, ever warm, ever warmer, has invested me with an anxiety for his success in his far-off home. That success seems assured. I see that he has touched the heart of his new neighbors, and am happy in his good fortune. He deserves it all. He is worthy of the confidence and love of the Liberals, among whom he is laboring. His heart is as full of loving kindness as his head is of intellect.

I wrote FREETHOUGHT at least one year ago that a company with Mr. Andrew Carnegie at its head had been formed to build a music hall on the corner of 7th avenue and 57th street. The excavation for its foundation is about completed, and the plans for the building have been filed at the Bureau of Inspection of building. The style will be Venetian Renaissance, with a frontage on 57th street of at least 150 feet. This is to be the home of classical music, and the hall will be as perfect and beautiful as architectural genius and money can make it.

The company building on the site of the Madison Square Garden is pushing its work. The foundations are laid, and walls up to the sidewalk. This covers an entire square, from Fourth to Madison avenue and 26th to 27th street. On this spot there stood a quarter of a century ago the station of the Harlem railroad, which was used also by the New Haven road. The enormous building will contain a theater, a concert hall, cafes, and an arcade. It will be a novelty in this country. The company had up-hill work in placing its stock. It is in the hands of wide-awake and progressive men, and is bound to be a success. I fancy this will be the home of vaudeville rather than classical. The situation is central.

The marriage of Colonel Ingersoll's daughter did not make a ripple on the ocean of society. The girl was married as sensible girls like to be, at home surrounded by friends only. Mr. Brown is a gentleman and a man of wealth. He came into Wall street some dozen years ago, from Ohio, I understand. He has not the genial face of his father-in-law, but it is a thoughtful and intellectual one. Brown is never forgotten in his calculations. I mean his face indicates it.

Tammany Hall has been moved by impulse entirely in nominating Turner, the driver of an ice-wagon, for Congress in the Sixth district. There is no evidence that he possesses the first qualification for the position. There is one thing in his favor. He is a Yankee; was born up in Wentworth, New Hampshire, and is well educated. I don't suppose there is any doubt but he will be elected. This is more like a romance than politics. Tammany nominated a Mr. Durham for state senator; he seeing no chance for election refused to run, and chance brought out this unknown and unheard-of young laboring man. He accepted the nomination and made a run that amazed the politicians. His opponent, luckily for Turner, was elected by a few hundred votes. His staying-power so commended itself to the braves of Tammany that the sachems decided to run him for Congress and to pay out of its treasury all the expenses of the election. It is to be hoped that this sudden success will not turn the boy's head. It is presumable that, coming from the old Granite state, he has Yankee shrewdness at least. He may be another Daniel Webster in embryo—who knows? Whoever he is or whatever he is, he is certainly an improvement on Tim Campbell. At this date no one has been placed in the field against him.

The raising of the fair fund of $5,000,000 is almost complete, $321,000 only is wanting. There is no doubt but it will be subscribed by Saturday night. The determination to occupy a portion of the park almost killed it. The people were opposed to this idea, and it was only when the committee gave it up that the fund made any material progress. The tradespeople, of course, are anxious for it, as it would increase their business wonderfully. The average citizen would prefer it being held elsewhere. They find that New York is too big to be glorified by a pandemonium of this kind. So far as they are concerned, they would not turn the hand over to bring it here. Chicago is welcome to it. Mr. Town, the celebrated engineer, thinks the time too short to complete the building and make it a success. The most active man raising this fund has been John Claflin, the senior of Claflin & Co. His firm subscribed $100,000. He has been active in the dry-goods district soliciting subscriptions. Old Mr. Huntington yesterday gave $25,000. I think D. O. Mills gave a like sum.

We notice a slight stir among the Protestants over the late congress of Catholics and its results. When a played-out old blatherskite like Dan Dougherty made the charge that the Catholic church has suffered persecution in this country and attempts to stir up a fanatical feeling in that church, it seems about time that some notice should be taken of the rapid strides that church has made in the United States during the past fifty years. I fancy few realize how rapid its growth has been, and how baneful its influence has been. Why should not a man steal when that sin can be wiped out by a priest? Our prison records show no pleasant page for the pope of Rome to read. Why not concentrate all your thunder on this particular branch of the church for the time being? There are many things to be shown up before this slow American public will be woke up to the dangers which surround it. Here is a good field for Freethought.

EUDORUS.

OUR CHRISTIAN ALLIES.

It is worthy of note that the Christian sect called the Second Adventists should be so conspicuous as they are in battling against the traitors who are attempting to convert the constitution and government of the United States into a theocracy. It is the only sect in all American Christendom, so far as I know, that is actively engaged in exposing and opposing the plans of the fanatical revolutionists embodied in the Prohibition party, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and the American Sabbath Union. The organ of the Second Adventists is the American Sentinel—well named—and the editors thoroughly understand the question at issue. I would be happier than I am if I were convinced that there were ten men in the two houses of Congress who comprehended as well the true relations between the state and the church under our national constitution, and who, during the coming session of Congress, could, and would, make it plain to the comprehension of the people.

I have lived for half a century in the neighborhood where this revolutionary party in religious politics was first organized, and have watched every step they have taken since. I have read and studied church history and know the why and wherefore of this movement, and I cannot adequately express my admiration of the ability and patriotic determination of the American Sentinel in its exposure of the conspiracy.

It is, however, easy to see why our Second Adventist friends understand so well the genius of our free institutions. Persecution has a wonderful effect in clearing the vision and enabling a person to understand the subject of human rights and the true nature of civil government. Roger Williams was an Englishman by birth, and would have held the same notions on this subject that his Puritan brethren of Massachusetts did but for the fact that he changed his views and became a Baptist, thus getting himself and followers into a minority. Hence he was banished into the wilderness. This converted him into a candid inquirer or free thinker on the subject and disposed him to look at both sides of the question instead of one only, and the effect was to immortalize him as the first clergyman ever known to be opposed on principle to the cruelty and stupidity of persecuting men for their opinions.

In like manner, in the barbarous states of our Union, conscientious Adventists who, as strictly as possible, worship God on the seventh day of the week, as commanded in the Decalogue, instead of the first day, as required by the church, are punished as criminals if they do any work on Sunday. I speak advisedly when I say "barbarous" states, for, in defiance of the national constitution, which requires the several states of the Union to conform their constitutions and laws to the supreme law of the land, nearly all of them are guilty of the crime of persecuting men for their religious opinions and practices. There are three religious sects in this country which observe the seventh day of the week as a Sabbath—the Jews, the Second Adventists, and the Seventh-day Baptists. These people are all good citizens and regular tax-payers, and number thousands upon thousands in the several states. They are compelled to lose two working days of the week, while other people only lose one. Their consciences compel them to give up the seventh day as the Sabbath, and the state laws compel them to give up the first day. Now, suppose these three sects number in all a hundred thousand people, and that half of them are working people whose day's labor is worth a dollar. Then, there are fifty thousand good citizens who are fined by the individual states $50,000 a week, or $250,000 a year, for the offense of being sincere Jews, Second Adventists, and Seventh-day Baptists; and that under the national constitution, which the framers of it made purely secular in order to prevent this very thing from ever being done. Is it any wonder that when these citizens tamely submit to this outrage persecution should organize itself into a political party as it has for the purpose of more widely and effectively doing its unconstitutional and wicked work?

Messrs. Editors, allow me to say that all our editors, lecturers, writers, and Freethinkers should study and understand this subject of the proper relations of civil government to religion and religionists, so that the plans of the revolutionists may be defeated. And I know no teacher that can be compared to the American Sentinel. It has made the subject a speciality, and has a literature which forms a hand-book that every citizen ought to be familiar with.

THE CASE OF RICHARD ROE, "LABOR REFORMER."

PROLOGUE.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Mr. B. G. Haskell's challenge to his "slanderers" in your issue of FREETHOUGHT of November 30, recalls to my memory that more than five years ago I consulted a well-known attorney in regard to a slanderous libel Mr. Haskell circulated against me. The attorney, who knew Mr. Haskell quite well, said, "You can't imprison him for libel, and the man has no property through which you can sue him for damages; the only satisfaction you can get, in this case, is to give him a cowhiding." Of course that would bring me to Mr. Haskell's own level, which, for a clean man, is not desirable. Before this occurrence I had been closely associated with the "gentleman." Since then I have avoided him as I avoided certain little animals I met with during my six years' life on the western plains, which, upon the slightest disturbance in their usual occupation, make the surrounding atmosphere rather unpleasant to dwell in. Those who have had an acquaintance with Mr. Haskell extending over a number of years are rather amused at his challenge. Should any one step a little closer and examine this roaring lion he would find him like the long-eared animal in the fable of old.

Last Sunday, after a pleasant perusal of the columns of FREETHOUGHT, I drew the inclosed pen picture of an individual I have known well during past years in the labor movement, which I herewith submit to your readers. If Mr. Haskell fancies it looks like him he is at liberty to frame it and place the same in the largest hall of one of his many airy chateaus.

Yours very respectfully, C. F. BURGMAN.

(For address see advertising columns of FREETHOUGHT.)

A SKETCH FROM REAL LIFE.

In a large city near the shores of a majestic ocean, where sets the sun in golden grandeur at the entrance to a magnificent harbor, lived Richard Roe. Richard was a person somewhat below the average height, with sloping shoulders, a narrow chest, a round forehead, narrow contracted brow, and large protruding eyes, of a bluish gray color. His complexion looked unhealthy and sallow, and in walking he would lean slightly forward, inclining to the left. At first glance you might have taken him to be about twenty-three years of age, though in reality he was twenty-eight and after some acquaintance with him he would impress you as a much older person.

Like a good many men in his day and generation, Richard was ambitious. He wanted to engrave his name on the pages of history and become a shining light among his fellow-men. Some Americans are proudly pointing their ancestry back to the advent of the Mayflower; Richard did more, he traced his ancestry back to the Swedish kings of the eleventh and twelfth century, and kept a genealogy to prove it; and though that genealogy bore the embellishing traces of his own artistic hand (he was an artist of the pen), and though Richard himself was the most conspicuous figure in it, yet there it was, a sure proof of his lineal descendancy from the loins of royal ancestors.

In his zeal to make a name for himself in the world, he cast about in early life for a suitable occupation that would lead him on the road to fame. He was an inveterate reader, and, dazzled by the great names and mighty deeds of famous generals, he decided to try his fortune as a soldier. It was true, the chances to become a famous general had passed about the time he had just risen from babyhood, but one could not tell what the future would bring.

Richard enlisted in a militia company, and by zealous application in an incredibly short time became the captain of the company and was on a fair way to step higher in the ranks of military distinction, when an influential journal of the city one morning startled the community by accusing Richard of having embezzled the funds of the company and left for parts unknown. Of course it was proven that he had only gone to a neighboring town on some private business, without announcing that fact to the world at large before departing, and somehow explained satisfactorily the absence of the company's funds; but his military career was blighted and he sought fortune in another field.

He would become a famous lawyer. Had he not the shining examples of Webster, Calhoun, and Blackstone before him? Yes, he would become a brilliant star in the legal firmament. Richard's next step was to enter into the employ of a prominent law firm, and there began his studies in legal lore. It happened, however, that a member of aforesaid firm became a rising luminary on the political horizon of the country in which they were domiciled, and Richard, dazzled by the possibility of becoming president of a great nation, threw himself headlong into politics. But being crossed by superior minds and craftier cunning, he determined to revenge blighted hopes and fallen aspirations by becoming a journalist. Here he would become a power in the community and a terror to his enemies. Politicians would seek his support and influence and statesmen bow to him. And maybe through the influence of his powerful organ he could direct the destiny of the nation.

To think and to do were one with Richard, and he soon had a prominent printing firm interested in his enterprise. Shortly before the issue of the projected paper, our hero chanced to enter a meeting in a hall on a prominent street of the city. It was a meeting of strange men, men of a type Richard had never met before. Their apparel was plain, their manner unassuming, but upon their countenances there was depicted an earnestness of purpose such as he had never witnessed before among all his associates. They were seated in a semi-circle, with a tall, commanding figure as presiding officer. Before the president's dais and facing the audience, which comprised about one hundred persons, stood a man of slender proportions and rather dark complexion who, in an earnest and impressive manner, addressed the audience before him, and who listened to him with eager expectancy and interest.

Richard learned soon that he was in a meeting of trades-delegates; the men present were the representatives of the different Trades Guilds, or Unions, as they are now called, of the city, and the speaker, whose name was John Doe, had just returned from a Trades Congress, where had been formed a gigantic combination of national and international trades unions for mutual protection and benefit, and was giving an account of the work accomplished and the discharge of duties entrusted to him. The speaker, having completed his task, was applauded to the echo, and resolutions of appreciation and thanks in recognition of the faithful discharge of his duty were tendered and adopted.

The discussions which followed touched upon subjects of which Richard had never heard before, and which opened to him a grand vista of noble work to be accomplished. He heard the relation of capital and labor discussed; the economic dependency of the wage slave to the proud factory lord was portrayed vividly to his mind. He was given a glimpse of the industrial barbarities practiced under the then prevailing civilization. Also the aims and objects which had brought these men together, and the means by which they thought they could regenerate society and place mankind upon a happier basis and into better conditions. These and other discussions so worked into the mind of our Richard that he at once concluded to become better acquainted with these men and if possible get their support in his enterprise, for he was convinced that these men would live true to their conviction, and would labor with all their might and mind for the accomplishment of their aims and objects.

THE DECEMBER ECLIPSE.

At least four parties will make long and difficult journeys this month to observe the total eclipse of the sun, which occurs on the morning of December 22, 1889 (civil reckoning). In fact, it is more than probable that two of these parties are now at their chosen stations, and the other two close to their journey's end. The eclipse path extends completely across the Atlantic ocean, and it is only at one or two points on the South American coast and in a narrow belt of equatorial Africa that the phenomenon may be observed.

Of the four parties, two are sent by the Royal Astronomical Society of London, one by the United States Government, and one by Colonel Charles F. Crocker of this city, in behalf of the Lick Observatory.

S. J. Perry, Director of the Stonyhurst College Observatory, England, will direct one of the R. A. S. parties to be stationed at Cayenne, French Guiana. The other one will go to Africa in charge of Mr. Taylor, assistant in the private observatory of Mr. A. Ainslie Common, Ealing, England. The work of these two parties will be almost entirely photographic.

The United States Government party sailed from New York, October 10th, on the U. S. S. Pensacola, bound for the west coast of Africa. The expedition consists of Professor David P. Todd, Director of Amherst College Observatory, chief; Professor H. F. Bigelow of Racine College, and E. J. Loomis of the Nautical Almanac Office, astronomers; Professors Abbe of Washington and Jacoby of Princeton, meteorologists; E. D. Preston of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, geodesist, and H. S. Davis, Princeton, J. E. Carbutt, and E. J. Wright, photographers. It will be seen that the work of this party is comprehensive in the extreme. Even should cloudy weather ruin all chances of successful eclipse work, valuable results in all other departments of their scientific programme must ensue. The voyage will afford an opportunity of gathering information in many unknown regions, and the party has been made up with this end in view. The astronomical force, which is fully capable, is only a small fraction of the whole body of scientists; although it is to be hoped that their labors may not be hindered by unfavorable weather, the more especially since on a former occasion, when Professor Todd and his wife traveled all the way to Japan to secure observations of the total eclipse which occurred in 1886, cloudy weather prevented even a glimpse of the sun during the coveted seconds of totality.

Of this party Professors Bigelow and Loomis are both experienced naturalists, as well as expert astronomers. Professor Abbe is a well-known student of meteorological phenomena, and has with him a small army of assistants provided with every species of apparatus known to the officials of the United States Signal Service. In this case, observations of the wind and weather may accomplish some possible good, although an immense amount of misapplied energy is annually devoted to this work, which only results in an enormous aggregation of dry statistics. (By this comment no disparagement of the United States Signal Service is in any way intended. Their operations cover a large field and are thoroughly organized; while the weather forecasts and storm predictions are of untold benefit to our commerce and agriculture. But in any scientific library the endless array of volumes of semi-collated "Meteorological Observations," which are published in every quarter of the globe, and only burden the shelves where they repose, is simply appalling!) The researches in natural history, projected for this terra incognita, should also be of extreme interest, as well as the geodetic operations. Mr. Preston of the Coast Survey is well known in this city through his pendulum work at the Lafayette Park Observatory and at Mt. Hamilton. This gentleman, who is one of the brightest of the young men on the survey, has had a wide experience in government expeditions. During furloughs from the Coast Survey duty he has served under Professor Gould in the Argentine Republic; with the Eclipse expedition of 1883 to the Caroline Islands, where he made pendulum observations to determine the attraction of gravity at various points, and, also in an extended geodetic campaign in the Hawaiian islands. Mr. Preston, besides being a leading scientist and a most companionable member of the expedition, is a thorough linguist. He can read and converse in every modern civilized tongue, and picked up enough of the Hawaiian language during his five months in the islands to translate our scientific books for their benefit. It is altogether likely that he will improve the opportunity for some ethnological researches, and will be on conversational terms with the native chiefs inside of a week.

Lastly, we have the Lick Observatory expedition to Cayenne, consisting of S. W. Burnham and J. M. Schaeberle. Their work during the eclipse will be entirely confined to photography and they will attempt to secure good negatives of both the "inner" and "outer" corona.

Professor Schaeberle will have charge of the camera, consisting of a six-lens by Clark, equatorially mounted; and Professor Burnham will use the Clark equatorial belonging to the observatory, of similar size, which he will stop down to about three inches for sharper definition, etc. It is believed that by making a moderately long exposure (half a minute) with the camera, a good negative may be secured, showing the outlying portions of corona, and probably sacrificing, through over-exposure, the details close to the sun. The reader should be reminded that in the California eclipse of last New Year's day, photographs taken by two members of the Pacific Coast Amateur Photographic Association, William H. Lowden and William Ireland, who were stationed with the remainder of their party at Cloverdale, Sonoma County, exhibited a greater extent of the coronal outlines than had ever before been rendered by this method. An intimate knowledge of photographic processes, as well as of the nature of the image they had to deal with, enabled these gentlemen to so time the exposures, and then regulate the development that the resulting impressions of the coronal streamers could be traced for nearly three degrees from the sun's center. This is nearly as far as any streamers have ever been detected by the naked eye—for it must be remembered that the eye is more sensitive to minute differences in shades of similar colored light than any photographic plates yet constructed.

One of the principal objects of the Cayenne expedition is to secure a plate confirmatory of the two California pictures—those made by Ireland and Lowden.

Messrs. Burnham and Schaeberle expect to remain in Cayenne during the whole of December and January. There are a number photographic experiments on star magnitudes to be made before the work is closed, while Mr. Burnham may be exploring the southern skies—a field new to him—for unknown double stars. In fact, if the discovery of new stellar pairs were as liberally rewarded as that of comets by Mr. Warner, the expedition under Burnham could doubtless be made to pay its own expenses instead of calling upon the funds so generously provided for its support by Colonel Crocker. A SAMPLE BISHOP.

The Vienna correspondent of the New York Tribune writes under recent date:

The climax to the recent scandals is to be found in the grave charges of malversation and fraud which have been brought by the Hungarian government against the famous Bishop Strossmeyer of Djakovar—charges which have led to the legal sequestration of the vast property of the episcopal see in question, and which will result in the removal and interment in some monastery of the unruly prelate.

Among the minor offenses laid at his door is that of having transgressed the forest laws by hewing down woods without the permission of the authorities; of having neglected to plant young trees where he cut down the old, and of having let the devastated forest to the owners of cattle, so that they are now in such a condition as to render replanting impossible. The oak forest, which formerly covered an area of more than 40,000 acres, have been completely destroyed, and the church property damaged thereby to the extent of several millions of dollars.

The vast sums derived from the sale of the timber have either been devoted to the personal enrichment of the bishop and his followers or else have been spent in fostering the Pan Slavist agitation in the Slavonic and Croatian provinces of the empire against the government of Francis Joseph. Bishop Strossmeyer has for many years past been regarded as the apostle of Pan Slavism in Austria, and was severely taken to task by the Kaiser a year ago for his disloyalty in teaching the people of his diocese to look for guidance and instruction to St. Petersburg and Moscow, rather than to Vienna and Buda-Pesth.

Among the long list of charges brought against the aged but by no means venerable prelate is a distinct and definite one of having appropriated to his own personal use a sum of 14,000 florins of trust money confided to his keeping, and the government is determined to avail itself thereof, to put a stop once and for all to his treasonable activity in behalf of Russia's propaganda in Austria-Hungary.

DOUBTFUL HEROISM.

Owing to a ghastly interest in leprosy and the colony of lepers on the Island of Molaki, and owing also to a widespread interest in any heroic good deed, probably there has been no death of any person more widely published and regretted than that of Father Damien, the priest who cast his lot among the lepers and finally lost his life by their disease in what has been said to be a self-sacrificing and wholly disinterested devotion of his life. Perhaps this aspect of the matter has been overdone, but at all events another side of the picture is now being presented. The government physician in charge of the colony says that the priest need not have become a leper if he had been cleanly in his habits; if he had employed ordinary precautions against contracting the disease, as the physicians themselves do. His religious opponents do not hesitate even to charge that his death should be attributed to his vices as well as his carelessness, and that he was not a pure man in his relations with the leper women. Probably there has been no greater cause of the spread of leprosy than sexual promiscuity, and if Damien's habits in this regard were no more careful and exclusive than in his free and easy table manners among them the result is not one to be surprised at or mourned.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

THE San Francisco Wasp will illuminate the coming Christmas with a gorgeous holiday number. Its edition for that day will contain fifty-two pages, with twelve full-page illustrations. But the supplement promised is what the Wasp Publishing Company is drawing particular attention to. It will be nothing less than a 24x28 inch reproduction of Francois Millet's great picture, "The Angelus," in all its original colors. The picture goes with the Christmas number of the Wasp without extra charge.

THERE is a mistake somewhere. The big fire in Boston did not scorch the Investigator office nor discolor a brick in Paine Hall.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel favored us with two of her ablest efforts Saturday and Sunday evenings, Nov. 23 and 24.

The audience was small from a combination of causes; among others, no announcement was made of her coming among us till the morning of the lecture. But Sunday evening we had a good house and a lecture equal to the occasion. No eulogy of mine can enhance her work. She clothes truths with the attributes that only a cultured, thinking student dares, when to champion it is almost social suicide in the eyes of the world. The old veteran, Mr. Lois Waisbrooker, will address us Sunday evening next. She favored us with some choice poems full of matured thought, and it acted as a harmonizer upon the audience. Even Christians speak well of Mrs. Krekel's lecture.

With Mrs. Waisbrooker and Dalhouse Priestly, we think we can set "sum on 'em a thinkin'" this winter.

Our meetings must, for a time at least be intermittent, as we are a few forlorn Liberal mariners upon a desert isle, whose rugged shores are lapped upon every side by the surging sea of perishing orthodoxy.

Milwaukee, Or.

MAURITZ S. LIDEN.

The Chivalrous Knight.

To the Editors of Freethought:

I am not here to further discuss the Terry case. My arguments upon that subject are closed. But I might be considered discourteous if I failed to pay my respects, in few words at least, to my bold antagonist whose presence perhaps is not generally known to the denizens of San Francisco. His second attempt to illuminate the illustrious career and amiable qualities of the much-abused Sarah Althea is but a reiteration of the first and possesses no significance or importance whatever, and is stale and flat; yet he manages to spread himself out over twelve general heads on the Terry case in a very attenuated form, until the readers cannot well resist the conclusion that our redoubtable Knight is afflicted with a disease known in the literary world as a "diarrhoea of words accompanied by a constipation of ideas."

He seems to emulate the old hen that tried to spread herself over more eggs than she could cover, and was very indifferent as to what kind of eggs she hatched, so long as they were eggs; and when the time came for the chickens to materialize, they turned out hawks, buzzards, and owls. That such will be the experience of my antagonist I have little doubt.

The many charges and indictments formulated against the judges, Sharon, and his friends by Mr. Knight are indeed distressing; that is, if they were true. The exposure he makes of himself in the attempts puts me in mind of a monkey climbing a greasy pole, the higher up he gets, the plainer he shows his caudal extremity.

Should Mr. Knight materialize in Fresno near the fort formerly held by her "Cousin Rodney," he would no doubt be astonished by a forcible reminder from the pedal extremity of one of the descendants of Judge Terry, on the unmentionable hinder part of his body, that his presence was not needed, and that would send him to hunt his "hole" on the double-quick.

A. SCHELL.

Knight's Ferry, Nov. 19, 1889.

The Freethinkers' Magazine for December will contain a full-page photographic illustration of the Bruno monument. A portion of the contents will be: "Reason at Rome and Romanism in America," by T. B. Wakeman; "Deputy Bovio's Consecration Address at the Rome Festival," translated by Professor Davidson; and a likeness of L. K. Washburn, editor of the Boston Investigator, and a sketch of his life. Price 20 cents. For sale at the office of FREETHOUGHT.

Now the lad who through the summer
Has wandered fancy free
Begins to cultivate the church,
With an eye on the Christmas tree.

An old Scotch minister told his congregation: "Brethren, you are just like the duke's swans in the lake yonder. You come to church every Sabbath, and I lave you all over with the gospel water, and I pour it upon you until you are almost drowned with it; but you just gang away hame and sit down by your fireside, give your wings a bit o' a flap, and you are just as dry as ever again."

DEACON JONES (solemnly)—My young friend, do you attend a place of worship? Young man—Yes, sir, regularly, every Sunday night.

Deacon Jones—Pray, tell me where you go to worship.

Young man—I'm on my way to see her now.

DICK—Why have you never married, Jack?

Jack—I was going to once, but Providence intervened. I eloped with a Boston girl and we were caught at Providence.

"The bustle is a thing of the past," says a fashion exchange. It always was a little behind.

PUTNAM'S WORKS.

The New God. 10c. The New God was made by an artist hand, guided by a poet soul. It is as perfect as sculpture. The creator makes his "god" in his own image, and breathes into his nostrils the breath of his own life.—L. K. Washburn.

Golden Throne. A romance. Price, $1 00. "The author certainly has genius. The divine creative spark is within him. The book is filled with manly thoughts, expressed in manly words, the transcript of a manly mind. Every Liberal should read 'Golden Throne.'"—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Walls and Wanderings. A new American story. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1 00. "A prose epic of the war; rich with incident and dramatic power; breezy from first page to last with the living spirit of to-day."—John Swinton's Paper.

Why Don't He Lend a Hand? And other Agnostic Poems. Price, 10 cents. "Mr. Putnam is a vigorous poet. His poetry rings like a bell, and stirs the reader like a trumpet."—Bulgarius.

Adam and Heva. Price, 10 cents. "A magnificent Agnostic poem, descriptive of the ever novel and ever mysterious legend of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden. The story is told with a wealth of imagination, a beauty of diction, and purity of thought which rank Mr. Putnam as a genuine poet."—The Universe, San Francisco.

The Problem of the Universe, and Its Scientific Solution. Price, 20 cents. "As a philosophical writer Mr. Putnam is always a success, and we delight to read him. His easy style and poetic expression make his productions very attractive."—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

Ingersoll and Jesus. A Poem. Price, 10 cents. "Written in a rather familiar style, but the sentiment is quite good, liberal, and sensible, and witty without being coarse. On the whole, it is a very clever dream, and very pleasantly related. It is well worth reading."—Boston Investigator.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future

Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. PUTNAM & MACDONALD.A Vision.

I dreamed a dream. After long hours of pain
And parting, I had died, and lived again;
And floating somewhere far beyond the skies,
Had found the guarded gates of Paradise,
Where, to the angel of the flaming sword,
I showed my pass, signed, "Servant of the Lord."

"Enter!" the angel cried, "and have no fear;
Friends of your friends are always welcome here."

I bowed; the doors flew open wide; I heard the singing,
And saw the blest, through golden ether winging
As thick as, when an earthly sunbeam floats
Across the room, within it dance the motes.

There was the banker, who, from fraud-got store,
Had left a deodand to endow the poor;
The grim inquisitor, whose pious zeal
Showed heretics the flames he'd have them feel;
The gallows-housed felon's scarce-won wraith
For what are hope and charity and faith?
Yet, of all those who taught mankind to rise
Above this sordid world of woes and lies,
Of those by whom man's progress was begun
In love and wisdom, I beheld—not one.

My spirit sank. "Ah, sir!" in grief I cried,
"Have you no souls of nobler sort inside?
I dare not seek to live with such as these;
Where are Aurelius, Zeno, Socrates?
Spinoza, Galileo, Darwin, where?"
The angel answered, pointing downward,
"There!"

I turned and fluttered that way in affright
And reached, at length, a scene of softer light,
Where those I sought and more, with sober mien,
Were gathered, talking, active, but serene.

Voltaire advanced and, pointing to the door,
Said, "Welcome, friend, to sheol—hell no more.
These souls you see, the friends of all their kind,
To make the worst of evil had no mind.

And, truth to tell, had doubted, from the first,
That there could be a region so accursed.
Yet finding that, in fact, some things went ill,
Put forth their practiced energy and skill,
Improved the climate, drained the lake of fire,
Talked to the fallen angels, trained the choir,
Put down bad language, stopped theology,
And made the agreeable limbo as you see."

Thankful for Small Favors.

One of the church letters read at the annual meeting of the Philadelphia Association contained this: "We are spiritually dead, but we thank God that things are with us as they are."

The Rev. Dr. Murdock turned to the Rev. J. T. Buckley, D.D., and said: "That reminds me of a young man who arose in my meeting when I was a young pastor and said: 'Brethren, I am a great sinner, and I am determined to hold out to the end.'"

PAPA (who doesn't believe in punishing children while angry)—Now I am going to whip you for that when I come home, and I want you to be right here when I do.

The Terror—Papa, if I send a letter of regret wont it do just as well?

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and understand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

SAN FRANCISCO, - - - DECEMBER 14, 1889.

"PRAY excuse me," were the last words of Jefferson Davis. He is excused.

THE London Freethinker must not again refer to the state of Oregon as a territory. Our northern neighbor has been in the Union about thirty years, having been admitted in 1859.

C. R. BENNETT, Anthony Comstock's Pacific Coast agent, has drawn public attention to himself by the reckless discharge of firearms on the public streets. He endeavored to bring down a flying forger, and came near hitting several pedestrians and residents in the near neighborhood.

THE picture of L. K. Washburn in the Freethinkers' Magazine for December, hardly does justice to the softer and more amiable side of the subject's nature. The editor of the Investigator is not a fierce hussar with a barbed wire-moustache, eyes like the muzzle of a double-barreled shotgun, and a brow clothed with thunder.

THERE is a great deal of difference between Canada and California, not only geographically, but otherwise. The Canadian government, some time ago, refused to issue a certificate of incorporation to a Secular Thought Publishing Company, whereas the state of California has just licensed the Freethought Publishing Company without question or remark.

WE fail to see how anything is to be gained by criticism of the Secular Union Congress at Philadelphia. There is no plank in the platform adopted that every Liberal cannot indorse; and while the platform does not include all reforms considered necessary by Freethinkers, it includes more than are likely to be accomplished during the present administration.

THE Sabbatarians desire to suppress the Sunday ball games, which are attended by thousands in this city, on the ground that they are a desecration of the Sabbath and displeasing to God. The suggestion might be made that if God is displeased with Sunday baseball, he has at his command the most effective way of stopping it. He can at any time "call" the game by means of a smart shower, but so long as he neglects to turn on the hose the players are justified in assuming that they have his tacit permission to proceed.

THE revivalist, Mrs. Woodworth, who has been doing business in a tent over in Oakland, has one lunatic to her credit. Christian Anderson, a young Dane, went to the Stockton asylum last week in a straitjacket. His insanity is of a religious nature, and is traceable to Mrs. Woodworth's ministrations.

"FOREORDINATION must go." So affirms the Rev. Dr. Harcourt. "Only a few years ago," said he in his sermon last Sunday, "for a Presbyterian minister to have even intimated such a thing as a change in the Westminster Confession of Faith would in itself have been sufficient grounds for bringing a charge against him for heterodoxy. Foreordination must go, and I am heartily glad of it. And that most absurd of doctrines that non-elect infants go into eternal suffering must also go before the light of a new civilization. That it could ever have had a place in a Christian creed seems almost incredible. The common sense of the nineteenth century casts out this unclean thought concerning God, and the church that refuses to do so must fall behind in the march to victory." And yet the Presbyterian church has damned thousands for not believing in these very dogmas that Dr. Harcourt now rejects.

THE NEW CATHOLIC DEPARTURE.

While power is falling from the hands of Rome in Italy and France, in the United States it is accumulating and threatens serious danger to the republic. Though she always, as far as possible, has influenced elections and politics for her own benefit, as against the welfare of the state, the church has not till lately boldly declared her intention to overthrow one of the most cherished bulwarks of liberty—the public school.

Forty years ago an eminent prelate declared: "The church is losing half of her children through the influences of the public schools. This should be stopped!" Soon after began the organization of parochial schools, which now give instruction to six hundred thousand children. In them all the dogmas of the church are taught, and their main object is to make good Catholics, which means bad citizens. Till lately the priesthood induced their asses of Issachar to patiently pay the double tax necessary to sustain the schools of the state and the schools of the church, promising them it should not always be so. Now they think they are strong enough to strike the fatal blow long meditated.

At a recent great representative gathering in Baltimore the public school was openly denounced as godless and injurious to the welfare of all religion. The special weapon chosen for the assassination is a demand for the division of the school moneys, each sect receiving its portion. This demand is now boldly and persistently advocated. It was put forward at the last meeting of the National Educative Association at Nashville. It is arrogantly and stoutly claimed as a right by a Catholic bishop in the December Forum. We know by past experience that no flattery, threats, or corruption will be lacking to further it in the state and national legislatures. Rome has not planted herself strongly at Washington—in her so-called university—without deadly purpose. She is getting near the heart of the nation to stab it the more surely.

The church has grown rich and strong and believes that her ten million adherents will follow her new crusade against knowledge. If the American people allow her to succeed, a great torch of liberty will be extinguished. Inexpressible disaster will follow to the commonwealth.

THE CHURCH AND DIVORCE.

In his late article in the North American Review, Colonel Ingersoll said:

"The death of love is the end of marriage. Love is natural."
"Wherever love is it is pure."

Very few people could see anything calling for criticism in that sentiment, but the Catholic Review declares:

"Nothing fouler than this could pen contrive. The avowed apostles of free-love gave precisely the same definition. The outcome of its adoption by society would be that whenever a sensual man or weak and vain woman believes 'love' dead, that instant divorce becomes not only licit, but dutiful. 'Love' may 'die' because a husband cannot buy as handsome a fall bonnet as his wife would like. On his side 'love' may 'die' the moment he sees another who arouses in his lower nature passions that are 'natural.' Forthwith divorce for either or both. Forthwith go the children born in the previous union, wherever a court may direct; and if the precept herein implied should be carried to its complete conclusion, the state would have to return to the cruel and heartless imperialism of Lycurgus, and create vast nurseries for the care of offspring whose parents had ceased to 'love' each other."

The Catholic idea of marriage is that it is merely for purposes of increase, like the union of cattle, except that in the case of human beings no attention is paid to physical fitness. The church claims to own the human beings whom she mates, and the farmer owns the cattle; and her consent is necessary to their union as the cattle breeder's supervision is deemed necessary in raising stock. If, however, the stockman finds by experience that he has made a mistake in crossing two breeds for one season, he will take care that the error is not repeated. But it is the claim of the church that all mistakes of this kind occurring among men and women are to be perpetuated in this life on pain of eternal damnation in the next.

The Catholic Review asserts that were Colonel Ingersoll's views adopted, the outcome would be that "whenever a sensual man or weak and vain woman believes love dead, that instant divorce becomes not only licit but dutiful." Supposing a sensual man and a weak and vain woman are single, and believe that love is living instead of dead, and thereupon proceed to marry. Is not their union as bad in this case as their separation would be in the other? Is it not infinitely worse? Again, is it not as despicable for a woman to marry for the sake of a handsome fall bonnet as to seek a divorce for the lack of it? And if a man and a woman marry each other in obedience to their lower natures, are they any more moral than when they separate at the behest of the same instinct? This is, of course, a low and unpleasant aspect of the marriage relation, but it appears to be the only one the Catholic Review is capable of recognizing.

There is but one divorce court to which members of the Catholic church may appeal. It is the court presided over by Death. The church will admit that the unhappily married are divorced when husband or wife dies; and the Catholic church knows that thousands have found and welcomed this court prematurely, because there was no other open to them. The blood of these unfortunates, whose commitment to the matrimonial prison was signed by priests that denied them release, is upon the hands of the church. The responsibility for the blasted lives of men, the beaten and mangled flesh of women, the depravity of children begotten of hatred overcome by lust, lies at her door.

Colonel Ingersoll once drew a picture of the future, and he said: "I see a world without the beggar's outstretched palm, the miser's heartless, stony stare, the piteous wail of want, the pallid face of crime, the livid lips of lies, the cruel eyes of scorn. I see a race without disease of flesh or brain—shapely and fair, the married harmony of form and function. And as I look, Life lengthens, Joy deepens, Love intensifies, Fear dies; Liberty at last is God, and Heaven is here. This shall be."

But it will not be until the grasp of the church is taken from the hearts and lives of the men and women of this world.

EVER since the Freethought Publishing Company was thought of we have been waiting for the verdict of one man on the prospects of the enterprise—the man who, we are informed, established the business known as the Bancroft Company, the largest book dealers on the coast. That man is Mr. John McGlashan of Ukiah. Mr. McGlashan did nothing in haste. He thought the matter over. He is a man whose word is as good as his bond, and his word and bond go together. He would as soon support a movement with his money as with verbal encouragement, if he had no faith in its success. He is personally and intimately acquainted with the managers of FREETHOUGHT, and has aided them with sage advice and liberal donations. We therefore call especial attention to his letter on another page. It is a tower of strength.

LAST Sunday's Chronicle contained a large amount of matter written in vindication of B. G. Haskell from the accusations previously made against him with relation to the affairs of the Kaweah colony. It still remains to be proven to our entire satisfaction that Mr. Haskell is not an honest man, and we fondly hope that none of the charges brought against him can be made to stick. It should be understood that what Mr. Burgman has to say in FREETHOUGHT is in response to what he terms Mr. Haskell's "bluff" of two weeks ago, and that our columns are as free to Mr. Haskell as to Mr. Burgman, each being alone responsible for anything he may choose to write.

MR. CHARLES G. CASPARY, of Wagner, Or., writes under date of December 1: "A Liberal meeting was called for to-day and well attended. Resolutions were passed to meet every second Sunday; to form a Liberal club at our next meeting, and adopt rules and by-laws; also to elect officers. We are assured of a large audience at our next meeting, and hope to be able to give you a creditable report of the proceedings and success of the Haystack Liberal Club." This is encouraging; let the good work go on.

A CALL for the annual convention of the California State Liberal Union is issued, and no pains will be spared to make this the largest gathering of the kind yet held here or elsewhere. Liberals throughout the state will save the officers much labor if they will promptly begin talking the matter up and making their contributions toward expenses of hall-rent and advertising. The treasurer's address is A. H. Schou, 677 Twenty-fifth street, Oakland.

FREETHOUGHT invites any one who knows anything to Burnette G. Haskell's credit to speak. Look out, Friend Macdonald, or you will soon be "within four walls." You are guilty of libel by implication.—Weekly Star.

Nay, not so; it is Mr. Haskell's friends who, in remaining silent, allow his reputation to suffer by contributory negligence.

JUDGE BUSH, of Seattle, begins this week a series of articles on "Judicial Oaths." They are worthy of careful perusal, like all that comes from his pen.

THE FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY.

As a good many hundred people are concerned in the recently organized Freethought Publishing Company, and as corporations are generally regarded as more or less mysterious and soulless bodies, it may be interesting to give a brief history of this, the only Freethought corporation in America.

When Mr. Putnam and myself first discussed the question of organizing this company, we had somewhat indefinite notions of what was necessary to be done, but we agreed that we could make no mistake in first feeling the Liberal pulse and ascertaining how many potential stockholders there were among our constituency. We found this out by means of a circular letter. In order that the circular might be satisfactory to both of us, Putnam wrote a copy for one, and I wrote another. Then the two were amalgamated, headed "Important to Liberals," and sent out under date of November 17. As has been seen by letters already published, the responses come fast and thick. We voted unanimously between ourselves that the company was a happy thought.

When our co-partnership was formed in 1887 to enter upon the publication of this paper, we simply drew up a document and signed it before a commissioner of deeds. In the present case it was thought the process might be similar, though subsequent experience has proved it to be quite otherwise. We had the presence of mind, however, to call upon the Honorable Judge Collins, of 526 Kearny street, and there we learned in a very few moments how little the average layman knows of legal processes. The judge asked us, with a twinkle in his eye, what we had done and how we intended to proceed to organize the company. We told him we had sold several hundred shares, and were going right ahead to issue certificates of stock. We should call a meeting of all who had subscribed, elect trustees, and proceed to business. Judge Collins commended that method as artless, but objected to it as devoid of legality and common sense. He begged us to realize that what we had done amounted to nothing in the eyes of the law, and that what we had expressed an intention of doing would be null. He then drew up a Subscription Paper reading as follows:

We, the undersigned, do hereby subscribe for and agree to take the number of shares of the capital stock of the Freethought Publishing Company set against our respective names, and to pay five dollars per share for the same.

He then inquired if we had decided on a Board of Directors, and we told him we had, mentioning names of men residing at various points between Crescent City and San Diego. The men were all good Liberals, generous subscribers, and calculated to adorn any position. But the judge said it wouldn't do; the directors of an active corporation must be able to meet at short notice and without expense. He suggested that Mr. Putnam and myself be placed upon the board. We had not thought of that. The other directors, he said, should be young men who would work harmoniously together and with us. We therefore added the names of W. H. Eastman, Frank L. Browne, and Emil S. Lemme, and when Judge Collins met these gentlemen afterward he declared that they made as good-looking and intelligent a board as he had ever seen.

The judge assured us that we were now prepared for work, and upon the evening of Monday, December 2, the parties above indicated met in his office, signed the subscription paper, and drew up these Articles of Incorporation.

ARTICLES OF INCORPORATION OF THE FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY.

Know all Men by these Presents:

That we, the undersigned, a majority of whom are citizens and residents of the state of California, have this day voluntarily associated ourselves together for the purpose of forming a corporation under the laws of the state of California.

And we Hereby Certify:

FIRST. That the name of said corporation shall be The Freethought Publishing Company.

SECOND. That the purposes for which it is formed are to maintain and conduct the "Freethought" Newspaper, and a Book and Job Printing Establishment; to purchase and sell Books, Stationery, Fancy Goods, and Jewelry; and also to acquire, by purchase, exchange, or otherwise, and to improve, sell, mortgage, or lease, so much Real Estate as the business of the Company may require.

THIRD. That the place where the principal business of said Corporation is to be transacted is San Francisco, California.

FOURTH. That the term for which said Corporation is to exist is fifty years, from and after the date of its incorporation.

FIFTH. That the number of Directors or Trustees of said Corporation shall be five, and that the names and residences of the Directors or Trustees, who are appointed for the first year, and to serve until the election and qualification of such officers, are as follows, to wit: [names of Directors.]

SIXTH. That the amount of Capital Stock of said Corporation is twenty thousand dollars, and the number of Shares into which it is divided is four thousand of the par value of five dollars each.

SEVENTH. That the amount of said Capital Stock which has been actually subscribed is one thousand and twenty-five dollars, and the following are the names of the persons by whom the same has been subscribed, and the amount subscribed by each of them, to wit: [names and amounts subscribed.]

In witness whereof, we have here unto set our hands and seals, etc.

On the following day, December 3, the five incorporators appeared before a notary and again appended their signatures to the foregoing document, which was filed with the county clerk at an expense of $2.50, and a copy thereof forwarded to the secretary of state at Sacramento for the trifling cost of $11.00.

On the same evening a meeting of subscribers was held in Judge Collins's office, S. P. Putnam being appointed to the chair. Mr. Putnam made a statement of the work done and the objects of the company, and called for nominations for temporary officers. The chairman was elected to stay there, F. L. Browne being vice-president, and Geo. E. Macdonald received the most votes for secretary. These officers were subsequently elected by ballot to hold office for one year. Upon motion of Mr. Eastman, it was voted to purchase FREETHOUGHT, with all its stock of books, plates, and so forth, for five hundred dollars in cash and nine hundred shares of capital stock. Some matters of detail were discussed and voted upon. The present editors were retained,

Mr. Putnam without a salary. The undersigned is to be allowed a moderate stipend. The question of a treasurer caused considerable debate. The secretary favored a bank for treasurer; the others desired a proper person. Judge Collins, as adviser, supported the latter and said the board would honor itself by putting a woman in that position. The funds of the company must be either invested or placed in the bank, but somebody would be needed in the office to pay and receive bills. The finger of choice pointed to Mrs. Grace L. Macdonald and she was elected.

Following are the by-laws adopted:

BY-LAWS.

The name of the corporation shall be the Freethought Publishing Company.

ARTICLE I.—Corporate Powers.—The corporate powers of this corporation shall be vested in a Board of five Directors, who shall be Stockholders, holding one or more shares of stock in their own names on the books of the Corporation, and three shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

ARTICLE II.—Election of Directors.—The Directors shall be elected by ballot, at the annual meeting of the Stockholders, to serve for one year, and until their successors are elected. Their term of office shall begin immediately after election.

ARTICLE III.—Vacancies.—Vacancies in the Board of Directors shall be filled by the other Directors in office.

ARTICLE IV.—Power of Directors.—The Directors shall have power:—

1st. To call special meetings of the Stockholders when they deem it necessary. And they shall call a meeting at any time, upon the written request of Stockholders holding one-third of all the capital stock.

2d. To appoint and remove at pleasure all agents and employees of the Corporation, prescribe their duties, fix their compensation, and require from them security for faithful service.

3d. To conduct, manage, and control the affairs and business of the Corporation, and to make rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of the State of California or the By-Laws of the Corporation, for the guidance of the officers and management of the affairs of the Corporation.

4th. To incur indebtedness. The terms and amount of such indebtedness shall be entered on the minutes of the Board, and the note or obligation given for the same, signed officially by the President and Secretary, shall be binding on the Corporation.

ARTICLE V.—Duties of Directors.—It shall be the duty of the Directors:—

1st. To cause to be kept a complete record of all their minutes and acts, and of the proceedings of the Stockholders, and present a full statement at the regular annual meeting of the Stockholders, showing in detail the assets and liabilities of the Corporation, and generally the condition of its affairs. A similar statement shall be presented at any other meeting of the Stockholders, when thereto required by persons holding at least one-half of the capital stock of the Corporation.

2d. To declare dividends out of the surplus profits, when such profits shall, in the opinion of the Directors, warrant the same.

3d. To supervise all officers, agents, and employees, and see that their duties are properly performed. To cause to be issued to the Stockholders, in proportion to their several interests, certificates of stock, not to exceed in the aggregate $20,000.

ARTICLE VI.—Officers.—The officers shall be a President, Vice-President, Secretary and Treasurer, which officers shall be elected by the Board of Directors. The compensation and tenure of office of all the officers of the Corporation (other than Directors) shall be fixed and determined by the Board of Directors.

ARTICLE VII.—President.—The Board of Directors shall, at their first regular meeting, elect one of their number to act as President; and if at any time the President shall be unable to act, the Vice-President shall take his place and perform his duties; and if the Vice-President, from any cause, shall be unable to act, they shall appoint some other member of the Board to do so, in whom shall be vested, for the time being, all the duties and functions of his office. The President or in his absence the Director, appointed as above provided:—

1st. Shall preside over all meetings of the Stockholders and Directors, and shall have the casting vote.

2d. He shall sign, as President, all certificates of stock, and all contracts and other instruments of writing which have been first approved by the Board of Directors, and shall draw checks upon the Treasurer.

3d. He shall call the Directors together whenever he deems it necessary, and shall have, subject to the advice of the Directors, direction of the affairs of the Corporation, and generally shall discharge such other duties as may be required of him by the By-Laws of the Corporation.

The President, or two of the Directors, may call special meetings of the Directors at any time, and notice shall be given of such called meeting by leaving a written or printed notice at the last-known place of business or of residence of each Director. Such service of notice shall be entered on the minutes of the Corporation; and the said minutes, upon being read and approved at a subsequent meeting of the Board, shall be conclusive upon the question of service.

ARTICLE VIII.—Secretary.—The Board of Directors shall elect a Secretary.

1st. It shall be the duty of the Secretary to keep a record of the proceedings of the Board of Directors and of Stockholders.

2d. He shall keep the corporate seal of the Corporation and the book of blank certificates of stock, fill up and countersign all certificates issued, and make the corresponding entries in the margin of such book on such issuance; and he shall affix said corporate seal to all papers requiring a seal.

3d. He shall keep a proper Transfer Book, and a stock ledger in debit and credit form, showing the number of shares issued to and transferred by any Stockholder, and the dates of such issuance and transfer.

4th. He shall keep proper Account Books, countersign all checks drawn upon the Treasurer, and discharge such other duties as pertain to his office and as are prescribed by the Board of Directors.

5th. The Secretary shall serve all notices required either by law or the By-Laws of the Company; and in case of his absence, inability, refusal or neglect so to do, then such notices may be served by any person thereunto directed by the President or Vice-President of the Company.

ARTICLE IX.—The Treasurer.—The Treasurer shall receive and keep all the funds of the Corporation, and pay them out only on the check of the President, countersigned by the Secretary.

ARTICLE X.—Books and Papers.—The books and such papers as may be placed on file by vote of the Stockholders or Directors, shall at all times, in business hours, be subject to the inspection of the Board of Directors and of any Stockholder.

ARTICLE XI.—Certificates of Stock.—Certificates of stock shall be of such form and device as the Board of Directors may direct, and each certificate shall be signed by the President and countersigned by the Secretary, and express on its face its number, date of issuance, the number of shares for which, and the person to whom it is issued.

The Certificate Book shall contain a margin, on which shall be entered the number, date, number of shares, and name of the person expressed in the corresponding certificate.

ARTICLE XII.—Transfer of Stock.—Shares of the Corporation may be transferred at any time by the holders thereof, or by attorney legally constituted, or by their legal representatives, by indorsement on the certificate of stock. But no transfer shall be valid until the surrender of the certificate and the acknowledgment of such transfer on the books of the Company.

No surrendered certificate shall be canceled by the Secretary before a new one is issued in lieu thereof; and the Secretary shall preserve the certificate so canceled as a voucher. If, however, a certificate shall be lost or destroyed, the Board of Directors may order a new certificate issued upon such guarantees by the parties claiming the same as they may deem satisfactory.

ARTICLE XIII.—Meetings.—The annual meeting of the Stockholders may be held in San Francisco on the first Monday after last Sunday of January in each year, after January, 1890, and shall be called by a notice printed in one or more newspapers published in the City and County of San Francisco, as the Directors may direct, for at least ten days last preceding the day of meeting, or by a notice in writing by the President, delivered to each Stockholder personally.

No meeting of Stockholders shall be competent to transact business unless a majority of stock is represented, except to adjourn from day to day, or until such time as may be deemed proper.

At such annual meeting of the Stockholders, Directors for the ensuing year shall be elected by ballot, to serve for one year, and until their successors are elected. If, however, for want of a quorum, or other cause, a Stockholders' meeting shall not be held on the day above named, or should the Stockholders fail to complete their elections, or such other business as may be presented for their consideration, those present may adjourn from day to day, until the same shall be accomplished.

ARTICLE XIV.—Voting.—At all corporate meetings, each Stockholder either in person or by proxy, shall be entitled to as many votes as he owns shares of stock. Such proxy shall be in writing, and filed with the Secretary.

ARTICLE XV.—Amendments.—The By-Laws may be altered or amended at any meeting of the Stockholders, by a majority of the Stock represented at such meeting, or by a two-thirds vote of the whole number of the Board of Directors, to be ratified by the first meeting of the Stockholders thereafter.

ARTICLE XVI.—Seal.—The Company shall have a Common Seal consisting of a circle having on its circumference the words, The Freethought Publishing Company, Incorporated December 3, 1889.

With these by-laws copied into the minute book of the association, the Freethought Publishing Company stood ready to go ahead, but if anything more was needed a document just received from Sacramento would settle the question. Thus:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, William C. Hendricks, Secretary of State of the State of California, do hereby certify that a copy of the Articles of Incorporation of the Freethought Publishing Company, certified by the County Clerk of the City and County of San Francisco as a copy of such Articles filed in his office, was filed in this office on the Fourth day of December, A.D. 1889, which Articles and the copy thereof contained the required Statement of Facts, to wit.; First, the name of the corporation as aforesaid; Second, the purpose for which it is formed; Third, the place where its principal business is to be transacted; Fourth, the term for which it is to exist; Fifth, the number of its directors or trustees, and the names and residences of those who are appointed for the first year; Sixth, the amount of its capital stock and the number of shares into which it is divided; Seventh, the amount of its capital stock actually subscribed and by whom.

Witness my hand and the Great Seal of State
[L.S.] at office in Sacramento, California, this the 4th day of Dec'r, A.D. 1889. W. C. HENDRICKS, Secretary of State.

With an instrument like this in our possession, bearing a golden seal four inches in diameter, there can be no doubt of the validity of the Freethought Publishing Company.

It would not be just to close this account without making due acknowledgment of the services of Judge Collins. The judge devoted many hours of his time to the drawing up of papers and guiding the incorporators through the legal mazes in which they became frequently lost, but he declined anything in the way of compensation, assuring all that their interest in the work could not exceed his pleasure in aiding them to accomplish it. The directors, however, did themselves the honor to vote him ten shares of stock in recognition of his eminent service.

The men who form the Board of Directors of the Freethought

Publishing Company need no elaborate introduction to the readers of this paper. The president, S. P. Putnam, has planted our banner upon the ramparts of a hundred Christian fortresses on this coast. The Company is incorporated for fifty years, but he expects to outlive it. Vice-President Browne is the printer of FREETHOUGHT, and often burns the midnight oil in getting the paper ready for the press. Ten or a dozen years ago he worked in the Truth Seeker office, and has ever since been connected with the press either as a publisher or printer. W. H. Eastman is a practical book-keeper of seven years' experience in a large printing establishment. He will lay out and supervise the books of the corporation, which will be kept with all possible accuracy, so that, as provided in the by-laws, a statement of the condition of affairs may be made at any time. Mr. Eastman is a vice-president of the San Francisco Freethought Society. Emil S. Lemme is also an officer of the Freethought Society, and of the State Liberal Union. He is an architect by trade, of German parentage, and the youngest member of the board. The secretary finds himself in this desirable company through the good luck which he has never deserted. The treasurer of the Company, Mrs. Grace L. Macdonald, is the youngest daughter of the late T. C. Leland. She is also the more worthy moiety of the secretary.

Thus manned the ship is launched, and she bids fair to prove as staunch a craft as ever flew the banner of FREETHOUGHT.

The appended letters show how the shares are being taken up. We hope no subscriber will miss the chance to enroll his or her name on the list of stockholders:

UKIAH, CAL., Dec. 8, 1889.

FRIEND GEORGE: I should have answered your favor much sooner, but it appears that one thing and another has kept me so busy that I could not find time.

I think you have hit on the best plan yet to further the interests of Liberalism and humanity, in the idea of establishing a FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY. It certainly seems to me that you should have no difficulty in obtaining all the money needed, to have all the shares taken up readily. I feel satisfied that there is a fine opening on this coast for such an enterprise. It is needed—needed badly—and I think you are just in the position to make a success of it. Your paper is thoroughly established; it is now past its infancy; it is now past a doubt; it is a paying institution. Now with the increased circulation that is sure to be obtained by the means proposed, it will make it more remunerative in dollars and cents, and each and every member and stockholder will derive the benefit in that way also. With energy, care, and proper management, it must succeed. There is hardly a Liberal-minded person on this coast but can afford to take at least one share, and when he or she does that, they have the satisfaction of feeling that they have done something to benefit the human family; done something to lighten the ignorance and superstition, and help to lift some of the gloom and persecution of the past dark ages, which still surrounds us, with priestcraft and bigotry. Science, Freethought, and Liberalism have never yet, it is well known, made a single step in progress and improvement, searching into the laws of Nature, but every inch gained had to be wrested from the hands of those whose interest it was, and still is, to keep us in ignorance and darkness. Give the people an opportunity to read; some will be set thinking. Put me down for five shares of $5 each, $25.

Yours ever, JOHN MCGLASHAN.

ARGENTA, MONT., Nov. 30, 1889.

MY DEAR SIR: Your notice to incorporate FREETHOUGHT has been received and duly noted. You may put my name down for five shares, and if I am in easy circumstances when the time to pay comes, will take more. Please let me make here one suggestion. If you incorporate FREETHOUGHT, the services of Geo. E. Macdonald and Samuel P. Putnam must be retained for a few years at least. To me the paper would be an orphan without you both. Perhaps after a period of five or six years we might be able to spare one of you, but not at this time. I do not mean to flatter either of you when I say this. But I have great faith that you and "George" can carry FREETHOUGHT over the stormy sea.

A. BESSETTE.

UNIONTOWN, OR., Dec. 4, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Yours of the 17th is received. In regard to the enterprise you wrote about, I will assist it some; will take one share at least, and will get another man to take one share. I think it can be made up; I know it ought to be.

Yours respectfully, T. CAMERON.

STOCKTON, CAL., Dec. 8, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM AND MACDONALD: You may enroll myself and wife and Charles Haas and wife for one share each; also Jacob Grundike, I. K. Garrett, M. L. Sims, W. S. Fowler, J. E. McKenzie, and Frank McClure, one share each in the contemplated corporation. There are doubtless some others who may be induced to aid in the movement, and as opportunity is afforded me I will communicate with them for the desired purpose.

Yours, W. F. FREEMAN.

LIVERMORE, CAL., Dec. 8, 1889.

DEAR SIR: I received yours on the seventh, and inclosed you will find an order for five dollars as a free gift to help the right—no issue of stock upon it. Wishing you success and progress, I remain, Yours, MARVIN S. PALMER.

SALMON CITY, IDAHO, Dec. 3, 1889.

FRIENDS: Inclosed find $3.50, balance due on this and last year's subscription for FREETHOUGHT.

You can count on my taking two shares in the Freethought Publishing Company, and I am ready to remit on application. The paper, FREETHOUGHT, is perfectly satisfactory, and I like it better and better the more I read it.

Long may it live to down the obstructions to progress and humanity! There is no truth in Christianity, and as to priests and preachers they may be divided into two classes—fools and hypocrites, and they are the cause of a great deal of harm. Yours for science and morality, and no religion,

CHAS. F. BLACKBURN.

ROSALIA, WASH., Dec. 3, 1889.

DEAR SIR: Yours of Nov. 17, in regard to the co-operative association, is at hand. I will take ten shares, not that I expect to reap any pecuniary gains, but as a duty we owe to our fellow-men to drive ignorance and superstition from the land. That, I know, is a big undertaking, but patience and perseverance will accomplish many things. If all the Liberals could see the danger of priestcraft as I do, they would come out liberally, and fight the monster in his den. Wishing you success,

WM. FISK.

DENVER, COL., Nov. 30, 1889.

DEAR FRIENDS: I will subscribe for $10 worth of stock, and wish you all success.

THOS. J. TRUSS.

WALLA WALLA, WASH., Dec. 4, 1889.

DEAR SIR: My reply to your favor of Nov. 16 had to suffer delay on account of my absence from home during several weeks. I welcome your new proposition and am ready to take five shares in the Freethought Publishing Company.

Yours faithfully, ALBERT ROSENOW.

KNAPPTON, WASH., Dec. 5, 1889.

FRIENDS: We have received your circular and will take two shares in the Freethought Publishing Company. Put us down for $10, five for W. W. Butts and five for R. I. Butts. We are Spiritualists, but we don't care a fig whether you are or not. If you cannot see spirits you cannot help it, and you have a work to do. Don't stop to bicker with Spiritualists (for they can take care of themselves), but fight the enemies of our liberties and blessings we all like to enjoy, Yours ever truly, R. I. BUTTS.

SALMON CITY, IDAHO.

GENTLEMEN: Yours just received. I will take two shares in your enterprise at present, and more by and by. Hoping for your success in your undertaking I am, yours very truly,

J. M. MOORE.

CLINTON, IOWA, Dec. 1, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: Circular received. Count me in for five shares at $25. Keep the ball rolling, and make your call on my purse strings at any time and you will get response. Fraternally,

JAMES A. GREENHILL.

MOLALLA, OR., Dec. 2, 1889.

DEAR SIR: I received your letter in regard to forming a stock company so that you could carry a stock of books. I hope you will meet with success, and will take one share at $5.

A. B. KLISE.

BOCA, CAL., Dec. 2, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: I inclose $2, for which please send FREETHOUGHT one year to my address. Please put down my name for one share in the Freethought Publishing Company. Will send the money any time you want it.

JOS. M. DOAN, M. D.

DEEP RIVER P. O., WASH., Nov. 29, 1889.

DEAR FRIENDS: Your circular was duly received. I hope the Freethought Publishing Company will prove a grand success. I have tried my best to get the Liberals here to take shares, and have succeeded in obtaining the following names: Ella A. Nelson, one share; Emma G. Nelson, one share; J. P. Foster, one share; M. E. Foster, one share; R. S. James, one share; John Anderson, one share; John Nelson, one share. I send you two new subscribers to FREETHOUGHT. With best wishes for your success,

EMMA G. NELSON.

ARAGO, OR., Dec. 2, 1889.

MR. PUTNAM, Dear Sir: I received yours of Nov. 17 in due time, and I am in hearty accord with you. It is by a combination of forces that strength is gained. We have long felt the need of a bookstore where Liberal and scientific works could be had. Mr. H. Snow's was the only place on the coast where we could get any, and his supply was limited. FREETHOUGHT is doing such a noble work now that with the additional strength it would gain by the book store, I think its usefulness would be greatly increased.

I will do all that I can to forward the enterprise. I will certainly take one share, perhaps more, but to do what I can you can count on me all the time.

I have not the shadow of a doubt of your success, for Putnam and Macdonald are the right men in the right place.

Yours truly, JAS. McNAUGHTON.

TALENT, OR., Dec. 4, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Find inclosed $2 subscription to FREETHOUGHT for one year. Received Mr. Putnam's letter in regard to book house. If you are likely to succeed I will throw in a piece.

Yours truly,

H. AMERMAN.

OTTUMWA, IA., Dec. 1, 1889.

DEAR FREETHOUGHT: Your circular at hand. I have been watching with great interest the development of Liberalism in the West, and I am rejoiced to see it, for I think the success of the cause mainly depends on the free West. The producers, those who make the wealth of our country, are being crushed to death by the money power at home and English capital combined. This power controls all the offices of the country from the president to the policemen on our streets, and all the bishops, preachers, and other parasites that are getting their regular salaries, which were doubled when our country was prosperous and all profitably employed, and continued to the present time, when labor has to go a-begging. The indications this fall are that the people are waking up to their interests, and I look on Liberalism as one of the most potent factors to full liberty, politically and religiously. I have been hoping that Chicago would become the prominent point for Liberalism, but I see the far West is going ahead of all other parts of the country. You can count on me for one share in your company. Yours for liberty,

WM. LINDSEY.

PRINEVILLE, OR., Nov. 27, 1889.

DEAR SIR: I have just received your circular, and will do something—at least one share, may be five or six.

W. H. CAMPBELL.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Dec. 4, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: You can put me down for two shares of stock in your new venture. I hope it may prove a grand success.

NELSON SMITH.

NEWPORT, OR., Dec. 2, 1889.

MR. S. P. PUTNAM, Esteemed Friend: I received your circular, and am highly pleased with the plan of a Freethought Publishing Company. I will take one share. Several here have told me that they intend to take stock. Will do all I can for the enterprise.

J. B. HOSS.

BOULDER CREEK, CAL., Dec. 6, 1889.

DEAR SIR: Put my name down for five shares in the Freethought Publishing Company. I think your undertaking will be a grand success.

Yours truly,

O. R. HARMON.

RED CANYON, WYO., Dec. 1, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: I will take one share at $5, and forward money when notified. I will also try to get a new subscriber and will remit you during this month. With the best of wishes for yourselves and FREETHOUGHT, WALT R. MACDONALD.

WILSONVILLE, OR., Dec. 1, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: Your circular received, and after carefully reading it I consider this plan one of the best for promoting the cause of liberty. You may put me down for one share, and the money is ready whenever you see fit to call for it. It is to be hoped that every Liberal, Freethinker, and Spiritualist will at least take one share, as their interests are identical. This would insure success, and the amount would not be missed.

JOHN KRUSE.

ROSWELL, N. M., Nov. 26, 1889.

DEAR SIR: The books and first installment of FREETHOUGHT duly received. Thanks. You have also inclosed me a circular letter advocating the establishment of the Pacific Coast Freethought Publishing Company. I am in full accord with your Liberal principles and with the objects of your enterprise. I sympathize deeply and sincerely with your struggles to emancipate man from the thralldom of bigotry and superstition, by which the world is so pitifully degraded and enslaved, and from the toils of priestcraft and hypocrisy.

You can enroll my name upon your subscription list for ten shares, or $50, stock in the firm. Whenever you notify me that you have so far succeeded as to call in subscriptions I will forward amount promptly.

Yours,

P. F. GARRETT.

SECULARISM IN WEST VIRGINIA.

The Wheeling, W. Va., Register of Dec. 2 contains this notice of a meeting of Liberals in that city:

Another meeting of the Secular Union was held at Germania Hall yesterday afternoon at 2 o'clock. About forty persons were present, and most of them seemed to be identified with the movement.

The temporary chairman, Mr. Allen Noe, called the meeting to order, after which the secretary pro tem., Mr. D. G. Crow, was called to the floor, and addressed the audience on the purposes and plans of the organization. The address lasted about forty minutes, and the speaker gave a history of the movement from its inception up to the present day. He also gave an insight into another organization to which the Secularists appear to be opposed—the American Reform Association, whose aim, the speaker stated, was to destroy the secular character of our laws and Constitution. The address was a stirring appeal for the preservation of the secular character of our Constitution and public schools.

At times the speaker grew animated, but never abusive; critical but fair, in dealing with his opponents. The address was listened to with marked attention, and frequently brought forth hearty applause from the auditors.

After the address the work of organization was commenced. A constitution was adopted, but as it was growing late, an election of officers was postponed until the next meeting.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

It is understood that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company will proceed at once to build new roads in the San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys in order to head off the encroachments of Eastern lines.—Those who know when they have had enough, say that no more rain is needed at present in California.—Portland, Or., has a new ordinance under which the Salvation Army disturbances are to be repressed.—The San Francisco Mint is at present overloaded with bullion, 800 bars of silver having come in from Montana. The metal is piled up in the building in every direction, and the gold, in the language of the informant, is "heaped up on end, and we are about swamped for space." On account of this large accession of bullion from one source, in addition to the usual deposits, six extra men are required in the melting department, and the entire force is kept busy.—A case of reckless shooting in the streets by officers of the law occurred on the 6th. Police Detective Silvey and Agent Bennett of the Society for the Suppression of Vice fired seven shots after a fugitive forger on Sacramento street. One of the bullets passed through a window at which a young lady was standing, and others narrowly missed citizens on the crowded street.

A young man named Ostrom, who confesses to the embezzlement of $2200 of the Pioneer Press fund, is charged with firing the Minneapolis Tribune building in order to efface the evidence of his guilt.—Jefferson Davis was at one time secretary of war, but the war department at Washington will take no official notice of his death.—The police raided a faith-cure establishment in Brooklyn, N. Y., on Sunday and arrested three persons who had endangered the public health by going from a house infected with diphtheria and scarlet fever to a place of public meeting without taking the ordinary precautions to prevent the spread of the disease.—The women journalists of New York have organized a woman's press club, with Mrs. Croly (Jennie June) as president.—The Knights of Labor and the Farmers' Alliance have formed a partnership.—O. F. Brannon, of Holyoke, Col., chairman of the Republican Central Committee, and a leading lawyer, became so enthusiastic over the news announcing the death of Jefferson Davis that he hoisted the Stars and Stripes at full mast over his office and kept it flying all day. Considerable comment was made upon his action.—The Rev. W. F. Pettit was arrested at Columbus, O., Dec. 7, charged with poisoning his wife. Pettit is the grand prelate of the Indiana commandery of Knights Templar.—Dover, N. H., has recently experienced a severe shock of earthquake.—Justus H. Rathbone, founder of the order of Knights of Pythias, died at Lima, O., last Monday, aged 50.

Dom Pedro, the exiled emperor of Brazil, thinks that lately established republic will not be permanent, as the people of Brazil are not sufficiently educated for self-government.—The explorer Stanley is out of the woods and is now at Zanzibar. Emin Pasha (Dr. Edward Sehnitzler), whom Stanley penetrated Africa to rescue, has recently met with a severe fall which endangered his life, but he may recover.—Boulanger, the French general, will visit America in the beginning of next year and deliver a course of lectures.—Henry Searle, champion oarsman of the world, died of typhoid fever at Adelaide, Aus., on the 9th. He was 23 years old.

THE TWO KNIGHTS.

In ancient days when valor marked the man,
And prowess made him master of his clan;
When might was right, and polished steel was law,
A famous knight a wondrous vision saw:
Returning from the tournament, he lay
Upon the barren moor at close of day,
His mighty lance, that chivalry defied,
And all his glittering armor laid aside.
He seemed by nature formed to master men,
Having the weight of two, the strength of ten.
His battle ax, no other knight could swing,
To him was light as sceptre of a king.
He held the list, so great a knight was he,
Against the pride and flower of chivalry.
And oft the tide of battle to restrain,
Stalked, like the sickler, through the harvest grain.
Falling asleep while musing on his fame,
He dreamed a stronger Knight, unarmored, came,
And with a slender rapier touched his breast,
And startled, he the stranger thus addressed:

"And who art thou—or knight, or page, or squire—
That com'st to me in such a strange attire?"
To which the stranger said: "Behold in me
The Knighthood of the Nineteenth Century."
"What mail hast thou beneath thy robes concealed.
That makes thee bold? Thou hast no arms nor shield!
Quaint knight, to challenge me thou dost presume
With nothing knightly 'bout thee save thy plume;
The weight of my huge sword would cleave in twain
That casque of thine which barely sheds the rain;
That rapier toy thou dost so deftly wear
Will serve as bodkin for my lady fair;
For since thou hast defied me on the road
My lance shall spit thee as thou would'st a toad—
If knight thou claim'st to be, pray tell me how,
Unarmed, thou dost maintain thy knightly vow—
The oath of chivalry that poets sing:—
'Defense of God, the ladies, and the king?'"

"Defense of God," quoth he, "we ne'er pretend,
For heaven itself can heaven itself defend.
Protect the ladies? Yes! the precious elves,
But, bless your soul, they can protect themselves.
Although we're seldom charged with their defense,
Pray do not think they're any less expense.
And kings are luxuries, beyond a doubt,
The world is learning fast to live without.
Mankind to man refuse to bend the knee,
And kings are only kings by courtesy.
I represent"—at this his proud lip curled—
"An age where mind, not muscle, rules the world."

"Since thou hast challenged me unarmed, Knight,
Use thou thy weapon; I unarmed will fight!
But that thy boldness earns respect from me,
With my mailed gauntlet I would chasten thee,
Or, if inclined, clutching thee by thy frock,
Dash out those brains upon the wayside rock
Thou claimst as thy defense—and thou shouldst find
That muscle still is master over mind!
I'll take thee 'neath my arm and squeeze thee there
As one would play a bagpipe at a fair—
And thou shalt feel me piping at thy throat,
And, swan-like, die with thy expiring note!"

Replied the stranger: "Sir, you'd best reflect!
Before we're done you'll speak with more respect!
Before the title of Brave Knight you earned,
A little caution, too, I ween you learned!
While man is human he should never scorn;
No man so great but greater may be born.
The strongest nations, those most civilized
With arts destructive, reason hath devised.
Although I am a vulnerable ghost,
I fear you not, no matter how you boast."

At which the knight made at him, thus defied;
Meanwhile the stranger nimbly stepped aside,
Drawing his pistol as he turned around,
Fired through the empty helmet on the ground.
Amazed, the trembling knight, prostrate with fear,
Gasped: "What infernal noise is this I hear?
And art thou, sir, the devil in disguise?
Is that the thing with which to civilize?"

"I am but mortal, sir; pray have no fear—
His majesty ne'er puts on knightly gear.
This pistol, sir, the product of the mind,

Unto one common level brings mankind.
Be not amazed; 'tis but a common toy,
And rates the giant with the cripple boy.
Look where the bullet pierced your helmet through!
'Tis well, Sir Knight, I did not shoot at you—
Although the instrument is well designed
To impress an argument upon the mind.
Here's dynamite—a modest powder brown—
That burrows earth and tears the mountains down!
Should I the wonders of the age explain,
Your feeble mind would hardly bear the strain;
It is enough, Sir Knight, for you to know
True chivalry doth not in armor go.
Who conquers others, oft much valor shows;
Who conquers self, subdues the greater foes.
The fiercest wars are battles of the mind—
Bring sweeter peace and leave less ills behind.
If swords bring death far better than we break them,
And help poor orphans rather than to make them,
'Twere far more valorous to wield the spade,
For making widows is a sorry trade.
They need no armor who in modern years
Shed benefits instead of purple tears.
Not he alone of great athletic might
Or skill to use the sword may be a knight.
But every man who scorns oppression's ways,
Loves country, home, and mother all his days;
Who can be cautious, too, as well as brave,
And bear through life his honor to the grave—
A life of purity, without pretense,
Of charity and sweet benevolence—
Twin virtues by which chivalry may find
Man's greatest glory is to bless mankind.
Though he's true knight in whom these virtues blend,
He's truest knight who's truest to his friend;
For friendship—grandest boon to mortals given—
Creates on earth a little bit of heaven."

A while in wonder he the stranger scanned,
Acknowledging defeat with proffered hand:
"I'll be a modern knight henceforth," said he,
"For thou, defenseless knight, hath conquered me!
I feel a power within that's greater than
The sinewed might of any mortal man!
No more shall my huge lance, on tented field,
Strike down opposing knight too brave to yield.
The foremost knight shall be the foremost man,
And, chivalrous, turn Good Samaritan!"

The archers o'er night's ramparts had begun
To shoot the golden arrows of the sun
Before the dreamer, waking, found that he Had wandered in some future century.
He felt the soul within, beyond a doubt,
Was greater than the mighty man without—
The spirit, the aspiring mind, and heart
Alone, were heaven's eternal counterpart;
That prowess, after all, was empty name,
And noble deeds the surest road to fame.

WHAT GEORGE CHAINEY IS DOING.

George Chainey, of America, the mildest visionary that ever saw visions and dreamt dreams, called upon me again the other day. He has a coffee-colored face, and great black eyes like a gazelle, and his kingdom is not of this world. He poses as a Christ, and is the most unruffled sort of Christ imaginable. When reviled he revileth not again. He gets into no scrapes with Scribes or Pharisees, and is so far removed above human emotions and passions that he cares not a jot should some Judas betray him every hour of the day. I do not think that, if he were being even crucified, he should make any fuss about the matter whatever. Such is the advantage or disadvantage of living in the clouds.

Mr. George Chainey is engaged in producing a book to be called "Shusan"—not Susan, mark you, for George is now away a thousand miles over the heads of all mere Susans, although popular report hath it that he was not always so. This Shusan of his is the name of some old palace mentioned in the Bible, and which, being translated, according to George, meaneth roses and cat's whiskers. This book, George assures me, is being composed principally in his sleep. Whether revealed to him by the Lord, or quite the other party, he saith not. I have to keep very wide awake when I am writing my books, such as they are; but it is quite otherwise with George. It is revealed to him in his sleep that the Bible has an esoteric meaning never dreamt of by Jehovah or the Holy Ghost when they wrote it. But then Jehovah and the Holy Ghost are poor benighted creatures when compared with George.—SALADIN, in the London Agnostic Journal.

THE CASE OF RICHARD ROE, "LABOR REFORMER."

A SKETCH FROM REAL LIFE.

CHAPTER II.

After the conclusion of the meeting Richard introduced himself to John Doe, complimented him as a participant in a noble work, and stated that he would publish a full report of the meeting in his new journal which would appear in a few days. Having tendered John Doe an invitation to call at his office, Richard left to prepare his plans to captivate the active interest of the men he had met that evening.

John Doe, however, paid no attention to Richard Roe's invitation. The assertion that his "paper would be devoted to the interests of the laboring people and had come to stay" was stale to him. He knew of demagogues and self-seekers who had published papers before and had gained the confidence and support of the people by such promises, only to betray the cause they professed to espouse and sell out to the highest bidder at election times; and in a few moments Richard Roe disappeared from his mind.

Richard, however, kept his word. The first issue of the paper, which was printed in neat type and had a generally clean appearance, contained a glowing account of the aforesaid meeting, and a number of copies were forwarded to the address of John Doe, who, favorably impressed, distributed them among his associates. Richard invited correspondence and articles on subjects these men were interested in, which, much to their surprise, were printed as regularly as they were forwarded.

Now the publication of a paper advocating the views of this group of reformers had been under discussion for some time previous, and the unsolicited support of this young stranger was rather unexpected, and though a little dubious as to the final outcome they went to work and extended the circulation of "The Banner," as it shall be termed hereafter.

Richard Roe, little by little, insinuated himself into the confidence of the different members of the group who constituted the controlling and organizing force of all the various branches of industrial organizations in and about the great city, and soon was initiated into their secret councils. He was shortly able to grasp the object aimed at and became a champion of the cause of the oppressed. One day he complained that his paper did not receive the financial support he had expected, and he was afraid that from lack of means he would soon have to suspend publication. This threatening calamity was looked upon as a severe blow to the cause, which was advancing at that moment quite favorably, and after a consultation with his friends, John Doe, who had become an enthusiastic admirer and a warm champion of "The Banner," packed his working tools together, left his occupation where, as an intelligent mechanic, he had earned a good and steady competency, and embarked upon the very uncertain venture of extending the circulation of "The Banner."

Coming in closer contact with Richard Roe, John found him in needy circumstances, though struggling to keep up appearances. Finding Richard's wardrobe extremely depleted, John, through the medium of one of his tailor associates, had Richard fitted out in a new suit of clothes. Finding on another occasion the house in which Richard lived cold, without fuel, or money to buy it, John sent him a ton of coal and brought warmth and cheer to the premises. John also found that Richard had no personal financial interest in the stock and fixtures of "The Banner," but that it was the property of the printing firm in whose office it was edited and whence it was issued weekly.

Under John Doe's active canvass the circulation of "The Banner" extended rapidly, subscriptions and advertisements poured toward it in a pleasing stream, and for a time it looked as though "The Banner" would prove a phenomenal success. About this time the country was thrown into a fever of political excitement owing to the near approach of a presidential election, and the people, absorbed for the time being in the topics of the day, were rather adverse to investigating the ideas advanced through the medium of "The Banner," and the financial aspect was rather clouded. The firm publishing the paper endeavored to run it into the course of current politics, and failing in this, owing to the active objection of that band of reformers which had given the paper circulation and prominence, finally refused to publish it any longer.

This was a sad blow to Richard; all his hopes and aspirations were centered in the success of this publication, and with its cessation all his airy castles were dashed to the ground. However, his newly made friends came to his rescue. John Doe procured the type and fixtures of a suspended publication at a small monthly rental; and with the assistance of his associates in a few hours secured several hundred dollars, with which he rented an office on one of the main thoroughfares of the city, and soon "The Banner" flourished again with Richard Roe as editor.

The financial deficiencies of the paper were covered by a co-operative stock company formed solely to give backing to the publication, and, with the active assistance of many hands and many minds, "The Banner" soon attracted widespread attention. With the growth and influence of the paper the innate nature of Richard Roe asserted itself. Out of the realms of possibility his imagination took flight, and from his fertile and rapidly working brain schemes were evolved which startled the public and filled his associates with dismay. The wild fancies of an opium eater could not have appeared more grotesque than the propositions advanced by Richard Roe at the secret conclaves of the "Reformers' Association," and finding himself opposed by cooler heads and more experienced counsel, he finally determined to carry out his schemes in the face of this well-meant opposition.

Meantime the circulation of "The Banner," through the editorial extravagances, began steadily to decline, and John Doe, though facing tremendous odds for a time bravely, was finally compelled to return to his trade to make a living for his family. He had put two of the best years of his life into the support of this publication. It was true he had not much money, but such little as he possessed he had given freely. His wife, who possessed a little property, had sold it, and put the proceeds into the paper; and money which she had secured from her parents to pay doctor and nurse bills during approaching confinement was used to pay printer's wages and press bills for "The Banner;" and now after all these sacrifices he found the paper a failure. He found that for some mysterious reason his friends and associates were falling away from him. With the soles of his shoes worn to a wafer, his wife's and his own wardrobe worn out during the past two years; with 15 cents in his pocket, hundreds of dollars in debt, several months' rent in arrears, not a bite to eat in the house, not a pound of coal to warm his sick little baby and his brave, patient wife with, he left the office one January day to face the world anew. But John had not yet drained the bitter cup of experience completely; he was destined to learn something of the dark side of human nature from a quarter he least expected it. Richard Roe, fearing to lose the support of John's associates as well as he lost John's immediate co-operation, had for some time thrown out suspicious hints regarding John Doe's honesty, which accounted for the strange deportment of John's friends toward their associate. Shortly after, when John had left the city for a few days, Richard Roe grew bolder and openly charged John Doe with embezzlement of the funds of the publishing company, to the amount of over one hundred dollars. John, on his return, hearing of these reports, demanded an investigation of the accounts of the company, which, by the way, had been kept during a year or more by Richard himself or a member of his family. The committee appointed to investigate these books, at a subsequent meeting reported that "The Banner Publishing Company" was indebted to John Doe to an amount of several hundred dollars, thus completely vindicating him. Notwithstanding this honorable vindication, Richard Roe continued, with inconceivable malice and a strange perversion of human nature, to tell this infamous falsehood in an exaggerated form as years rolled on, even when he could derive no possible benefit from stating it.

CHAPTER III.

After John Doe's retirement, "The Banner" was reduced from a weekly to a monthly publication in magazine form, in which Richard Roe made extravagant promises that of course were not kept, and after a few issues, finally suspended altogether. The members who constituted the "Reformers' Association," thoroughly disgusted with Richard's wild and extravagant schemes, one by one resigned, and one by one Richard would fill their places with newly made friends. In council with his old associates, Richard had taken a pledge with all other members of the association that, in case of death or resignation, no new members should be added to the central council of the "Reformers' Association" without the unanimous consent of all the other members, active or retired, and that in case the number in the central council should fall below a certain point, the association should disband and the name be discontinued; thus expressly providing against the possible perversion of the aims and objects of the association, which were purely educational in their scope, by the introduction of untrained minds. Furthermore, the members had become suspicious of Richard Roe, who had on several occasions advanced propositions at the council meetings which, if carried out in earnest, would have resulted in the violation of the law and the destruction of both private and public property and would have resulted in swift punishment of the perpetrators by an indignant public, and an indefinite postponement of the aims and objects sought for by the association.

As before stated, after the retirement of the majority of the older members of the association, Richard Roe, who had been secretary and still retained possession of the books, in violation of his pledge, filled the places with men of his own choice, and continuing the name of the association carried on the affairs with a high hand. The association had numerous branches extending along the coast, and members' fees and contributions to push the work of reform or "propaganda" (Richard's favorite word) flowed constantly toward the secretary, a proper account of which was never rendered. Soon rumors of the existence of a dangerous society began to agitate the press of the city, and stories of plots against life and property became circulated. Dark hints were given as to the ringleaders of the society, and all indications pointed to Richard Roe as the head and front. One morning the community was startled through the announcement of the public press that a dangerous plot had been discovered to blow up certain portions of the city with a high explosive, and a number of arrests had been made. The men arrested were well known by some of the old reformers to have intimate association with Richard Roe in his new schemes, yet, strange to state, Richard was never publicly implicated with the affair, though the men arrested were tried and condemned to imprisonment. Strange stories of schemes connected with Richard's name, and of which those who knew him intimately believed him fully capable, circulated freely, but Richard, with a daring stroke of generalship, stepped out from the veil of secrecy, and, improvising a convention of so-called trades representatives, gave himself a standing in the reorganization of the trades guilds council which had fallen somewhat into oblivion for a few years.

He proved himself to be a successful organizer, and with a band of devoted followers soon gained prominence and distinction in this new venture. However, his power was of short duration, and the solid, plain sense of the trades people soon forced him out of the council chamber. Meantime he had reached out in other directions. A wave of co-operative experiment had swept over the country; and reformers everywhere joined hands to start co-operative colonies. Hundreds of men and women left their homes to join kindred minds, at distant points, in co-operative efforts, and Richard Roe was not slow in taking advantage of this new movement. He soon located a colony, which he advertised extensively, and in glowing, seductive word-pictures, appealing to the emotional nature of men and women, shortly drew together a nucleus to start a colony with. Money flowed in readily; men in shop and factory parted with their hard earnings to buy a share in this new enterprise; men aged in years who bore the traces of many a hard-fought battle for the enlightenment and elevation of mankind, men frugal to an extremity in their personal habits, offered up their hard and slowly saved earnings on the altar of co-operative effort, only to find after a while that they were losing both their rights and interest in Richard Roe's co-operative colony. Internal dissensions broke out, and Richard, in league with a few crafty followers, soon had the best and foremost men outside of the pale of the colony, through devices of which only a man versed in the methods of legal craftiness, and of the calibre of Richard Roe, was capable.

Certain events transpiring in the country where Richard dwelt struck a deathblow at secret societies of a revolutionary character, and the advocates of industrial and social reform concluded that truth had better be told to the world in the broad open light of the day; let the consequences to the individual for telling it be faced bravely. Of course individuals of the character of Richard Roe could not flourish long under these changed conditions. The transparent impracticability of all his ill-digested propositions made his leadership impossible, and he was on the eve of falling into oblivion, when suddenly a brilliant star on the horizon of industrial and social reform brought new light and hope to despondent souls and rallied the reformers of all shades and opinions to bathe in its luminous rays.

A "wonderful book" had outlined a perfect system of industrial co-operation, had shown a clearer way to a civilization which had long been the dream of the poets, the desire of philosophers, and the hope of the multitude. To carry out the plans laid down in this book, associations sprung up like the flowers in springtime. Everybody who had any heart for the welfare of his fellow-men became an enthusiastic worker. And Richard, gaining new life with the general rejoicing, at once constituted himself anew a leader. But the days of bombast were gone; good, earnest, and sincere workers were wanted; honesty and sincerity and unselfish devotion were needed in a time like this, and Richard, finding suspicion thrown upon him on account of his previous career, soon joined the ranks of the deservedly forgotten.

I have thus outlined a character unique among men; an individual who, possessed of certain personal habits which would make sensitive persons shrink from him, yet had a magnetic attraction that few for a time could resist. As an orator he would raise his audience to the highest pitch of excitement, and by the very force of his apparent earnestness he had many devoted followers. And though it was impossible to bind any really thoughtful person to him for any length of time, yet he was always able to replace the loss of an old friend by the advent of a new one. He was a man, too, who, notwithstanding his many bad qualities, did some good and lasting work, and many a trades guild owed its existence to his splendid organizing talent. His main force lay in appealing to the sympathies of the people before him, and posing as a martyr to the cause he espoused; and he would shrink from no falsehood whatever to accomplish his objects, to make a living without hard labor, and gain prominence among his fellows. Thus he never blushed in stating that he had sunk $10,000 of his own private fortune in the publication of "The Banner," when in fact he was a penniless outcast from old associations at the time he entered on its publication.

I have given this sketch to show how brilliant parasites fasten themselves upon associations and do the progress of reform movements incalculable injury. If it will convey a lesson I have accomplished my object. C. F. BURGMAN.

IS MEDIUMSHIP CRIMINAL AND FRAUDULENT?

The Spiritual Instructor, published monthly at Grand Rapids, Mich., by Walter E. Reid, brings information of the fact that its editor has been indicted by a grand jury of the United States court on the ground that in proposing to get communications from the spirit world in answer to sealed letters he was offending against the mail laws which make it unlawful to use the mails in any scheme to defraud. The Spiritualists of Grand Rapids have appointed a Defense Committee to invite means to make a good defense, for this committee announces that "Spiritualism and mediumship are on trial," and they regard it as a species of religious persecution, or an attempt of the dominant orthodox church creeds, now represented largely in the highest offices of the United States, to crush the faith and practices of a minor religion. The secretary and treasurer of this committee is Mr. L. H. Austin, 31 Huron street, Grand Rapids, to whom we have already sent our contribution to help pay attorney's fees, witnesses' expenses, etc., not because we have any care for Spiritualism or any use for mediumship, but because we have already seen too much abuse of Comstockian mail laws, and because we fully endorse the resolution of the last congress of the American Secular Union, to wit:

Resolved. That we strenuously oppose the perversion of the state's penal laws by tyrannical and bigoted officials belonging to dominant religious sects, to destroy their critics and religious opponents, as such action is conspicuously illustrated in the prosecutions directed against Messrs. Harman & Walker, of Valley Falls, Kan., and W. E. Reid, of Grand Rapids, Mich.—that both these cases bear evidence of being the results of personal animosities and contemptible religious antipathies, which make it a disgrace for the state to lend its powers to the use of the church.

The attorney for the defense has already made an ineffectual attempt to have the indictment quashed on the ground that the indictment charges the defendant with acts which are necessary for the exercise and enjoyment of his religious belief, that no trial can be had without making the truth or falsity of Spiritualism material to the issue, and that this sort of interference with religious beliefs and functions is unconstitutional. In sustaining the indictment and holding Reid for trial the judge admitted that if "respondent believed he could do what he said he could, he was innocent; but if he practiced the device knowing it to be fraudulent, then he was guilty," and this delicate point the judge proposes to leave for the decision of a jury. The trial is set down for Nov. 22. Of this case the New York World, democratic, has said, "We are inclined to agree with Dr. Reid in his opinion that individual liberty has been attacked in his person." Those who accept this view, and who stand ready to take offense at the first invasions of liberty, would do well to keep track of this case by subscribing to Dr. Reid's paper, and exhibit the extent of their yearning love of liberty by subscribing to the defense fund.

From the standpoint of physiology and psychology there is much of interest in the subject of "mediumship" which we cannot here present further than to say that "double consciousness" is now recognized, or states in which verily the right hand knoweth not what the left hand doeth, and one hand may write unknown to the predominant consciousness of the individual. The subject has been considerably explained in recent numbers of a radical, scientific weekly of Chicago, The Open Court, and we have no doubt that the expounder of such curious phases of activity of the human brain could readily show that many a person might, on scientifically understood grounds, believe himself possessed of "mediumistic powers." The United States government not long ago exhibited its barbarous lack of scientific advancement by executing on the gallows a man better fitted for a lunatic asylum; and it may appear in this case that the government is committing a medico-legal blunder by trying as a criminal a man with a freak-brain, perhaps unusually endowed, possibly warped; but knowing, as we do, that the prosecution is the outcome of petty jealousies and quarrels among the Spiritualists themselves on the one hand, and the old spirit of religious persecution and intolerance on the other; it looks as though the court of Uncle Sam were being debased to the promotion of undignified as well as unconstitutional purposes.—Health Monthly.

JUDICIAL OATHS.

I.

A judicial oath may be defined as a solemn promise to tell the truth, made in judicial proceedings, and punishable with the pains and penalties of perjury.

Burrill (2 Law Dictionary, p. 163) says: "An oath, considered with reference to its words, consists of two parts: A declaration of what the party will do, or a declaration in reference to what he has done; and an appeal to the deity by way of attestation or confirmation of it; the latter being expressed by the concluding clause, 'So help you, God,' or 'So help me, God!' In this appeal the force and essence of the oath consists."

He considered the words, "So help me, God!" of the essence of the oath; and according to his views an oath which omitted this form was not an invocation to God to attest the truth of the testimony of the witness.

Michaelis, a writer of the seventeenth century, says: "An oath is an appeal to God as a surety, and a punisher of perjury: which appeal as he has accepted, he of course becomes bound to vindicate upon a perjured person irremissibly. Were not God to take upon himself to guaranty oaths, an appeal to him in swearing would be foolish and sinful."

An oath, then, where the swearer does not appeal to God, where he has no faith in his power to guaranty the truth of the testimony, is unreasonable, and derives its force only from human laws. Prior to the date Michaelis wrote, the church had its own courts, claimed jurisdiction of the morals of the people and of perjury, to the exclusion of the civil power; and its priesthood claimed to represent the deity and curse in his name all who offended the church or profaned its ceremonies. They made the oath an appeal to God, and made its administration imposing and solemn by religious ceremonies. Michaelis's definition is based on the canons of the church.

Starkie (Starkie on Evidence, 80) says: "A judicial oath may be defined to be a solemn invocation of the vengeance of the deity upon the witness if he does not declare the whole truth as far as he knows it." This is in accordance with ecclesiastical ideas.

Bouvier (3 Institutes, 443) defines an oath to be "a declaration or promise made according to law, before a competent authority, to tell the truth; or it is the act of one who, when lawfully required to tell the truth, takes God to witness that what he says is true." This recognizes the secular oath, and the ecclesiastical oath; or, as stated by some writers, the promissory oath, and the imprecatory oath. He adds: "In an oath two things may be observed, (1) An invocation by which we take as witness the God of Truth who knows all things; and (2) the imprecation by which we ask him as just and almighty to avenge our perjury."

This definition is based on the idea of a direct miraculous interposition of God. It may be called the Christian theory of the oath. This theory, that God takes note of every witness and is ready to strike him down with vengeance if he swears falsely, has not been universally received by mankind, nor by civilized nations who had made progress in the arts, sciences, and philosophy.

In China, about 1000 B.C., judges were instructed in criminal cases, "Say not that heaven is unjust—it is man that brings these evils upon himself. If it were not that heaven inflicts these severe punishments the world would be ungoverned." In strict compliance with this philosophy,* in the modern jurisprudence of China, there is no allusion to any evidence save that of facts substantiated by witnesses, and even oaths are neither required nor admitted in judicial proceedings.†

"Dr. S. Wells Williams says that in the consular courts of China no effort is made to exact an oath, but the witnesses are simply warned that if they give false testimony they are liable to punishment for lying.

"To settle a dispute among themselves they often resort to a temple wherein there is one of their national gods, and cut off a cock's head, smash a plate or make some other sign, as a token of what they wish to happen to themselves in case they do not do what is promised, or are guilty of the charge. This cannot be done in their own courts where there are no idols. . . . The witnesses in a native court, in general, give as fair an account of a transaction as they give in their common intercourse with each other. By experience they have learned that, in order to get along in life, a certain amount of truth is necessary. Few or none of them expect that an invocation, or an oath, to or before an idol, would have much weight or carry a conviction to make a man speak the truth, when otherwise he would lie. The ceremony of killing a cock is rather an imprecation of like punishment to himself than a call on a spiritual being who knows the heart, and whom he fears, to attest the truth of what he says. Consequently, such ceremonies are not general, for they do not carry much weight. The experience of consular courts in China is favorable to the general credibility of the testimony."*

*"Virtue in its grandest aspect is neither more nor less than following reason."—Lao Tsze, seventh century B.C.

†Stanton's Penal Code of China, p. 364.

The Hellenic nations outgrew the superstition which recognized the ordeal as the proper mode of determining the truth, and upon the principle that a miracle would not be wrought to attest the truth, they did not require an imprecatory oath; and where the person testifying was a man of good character, the judges had the power to dispense with the oath. This was done in the case of Zenocrates.†

The Essenes, like the Greeks, held that men pure in character need not be sworn, and regarded the direction of Christ, "Swear not at all," as absolute law. John the Baptist and Christ himself are believed to have belonged to this sect of the Jews, and this text is doubtless derived from the "Sabæan Book of the Law," which was written before the time of Christ, and says, "Adhere so firmly to the truth that your Yea shall be yea, and your Nay, nay."‡

Numa is said to have established among the Romans as their most binding pledge of truth an oath by the goddess Fides. An ancient form of the oath is, "I promise," or "I speak the truth from the thoughts of my heart"—"from my conscience"—a purely promissory oath.

The history of the actual practice of the Roman courts is fragmentary so far as relates to the period prior to the formation of the codes under the empire. The Twelve Tables contained the oldest part of the Roman criminal law. Fragments only remain. The Eighth Table, as reconstructed by Ortolan, provides:

"XXII. Any person who having been a witness in any business or contract afterwards refuses to give his evidence, becomes infamous and incapable of making a will.

"XXIII. Whoever gives false evidence must be thrown from the Tarpeian rock."

These provisions show that great stress was laid upon truthfulness, that refusing to testify or falsely testifying were among the gravest of crimes. Truth was essential—not the form of swearing. The penalty was not in the next world, but the brand of infamy or swift death in this life. As, however, the courts regulated their own practice and created their own law, the mode of examining witnesses was within their own control. Their decisions, legislative enactments, and the decrees of the emperors, produced a body of law afterwards codified in the Theodosian code and the Pandects. The text of these prior laws has not been fully preserved.

The Digest, or Pandects, is not a complete collection of the decisions, speculations, and transformations of the Roman law, but a collection and attempt to harmonize the conclusions that continued to be authoritative towards the middle of the sixth century, when Christian influence molded the principles of jurisprudence and the practice of the courts. Christian councils had then fixed the canon of the Old and New Testaments, and defined the creed of the church. Heresies were defined, and heretics compelled to recant or die. The miraculous, the supernatural in religion, was sustained by the sword of the Christian emperors as the true faith of the church, and there is no doubt that the treasures of law perished in the same flames that swept away pagan literature and the heretical works of the early Christian writers.—(To be Continued.)

TO THE LIBERALS OF CALIFORNIA.

All who are in favor of the total separation of church and state; of the American Republic founded upon the Declaration of Independence; of equal rights and impartial liberty, are cordially invited to meet in Convention at San Francisco on Saturday and Sunday, January 25 and 26, 1890, at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, for the purpose of discussing the issues forced upon the people by ecclesiastical encroachments, and preparing measures for the establishment of a purely Secular government in the state of California, and throughout the nation.

The main question which is now presented to the Liberals of California, and which demands, on their part, persistent and united action, is the Sabbath question. "At a recent meeting of the American Sabbath Association of California it was resolved to proceed at once with a vigorous and well-directed campaign to restore, by state legislation, the weekly day of rest to its proper position." This is the declaration of the ecclesiastical party. The California Liberal Union is opposed to any Sabbath legislation, and the purpose of its Convention is to arouse the people to the threatened danger and, by the force of an enlightened public opinion, to guard against the passage of any laws by the state legislature for the enforcement of the Sunday as a Sabbath.

All Liberals of other states who are visiting San Francisco at the time are cordially invited to be present; and will be welcomed as members of the Convention if they so desire.

There is no creed, no religious belief or non-religious belief in the platform of the Liberal Union. It stands simply and solely for human rights irrespective of creeds, and it expects the co-operation of every American, without regard to belief or non-belief.

CATHOLIC TOLERANCE.

From Point Pleasant, West Va., comes this interesting story of the barriers which the Catholic church puts up between its children and their free affections: "Miss Minnie Offenheimer, the beautiful daughter of a wealthy Catholic citizen of Mason City, fell in love with Mr. Ed Shoemaker, a young Protestant business man. They became engaged. Miss Offenheimer's parents objected to Shoemaker's religion. She refused to give him up, and her parents locked her in her room, where she was half starved and cruelly beaten every day for weeks. Neighbors heard her cries and finally interfered, only to find that the girl's sufferings had driven her insane." We suppose the mother church will console the parents of Miss Offenheimer with the assurance that it is better that their daughter should have been driven insane through their harsh treatment than that she should be the honored wife of a Protestant. And yet Catholics complain of the intolerant spirit of the Protestant majority in the United States.—America.

PROFESSOR SEYMOUR, just in from the Trail, had a full house last Sunday evening to hear his famous lecture, "Love and Marriage; or Nature's Method of Doing Things." The sham Mormon wedding at the end of the lecture took the house down for its novelty. Next Sunday evening at 909½ Market street, at 8, Mr. Seymour will speak on the redemption of the race, by scientific mating of the sexes and hereditary law. Admission free; also clairvoyant and psychometric readings of character, giving incidents in the past and future of persons in the audience. This is said to be very interesting and amusing; also the same during the week at 841 Market street, room 22. Call and see him.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened. JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth." J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

[From the Washington National View.]

Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, New Jersey offers his valuable services to all those in need of a kind, sympathetic and skillful physician. Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been assailed and exposed by the press, but, Dr. Fellows, a specialist, in his line, stands foremost in his profession, and the encomiums showered upon him publicly as well as in private, are flattering evidences of the high appreciation and confidence his long and conscientious devotion to his specialties in his profession have so justly merited for him, and it is safe to trust him.

A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1888.
DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: The remedy you sent is working like a charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. Have only been using it one week, and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right.
Yours respectfully,
J. R.

REMARKS—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, but who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out and out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future

Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously written. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

"Let Me Alone!"

"Let me alone," the Christian cries,
Like a child in fear of pain.
He thinks the past forgotten—
The millions that were slain
Or flayed by inquisition
Behind the dungeon wall;
For doubting-truth's of Bible
The church condemned them all.

Condemned them all to torture,
Or burning at the stake,
And killed enough in battle
Whose blood would form a lake
Full large enough to float on
St. Noah's ark of old,
And deep enough to drown in
All lies the bible's told.

But now he cries, "Let me alone!"
Against him his God has turned.
We fear no inquisition,
The last martyr has been burned.
We are ready now for battle,
With reason and Freethought,
Against creeds and superstition
The Christian church has wrought.

So rally round the flag now;
Let reason be your guide;
From science, truth, and justice
Christianity will hide.
Then build your halls of Freethought,
Make truth your corner-stone,
And not until you've gained your rights
Let the Christian church alone.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and understand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

NEWS AND NOTES.

Hanford and Lemoore are in the beautiful Lucerne valley, so named because of its resemblance to the Lucerne district of Switzerland. King's river, Tulare lake, and the Coast Range and Sierra mountains form the picturesque scenery of this fruitful place. It contains an area of six hundred square miles, and has a population of about four thousand. Its main productions are grains, fruits, stock, and alfalfa. It is the home of the rose, which blooms all the year round. Along the river courses are groves of giant oak. Tulare lake is the largest body of fresh water in California. The county is the sixth in size, in the state, having a greater area than Rhode Island, Delaware, or Connecticut. It is claimed to be the banner county in the production of wheat. For barley it is equally good, and corn has been successfully raised. The average rainfall in Lucerne valley is about six inches. The system of irrigation is excellent. The source of water supply is the rainfall and snow in the Sierra Nevada mountains. This finds its way to Lucerne by Kings, Kaweah, and Tule rivers. There is also an important supply from artesian wells, of which there are quite a number in what is called the artesian belt. The climate is healthful and bright. The sunshine is golden, and winter rejoices in the splendor of summer. It is claimed that there are no sunstrokes, no cyclones, and no blizzards in this locality. The prosperity and wealth of the country are simply a matter of time.

I did not get to Hanford, however, without some difficulty. The way to an earthly paradise is sometimes as disappointing as the way to a heavenly paradise, and we are never sure until we get there. The express train from San Francisco stopped two hours at Lathrop for the eastern passengers, via Sacramento, and this delay brought me to Hanford somewhere about ten o'clock at night, and this was too late for any lecture that evening. It was a disappointment to a large number who came quite a distance from the surrounding country to attend. I have no doubt, however, that the Christians were highly delighted, for they were running a revival at this time, and if the Infidel lecturer was not on hand they would have a better chance for recruits to the army of the Lord. However, there was plenty of chance for work on our side, and the lectures were given on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday evenings, and to full houses. The audiences, too, were representative of the culture and intelligence of the place, although, with proverbial Christian charity, the preacher declared that only "saloon bummers" would be present, "so drunk that they wouldn't know enough to take off their hats." A desperate effort was made to prolong the interest in the revival. About a dozen, mostly children, were baptized each night, and on Saturday flaming red posters were plastered over the city announcing for that evening the soul-thrilling theme, "Prisoners of Hope, and Prisoners of Despair." The attendance at the lectures, however, constantly increased, and on Saturday night there was only standing room, and I could not find more appreciative listeners. Hanford is indeed permeated with a splendid Liberal element. Many of those in the churches find themselves in harmony with Liberal ideas. This shows the unconscious growth of humanity, and that the drift is onward. The pronounced Liberals of Hanford are most intelligent and constructive. There is not the unbelief of negation, but of affirmative advance. I was pleased with the people I met here—so earnest and cultivated. I found a cheerful atmosphere of thought and I see large possibilities in the growth of this city, although there are five churches here, and the baptismal font is lively. Orthodoxy has lost its grip. Even one of the clergymen declares that hell-fire is a myth and that the Bible does not make religion, but religion makes the Bible, which is a dead give away to the supernatural claims of Christianity. If the clergy are so wise in their generation what shall we say of the Liberal?

The day after my arrival was simply lovely. There was no need of any fire. The skies were balmy, softly blue, with stretches of great white clouds, lustrous in the brilliant dome. The grass was green, like the June green of New England. The flowers were in bloom. No wonder the people of this land expect to make it the garden of the world. Eve might eat the apple here and still she would dwell in paradise. There is no banishment, no flaming sword in this flowery kingdom, where days of blue and gold go marching on, with the soul of music and joy in their exhilarating breath. Not all the days are blue and gold, I admit. The skies will lower in spite of our prayers, and the prayers of the Christians superadded, and the rain will fall, and the mud will stick to the wandering feet, but when the sun does shine forth, the glorious landscapes, the broad plains sweeping to the snowy heights, make a resplendent palace in the pathway of the storms, built as if by magic.

I find my home at the Commercial House, formerly the Lucerne, and this is kept in apple-pie order, for the landlord is a landlady, and the genius of woman prevails, and, therefore, there is comfort for the traveler, especially a good square meal.

The company is varied and cordial, some Liberal, some Christian, but all in pleasant spirit, in the interchange of thought.

When the passenger alights at Hanford, he will find the Commercial a comfortable location.

Right at the corner is the gallery of my friend, H. C. Tandy; and here the hours go happily by, while the faces look kindly from the walls, among them the genial countenance, life-like, of Dr. Moore, my platonic companion, of Lemoore, who has solved the problem of the universe with such comprehensive scope, and made it the dwelling-place of the beautiful that never dies. My friend Tandy takes pictures, among them my own, with lightning-like rapidity, but he gives no "counterfeit presentment" of himself, but stands before the world an uncompromising Free-thinker; and a worker too, for by his strenuous services Free-thought has made itself felt, and the lectures by Mr. Underwood and myself are the result of his enthusiastic labors. His heart is in the cause. Like attracts like, and in this artist-laboratory of his, congenial minds give thought and life to the winged hours. A. D. Wolff, the schoolmaster, discourses of Darwin and evolution with the insight of a genuine scholar, and O. B. Phelps, whose father is one of the veterans of Silverton, makes the rafters ring with the jolly laugh of the heretic who can no longer be burned at the stake for his honest thought. Fred Dodge and George Dodge don't hesitate to join the Liberal Club, and say their say without any fear of the orthodox club, and Dr. N. P. Duncan, who delivers his radical ideas as quietly as the deacon would say his prayers, but with a thousand times more effect—a lover, the doctor is, of what may be, as well as a student of what is, and who extends the line of logic into dreamland; A. F. Jewett, who is always in the front rank, the color-sergeant, a head taller than the rest, he bears the standard on; A. L. Gates, in whom philosophy needs no "regeneration," for it discovers no "miracle;" C. C. Curtis and Mrs. Curtis; Ira Chrisman, who must know "that the mills of the gods grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small;" J. O. Hickman, who delights to take the opposite view, especially when the clergymen are about, and others, formed a charming and changing circle of intellectual force. J. H. Malone, Dr. R. W. Musgrave, L. Cohn, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Ford, and Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Brown, of Porterville, visiting with them. Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Jenkinson, Henry Boice, F. E. Welsh and family, Ed. Weisbaum, etc., also generously aided the cause, and are not afraid to be counted. I had the pleasure of breaking bread with Dr. Mickle and Mrs. Mickle, who are from the sunny south. The doctor is a sturdy radical. Mrs. Mickle has always thought she was a Christian, but she attended the three lectures, and if she does not give up the old, she is certainly ready to welcome the new in the spirit of humanity. Thus I have delightful memories of my sojourn in this Switzerland of California, where the rain mingled with the sunshine day by day, but refrained from pouring down during the lecture hours; and "between spells" the campaign went on successfully, and a greater number were present at each lecture than at the revival.

Alas! Sunday morning was lowery, and it looked gloomy for the lectures at Lemoore. Frank B. Fox came up for me, and while the mists were falling, and the far horizon was glittering with a little sunshine, the good steed took us along the valley where the harvests were being stored up, for the June days, by the million quivering drops. We come to the little house around the corner where resides our veteran of the anti-slavery days, a soldier of humanity every inch, Joel A. Fox and his wife, Sarah G. Fox, who sometimes writes for the Truth Seeker, and I hope will sometimes write for FREETHOUGHT, and tell how the cause goes on.

The moment I got out of the rain into the rocking-chair in the corner by the stove, where the fire was blazing, I was at home, for the welcome was as cordial as heart could wish. The rain kept pouring down, the horizon darkened, and there was no hope of sunshine that day. However, a good audience was present, the hall was nearly full, and among them were two preachers, and I thought that my discourse on "Universal Mental Liberty" would not be altogether in vain if I could set them to thinking. One of them was a cowboy preacher, converted in the wilds of Texas, and I believe he has some sense, for in spite of the exhortation of the elder clergyman not to do it he did do it; that is, he came up and shook hands with me and said he liked the discourse. Evidently he is not much bound by the creed. A good audience was also present in the evening. To my delight, Mr. B. K. Sweetland and Lynn Fox furnished music for the occasion, which was quite an attraction and helped to make us forget the gloomy weather. I don't know of any place that is more deeply penetrated with Freethought than Lemoore. Many of our friends here are Spiritualists, but they are thoroughly progressive and intellectual. Mr. and Mrs. Fox have had many remarkable experiences, and in view of them, all I can say is "I don't know," and in the mean time we will join hands and do the most good where we are.

I was sorry not to see Dr. Moore and his wife. She, at present, is not well, and the doctor was obliged to remain with her and not attend the lectures. Our deepest sympathy extends to these good and true friends. I hope that the blessings of health and strength will keep our friends long with us in the glorious work of life and progress here.

Captain Nelson says he is coming to San Francisco. He shall have a royal welcome at FREETHOUGHT headquarters.

I was glad to see again my good old friend, Dr. Morse. Age does not dim his devotion to Freethought. Dr. Hamlin, A. S. Cunningham, and W. S. Cunningham, always loaded to the brim with Freethought ammunition; Samuel Kipp, W. M. Gill, of the Lemoore Leader, P. Hollenbeck, and many others, I was pleased to see. The movement is going onward in Lemoore. The time is coming for an organization, both here and at Hanford, and without doubt this beautiful valley will be a home for Liberalism. Here the harvests will grow, the harvests of humanity mingling with the radiant wealth of earth. This is indeed one of the brightest spots in California. The scenery is picturesque, broad, and inspiring. The distant ranges, glittering with eternal snow, a hundred peaks rising to the blue sky, give health and wealth to these fruitful scenes.

I must not forget to say that I met McCord at Hanford, who has a ranch of sixteen hundred acres about nine miles from Hanford, towards the lake. He is as ready to tackle orthodoxy as ever, but he deals his blows in such a deft way that even the clergy don't know how hard they are hit, and shake him by the hand and call him "brother."

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

WHY INDEED?

Concerning Mrs. Woodworth, the magnetic revivalist now bringing weak-minded sinners to their knees in Oakland, a correspondent in Turlock says:

"A writer in the Daily Report objects to the craze which Mrs. Woodworth is seeking to spread in Oakland, and says, 'It is a wonder they are not rotten-egged, or driven out of Oakland in some rational way.'

"Mrs. Woodworth is only doing what Protestant ministers are everywhere trying to do, especially at revivals and campmeetings—to make converts. A revivalist at this place lately declared, in the church, that if he had the power he would drag, or even starve, every sinner into the church. Not long since a prominent citizen of the pious little town of Modesto was sent to the insane asylum, crazed by religion. He was discharged, but finally hung himself in his barn. Since then, another religious crank has been sent to the asylum from Oakdale.

"If Mrs. Woodworth is to be egged, why not others of the same stripe?"
"J. C. P."

It is indeed a question why Mrs. Woodworth should be singled out for special treatment with eggs. She professes to be preaching the Christian gospel and to be working through the power of God. The only difference between her and the other sensational preachers consists in the fact that she is more successful than the majority of them. If Mrs. Woodworth is honest she is not to be blamed, and while she is the immediate cause of lunacy in some cases, she is as much the victim of delusion as those whose minds she unsettles. The persons really responsible for the evil are the intelligent and sane clergymen who preach the Christian religion, of whose doctrines Mrs. Woodworth and her gibbering converts are the natural results.

S. P. PUTNAM TO LECTURE IN LOS ANGELES.

Samuel P. Putnam will lecture at Illinois Hall, corner of Sixth and Fort streets, Los Angeles, on Sunday evening, December 29; subject, "The Bible and Modern Thought." Every Liberal in Los Angeles and vicinity is invited to be present and to bring friends. A large attendance is desired.

A MUDDLED THEOLOGIAN.

The Rev. L. M. Schofield, a Presbyterian clergyman of San Francisco, undertook last Sunday the task of proving by reasoning and by court decisions that the United States is a Christian nation. "One of the most vital questions of the day," said he, "is, Is this a Christian or a Protestant nation, or is it a secular one? The question is variously answered, and answered positively in the true American style by people who have scarcely read a page of our history intelligently, and by people who are utterly ignorant of the very words. Some answer that it is no more a Protestant than a Catholic or a Jewish government. If they mean it is not denominational and has no union of church and state, I agree with them, but if the claim is made that all faiths and no faith are on an equality save only in regard to the freedom of profession, the dogma is absurd."

The Rev. Mr. Schofield is pretty badly mixed, if he is correctly reported. It is not the unintelligent or those unacquainted with the history of the United States who deny that it is a Christian nation. A document more than one hundred years old, signed by the man who is called the father of his country, declared that the nation was not Christian. In matters of this kind the decision of George Washington should be rated as high as that of some politician who may have decided that the laws of the Protestant church are the common law of the land.

But the Rev. Mr. Schofield should explain how a nation can be either Christian or Infidel. "Nation," as the word is now employed, is the collective name of a people living under one government. It is not a person, capable of enjoying baptism, regeneration, salvation, and a future state of rewards or punishment. A nation can no more have religion than it can have the rheumatism. The people may have it, but the nation lacks the necessary bodily parts for the disease to subsist upon; and in the same manner it is destitute of the organs exercised by religious emotions. A Christian is supposed to go to heaven. Does the Rev. Dr. Schofield think that the United States will go there and be immortal? If the Christian zealots could only get their vision clear, they would see that religion must be a matter of belief and not of politics, and that in seeking state support for Christianity, they virtually acknowledge that their religion is too weak to stand alone, and cannot exist on its own merits.

WORK IMMEDIATELY BEFORE US.

If there is to be a successful convention and Paine celebration in this city next month, there must be immediate action on the part of officers of the state and local societies. We have taken the responsibility of securing Union Square Hall for the month of January. On Sunday evening, the 5th, S. P. Putnam will lecture in the small hall; on the following Sunday evening some other speaker will occupy the platform, and on the 19th Mr. Putnam will speak again. It is arranged to have a State Convention in the large hall on Saturday and Sunday, the 25th and 26th, and a Paine celebration on the evening of Wednesday, the 29th.

The object of the preliminary meetings previous to the convention is to set the ball rolling and awaken interest. Mr. Putnam proposes, for this purpose, to give his month's work without money and without price. He desires to lay before his listeners the exact state of affairs as regards ecclesiastical encroachments, and the attitude of the church towards liberty, so that a definite notion may be gained of the nature of the work to be done.

Mr. Putnam's first lecture will be a review of the late Catholic convention at Baltimore. That convention was in some respects the most significant gathering of the kind ever held, as it outlined the aims of the church and gave the people of the country some idea of the growth and power and objects of Rome in America. The American Secular Union and its auxiliaries are the only organized bodies in the country working for total separation of church and state, and against both Catholic and Protestant schemes for religious domination. There seem to be but few people in America who realize the value of secular work, and it is therefore all the more important that these few should be continually active. With the Roman hierarchy gaining ground swiftly and surely, and with the National Reform Association reaching out through its organizations in every direction to lay the state under tribute to the church, it would seem that the imperative necessity of secular effort must impress itself upon all who care for the preservation of religious liberty.

What we must do, then, is this. We must turn out in large numbers at the preliminary meeting of January 5. Members of the San Francisco Freethought Society should be there in full force prepared to renew their allegiance and subscriptions to the work of the society. They should come prepared for business; hold a business meeting, appoint committees to arrange for the convention and the Paine celebration, and for other details.

We hope that every Californian reader may be able to think of something he can do to make the new year's work open auspiciously. The burden of preparation must be divided. If every one leaves the work for somebody else to do, it will not be done; but if, on the other hand, everyone makes a determination to do something, a great deal of effective work may be accomplished.

The hall rent will amount to $80, and other expenses will take more. If all interested will contribute to this fund, the individual burden will be light and the result large.

The foregoing suggestions are here thrown out unofficially for the consideration of Californian Liberals. The officers of the State Union are S. P. Putnam, president; Emil S. Lemme, secretary, 504 Kearny street, San Francisco and A. H. Schou, treasurer, 677 Twenty-fifth street, Oakland. Communicate with these officers. Send suggestions, subscriptions, and counsel. Give the union the vitality that comes from unity and association, and a successful convention and Paine celebration are assured.

THE Mormons are about as plausible hypocrites as their Catholic brethren. Wilford Woodruff, Geo. Q. Cannon, and Joseph F. Smith, apostles of the Mormon church, have issued another manifesto unqualifiedly denying all the charges made against the church in the recent hearing before Judge Anderson. So far from any doctrine or teaching of the church being hostile to the United States government, they say, the members of the church are under divine command to revere the Constitution as a heaven-inspired instrument, and obey as supreme all laws made in pursuance of its provisions. If the Mormons were allowed to judge for themselves what laws are in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution, no doubt their plea would be sound. The trouble arises from their inability to agree with the federal judges in construing that instrument.

IN attempting to reconcile the facts of science with the claims of religion, the Very Rev. Joseph Sasia, head of the Jesuit order in California, said in a recent discourse that "the conflict between science and religion is only apparent and not real. Science treats of the natural world, which is God's work; religion treats of the truths of divine revelation, which is God's word." This is equivalent to an admission that in religion there need not necessarily be any of that harmony between word and fact which constitutes truth, or that the subjective order of thought need not of necessity correspond with the objective order of phenomena. Bearing in mind this distinction between natural and revealed truth, the Rev. Father Sasia could not consistently ask us to prove our position if we pronounced him a humbug and a fraud.

SAID ex-President Cleveland in a late public address: "We need not stifle our scorn and contempt for the wretch who basely sells his vote, and who for a bribe betrays his trust of citizenship. And yet the thought will intrude itself, that he but follows in a low and vulgar fashion the example of those who proceed upon the theory that political action may be turned to private gain." It is well to keep this matter before the people; and to apply the philosophy of the above remark, let us inquire why John Doe, who sells his vote for two dollars, is not as honest as John Wanamaker, who in return for raising a four hundred thousand dollar campaign fund was rewarded with the position of post-master-general, which position he now uses in the interests of himself and his religion.

THE ministers of Minneapolis are making war upon the Sunday newspaper and are signing an agreement which reads as follows: "We pledge ourselves to withhold all patronage from the Sunday newspaper, both in the matter of subscription and advertisement, and to persuade our people, in so far as possible, to take the same position. We do this believing that the Sunday newspaper is the head and front of all offending." We do not believe the Minneapolis ministers have the slightest hope that they can stop the publication of Sunday papers. The movement is simply an advertising dodge on the part of the clergy. They must do something to call attention to themselves or they would be forgotten.

FREETHOUGHT has received from Mr. M. S. Wahrhaftig, of Esperanza, Tulare county, a long review of his relations with B. G. Haskell. It would cover two or three pages of the paper, and we hardly think that the interest felt by our readers in Mr. Haskell would warrant its publication. Mr. Wahrhaftig's estimate of Haskell is substantially identical with Mr. Burgman's, already published. FREETHOUGHT has made no attack upon Mr. Haskell, nor any statement concerning him that has been denied or needs to be proven. With the writer's consent, Mr. Wahrhaftig's manuscript may be turned over to Mr. Haskell for such action as he chooses to take. It was written in response to a "bluff" published in this paper October the 25th.

THE death of Dr. Oliver Johnson, which occurred at Brooklyn, N. Y., December 10, removes a prominent figure from the list of leaders in the abolition movement. Dr. Johnson differed from the majority of his co-laborers in matters of religion, that is to say, he lived and died in the narrowness of the orthodox faith. He leaves but few survivors among those who worked with him. Among these are Parker Pillsbury and Lucy N. Colman in the East, and on this coast the Hon. John A. Collins, of San Francisco, and Judge J. W. Forth, of Fresno. There may be others, but the past decade has witnessed the death of many of the old heroes of Antislavery.

MR. FRED EMERSON BROOKS, the well-known poet, has called to inform us that he is the author of the lines published in last week's FREETHOUGHT under the heading of "The Two Knights." It is a work that any poet might be proud of, and we are not surprised that Mr. Brooks should object to losing the credit of writing it.

SOME of the spirit of Calvin still exists in Geneva. A member of the Salvation Army was lately fined $25 for infringing a decree by which he had been expelled from Switzerland.

THE FREETHOUGHT BROTHERHOOD.

We give a few out of the many letters received since our last from friends who desire shares in the Freethought Publishing Company. Between 700 and 800 shares have now been taken.

OREGON CITY, OR., Dec. 7, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: I received your letter. Times are hard, but put me down for five dollars for one share. GEO. JOHNSON.

FORT BRAGG, Nov. 28, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: Your circular letter of the 17th inst. is at hand, in reply to which I will say that you can depend upon me for one and maybe two shares of your enterprise, and I regret very much that I am not able to take more. Call on me for one share whenever you are ready and I will forward the price. Wishing you every success in your enterprise and cause, I am very respectfully yours, JOHN PILGER.

CALEB, OR., Dec. 3, 1889.

GENTLEMEN: Your favor of Nov. 17, informing me of your intention to organize a FREETHOUGHT PUBLISHING COMPANY, arrived by yesterday's mail. Thanks. Kind friends, I consider this a good move, and in the right direction. A good FREETHOUGHT bookstore is a necessity and we must have it. Your servant is willing to take a few shares in this enterprise, and hopes every Liberal on the entire coast will do the same. I am happy to note that Freethought is gaining ground very rapidly and I have the greatest hopes for its future. If I thought there was any virtue in prayer, I would pray long and fervently for the success of FREETHOUGHT. But while there is no virtue in prayer, I am positive there is lots of virtue in a few dollars. So you will find inclosed a five dollar bill, which you will please place to my credit and forward me the inclosed list of books. Hoping that by making this order and renewing my subscription, I am helping the interest of Freethought, and wishing you the best of success, and agreeing to take five shares in the Publishing Company, I remain, Yours for U. M. L., WILLIS L. PENCE.

FRESNO, CAL., Dec. 2, 1889.

DEAR FRIENDS: After being broke and sick for two years, I have recovered some of my health and spunk, and getting disgusted trying for several days to find one that would take a share in Freethought Publishing Company, and failing, was raised to such a pitch as to up and take one all by myself, and here is the money. There are a dozen good talking Liberals that are more able to take a hundred than I am to take one, right here in Fresno. I have only made thirty dollars this year, but I am in hope to make more now, and I will take one share for every $30 that I earn, until you have them all taken, and I hope you will find no difficulty in getting five thousand shares taken this month.
Your everlasting friend, JOSEPH LEE.

PLAZA, WASH., Nov. 28, 1889.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM: The plan you think of adopting in regard to FREETHOUGHT, I think is an admirable one. My heart is with the cause and I hope to take at least four five dollar shares. We have built a nice school house at Plaza in which I hope to hear you lecture next summer.
ABRAM DORSEY.

ROMLEY, COLO., Dec. 30, 1889.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 17th inst., will say that you can put me down for $5 anyway. If I can spare more will let you know.
Yours truly, F. SHODL.

MORGAN CITY, UTAH., Dec. 1, 1889.

MR. S. P. PUTNAM: Dear Friend: Your letter received. In reply will say you can count on me for two shares at five dollars each, and I think my son Joseph will take some. I believe it to be a grand enterprise, and will be the means of doing a great deal of good. Money will be on hand anytime when needed. Accept kindest regards.
DANIEL WILLIAMS.

PRINEVILLE, OR., Nov. 26, 1889.

DEAR SIR: Your circular and kind letter came duly to hand last Saturday. As to the enterprise of making FREETHOUGHT a corporate concern, I think it a good one. In my judgment, it will at least insure its continued publication. I am a poor man, but you can put me down for at least one share, and if I can see my way clear, when you call on me for the money, will perhaps take two or more.
C. ROGERS.

DEEP RIVER, WASH., Dec. 6, 1889.

DEAR FRIENDS: Your circular letter of Nov. 17 is duly received. The enterprise you speak of is good. I think it will benefit Freethought and the world at large. I will take one share in the enterprise, and forward the money when it is wanted.
J. P. MILLER.

SCOTT'S MILLS, OR., Dec. 12, 1889.

DEAR SIR AND FRIENDS: I received your letter of late date, a few days since, in regard to the Freethought Publishing Company. I think it a good scheme, as the west and northwest are much in need of such a company. I will inclose $10, for which you will please send to me a certificate for two paid-up shares of stock for R. H. Scott, and oblige,
Very truly, CHAS. SCOTT.

NATIONAL CITY, CAL., Dec. 18, 1889.

MY DEAR PUTNAM: Samuel McHenry authorizes me to inform you that he will take four shares in the Freethought Publishing Company—$5 each. Draw on me for $10. Mr. McHenry will remit $20 on demand. I am agreeably surprised to see how the "boys" respond. I think your motive and aim are indorsed by the reasonable and intelligent public, therefore, why not "make ready for war in time of peace?" I trust you will not leave a stone unturned. I will hear you at San Diego, Dec. 22, as announced. If I am here I will shout and do all I can to get you out an audience.

Yours, A. N. BURGESS.

WILLAPA, WASH., Dec. 5, 1889.

FRIENDS: You are making the right move. May the new concern prosper is my best wish; and call on me, when you are ready for it, for twenty dollars.
JACOB DRISSLER.

CASCADES, WASH., Dec. 8, 1889.

FRIENDS: Your proposition to build up a Freethought Publishing Company meets my approval. You may put me down for two shares anyway, and if I happen to be pretty flush when pay day comes, I will take more.
Yours for Liberty, Reason and Truth, S. B. IVES.

GRAY'S RIVER, WASH., Dec. 8, 1889.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 17th received. J. L. Hansen will take one share and I will take two shares, and will send the money as soon as called for. P. C. Nelson also takes one share.
H. P. ANDRESEN.

LOST VALLEY, OR., Dec. 9, 1889.

MESSRS. PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Yours of November 17 to hand; will take two shares for David Hardie, two for George Hardie, two for W. M. Stewart, and five for Alex. Hardie. We think it a good plan, and hope for its success.
Yours, ALEX. HARDIE.

DEEP RIVER, OR., Dec. 9, 1889.

PUTNAM & MACDONALD: Put my name down for one share in the Freethought Publishing Company.
LEWIS OLSON.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK

The long rain is apparently to be succeeded by settled weather, clear and cool.—Dr. O'Donnell the late aspirant for the mayoralty of San Francisco, must stand trial on a charge of criminal malpractice. His case will come up after the holidays.—There were 119 deaths in this city last week against 106 for the corresponding week in 1888.—It is said that the damage by rain in San Diego will foot up $150,000.—The town of Truckee has lost three school-houses by fire in four months. The last and best, worth $5000, was burnt Dec. 16.—Karl Formes, the distinguished basso, died of pneumonia in this city last Saturday. He was a native of Germany, and was 74 years old.

Four men, Daniel Coughlin, Martin Burke, Patrick O'Sullivan, and John Kunze, were found guilty by the Cronin jury, which rendered its verdict last Monday morning. The first three were sentenced to imprisonment for life, and Kunze gets three years' imprisonment. The fifth man implicated, John F. Beggs, was acquitted.—Franklin B. Gowen, ex-president of the Reading Railroad, committed suicide at Washington last Saturday by shooting himself.—Kilrain, the pugilist who fought Sullivan in Mississippi, will have to go to jail for two months and pay a fine of $200, having been convicted of assault and battery.—Miss Caldwell, the deluded young woman who endowed the Catholic University at Washington, will marry the ruined French Prince Murat. He marries her for her money and she marries him for his title.—An anti-Catholic procession, headed by a vehicle with illuminated inscriptions of "No Popery," was dispersed last Saturday at Toronto, Can., by the police, who used their batons freely and made one arrest.—Oliver Johnson, one of the original Abolitionists, is dead.

Gladstone declines to accept an invitation to initiate the agitation looking to the establishment of a working day of eight hours. He says his time must be largely devoted to the settlement of the Irish question.—Browning, the great English poet, died in London Dec. 12, in his 77th year. He is to be buried in Westminster Abbey.—Emin Pasha, the man rescued from African wilds, and who injured his skull by a fall at Zanzibar, is rapidly improving.—Influenza is epidemic all over Europe.

OBSERVATIONS.

Lucifer, of Valley Falls, Kan., has just reprinted one of my early efforts at rhyme, and Brother Harman gives it this favorable introduction:

The following loving tribute to D. M. Bennett was written by Mr. George E. Macdonald, now one of the editors of FREETHOUGHT, in the spring after Mr. Bennett's death. It appeared in the Truth Seeker June 9, 1883. It is full of beauty and tenderness, and we gladly accede to the request of a friend to republish it.

I have changed the lines a little, and print them here. They may help to keep alive the memory of one of the bravest soldiers that ever donned the armor of Freethought:

IN MEMORY.

We journey onward, marching day by day,
We join the million-footed forward tread,
Yet memory, pausing by a wayside stone,
Dwells for a season with its heroes dead.

A single winter spread its snowy shroud,
And draped the earth since 'neath its sod we placed
The martyred form that mingles dust with dust,
And one short spring its path of verdure traced.

'Tis meet that those, unworthy though they be,
Whose shoulders bear the mantle of his years,
Should consecrate the spot where valor lies,
As holy ground made holier by tears.

'Tis ours to raise above the grave of him
A mark to grace the resting-place of worth;
To tell the story how he lived and died,
The great among the great ones of the earth.

A thankful task, this tribute to his dust;
Love's work requites us by its own accord;
And we would bless the stone that should above
His quiet grave keep lonely watch and ward.

Sleep on, then, silent sleeper, with the dead;
Thy labor here hath brought thee well-won rest.
Sweet be thy dream amid calm Greenwood's graves,
Eternal be thy memory, and blest.

While o'er thy slumbering clay a shaft we raise
To bear the story of a hero gone;
Mid storm and sun, 'neath changeless stars, and clouds,
First in our heart of hearts, sleep on, sleep on.

I suppose that when Mr. J. C. Weybright wrote the communication printed in another column and headed "Nationalism," he was under the impression that in some way he had knocked the props out from under my position as regards the new razzle-dazzle order of Socialists and let me down to the moist earth. Perhaps he is correct, though the more I read his words the less I see to convince me that I have been struck. I did not give any definition of Nationalism, religious or otherwise. I merely called attention to the fact that various religionists accepted it as a part of their religion, which I object to do myself. Religion is the relation between man and God, while Socialism deals with men's relations to one another; and if a man regards Nationalism as a religion, I would oppose his introducing it as a form of government as I would oppose Christianity. Being Secularists, we should treat Christism and Bellamism with impartiality, provided both are put forward as religions. I do not know how the movement is conducted elsewhere, but in San Francisco it is run on the principles that prevail in revival meetings. The present civilization stands for the hell from which sinners are warned to flee, and Boston in the year of grace 2000 is the heaven they are invited to seek. "Looking Backward" is the Bible, Bellamy is God, and B. G. Haskell is his prophet.

Somehow or other I cannot get rid of the notion that the quality of this world depends on the people in it, and that our governments reflect pretty accurately the elements which create them. If the whole population of the globe were good people like the majority of the Nationalists, we would have a government and a civilization of a similar character. I once heard a Liberal Club orator remark that the government of a country was represented by the hands of a clock, while the people were the works. If the clock did not indicate correct time it showed that something was the matter with the works, and nothing could be gained by tinkering with the hands. Perhaps he was right.

Perhaps the reason why governments are bad is because people are bad or ignorant. We have a robber class which will exist under any government so long as there are people who will submit to be robbed and whose highest ambition is to become robbers themselves. It is the same with the priestly class. They will exist so long as people consent to be humbugged. I look to education, therefore, as the way out of the difficulty, and in so far as the Nationalist societies are educators they add their drop to the stream of tendency toward better things. But if they attempt to make a paradise with the human material at hand unchanged, they will be about as successful as the man who tried to manufacture a silk purse out of a sow's ear.

There is no Christian faith:
A man may say all increase is of God,
But he who plants not seed beneath the clod
Reaps barren sod.

That man who hastes, when clouds are in the sky,
To house his grain, knows that no God on high
Will keep it dry.

The mariner seeks heaven's aid no more,
But life preservers, when the breakers roar
On leeward shore.

"The wind is tempered," says the Christian seer,
Yet prudent herdsmen scarce are known to shear
At fall of year.

We go to rest with prayer when day is o'er,
But seldom lock our sense in sleep before
We've locked the door.

Believers rear their temples high and broad,
And then attach, not having trust in God,
A lightning rod.

And who has read of flaming holocaust,
Not noted, touching churches that were lost,
"Insured for cost."

Whoever for another day prepares,
And guards 'gainst danger coming unawares,
God's word forswears.

He rises from his knees when prayers are said,
And, shunning heaven to whom he prayed,
Seeks human aid.

There is no Christian faith;
Men with their lips may trust a God on high,
And by their every act their word deny,
I know not why.

I observe that Brother Owen, editor of the Golden Gate, is about to issue in book form some of his random thoughts that have already appeared in the G. G. under the heading of "Editorial Fragments." He does this in response to the clamor of his readers, who are not satisfied with reading his articles once, but desire to have them where they can refer to them at almost any time. I always read Mr. Owen's "Editorial Fragments" as soon as I have leisure after the paper comes in, and I am not surprised that his subscribers want them preserved in book form. They belong to the kind of literature that you can read the second time with just as much pleasure and profit as you gained when you read it first. Then there is nothing incendiary about it; it doesn't heat the blood with excitement, or swell the veins out by producing violent laughter. You stay right with it, expecting to strike a valuable idea pretty soon, the same as a hopeful miner always thinks that pay dirt is just ahead. It is good for Sunday reading, too, and would save you from breaking the Sabbath by working your brain on that day. It fills your mind with the lonesome sort of calm that pervades a house when everybody is away from home, or a railroad depot just after the train has gone out.

I am watching the success of Brother Owen's book with considerable anxiety; because if it succeeds I may publish one myself embodying "Some Casual Observations," heretofore appearing in this paper. There has been no call for such a work, but I can write one myself and sign it "Admiring Reader," and thus supply the deficiency.

NATIONALISM.

To the Writer of "Observations:"

Nationalism is different from Secularism, but I cannot accept your definition of it. The fact that a number of religious teachers have professed to receive it as a part of their religious belief is not sufficient reason for giving it a religious definition. And admitting the important distinction of which Mr. Burgess loses sight, still there is something of Bellamy's dream; a thing in which you hold slight faith.

We all know that it is not quite so easy to build a Utopia as to criticise theories favoring one. But the Incas of Peru had a practical government far superior to ours, industrially. Are the ideas, then, of Bellamy's book less practical? Is there not a very important distinction between Bellamy's paradise and the paradise of religion? Bellamy's is to be here; in this life, in this world. Men and women co-operate to create an earthly home, free from many of the annoyances that now befall them, without any reference to the beyond; while the paradise beyond Jordan is quite another affair; one has to die to get there. Please excuse me, I cannot appreciate the idea, but can see why you have not much faith in it.

Secularism is educational; but how do the Secularists expect to make their ideas practical if they do not use them politically?

Please tell us why you have little faith in Bellamy's paradise. You seem to have faith in co-operation; and that is one of the chief features of his dream. I do not think any of the subscribers to the stock of FREETHOUGHT are actuated by a speculative selfishness; still, what security have they that, when your business becomes profitable, some one or more persons will not combine to freeze out the lesser shareholders? Persons who are now in no way connected with the enterprise may buy up the stock and hamper or control the journal and other business. Such things have been done. But if you adopted the Bellamy co-operative system each and all would be equally interested and identified with the cause, and the motive for speculation would be absent.

Does justice only "condemn and punish?" Does it not also reward? Does a mother's love always overlook the faults of her child? Is there not a genuine mother love mingled with justice when she lovingly though firmly corrects her child? In fact, is not all justice backed by a love of right? Why do we uphold justice? Is it not because we believe it is for the greatest good, and want those we love to enjoy that good?

Please give us the principles advocated in Nationalism, I mean the platform.

J. C. WEYBRIGHT.

The platform of the Nationalists is printed monthly in the organ of the society, under the name of "Declaration of Principles." It reads as follows:

The principle of the Brotherhood of Humanity is one of the eternal truths that govern the world's progress on lines which distinguish human nature from brute nature.

The principle of competition is simply the application of the brutal law of the survival of the strongest and most cunning.

Therefore, so long as competition continues to be the ruling factor in our industrial system, the highest development of the individual cannot be reached, the loftiest aims of humanity cannot be realized.

No truth can avail unless practically applied. Therefore those who seek the welfare of man must endeavor to suppress the system founded on the brute principle of competition and put in its place another based on the nobler principle of association.

But in striving to apply this nobler and wiser principle to the complex conditions of modern life, we advocate no sudden or ill considered changes; we make no war upon individuals; we do not censure those who have accumulated immense fortunes simply by carrying to a logical end the false principle on which business is now based.

The combinations, trusts, and syndicates of which the people at present complain demonstrate the practicability of our basic principle of association. We merely seek to push this principle a little further and have all industries operated in the interest of all by the nation—the people organized—the organic unity of the whole people.

The present industrial system proves itself wrong by the immense wrongs it produces; it proves itself absurd by the immense waste of energy and material which is admitted to be its concomitant. Against this system we raise our protest; for the abolition of the slavery it has wrought and would perpetuate, we pledge our best efforts.

MR. HASKELL'S DEFINITION.

Nationalism takes for its corner-stone the fundamental American proposition that taxation without representation is tyranny.

It asserts that the trusts, syndicates, and corporations (in which we are not represented) yearly tax the people out of two-thirds of their earnings, and affirms that the natural remedy for this is for the government to assume and run these great businesses for the benefit of the people at cost, thus finally abolishing rent, interest, profit, poverty, and crime.

If the city of San Francisco, for instance, owned and operated its own water-works and street car lines and appropriated the revenues to public use, these revenues would be equal to the total annual municipal taxation now levied upon our city. Why should we give this enormous amount yearly to gentlemen like Charles Webb Howard and Robert F. Morrow instead of taking it ourselves?

This, briefly stated, is one of the issues of Nationalism.

It is an issue of common sense as well.

A LETTER FROM SWEDEN.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Mr. Viktor E. Lennstrand has forwarded your kind letter to him and ordered me to reply. The order for two dollars U. S. money thankfully received within a few days. I'll send the Fritankaren to Mr. George Svensson, Kalamas, Wash., U. S. A., and will also send our paper to yourselves. My personal friend, Mr. J. M. Wheeler, of London, sent me a copy of the San Francisco FREETHOUGHT, and I found that you had received a number of Fritankaren but were "unable to enjoy any of the good things which Fritankaren doubtless contains." I see now by your letter to Mr. Lennstrand that some countryman of mine has translated from Fritankaren and you kindly republished it in your paper. I will send our numbers to you, and if they can be of any direct use to you we should be glad. As we have a great many countrymen spread all over the U. S. A., we should indeed feel very much obliged to you if you in your paper would recommend our paper to our American countrymen and also to the benevolence of the American Freethinkers. Fritankaren is at present the only means for Freethought propaganda in Sweden, while our stout-hearted young leader is in prison. He is now sentenced for two prosecutions to six months' imprisonment, but there are still three undecided, and they will most probably procure him nine months' additional imprisonment.

We hope our American fellow Freethought champions will show us their sympathy and sustain us in the struggle. We are wanting funds to be able to in the long run keep the Freethought banner waving upon the air in opposition to clerical and autocratical oppression and persecution.

The Liberals of all professions in Sweden have cheered us by their timely subscriptions in order to minimize the prison sufferings of our noble young chief, Lennstrand.

Mr. Putnam, I know you are a lecturer in the States and hope you will do what you can to recommend us to American Freethinkers. I will also send some back numbers of Fritankaren, and please to distribute them to those who are Swedes among your listeners. The 15th inst. I wrote to the same purpose to Colonel Ingersoll and appealed for his interference.

I was honored with a letter from Mr. E. M. Macdonald, of New York, in which he asked for news about the Freethought movement in Sweden, and I availed myself of the opportunity and asked him to interest the American Freethinkers in our behalf. The pecuniary result may be what it will; it will in any case be of very great service to us. The moral assistance would be great, for the Swedes are particularly sensitive to the opinions abroad.

The kind pecuniary assistance from the Freethinkers in England when Mr. Lennstrand was for the first time incarcerated advanced our movement greatly, and the unceasing endeavors of my dear friend, Mr. J. M. Wheeler, of London, to make us known abroad have proved to be of inestimable value.

Gentlemen, with the greatest regard from Mr. Lennstrand and myself,
Most truly yours,
OTTO THOMSON,
Secretary to "Utilistiske Samfundet" in Sweden, and business manager of Fritankaren, Stockholm.

"The System of Nature," by Baron D'Holbach. $2.

JUDICIAL OATHS.

II.

Under the empire the accuser and the accused appeared before the judge. The accuser took an oath that his accusation was not calumnious, and stated its nature. If the accused did not deny it, the accuser filed an indictment, a day was set for trial, the court constituted, and time allowed for the production of witnesses and documents. Whether the accused could call witnesses other than to character is a matter of doubt; the opinion of jurists on this point being based on a passage in Quintilian's Institutes and on a study of Cicero's orations. But under the civil law as administered on the continent, up to a recent period, the prosecutor only could call witnesses. Under the empire torture was used as a part of the Roman criminal procedure. The efficacy of the oath, though administered by priests and buttressed by solemn religious ceremonies, was deemed insufficient to secure truthful testimony.

The Theodosian Code was compiled about 450 A.D., and the Digest between 530 and 533. The interval between the Twelve Tables and the compilation of the Justinian Code was about one thousand years. The various Leges Julice, the statutory basis of the Digest, were passed about three centuries after the legislation contained in the Twelve Tables. What is known as the civil law is based on the Digest or Pandects.

In the Pandects an oath is defined to be "a religious asseveration by the invocation of God as an avenger if the juror knowingly should deceive." This was the result of the modification of the Roman law by the Christian emperors. The original forms and principles of the Roman law professed to be based on reason and not on superstition. The accuser was compelled to prove his case, and the burden of proof lay upon him. The accused was presumed to be innocent.

The priesthood, however, set little store by simple oaths. They reckoned the obligation of an oath by the holiness of the place where, or the material objects on which they were taken; and when these were relics or places of particular sanctity, they were held to have the power of punishing the perjurer, rendering the oath thus administered an absolute ordeal. This was the rule in St. Augustine's time, 395 to 430 A.D., and the sacredness of the relic on which the oath was taken, or of the altar on which it was administered, was believed to give the oath its efficacy. Hence superstition encouraged the oath. So did priestly avarice. The priesthood derived fees from its administration. They magnified their claim as God's chosen mediators, and as agents having power to visit upon perjurers here the vengeance of the deity. They maintained the supremacy of Christian emperors in civil affairs, for the civil powers admitted their supremacy over the morals, the consciences, and religion of their own people.

The early rules of evidence in judicial proceedings allowed the testimony of all persons who knew the facts to be given on the trial. This was the rule of the English common law among the Saxons before as well as after the conquest, and no restriction existed on account of the religious belief of the witness.

The oath by the weapon was a common form of swearing among the northern tribes of Europe. In the days of Cæsar and Tacitus, so far as we have any knowledge of the mythology of those days, there was no supernatural idea connected with an oath by a weapon. In the Germanic tribes all freemen stood upon an equality. Whenever, in time of war, leaders were chosen, the armed host pledged themselves to follow those leaders. This pledge of honor, which bound them to the fortune of their tribe and to personal allegiance to the leader, was based upon the principle of personal honor. It was chivalric in its character. The traitor, or deserter, ceased to be a man of honor, was no longer truthful, and no longer entitled to take his place among the freemen of his village. As his weapons constituted the true insignia of his honorable standing in his village community, it was natural that his promissory oath should be made by touching those weapons. In their village moots when any action was taken and the votes of freemen called for, they were given by the clanging of arms upon the shield. The ceremony of taking an oath by the weapon remained so common in Christendom that by a synodical decree it was forbidden.

The Scottish oath, where the witness with upraised hand swears to tell the truth as he shall answer to God at the day of judgment, is an example of an oath based upon the Christian idea. The English oath was sworn upon a halidome—a holy or sacred object. This oath in the present form—touching the New Testament and invoking the deity—is the outgrowth of the Christian form of the oath after the sixth century. The Icelandic oath adopted in the twelfth century was in this form: "Name I to witness that I take oath by the ring, law-oath, so help me Frey, and Niordh, and almighty Thor, [hialpi mer sva Freyr, ok Niordh, ok hinn almatliki Ass] as I shall this suit follow or defend, or witness bear or verdict or doom, as I wit rightest and soothest and most lawfully," etc. Two of the gods here referred to are the old English gods whose names we commemorate in Friday and Thursday. This is what Tylor calls an oath of conditional favor; but it seems in its essence to be an appeal not to vengeance, but to the powerful gods above to aid the witness in stating the truth with the utmost clearness—a prayer for help rather than an imprecation of vengeance.

The savage tribes feared the destructive forces of nature, believing that falsity would bring penalty upon him who uttered it. They expected the violation of truth or of a promise would be punished in this world; that a curse would follow a man who did not keep his pledged word. They believed that a perjurer would be punished by accident, disease, or death here; but as men rose to a higher point of civilization and began to reason in regard to the action of natural laws, and compared opinions with facts, they saw that falsehood was not punished in this world by the operation of natural forces.

In the classic time of Greece the effect of reason was seen by the poets and the philosophers, as is shown in the Dialogue of Aristophanes. The farmer Strepsiades asks, "Whence comes the blazing thunderbolt that Zeus hurls at the perjured?" "You fool," replied the Socrates of the play; "you smack of old Kronos's times." "If Zeus smote perjurers, wouldn't he have been down on those awful fellows, Simon, and Kléonymos, and Théoros? Why, what Zeus does with his bolt is to smite his own temple, and the heights of Sunium, and the tall oaks! Do you mean to say that an oak tree can commit perjury?"

Mr. Tylor alleges that the thought of the perjurer being punished in the world beyond the grave is plainly written in the laws of Menu: "A man of understanding shall swear no false oath even in a trifling matter, for he who swears a false oath goes hereafter and here to destruction." This extract must be taken in connection with the ethics of the Hindoos. It was a part of their religious belief that falsehood once spoken led on by simple degrees to the destruction of the person; that it followed him through all time to the point where personality was absolutely annihilated. A false oath was followed by no severer penalty than a false word, as they believed veracity was the key to happiness here and to eternal life hereafter.

Lecky, in his "History of European Morals," Vol. I., p. 294, says: "A third and still more important service which Stoicism rendered to popular morals was in the formation of Roman jurisprudence. . . . A deep reverence for law was one of their chief moral characteristics, and in order that it might be inculcated from the earliest years, it was a part of the Roman system of education to oblige the children to repeat by rote the code of the Decemvirs."

The preparation of a code of jurisprudence was begun under Augustus by the Stoic Labea, continued under Hadrian and Alexander Severus, and resulted in the compilations of Theodosius and Justinian. "In this movement," says Lecky, "we have to observe two parts. There were certain rules of guidance laid down by the great Roman lawyers, which constituted what may be called the ideal of the jurisconsults—the ends to which their special enactments tended—the principles of equity to guide the judge where the law was silent or ambiguous. There were also definite enactments to meet specified cases. The first part was borrowed from the Stoics, whose doctrines and method thus passed from the narrow circle of a philosophical academy and became the moral beacons of the civilized globe. . . . The essential characteristics of the Stoical method was the assertion of the existence of a certain law of nature to which it was the end of philosophy to conform. These tenets were laid down in the most unqualified language by the Roman lawyers. "As far as natural law is concerned," said Ulpian, "all men are equal." "Nature," says Paul, "has established among us a certain relationship." "By natural law," Ulpian declared, "all men are born free." Slavery was defined by Florentinus as "a custom of the law of nations by which one man, contrary to the law of nature, is subjected to the dominion of another." In accordance with these principles it became a maxim among the Roman lawyers, that in every doubtful case where the alternative of freedom or slavery was at issue, the decision of the judge should be in favor of the former. (Ibid, p. 295, 296.) Zeno, the founder of Stoicism, before the time of Christ, laid down the broad principle that "all men are equal, and that virtue alone establishes a difference between them." Lecky says that Seneca, "careless of a future world, and profoundly convinced of the supreme majesty of man," labored to emancipate his disciples "from every fear of God and man." (Ibid, p. 342.) W. THE COLONY OF VICTORIA, AUSTRALIA.

In order to give an adequate idea of the advancement made by the colony of Victoria it is necessary for me to go back forty years and place myself in one of the dingy old habitations of the squatter of that time, who, for convenience, I shall name Mr. Wether. Here, surrounded by flocks of sheep and a few ticket-of-leave prisoners as slaves, Mr. Wether lives in the most profound obscurity. His apparel consists of a European fabric of such cut and fashion as recalls at least the memory of a hundred years ago. Thus with a greasy cabbage-tree hat of native manufacture Mr. Wether stalks forth, the aristocrat of Australian society, and such he was and is, for on the opening up of the gold-fields his beef and mutton, which had hitherto been of no value, found a ready market at very high prices and Mr. Wether became suddenly wealthy and possessed himself of all the land he could grab. The first Victorian Parliament found him in the upper house, or Victorian House of Lords, with his distinguishing brass collar registered "Sir Wether Ram." Such are the humbugs who call themselves democrats, with a parliament presided over by an impostor appointed in Downing street who entertains all the royal beggars who reach these shores at the expense of the working classes of the colony. But I shall deliver them over to be dealt with by Mr. Symes and proceed to something else.

A decidedly radical change is taking place in the sentiment of the people of these colonies; they are no more all loyalists and jubilant over the long reign of a worthless monarch. The Liberator newspaper has opened their eyes to the trickery of their rulers and the sinister and clandestine scheme of confederation of the empire—a scheme which would pin Australia to the apron-string of Great Britain for all time. But the radical spirit is up, and the people are day by day getting more alienated from the crown, and long for an opportunity to assert their right (I may say in a certain sense) to home rule, and dismiss their foreign governors. Great Britain has too many irons in the fire, and this one in the southern hemisphere is getting too cold to work into the machinery of the empire. Considering the geographical position of these colonies, their vast territory and resources, there is nothing more natural than that they should aim at independence; and in all human probability the Australian colonies will become a union of confederated republican states.

From this idea springs their friendly feeling towards America. They know that the United States will be the first to acknowledge their independence and the mightiest to maintain that acknowledgment. If the thundercloud which hangs over Europe should burst and draw Great Britain within its vortex, such a course would become absolutely necessary.

The extreme radical press, the Anarchistic, are at present discussing the subject of individual rights, and after they have darkened several pages with their bewildering arguments and their metaphysical jargon, they generally arrive at the conclusion that anyone of common sense must know, intuitively, that every one born into this world has a right to an equal portion of its surface and as far under as he wishes to go; but the majority have been forced to accept about six feet under, and no one was ever yet known to grumble when placed in possession of his allotment. The great question is, What constitutes right and under what conditions is it obtainable? Now suppose that there are but two individuals in the world and they disputed about the ownership of it; morality might give in to brute force and might become right, and the stronger of the two would own the whole world and all that therein is, including his comrade. This is precisely what has been the matter with the world ever since that old bee-hunter Moses frightened the people into subjection to rulers with that pugnacious arch-ghost called Jehovah. Seeing, then, that our fathers and great-grandfathers have been swindled out of their birthright through dreary centuries, is it not high time the swindlers should be brought to book and compelled to divide what they have got on hand and allow the arrears to stand over as a memento of the reign of that hideous conception whose name is destined to become obsolete? AN IMPARTIAL JUDGE.

Judge Alexander Laidlaw, of the Oakland police court, recently went on a drunk, and while in an intoxicated state smashed windows and bull-dozed inoffensive citizens. The authorities paid no attention to his violation of the law, and he therefore took the matter into his own hands. A daily paper thus relates the particulars:

The dreary, weary, ordinary routine of every-day proceedings in the Oakland police court received a shock yesterday afternoon that has not only shaken up the blind-eyed goddess in the Athens of the Pacific, but has visibly staggered all the philosophic habits in the corridors of justice.

During the morning hours, Judge Laidlaw sat upon the bench and meted out justice to drunks by ones, by twos, and by threes. They all told the same old story, received the same old sentence, and went the same old way. Only once were the proceedings interrupted, and that was when old Daddy Harkiss feelingly replied to his honor's stern "ten days:" "Them laws was made for them as drinks beer and not them as drinks wine. I'm not the judge, so I wont say anything about that whirl your honor had at the White House."

"Ten days," repeated the inexorable justice, rubbing his nose, but there was a tremor in his tones.

"Five days," sighed his honor, as the last bibulous pilgrim passed up, and Clerk O'Brien looked up with a start. Judge Laidlaw was easing his cravat; his face was pale, but determined. While the courtroom loungers looked on in breathless awe, he began in a voice packed with emotion:

"Mr. Bailiff, call Alexander Laidlaw. It seems he has been violating an ordinance at the White House."

Bailiff Mitchell blushed, shifted his position, and looked appealingly from the judge to the spectators. Neither offered any assistance, and while he was trying his best to sink through the floor, Judge Laidlaw exclaimed gently: "This Laidlaw is released on his own recognizance. Now, Mr. Clerk, enter a charge of violating an ordinance of the city of Oakland against this Alexander Laidlaw." A tear stood in Clerk O'Brien's eye as he shot an appealing glance at the inexorable judge.

"Enter the charge," sternly repeated the judge. Clerk O'Brien sorrowfully complied.

"To that charge I plead guilty," continued his honor, "and before I pass sentence I deem it my duty to make a few remarks concerning this case. That I was drunk, or to use the language of the ordinance, 'under the influence of intoxicating liquors,' is true. That there was no palliation nor extenuation then, nor is there now, for this offense is also true. That the entire occurrence is lamentably, sincerely, and sadly regretted I can honestly state, and I do so state.

"I, who have sat here day after day, week after week, month after month, dispensing justice with an honesty of purpose, sense of justice, and every other motive of right that can possibly actuate an honest man, cannot pass by the greatest offense of my life. Is it right? Is it just? Is it honorable? Is it honest to myself, or to the people of this city, to permit myself to go unpunished for the commission of an offense for which I punish others daily? My answer is No! Emphatically, No!" And echoes from all about the courtroom answered "No!"

For a tramp or a vagrant, lost to the world, to his home, to his family, to decency and shame, there may possibly be some excuse in the commission of an offense of this character, but to one of my past standing in this community, there is no excuse. But for the sake of one I hold most dear and who inculcated those early precepts which I shall never forget, I deem myself in duty bound to show my manliness and admit frankly and sincerely that I have committed a wrong and ask forgiveness for the same.

"I have made this statement freely and voluntarily, and with a proper consideration of the fact that many a better man than I has 'put an enemy in his mouth to steal away his brains,' but I sincerely hope that this affair may serve as a warning to all such as are beset by that curse of modern civilization, drink."

"Upon a repetition of this offense, I shall not ask for mercy, neither will I expect it." [Cries of "Hear, hear!" from below stairs.]

"In conclusion I wish to exonerate and exculpate all persons from any blame, whatsoever, whose names have been coupled with mine in this unfortunate affair. The sentence of the court is that the defendant pay a fine of $50, with the usual alternative."

The awed spectators never breathed till Judge Laidlaw thrust his hands into his own pockets and produced three twenty-dollar pieces, which he solemnly handed to the clerk, who scrupulously returned the exact change.

Court being adjourned, Judge Laidlaw descended from the bench and received the congratulations of his admiring friends on his light escape.

TO THE LIBERALS OF CALIFORNIA.

All who are in favor of the total separation of church and state; of the American Republic founded upon the Declaration of Independence; of equal rights and impartial liberty, are cordially invited to meet in Convention at San Francisco on Saturday and Sunday, January 25 and 26, 1890, at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, for the purpose of discussing the issues forced upon the people by ecclesiastical encroachments, and preparing measures for the establishment of a purely Secular government in the state of California, and throughout the nation.

The main question which is now presented to the Liberals of California, and which demands, on their part, persistent and united action, is the Sabbath question. "At a recent meeting of the American Sabbath Association of California it was resolved to proceed at once with a vigorous and well-directed campaign to restore, by state legislation, the weekly day of rest to its proper position." This is the declaration of the ecclesiastical party. The California Liberal Union is opposed to any Sabbath legislation, and the purpose of its Convention is to arouse the people to the threatened danger and, by the force of an enlightened public opinion, to guard against the passage of any laws by the state legislature for the enforcement of the Sunday as a Sabbath.

All Liberals of other states who are visiting San Francisco at the time are cordially invited to be present; and will be welcomed as members of the Convention if they so desire.

There is no creed, no religious belief or non-religious belief in the platform of the Liberal Union. It stands simply and solely for human rights irrespective of creeds, and it expects the co-operation of every American, without regard to belief or non-belief.

A GOOD NOTICE.

The Hanford, Cal., Sentinel contains the following report of Mr. Putnam's lectures at that place:

The series of three lectures by Samuel P. Putnam, of San Francisco, at Pythian Hall last week were well attended, the recent lectures of Mr. Underwood having popularized, to some extent, the Liberal idea in this community. He is the golden glimmer of eloquence that dances on the sea of thought, while Underwood is more of the diver into the depths of logic, coming forth every time with a scientific gem. The audience that loves music and the silvery ripple of an eloquent tongue will listen to Mr. Putnam untired for hours. His first lecture, "The American Republic," was devoted to the attitude of the church toward the state, and the growing tendency toward ecclesiastical legislation, his position, of course, being against any union of religion with civil law. The second lecture was, "The Bible and Modern Thought." He discussed the authenticity of the scriptures, and quoted the words of Luther, Calvin, Dr. Thomas, and other Christian ministers, as well as scientific authority, to sustain his position. He pointed out what he considered the errors of accepting through faith what has been compiled by men in an ignorant and superstitious age and passed down through generations on the chariot of tradition, yet he would not discard the Bible, but would cling to it as a literary work, and declared that a truth in it is the same as any other truth—eternal, and that an error in it should be as much an error as if it were discovered anywhere else. Saturday night closed the series with the subject, "The New Heaven and the New Earth." The speaker gave some leaves from the diary of his own experience. He is a graduate of a theological college, and was for several years in the Christian ministry. He would have men strive to become honest citizens, sympathizing brothers on this earth, as the best preparation for any life that is to come. He knew of no future beyond the grave, but the cultivation of virtue, justice, and brotherly love could at least fit us for any future existence. The lecturer closed each discourse by reciting a beautiful poem, and those who heard him testify to his candor, his captivating eloquence, and gentlemanly treatment of his opponents in the realm of thought.

NEW YORK LETTER.

Turner's luck took him from a salary of twelve dollars a week, and lifted him into our national legislature with the modest income of $5,000 a year—a sudden change in the life of this boy of twenty-eight. This "presto change" will either ruin or make him; if the latter, there is a great future before him in this democratic city, for the multitude is hungry for a new name, for a new man. Almost anything is within his reach, certainly the mayoralty. Mr. Collier, a truckman, nominated himself as an opposition candidate, distributed his own ticket, and polled over 1,100 votes. The poor fellow will, in all probability, be forgotten before another year rolls round. Lightning is not apt to strike as anticipated. Queer things happen in politics. Cummings represented the sixth ward in the last congress and voted against the Mills bill. He was dropped last fall for that vote, but this fall he has been elected to take "Sunset" Cox's place. Mr. Turner goes to Washington with the best wishes of New York. No one envies him. All rejoice at his good luck.

Daniel Dougherty has had his say at Baltimore, and now comes Dr. McGlynn with his Sunday night talk. He thinks that no Catholic could be elected to the presidency. He rather rejoices at this, if I am able to judge by the meager report of his remarks. He, however, thinks there is an unfair and ungenerous prejudice against the Catholic church in this country. Well, why should there not be? What has that church ever done to disarm that prejudice? Is not every Protestant, in her eyes, a heretic, and has she not in her heart, if not always in words, cursed them and sent them to perdition? Is she not straining every muscle to undermine our common school system?

Dr. McGlynn said that all this prejudice was based upon the fear which the citizens of this country had of the Catholic ecclesiastical political machine, which has no end in view save its own aggrandizement, and he thought that until this ambition for temporal power was eradicated from the leaders of the church, this bar to the presidency would exist. "It is the truth, and I am prepared to give names that the pope is coquetting with his desire to send a papal ambassador to the seat of government at Washington."

We think there is something more in this deep-seated feeling against it than the doctor suggests. This is not a Catholic country, and nothing but a lowering of its pretensions, and a modification of its theology can wipe out, or even lessen this prejudice. There is one thing our citizens are blind over; New York is paying the Catholic institutions to educate our waifs to Catholicism; paying to bring our children up in superstition and religious intolerance. Is San Francisco doing the same thing?

Colonel Ingersoll will deliver the annual address before our State Bar Association on the third of January, subject, "Crimes against Criminals." We can look for something fresh and grand. The fair fund continues to increase. The committee does not intend stopping at any limit this side of $10,000,000. A little ambitious, I think. If absolutely necessary, it could be raised, but it won't be. The fight now goes to Washington. The chances are that it will be a "fizzle" if held here; if it is held in an inland city it will be "flunk." It is ridiculous to suppose that foreigners are going to reship their goods a thousand miles inland. What would the French exhibition have amounted to if it had been held at Lyons? These exhibitions are worthless shows anyway. What did the one in '76 do towards extending our foreign trade? The amount subscribed to date is $5,116,000. The investigation of the Dock department shows the same corrupt methods of swindling the city. The commissioners, to say the least, are three incapable men, whom the mayor ought to remove at once, but it is not to be expected. Why such men were appointed is a mystery. Nothing in their career showed any fitness for the position. But in this town fitness is an unknown quantity; the "political pull" is the potential factor governing appointments. Grant is no more to be blamed than Hewitt or Edson or Grace, or even old Havermeyer. There are plenty of honest, capable democrats in New York, who would gladly accept such an appointment, but such men have no pull, consequently men like Matthews and Crane fill our offices of trust. Where is the fault? Is it in the times, the people, or in our system of government?

In J. A. Cruzan's address before the San Francisco Nationalist Club, November 18, I find this, "are driving small farms into bankruptcy, and have compelled over eight hundred families in New Hampshire alone to abandon their farms for lack of return sufficient for their maintenance." That a large number of farms have been, in one sense, abandoned in that state is true, but not for the cause this gentleman states. New Hampshire is a large importer of corn and flour. Almost every farmer in that state buys every year more or less of those two articles, so the "bonanza farms" of the West, instead of injuring the farmers of New Hampshire, are a positive benefit, giving them cheap corn and flour. There is one thing, or rather two, which hits the New Hampshire farmer hard; one is the sending dressed beef east, and the other, the large cattle ranches of the West. The failures of the cattle kings have forced so many cattle on the market, west and east, that the price of beef has dropped to a point in this section almost ruinous to the farmer. But as soon as this surplus is worked off, there will be a rebound in prices. The cause of farms being abandoned in New Hampshire is the decay of families. The young boys go to the cities, south or west, and when the old man dies, there is no one to take his place and till the old homestead. These farms are not given back to the wilderness. They are still owned by some one, and in a way cultivated. In most instances some one occupies the house, some have been "turned out to pasture." The farmers of New Hampshire as a rule are more prosperous to-day than they ever were. They have better houses, barns, horses, carriages, and harnesses than they ever had before. They dress their wives and children better than they did thirty years ago; they also have better schools than when I was a boy. There is nothing in the life of the New Hampshire farmer for any one to mourn over, or to write essays on. He is prosperous and contented.

EUDORUS.

INCIDENTS IN THE HISTORY OF SCIENCE.*

BY JUDGE J. W. NORTH.

In attempting on this occasion to call your attention to science, and to some incidents in its history, I can touch only upon a very few points, and leave you to look into them more at leisure for yourselves. The field is illimitably broad; we can only glance at it.

Let us first inquire, what is science? The best answer I can give is that it is knowledge—systematized knowledge—not guesswork, not mythology, not legend or tradition, but knowledge based on evidence. If all the facts concerning any given subject are collected and methodically arranged, the knowledge we get from them is called the science of that subject.

Science is as broad as the universe, as far-reaching as the telescope, as minute as the objects revealed by the microscope. It takes account of the earth on which we live, its size, its form, its motion, its climates, its productions. It takes note of its forests and its flowers, its strata and its hidden treasures; its infinite variety of animal life, from the invisible insect to the behemoth, from the humming-bird to the eagle, from the tiny fish that inhabit our smaller streams to the monsters of the deep.

Science also reads the heavens, tracing the planets in their orbits and the stars in their courses. It uses them in determining and dividing time; and by teaching the navigator his latitude and longitude, it guides him through unknown seas and leads him safely to his destined haven. We may say of it, and without irreverence, what the Psalmist said in addressing the deity: "If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost part of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me."

Science guides the commerce of the world and every civilized industry; it superintends the building of our ships and railroads, our telegraph and telephone lines; it furnishes us with the indispensable friction match, also with the illuminating gas and the electric light; it gives us protection from lightning, and informs us of coming storms days before their arrival.

It enables nations to converse together over mountains, across deserts and under oceans, as though they were assembled in a social circle; it enables us to read the world's doings of yesterday before we sit down at our breakfast tables.

Coming down to man it furnishes minute knowledge of the wonderful structure of the human body, and the still more wonderful structure of the mind. It affords protection from disease and relief from suffering. It guides in the construction of our homes, in the preparation of our clothing, of the food we eat, the water we drink, and the very air we breathe. Science makes the difference between savage and civilized life; between the Indians of our mountains and the statesmen who compose our government. It guides every step in the progress of civilization.

The origin of science cannot now be fixed with certainty. Long centuries before our era, wise and thoughtful men were earnestly seeking truth, and notwithstanding numerous mistakes, they caught glimpses of some truths that have stood the test of time and have come down to us through the ages, forming a part of the science of our day.

At the commencement of the Christian era, science scarcely existed, even in name. The ideas of Pythagoras, asserting the globular form of the earth and its revolution, had survived but to meet the earnest hostility of the early Christian fathers. Exaggerated ideas of the "Books of Moses" had early taken possession of the leading minds of the church, and there seemed no limit to the claim set for them. Deeming these books to contain not only the unadulterated truth, but all truth, everything outside of them, or opposed to them, must be necessarily false. This unfortunate position dominated the entire church, and, of course, presented an insurmountable obstacle to all progressive learning. Science and civilization have been retarded many hundreds of years by this absurd folly of really good but mistaken men.

Tertullian (A. D. 200) held that the "Books of Moses" were "not only all truth, but that all truth was contained in them."

*A lecture delivered before the Unity Society of Fresno.

Lactantius, more than a century later, in referring to the "heretical doctrine of the globular form of the earth" and its revolution, says, "Is it possible that men can be so absurd as to believe that the crops and trees on the other side of the earth hang downward?"

St. Augustine, about the year 400, says: "It is impossible there should be inhabitants on the other side of the earth, since there is no such race mentioned in scripture among the descendants of Adam." And then he adds, what he evidently thinks a complete refutation of the idea: "In the day of judgment, men on the other side of the earth could not see the Lord descending through the air."

At this period the whole influence of the church was brought to bear to rebuke or frown down everything that savored of science. The most eminent bishops spoke contemptuously, saying that they did "not trouble themselves with such things." The lesser lights dealt in absurd denunciation.

LESS CARPING!

TO THE EDITORS OF FREETHOUGHT: Let me say a word to Liberals. Are we Secularists, or hobbyists, which? I consider all this harsh criticism in our ranks regarding others' opinions and their various shades of belief, whatever they may be, as absolutely detrimental to Freethought and Secular work. What belief others entertain is no one's business so long as they fulfil their duties as Secularists by favoring and supporting Secular work. A true Liberal should be employed in better work than flinging sarcasm at those who entertain views different from his. All such clashing creates dissension in our Secular work and retards the progress of the Union. The question is not as to what you believe, but what are you willing to do for Secular work (the welfare of the human race) and the American Secular Union? All who wish to promote these objects and help to support the Nine Demands (which is the work of the A. S. U.)—count them in, and stop this clashing and brewing dissension in regard to what opinions others entertain. It has no business in our Secular Union, or in our separate Secular work. Let us rise above it; then there will be no such word as fail. President Westbrook has well said, "If the movement for secularizing the state is kept on the narrow basis advocated by some of our friends, it would take ten thousand years." It would be well for many Secularists to memorize the letter of President Westbrook as published in the Truth Seeker of Dec. 7, and constantly bear in mind what the Secular Union is organized for.

R. H. SCHWARTZ.

On the Trail.

To the Editors of Freethought:

After my long ride down the Snake river, I changed to the cars at Riparia, passed through Walla Walla at daybreak, arrived at Pendleton, on the main line, at 9 A.M., and took the through overland train for Portland. From Pendleton to The Dalles it is one continuous desert of sand and sagebrush. The wind was blowing almost a hurricane, and the air was so thick with flying sand that we could see but few feet from the car window. We had to stop several times for the Chinamen to shovel off the sand, that had drifted upon the track. Immense drifts of sand were piled up mountain high on both sides of the railroad, and for miles I saw the sand clear up to the tops of the telegraph poles, so that the wires were lying in it. In many places, the fences were buried twenty to forty feet deep in the sand-dunes. The railroad company has tried all kinds of devices to stop the sands of this wind-swept desert from burying up their track and other property, but without much apparent success. I think they will have to erect snowsheds for over a hundred miles, and these would soon be buried many feet deep, and simply make a long, dismal tunnel. This desert of the Columbia is one of the most dreary imaginable, and does not impress the traveler from the east, after his long ride over the sand and alkali plains of Idaho and Wyoming, that Oregon is very much better. But at length we are out of the dismal waste, and among the bluffs and mighty gorges of the Columbia with its basalt cliffs. The river, at this point, runs with frightful rapidity through a narrow channel it has cut in the black rocks; in fact, it seems that one could almost step across the rushing, foaming river, so narrow is the channel. The next moment it is divided into several channels that seem to be mere creeks; and yet this is one of the mightiest and grandest rivers in America. Here is the place where the government has expended millions in cutting canals around these terrible rapids, and will expend, perhaps, hundreds of millions more, in order to have the upper and lower river connected by navigation. The forces that have been at work in cutting down this river channel through the mighty snowcapped Cascades are beyond computation. Millions of years must have rolled away while the slow work of erosion has been going on. The scenery at this point is grand beyond the power to express. The change from the wind-swept sand-plains to the falls and rapids of The Dalles in the Columbia is a picture no artist can paint or poet rhyme—nothing on the continent can excel it, save, possibly, the chasm of the Colorado in Arizona.

A snort of the iron horse and a jerk, and we leave this workshop of nature, and are soon in another world, in the green fields and vine-clad hills in western Oregon, where winter never comes; but the gentle rains come pattering softly down, for weeks and months, and the hills and valleys ever bloom with choicest flowers that make this fair land an earthly paradise. I arrived at Portland at 9 P.M., where scores of old friends meet me and bid me welcome. The next Sunday I speak for the first society of Spiritualists, in one of the best halls in the city, to a fine audience. Then as the rains come down apparently never to terminate, I am off by the night overland express, for the city by the Golden Gate, to rest awhile from my tramp "On the Trail." D. C. SEYMOUR.

Mrs. Krekel.

To the Editors of Freethought:

We were favored with two lectures by Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel on the last evening of last month, and first of this; subjects, "Evolution of Thought and Progress of Ideas," and "Natural Morality Superior to Theological Restraint as a Safeguard to Society." There was a fair attendance and good attention. We, as Liberals, were highly pleased with the subject and the way it was handled. I don't see how it could otherwise than favorably impress all who were Liberal enough to attend, as there was no ridiculing Christianity, which seems to be a predominant feature with some of our ex-Christian Liberals. I hope the Liberals on this coast will keep Mrs. Krekel in the field, and extend the hand of hospitality to the woman who dares face the world alone. She deserves the best we, as Liberals, can do for her. I am not alone in this opinion, and I feel confident all who hear her will join me in her praise.

Fraternally, JENNIE VOSE GRAHAM.

Mrs. Waisbrooker.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Mrs. Lois Waisbrooker lectured as announced on the evening of December 1; her subject was "God Manifest in the Flesh." It was well delivered and well received. For fear of being misunderstood on the "God question," she said: "If God is anything like the common conception of him, he should be put down in the deepest pit of his orthodox hell and have mountains of sulphur and brimstone piled on him to burn, not forever, but till some of that 'infinite' selfishness was scorched out of him." She was to have delivered another lecture as a sequel to this, but lack of health and an engagement with the Portland Secular Society prevented.

Yours, MAURITZ S. LIDEN.

Milwaukee, Or., Dec. 11.

THE lecture at St. George's Hall on "How to Fall in Love with Your Mother-in-law, and Hereditary Descent," last Sunday evening, was well attended. It was something entirely new and was much appreciated. The readings of character, giving leading incidents in the history of persons in the audience, with a horoscope of their future, is a peculiar feature and creates much amusement. Another free lecture will be given next Sunday evening, Dec. 22, at 7.30, at 909½ Market street. Private receptions and delineations every day after ten o'clock at 841 Market street, room 22, by Professor Seymour. *

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth."

J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

E. A. STEVENS, Secretary American Secular Union.

Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, New Jersey offers his valuable services to all those in need of a kind, sympathetic and skillful physician. Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been assailed and exposed by the press, but, Dr. Fellows, a specialist, in his line, stands foremost in his profession, and the encomiums showered upon him publicly as well as in private, are flattering evidences of the high appreciation and confidence his long and conscientious devotion to his specialties in his profession have so justly merited for him, and it is safe to trust him.

A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1888.
DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir: The remedy you sent is working like a charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. Have only been using it one week, and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right.
Yours respectfully, J. R.

REMARKS.—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle-aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, but who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out-and-out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors.

Call Me Not Dead.

[Published by request.]

He who died at Azim sends
This to comfort all his friends.

Faithful friends, it lies, I know,
Pale and white, and cold as snow;
And ye say, "Abdallah's dead"—
Weeping at the feet and head.
I can see your falling tears;
I can hear your sighs and prayers.
Yet I smile and whisper this:
I am not the thing you miss!
Cease your tears and let it lie;
It was mine, it is not I.

Sweet friends, what the women lave
For the last sleep of the grave
Is a hut which I am quitting;
Is a garment no more fitting;
Is a cage, from which, at last,
Like a bird my soul has passed.
Love the inmate, not the room;
The wearer, not the garb—the plume
Of the eagle, not the bars
That kept him from the splendid stars.

Loving friends, oh rise and dry
Straightway every weeping eye!
What ye lift upon the bier
Is not worth a single tear.
'Tis an empty sea-shell—one
Out of which the pearl is gone.
The shell is broken, it lies there;
The pearl, the all, the soul is here.
'Tis an earthen jar whose lid
Allah sealed, the while it hid
That treasure of his treasury—
A mind that loved him, let it lie,
Let the shards be earth once more,
Since the gold is in his store.

Allah glorious! Allah good!
Now thy world is understood—
Now the long, long wonder ends;
Yet ye weep, my foolish friends,
While the man whom you call dead
In unbroken bliss instead,
Lives and loves you—lost, lost 'tis true,
In the light that shines for you;
But in the light you cannot see,
In undisturbed felicity—
In a perfect paradise,
And a life that never dies.

Farewell, friends, yet not farewell,
Where I go, you too shall dwell,
I am gone before your face—
A moment's worth, a little space,
When you come where I have stopt,
Ye will wonder why ye wept;
Ye will know, by true love taught,
That here is all and there is naught.

He who died at Azim gave
This to those who made his grave.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

I hereby inform the fruit-growers of California that I have invented a Fruit Drier entirely different from anything I have ever seen or heard of. It is simple in construction, will be run by steam and, as I firmly believe, will remedy all the defects in other family driers—especially the Zimmerman, which I have used and under stand well.

A model of the above dryer is on exhibition at J. H. Redstone's at No. 1509 Market street.

Mr. Redstone will explain its construction, mode of operation, etc., to callers. He is also authorized to sell the same or organize a company to manufacture and sell said drier on this coast.

NEWS AND NOTES.

Glorious Southern California—glorious in sunshine and in storm; how wonderfully these mingle in beauty, softness, and grandeur. The wide plains, the green hills, the sparkling sea, the sky filled with masses of clouds, sweeping in gorgeous ranks over the blue depths; the wild and rushing rivers that, from the bosom of darkness, lift their white banners against the sun; the iron horse slowly advancing over the creaking bridge, and anon dashing athwart the level spaces; these vast and picturesque scenes make the panorama of travel now, and if one has plenty of time and can take the varying fortune, whether he "gets there" or not, the journey is certainly one of fascinating alternation.

When I arrived in Los Angeles it was bathed in brilliant sunlight, and the June roses of New England were redolent in its radiant gardens. The pulse of the Queen of the Angels still beats. The "black eye" is scarcely noticeable. Inflation is now at an end, and real business proceeds. The Los Angelese realize the supreme blessing, "Blessed is he who expects nothing, for he shall not be disappointed." They are coming to the gospel of hard work and natural resources. The future of the city is assured. New buildings are going up constantly—fine blocks and residences. There is an air of improvement. Wealth, however, will not come, like Jonah's gourd, in a night, or day either, or a year.

J. E. Clark has removed from his old quarters to 516 South Spring street, a new and larger building, but the old flag is flying still. Always there is welcome. He will divide his last dollar with the Secular Pilgrim. He was formerly of Snohomish, when the mighty woods were almost untouched by the axe. Three children are buried there. Stella, on the Columbia river, was named after his daughter by a company of friends who, in love with the musical appellation, so named their abiding-place, and, the star shines on unto this day. Clark was also at Salem, joining forces with our transcendental philosopher, C. A. Reed, some years ago. I guess the latter will recognize his Materialistic ally, who has fought the battle all along the line from Puget Sound to San Pedro; and if any place needs his unconquerable spirit it is Los Angeles.

When evening shades prevail and the electric lights shine in silver opposition to the golden stars, I climb Mt. Zion, alias Metcalf street, to number 11, where John Riggins is gracefully wending his way to his one hundredth birthday anniversary, amidst flowers and greenswards—the white crowns of hills in the blue distance. A warm welcome is here and the firelight is sparkling. Uncle John is eighty years of age and the reminiscences of his life extend over a wonderful arc of the nation's history. He was born in Maryland, and before he was twenty years of age struck out for the Great West. At that time he was a clerk in a store at the munificent salary of thirty dollars per year and board. He thought he could do better. When he arrived at St. Louis it was a city of five thousand inhabitants. He was a citizen and prosperous business man in this city for fifty-three years, and saw its expansion from five thousand to five hundred thousand inhabitants. During the stormy days of the war he was an unflinching Union man, although born in the South, and a slaveholder. As one of the officials of the city he was in familiar relations with Grant and other great generals. He was in the thick of the conflict of public opinion, and it required courage to express his devotion while so many of his associates were determined to fight it out on the other side. He enjoys life to the utmost, for he has all that wealth and a delightful home can give. He believes in Freethought, and is thoroughly interested in all the plans of organization and advancement. He is one of the largest stockholders in the new Freethought Publishing Company, and has the utmost confidence in its success.

Wednesday, the next day, I hunt up Severance, who, like Jesus, is pursuing the honorable avocation of a carpenter. I found him at the bench, keen and bright as ever. The readers of FREETHOUGHT know that he can write a rattling article and give humbug many a shaking. C. C. Stephens also put in an appearance ready for work. Up and down the mazy stairs I wend my way, and greet the Schroeder Bros., who are willing to give their colors to the cause. Others I find. Illinois Hall, a new and handsome structure, is secured for the lecture to be given Sunday evening, Dec. 29, and if the weather is fair I have no doubt of a large audience. My Prohibition friend Bruce is on the alert, but he doesn't take any stock in the church racket which is holding such solemn sway at Pomona, Riverside, Orange, and other places, where the prayers of Christians so prevail that business is almost at a stand-still, and all the whiskey that a man wants can be purchased underground. I found Rieman at the post-office and shook hands for myself and Wilson, of distant Davenport, who will recognize the bond.

Wednesday it began to rain, a little at a time, and when the mantle of night came down, it poured a flood. I was safe in John Riggin's mansion, with him and Severance for merry and philosophic companions. All night and the next day there was a steady flow, and the lower part of the city was something like a river. I was due at Norwalk that evening, but the cable cars ceased to run and I couldn't get through on foot. So I was put upon Riggin's noble steed. I had to take it horseback, for the waters were too deep for a carriage. I waded down to Clark's and there was a telegraphic dispatch not to come to Norwalk. The weather was too bad, and I didn't need any proof of that assertion. I stayed at home willingly, and adjourned my lecture at Norwalk until the New Year. The next day, however, I pushed on to Anaheim. The train was late and I saw nothing of my friends K. and L. Parker. I found afterwards that our energetic worker, Mrs. Parker, had been thrown from a carriage and severely injured. She is now getting better. There was no chance for a lecture at Anaheim, for Noah himself would have been discouraged. I remained until the next day and had the pleasure of a visit with Mr. and Mrs. Bates, S. Littlefield, and other friends.

All the trains were behind, and it was doubtful when I could get to Santa Ana, even if I undertook to wade or swim there. However, I ventured forth, and was fortunate enough to reach Santa Ana at noon. But the horse cars were not running and the mud and water were too much for the pedestrian, and so I have to charter a hack. This lands me at H. A. Newman's, and I am safe for a week at least, no matter what happens. Good luck, in the course of an hour or two, brings me a conveyance to Edson Smith's "Ten Acres Enough," and I rest Saturday night while, with almost redoubled force, the rain patters upon the roof. It is a dark outlook for the Sunday. But the clerk of the weather is in a genial mood and concludes to fling in a day or two of beautiful sunshine, and, indeed, a more resplendent day seldom marches along the blue heavens. The roads are simply awful and the horses have to walk, but the white flag over the black flag gives the signal of hope, and the breezes blow from the sea, and the mountains lift their shining foreheads without a cloud upon them, and the blue expands its glowing canopy until only along the far horizon gleam the misty splendors of the departing storm phalanx. I find over a hundred present at the hall in the afternoon, and a hundred and fifty in the evening. Had not the roads been almost impassable, over twice that number would have attended. As it was five ministers were in the audience, and I feel that, on the whole, I did a pretty good day's work.

Sunday night I spent at Hotel Richelieu, where the Goepper Bros. make the traveler happy, and especially myself. I had the pleasure, also, of visiting Mrs. Florence Porter, who, with Emil Goepper and brother, furnished excellent music for the lectures, which was a most inspiring alliance. Mrs. Porter has the courage of her convictions and is a noble and enthusiastic adherent of Freethought—not as a thought only, but as a living life and help to the world.

Monday morning friend Smith takes me over to Tustin and round about, and I have a chance to see what a beautiful country surrounds Santa Ana, and the splendid possibilities for the future. Santa Ana is now the county-seat of Orange county, and its prosperity is undoubted. It is the centre of a fertile territory.

A call on Baker, of the Standard, gives one new vim. He is an editor with back-bone, who says what he means and means what he says. His paper is the most popular in the county, for it is a live journal.

Monday evening I spend with Mr. and Mrs. Bradley, of Wahoo, Neb., but who find refuge from cyclones in this lovely valley. They are earnest Liberals and will help to make Santa Ana a banner town for Freethought. So will Mr. and Mrs. Cone, lately from Kansas, where the Catholic riot has made such a stir, and where his brother holds the fort. The Cones, both of them, are splendid soldiers of liberty.

Tuesday morning Herman Goepper drives me over to Orange and vicinity. Father Goepper is a philosopher indeed. He has fought the battle of life and in thoughtful age dwells in the tents of peace. He has deeply considered theology, and from the bosom of the church has traveled to the open fields of the universe.

Orange is a pretty place, but it is in the clutches of ecclesiastical prohibition and has the doleful aspect of a graveyard. What is the value of temperance unless it is the voluntary life of the people?

Journeying homewards we encounter Seymour, not Professor, but "Brick" Seymour, very much like Brick Pomeroy in the originality of his ideas and expression. He says he is three parts Irish and one part Indian. I guess the diagnosis is correct. At any rate he has plenty of Milesian wit. He is a graduate of New York politics and amused us with tales of Fenton, Conkling, and the "Bald Eagle," etc. He was working on his wedding suit, he told us. I should judge by its appearance that the suit was about a century old. But Seymour sticks to the substance of things and not to the looks. He is tremendously radical, and could overthrow a whole legion of clergymen if he could get a chance to talk at them.

The Sabbath Union held its convention while I was at Santa Ana, and a local organization was formed, and names, especially those of boys and girls who hardly know what they are signing, were attached to a petition for a Sabbath law in California. So the lines are forming, and next winter the conflict will open with hot shot, and it is to be hoped that the Liberals will not be behind hand with their artillery.

The Rev. Mr. Thompson, the agent of the Sabbath Union, made the affirmation that I had refused to debate with him; but when or where I had not the slightest knowledge. In order, however, to settle the question as to whether I was ready to debate with him or not, a challenge was immediately issued to him by my friends; but, strange to say, the valiant gentleman could nowhere be found to answer the summons. At last accounts, he has not put in an appearance. He will be compelled to meet me in debate, or back down, if it takes all winter and summer to find him.

My friend Smithwick, over four score years of age, never takes a back seat when the flag of Freethought is unfurled. He is there every time, with the best of them. So is Newman, who wished me all manner of good luck as I said good-bye, almost swimming through the mud to reach the horse-car creeping like a snail to the Santa Fe station.

Edson Smith has been married since I was here, and his beautiful home is bright with mingling hope and memory. The trees are blooming all the year round and the fruits glisten. The incubator flourishes and hundreds of chickens peep forth, and the ducks are coming, too. Smith has bet a Thanksgiving dinner that he will raise a thousand ducks this year, on ten acres. The incubator is a decided improvement for ducks. An incubated duck fed like Captain Jinks's horse, on corn and beans, surpasses the wild duck and is becoming the favorite of the market. Such are the blessings of evolution, and there is something new under the sun. What would Solomon say to an incubator? He would not cry all is vanity and vexation of spirit, if he could partake of a modern duck raised on dry land, kindled to birth by the flame of a kerosene lamp.

I did not know what was before me as I left Santa Ana on Wednesday morning. It was rumored that the railroad communication with San Diego was cut off, and that I would have to take a steamer at Oceanside to complete my journey. This seemed a pleasant diversion, and I determined to go. A voyage over the shining Pacific was an attraction. When we got to Oceanside, however, no boat was in sight, and was not expected for an hour or two. When it did appear, it proved to be only a tug-boat, that tossed like a cockle-shell on the swelling sea, for the winds were rising, and the clouds rolled threateningly over the fair promise of the morning. The waves were so rough that it was impossible for the tug to reach the wharf. The only way was to trust our lives in a little boat. Gentlemen were allowed to try this, provided they would not sue the railroad company if they got drowned. Ladies were absolutely forbidden to make the effort. The privilege was given to return to Los Angeles free, and try again when there was safer transportation. I made up my mind to go back to Santa Ana. One man, who said that he had sailed the seas often, declared that he would not go out upon the Pacific in that tug-boat for a hundred dollars. I went down to the wharf to take a look. It was near sunset and the clouds were rolling off, and the view of the broad ocean was exceedingly magnificent. The colors were brilliant, sea and sky reflecting the ever-changing splendors. At the end of the wharf a big crowd was gathered to see the passengers who were brave enough to try to land from the tug-boat. Some of these were ladies, and I thought they showed remarkable courage to try that dangerous way. The boats that took them from the steamer floated thirty feet below the landing-place, which was reached by a wooden ladder straight up and down. A rope was lowered, tied around them, and thus secured, they climbed the "golden stairs," and were lifted upon the wharf like a bag of wheat. About a half a dozen ladies were landed in this fashion, but they declared that they never wanted to try it again. I came to the conclusion that if ladies could weather the difficulty, I, of the "sterner sex," ought to do the same, and if they could get from the boat to the land, I certainly could get from the land to the boat. About half a dozen other passengers going south, determined to do the same. There was no knowing if anything better would offer for a week to come. So, swinging around the ladder, I climbed down into the abyss. It was very much like descending into hades. When I got to the bottom and was ready to drop, I had to wait for the surges to sweep the boat under and, in the nick of time, let go. I landed safely on the mail bags, and stayed there while the boat rocked away, and then rocked back again to take the next passenger in the same way, and so on. I remarked to the captain that it required considerable nerve for ladies to land in a sea like this. "Why," said the captain, "I had rather handle ladies any time, in a difficulty like this, than men. The ladies always obey orders without question, while the men think they know it all, and the first thing is, they get their heads broken or are drowned." I meditated that it was best to follow the feminine example and do as you are told. When we got to the little steamer, dancing on the huge billows, we had to wait until the boat and it collided, and then roll on board with all your might. If you didn't happen to strike it just right, you might tumble into the boiling waters beneath. When the man took my hand and said "jump," I jumped, and found myself, the next second, flat on the deck of the steamer, but no bones broken. I scrambled to the cabin, and such a woeful picture as met my view was indescribable. Men and women who had come from San Diego and were too sick to land were stretched on the seats, a bucket before each of them, and the way they went for those buckets at every lurch of the vessel was highly suggestive of a disordered stomach. One woman was pitifully crying, "O Lord, I shall die, I shall die." I myself had the premonitory symptoms of sea indigestion, and at the earliest possible convenience stretched myself flat on the cabin floor. I made out to keep my balance, and did not surrender a particle of my dinner; but my slumbers were continually interrupted by gurgling throats and prolonged groans, and the passenger next to me would flop his heels in a semi-circle over my head, as he frantically embraced that iron-bound bucket that did not "hang in the well." I braced myself against the table, and murmured, "Rock me to sleep." Four hours and more we thus rolled and tossed and heaved, while the boat ploughed its way through the Pacific. At eleven o'clock we passed the light-house at Point Loma, and then the placid waters of San Diego bay were before, and in a little while all were safely landed. A hundred other passengers, however, returned to Los Angeles to wait for better means of travel. I would not advise anybody to come this way, unless they had to. I have tried it once, but it is by no means a pleasure excursion. Of all modes of locomotion, I think I struck the worst one this time.

I am safe and sound now at San Diego, and the fishes have no longer any chance at me. I am at the New Carleton House. The sun is shining brightly, the skies are clear, the sea is glistening with diamonds, Coronado Beach and the broad city and encircling mountains are glowing in the happy light. It looks as if the storms were over. Not for many years have such violent rains prevailed, and so much damage been done. But a world of wealth is in these floods after all. California emerges from it with the bow of promise on her radiant brow.

San Diego, Dec. 19, 1889.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"FREETHOUGHT'S" NEW HOME.

The next number of FREETHOUGHT will be issued from the new quarters at 838 Howard street, between Fourth and Fifth streets, at which place a large store has been leased. After much search and some fruitless advertising, this location has been selected as the most eligible, all things considered. Howard street is four minutes' walk from Market. It has a line of cable cars running to the ferries, and is traversed at Fourth street by a horse-car line connecting with the railroad depot at Townsend street. While not enjoying the extensive traffic of Market, Kearny, and Montgomery streets, it is still a great and lively thoroughfare, and is destined to become still more populous. No. 838 can be conveniently reached from all parts of the city, and our store and office are upon the ground floor.

The room rented is sixty-five feet deep, having a frontage of twenty-two feet. It is in a new three-story building just completed, and FREETHOUGHT is its first tenant. Numerous windows at the rear provide ample light for the composing-room and job printing-office soon to be established, while the capacious show-window in front will display Freethought and scientific books and papers as they were never before displayed in this country or any other. A jog in the wall furnishes space for the editor's desk, and it is proposed to provide a small reading room where visitors who feel so disposed may enjoy themselves at the expense of our many exchanges.

Besides Liberal and scientific books, will also be kept on hand an extensive line of all radical and reform literature. We shall have Dr. Foote's and Dr. Holbrook's health and hygienic works; Colby & Rich's Spiritualistic publications, and books on Theosophy; also the literature of Labor—Nationalism, Socialism, Communism, etc. Also a large stock of popular books such as everybody buys. Heretofore Liberal book dealers have been exclusive, and have drawn their custom from the limited number of readers of their special class of literature. It is not apparent why this should be so in San Francisco. While there may be no more readers of Liberal books in this city than others of its size, there is less of orthodox bigotry: and the average citizen gets his reading matter wherever it is most convenient. He is not particular where the profit of the transaction goes, so long as he gets the worth of his money. There is therefore no reason why the average citizen should not help to support the Freethought Publishing Company's bookstore, and he will if it keeps the books he wants. We intend to supply the demand. If inclosed in a popular novel or magazine he finds a tract setting forth a new thought and informing the reader where more of the same can be found, it may excite his curiosity, and perhaps he will return. We have known the course of a man's life to be changed by some simple truth imprinted on the wrapper of a parcel.

It is believed that the location selected will warrant the establishment of a book and job printing-office. At any rate the putting in of a press of sufficient size to work off Freethought tracts and to do our own job-work is as good as assured.

The work of moving in and fitting up the store is in lively progress. Architect Lemme spent last Sunday taking measurements and drawing plans for shelving, counters, and partitions, and Contractor Schou and Mr. Gierisch are putting Mr. Lemme's designs into material form. Friends are invited to drop in and look on.

INGERSOLL'S ALLEGED CHANGE OF VIEW.

The editors of numerous daily papers, and some of the Christian ministers, are calling what attention they can to a recent letter by Colonel Ingersoll on the subject of immortality. The Cleveland Plain Dealer says that "Ingersoll has backed down," while the more cautious writer of headlines for the daily Examiner puts it in another form, thus: "He intimates his belief in a life after death." The proceeding is accepted as a change of front on the part of the colonel by those who would be glad to have it so.

The utterance on the part of Ingersoll that has been made the apology for these misleading statements was called out by the work of Mr. E. R. Johnes, a Chicago lawyer, who, it is claimed, has applied to the doctrine of immortality the law of circumstantial evidence with much ingenuity and original thought. Mr. Johnes sent a copy of his work to Ingersoll, and the following is the colonel's reply:

"If we admit the existence of a God of infinite wisdom and compassion, we may say that there must be a world better than this; but how do we account for one worse—that is to say, if injustice triumphs here, why not there? If honesty goes without bread in this world, why not in another? Certainly God will be no better then than now.

"Still, it may be possible that a God of infinite love and compassion will so reward those who suffer—through suffering itself—that all that happens will be consistent with wisdom and compassion.

"I do not see any evidence in this world that it was created by either wisdom or compassion. Nor do I see what right we have to say that man has a spiritual body any more than trees have.

"The tree springs from a seed; so does man. The trees produce others and then perish from the earth. The same is true of the human race. You have had the courage to accept the logic of your position and give to all life the immortality that Christians give to man. I hardly know the meaning of the words spiritualist and materialist. I don't see that it makes the slightest difference with the argument to admit that everything is spiritual or to assert that everything is material. He who asserts that all is spiritual admits the existence of everything that another calls material, and he who insists that all is material admits the existence of everything that is by the other called spiritual. Call it what you will, it remains beyond the grasp of our minds. I congratulate you on what you have said concerning the wax figures of Milton. His 'heaven' was simply another England, with a government somewhat worse.

"You have endeavored to establish your doctrine by something universal, and you have wisely left the provincialisms, the prejudices, the puerilities of Christianity. Love and hope are universal. As long as men love and as long as men hope there will probably be in the heart and brain the splendid dream of immortality. It may be that we live no more, that we go back to the unconscious dust, and yet the heart will always say, 'Perhaps there is another life.' But whether there is or not, let us all paint on the canvas of the future the picture that delights and satisfies the soul. We know that in this world after joy comes grief, as after day comes night, and it may be there is some world where after grief comes joy, as after night comes day."

After reading the foregoing carefully we are still at a loss to understand how any one in the slightest degree conversant with Ingersoll's writings can find in this anything more than the admissions long previously made by him concerning the possibility of a future life. Ten years ago he said and has often repeated: "The idea of immortality, that like a sea has ebbed and flowed in the human heart, with its countless waves of hope and fear beating against the shores and rocks of time and fate, was not born of any book, nor of any creed, nor of any religion. It was born of human affection, and it will continue to ebb and flow beneath the mists and clouds of doubt and darkness as long as love kisses the lips of death. It is the rainbow—Hope shining upon the tears of grief."

Ingersoll does not say that he believes in immortality. He says "perhaps," as all candid people are obliged to do. Those who are so anxious to make something out of his latest remark on the subject are persons who are unfamiliar with his previous utterances and who fail to distinguish between a fair admission of possibility and a positive assertion. The probability is that when Colonel Ingersoll changes his views he will announce the fact in language that will need no explanatory comment by the clergy.

LECTURES IN SAN FRANCISCO.

As announced last week, Mr. Putnam will lecture at Union Square Hall on the evening of Sunday, January 5, on "The Baltimore Convention." Admission free. All members of the San Francisco Freethought Society are requested to be present.

We have been gratified during the past week by receiving calls from the Hon. A. Schell, of Knight's Ferry, and Judge J. W. North, of Fresno. Mr. Schell will be present at the State Convention in January and will deliver an address, but Judge North, who is conducting most successfully the Unity Society of Fresno, may be kept away by feeble health and home duties.

THE PUBLISHING COMPANY.

Because we do not publish this week any letters from shareholders in the Freethought Publishing Company, no one should infer that we have none on hand. We have scores of them, but they are deferred.

All who send cash now receive handsome certificates of stock to the amount of their investment. The shares are five dollars each, and a few more are on the market. We hope every subscriber to FREETHOUGHT will become a member of the Company by investing in these shares.

S. P. PUTNAM TO LECTURE IN LOS ANGELES.

Samuel P. Putnam will lecture at Illinois Hall, corner of Sixth and Fort streets, Los Angeles, on Sunday evening, December 29; subject, "The Bible and Modern Thought." Every Liberal in Los Angeles and vicinity is invited to be present and to bring friends. A large attendance is desired.

A BITTER contest over sectarianism in the public schools of Boston promises to break out again, says a dispatch. The Protestants elected three-fourths of the school board, who announce their intention of abolishing the use of Professor Anderson's history, which is lenient to all religious beliefs, and to reinstate Swinton's history, which is a most obnoxious one to Catholics. The Catholic members of the board have signified their intention of resigning and issuing an address to the Catholic citizens. Nearly half of the public school children are Catholics, and such an action will undoubtedly lead to the church ordering them to the parochial schools. As the latter are under control of the Protestant school committee, and the law compels them to be up to the standard of the public schools, a serious contention of faiths is promised. The question whether or not Swinton is historically accurate does not appear to have come up for discussion. It is a war for religion, not truth.

THE postal-telegraph question has come up before Congress in a mild form. Senator Cullom last week introduced a bill authorizing the postmaster-general to contract for five years with any existing telegraph company for the use of its lines for the transmission of its postal messages between free-delivery offices, the postmaster-general having authority to determine between what points the lines shall run. The messages are to be prepaid with stamps, at rates to be fixed by the postmaster-general, and are to be delivered by letter-carriers on the first mail delivery after they are received, and at such other times as the postmaster-general may direct. We do not know what chance Senator Cullom's bill has of becoming a law, but there is undoubtedly a long-felt want for such a service as it contemplates.

THE Economite Society at Harmony, Pa., which originally consisted of over seven hundred persons, has dwindled to a membership of less than thirty-five, nearly all aged people, and the community threatens to die out unless new accessions are received. The Economites are celibates, but as their wealth amounts to millions they will probably experience no difficulty in finding recruits who are willing to give up their families in view of improved financial prospects. Nine new members, it is said, are to be admitted next month, some of whom are married.

MANUEL BAPTISTE, a boy who was before the Lunacy Commissioners the other day, is suffering from a horrible hallucination. He imagines he is being pursued by the devil, and is constantly attempting to run away and hide from his satanic tormentor. He ran away from his home recently, and when an attempt was made to recapture him he fought like a tiger, shrieking in terror that his family and friends were in league with the evil one to torture and torment him. He was adjudged insane. Merely another victim of popular religious teaching. The boy is right if Christianity is true, for according to that system of superstition the devil is after all of us. Baptiste has made the mistake of believing what his teachers tell him, instead of merely professing to do so.

THE Rev. Dr. Stratton, in talking to the Teachers' Institute at Redding, declared that a great danger to the country was the too free license to vote, as it now placed the governing power in the hands of the ignorant and those having no settled interest in the country. He proposed, among other remedies, that no person not possessing five hundred dollars' worth of property should be allowed to vote. This plan of Dr. Stratton's would create a most respectable oligarchy; but if he believes that five hundred dollars entitle a man to one vote, he must be able to answer the question why a thousand dollars would not entitle another man to vote twice.

THERE are queer things in law as well as in religion. Henry Miller and Anna Miller were adjudged guilty of criminal conspiracy by the Superior Court of San Diego county, and sentenced, the husband to one year's imprisonment in the county jail, and the wife to pay a fine of $1. Miller, on appeal, contended that the information did not charge him with any crime, as he and his wife were one person, and it was impossible for one person to enter into a conspiracy. The Supreme Court sustained this view and directed the discharge of the prisoner.

If any desire to know why we have not located on Market street, let them ascertain the rent of stores on that thoroughfare. It is about a million a minute. As a rule no lease is to be had, and the landlords, it is said, make a practice of raising the rent as fast as the traffic will bear it. When the tenant has been frozen out by this process, they reduce the rent to the previous figure, and set the trap for another victim.

NOTHING is heard in these quarters concerning the movement to organize a State Union in Washington. Progress is to be reported through the Ironclad Age, of Indianapolis, Ind., which will give news an opportunity to cool somewhat before falling into the hands of those most interested. The Age, we learn from its editor, and as we have reason to know, is an immense paper.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, editor of the Children's Corner of the Truth Seeker and an occasional correspondent of FREETHOUGHT, has recently been elected to the school board of Fall River, Mass. Her opponent was a popular Episcopal minister. Miss Wixon is one of the brightest young women in the country, and we are glad to see her ability recognized by her fellow-townsmen.

MR. W. N. SLOCUM, who left his case in the composing-room of FREETHOUGHT in order to cast his lot with the Sinaloa Colonists of Mexico, has just returned. He does not give a flattering report of either the prospects of the colony, or the character of its present managers.

A PROMISING Liberal book, a "Handbook of Freethought," is soon to appear. W. S. Bell has written it, and Henry Replogle, of Oakland is, putting it in type. Mr. Bell, with a large and heavy form under his arm, on his way to the stereotype foundry, has become a familiar figure on the ferryboats crossing the bay.

THE first announcement of the Board of Directors of the American Secular Union is in print this week. The Directors met in New York, where they were introduced to the attendants at the Liberal Club, and tendered a reception at the residence of Dr. E. B. Foote.

DR. LEONHARDT's communication on another page will be interesting both to those who do and those who do not consider possible the indefinite prolongation of human life. All will recognize in the writer a man who has thought before speaking.

READERS will see from a note published this week that Mr. B. F. Underwood is not to visit the coast until next spring. We had hoped to hear him at Union Square Hall during January.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE WEEK.

The copious rains since our last issue have not verified the remark that settled weather was likely to prevail. The coast has had more rain than ever before at this season of the year.—Capt. J. H. Drummond, one of the leading viticulturists of this state, died at Glen Ellen last week of heart disease.—Sailors will be apt to regard the British ship Durham with superstitious awe. Within a single week the ship caught fire, two well-known citizens were smothered in the hold, and last Sunday the first and second mates were drowned while coming from the ship to this city.—A worthless man named Eubanks shot his daughter to death with a shotgun last Sunday at Los Gatos, because she refused to give him her wages. The wretch narrowly escaped lynching.—An invitation has been extended to Henry George by the Single-tax Club of Oakland to deliver a lecture before that body on his visit to this coast in January.—Governor Waterman hopes to obtain government aid in controlling the Sacramento river, which has been running over its banks during the recent rains.—Colonel Crocker has given $10,000 to the Brooklyn, N. Y., Polytechnic Institute.—The Rev. Mr. Kincaid, of this city, who recently resigned a pulpit here because he had become convinced that he was not a Baptist, has been called to a Presbyterian church in Minneapolis.—A dozen girls were severely burnt by the upsetting of a candle while rehearsing a Christmas cantata at Detroit last week. Their clothing caught fire, and one was fatally injured and four others seriously.—Archibald Gunter, the novelist, has been black-balled by the Calumet Club of New York because he is an author.—Governor Miller of North Dakota, has signed the Prohibition bill, and the state will go dry.—Sixteen men lost their lives on the 22d inst. by the caving of the Lane mine at Angel's Camp, Calaveras county.—The observers who went to the west coast of Africa to witness the total eclipse of the sun, which occurred Dec. 23, were baffled by cloudy weather, and were able to record only partial obscurations.

California pioneers have organized a society in Chicago.—Henry W. Grady, the editor and orator, died of pneumonia at Atlanta, Ga., last Monday morning.—A warrant was issued last week for the arrest of T. V. Powderly, general master workman of the Knights of Labor, who is charged with "conspiracy." The warrant was found imperfect and was not served.—Chu Fong, a Chinese interpreter and cashier of Kwong Hong Long & Co., Mott street, New York, has suddenly disappeared with the funds of several Chinese firms. His misappropriations, so far as known, amount to about $25,000. Chu Fong is a converted heathen, and has been an ardent Sunday-school worker for the past six years.

The people of Brazil have cut Dom Pedro off without a shilling and have forbidden him to return for two years. De Fonseca, head of the provisional government, has been seriously sick, but is reported out of danger.—An agitation in favor of a republic is going on in Spain. Castelar is at the head of it.—Queen Victoria is about going to Ireland on a visit of state.—It is worthy of note that three men of Berne, Switzerland, have been acquitted of issuing an Anarchist manifesto.—The czar of Russia proposes to be crowned king of Poland, and the event will come off next year.—William O'Brien, the Irish agitator, is just out of jail again from the Galway prison. He started a novel while in durance and will hide himself for a few weeks in order to finish it.

THE AUMSVILLE DEBATING CLUB.

Some time ago some "brother in the cause" recommended in your columns the introduction of Freethought questions in local debating clubs in order to induce discussion and thus familiarize the people with Liberal ideas. I have acted upon this idea, and found it to work well. Here in this priest-ridden community we have lately debated the question, "Resolved, That Catholic aggression is detrimental to American institutions and ought to be repressed." Also, "Resolved, That church property should be taxed the same as any other property." At our next meeting we take up, "Resolved, That foreigners should reside in the United States fifteen years before being allowed to vote."

A year ago these questions would not be touched with a forty-rod pole. I failed to get more than one discussion, and to do so had to go out of this neighborhood and then debate against the crowd, solitary and alone (as published in your paper last winter). Now we discuss these questions here, and do so good-naturedly too. Are we not advancing? Surely so; and the lyceum plan is a success. People here are learning more of Secularism; are beginning to see that there are two sides to the question, and that other people have rights as well as themselves. The extra-pious fight shy, however, and I have not as yet succeeded in getting a preacher into discussion. We have a new eastern preacher here named Baley, who talked largely when he first came, but when business was offered him he prudently keeps out.

Thus the debating club gives us access to the people which cannot be well had in any other way. Here we have the advantage of the priest, as he will not meet us on equal ground, and we thus get the inside taack.

We have also a little free-trade club here, not political or partisan, but simply for the discussion of protection versus free trade. We find the protectionists quite shy. We have held five meetings and only had one discussion, the "protects" not responding. We are satisfied, however, with the one we did have, and want some more. The more I learn of this question, the more I am in favor of Secular adoption of free trade, as well as free thought, free speech, or any other "free." Not as political partisans, but as a universal and everlasting principle applied to all nations, and to the United States especially. Tax the states directly for the support of the general government; no customs, no custom-houses, no revenue officers, but absolutely free and unrestricted commerce with all the world.

Why not discuss this question through the columns of FREETHOUGHT? I for one would like it and hope it will be done.

A NOTE FROM B. F. UNDERWOOD.

EDITORS FREETHOUGHT: When I left the Pacific coast last fall I thought I should be able to return to California in January and spend a month lecturing in the state. I desired to do so, since I was obliged to return East without visiting several places that had applied for lectures, and since some of those visited wished me to give additional lectures. But I see now that my next trip to the Pacific coast must be deferred till spring, and I take this way of making the fact known to those who may desire to arrange for lectures at that time. Truly yours, B. F. UNDERWOOD, P. O. Drawer 134, Chicago, Ill.

A WARDEN'S LETTER.

FRIEND PUTNAM: Since my father's death (whom you knew well) I have seen but few Liberal papers; in fact, I have been up here on this island as acting warden and only occasionally visit my family in Seattle. I have before me the FREETHOUGHT, a copy of which I purchased at Tacoma yesterday, and was happy to find your name associated with that of Mr. Macdonald as editors.

A few items right here might be of interest to your intelligent readers. In running over the prison records in my office, dating from July 6, 1889, I find 76 names of convicts or prisoners sentenced to short terms, from thirty days to eighteen months. The record shows 40 Catholics, 14 Protestants, 5 Lutherans, 2 Episcopalians, 9 professing to have no religion, 4 Methodists, 1 Baptist, and 1 Atheist. This Liberal received a short sentence, and the offense (if it could be called such) was giving a drink of whisky to an old Indian friend. The record the past three and one-half years shows about the same ratio as to religious views. Comment is unnecessary, as you know and have statistics from many prisons.

We have confined here Frank Fuller, the man who killed the archbishop of Alaska, or rather a Catholic priest. This Fuller is himself a devout Catholic. It seems he was a traveling companion of the priest, only Indians making trips with them across the wilds of Alaska when the manslaughter as charged occurred. Only Indians served as witnesses. Fuller claims it to have been an accident. He got ten years. If the victim had not been a priest, the fellow would have been cleared. Fuller packed the priest's body over frozen ground on his back, many miles. We have an Indian in here from the wilds of Alaska sentenced to 99 years for killing his wife, whom he caught in the act of adultery with another Indian. Their code of laws is such that if husband or wife commits adultery the penalty is death, and the injured party is the one to inflict it. In my opinion this Indian (Jim) should be pardoned out by the president. I make a trusty of him and find him faithful and smart.

A few reminiscences of my father, Asa Coombs, may be admissible. He died at Seattle about one year ago, 93 years and 2 months old. He had lived under every president up to the time of his death, and was a veteran of the war of 1812. He was a subscriber to the old Boston Investigator for fifty years, and a Liberalist. I was at his bedside almost continuously from the first illness, ten or twelve days before. A very kind lady, a Christian neighbor, took occasion to lay down her views on a hereafter. He very quietly listened, and before responding fell off into a refreshing sleep and on awaking felt very much relieved of his pains. He said to my sister, "Tell Mrs. Allen [the Christian neighbor] to come in," and as she approached he said to her, "You can tell all you meet, that wish to know, that I die as I have lived, an Infidel and Liberal."

Our city, Seattle, is taking wonderful strides ahead just now, and when I reach home to stay, about January, 1890, I will do my level best to get a large list of subscribers for your paper, and stockholders as well. Seattle and Tacoma should be a good field for Liberal lecturers.

Yours truly,

S. F. COOMBS,

Warden U. S. Pen., McNeil's Island, Wash.

TO THE LIBERALS OF CALIFORNIA.

All who are in favor of the total separation of church and state; of the American Republic founded upon the Declaration of Independence; of equal rights and impartial liberty, are cordially invited to meet in Convention at San Francisco on Saturday and Sunday, January 25 and 26, 1890, at Union Square Hall, 421 Post street, for the purpose of discussing the issues forced upon the people by ecclesiastical encroachments, and preparing measures for the establishment of a purely Secular government in the state of California, and throughout the nation.

The main question which is now presented to the Liberals of California, and which demands, on their part, persistent and united action, is the Sabbath question. "At a recent meeting of the American Sabbath Association of California it was resolved to proceed at once with a vigorous and well-directed campaign to restore, by state legislation, the weekly day of rest to its proper position." This is the declaration of the ecclesiastical party. The California Liberal Union is opposed to any Sabbath legislation, and the purpose of its Convention is to arouse the people to the threatened danger and, by the force of an enlightened public opinion, to guard against the passage of any laws by the state legislature for the enforcement of the Sunday as a Sabbath.

All Liberals of other states who are visiting San Francisco at the time are cordially invited to be present; and will be welcomed as members of the Convention if they so desire.

There is no creed, no religious belief or non-religious belief in the platform of the Liberal Union. It stands simply and solely for human rights irrespective of creeds, and it expects the co-operation of every American, without regard to belief or non-belief.

DEATH OF A FREETHINKER.

William Germain, of Black Hawk, Col., died Nov. 3, aged 55 years. He was a pioneer settler in his locality. In mentioning his death, a paper published at Black Hawk says:

"He went down into the darkness apparently without fear. We have often discussed the problems of life and death with him. We differed widely in our views. He did not believe in a life beyond the grave. He denounced all such beliefs as relics of superstition. He forbade any religious services at his funeral. What better evidence can one give of the honesty and sincerity of his views than to hold firmly to them when the dew of death is on his brow and the death-rattle in his throat? We remember a few months ago, in the heat of argument, telling him that if he thought he had but a few hours to live he would pray and ask others to pray for him. It appears he did not. He died as he had lived. William Germain came here in the spring of '60 and was, in company with two brothers, engaged in freighting across the plains for several years. He has since mined, run a drug store, a livery stable, and many other things. He was a man of a considerable more than average ability. He was buried in the Dory Hill cemetery on the afternoon of Wednesday, the funeral being under the auspices of the Pioneers' Association of Gilpin County."

A CAUTIOUS "PIRATE."

D. Edson Smith, one of our best citizens, called at the little "Pirate" office and asked it to insert a notice of Putnam's lectures this week, as all of the other papers did. Brother Clarke whined and said he was afraid that it would offend the two dozen timid minded-subscribers he had on his list, who were unused to hearing intelligence on the rostrum and would therefore have to decline it until he called a meeting of the long-haired cranks and and short-haired females who run the Pirate. Brother Clarke's cautiousness is to be commended, but his liberality and judgment are on a par with the class of fanatics he represents. Intelligence is what the Pirate has to combat in its struggle for existence.—Santa Ana Standard.

HERBERT SPENCER was recently quoted in the London Times as favoring the nationalization of land, which drew out a letter from him repudiating the doctrine as ascribed to him. This led to a lively discussion, in which Prof. Huxley, Sir Louis Mallet, and others took part, and a variety of views on the general question were expressed. The correspondence will be printed in the January Popular Science Monthly, under the title "Letters on the Land Question."

INCIDENTS IN THE HISTORY OF SCIENCE.*

BY JUDGE J. W. NORTH.

II.

Cosmas early in the sixth century published his "Christian Topography," the great object of which was—as he declares—to denounce the false and heathen doctrine of the rotundity of the earth, and to show that the tabernacle in the wilderness is the pattern or model of the universe. "The earth," he says, "is a rectangular plane four hundred day's journey east and west, and exactly half that distance north and south. It is surrounded by mountains, on which the sky rests. The heavens come down to the earth on all four sides, like the walls of a room. All below the firmament is the world, the story above is heaven, and below the earth's surface is hell. Midway in the rectangular surface below lies the inhabited earth, encompassed by ocean. Beyond ocean, bordering on the edge, is the unvisited terrestrial paradise. Here, too, on a barren and thorny soil, without the walls of paradise dwelt man from the fall to the deluge. The ark floated the survivors across the great ocean belt to this better land which we inhabit. This oblong plain lies a little tilted to the south, so that the rivers, like the Tigris and Euphrates, running south, run rapidly, while those running north, like the Nile, run more slowly because they have to run up hill."

These were the opinions of the Christian church for more than a thousand years, and were all based on the Bible. During thirteen hundred years Christendom furnished to the world no astronomer or chemist. The Mohammedans were far in advance of the Christians in both of these studies.

As time advanced the hostility of the church to science became intensified. At the beginning of the fifth century the growing power of Rome had taken from Alexandria its pre-eminence as a seat of learning, and left it but secondary to the home of the Cæsars. The Greek School of Philosophy had dwindled to small dimensions, and was mainly represented by Hypatia (the daughter of Theon, the mathematician), whose beauty, learning and eloquence drew to her academy the learned and the elite of the city.

Cyril, the most influential and aggressive, as well as the most violent and unscrupulous of the Christian fathers, was then bishop of Alexandria. The great popularity of Hypatia was an obstacle in his way, as well as an annoyance to him. The result was that a Christian mob—usually called Cyril's mob—of many monks, seized Hypatia and dragged her from her carriage one morning as she was riding to her academy, stripped her of her clothing, took her to a church, and Peter the reader struck her on the head with a club, killing her.

This Christian mob then cut her body into pieces, scraped the flesh from her bones with shells, and burned her piece-meal.

This was Saint Cyril's method of extinguishing the light of science, and of promoting the cause of Christianity, in the early part of the fifth century. And though no one seems to have questioned Cyril's guilt, in this brutal murder of a woman noted for her virtue, as well as for her intellectual attainments, the Christian church never called him to account for the infamous deed, but on the contrary enrolled him among her saints, and he is known to-day only as "Saint Cyril."

This policy of suppressing science by murder continued to be the policy of the church for more than twelve hundred years, and is suspended now only because it has not the power to practice it.

The Catholic church, though suspending the working of the Inquisition for want of power, has retained the organization complete, and now, from 1875 to this day, a crowd of defenders has arisen, advocating the re-establishment of the Inquisition. If any doubt it let them read the article on "Inquisition" in the New Encyclopædia Britannica, or the recent encyclical letter of the pope, read from all the Catholic pulpits in America by order of Cardinal Gibbons. This letter sounds like a cry of rage and agony, that a statue has been reared in Rome to the martyr, Bruno, on the spot where he was burned in 1600 for teaching some commonly accepted facts of science of the present time.

*A lecture delivered before the Unity Society of Fresno.

When the forces of Victor Emanuel entered Rome in 1870 the pope and the Inquisition were driven into the Vatican. Shall they now come forth to establish their throne in America? And shall we hear no note of remonstrance from our statesmen? Not one word against setting up here a hierarchy, a government by the priesthood?

But to return from this reference to our own time, let us follow the treatment of science. We have seen how its light was extinguished in Alexandria by the infamous murder of Hypatia; after which no one dared to enter that field. We must also notice that both Rome and Constantinople were at the same time controlled by the same power, which was hostile to all scientific research. At the commencement of the sixth century there was but one prominent seat of learning in all Christendom where science was permitted to be taught; and even this was not continued long. In 529, the Christian Emperor Justinian suppressed the schools of philosophy of Athens, and the night of "the dark ages" closed down on what was then known as the Christian world; the night of a thousand years, in which the church ruled, both temporally and spiritually; a church that claims to be the light of the world, and yet this period was the darkest that our era has known.

If it be now asked, what produced the dark ages, history gives us the answer. If it be asked, what continued the dark ages for a thousand years, or what influence sought to present the revival of learning at the end of these thousand years, we receive from history the same unequivocal answer. It was in each and every case, mainly, the Christian church.

During this long night of darkness the puerile "Christian Topography" of Cosmas continued to be the doctrine of the church and the treatment of students of science remained unchanged. A single instance will be sufficient to illustrate both.

In the thirteenth century, Roger Bacon of England, spending some years in France, devoted himself somewhat to the study of chemistry, a science then unknown. But the first advances towards it were condemned by the church. Though he had received his degree of doctor of theology, his experimental studies were denounced by the ignorant priests as magic and the black arts, and his orthodoxy was at once questioned. Having returned to Oxford and commenced lecturing there, his lectures were interdicted, and he was placed under supervision at Paris, where for ten years he was prohibited from writing anything that might be published. A Franciscan monk himself, after his return to England he denounced "the ignorance and vices of the clergy and monks, and generally the insufficiency of the existing studies," for which his works were condemned by a general of the order, who afterwards became pope, and Bacon was thrown into prison, where he remained for fourteen years, dying two years later. Such was the penalty that Christianity inflicted for the study of science in the thirteenth century.

In 1507, Copernicus, a modest priest and learned Prussian, away off on the confines of Hungary, had completed a book on "The Revolutions of the Heavenly Bodies." Knowing the hostility of the church to any such teaching he waited thirty-six years before daring to publish his work. After that length of time, being urged to it by a cardinal, he ventured to give it to the public. This was the great work that was the foundation of our Copernican system of astronomy. Mark the reception that was given it by the Christian church. On the day that the first copy of this great work was brought to him, moist from the press, he died, and thus escaped the personal vengeance of the church; but his work was condemned and burned, so far as his persecutors could accomplish it.

Here we come to the time of Luther, Calvin, and other reformers. Does anyone hope that they will be found more favorable to science than their antagonists? Vain hope. Historians tell us that they were even more bitter than the Catholics in their denunciation of science. Luther called Copernicus a fool, and thought he had answered him effectually by saying that "Joshua commanded the sun to stand still, which he would not have done if the sun did not move."

Galileo, some eighty years later, revived and taught the theories of Copernicus, and having constructed a telescope, made many valuable discoveries. For this he was accused of "imposture, heresy, blasphemy, and Atheism." Do we not here see where the clergy of our time learn to call every man an Infidel or Atheist, who is in advance of his fellows in search of truth? He was summoned before the "holy inquisition, under the accusation that the earth moves around the sun, a doctrine utterly contrary to the scriptures." He was compelled to retract his "heresy," and for sixteen years the church had rest; but in 1632 he published his book entitled "The System of the World," which sustained the theory of Copernicus. He was again brought before the Inquisition, and though he again retracted, he was thrust into prison and treated with remorseless severity for the remaining ten years of his life.

But by following to the end the story of Galileo we have passed by a few years, the tragic events connected with the fate of his contemporary, Giordano Bruno.

NEW YORK LETTER.

John Greenwald was hanged on the 6th for murdering Lyman S. Weeks at his home, 1071 De Kalb avenue, Brooklyn, on the 15th of March, 1887. Father O'Hara was his spiritual adviser, and consequently this murderer died in good standing in the Catholic church and his body was buried in Holy Cross Cemetery. A few weeks ago Miss Theresa Kelly (her name if my memory is correct) died. This lady for years had been a devout member of St. Stephen's church. She had, however, followed her beloved pastor, Dr. McGlynn, when he was removed from his pastorate, and had remained faithful to him after his excommunication. For this the authorities of the church laid its heavy hand on her after death. The testimony of all is that she was a pure, loveable woman; that she had kept all the requirements of her church, and had died in the faith. Her friends placed her body in the receiving vault of Calvary Cemetery. They were forced by the authorities of the Catholic church to remove it, and to-day it rests in a vault of a Protestant cemetery. (These are the facts as I understand them.) That church buries in her consecrated ground the body of a midnight assassin, and refuses a like repose to the body of a pure woman. And why? Because it could not, by cracking its whip over her back, drive her from her old pastor, could not force her to give up her womanhood, to acknowledge that Archbishop Corrigan was the umpire of her conscience. Miss Kelly fought a good fight for liberty against ecclesiastical tyranny. In life she was successful, but in death will the American people permit her to fail? Shall the Catholic church possess the right to refuse burial to a woman who owns a lot in a Catholic cemetery? Our courts have decided that the church has that right.

And now comes a report through the Herald that a Catholic bank with a capital of $100,000,000 is to be started in America. Such a bank would be more powerful than the old United States Bank, which Jackson crushed out. We don't believe the church is so foolish.

The closing of the Erie Canal on the 1st inst. ends one of the most prosperous years of its history. Perhaps a few items might interest your readers. Freight has been large and prices remunerative. There have been cleared from Buffalo during the season 6855 boats. They have carried east 33,000,000 feet of lumber, 56,000,000 pounds of flax seed, 19,000,000 pounds of iron, 11,500 tons of coal, 15,000,000 bushels of wheat, 20,000,000 of corn, 4,000,000 of oats, and 2,500,000 of rye and barley. There has been taken over the canal west 66,000,000 pounds of iron, 20,000,000 pounds of salt, 12,000,000 pounds of sugar, 1,500,000 pounds of coffee, 100,000 tons of coal, 95,000,000 pounds of merchandise, and at least 165,000,000 pounds of sundries. This great artery of commerce is opened to the traffic of the West free and untrammelled. There is no question but a free canal has lowered the price of farm products in this state, but in other respects our people have been benefited.

There is almost universal complaint among the farmers of this state over the low prices of wheat, oats, corn, barley, and rye. The farmers in the West have formed an alliance or association to control the deliveries of their crops, but thus far it has been of no value in maintaining prices. Either it is not yet working order, or they have attempted an impossible thing. It has been fashionable for the past few years for the world to bear our crops. The world seems all at once convinced that wheat and corn have little value. The press in the East has echoed this idea until it is almost a public offense to avow yourself a friend of the farmer. Low prices have made poor farmers, and these poor farmers, constituting about one-third of the population, are not buyers of dry-goods and luxuries. The consequence is dull markets at Fall River and Lowell, dullness in Maiden Lane and Church street, our merchants failing or going out of trade. The railroads cannot show large net earnings so long as they have to haul empty cars into the wheat and corn region of the West. Transportation one way only does not mean large income for any company. From these remarks your readers can readily infer that business the past fall has not been satisfactory. Our merchants have sold goods at small profit, and collections have been and are slow. At the stock, produce, cotton, metal, and coffee exchanges dullness has held sway. The public is not there. Dry rot is eating the life out of them. Low prices have made poor farmers, poor farmers have made poor merchants, and poor merchants and poor farmers have made poor brokers. The iron trade has always been considered the barometer of business. That branch has been active the past three months, but has failed to infuse life and activity into ordinary trade.

I see that Bonner predicts a boom in '90. The people of the East are in great need of one to get them out of the rut they have been in since Garfield was shot. The moment our farm products advance in price to a fair profit over the cost of production there will be a revival of business. Europe's wheat and rye crop for 1889 is largely deficient. Russia alone has raised this year 91,000,000 bushels less wheat and 95,000,000 bushels less rye than in 1888. Austro-Hungary is in the same bad fix. This ought to make a demand for every bushel of wheat we have to spare and advance prices. The advocates of low-price wheat are constantly depicting the hardships an enhanced price of flour would bring to the poor of our cities, forgetting the reflexive nature of prices. High-price flour never made a man poor. It is whisky and beer that bring poverty into the laboring man's home. The higher flour is the less money the working men would have for rum, and consequently, from a moral point of view, a blessing. The poor farmer, struggling with a mortgage on his land, has no sympathy. A flood, a drouth, a frost, may destroy his crops and not a tear is shed over his misfortunes. The change is always rung on the poverty of the city.

The investigation of the dock department has ended. The impression is general that Mayor Grant will stir up some of the dry bones in that department. The removal of the commissioners will only satisfy the public. Our young mayor has an opportunity to win favor.

The weather is unusually warm. Almost everyone is suffering with colds.

"STEVENS."

DEAR GEORGE: I have been dreadfully worried of late. Nearly all the daily papers throughout the country have been publishing scandalous libels against my financial integrity, so that I have been kept busy repudiating them. Would you believe it? These newspapers have not only insinuated, but positively asserted that I, E. A. Stevens, was the possessor of fifty or twenty millions. I don't just now exactly remember the amount, but a few millions of dollars, more or less, either way is a matter of no consequence to me whatever. Could anything be farther from the truth? And to think that you gave currency to such sordid rumors without giving my friends one word of explanation that I possibly could not be the culprit. My chief maligner in this matter is a fellow for whom I had a sort of sneaking regard, and whom I certainly never injured, Thos. G. Sherman. I do not know whether I ought to commence a libel suit against him or not. But learning he had abandoned the practice of law for journalism I concluded there was little prospect of recovering damages—especially heavy damages, such as I in justice should be entitled to receive—so I fortified myself to try and brace up against this burden in solemn silence. However, humanity is a gregarious animal, so I fly to you, metaphorically, to unburden my woes. Think for a moment how bright hopes might be blighted; what brilliant opportunities might turn from my grasp, if my friends and associates should be confirmed in the sad delusion that I was the parsimonious possessor of $50,000,000. Might they not shun me? Worse still, some one having a "little bill" against this fifty-millionaire might try to collect it off your humble servant, which would be a marvel of financiering, I assure you. Again, some personal friend of this much-to-be-pitied moneyed magnate might, in redeeming his i. o. u. for a few thousands, send me his check or the currency, and I, innocently enough, go off and spend it. That would indeed be a calamity! Looking at it from any point of view, I am confronted with the gravest possibilities, so that I beseech you to kindly and promptly inform my friends that I am entirely, unqualifiedly, and absolutely above suspicion; that I am free from so baseless, so utterly groundless, a charge as that of being possessed of $50,000,000. Honor bright!

In your issue of the 7th, just read with my usual deep interest, I note that you spent the solemn Thanksgiving in riotous living—doughnuts, coffee, and euchre. The latter pernicious practice, I believe, with a gentleman who is old enough to know better. By a strange coincidence I also observe that "all Sacramento was out to attend the unveiling of the Stevens monument." The strange coincidence is that I am here and alive, and the monument is in the wrong place. All Sacramento should rise to explain.

PHYSICAL IMMORTALITY.

"If that thou seekest thou findest not within thee, thou wilt never find it without thee."—ABIRILL.

In all ages and among all nations, the search for immortality has been in progress. It has always been, and it still is, the prize which every religion offers its devotees. It has ever been a theme of poets, the goal of philosophers, and the never realized dream of humanity. The idea of an endless life seems to be coeval with the race; it is involuntary and constant, coming without instruction and never wholly disappearing from human consciousness.

The myths of bygone ages are filled with instances of fortunate or unfortunate mortals whose lives were prolonged far in excess of the usual allotment of years to most men. Some were blessed with the secret of renewing their youth continually; some possessed control of a power whereby they became independent of known physical laws; others, as a penalty, were doomed to live forever and never to taste of the repose of death. As examples of this notion may be cited the legend of the gods who drank from the pool of Umritsar; Tithonus, Endymion, and the poet Epimenides, Joseph of Arimathea, and St. John; Charlemagne, Frederic Barbarosa, Thomas of Erceldoune, and William Tell; the priests of Sophia, and the French victims of the Sicilian Vespers, Sebastian of Portugal, Tryggoason of Norway, Porsenna of Russia, and the Wandering Jew; The Dancers of Kolbeck, The Wild Huntsman, The Captain of the Phantom Ship, and many others.

Doubtless the fact that many good men live lives of unhappiness, while others who are vile and wicked seem to prosper and are happy, creates in many a sort of necessary belief in the existence of a future conscious life when all this injustice and inequality may be righted.

Before the idea of ultramundane immortality took shape in the minds of men, and later those who did not accept that theory, there were individuals who believed in the possibility of prolonging the present life indefinitely by ascetic practices, hoping thereby to wring the secret of rejuvenescence from nature, and another class who expected to achieve a similar result by the taking of some elixir, drug, or substance that contained the longed-for property therapeutically. In the Orient, societies still exist whose fellows hope to render themselves independent of the limitations that now affect ordinary human life. They aspire to physical immortality with the same confidence that they look forward to a time when they shall be able to transport themselves through space without regard to time or distance. In centers of civilization, numerically strong religious denominations flourish whose adherents furnish examples of those who await the realization of this "blessed hope" by devotion and the faithful performance of their various sectarian virtues. Isolated instances present, in these places and elsewhere, of men who seek this consummation by preferment, contending that there is no necessary relation existing between the art of living forever and the observance of any form of asceticism or faith; they base their opinion on the longevity enjoyed by such persons as Johannes de Temporibus, Thomas Parr, James Bowles, Henry Jenkins, John Rovin, Joseph Surrington, and others.

There is a fragment of truth in all these opinions. That the prolonged and intense application of the mind to psychical pursuits does not invest its owner with powers that, to the simply intellectual, are little less than miraculous, cannot now be denied; but it does not appear that the longevity of the people of China, Siam, Thibet, and British India, is on this account increasing either individually or collectively. That an organism like the human body should cease to exhibit all its capabilities immediately upon dying cannot be believed in the face of what is now known of posthumous manifestations. That physical immortality can ever be acquired by demolishing the structure it is one day expected to animate, that any kind of life can ensue upon the death of the body, or that eternal life can be acquired by the taking of some subtle potion, are all equally improbable.

The revival of ancient mediæval mysticism is a most remarkable part of the annals of this age. The belief in mascots, sprites, ghouls, gnomes, and vampires; the power to commune with the ghosts of the dear or hated dead; magic, mesmerism, and a hundred different phases of occultism; the search for the philosopher's stone, elixirs of life, etc., these inanities show an extraordinary state of affairs to obtain in the closing years of a century such as this has been. That modern science is much at fault, that it is sometimes misleading and occasionally at sea, no one who knows will deny. That some ancient beliefs, which were proven false by scientists of a later day, are again being clothed with the dignity of truths, is not denied; this, if it proves anything, demonstrates the impartiality of modern research rather than its futility or insufficiency. The knowledge now professed of the seen and unseen universe, is at least rational; nomenclatures have taken the place of symbols, legitimate inferentialism has taken the place of many aged superstitions and puerile faiths, the compass and sextant have displaced star and "cross-staff" gazing; steam, which superseded wind as a motor, is being itself rapidly displaced by electricity; we now have greater confidence in boards of health than in abracadabras; and the signal service officer of to-day has a greater following than the hedge-hog of yesterday. There are certain self-evident and other consecrated truths that no kind or amount of assumption or mysticism can ever change or displace; they are solutions that have been obtained according to the rules of the "fixed arithmetic of the universe." Along the ever widening horizon of human attainments there is a gradual shading into the realms of the unknown which, to the intellectually myopic, has the appearance of a dividing line, but which the profoundly scientific assure us is no more a demarcation than the circumference of one's field of vision, or the borders of the horizon. It is the mental explorations of the latter kind of men that promise such scope to the possible, newer and larger measures of success daily, and that, with every revision of the past, enlarges the circles of positive knowledge and rational belief.

At present, the idea of a continued and uninterrupted development seems to have taken complete possession of the race and to actually override our age; all really able books are full of it; it is revolutionizing the trend of all research; it is stirring the pretensions, beliefs, and sciences of every age and every people to their very depths; it cannot be wholly meaningless.

The fact that we live is proof that we have the power to live. The decreased death rate since 1861, which in England alone has added two thousand years to the lives of one thousand males during their productive period, demonstrates that mankind controls, in a measure at least, the duration of terrestrial life. The fact that a healthy human body exhibits an overplus of ability to arrange external conditions with advantage to itself during its developmental period, and for a number of years a perfect counterpoise between molecular destruction and reconstruction, evinces the power, for a time at least, of maintaining an equilibrium between itself and external condition. All phenomena show that force and matter are inseparable and unchanging in quantity; we think this has been proven by what is known of the transmutation of actual energy of every kind. It is now held by physicists, that all the known cosmic forces may result from the action of living bodies; that the organic and the inorganic are but the two ends of one and the same thing, that both are subject to the same natural laws; that vitality is no force or thing at all, doing no work whatever, nor existing contrary to or independent of the ordinary known physical forces; that a body acted upon by a given force will continue to move in the direction of that force until the impulse ceases; that there are no superlative, diminutive, or repeating decimals in nature; that action and reaction are always equal. In view of all this it seems to be a warrantable inference, that the human individual should continue to live as long as the earth exists and produces plants. There is nothing absurd in such a conclusion; it is a logical possibility. The fact not having come into actual existence as yet, is no reason that it can never be realized; because life is the only sum that does not at all times exactly contain all its factors, is evidence that the mathematics of being is not yet mastered rather than that it is faulty. Surely the way in which human life at this time meets its requirements is by no means to be regarded as the only way in which they can be met!

It does not seem consistent with present knowledge, however, to expect that perfect balance which the body maintains between itself and its environments for something like a score of years can be made perpetual, or even of very long duration, by the employment of any therapeutical agent taken before, during, or after this equation has been disturbed. The effects of all medicines are as transitory as their exhibition, they act as catalysis; when by assimilation remedies become part by the economy, they are foods.

That every creature must elaborate its own tissues, is an axiom in biology. The blood of one animal taken into the stomach of another acts as a certain amount of food, not as so much blood; even when injected directly into the circulation it is a question whether it has any effect different from that of the same amount of milk or even water of the requisite density, similarly employed. For the same reason, the introduction of a semeniferous fluid can become no permanent part of the body unless made so by nutrition, in which event it acts simply as so much food. We know what effect castration has on "hair and horn," but it does not appear that either of these in greater or less abundance adds to the individual longevity of its possessor. True, males, as a rule, are pugnacious and ornamental, but these qualities do not postulate greater power of life—in fact, there are numerous exceptions in nature. To the question, What effect has emasculation on the longevity of males? we have no statistics from which to frame an answer. The gelding is not shorter-lived than the stallion, and the eunuch frequently outlives the lord of the harem. A fluid capable of initiating the process of embryonic development certainly possesses dynamogenetic properties of some kind, and that its subcutaneous injection should cause the fires of life, smothered under the weight of years, to burn more brightly for a time, is not surprising; but other fluids not seminal have been known to do as much—indeed it is quite possible that the reaction succeeding the momentary pain consequent upon the insertion of the needle would do the same. But stimulation is not reconstruction; there has not been a continuation of the normal life; an exhibition of colored fire, a masquerade has occurred, not a reality; endless life is a question of extension, not one of patching.

I do not believe that the attainment of longer lease of life is possible by means of so simple a procedure that may be taken advantage of at any time in life. The secret of everlasting life, if there is one, is a clustered fact, every integral part of which will have to be well understood and scrupulously observed, for they will be found to be basic conditions underlying the whole period of the individual's life at least from his birth. These conditions must necessarily be complex, such as the knowledge whereby the present process of reproductive nutrition may be radically changed; a practical application of means that shall render the dynamic expense of living continually self-sustaining, etc. The realization of these requisites will alone make it possible to develop a quality of life that shall be of long, perhaps æonian, duration. The process will doubtless be slow and difficult, but it will not be more tedious and painful than was the evolution of man to his present state of excellence; to attain the age supposed to have been enjoyed by the patriarchs, need not necessarily be measured by geological time.

This desire for more abundant life is shown throughout the whole animate world in the instinct of self-preservation. It is greatest in those whose measure of life is already large, and most active in man, especially those who are in possession of the prizes of the world. It is only the weak, the aggrieved, and the persecuted who see in death "the friendly stroke;" to those who are strong, successful, and content, death is not a "grand and consoling idea."

—"To die, and go we know not where;
To lie in cold obstruction, and to rot;
This sensible warm motion to become
A kneaded clod—'tis too horrible."

This aversion to death and longing for life, inherent in all things that live and have the prospect of ultimately perishing, cannot be without cause. This dread of the one and yearning for the other is an irresistible law that obtains in all sentient creatures, and it acts as a sort of intuitive knowledge that the one can be avoided and that the other can be obtained. In its operation it behaves like that unconscious ratiocination shown by the birds of the air, the fishes of the sea, and the beasts of the field: in the phenomenon of migration; and like that, it shows a cyclic ebb and flow as genuine as man's belief in immortality, which has waxed and waned many times in his history. Whatever the causes may be that impel these migrations, they are equally indomitable whether affecting the inferior creatures or man himself. The same blind impetuosity that characterizes the journeys of locusts, tile fish, blue-throats, humming-birds, antelopes, wolves, and monkeys, marked the wanderings of the Cimmerians, Scythians, Jews, Mongols, Turks, Gauls, Goths, Huns, Avars, Negros, etc. These promptings certainly depend on the hopes and aspirations of life rather than on the expectation of dying.

May it not be that some psychic law now and then, here and there, takes hold on humanity and gives rise to this aspiration to perfection, and expresses itself in this longing for immortality?
JOHN S. LEONHARDT.

PRAYERS.

There are so many specimens of invocation to the deity, that one scarcely knows of which to make a selection. There are the supplicating, the didactic, the advisory, and many others too numerous to mention.

There, for instance, is the chaplain's prayer. Not a very pleasant nostrum, but regarded as necessary to the political conscience. About the principal merit of this "obsequium" is the salary attached to it; its efficacy is here apparent. Keeping the incentive in view, the prayer should be a good one.

Then we have the "universal prayer"—"father of all, in every age, in every clime adored." This prayer is progressive in its tendencies, a grand improvement upon its cotemporaries, but a little behind for this age of the world.

Something akin to it is Byron's "Prayer to Nature," a supplication sensibly imbued with the poetry of religion, but considerably lacking in logical sequences. Had the author displayed no more genius in "Childe Harold" or "Don Juan," Valhalla would scarcely have been his portion.

Again, we have the prayer of courtesy, delivered as a kind of compliment to the religious element. It is only a polite ceremonial, and understood by Infidels as a leave-taking of a dying mythology. This prayer is not addressed to an anthropomorphic God, but to that less tangible conception—a divine intelligence.

Possessing, it may be, less ornamentation, but more honesty, is the prayer of that miserable old outcast—Lear: "I will pray and then I'll sleep." Inferentially, this prayer was dutiful, but deliberate and procrastinating. The resolve is suggestive of the human, whether crowned or uncrowned; depending upon God, when all other dependence has forsaken it.

Again, we have the common, every-day prayer of the sanctuary. Of all specimens this is most farcical, the most despicable. Not only is it mercenary but diabolical. It is the essence of mockery, the quintessence of craft. No matter where its santimonious draw regales the ear, there is no mistaking it. It is a kind of compact between hypocrisy and malignancy. The master of ceremonies takes both heaven and hell under his jurisdiction, and proposes to manipulate the machinery according to his own sweet will; consigning all who do not submissively kneel to him to torture eternal, and audaciously imploring divine wrath to aid him.

But of all the prayers, there is but one kind that justly deserves the name, the truly spontaneous, the genuinely sincere. This is such as is heard in the hour of dire extremity—when the ship is sinking, when the house is burning. It wells up when all hope of earthly help has departed. It is the promptings of fear, the voice of distress, the irrepressible wail of despair. The hands of assistance hold out to it, and it thrills to agony the soul of pity. But like all other prayers to the "Supreme," its cries are useless, its pleadings are vain.

JUDICIAL OATHS.

III.

So far as the codes of Rome were true to fundamental principles they were Agnostic. The Atheist was equal to the believer in one god or in many gods. So far as warped and twisted by the priesthood, the code was bigoted and superstitious. Under the Christian theories, Adam and Eve were felons, their blood corrupted, their children cursed with the same disabilities, until, as the elect of God, they were redeemed by the blood of Christ. As the elect, with their blood cleansed and redeemed, the Christians arrogantly held themselves above other men, and claimed the right to disfranchise and exterminate heretics. This may have been the reason that Christianity was not tolerated in Rome. As practiced it denied the equal rights of manhood. Lecky says that "from the time of Tiberius, with the single exception of the Christians, perfect liberty of worship seems to have been granted to the professors of all religions in Rome."

The Christian emperors, when the Pandects were compiled, abandoned the views of the early Christians and accepted the superstitious idea of the oath. Tyler says: "I have never found the definition of an oath, or the form of an oath, implying the imprecatory clause, acquiesced in by the early Christians. The ages when the most dreadful imprecations were used, and a multiplication of them was relied upon as a greater security for the truth, were the ages of religious darkness and corruption."*

The Essenes did not believe in oaths. The Ebionites refused to swear. Tertullian, who lived in the second century, seems to have considered an oath as in no case allowable. Gregory Nazianzen, who lived in the fourth century, never took an oath. "Fly from every oath," he says. "How then shall we be believed?" he was asked. "By our word, and by a life that makes our word worthy of credit," he answered. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Epiphanius, Basil, and Theophylact seem to have considered all oaths forbidden. Augustine says, "We do not assert that we never swear; I myself swear, but only when compelled by urgent necessity; and then after weighing the matter well, I say with great fear, 'Before God; God is witness;' or 'Christ knows that so it is in my mind.'" He also says "that the oath is the fault, not of those who swear, but of the person who will not believe without an oath." St. Augustine was asked by one Publicola, "Whether it was lawful for us to put a man upon his oath whom we knew to be a heathen; and who consequently would swear by an idol." He answered in the affirmative, alleging the necessity of the case. "If you will not admit the oath of an idolater," says Augustine, "there is no other adequate method of forming a covenant with him, or of binding him to keep his word; or of preserving the public peace; nor is it forbidden by any law of God to employ for a good purpose the oath of that man whose fault consists in swearing by false gods, but who keeps the faith which he had pledged." He thus recognizes the Roman oath as a simple contract to tell the truth. Pope Pius ruled that an oath sworn according to the swearer's own superstition should be accepted as valid, because the only question is, "Has an oath been taken?" not "Whether that oath ought to have been taken."

These citations show that in the early centuries of the Christian era, the oath was not universally required, that the character of the man who testified was more important than the form of the oath, or the sacred person or thing by which he swore; and that a solemn asseveration by a truthful man was deemed a legal and valid oath. For some time the early Christians only called "the truth to witness," regarding that as a form of oath. This in fact is the Brahman's oath, and was probably the form used by all the oriental nations. "Whatever we speak as in the presence of God," says Athanasius, who died 373 A.D., "we Christians consider as spoken under an oath."

The form of an oath required by the Christian emperors is shown by the oath of fidelity required of each soldier. Vegetius says: "They swear by God, and by Christ, and by the Holy Spirit, and by the emperor's majesty, which next to God is to be loved and worshiped by mankind; for, when our prince hath once been invested with the title of Augustus, we are to pay to him, as to a present and a mortal god, faithful devotion and most watchful service." This joint divinity is recognized in the oath taken by the Council of Ephesus, which was by "the Holy and Consubstantial Trinity and by the piety and victory of the two masters of the world, Flavius Theodocius and Flavius Valentinus, the emperors."

The form of swearing by the gospels appears to have been instituted by Justinian, and after his time the most usual form required the witness to touch with his hand or kiss the book of the gospels, saying: "So help me God! and these holy gospels." Prior to that time, 527, 565 A.D., all religions were tolerated, and while philosophers asserted the independent dignity of reason, they resigned their actions to the demands of law and custom. The Christians had separate organized communities regulated by their own laws; but when Constantine embraced Christianity he legalized their ecclesiastical organization, and thenceforth they claimed as the just and inalienable rights of their order what they had been permitted to do. The whole body of the Catholic clergy was exempted from all service, public or private, and from all taxes, and the performance of their professional duties was accepted as a full discharge of their obligations to the government. The bishop was the censor of morals. The priesthood devised a system of canonical jurisprudence, which minutely defined the rules of evidence, the degrees of guilt, and the measure of punishment.

The Romans were descended from Aryan stock, and Aryan customs were preserved, so that the various tribes in Italy had many customs and rules of law in common. These Italian tribes constituted "all the world" to Rome, and when the members of other tribes came to Rome they were not admitted to citizenship, but were accorded certain rights, and, in determining their rights, there grew up a body of law called the Jus Gentium, or law of nations—that is, the law recognized in common by all these foreign tribes as well as by Rome. It was defined in Justinian's treatise, as "that which natural reason appoints for all mankind." Between the law based on reason, and the code of the church based on the absolute depravity of mankind, there was a direct conflict. Under the old Roman law the making of contracts was attended with ceremonies; and the makers felt themselves bound to observe all ceremonial contracts, no matter what the cost to themselves might be. These contracts were not deemed legal contracts based on a legal obligation, but contracts binding on the consciences of the makers. Gradually these ceremonies were dispensed with, and contracts were merged into pacts—or legal obligations.*

THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

OFFICIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

The first meeting of the Directors of the American Secular Union was held in New York on December 7, 1889, at which all the members of the Board were present, except Dr. Juliet H. Severance, who was detained home by an accident. After a free discussion, the following policy was adopted, and is hereby submitted to the members and friends of the society, in the hope of securing their prompt and active co-operation.

We recognize the fact that "there is a tide in the affairs of men" which should be "taken at the flood." There are certain subjects which are now uppermost in the public mind; and to these we call special attention, viz.: Church Taxation, Secular Public Schools, and no Sabbath Laws as such. To these three demands of Secularism we propose to give special attention, without abandoning the other six.

In pursuance of our work, the methods proposed are as follows:

I. To give earnest attention to organization. Many of our local auxiliary societies—which at one time numbered nearly three hundred or more—have become inactive and indifferent; while the National Reform Association and the American Sabbath Union are unusually active, having their agents at work everywhere, holding public meetings and subsidizing the press. We must counteract this influence by a more complete organization of our forces.

The records of such local societies as we have are incomplete and unreliable. We therefore call upon all who are interested in this subject to send us as soon as possible the names of all local societies, whether auxiliary to the American Secular Union or not, with the names of their officers, and the names of all persons who would be likely to be interested in this matter. We want to prepare a perfect inventory of all organizations and persons who are likely to work in our cause. We call for help in this regard.

If your local society is alive, or half-dead and inactive, or if you have no local society, and have only five persons who desire to be organized, let us know at once. Especially let the auxiliaries of the old National Liberal League now come to our assistance.

We invite the co-operation of all persons and societies, whether they agree with us in other matters or not, to unite with us in promoting some if not all of the "Nine Demands."

II. We invoke the assistance of all traveling lecturers and organizers in forming new societies; and in return we will aid them by maintaining a "Bureau of Information" regarding Liberal societies and active workers in the cause throughout the United States.

III. Especially do we invite the correspondence of all volunteer agents residing in the cities where state legislatures meet, and in every important center where local issues may arise, or where new legislation may be proposed; and we ask for information regarding the abuse of any existing laws involving the Secular principle of our government.

We propose to look after Secular interests through our auxiliaries, through local representatives, and through other competent agents, wherever these interests are endangered.

IV. We propose that our treasurer shall keep accounts of a special fund for the free distribution of pamphlets and Liberal literature generally, selecting the matter in accordance with the wishes of contributors. We hope to organize this work so as to make it a propaganda which shall be widely efficient, with the least possible waste and expense. We already have frequent calls for publications of this kind, and hope to be promptly supplied with money for this purpose.

V. We urge life members and annual members to help our secretary to compile correct lists, in order that we may know how many there are in our ranks, or interested in our cause, or able or willing to aid it.

VI. We urge all who have time, capacity, or inclination to act as local volunteer reporters, agents, or pickets, to make themselves known to us, and to say what they can and will do in such practical work as circulating petitions, distributing documents or attending and reporting the proceedings of public meetings, and especially of legislative bodies.

VII. We urge all who can, to subscribe money for the work of the Union, and, upon receipt of this announcement, to promptly send to the treasurer, Mr. F. C. Mende, 930 N. 17th street, Philadelphia, either some actual subscription, or some pledge of what they can do during the year, so that the extent of our work can be planned accordingly, and its execution insured.

VIII. We invite further suggestions as to the work to be done, and the means for accomplishing it; but especially do we ask that those who are willing to lend a hand in any way should communicate with us at once, as above suggested. Let each member and every Liberal wake up to the fact that it is his duty to answer to the roll-call and to inform us where he may be found, what he can do, and how much he will contribute. We are now prepared for a large amount of active, systematic work; but our plans presuppose the existence of live members and local branches; and our success will necessarily be proportionate to our support.

IX. We have taken an office at No. 930 N. 17th street, Philadelphia, as our headquarters, where our secretary is at work early and late, and where our president and treasurer make daily calls, to see that the battle for freedom is wisely directed. Write at once, and let us know what to depend upon.

A MISSING CHAMPION.

To the Editors of Freethought:

Brother Putnam has just left for San Diego. It rained for three days previous to the time appointed for his lecture here, and the churches united in petitioning their God to keep the windows of heaven open so as to forbid the holding of meetings by the Infidels. But their prayers did not avail. The sun god rose in his majesty one hour before the specified time for our meeting and, like magic, swept every cloud from the sky. And although the roads and streets were almost impassable, we had good audiences both afternoon and evening. And, best of all, we got four clergymen to the afternoon meeting. Had the roads been in their usual condition the large hall would have been crowded. Mrs. Porter and the Goepper Brothers furnished delightful music at each of our meetings, and Brother Putnam sowed the seeds of truth with great effect.

The next morning, having business in Tustin, a few miles away, I took Mr. Putnam in my cart and drove through the principal street of Santa Ana, in the direction of the Santa Fe depot. The orthodox observers thought Mr. Putnam was going to take the train for San Diego, and no sooner were we out of sight than some of them began to brag how one of their prominent preachers had backed Putnam down with a debating challenge; and how eager this clergyman was to debate the Sunday question with Mr. Putnam.

A namesake of mine offered to put up ten dollars that Mr. Putnam never refused to debate with any representative gentleman at any proper time or place. When we returned, and Mr. Putnam was told that the Christians had a champion eager for the fray, he said, "Bring him on, I am ready. I know no such challenge as they talk about. I will delay going to San Diego and debate with him as long as he chooses."

This was a bomb they were not expecting, and on receiving Mr. Putnam's answer, their champion could not be found. Runners were dispatched in all directions to hunt him up, and twenty-four hours were given to find him. This morning we hunted up one of the ministers who had boasted about his champion and he meekly told me that his man didn't care to debate the question.

I told him if they succeeded in finding a man who did wish to debate upon any of the issues made in Mr. Putnam's lectures, he would find a representative man to meet him. So we intend to hold their noses close to the grindstone. Yours for education,

[From the Washington National View.]

Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, New Jersey offers his valuable services to all those in need of a kind, sympathetic and skillful physician. Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been assailed and exposed by the press, but, Dr. Fellows, a specialist, in his line, stands foremost in his profession, and the encomiums showered upon him publicly as well as in private, are flattering evidences of the high appreciation and confidence his long and conscientious devotion to his specialties in his profession have so justly merited for him, and it is safe to trust him.

A Testimonial.

WEST LIBERTY, O., Aug. 12, 1888.
DR. R. P. FELLOWS—Dear Sir:—The remedy you sent is working like a charm. I am completely surprised the way it acts upon the organs. Have only been using it one week, and that weakness, (seminal weakness) is coming out all right. Yours respectfully, J. H.

REMARKS—The above is a fair sample of the hundreds of testimonials received from all parts of the United States, from young, middle-aged and elderly men, suffering from various kinds of sexual complaints, but who are now cured by my External Application, the greatest of all known remedies for this class of diseases. As I am an out-and-out Liberal I trust the Freethinkers of the Land will give me their patronage, and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors.
DR. FELLOWS.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future

Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A system of easily-comprehended rules and Chart by which any one can readily learn to cut Dresses, Basques, etc., in the most perfect manner.

It contains the best ideas resulting from thirty years experience with Dress Charts and Tailor systems. It is adapted to the modern requirements of dress, and is used and indorsed by the best professional dressmakers of the East. It is as far superior to old methods as the steam car is to the stage.

Price of the Chart, with full instructions, $10. By special arrangement we are able to offer the readers of FREETHOUGHT a liberal discount, for a short time. Write for particulars if you are at all interested in matters of household economy. This chart will save any family five times its cost in a single year.

Send 25 cents with bust and waist measure and number of inches from natural waist up as high as you wish the dress underneath the arm, for a sample pattern drafted to order, with full directions for making up, if you wish to test the system. To take the first measure correctly, place the tape above the bust, underneath the arms, and straight across the back, drawing it very tight. Write figures plainly. THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"The Glory of Infidelity" was one of the poet-secretary's happiest efforts, and ranks with the best speeches of the Congress.—New York Truth Seeker.

Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity" is one of the ablest defenses of Freethought to which I have ever listened. JOHN E. REMSBURG.

The lecture was "The Glory of Infidelity." No man or woman could hear it without being inspired by the heroic Infidel manhood and womanhood coming down to us as a rich inheritance through the dreary ages of the past, and pointing with glorious hope to the "New Heaven and Earth." J. F. BECK.

I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of all when I say that for a lecture of its character, Mr. Putnam has never been surpassed and seldom equaled on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords. "The Glory of Infidelity" fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic Secular sermon.

The following composition was handed in a few days ago, by one of the smaller girl pupils, to the teacher of a department primary in one of the city schools: "A cow is an animal with four legs on the under side. She tail is longer than the legs, but is not used to stand on. The cow kills flies with her tail. The cow has big ears that wiggles on hinges; so does her tail. The cow is bigger than the calf, but not so big as an elephant. She is made so small that she can go into a barn when nobody is looking. Some cows are black and some hook. A dog was hooked once. She tossed the dog that killed the cat that worried the rat. Black cows give white milk; so do other cows. Cows chew cuds, and each finds its own chew. That is all there is about cows."
