"I may be wrong in many things, I cannot be wrong in this,—the Catholic Church is the only true Church," is the speech Cardinal Manning puts into the mouth of one Morely, in Loss and Gain. In like spirit, one of Mr. Moody's converts gave his experience. "I don't know much," said this man out of the depths of assured bliss; "but what I do know, I know for certain." One would not quarrel with another's happiness. So long as Catholic or Protestant can cling joyfully to some conviction or experience, let them have peace. Only, if in the exuberance of their bliss and their charitable feeling for others, they trouble you to dissuade you from following your own predetermined course, then you may bear your own happy testimony concerning the certainties on which your life is stayed. And one may indulge in a little criticism, too. Indeed, to keep even with the aggressiveness of many zealous Christians whose mission is to "go into the world and preach the gospel," one has often to say a word both as regards the "gospel" preached and the manner of the preachers. The case of our Methodist brother requires little comment. He was quite competent to affirm truthfully his own experience. He was happy, and he knew that "for certain." If there is any approach to infallibility possible, it is when one describes the state of his own feelings. The man had reasoned somewhat. He had said to himself, "Whereas, I was lost and unhappy, now I am saved and happy." One may question his declaration that he had been "lost" and was now "saved," possibly; but that he had passed from unhappiness to happiness, is a fact lying so wholly within his ability to report, no further words are needed. Let him keep that happiness while he can. But when he insists upon it "in season and out of season," that you are unhappy, and need to go through precisely his own experience in order to get rid of said unhappiness, then you must tell him what you think about it, and, it may be, that he ought not to be foolish, even "for Christ's sake." Our Catholic brother presents a different point. With him, feeling, personal experience, do not count. He has, as in these days we are told, a rational conviction. He stands on reason. That is, he has convinced himself by a rational procedure that the Church he battles for is "the only true Church." And he says that the office of this true Church is to teach the infallible truth. This is the conclusion he has reached, and he "cannot be wrong." The criticism one must offer him, is, How is it, friend, you were able to reach this certitude while you were yet left to your own fallible reason? A establishes himself in a temple as the sole infallible oracle of divine truth. B, less presumptuous, confesses that he himself does not know truth from error. But, providentially, he is not left blindly to grope his way. Though he cannot rely on his own reason to detect truth from error, there is B, who can save him; he knows this someone else whose infallibility is his refuge. In this he "cannot be wrong"; and yet it is a conclusion arrived at by that same fallible reason of his he so fully distrusts. He may reply that his own reason is competent to do all he undertakes. It is one thing to say what infallible spiritual truths are, and another to determine who has been commissioned to teach them. This latter he can do; the former is beyond his ken. Without going into the course of reasoning by which he establishes the right and ability of his Church alone to see and announce spiritual truth, he may be reminded of the great danger he runs in renouncing his own privilege to "judge all things, and hold fast that which is good." As equal with his fellows, he must use his own eyes and judgment,—accepting their word when he is without reason to doubt it, but always reserving the right to question, if he is so prompted. Also, he should consider that it is one thing to take the authority of others in matters that do not directly concern our own personal character, and a quite different thing to live under their guidance where character is concerned. We must not be machines, running ourselves under advice of even superior minds. Whatever others may contribute must become our own by adoption into our blood. It must flow through our lives freely as though it were—as then it will be—our own. Not rules of guidance, but principles of life, serve us truly. One must be in earnest, and he can only so be when the Law is written in his own heart. Commanded from above—Independent of his conscience, by virtue of insight and appreciation,—he is the unliving mockery and empty soul in whom we all refuse to take delight. "I strive," said one, "when I am uncertain of the right course to pursue, to think what Jesus would have done in like circumstances." This bit of diplomacy seemed to satisfy her mind. To decide at once and directly what the right and the wrong was, was more than she could do. Being fallible, she distrusted her reason. And yet, like our Catholic friend, she reasoned. She said, "If Jesus were here, of course he would do right. And if he did right, he would do so and so. Therefore, I will do so and so." By this roundabout way she made use of her own judgment without knowing it. The mischief was, the principles she adjudged to be right, because Jesus would have used them, never became a permanent part of her life, but were intermittently displayed as occasions furnished extra pressure. Besides, had the "right" Jesus would have sanctioned not been right, the evil would have been twofold.

To the protest of a Roman Catholic brother, a friend of ours once made reply:—

"There is indeed one true Church. The soul is that Church. Seek it not in outwardness. Go not far over the earth to join the visible institutions of men. They are the habitations men have built in their wanderings. They have strayed from home, and lost their way in outer darkness. Pity the lost, and be glad if in their wandering they gain any solace. But do thou, O friend, return unto thine own soul, and be at peace. Nor shalt thou worship there alone. It is thy soul—it is my soul—the common soul of all men—the one universal Church wherein is no schism. Art thou a worshipper there—thou shalt need no creed, nor badge, nor outward sign, nor ritual, nor priest, to make thee a welcome among its devotees over the wide earth. Whosoever shall ask thee, 'To what church dost thou belong?' is thereby confessed no true worshipper, but a wanderer and a stranger. For all right worshippers know of a surety one another, not by word but by spirit. Be not impatient for all truth. If thou hast the spirit of truth, it will suffice thee on the road. Thou shalt then in truth find peace, and no more distrust and fear God. Thou wilt know—if thou art a worshipper in the soul—that no outward danger can assail thee. With joy unspeakable thou mayst dwell in this sanctuary; thou and thy neighbor equal with thyself, for there shalt be no self-righteousness, neither any abasement there.

"Beware only of the limitations of speech; and yet fear not this overmuch. Let thy speech be a song and not a fetter, and the invisible, unspeakable soul shall shine through all thy words."

AS TO THE STRIKE.

No amount of criticism of the course pursued by the strikers will set aside the one issue it all implies. There is, we do not say there ought to be, a deadly war going on between labor and capital. In vain the talk about their interests being identical. If they were so, would it not be manifest? Does the history of the last few weeks show any such identity and friendliness? What is the record of these exciting times but the explosion of long pent-up feuds?

Whose is the fault?

Let us grant at once that this collision is not something made up and wilful on the part of individuals on either side. Is it not rather the natural outcome of a system all parties agree in maintaining? The "strikers" demand "justice," and, as an increase in their pay would undoubtedly be in the direction of justice, they have our sympathy; but were they by some sudden reverse of fortune transformed into a rich railroad corporation, other people would have to "strike" against them. They, no more than the "capitalists" they denounce, have forsaken the motto, "Sell high, buy low,"—that is, take all you can get, and give as little. The conflict between capital and labor would not end by an exchange of opportunities.

The good result of the "strike" will be apparent, when all parties are stimulated by it to study in earnest the question of Equity.

THE WAY TO LOOK AT IT.

The late riots are said to constitute a great national disgrace. They were also a surprise at home and abroad. The outbreak of the Civil War had been partially anticipated. Slavery was confessed to be so inconsistent with American institutions that an "irrepressible conflict" was inevitable, which sooner or later would flame into open war. But the idea of an "irrepressible conflict" between labor and capital on American soil seemed too ridiculous for any but people crazed and beside themselves, to entertain. Here, under the benign shelter of the Republic, lion and lamb would lie down together. So much was expected of a republican form of government. Under a monarchy or a despotic government, labor might be expected to plot insurrection or drift into riot. That would be a natural sequence of such governments. But to find such things happening under democratic rule, is the new sensation we had not anticipated. It is, however, proved true, that a new form of government is not the panacea for all our ills. Industrial and social problems are not much helped by governments of any description. As a rule, it may be said that whatever is touched by politics is blighted. The real ground of hope for this country was that the non-interference of our government in much that concerns the people would be a valuable aid to their adjusting their individual interests, including labor and its just rewards. To the extent that non-interference has been observed, this benefit may have been reaped. But evidently the labor problem is not to be solved by any amount of political interference or forbearance. It is a question by itself, to be seen truly only when kept free from a political atmosphere. So seen, it is not in any of its turbulent features of American origin; but as much of an inheritance as was the so-called "peculiar institution" of the South. It may be a "national disgrace," and the riots growing out of it may also be disgraceful, but not in the sense that they are a real outcome of American ideas. America is disgraced, if at all, by tolerating an industrial system which spawns poverty, ignorance, deeds of blood. This toleration, however, is in a fair way to be outgrown. As we outgrow the idea that men could be enslaved as mere chattels, so we shall advance from the idea that men can remain as the mere appendages of other people's wealth.

"FEELING."

It will save a vast deal of useless speculation if it can be shown that the question of wages is wholly removed from all considerations of justice or injustice, right or wrong, fair or unfair dealing. We are told that "feeling," which arises from a perception of moral distinctions, has no place whatever in the labor market. Everything there is of necessity governed by a natural law which no amount of suffering and complaining can in the least modify or repeal. Philanthropy may come in to mitigate distress, but all theories of justice are barred out absolutely. The law exists in the nature of things, and is above all disturbance by human will. Labor being for sale in the market, the price is settled by the amount there is of it. The purchaser is to pay no more than he is obliged to. He is obliged to pay only so much as labor when down is obliged to sell itself for. On the other hand, he is forced to pay all labor when up is pleased to demand. When labor is plenty the purchaser has the advantage. When it is scarce labor has the advantage. This advantage either side—helpless under the "irreversible law"—does right to make the most of. Tears are unavailing. The "law" does not know what they mean.

Now if this be the true state of the case there is nothing more to be said. All the talk about the "selfish greed of corporations," of the misery it produces, flies wide of the mark. Great or small "dividends" do not concern us. "Grinding the face of the poor" is nothing; for it is not the fault of those seeking dividends if the faces of the poor are ground; it is a natural result of the workings of this supreme law which governs and controls rich and poor alike. Hence, it is said, "feeling" in this vast problem of labor and its rewards has no part to play but that of mischief.

It appears, however, that in spite of this oft-proclaimed and imperative "law," "feeling" will not subside. What is more astonishing is, nearly all who profess to stand by it loyally, as intelligent citizens ought to, betray in greater or less degree symptoms of the common weakness. In spite of superior intelligence they get betrayed very often into expressions of "feeling." They go so far that they even desire legislative interference,—a new law, arbitrary; the expression of man's will, embodying certain notions of justice. In short, since the natural law is without "feeling," they propose that it should in some form be supplemented with a made-law which shall contain some grains, if not ounces, of what "feeling" will pronounce to be "righteousness." Others look only to a change of public sentiment, and think capitalists and corporations should be held in check by being "frowned upon." But whatever form it may take, the proposition for the introduction of "feeling" in any shape is a confession that the "law of supply and demand" does not or ought not to regulate the whole character of our business life.

A RELATED CORRECTION.

Now that the official report, in pamphlet form, of the proceedings of the recent annual meeting of the Free Religious Association is before the public, I feel impelled to say one or two things by way of correcting certain misapprehensions under which one of the prominent speakers appeared to labor. These things might better have been said at the time, and I was strongly moved to say them; but the necessity of not interfering with specially invited speakers, and the distractions of my office as Secretary, then prevented. But it is never too late to correct a mistake in which lies a personal injustice.

I refer especially to a remark made by our good friend and brother from England, William Henry Channing,—whom it was so good to see and hear again, with all his old-time enthusiasm for humanity, that it seems a most ungracious thing to criticise anything he said. But I know, both from his general desire to be accurate and just, and from his special interest in and sympathy with the free religious movement, repeatedly expressed, that he will earnestly wish to be set right on the matter in question.

First, it seemed rather strange and unaccountable that our friend should have had the doubts which he had expressed in his speech, about the cordiality of his reception there speaking as a "Christian," a name which we all knew previously that he highly prized and was wont to use in no merely technical sense. But when, interrupting President Frothingham, who, in endeavoring to remove these misgivings, made the very correct assertion that the Association had "repeatedly, in the most honest and earnest manner, asked men of all views, of all persuasions, of all possible definitions of religion, to address us from this platform," Mr. Channing said, "I grant that of you; but it is not true of others,—it is not true of Francis Ellingwood Abbot," he fell into a great error of which his mind ought to have been disabused on the spot. Mr. Frothingham's rejoinder did not meet all the necessities of the case. Mr. Abbot, unfortunately, was several hundred miles away and could not speak for himself; and the "others," implicated by the same charge, were not mentioned by name, and of course made no reply. And so by silence the imputation appears to have been acquiesced in, that some persons in the directorship of the Association, of whom Mr. Abbot in particular was one, were not in favor of that large comprehensiveness in the selection of speakers which Mr. Frothingham had described, but would, on the contrary, invite and welcome addresses only from speakers of certain theological views,—excluding, especially, believers in Evangelical Christianity, or even those who, like Mr. Channing, adhere by earnest conviction to the Christian name.

Now, if this accusation be true of any persons, then, certainly, such persons are violators of both the spirit and letter of the Association's Constitution. But having been in a position, from the beginning of the Association to know pretty intimately the views of its officers on this point, I feel justified in saying that the charge appears to me to be wholly groundless. And I am sure that our friendly, sympathetic brother never could have made it, and especially could have had no doubt of his own warm welcome, if his residence these many years abroad had not removed him from direct knowledge of the facts. In truth, representatives of widely variant religious opinions have spoken on the platform of the Association both in its conventions and its lectures. There has not been the slightest hint of a suggestion, of which I am aware, that a man should not be invited as a speaker because he loves and adopts the name of "Christian." The only direct difference of opinion on the subject of invitations that has come to my knowledge, is with regard to repeating invitations to prominent persons of Orthodox views who have once declined, and who in some cases have treated the Association with disrespect. Mr. Abbot and some others have not thought that liberality required us to do this; and some members of the Executive Committee have not been so urgent as others for that expression of liberality which consists in extending invitations in certain theological quarters where there is little or no likelihood of their being accepted; but the difference of opinion on this point is simply a matter of degree. No one, to my knowledge, would take the ground that prominent representatives of Evangelical faith who had again and again declined invitations, should continue to be urged by yearly invitations to come, nor, on the other hand, that any person who had any desire to come, should be excluded from the Association's platform, or not received with courteous welcome there, merely because of difference of theological views. Surely, neither Mr. Abbot nor any others of the Free Religious committee have ever taken this latter ground.

Some of Mr. Abbot's critics believe that his conviction of the antagonism between Free Religion and Christianity, or his "anti-Christian" position, tends to make free religion narrow and to keep its platform exclusive. And this opinion, of course, if they have formed it to the best of their judgment, they have a right to hold and express. But it is their inference from his view, and not his own. His own interpretation of his position makes it broad and inclusive, and all his practical action as a member of the Free Religious committee will, I believe, be found in the direction of a large inclusiveness, on the basis of freethought, and not at all of a nature to sustain such a charge as was made by our American-English brother,—made, however with no intentional injustice, but probably in some such inferential way as that just suggested. The injustice was rather ours who knew and felt it to be unjust at the time, and yet omitted to make the needed correction. And for this reason I have tried here, thus tardily, to make such amends as I can for the neglected duty, doing it the more freely, however, in the temporary absence of Mr. Abbot from his editorial post.

NOTES FROM ABROAD.

MELBOSE, Scotland, July 15, 1877.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

Perhaps you will be interested in a few brief jottings of some of the hasty observations of a free religious traveller in Great Britain. In Ireland I heard but little of religious matters, except in visiting one of the large schools in Dublin. The Marlboro School is the largest school under government control in Ireland. It partakes of the characters of our normal, high, grammar, primary, and industrial schools. It is not what we call free, each pupil paying a small sum per week proportioned to its parents' means; but it is free in this sense: that is, it is open to all sects and classes on these terms. In this school they have five different kinds of religious service every morning—Catholic, Church of England, Presbyterian, Wesleyan, and Unitarian,—the children attending whichever the parents direct, or being excused from any if so decided on entering school. The teachers say that this system works well, and that the differing faiths cause no jealousy in school or quarrels on the play-ground. They cannot conceive of a wholly secular school. In the north of Ireland I went into a small government school and found the morning hour given up to a most parrot-like repetition of Scripture lessons. I believe Ireland is the only country, except New England and her daughters, where Unitarianism is a power; and I fancied I could see its legitimate fruits there in respect for culture and a high standard of morality. I hear Unitarianism spoken of with great respect in Ireland, even by those of differing views.

The bill before the House of Commons for closing the public houses for the sale of liquor on Sunday in Ireland, was causing much excitement when I was in London. I had the pleasure of hearing one debate upon it. Its advocates say that the best people of Ireland unanimously demand this law, and that it is a strange anomaly to grant a license to sell liquor on Sunday, when the sale of the most harmless articles of merchandise is forbidden. The remonstrants reply that it is cruel to deprive the poor man of his social enjoyment on Sunday, which the rich man may have in his own house; and add the usual arguments against restrictive laws. But the interesting point is, that the remonstrants charge the friends of the bill with acting in the interests of Sabbatarianism; and some of its advocates in the House, to rebut this charge, declared themselves in favor of opening museums and other places of innocent amusement on Sunday; and every such declaration was greeted with much applause.

Mr. Peter A. Taylor has a bill before the House for opening museums and art galleries on Sunday, and it may encourage our Free Religious Association friends who felt disappointed at the small attendance at the Convention last fall, to know that he referred to that in his speech on the bill, and found valuable aid in the speeches of Mr. Gannett and others on that occasion. But although every allusion to the bill is received with favor in the House, it is voted down by members who know that their country constituencies are not yet ready for such a measure. But one cannot see these noble museums—the British Museum, the Crystal Palace, South Kensington, and others—without feeling that they are in the right line of succession to the cathedral and the abbey in the great church of humanity, and that it is a cruel wrong to shut the people out from them on the one day when they could enjoy them freely. It points the injustice that many places, as the Zoological and Horticultural Gardens, are open to proprietors and their friends, and are thronged by a fashionable crowd who have nothing to hinder them from attendance all days in the week.

Arriving in London on Saturday, I went to Westminster Abbey on Sunday morning hoping to hear Dean Stanley, but was disappointed. He did not preach. But the next Sunday I heard him in a more humble church, St. Stephen's, I think, where he preached on behalf of a charity, the School Ship for Boys. I found Dean Stanley's name called forth bitter feelings in England. I was told that he was a very uninteresting preacher, that I should not hear him, etc., and found that my informant thought his action in advocating the opening of museums on Sunday gave great offence. Others spoke of him with cordial admiration. He is a quiet, refined, delicate looking man, with decided marks of age. His voice is somewhat feeble and not particularly fine, but not unpleasant to me. It was not a great sermon; indeed the English service is so long—an hour and a quarter before the sermon,—that the congregation are impatient of a discourse more than twenty minutes long, and it is hard to treat any subject fully in that time. But it was to me very delightful. His subject was "Baptism," and he illustrated his theme with the same thorough knowledge of history and the same vivid imagination which make his books so delightful. His straightforward candor was admirable. He did not twist history or Scripture to support certain views, but gave the facts as they were. He said that the immersion in the flowing waters was the apostolic form of the rite, and that it was essential to the original idea of baptism, which denoted the sudden, entire cleansing from old errors. He traced it to its origin in earlier Eastern religions, and compared it to the consecration of the Knights of the Bath. He also emphasized the original meaning of the act as producing personal cleanliness, which was a religious duty as well as the holiness of soul symbolized by it. He said the Church, for reasons of convenience, had departed from the apostolic custom, both as regards the actual immersion and the baptism of infants. The whole sermon, with the exception of a few customary phrases, was as free and liberal as one could desire.

The next Sunday I heard Mr. Conway at his Chapel, being desirous to see his work there. His discourse was a very brilliant one,—on the necessity of union among reformers to conquer old abuses. His service is very simple, and his congregation has the same strong, clear-headed, radical look which we see in independent churches at home. The chapel is usually crowded, and was quite full, though the day was very stormy. I was sorry not to have another Sunday to hear Mr. Voysey, whose service I heard very highly spoken of.

One virtue seems to be sufficiently cultivated in Great Britain, that of charity. It seemed to me to be the leading business of Dublin and even London. Hospitals, asylums, houses for poor Protestants, sailors' homes, and all manner of institutions greeted you at every turn. There were boxes for the poor not only in churches, but even in restaurants. In spite of all this the streets swarm with poverty, and one's heart aches at the constant eagerness of poor wretches to found a claim for a penny on some little service done you. The poor in London, not only the wretched poor, but the poorer middling class, wear the saddest expression I have ever seen on human faces. I know not why, but Irish poverty carries a certain jollity and ease of manner with it; but the London poor have hungry, sad-eyed, hopeless, careworn faces. They need some new gospel to bring them good tidings besides the litany, which is sung daily in all the churches of the kingdom.

To-day, passing a stormy Sunday in this little Scottish town, famed for its beautiful ruins of Dryburgh and Melrose, I went in to the service of the Free Church of Scotland,—the descendant of the old church of Puritan protest against the interference of the State with the congregation. The preacher was a stranger, who gave the commonplaces of the Calvinistic views without much original thought or unction; but what interested me was the congregational singing of the old version of the psalms, with its quaint forced metre, led by a precentor who did not seem to have been chosen for his melodious voice. The Free Church is said to be the most vital and active of any in Scotland, and it will lend powerful aid in the disestablishment of the Church of England,—a measure which seems to be the next step in progress, but which will be most hotly contested, as of course very great interests are involved in it. In seeing these beautiful old abbeys with their grounds, and the grand cathedrals, one cannot wonder at the regret with which they were given up; but it seems as if the world might sometime learn the great spiritual law which Jesus taught, that he who loveth his life will lose it, and that it is only by recognizing the new demand and conforming to it that the old can be saved. The old castle at York may stand, since it is an asylum for the blind; that at Durham shelters the courts of law, and the Cathedral grounds are converted into a public promenade on the banks of the river, which ensures the interest of the public in their preservation; but my radical heart acknowledges that Cromwell and John Knox did service sorely needed at the time, even while my æsthetic sense mourns over the destruction of so much beauty. Something we must yet have, giving us the harmony and beauty of the old, with the freedom and equality of the new. I have seen nothing which prophesied it so fully to my mind, as the Handel Festival in the People's Palace, at Sydenham. Let it be open on the legal holiday, consecrated by religious associations, and I believe it will become more than ever a power of good for humanity.

Yours,

E. D. C.

LABOR NOTES.

S. H. M.

—The times are not "out of joint"—they are joining.

—The "question of questions" with all parties is rapidly coming to be, "What shall we do to be saved?"

—A lady writing in the Christian Statesman thinks the "strikes" are caused by "Sabbath-breaking."

—"The laborer is worthy of his hire." This applies to capitalists, as well as to everybody else.

—"The most successful speculator is he who can create the most want in the community, and extort the most from it."—Josiah Warren. He calls it "civilized cannibalism."

—Says the New York Times, "The strike will be worth all it cost, if it will put labor in a more reasonable relation with capital, and thus avert some of the dangers which have just showed their front so admirably."

—The opinions of the "President and his ministers" on the labor question, says the New York Journal of Commerce, "are not wanted or proper to be given." It advises against any legislative interferences which "would be specially injurious in its operation on the laboring classes, while, of course," (?) "it would be exceedingly harmful to capitalists."

—We are no convert to the creed of "Social Democracy." Such a harum-scarum time of it as we should all have with such a governmental perpetual interference shop, would, in our judgment, set us all crazy, and leave no chance for "equity," or aught else. Besides, Liberty isn't to be wiped out to keep us from starving.

—We believe in individual enterprise and in individual equity. We believe that no amount of political or social combination will help the people of this country out of their troubles. What we want is not "common property," but to learn when we have our own and not our neighbor's; or, rather, we need to know when we are getting our own and not our neighbor's; for it is in the getting (accumulation) of the property we call ours, that Satan creeps in to stir up the mischief.

—The same lady, quoted above, remarks, "We remember when the Ohio River was full of splendid side-wheel steamers, nearly all running on Sabbath and carrying bars; the river is now empty of floating palaces; property embarked in them was in nearly all cases lost," etc. "When the Lord came to claim his dues for the Sunday profits" he took everything, and left the "owners beggared." The Governor ought to have "called out the militia."

—It is also stated by the same Christian writer, that "if every Sabbath boat and train were wrecked on the trip, then men would begin to see what God means; but he delays, and men 'think that he is altogether such an one as themselves.'" In this, however, they are mistaken, for he is "grinding slowly, but exceeding small." With a touch of humanity, yet bound to save her Christianity, she adds: "It seems to a degree hard-hearted to look on at terrified cities, at flaming property, at dead and wounded men, and say, 'These are God's reprisals for Sabbath desecration.' But is it not true?"

—Still another quotation seems to be worth while: "With the individuals comprising such corporations, God has an after and spiritual reckoning; but with the corporations themselves, as they shall have no existence in an eternal world, he is bound to deal here in the realm of the physical." Exactly, "corporations are quiless." We have long thought as much. But here follows a bit of retributive doctrine which "workmen" must not get hold of; not if at the same time they propose to heed Christ's admonition, "Be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect." "When God has been protesting 'Ye have robbed me,' and when those who are guilty are always under the reach of his hand, the hour must come, for the sake of his own honor, when he takes forcibly (?) out of their grasp all that has been robbed from him."

—Some two years ago the Boston Herald had an editorial on the "Industrious Poor," urging that, as there was a large class in the city, working long hours, frugal, temperate, and in every way deserving, that could not, if overtaken by a week's sickness or idleness, keep want from the door, something should be done in the way of charity by the rich, and suggested the formation of a Bureau of Charity. Now, a permanent class of "industrious poor," is one of those "conditions" civilization ought to abolish. Then we could all talk with better show of reason about the "disciplines" of life.

—It ought not to be necessary to point out that the two classes, rich and poor, are unlike in this: that the one, the rich, is guilty of all iniquity, and the other, the poor, we were going to say, of all virtue. But it seems that something of the sort needs a vast deal of iteration. As the fact stands to-day, it is a question of ins and outs. One class is as good as the other. Both mean to get in and to stay in. The rich man who was poor has got in. The poor man would like to get in if he could, and once in he would not concern himself any more than the other man with what became of all whose fortune it was to swell the ranks of those compelled to stay out.

—No one will ever know how near Boston came to a riot after the meeting in Hampshire Hall, when the crowd in large numbers gathered at the Boston and Albany Railroad. The papers stated that the police offered to "clean the crowd out"; but the railroad officials said, "No; let them alone, and there will be no disturbance." It was a wise conclusion. The appearance of the police with a demand for the crowd to "disperse," would, without doubt, have led to results it would have been any thing but pleasant to record. Left to itself, the crowd melted away into order and a peaceful night.

—Nothing is more ill-advised than the increase of the standing army as a precaution against riots. The attention of the country should be turned to some precaution against the disposition to riot. Remove the injustice there is in the land, or strive to, before you rush so eagerly to arms. The trouble is, no surer way to provoke and increase disturbance can be devised than this turning to a greater reliance on "troops." It will make you arrogant, and blind you to the encouragement of right principles. Once begin the increase of the army and you will be obliged to continue. Every new soldier will fan the flame of discontent. Leave this thing alone, if you wish "law and order" to prevail.

—"The equal distribution of wealth!" exclaims our neighbor at the table; "what nonsense." And then he goes on for ten minutes at full speed, showing how wealth once equally distributed would rush back into a few hands again, and everybody be as bad if not worse off than before. In vain that we say, "Equitable distribution." In vain that we say the "distribution" spoken of comes naturally in the receiving each man his own earnings. "All bosh," he continues; "equal or equitable, it's all the same, you've got to 'root hog or die'; take what you can get, live or starve." Verily, every man to his own opinion!

—And yet, our neighbor across the table is consistent. "We are all under the law," he says; he means the "law of supply and demand." We hesitate here,—for has he not already remarked, "A man writes himself down an ass who does not believe in that?" He says, "Whatever gets into the market, has a market-value. Can you keep labor out? Then it must go for what it will bring." The assurance of the man is amazing. You would think the universe stood at his back. Perhaps it does. There are others who put on quite as bold a front, and curl their lips in a fashion equally contemptuous and withering. If we venture to suggest that there may be in the bare possibility of things a chance for those who are disposed in spite of the temptations that beset them, in the exchange of their labor to exchange equivalents, he laughs till he grows red in the face.

—Mr. Beecher says, "No, not if a man smokes and drinks beer." There is so little reason in all this talk about the poor "drinking and smoking"—as if they were alone born into the world to be patterns of all the virtues,—that it is astonishing good-meaning, intelligent persons rehearse it. But grant that the poor, every "tramp" does smoke and drink beer when he can get it. What is the significance of it all? When Rip Van Winkle was told to "drink away and drown his sorrow," he replied that his sorrow was his wife, and she "wouldn't drown." But most men can "drown their sorrow," or find temporary full of their troubles in smoke and beer. People who have no outlook, no substantial hope, but an "oppressive consciousness that such a thing as rising out of their condition is almost without the range of possibility," may be pardoned, nay, may be expected to seize such solace as is within their reach. We do not like the perfumes of tobacco, but we never yet could censure a poor man, who had no higher resource, for the free use of his pipe. Mr. Beecher, men "smoke" and "drink beer" because they get "a dollar a day."

—Mr. Beecher complains of "careless reporting." He did not say "bread and water was good enough for a workingman." His remarks were as follows: "Now, at this point, the operatives of the great railroads conspire and rebel because their wages have been cut down. As if they were the only ones in this country whose wages have shrunk! As though they were the only men who feel the pressure of the times in a reduction of their pay! They are not special sufferers. We are all under discipline. They suffer only what the great mass of the people are suffering. It is said that they cannot support their families on the wages that they receive. Very likely they cannot as they would like to support them. It is said that a dollar a day is not enough for a wife and five or six children. No, not if a man smokes and drinks beer. It is not enough, if he expects that they are going to have not only food and raiment, but amusements that are expensive. It is not enough, if they are to live as he would be glad to have them live. It is not enough to enable them to live as perhaps they would have a right to live in prosperous times. But is not a dollar a day enough to buy bread with? Water costs nothing; and a man who cannot live on bread is not fit to live. What is the use of a civilization that simply makes men incompetent to live under the conditions which exist? Education and civilization are designed to make a man a universal instrument of improvement, and to make it possible for him to live and be happy under any conditions. The man who is cultured away from the power of self-denial is falsely cultured. The idea which Mr. Beecher is evidently striving to enforce in all this is undoubtedly a good one; namely, that a man should trim himself to his circumstances, if they are inevitable, and be happy. It is good philosophy, but, unhappily for the matter of Mr. Beecher's discourse, it is not to the point. Men can live on bread and water, but ought they to? Hard work day after day it would seem should entitle them to something better. He asks, "What is the use of a civilization that simply makes men incompetent to live under the conditions which exist?" One would suppose he would have asked, "What is the use of a civilization that does not improve upon the conditions which exist?"

—Mr. Beecher makes another point—the general shrinkage of property and wages in the country. The strikers are not "the only men who feel the pressure of the times." Perhaps not. But from appearances it would seem that they felt it most. But be that as it may, the real question is not as to good times, or bad, in the ordinary sense in which those terms are used. "Good times" are no better than "bad,"—nor as good,—if we consider what they will do to settle the labor problem as it should be settled. "Good times" that still leave a large proportion of laborers unable to provide against the evil days that may be coming; nay, worse, that do not permit of proper food, raiment, leisure, in the days that are passing, are good times only by comparison with starvation times. The latter, the bad times, have this saving grace in them: they stimulate inquiry as to the cause of it all. "It is the darkest before day," we are told. People are pretty much alike in their willingness to bear their legitimate burdens; and when the "shrinkage" Mr. Beecher speaks of comes, all classes would put on a cheerful face if the infliction fell at all equally. As things go in prosperous times, only a part are able to acquire capital, and on this class "shrinkage," though it may greatly affect, does not fall so heavily as to grind down to "bread and water." On the other hand, the large class who, by the very nature of the case, find it absolutely impossible to acquire property, even in prosperous times, know what "shrinkage" means in a sense capitalists little dream of.

RIOTS AND REVOLUTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Your attack on the newspaper report of a recent speech of mine, in your journal of this date, seems to demand some notice from me, on account of its misrepresentation, if not on other grounds.

In the ordinary but thoughtless judgment of the world, a movement of men in force has been called a riot, a rebellion, or a revolution, only according as it has failed or succeeded. But I supposed, until now, that you recognized a truer standard of judgment, and held that such a movement was to be condemned or applauded, whether it immediately succeeded or not, when the cause that impelled it was either base or noble. If human beings are the victims of the despotism that drives them mad, their proper efforts at resistance are deserving of aid and sympathy, even though they are not strong enough to right their wrongs. The wanton and unnecessary invasion of human rights, by whoever committed, deserves only reprobation, though supported by an irresistible display of force. These obvious distinctions, at the basis of all "moral order," you seem to overlook or defy in the attempt to separate a riot from a revolution.

As you define a revolution and a riot, you leave no place for the Boston Tea Riot of 1773, or the Pittsburgh Railroad Riot of 1877, in either definition.

A revolution, you say, is "the forcible overthrow of one government for the purpose of establishing another government in its stead." But that does not embrace either of these riots, because neither was produced by any such purpose. A riot, you say, "is an attempt to overthrow all government without the purpose of establishing another in its stead." Neither the Boston nor the Pittsburgh riot was an attempt of this kind; neither, therefore, was a revolution or a riot.

With a remarkable disregard of reason and logic, you proceed to invent a distinction between the Boston riot and the riots that have grown out of the late railway strikes. As an isolated act, the Boston riot "would have been utterly indefensible." On what ground, then, do you justify it? It was "one in a long series of acts which together constituted one of the most completely justifiable revolutions that the world has ever seen." Now, which was it? Was the riot justifiable because it was "one in a long series"? The same may yet be truly claimed for the Pittsburgh riot. Or was it because the acts were all justifiable by being taken "together"? Don't you see where this lands you? An act utterly indefensible becomes righteous and holy by lumping it with a long series of acts! Are you willing to be "morally responsible" for such a doctrine?

But even on this ground you cannot as yet condemn the Pittsburgh riot. The "series of acts" by which you justify the Boston riot, closed, in your statement, by the adoption of the Constitution. The "act" of 1773 was justified by the "act" of 1787. Then wait fourteen years at least, to determine whether the Pittsburgh riot is justifiable or not. But what, after all, becomes of your definitions? A revolution may be justifiable, but a riot, never, you say. A revolution is the forcible overthrow of the government to establish another. Yet it was not till three years after the Boston riot that a revolution as thus defined was even attempted. No thought or purpose of revolution guided the Boston mob. You might have omitted your definitions without weakening your argument.

I utterly reject your defence of the Boston riot. The noble pride which the city of my youth takes in this revolutionary remembrance is not the limp and flabby thing you make it. Do you suppose we have been glorifying for a hundred years an infamous thing which we could only consent to excuse in the light of the events of the subsequent fourteen years? If a British soldiery had effectually suppressed the rising of the Colonies, immediately after the destruction of the tea, that glorious act would have had as good a claim to the admiration and gratitude of mankind as it has today. It was itself inspired by the same sentiment that blazed at Bunker Hill, lighted the gloom of Valley Forge, and found voice in the final shout of deliverance at Yorktown,—that "resistance to tyrants is obedience to God." No, Mr. Editor, there is no room in history or reason for your impossible distinction between revolution and riot. A revolution often begins in a riot,—and if the cause be righteous, the first "strike" is as sacred to humanity as the accomplished fact. Some knowledge of American history will be useful in discussing this question; and Higginson's Child's History is a good book for beginners.

Now as to the analogy. You charge the strikers with "conflagration, rapine, murder"; and therein only echo the language of the daily press. For convenience and brevity of discussion, I took the Pittsburgh riot as representative of the others, with the formal exception of Baltimore; and the facts as reported did not and do not warrant your language. What was the Pittsburgh riot? An assemblage of trainmen who stopped the freight trains at that point; an act in which they had the sympathy of the entire city, including the local militia. That was all,—there was no destruction of property, no menace to life or limb. Whatever condemnation this act merits, the strikers incurred,—but nothing more. The Boston mob did more than this,—they actually destroyed property. In this view the comparison is not to the disadvantage of the strikers. What happened next? The Philadelphia militia arrived, and without warning poured a death-dealing volley into the midst of the assembled multitude. Then the crowd, thus mercilessly fired upon, became enraged, and fired the railroad property. But the most remarkable thing in the history of riots is this: that the mob, maddened as they were, did not "unchain the tiger" of indiscriminate fire and pillage, but protected or spared all but railroad property. When we have sufficiently recovered from our surprise and panic to look the facts coolly in the face, it will be found, unless the reports have seriously misled us, that all the terrible excesses at Pittsburgh are directly chargeable to the shots of the Philadelphia militia.

Admit that the act of the strikers was illegal; what else could they do? They complained that their hardships could be no longer endured; but their complaints were not heard. Has any one of the "law and order" press even suggested what proper course they might have taken to obtain relief? They said, "We will stop the freight trains, and perhaps we may get a hearing." And, spite of all the croakers, they have got it! The American people, a pale and trembling audience, sits at the feet of labor to-day! Perhaps we may learn that when large masses of men are driven to desperation, all over the country, we had better look into their grievances before we shoot them down.

I am sorry to see, Mr. Editor, that you so far forgot yourself as to do a thing which I have known you to condemn in unparaphrasing and indignant terms when you have claimed it has been done to yourself. In the report you reprint, occurs this passage: "If [as] Vanderbilt says to the trainmen on his road, 'You are part and parcel of us,' it seems to me they do have some right to say who shall work on that road. Taking these men on their own ground, taking them by the doctrine they themselves proclaim, how, I ask, can they escape from the conclusion that it is the right of the trainmen to say who shall take their places when they strike." The last clause is a statement of the conclusion which follows from Vanderbilt's premises,—it is not an expression of my opinion at all. Did you intend to do me an injustice when you wrenched this clause from its connection, and, robbing it of that part of the sentence which fixed its meaning, made it appear to mean something else?

I might content myself with pointing out this unfairness on your part; but, for the sake of those whom this garbling may mislead, I will take occasion to say that my point in that portion of the speech was to show the impertinence of that platitude. The strike was spreading in every direction; the militia were flying to arms; the whole country was in alarm; and at this critical juncture the papers were harping on that string,—"They've no right to say who shall take their places." I confess I sickened at this stupidity. I did what I could to turn attention to a more vital point. To restore peace was the thing to be done. To do that it was necessary to understand the grievances of the men who were demanding to be heard. Seeing they had made themselves heard, it was entirely impertinent to ask if they had a right to take the step which secured a hearing. Because it was an impertinent question, I was careful in that speech to give no opinion of my own. The strikers had as good a right to stop the trains as the Boston mob had to throw the tea overboard. But if I should ask you to show by what right the tea-spillers acted, you would doubtless say that it was too late to raise the question.

In saying you were once accused of callousness to the wrongs of labor, you make an allusion that I feel compelled to notice. I do it because I have reason to know to what you refer. On the appearance of the New Age, you criticised it in your columns because it did not adopt the method of advocacy. The New Age, accepting this as entirely fair criticism, and supposing it to be a proper topic to discuss, published an article on "The Perils of Advocacy," pointing out the tendency in a person or a journal, that became the advocate of some special idea or party, to become one-sided and partial, and overlook other things equally vital. Among other illustrations it gave this: "There is THE INDEX, the advocate of a great national party of freedom, one of the objects of which will be to discontinue the employment of army, navy, and legislative chaplains. But when, this autumn, the entire State was startled by the conflict between the manufacturers and operatives at Fall River, and the bayonet was put in requisition in a time of peace, Mr. Abbot had no word to speak." This, as you say, you never noticed; nor should I now have referred to it, had you not said that he knew it was false who said it. It pains me just as much to be charged with intentional falsehood in this indirect and unmanly way, as it would to have my name connected with the charge. If the pleasant and half-jocose intimation in the above paragraph had been false, how easily you might have turned the tables upon it by a brief reference to some vigorous article of yours published during those stirring weeks. Nor (pardon me!) can I now think, after what you have just said, that you would have hesitated to do so if your own columns had given you due warrant. Why should you revive this matter after keeping silence so long, I do not know; but the facts are not changed by the lapse of time.

I have hastily, and at the earliest moment, noticed the points in your article which seem to call for remark from me. It might be thought hardly graceful to cut to pieces an article written in an hour of exhaustion on the eve of your vacation; but my own infirm health has been the best defence of your positions.

THE POLITENESS OF CHRISTIANITY.

A CATHOLIC NOTICE OF THE WALCOTT MEETING.

EDITOR INDEX:—

The Catholic Union of Buffalo, the organ of "The True Apostolic Church of Christ," notices the Liberal Grove Meeting to be held in Walcott, in the following polite and Christian style: "What a blessed gathering that of the 'Freethinkers' will be, which is announced for the 17th, 18th, and 19th, near Walcott, N.Y. A motley crew of blatant blasphemers will, of course, be gathered with the four-mouthed Ingermoll as the 'big Injun' talkist. Bold and daring fellows these, who, while the heart of the country is yet throbbing from the effects to which their atheistic principles surely lead, defiantly announce their intention to spread these principles, hope to wipe out the very idea of God from the universe, and thus destroy the ultimate source of all authority."

If this "holy man of God" refers to the recent mobs that have devastated our large cities, allow me to inform him, of what every intelligent person knows, that the controlling and worst element of these mobs are communicants in his holy Church, in good and regular standing, and that this has been the case with all mobs that have ever disgraced our country. The Church keeps its dupes in ignorance. Freethinkers advocate education and science; therefore, the Church is the mother of vice and mobocracy, freethought the parent of order and good government.

CLERICAL AND LAY BELIEF.

BY BISHOP FERRETTE.

An "Evangelical" clergyman, who was travelling in Italy, wishing to ascertain the exact state of the native mind with regard to the gross superstitions of the native Church, first went to a priest and asked him as follows:—

"Is it possible, sir, that you really believe?" etc.

"What your signory has said," answered the priest, "is verily the way that the common people believe. But we, the clergy, have for all those doctrines and ceremonies a theological and enlightened explanation."

The minister, having put this in his note-book, then went to a poor facchino, who was telling his beads before a picture of the Virgin Mary at the corner of a street, and interrupting him, spoke to him thus:—

"Is it possible, my dear fellow, that you really believe?" etc., etc.

"What your signory has said," answered the porter, "is verily the way that our priests believe. But we, the common people, have sense enough to take all that our priests say with a grain of salt."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 26, 1872.

To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEINBERG.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.
J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM AND THE NEW FAITH.

By EDMUND C. STEDMAN.

12mo, Cloth extra, with Portrait of Mr. FROTHINGHAM, 75 cents.

A clear and effective presentation of what is known as Rationalism in Religion in an analysis, by an admirer of acknowledged genius, of the life and work of one of its leading teachers.

"A brilliant and appreciative essay."—Boston Post.

"Radical ideas are here formulated, and expressed in a strong, clear light."—Liberal Christian.

LEWES' NEW BOOK!

THE PHYSICAL BASIS OF MIND.

Being the Third Volume of "Problems of Life and Mind."

By GEORGE H. LEWES, author of the History of Philosophy, the Life of Goethe, etc. 8vo. $3.00.

CONTENTS.—THE NATURE OF LIFE.—THE NERVOUS MECHANISM.—ANIMAL AUTOMATISM.—THE REFLEX THEORY.

Mr. Lewes is widely recognized as one of the most acute and independent of thinkers, and a writer of remarkable force and perspicacity. The two preceding volumes of Problems of Life and Mind have attracted in an unusual degree the attention of scientific and philosophical minds, and have taken rank among the most important of recent contributions to the philosophy of life and thought. The present volume is of equal significance, and will doubtless win equal study and admiration from those competent to follow the author's speculations and argument.

Its interest is by no means confined to specialists, but all persons of intelligence will find it in a high degree instructive and engaging.

"The book is one which will inevitably find its way into the hands of every student of mental science who wishes to obtain the freshest view of physiology in its relation to mind."—Saturday Review (London).

PROBLEMS OF LIFE AND MIND.

Vols. I. and II. $3.00 each.

Sent postpaid on receipt of price by THE INDEX, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

FROTHINGHAM'S WORKS.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY. An Essay. Third Edition—Revised. Price $1.50.

"Nobody can peruse this book without respect for the learning, mental honesty and skill in the statement of his convictions, possessed by the author, and for the essential integrity and philanthropic tendency of his spirit."—Springfield Republican.

"A profoundly sincere book, the work of one who has read largely, studied thoroughly, reflected patiently.... It is a model of scholarly culture and of finished and vigorous style."—Boston Globe.

THE CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION. For Sunday-schools and Homes. Price $1.00.

THE SAFEST CREED, AND OTHER DISCOURSES. 12mo, Cloth, $1.50.

Not "food for babes," but full of suggestion for earnest and thoughtful men.

STORIES FROM THE LIFE OF THE TEACHER. With Frontispiece. Cloth, $1.00.

"The Parables are so re-told as to absorb the attention of the reader, and to fasten upon the mind what the writer believes to have been the impression the Saviour meant to convey. It is in style and thought a superior book, and will interest alike young and old."—Zion's Herald (Methodist).

STORIES OF THE PATRIARCHS. With Frontispiece. Cloth, $1.00.

"A work of culture and taste; it will be welcome to all ages, and gives the sublimest lessons of manhood in the simple language of a child."—Springfield Republican.

TRANSCENDENTALISM IN NEW ENGLAND. A History. With sketches and studies of Emerson, Alcott, Parker, Margaret Fuller, the Brook-Farm Community, etc. 8vo, Cloth extra, with steel portrait of the author, $2.50.

THE LIFE OF THEODORE PARKER. 8vo. With Portrait, $3.00.

The New York Tribune closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

THE CRADLE OF THE CHRIST. A Study in Primitive Christianity, illustrating the prime importance of the Messianic Idea in the New Testament, as the key to the development of Christianity from Judaism. Octavo, Cloth, $1.75.

$55 to $77 a Week to Agents. $10 Outfit Free. P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

$12 A DAY at home. Agents wanted. Outfit and terms free. TRUE & CO., Augusta, Me.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.

2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.

3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.

4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.

5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.

6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.

7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."

8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.

9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.

10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.

11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.

12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.

13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE
FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

S. H. M.

THE WORLD moves,—and so does Philadelphia. The Permanent Exhibition is to be opened Sundays.

ONE OF THE "Blue-Laws" read thus: "No woman shall kiss her child on the Sabbath or fasting-day." Blue enough.

"ANSWERS TO PRAYER" lately published, shows a large majority of "answers" were in response to petitions for money. Does this indicate a religious solution of the labor-problem?

MR. COOK asserts that God revealed to Solomon the lesson that man should be industrious; but denies that God informed him that the ant lays up food for winter. He says "The doctrine is true, but the illustration is a human error."

IN THE SAME way Mr. Cook destroys the story of Jonah, or, more strictly speaking, of the whale. Jonah had an inspired mission; he was false to his trust and was punished. That was God's part. How he was punished was left to the human fancy, and fancy invented the whale. Verily, our Joseph's coat is of "many colors."

THE Independent says of the Witness, started as a religious daily: "It has had a great deal of sound moral sentiment, but has not had the news." This is an error. It did have the news; but its news was too old by nearly two centuries,—perhaps we should say six.

MARS is said to be inhabited, and its appearance from our earth holds the balance pretty evenly between red and green. Wonder how our earth succeeds in that particular? Does our red sandstone in the eye of Mars offset "we, the people"? It may be so; but we shall change our color when we have wiser grown.

SPEAKING OF Mars and its inhabitants, it becomes a question of significance: Did Christ go there and die for their sins? Reasoning from analogy, we should say he must have. For, as we here came up from the "earth earthy," even so must the people there have come up from the "mars maray"; and a Redeemer must have been quite as much in order there as here.

ONE THING: though Mars is reputed for its warlike behavior, owing doubtless to some "original sin"—just what it were idle to speculate,—it is to be hoped that the Prince of Peace found in that Martian sphere, among his professed followers, a sweeter temper and more winsome manners than vast numbers of his zealous disciples inhabiting our own planet display. How disheartening it would seem should we some day get an air-line road through space, and travel thither to find things no whit an improvement on our home-experience,—Christians there no better than other people!

A PART of the time those Orthodox critics who, like Dr. Lorimer, deem it their duty to expose the folly and impotency of rationalism, assail the rationalist with the charge that his only delight is in some new thing, that his pleasure is in what is new and not in what is true,—and they go on to tell how old truth is—"like the most ancient heavens." Then they turn about, eager for a telling point, and declare that liberalism, scepticism, infidelity are not new, but older than Christianity itself. Is consistency never a jewel?

THE Pall Mall Gazette wants everything in the Prayer-book that has the "appearance of absolution" struck out. Also, it desires to "strike at the root of priestly superstition by omitting the laying on of hands in the ordination service." It has been wrought up to this phase of "disestablishment" by the Priest in Absolution. It is becoming evident that the ritualists have fired a boomerang which in its backward flight will deal them a crushing blow. Is this the "wrath of man" once more "praising God"?

SOME OF OUR Christian neighbors have been excited—as it seems to us unduly—over this line in Mr. Ball's poem, "To Benedict Spinoza":—

O pure as Christ, as deeply-souled!
What is it they mean when they enjoin upon us all to be "Christlike"? Does it mean that we must have only likeness or an approach to likeness to him, and no "deeply-souled" reality? What is the doctrine of "perfection" as taught by Methodists? What does Paul mean when he says, "Except Christ be in you, ye are reprobates,"—or words to that effect? What did Jesus himself mean, when he said, "Be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect"? We wonder Christians do not accept Mr. Ball's verse as a tribute to Christ. "O pure as Christ, as deeply-souled!" Must not all Christians be even so when they are "perfect"? Mr. Ball simply says he thinks Spinoza was one of those souls, and not a "Dutch-Hebrew," as Dr. Tefft calls him,—if that be any discredit to a man.

METTEN, Austria, is a new competitor for miraculous honors. Four children out gathering bilberries "saw a very beautiful lady, with golden shoes, standing on the stump of an old tree. She wore a white dress and blue mantle, and held in her arms a lovely infant, clothed in a little scarlet coat. The children not only heard the Virgin's voice, but even that of the Infant Savior." If it be not irreverent, it occurs to us that times have changed since the days of the stall and manger. It is evident the children were more familiar with modern pictures of Virgin and Son than with the New Testament narrative.

AS AN offset—if one be needed—to Mr. Ball, we give the following by the Rev. Newman Hall:—

Athens and St. Paul.

"Athena, how grandly beautiful art thou!
Thy dignity, in death, retaining long,
In spite of centuries of cruel wrong;
In spite of earthquake, lightning, war, e'en now
Risest sublime thy queenly, peerless brow.
What names and memories to thee belong—
Poets and statesmen; fields renowned in song,
Where Athens guarded Greece from tyrants' thrall;
Demosthenes; eventful Marathon;
Plato and Socrates; great Salamis!
Still awes the soul thy pillared Parthenon;
Thy glittering, temple-crowned Acropolis;
But of thy glories this surpasseth all,— Rough, naked Areopagus, and—PAUL!"

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1878.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns, and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

(FOR THE INDEX.)

The Radical Sunday-School.

A NEW DEPARTURE—THE IDEA OF ROBERT RICHES REVIVED.

BY REV. DAVID H. CLARK.

The recent hint in the columns of THE INDEX that some account of the Sunday-school of the Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass., and the results of my experience as its superintendent during the past two years in respect to such work among liberals might be of interest to those who desire to initiate it, prompts this response.

It is an auspicious indication to those who, though they do not believe the time for destructive radicalism has passed, think that for constructive effort has come to witness the growing recognition of the worth of organization in behalf of the new ideas and principles which begins to appear, and especially with reference to the culture of the young. It is evident that there is an awakening sense, in the minds of many, of remissness in this particular. It has been the habit of radicals to point excitedly to the decay of ecclesiastical power,—the increasing disbelief in the doctrines of the creeds; to scornfully contemplate the misuse of the Church's energies and resources, while they put forth little or no exertion for the substitution of superior methods and convictions. But this could not be perpetual. It was natural to the first stage of the transition through which we are passing.

The human soul incessantly demands an ideal (if it cannot accept what is offered, it resorts to another) toward which it may labor and aspire.

It was the persuasion of the founders of the Free Congregational Society of Florence, that radicalism includes affirmations as well as negations; that there is something to build up as well as to tear down; that to pass the bounds of the Church is not to reach the end of philanthropy and culture.

With a consistency, which is not always exhibited, they did not believe in detaching themselves from the Church while they suffered their children to grow up under its influence. They did not believe in that amiable indulgence and conforming disposition which allows children to be educated in what the parents regard false and pernicious. They saw that to produce a more rational and better standard of human life than that which proceeds from the Church, they must begin at the beginning. Simultaneous, therefore, with their first steps toward the organization of the society, now somewhat more than thirteen years since, a Sunday-school was projected and set in operation as a necessary correlative to its contemplated scope and aims. As the society was not an evolution in the strict sense of the word, an outgrowth or modification simply of some preëxisting one, as is the case in certain instances in respect to those which occupy advanced positions, but was founded upon an entirely new basis—as it was, moreover, composed of a heterogeneous collection of persons, and could borrow but little from any previous experience as to plans and methods in Sunday-school work, or any other particular,—its course all along has been, and is still, very largely experimental and susceptible to improvement, when such has seemed possible. Of course, thus forced to feel our way, as it were, to cut our own path, we are not vain enough to suppose, or assume, that it is the one which all liberals should follow. We do not pretend we have attained perfection in our Sunday-school, or present it as a model for the imitation of others. We are simply assured that we have entered in a spirit of faith and perseverance upon the new departure which the time is calling for, and of which it does not yet altogether appear what it shall be. We hold ourselves, as has been intimated, ready and eager for light, knowledge, and suggestion from any and every source. This whole subject of the education of the young is so profound and imperfectly understood—is, in fact, so involved in the whole philosophy of human culture,—that it requires all the wisdom, originality, and ingenuity that can be brought to bear upon it to effect the best results. Meanwhile, much can be done with the fifty-two Sundays of the year in this direction.

The Florence Sunday-school has proved, in all respects, a gratifying success. That it is an unquestionable improvement upon the ordinary one seems not only conclusive to us, but is the general verdict of liberal-minded persons from abroad who visit it. For some time after it began, the exercises of its sessions were of a somewhat lighter and less systematic character than at present. They consisted of singing, the speaking of pieces by the little ones, readings and extemporaneous remarks by the elders, interspersed with marching and gymnastic performances. Each class was the possessor of a tasteful banner, upon which some motto correspondent to its age and character was inscribed. It was the custom, once a month, to distinguish a session as an almost purely festive occasion, when a dinner or collation was prepared, of which both young and old partook, the tables being supplied by contributions from members of the society. Occasionally, in summer-time, the sessions were held out of doors, in some favorite resort in the woods or fields, and assumed a picnic aspect. But nearly all these usages, peculiar to the earlier period of the school, without any specific reasons that it would be easy to particularize, have been gradually given up; doubtless, as the necessary consequence of the change which the society itself has been undergoing,—the better established, organized, and working condition to which it has attained. The marching and gymnastic exercises have fallen into disuse, though to what extent judiciously there may be a question. Very likely, such an element might be included with advantage in the plan of a liberal

Sunday-school in some instances. Much would depend upon its character and circumstances, whether there is a competent person to direct the exercises. The class banners have also been abandoned, and instead of the monthly festival and dinner, all that survives of that nature is our annual Christmas celebration, which, as at present observed, is a recent adoption, and includes, instead of the usual tree as formerly, a dinner, with social and literary entertainment, the distribution of gifts, and like associations of the time. The out-door Sunday gatherings have now no other representative, if, indeed, it can be considered such, than our annual summer picnic, which is always, not for our own people alone, but for many outside, one of the most attractive occasions of the kind of the season. I have allowed my pen to run back in this review of our school, in order that the course of its experience and development to its existing status may be more fully understood by those who have in view similar enterprises; and that whatever it suggests, or we have let go that it would have been wisdom to retain, may be perceived and appropriated.

I come now to the conduct and condition of the school at present. It is the custom of the society to devote Sunday forenoon to its session, the afternoon being allotted to our regular public meetings, discourses, etc. The school assemblies in the basement (which comprises a hall capable of seating three or four hundred persons, with several adjoining apartments) of the commodious and elegant building known as Cosmian Hall, erected by the society some three years since. Its sessions occupy one hour and a half, opening always precisely at half-past ten, and closing at exactly twelve o'clock. Much stress is laid upon punctuality and precision in this particular, the habit itself being regarded as of educational value. The number in attendance has run up to one hundred and twenty. Its average is about ninety. The usual programme of the school is as follows:—

First: Singing by all present, so far as possible, accompanied by the music of a parlor organ. The books in use for this exercise are The Morning Stars and The Musical Fountain, neither quite satisfactory to us, but the best for the purpose that we are acquainted with. This exercise may be improved by being led by a choir of young persons, selected from the school, under a competent director.

Second: Introductory reading by the superintendent. This occupies, as a general rule, fifteen minutes, and is rarely two Sundays in succession of the same character. It consists sometimes of a story in which some good lesson is conveyed; sometimes of fragments of poetry and prose; occasionally of a biographical sketch, an extract of history or science, or selections from the sacred writings of the religions of the world or the moralists, Pagan as well as Christian, with such comments or remarks as the reading may suggest. The school now resolves into classes. The Florence school includes at present the following: An adult class, composed not only of the oldest members of the school, but, in some instances, of the society,—one of its most constant attendants being seventy-five years of age, with others between sixty and seventy and thereabouts. They are accustomed to withdraw to a separate apartment, known as the conversation room, and to discuss in an informal manner, and with the utmost freedom in respect to opinions, the various reforms and questions of the day. The class includes both sexes, and varies in number from half-a-dozen to twenty or more. Next in the order of the elder members of the school is a class at present engaged in the study of Shakespeare. Its average attendance is probably about fifteen young men and women, some of them married persons, under the direction of a very competent lady of experience and superior qualifications as a teacher. The attention of the class was devoted last year to Milton's Paradise Lost. The plan of study embraced a critical examination of the characteristics of the genius of its author, as exhibited in his great epic, with expository comments and references to the mythological and classical allusions of the text. It involved, with a study of poetry (to a certain extent), a review of the Bible and a consideration of Christian theology. A method of similar critical thoroughness is applied to Shakespeare. The plays are not only read, but their various incidents, characters, and respective distinctions in respect to structure and forms of expression discussed with reference to literary art and their moral bearings. A written analysis of each play, prepared by some member of the class, is read at its close. The offences to good taste and delicate feeling embodied in the common text of Shakespeare are escaped by the use of Hudson's edition; while the consultation and comparison of some of the innumerable compendiums of literature, essays, and commentaries upon the author adds much to the study in interest and value. Such has been the progress of this class, the stability and faculty acquired, that the person who has conducted it with such admirable skill and success is meditating withdrawal from it to initiate some other good work in the school, feeling assured it has attained to a point where it can sustain itself independent of her assistance.

There is, in addition to the classes described, one in book-keeping,—pursuing this study in the winter and geology in the summer, with occasional excursions to a considerable distance into the country and campings-out for this object; a class in American history (Higginson's), of young women, nearly all of whom are engaged during the week in factory work; a class in natural history (Morse's First Book of Zoology); one in botany (Miss Youman's); one in drawing; also one in Many Teachers and One Lesson; and three of a primary character, in which the time is chiefly employed in readings appropriate to those of their age, with conversation. There is nothing arbitrary or fixed in regard to the studies of the classes; the plan being to introduce new ones whenever teachers or scholars can be found to engage in them, or it is preferred to pass from those pursued to others.

Besides the classes just enumerated, there have been in the school others in physiology, political economy, French, German, an historical and philosophical study of religion, and in Mohammedanism.

By way of digression, and yet somewhat in this connection, and as an illustration of the intellectual life of our village, which is mainly composed of what is usually described as "working-people," I may be permitted to say, in this place, that during the past winter there were week-day evening gatherings of a literary and social society, not to mention various musical ones; excellent day and evening schools, and a flourishing kindergarten; a superior dramatic club, with its presentation every few weeks of a high order of histrionic entertainment; and classes in Chaucer, Shakespeare, German (of different grades of advancement), and in scientific and philosophical readings. As the larger number of these (the schools, of course, excepted) were an emanation of Cosmian Hall, and mainly, if not entirely, sustained by those identified with it, this fact may be regarded as evidence that its influence has not been as pestilential or blighting as some would be disposed to imagine.

Returning to the exercises of our school: at about twenty minutes after eleven the classes dissolve, and all reassemble together for general exercises. These consist of singing by the school, recitations, songs, dialogues, readings by some of the elder members, usually followed by extemporaneous remarks from the superintendent and adult persons; the whole concluding with singing by the school.

There is a wheel within the wheel which I have just described—a smaller organization within the larger one,—which has proved so interesting and successful an auxiliary in the furtherance of the objects in view, that it deserves to be mentioned in this connection as necessary to a full presentation of our plan and the workings of the school. We call it the Banner of Wisdom Association. It is distinguished by the use of a few simple ceremonies and symbols, the principal one of which is a ladder. Each round corresponds to a certain virtue, and those who become members enroll their names in a book, with the round, or virtue, to which they propose to aspire. The first round upon this ladder is effort; and then succeeds abstinence from tobacco, intoxicating drinks, profanity, justice, mercy, sincerity, good manners, punctuality, peace, purity, etc. The first Sunday in each month, in the school, is assigned to this society, when the general exercises are arranged with reference to the virtue indicated by some round in the ladder of aspiration. This plan of arranging the general exercises occasionally with reference to a special subject we have found a very excellent one.

In addition to those mentioned thus in use, are the suggestions of various anniversaries, such as Christmas, New Year, national holidays, historic events, the birth and death of eminent persons.

It will be noticed by the foregoing account of our school that, contrary to usual custom, neither prayer nor Bible-reading constituted a part of our regular exercises. If any one should attend it at any time who desires to offer a prayer, I am very sure there would be no objection; while the Bible is placed upon the same level as the Scriptures of the other religions.

An objection is sometimes presented to our school because of its secular character. "Why teach," we are asked, "what is taught in the common schools?" But the fact that we find those who desire to engage in these studies is in itself a sufficient answer. Some maintain that it is defective and inadequate, because it has not a more direct ethical aim. They would eliminate the merely secular studies, and make all those of the school possess a moral or religious bearing. It is our persuasion, in answer to this, that though our school has not a preponderating bias on this side, in the distinct sense referred to, the whole influence of it tends to promote the higher culture, to develop superior manhood and womanhood. We hold to the conviction that such studies as have been specified in connection with our school, though pursued chiefly for intellectual ends, are, nevertheless, necessarily moral. Whatever invigorates or enriches any part of our nature correspondingly affects the whole. The rarely qualified teacher may make the day-school, unconsciously alike to teacher and pupil it may be, more moral even than that of Sunday.

And then, again, in deciding between what might be regarded religious studies and those we have indicated, the question arises of Herbert Spencer, "What studies are of most worth?"

If the study of religion of any kind, even the Christianity of the New Testament, divested of the principal features of the old theology, as taught even in liberal Unitarian Sunday-schools, likely to be of more value to the average boy or girl in the future, than that of science, history, or literature? Of course this cannot be uniformly determined. Much regard must be paid to special circumstances. A word in relation to the furniture and apparatus of the radical Sunday-school. The place where it meets should be as inviting and pleasant as possible. The whole character of the school in its surroundings, and in all respects, should be cheerful rather than sombre. The value of the decorative and tasteful should be recognized. Mottoes and pictures should adorn the walls, and objects which suggest thought and quicken the sense of beauty. It may enlist its pupils in securing minerals and specimens of natural history for this object. It should be provided with as good a library as it can obtain; with a black-board; a geographical globe; with albums of cards illustrative of botany and natural history (such as issued by L. Prang & Co.); also of the likenesses of eminent persons; with some scientific instruments (a microscope for example); with whatever, so far as may be, can facilitate the end in view. Let no one lose heart at this formidable catalogue. The Florence Sunday-school has not yet attained to this ideal condition, though it is reaching toward it.

One of the principal difficulties which the conductors of a radical Sunday-school will encounter, is, to procure suitable books for its use, both for its library and for teaching purposes. It is impossible for any one to have any conception how thoroughly, notwithstanding the rapid change which is going on in the direction of an opposite tendency, our literature, and especially that intended for the young, is saturated with theology. One can scarcely find a child's book upon any natural subject, an account of birds or animals, or a sketch of travels, without a reference somewhere to the Bible, or an attempt to explain the ways and describe the character of an incomprehensible being. Nor do volumes of poems and singing-books for those of this impressive period escape the intrusion. As it is the aim of this article to be somewhat comprehensive in its practical considerations, in order to render it as helpful as possible, I may be permitted to name some of the books, in addition to those already alluded to which we are better prepared to commend (for use in teaching) than any with which we are acquainted: Conway's Sacred Anthology; Stebbins' Bible of the Ages; Cox's Manual of Mythology; Clodd's Childhood of the World, also of Religion. In this class should be mentioned The Youth's Liberal Guide, which has been announced as ready to be published by Prof. H. M. Kottlinger, of San José, Cal.—a book of morals and religion for the young, which, if it proves as good as its prospectus promises, will be a desideratum; Emerson's Parnassus; The Speaker's Garland; Baker's and Monroe's Books of Select Readings; The Truth-Seeker Collection; The Beautiful Book, or Little Poems for Young Children; Frost's Book of Moral Dialogues; Dana's The Geological Story Briefly Told; Appleton's Science Primers; Pictures and Stories of Animals for the Little Ones, by Mrs. Sanborn Tenney (six small volumes); South Kensington Science Lectures; Steele's Science Text Books; History of Wonderful Inventions; Dickens' Child's History of England; Lucy's Wonderful Globe; Smiles' Self Help and Character; The History of a Mouthful of Bread; The Servants of the Stomach; Frothingham's Child's Book of Religion; Patriarchs and Parables; Hale's How To Do It; Miss Wixon's Apples of Gold; Mrs. Underwood's Heroines of Freethought; Hooker's Child's Book of Nature; Fables, Illustrated by Stories from Real Life, by Mrs. Cupples (a series of several volumes); Cowdry's Moral Anecdotes.

Some of these need the pen to be drawn across sentences and expressions in places; but they will be found less exceptional than most of their class. Doubtless many can furnish a better list, or supplement this with others as worthy. But this may serve as a guide in the absence of another to those seeking such information.

There remains another difficulty in conducting a Sunday-school of the type under consideration, even when never so completely equipped with needed appliances. It is to procure teachers qualified to render it a success. And yet this need not be so great as it might seem. It is not to be supposed that it will be easy to find in every community a large force of persons of special attainments for such a work ready to engage in it. Nor is it necessary. If it were so, the liberal Sunday-school would have to wait for a more general diffusion of scientific and literary acquirements among the people. But with such a plan and aids as have been suggested, it may be initiated wherever there is a nucleus of ordinarily intelligent liberal minds. It is not necessary that the teaching be through classes on special subjects in each instance, or of a scholastic character. It may partake chiefly of conversations and such general exercises as have been indicated. Let those who are in sympathy with the idea of the liberal Sunday-school, wherever there is a collection of such persons get their children together and organize for the purpose; choose the most earnest and intelligent person (a woman is often to be preferred) for a superintendent, and teachers and methods will soon appear in unexpected abundance.

It is not easy to put our faith always in new things, to transfer our habits and sympathies from that with which they have been associated to others. There are, hence, many who, while they recognize the fact that the ordinary Sunday-school is, for the most part, a failure, serves but little more than to stultify the mind and lumber it with obsolete ideas, would feel a distrust of the moral results of one in which the religious element is not more emphasized than in that which we have delineated.

We are prepared to offer some testimony upon this point. It is now, as has been seen, nearly fourteen years since our school in Florence was first organized. During that time, a number have passed from childhood or youth in our school to manhood and womanhood; some are the heads of families, and among the most prominent representatives of the community. Nor do we hazard anything in affirming of such instances that in all that constitutes good citizenship, the higher elements of character, or secures the general confidence and respect, they would suffer nothing, in comparison with any of its members.

The Sunday-school of the churches as hitherto conducted, is destined to be numbered with the things of the past. There is evidence of a sense of this among those who are identified with it. It is not long since we saw it announced among local news that the Bible-class in an Orthodox school in our vicinity had substituted for the study of the book just named, the Life of Washington; thus adopting the Cosmian Hall conception. And at a recent country Orthodox Sunday-school convention, the pastor of the Church in Florence answered the question, "How shall we retain young persons in our Sunday-schools?" by recommending a higher and more secular grade of instruction; the temporary suspension in such instances of direct religious teaching, if necessary, and substitution of science, history, etc. Similar indications might be mentioned which go to show the growing dissatisfaction and change which is going on in respect to the operation and idea of Orthodox Sunday-schools,—indeed, among those of the Church of every kind, and their steady setting toward the radical ideal. The influence of radicalism is widely diffused and deeply penetrative everywhere; but it needs a more organized and systematic coöperation in order to contend with any prospect of victory with conservatism. It has existed sufficiently long, and gone far enough among the elders, to turn it to more practical uses. Let us now give the children the benefit of it, and apply it to their education and training.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

A SUNDAY DIALOGUE.

BY J. L. STODDARD.

SCENE: A City Street.

Linscott.—Good morning, Mandel. Whither bound?

Mandel.—To church. And you?

Linscott.—To the Art Museum.

Mandel.—What! Is the Art Museum open on the Sabbath day?

Linscott.—I rejoice to say it is. Why are you so surprised?

Mandel.—Because it seems to me a desecration of the day.

Linscott.—A desecration to throw open freely to the public a collection of beautiful and refining works of art?

Mandel.—Yes; for the Sabbath is a sacred day, and—Linscott.—Pardon me; but why do you call it a "sacred day"?

Mandel.—Why, because—because it is so; is it not?

Linscott.—I do not think that it possesses any inherent sanctity. Pray tell me your reasons for deeming it thus holy.

Mandel.—Well, its sacred observance is commanded in the Bible.

Linscott.—I beg your pardon; in what portion of the book?

Mandel.—Why, in the fourth commandment of the decalogue, of course. "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy."

Linscott.—Precisely. But this Sunday of ours is not that Sabbath day at all.

Mandel.—Why, what do you mean?

Linscott.—I mean that the precept of the decalogue is to keep holy the seventh day of the week; whereas our Sunday is the first day,—as you see, a very different period of time.

Mandel.—I had never thought of that. I heard a long sermon recently about the obligation of keeping the Sabbath; but nothing was said of this change of days. Pray, how did it occur? Did not Jesus command us to keep the Sabbath day holy?

Linscott.—Not a word of any such command can be found in his recorded sayings. On the contrary, he was, you know, several times accused of violating the sacredness of the day; and defended himself for so doing, saying that "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath."

Mandel.—But when the rich young man in the gospel is said to have come to him inquiring the way of life, did not Jesus tell him to keep the Sabbath as one of the commandments?

Linscott.—On the contrary. The young man, if I recollect Matthew's story correctly, asked him "which" commandments he should keep. Jesus responded by quoting almost all of them, but the keeping of the Sabbath is not mentioned among them.

Mandel.—But did not his followers, the early Christians, keep the day holy and obey the old commandment of the decalogue?

Linscott.—No. On the other hand, they regarded themselves as at once free from this law, which they believed to have been abrogated by the advent of Jesus, whom they accepted as the Messiah.

Mandel.—What proof can you give me that the early Christians did not continue to keep the old Jewish Sabbath?

Linscott.—You regard Paul, I suppose, as a first-class authority?

Mandel.—Certainly.

Linscott.—Well, he clearly taught that the observance of the Sabbath was no longer a necessity. He wrote to the Romans: "One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it to the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it."

Mandel.—Is that all he teaches on the subject?

Linscott.—Oh, no. For instance, he says to the Galatian Christians, who were being influenced to still observe Jewish ceremonials: "How is it that ye are turning again to the weak and beggarly elements, wherunto ye desire again to be in bondage? Ye observe days, months, and times and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labor in vain."

Mandel.—This astonishes me beyond measure. But although his meaning is quite clear, Paul does not, I believe, allude to the Sabbath by name.

Linscott.—Excuse me; he does most emphatically. He writes to the Church at Colosse: "Let no man judge you in respect to the Sabbath days."

Mandel.—This, then, is certainly the view of Paul. How strange that it has never been brought to my notice before! But how do the fathers of the early Church view this question?

Linscott.—I have in my pocket some notes on that very point. Let me read them to you. St. Augustine, for example, says: "Of all the ten commandments, only that on the Sabbath is enjoined to be observed figuratively; which figure we have received to be understood, not to be celebrated by the rest of the body." (Ep. 55, c. 22.) St. Chrysostom also speaks as follows: "For what purpose then did he add a reason respecting the Sabbath, but not in regard to murder? Because this commandment was not one of the leading ones. It was not one of those which are accurately defined by our consciences, but a kind of partial and temporary one. And for this reason it was ABOLISHED AFTERWARDS?" (Hom. 12.)

Mandel.—This is remarkable. But tell me, Linscott, in a word, who St. Chrysostom was.

Linscott.—He was the greatest father of the East, as St. Augustine was of the Western Church. These quotations, therefore, are most important as showing the state of Christian opinion in regard to the Sabbath in the fourth century.

Mandel.—I now see plainly that there must have been a change on the part of the Jewish Christians from Saturday, their old Sabbath, to Sunday, the first day of the week. But I should really like to know, then, upon what authority the observance of our present Sunday can be based. My minister has always argued from the stand-point of the fourth commandment; but I am sure now that this is no authority at all, since Sunday is not the day there enjoined to be kept holy, and because that was a special precept for the Jewish people. Moreover, it seems that after the death of Jesus its keeping was actually preached against by Paul, as if it partook of a return to Judaism; and one of the greatest Church fathers states in so many words that it was abrogated!

Linscott.—Well and truly said. Shall I tell you, then, what I consider the only reasonable ground on which Sunday observance can be based?

Mandel.—Please do so.

Linscott.—The observance of Sunday, as a special day, is an institution of great antiquity, handed down to posterity from the primitive Church. We know that the early Christians used to meet on this day, talk of Jesus and his anticipated speedy return, sing hymns in his honor, and partake of a meal together in commemoration of the Last Supper. These services only occupied a small portion of the day, however. During the remainder of it they worked as usual.

Mandel.—Excuse me for interrupting; but why did they choose this day?

Linscott.—Because it was on Sunday (not the Jewish Sabbath) that they believed Jesus to have risen from the grave.

Mandel.—Ah! I see; and therefore they called it the "Lord's Day"?

Linscott.—Precisely.

Mandel.—Now, will you believe it? Until this conversation I had always supposed that the "Lord's Day" and the old Sabbath which the Jews kept "holy" were the same! No one in my church ever corrected my ignorance. But tell me more about it.

Linscott.—Of course as the Christians grew more and more numerous and powerful, the "Lord's Day" assumed greater and greater prominence, as a day set apart exclusively for worship. Thus it has acquired through the centuries an enormous weight of authority. But in reality it rests on nothing but the long-continued custom of the Church!

Mandel.—This reason then is plainly the only authority which can be urged to support its holy observance; and I am glad to ascertain exactly upon what basis it should be placed. I must say, however, that this ancient custom of the Church, around which cluster so many tender memories, seems to me very venerable from its long sanctity.

Linscott.—That is very natural and proper, Mandel. No liberal, I think, would fail to respect such a sentiment in the heart of any Christian believer. What he does object to is the arrogance of the Church in claiming a divine command for the sacred observance of this Sunday, and its infringement on the rights of people who do not care to keep it holy. It arbitrarily chooses one day as its peculiar season of religious worship, abrogating the day mentioned in the Mosaic code, which it still pretends to consider inspired. Then it forbids persons outside of its faith to spend this day as they prefer, and has the audacity to allege, as authority for this, the very command which it has itself broken!

Mandel.—I fear you are right. But tell me, Linscott; do you not think that one day of rest and recreation out of every seven is necessary for poor, toiling humanity?

Linscott.—I do, indeed. And precisely for this am I constantly striving. But it is just this day of rest and recreation which (pardon me if I speak too severely) Christian bigotry forbids. It will not allow this to be a day of rest and recreation! It pronounces it a sin for the toiling, half-tired, working-classes of our cities to roam off into the fields and woods, to feast their eyes on the beauty and freshness of green grass and running streams. It says, "God commands you to worship him on this day," which is, on the lips of every intelligent man who utters those words, a monstrous and deliberate falsehood! It declares: "It is wrong for you to stay away from church on this day; wrong to read during its hours any but religious literature; wrong to play or hear any but sacred music; wrong to go upon excursions; and to ride, walk, or sail for pleasure." Am I in error in thus stating the usual teaching of Christianity on this subject?

Mandel.—No. I am afraid it is only too true.

Linscott.—Now, why does the Church say it is wrong to rest or recreate in this way on Sunday? Because, forsooth, "God commanded men to keep it holy"? But, as we have already seen, God did NOT command that this day (Sunday) should be kept holy. Its sanctity depends solely upon a long-continued custom of the Church. As such, it should be binding only on those who accept that ancient custom as authoritative. To force it upon others is tyrannical! "Let every man," as Paul says, "be fully persuaded in his own mind," and act accordingly.

Mandel.—Ought we, however, to be particular about the specific day, whether Saturday or Sunday? Perhaps the early Christians did wrong to change; but will not God be satisfied with a seventh part of our time, on whatever day it falls?

Linscott.—Whether God will be "satisfied," as you call it, with any other day, as well as with the one which he is said to have appointed, is something about which I know nothing, and which you Christians, who changed it, will have to settle with him when the time comes. Usually, however, when a command is issued for a certain day, it means that the order is to be obeyed on that day which is specified, especially when no counter-order comes for the observance of any other day. But why do you believe that God commanded even the observance of the old Jewish Sabbath?

Mandel.—That is easily answered. Because it says so in the Bible.

Linscott.—Do you mean to say that you believe every statement of the Bible?

Mandel.—Ye—es. I think I do.

Linscott.—You are a student of geology and zoölogy. Do you seriously tell me that you still believe the six-day theory of creation?

Mandel.—Oh, no! I forgot that for the moment. Of course all students of science have now given up that absurd idea.

Linscott.—Then you admit that some statements in the Bible are not true?

Mandel.—Ye—es. But what would you say to my minister, who claims that six long ages may have been meant under the imagery of "days" in the first chapter of Genesis?

Linscott.—Indeed? Does he hold that theory? Then he should be consistent and say that a Sabbath ought to be some thousands or millions of years long; for the command, which he supposes to have emanated directly from God's lips, states: "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath-day and hallowed it!" Let him either keep days throughout, or ages!

Mandel.—I myself suppose that the author of Genesis meant, of course, literal days of twenty-four hours' length. Of course this is a childish view of the universe as we now know it; but it was consonant with the ideas of that age. In the decalogue the same language is used probably for the sake of harmony.

Linscott.—Both statements look then decidedly like human compositions. Do they not?

Mandel.—Well,—yes. But the decalogue cannot be a human composition! Such a marvellous code of morals could only have been produced by God himself.

Linscott.—Indeed! Do you think so? Do you suppose that no tribes or races, save the Jews, ever framed such laws as those? Do you think that such an elementary code as that would not be early and naturally formed in every growing nation?

Mandel.—I confess, I had thought so.

Linscott.—Have you never read the moral precepts of Confucius, who taught B.C. 551?

Mandel.—No.

Linscott.—Or those of Mencius, 371 B.C.?

Mandel.—No.

Linscott.—Or those of Buddha, about 600 B.C.?

Mandel.—No.

Linscott.—You ought to read them. They are not only far superior to the ethical precepts of the Old Testament (some of which are highly immoral), but are equal to, if not in advance of, the teachings of Jesus himself.

Mandel.—I shall have to verify this with my own eyes before I can believe it.

Linscott.—Do so. I will place the necessary books at your disposal. But we were speaking of the decalogue; the Buddhists have one very similar to it. Its precepts are as follows: 1. Do not kill. 2. Do not steal. 3. Do not commit adultery. 4. Do not lie. 5. Do not slander. 6. Do not call ill names. 7. Do not speak words which are to no purpose but harm. 8. Do not covet the property of others. 9. Do not envy. 10. Do not err in the faith.

Mandel.—These are all negative precepts.

Linscott.—Well noted. But let us look now at the Institutes of the Hindoo Menu (supposed to date from about 1200 B.C.), where there is the following arrangement of positive duties which must be obeyed. 1. Be contented. 2. Return good for evil. 3. Resist sensual appetites. 4. Abstain from unlawful gain. 5. Be pure. 6. Be chaste. 7. Study sacred writings. 8. Acquire knowledge of the supreme spirit. 9. Be truthful. 10. Abstain from wrath.

Mandel.—This is amazing. But in our decalogue God himself speaks these commands.

Linscott.—How do you know that?

Mandel.—It says so.

Linscott.—Who says so?

Mandel.—Moses, or whoever wrote the book of Exodus.

Linscott.—And what makes you believe this man?

Mandel.—Why,—I suppose because it is in the Bible.

Linscott.—Would you believe such a thing if any man should affirm now that God gave him laws?

Mandel.—No, of course not.

Linscott.—And you said a moment ago that you did not believe every statement of the Bible.

Mandel.—Well, I believe this statement.

Linscott.—Why?

Mandel.—Because the words of the decalogue are plainly those which God alone could,—oh! I forgot the Buddhist decalogue (laughs). I,—don't know why I believe it!

Linscott.—Nor I either, dear Mandel; especially when all great law-givers of antiquity were accustomed to sanction their laws by saying that they were communicated to them by the gods. They thus had far more influence over the people. Have you forgotten Numa Pompilius and the nymph Egeria?

Mandel.—At all events, Linscott, we must agree that the observance of one day in seven as a period of rest and worship is a good thing for the community.

Linscott.—It is. All I plead for is, first, that its enforcement should be placed upon its right basis; second, that it should be made a day of true rest and recreation for all to enjoy according to their own preferences; and, third, that the government should not draw a sectarian line and say that those who do not choose to observe the day as holy, cannot amuse themselves in festivities, or see works of art in our museums, or read freely in our libraries, or attend theatres and operas in the evening.

Mandel.—Well, to be candid, I am persuaded that Christians are wrong in thus interfering with the rights of others. Each individual should (under the necessary restrictions of good order) be allowed to pass his Sundays as he pleases. You would not, on the other hand, try to prevent Christians from worshipping on that day?

Linscott.—Certainly not. Let the pious worshipper go to church three times; let him fast all day if he so desires. But at the same time, let the man, who wishes to go on a picnic be allowed to do so. Let him who wishes to hear the operas of Rossini or Mozart on Sunday evenings have the opportunity of so doing. Let the present Sunday laws which shut up places of amusement, and yet wink at such pious frauds as "sacred concerts" and "jubilee singers" singing low doggerel about Jesus, be annulled! I would have Sunday a free, joyous day of repose and pleasure; a day of worship, to those who desire worship; a day of intellectual culture in museums, libraries and lecture halls, to those who desire such mental improvement; a day of innocent country amusement to the poor, working classes who have toiled like cattle all the week and who need this change; and a day when a man can travel with safety and legal security, on some errands besides those of "necessity or mercy"! In other words, a day of perfect liberty to all, on which Christian, Pagan, Jew, Freethinker and Buddhist, may all find an opportunity for such rest and recreation as they may desire, with perfect respect and tolerance towards each other! But the bells have ceased to toll. You will be late to church.

Mandel.—I'll not go a second time to church today. Your hand, Linscott! Thanks to this conversation, I feel that I am now a more liberal man. Will you allow me to accompany you to the Art Museum?

Linscott.—Most gladly.

Mandel.—I, too, am rejoiced that its halls are now open on Sunday.

Linscott.—It is certainly a movement in the right direction. We see the dawning of what I trust will be a day of liberty and equality to all. (They enter the Art Museum.)

ANARCHY.

BY HENRY DOTY MAXSON.

It is related that a Parisian of the seventeenth century chanced one day to hear that in Venice there was a State without a king; and the notion seemed so ludicrous that he nearly died of laughter. With no less ridicule, and, perhaps, more alarm, the average man of the nineteenth century receives any presentation of an ideal, social system without a government. Anarchy—the absence of an arché,—a central head, a governing power! The word is not particularly suggestive of millennial scenes.

There is a popular proverb that "That government is best which governs least." Therefore, adds Thoreau, that would be supremely best which should govern not at all. Admit the premise and it is difficult to avoid the conclusion. Is the premise true? Is "that government best which governs least"? "In proportion," says Wilhelm von Humboldt, "to the development of his individuality, each person becomes more valuable to himself, and is, therefore, capable of being more valuable to others." It is this principle alone which justifies the demand for liberty. The theory that there is any such absolute, inalienable right is a figment of the last century. Freedom makes a man more individual; individuality makes him more valuable; therefore he ought to be free. But what is freedom? The privilege of choosing your own masters? You would still be a slave. Rather, the privilege of being your own master,—of following out your own volitions to the utmost limit consistent with the enjoyment of the same privilege by your neighbor. Is "that government best which governs least"? Unless the favorite political principle of the age is a delusion; unless the greatest possible freedom in thought and action is not conducive to the highest human development.

The typical American never tires of asserting that our government is superior to any of the monarchies of Europe. Why? Because there is more liberty since the majority rule. Is that a sufficient proof? Does liberty vary inversely with the number of rulers? Was Athens three times as free under the Thirty Tyrants as under the oligarchy of ten, and thirty times as free as under Peisistratus? "Monarchy," says Proudhon, "is the sovereignty of one man; democracy, the sovereignty of the national majority." It is sovereignty still, though the agent which exercises it is changed. "The people" rule. "The limitation of the power of government over individuals," says

Mill, "loses none of its importance when the holders of power are regularly accountable to the community." In our stereotyped adoration of the Goddess of Liberty, who is supposed to preside over the nation, this principle is frequently forgotten. Chevalier writes of America as early as in 1835: "The infallibility of the people, in everything, and at all times, has, in fact, become the received doctrine." The statement is hardly an exaggeration. The "sovereign people," as a numerical majority is euphemistically called, wears about as regal a crown as that of James the First. The king has disappeared, but the "divine right" remains to sanction the power which has succeeded him. Vox partis majoris, vox Dei.

Perhaps there is no phrase more obnoxious to the American ear than "Church and State." It is not because religion is disesteemed. Hardly any one will refuse to assign a very high importance to the religious sentiments. It is not even on account of any wide-spread hostility to existing religious organizations. But few, even among their most unsympathetic critics, will deny their beneficent influence. Why should not the Church be united to the State? There comes from history a prompt reply. It is voiced in the martyr's moan. It is written in blood. "Religious freedom is a sacred right." But what consecrates this as the right of the race? If religion is beneficial, why not give it, in some organized form, the authority of the State? Because freedom is a crucible, in which the dross may be purged away from ancient faiths. Because, through freedom, truth may win a speedier victory; while without it, error, entrenched, may be able longer to perpetuate its power. Because freedom makes a man more individual, and individuality makes him more valuable to himself and to society.

The propriety of withdrawing State support from the organized Church is being quite generally conceded; but the principle which demands the change is receiving a very tardy recognition and a very partial application. Herbert Spencer tersely remarks, "Though we no longer presume to coerce men for their spiritual good, we still think ourselves called upon to coerce them for their material good,—not seeing that the one is as useless and unjustifiable as the other." Popular faith in the ability of government to create prosperity seems inexhaustible. Statute laws are confidently expected to regenerate the very society which enacts them. Mankind is to lift itself in a basket. These sanguine expectations are dampened little, if at all, by repeatedly failing to be realized. The over-stimulation which results from government aid leads to all sorts of extravagant enterprises. Railroads are built where they are not needed, and cannot support themselves; immense sums of the money which belongs to the whole country are sunk in river and harbor improvements which benefit a very limited locality or nobody. But subsidies and appropriations are continued. The various departments of public service already under the control of the State have vitiated our political system with their extensive patronage and facilities for corruption; and yet it is proposed to establish still other departments. Moreover, there is a graver evil than that which appears upon the surface. It oftentimes exists even when immediate external success attends a policy of government paternalism. By assuming duties which should be left to citizens singly or in voluntary organizations, the State discourages individual enterprise and diminishes the sense of individual responsibility,—two factors essential to give society permanent vigor.

There is quite another field upon which government has been recently lavishing its fondest care. The union of Church and State has come to be almost universally decried; the union of School and State is being received with about as general approbation. It may be a thankless task to criticize our public school system, thoroughly entrenched as it is in popular affection; and yet it seems fair to inquire why primary education should be thus singled out to receive the aid of the State and submit to its control. Can the masses be trusted to manage their own religious but not their secular education? Can they attend, unaided, to their eternal interests which are more important but less apparent; while as to their temporal interests which are less important but more apparent, do they require the assistance of the State? The perils of uniformity are nowhere greater than here. A secularized State must secularize its school. The pious Catholic must leave all adoration of the Virgin behind him as he enters the profane portals; the Evangelical can find no place within for his sacred book. The State blunts the sense of parental responsibility by assuming duties which Nature has commissioned and fitted others to exercise, makes itself the foster-parent, and strikes a final blow at individuality by forcing all its wards into a common educational mould.

There is a central care which breeds local carelessness. There is an over-governing which stifles the very capacity out of which government springs. Universal suffrage is not sufficient to guarantee the freedom of a people. What needs to be universal is the right to govern not others, but oneself. That may not be an wholly Utopian vision which sees many institutions, now public, more serviceable on private foundations, government better administered by being transferred largely from the State to the individual, order often more completely attained through anarchy.

THE IDAHO TROUBLES.

The existing Nez Perces outbreak deserves study. It is understood here to result from dissatisfaction with agents and the location of the reservation, federal non-observance of treaty stipulations, and the influence of Sitting Bull. The assertion is made that Joseph "made claims which could not be allowed." Those claims, we here understand, culminated in the demand that his people be admitted to the benefits of annuities relieved of obligations to live upon a reservation. At any rate, the attempt to force them to forego a roaming life would seem to be at the bottom of the present outbreak, and the matter is one demanding the entire consideration by the government of the Indian question. The matter comes to the people of Montana, who know not when the four operating causes mentioned above may move the Crows to no longer follow the policy of friendship of so many years standing, and become hostiles. Their reservation was removed against their consent to a point to which they, with good reason, objected; their supplies have not for years been provided according to treaty stipulation; their agents have not, since the removal of Major Pease, been to their liking, and a small leaven of dissatisfaction existing in consequence, and particularly with one branch of the tribe, may, with continuance of these causes of dissatisfaction, yet carry the entire nation into hostility. Although at enmity with the Sioux—and deadly enmity, too,—the latter have made advances during the past three years which have received the attention of the Crows to some extent, and the Nez Perces surprise may yet be repeated by the "friendly" Crows. It may not be; but, then, no one expected the Oregon outbreak. There is a question which threatens soon to be sprung upon the government by the Crows, and which will doubtless prove a serious one; namely, upon the construction of the Big Horn post (known at the East as one of the two Yellowstone posts), the Crows may, and no doubt will, demand the removal of their reserve to the Little Horn country. The government will be forced to accede; or take the chances of trouble; for, unless amity with the whites may have dispirited them, they will make the demand in good earnest. As an illustration of the method adopted to secure peaceable acceptance by Indians of treaties, may be mentioned the following fact: The "Brunot treaty," which contemplated the removal of the Crows to the Muske-shell country, received their sanction only upon the promise that their ex-agent, Pease, should be returned to them. The condition was presented, the promise was given; but fulfillment was no more intended than though the demand had never been made. True, the treaty (?) was not ratified; but had it been, what then? What a howl would have arisen from the West had a Nez Perces outbreak come from the Crows! I am advised that this promise was made without the knowledge of Mr. Brunot; but it was made, nevertheless. Now I know nothing regarding the fitness of this agent, or of the causes bringing about his removal; but I mention it as preliminary to the inquiry. Why should not the Indian have a voice in the selection of his agent,—the man upon whom, theoretically, at least, his bread and butter may be said to depend? These Indians demand this man Pease; yet it is said they have had three or four agents since he departed, and, while I know nothing against them, the fact is patent that the Indians have not been satisfied, and yet ask his return. Is it right that such a demand should be denied; such a departure from ordinary rules be legalized in so important a matter? Do Eastern people appreciate the moral importance of all these things? They lie at the foundation of the terrible, urgent, blood-spattered "Indian question." Said an ex-Indian agent to me this day: "When I called to say good-by to a certain commissioner after my appointment, he said to me, 'Now, my dear sir, you must make what you can and divide with the contractors, or they'll oust you before you know it!' He didn't steal and didn't divide,—and he was removed. 'Ah!' said a lobbyist to an agent, who complained that failure of supplies was lessening him his influence with the Indians: 'Ah! you don't understand it; it isn't the intention to expend upon any Indians anything like the amount of their appropriation.' 'Who told you so?' asked the agent. 'The Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and a Senator,' replied the lobbyist. And the agent tells me the supplies were purchased, for he had the bills; and paid for, for the bills were received; and shipped, for he had the bills of lading. But the supplies never came, and the Indians cursed the white man, and the agent lost his influence, and the Indian broke his 'treaty,' and roamed from the reservation. Had there followed a Nez Perces affair, all the West would have called for blood. What will the new administration do in these matters? It must not ask the army to go out, full-hearted, to suffer and punish, and die and kill in support of a 'policy' whose only result is robbery of the government, the demoralization of the frontier, and the forcing the red man to remain to-day the savage he was a century ago.—New York Tribune.

THE CHANGE IN ITALY.

Laymen past middle age, or advanced in years, seem often to feel a positive difficulty in realizing the fact that they are the same men who, thirty years ago in the Sardinian States, seventeen years ago in Lombardy, Central Italy, and the Kingdom of the two Sicilies, eleven years ago in the Venetian Provinces, and not even seven years ago in Rome and the patrimony of St. Peter, were liable at any moment to heavy penalties, to the choice between exile and imprisonment, if they dared to express in public the opinions which are now the recognized and official creed of the Italian State. Legally, as regards all outward acts, these men are free; but can it be matter of wonder if the iron of a life-long servitude has eaten so deeply into their minds and hearts that at every moment we recognize the traces of a mental bondage? Nevertheless, the transition from an anti-national and despotic task to a patriotic, free, and independent future is steadily going on among the Italian laity. Its progress is most observable among the peasantry, and for that progress the organization and discipline of the army are mainly to be thanked. The Italian officer has been the untiring and thoughtful teacher of the Italian soldier, and in teaching the Italian soldier he has been the best educator of the Italian people. From official data, which will shortly be published by the ministry of war, but of which the more important results have already been made known to me, it appears that, since the year 1859, when the old Sardinian army began to receive the conscripts from the first of the new provinces successively annexed, not less than one million five hundred thousand of common soldiers have received in the Italian army the educational training imparted to them by the younger officers. It would be difficult to estimate too highly the effect of this process on the national mind. Raw Sicilian and Neapolitan youths, whose entire stock of knowledge, until the day of their joining the army, has consisted in their acquaintance with strange provincial customs, or their traditional belief in crass, local superstitions, have found themselves four times a week, during two hours each day for a period of three years, in mental contact with a class of as highly-educated and public-spirited men as Italy can boast of. The mere elementary work of teaching the young recruit to read and to write has been quite secondary to the contemporaneous work of eradicating the prejudices with which his mind was overgrown. And this educational process has been marvellously aided by another, of all processes the best fitted to incarnate in the young soldier's mind the idea of Italian unity,—his successive transference from Italian cities and provinces, speaking various idioms, and marked by very different customs, but all agreeing in the recognition of that common country, which, had the illiterate peasant remained in his village, would never have been to him more than a myth. The Neapolitan conscript who had been trained up in the faith of St. Januarius finds, when quartered in Padua, that St. Januarius is there regarded as a very insignificant saint when compared with St. Anthony, and on his removal to his Bologna barracks learns that neither St. Januarius nor St. Anthony is held fit to be mentioned in the same breath with St. Petronius. What deductions he may draw from the comparison will depend partly on his natural intelligence, partly on the tone of conversation which he holds with his superior officers, partly on the character of the works in the perusal of which he exercises his new sense of intellectual power. One thing is certain: the million and a half of Italian peasants who have passed, or are passing, through this course of training, are a million and a half Italian minds in a most decided state of transition; and one cannot feel surprised at the undoubted fact that among this class are found many individuals who subject to a searching criticism, and end by rejecting the doctrines of the Roman Church; and who, in consequence, join the Waldensian or other anti-papal communions.—Contemporary Review.

Poetry.

TWO SONNETS.

To Marshal MacMahon.

O sworded President of ill-starred France!
Thou com'st of such a race defeat nor time
Can school thee, lift thee from the stagnant slime
Of bigotry to heights, where brightly glance
The rays of freedom. Battled long ago
Your kindred for the Stuart, despot vile,
And with him left discomfited their tale
To dwell where priestcraft still its blight could throw.
As they the fatuous Stuart served, so thou
His modern counterpart wouldst reëstablish
O'er struggling sons of France, who thee disown, Branding with scorn and infamy your brow.
Poor leavings of Sedan! thy baffled sword,
Is all too dull to keep these Gallia's lord.

To Gambetta.

No recreant to Liberty art thou,
Gambetta! but her clarion and tongue,
Haply from blood of Hellas nobly sprung.
For from Phœbe's halls full many a wandering prow,
When laid the Persian fair Ionia low
In history's dawn, and colonized Gaul's shore,—
With blood, which throbs for freedom evermore.
It matters not. In this her trial hour,
Great champion, thy crest thou dost not lower
To priest or tool of priest, whom thou dost know
As everywhere and always mankind's foe.
Thy lips, bee-clustered, gave no doubtful sound,
When lately maddened factions howled around,
To stop their clear, indignant overflow.

F. E. A. ANNUAL REPORT.

The report of the recent annual meeting of the Free Religious Association has been published in the usual pamphlet form, and can be obtained at the office 231 Washington Street, or at A. Williams & Co.'s, corner of Washington and School Streets, Boston. It contains the Essay by Rev. W. R. Alger on "Steps Towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and the Essay by Mr. C. D. B. Mills, on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; also Addresses by Messrs O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson,—with tenth annual reports of the executive committee, treasurer, etc. Price, single copy, forty cents; four, or more, twenty-five cents each.

Persons sending for it by mail will address, "Free Religious Association," 231 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

W. J. POTTER, Secretary.

A WEEK'S rioting is enough in the New York Nation's judgment to start the New World on the back track to repeat Old World follies,—it wants the standing-army doubled, and if need be, thribbled.

WE ARE glad to record the Springfield Republican's opposition to an increase of the army. It says: "At all points where the military for the moment fall short and after the full danger was realized, the vigilance committee sprang into being. . . . It is the American self-governing faculty which thus asserts itself upon an emergency,—like the cat's ability to land feet foremost when thrown into the air."

THE Christian Beacon is responsible for this incendiary placard:—

"Railroad men strike! For better wages! Put on the brakes! Abandon the trains! Burn the bridges! Tear up the track! Let no man take your run! Break the company! We mean the Bee Line to hell! and all its branches. Quit the service of Satan and serve the Lord Christ. Cease to do evil,—learn to do well. We do not promise you surer wages but better. For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. (Rom. vi., 23.) Hands wanted. Information given at the rooms of the Y. M. C. A."

CARDS advertising "Redding's Russia Salve," have on one side a pious little tract in rhyme entitled, "Please don't Swear," the last two lines running thus:—

"You would not swear upon a bed of death; Reflect! your Maker now could stop your breath."

We agree with Mr. Redding, swearing is foolish,—unless we make an exception in favor of the sort which comes forth provoked and flaming at long intervals, like George Washington's. We cannot imagine, however, why Mr. Redding should endeavor to frighten people by reference to their Maker's ability to "stop their breath." Is it that, he is really alarmed, or—he will forgive us—does this touch of "piety" smooth a highway to the selling of his salve?

THE Christian Beacon also gives notice that "No more strikes will be heard of when we have the great superintendent, the Lord Jesus Christ, at the head of corporation and brotherhood. With Christ in the office, Christ in the yard, Christ on the engine, Christ at the brakes, administration will be equitable and economical, Sabbath will be days of rest, and runs will be cheerful, easy, and profitable. Let the world adopt the following great principles, and the question between capital and labor is at once settled: 'Servants, obey in all things your masters, according to the flesh; not with eye-service as men please, but in singleness of heart, fearing God; and whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as unto the Lord, and not unto men; knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ.' 'Masters give unto your servants that which is just and equal; knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven. But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, and there is no respect of persons. (Paul to the Colossians.) Frame these words and hang them in the office, workshop, and caboose.'"

WE OUGHT to make friends of our Indian foes. How to go to work after all that has gone into the history of our dealings with them these two hundred years—considering, too, what we are to-day and how incapable we are of dealing well with one another—is a problem passing any immediate solution. But such a prayer as Sitting Bull offered to the heavens before holding a conference with General Miles, came out of the heart of a man—if he were not also such a "savage"—one should delight to know and honor. One of his warriors filled a pipe and handed it to him. He held it for some time in silence. He then arose,—holding the pipe aloft, looking into the sky,—and prayed thus: "The Almighty God sees and hears me. Great Spirit, bless my people, and give me power this day to protect and care for them. Make me to speak the truth; and make the white man to speak with a straight tongue. May he who lies to-day die first."

THE GOOD there is in good Sunday-schools, and especially in the Florence Sunday-school, gets pretty well stated this week. We are sure our readers will find Mr. Clark's essay and the other kindred communications—which meet this week in the columns of THE INDEX by a sort of unpremeditated providence—excellent and instructive reading. We have only this to say: that every Sunday-school should have a motto as good at least as that Jesus furnished when he said, "Suffer little children to come unto me." "Forbid them not," but don't command them. Mr. Emerson has supplemented this with good counsel: "It is time enough to answer questions when they are asked." Let the "twig" bend itself. Liberals should not take possession of their children's mind any more than other people. Give them freedom, and as fast as they are interested and inquire, tell them what you think, and let them then think freely and say for themselves whether they think as you think they ought to think. This we believe is what they try at Florence to do.

THE Independent is discussing the question as to whether "nine-tenths" of the rioters at Pittsburgh were Catholics. Bishop Tuigg, the priest who put his life in peril to persuade the rioters to "stop the fires," says: "I am told not five per cent. were Catholics." The Independent, not satisfied, addressed letters to several public men in Pittsburgh, and among others received a reply from Dr. Alexander Clark, editor of the Methodist Recorder. Dr. Clark, "judging by the bits of iron and the stones" thrown at the Bishop's head, thinks "very few loyal Catholics were in the crowd," and "no greater per cent. were Protestants." The Independent thinks this answer evasive. It wanted to know how many were brought up under Catholic influences, and would call themselves Catholic if asked what was their religion,—not how many were what might be called "loyal Catholics." It will "hold any religion responsible for the character of those who have been educated under it." There might be a greater justice in this if Catholics were products only of the Church; but of those foreign-born Catholics who come to our shores, by far the greater portion of them are outgrowths of Protestant oppression as well as Catholic Church influence. Judge the tree by its fruits when you can; but be sure from which tree your apples fall. England must answer for Ireland quite as much as Rome.

MR. CONWAY writes to correct the Independent in its criticism of his Sacred Anthology, he being charged by that paper with "going out of his way to degrade Christianity and to put it below rather than above the other religions of the world." Mr. Conway cannot understand this, since his work has passed through five editions and "met with approval in such various quarters as M. Renan, Max Müller, Von Weber, the Dean of Westminster, and various Orthodox clergymen and journals, and many of them have used it to illustrate their views of the superiority of the biblical writings given in it without comment to those of other books." The Independent responds: "When we said that Mr. Conway 'went out of his way to degrade Christianity,' we used language too strong for our purpose. Mr. Conway, in fact, was scrupulously careful to put the selections from the Old and New Testaments into the same shape as that of the extracts from the ethnic Scriptures. But, by a choice of divers irresponsible translations, by the acceptance of unproved theories concerning the late composition of the gospels, and by his assumption that the claims of Christianity are not absolute, a general effect of 'degradation' was produced." If it all turns upon this, that he did not assume "the claims of Christianity to be absolute," Mr. Conway may still hold himself vindicated from the charge of "prejudice and want of catholicity."

THE "scheme of salvation," still so strenuously urged, that forbids all expectation of "eternal life" or blessedness as a sequence of right living, seems not to have received from the lips of the Christ the attention commonly supposed. Conversing with the young man of "great possessions," who had, from his youth up, observed all the Commandments, Jesus seems to have avoided all mention of the doctrine of the Atonement. Hearing what the man said of himself, he believed him; looking upon him, he loved him. "You have come nigh unto perfection," he exclaims; "do one thing more, and thou shalt be perfect." "What lack I yet?" the man eagerly inquires. Now, had one of our modern Christian teachers been near by to make answer, he would have held forth somewhat in this manner: "All you have to do is to believe; believe Jesus Christ came out of the heavens to suffer for your sins in your stead. Believe this, and you shall surely go hence in peace." But the only reply Jesus made was, "Go sell all thou hast, and give to the poor; then take up your cross and follow me." He did not tell the young inquirer how he had been trying to reconcile God to him; but he asked him to reconcile himself to the making of a great sacrifice. That was hard; he went away sad. Had he been asked simply to believe something, he doubtless could have managed that. One can judge as much, by seeing how easily believing is practiced in these times. What would the effect be if this same Jesus could take his place for a Sunday in some Boston pulpit on the Back Bay, and speak once more of the comparative ease with which the camel can go through the needle's eye? Would there be many "countenances sad"?

OPINIONS differ as to the Pan-Presbyterians. The Catholic World pertinently says: "The ingenious reader may inquire, 'Who are the Pan-Presbyterians, and for what purpose were they in council?'" To this question it makes answer as follows:—

"The question would be a natural one, and he who propounds it need not blush for his ignorance. The people of Scotland may be presumed to know all that is worth knowing about Presbyterianism in all its forms; but it appears that, in certain rural districts of that very Presbyterian land, the impression prevailed that Pan-Presbyterianism was the title of a new sect indigenous to America, and recently smuggled into Scotland, like the Colorado beetle; while in more learned circles of Edinburgh this bucolic delusion was derided by erudite philologists, who explained that 'Pan-Presbyterianism is a learned form of stating that Presbyterianism is Everything, and that a Pan-Presbyterian is a person who holds that comprehensive yet exclusive doctrine.'"

The World has its own opinion, which it does not hesitate to give:—

"In point of fact, however, the Pan-Presbyterians were simply three hundred and twenty-five gentlemen, most of them with the handle of reverend to their names, who claimed to be the delegated representatives of the various Presbyterian sects throughout the world. . . . Presbyterianism has a history of about three hundred and twenty-five years, and in this period it has succeeded in dividing and subdividing itself, until even its own doctors do not know with exactness how many different kinds of Presbyterians there may be, or in what manner the points of doctrine which separate them should be formulated."

According to the World, one of the things done was the appointment of a committee which hopes to be able to report in three years' time how Presbyterianism can become reconciled doctrinally unto itself. The discussions that took place during the sitting of the Council reveal the great magnitude of this committee's task. The widest difference of opinion existed:—

"A lay delegate, a lawyer, said that if the Council once ventured to deal 'with the very complicated, delicate, and difficult question of creeds,' there might be found many who would propose to solve the difficulty by dispensing with all creeds. Dr. Begg at this point boiled over, and read the Council a severe lecture, expressing the disgust with which he had listened to some of the statements which had been made and apparently accepted."

"Every age had its own theology!" (Laughter and applause.) He did not in the least believe that. Theology had been the same since the days of Eden. The idea of having a new theology at every stage was a blunder. (Laughter.) They heard of discoveries being made, but these discoveries were only resurrections of old errors. (Laughter.) He found a revolt against the divine authority and the divine word, and the rebels were the discoverers of these new theologies."

EDWARD D. LINTON.

Edward D. Linton died on the morning of the 17th inst., aged sixty-three. Twenty months had passed since he was stricken down with paralysis, while attending a labor-meeting at John A. Andrew Hall. A year or so previous he had been deprived of work as ship-carpenter at the Navy Yard in consequence of the support he gave General Banks, then running for Congress in opposition to the regular Republican candidate. From that time he was unable to obtain steady employment, and times went hard with him. He was not of the complaining spirit, and only his most intimate friends realized the struggle he passed through. Goethe's mother said of him: "When my son has a sorrow he makes a poem of it." So by a native impulse Mr. Linton was wont to turn to good account whatever misfortune befell him. He did not permit the absence of "civil service reform" at the Navy Yard to discourage him; he was stimulated to greater effort in the cause he had so early espoused. But it also may be said to have helped hasten his death, quickening a mind already too active and unremitting in its labors. Mr. Linton was naturally of a robust constitution, and he held on to life with a tenacity that was marvellous, scarcely partaking of nourishing food during his long illness. Nature at last reluctantly gave way, and in death he was only a skeleton; but up to the last moment, save some temporary wanderings in the first part of his sickness, his mind held its steady poise; his intellectual vision was clear and serene.

Mr. Linton was born at Edgartown, Martha's Vineyard. He early went to New Bedford, and was apprenticed to a boat-builder. There, besides long hours at his trade, he persevered in his own education, declining for that purpose the almost imperative command of his employer to attend church, he feeling that he could and ought to spend his spare hours better. It is plain, however, although he had as then not thought very seriously on the subject, his young life had been tinged with scepticism touching the Orthodox creed. For when he chanced to stray into the Unitarian Church and listen to Orville Dewey, he told a young friend that he had just heard for the first time something he could believe. After that, when Waldo Emerson was for a short time occupying the Unitarian pulpit there, he and his friend both went into raptures, and felt that they were "living in a new world." At the age of nineteen he was trying to give expression to his thoughts in the Boston Investigator, then under the management of Abner Kneeland.

But Mr. Linton's experience as an apprentice, and the general condition of the working-people with whom he came in contact, made the deepest impression on his mind, and turned him to thinking of measures of relief for the common laboring class. He espoused the "ten-hour" proposal, and labored for it until President Van Buren's order adopting it as the system on all government works.

Mr. Linton was early in the anti-slavery movement, but not without his eyes still open for the wrongs of all races, and with a word for their redress. It is related that he presented in an anti-slavery convention a resolution to the effect that there were working people in England whose prospect for themselves and their children's children was no whit better than that of slaves of the Southern States; that the abolition of chattel slavery was only one phase of a world-wide problem. He thus early and lived to hear the news of the country's awakening forty years later to the reality of his vision. Mr. Linton's zeal in the anti-slavery cause was in no ways lessened by this larger view. He was the one young man determined Frederick Douglass should have a hearing in New Bedford. When the bill-poster dared not risk his life in putting up the bills, he traversed the city one cold winter night, and the next morning at every street-corner the people had "the news,"—they were to be "agitated" on the subject of human freedom by an ex-slave. Mr. Linton's anti-slavery work, though less prominent than some, was always to be counted on. He was an intimate friend of N. P. Rogers, and by his transcendental instincts allied himself mainly with that wing of the old abolitionists, which Rogers may be said to have led.

"In grasp of thought the future held,"

As a labor-reformer Mr. Linton has had quite a following of quiet but interested friends. Much of his work has been in social conversation, though he has contributed to several periodicals, and published some discussions of the labor-question in book-form. Among the latter may be mentioned Specific Payments Better than Specie Payments, and Conversations on the Currency; this last is now going through the press.

Mr. Linton early became acquainted with Josiah Warren, and remained his life-long friend. His views of labor were largely influenced by Mr. Warren, and he became a full believer in Mr. Warren's Cost Principle; but it was as the result of careful study and mature conviction. Intellectually he stood on his own feet; not too proud to learn of others, but desiring that whatever he received should be made his own by intelligent appreciation, and so become a part of his own thought. And then the unrelenting desire of his life was to impart to others willing to receive all he had gained for himself.

Aside from all questions of reform, all consideration of new views, there always stands a question friendship delights to answer: What of the man himself? Few, if any, in Mr. Linton's wide circle of acquaintances are not eager to give almost unrestricted expression to their sentiments of deepest esteem. No one is blest in life in whose nature friendships are not folded and sacredly cherished. Mr. Linton's life was rendered happy in this respect from his cradle to his grave. We do not fail to remember here the faithful love, the untiring devotion of his nearest companion in life, as through weeks and months, day and night, she has watched and ministered to his helplessness, until now she is herself stricken down and rendered an invalid, perchance, for life. It is no slight tribute to Mr. Linton that he could inspire the affection and sacrifice of one so gifted intellectually, so modest and true in all her ways.

Theodore Parker in discussing the forms of greatness, speaks of four different kinds: bodily greatness, crafty greatness, intellectual greatness, and religious greatness. Of the two former, Mr. Linton could not boast. His claim to the third in eminent degree his friends may assert. By the fourth, Mr. Parker meant the power of "justice, love, and obedience to the Eternal Right." If to be obedient in this wise is to be religious, Mr. Linton was a religious man, one among ten thousand. If true greatness comes also of such obedience, Mr. Linton achieved true greatness and true success. His life has not been a public one, but one hid in its own unselfishness. The public will not be able to lay its hand upon any great finished work or institution he has established. The work he did was without observation; but none the less great it may have been for that reason. Who can tell the force or the flight of an idea? Mr. Linton sowed as not expecting to reap again, save in the surety of his own soul that he did not sow in vain. "He lived the life he desired to," said one at his funeral, "and it was beautiful."

"The sun set, but set not his hope.
Stars rise; his faith was earlier up.
Fixed on the enormous galaxy,
Deeper and older seemed his eye;
And matched his sufferance sublime
The taciturnity of time."

A GLANCE AT THE FREE RELIGIOUS REPORT.

The report of the late Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association shows the proceedings to have been of much interest. Mr. Alger's fine address leaves in clearer light the "Steps toward Religious Emancipation," and Mr. Mills well states the "Internal Dangers to Free Thought." There are other shorter but interesting addresses reported, and two or three original hymns which show that the new religion sings and knows how to sing. One of these Mr. Wasson contributes; its last stanza we desire to quote: "Blow, winds of thought! to clear our skies,
That vex the light with darkening change!
No more let clouds the day disguise,
No more man's heart to man be strange."

We quote it, and say in good Methodist fashion, "Amen!"

Turning the leaves we come upon some remarks by William Henry Channing which arrest attention, and to which in part we cordially assent. We would be glad to speak of this we like and commend, but our space will only permit of a few words of dissent, and those will necessarily have to be abrupt. Mr. Channing fell into the fault of making an "odious" comparison. He speaks of Jonathan Edwards, Ellery Channing, and Theodore Parker as the "eagles," and of Thomas Paine as "the turkey-buzzard." He thinks Paine was no representative of Free Religion, and that there are "vastly better" representatives than he of the free-reason. He tells of his voyage across the ocean once, when the captain, a "terribly tough old John Bull," pointing to the American flag with its eagle on its folds, said: "It's only a turkey-buzzard, after all." The old Adam in him naturally got the start of him, and he would liked to have knocked that captain down. Considering this experience, we are something surprised that he should come home to repeat himself the same offence under not dissimilar circumstances. As he worships the old flag, so there are very many who think highly, and with good reason, of Thomas Paine. In their eyes he is as much of an "eagle" as anybody America has produced; and one can imagine their fury on hearing Paine pronounced "only a turkey-buzzard," to reach an emphasis before which Mr. Channing's, at the disparagement of the eagle on our flag, would pale.

Thomas Paine lived in an age when the free-reason had to manifest itself differently, perhaps, than it needs to now; but it seems out of all harmony with the facts to say that he was not one of the best representatives of it the Free Religious Association could select. He was a veritable John the Baptist of these modern times preparing the way in a wilderness of American superstition and ignorance for all the liberal teachers who have since appeared.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE second appearance of the Radical Review more than fulfils the promise inspired by the first. To begin with, its pages are beautiful to look at. There is no review or magazine in this or in any country that presents within a more attractive appearance. Democratic enough in spirit, it yet does not scruple to go dressed as well as anybody. Some have objected to its cost, and to its being gotten up in so expensive a style. As a reform Review it ought to go clad in cheap and unpretentious garb, so that "laboring men" could afford to take it. We dissent in toto to all this. By its appearance it asserts the right of the true and the beautiful to go hand in hand, and this for all laboring men and women throughout the land. Laboring people, however straitened in their income, should find in this Review an opportunity of investment, that they may become capitalists in ideas,—laying up for themselves not simply treasures on earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt and thieves break through and steal. Where they absolutely find it impossible to become individual subscribers, let them club by the half-dozen or dozen. Its appearing but once in three months affords ample opportunity for such cooperative enterprise. The articles in this issue of the Review directly discussing the labor-problem are by Mr. Spooner, Mr. Andrews, and Proudhon, as translated by the editor. Mr. Spooner gives a very careful study of "The Law of Prices,"—an article which, by its great ability, demands and will receive attention, whether the reader will or will not be led to adopt its conclusions. Mr. Andrews discusses the "labor-dollar" as a medium of exchanging "price-bearing commodities" equitably. The article is one of the clearest expositions of Josiah Warren's "Equitable Commerce."—Mr. Andrews calls it radical political economy; we should rather say with Proudhon, social economy—yet presented. Proudhon begins, "I affirm the REALITY of an economic science," and proceeds in his powerful way to show what he means. But the labor question is not the only question the Review deals with. To this number Joseph B. Marvin contributes by far the finest study of Walt Whitman and his poems that has appeared. Its biographical part is intensely interesting, and its analysis of Whitman's poetry, about which there has been such a diversity of opinion, is very thorough, and in our judgment conclusive. It is a paper it will do all workingmen good to read. No less will all be interested in Mr. Weiss' discussion of "The Orthodox Basis of Revivalism." It has a practical bearing on the labor question, as there is nothing the average workingman more needs than emancipation from superstition and the supremacy of priest and the idolatry of the Bible. Mr. Ball's poem, "Paul at Athens," will be apt to stir the indignation of all true Paulites,—and we confess, to a degree of incredulity. Let the reader judge:—

Zealot uncouth, whose seething brain
With theomanic visions glows,
What seek'st thou where Athena's fane
Empurpled mount and sea o'erbrows?
No desert-cradled prophet here
His mystic rancor ever poured;
But blue-eyed Pallas, calm, austere,
The might of reason, is adored.
To song and dance and joyous thought
The muse of Hellas sane inspires;
No dream of doom the soul o'erwrought
To pentecostal madness fires.
Yon is the stately Stoa, where Wise Zeno taught with fluent might;
Amid his listening pupils there
Serenely walked the Stagirite.
Of hero-moulding ethics stern
The founder one; the laws of thought
The other clearly did discern
With keenest introvision fraught.
O wandering dreamer! well may shine
With wild, unsteady light thine eyes,
Gazing at altar, marble shrine,
Where glorious shapes of beauty rise.
Bards, sages, artists, statesmen grand,
With Jove-like brows, a noble throng,
In bronze and stone, on every hand,
Confront thee as thou mov'st along.
What bring'st thou from the desert far,
Palm-shaded sand and blazing sun?
Fanatic zeal! thou com'st to mar
All that the might of thought has done.
Reason is by thy narrow race
Unheeded—nigh dethroned in thee.
Thou heraldest the mind's disgrace,
First of a priestly pedigree.
Because of thee for ages long
Shall thought in chains and darkness sit,
While reign a wild and squalid throng
Of monks, fierce foes of wisdom, wit;

And science, manhood, leave the world
In total, thousand-year'd eclipse;
Sense, judgment, into exile hurled,
No utterance find from human lips.
Fanciful Asia's rancor fierce
Shall poison Europe's spirit prone;
Long, long 'twill be ere reason pierce
With sun-bright shafts faith's murky cloud.

In the Atlantic Monthly for September, there is a short story, "The Child of the State," signed "S. A. L. E. M.," excellently written, and full of incident pertinent to the times. The writer evidently draws largely from intimate observation, and relates the inside workings of the "Reform School" with a fidelity which ought, together with the revelations of Legislative investigating committees, to draw largely upon public attention. No greater evils beset our civilization than these so-called "Reform Schools"; and their damage is all the more real in that they stand before the public mind in the guise of the wisest manifestations of philanthropy. Of the two sexes, as this writer's story illustrates, the boys, as "Children of the State," have by far the best of it; and when we have said this, the fate of the girls certainly cannot be said to be enviable. Mrs. Keyes is on a visit to the Reform School. She frees her mind to the Superintendent:—

"I have spent ten years studying the classes from which our reform schools, our houses of correction, and our jails are filled, and this is my conviction: that you take the children who are the worst born and bred in the world, and put them under circumstances which would render desperate, and consequently depraved, the best nature you could find. Your system is a failure, and you know it."

The eyes of the superintendent contracted savagely for an instant. Then he said, as mildly as ever, "On the contrary, madam, a large proportion of the boys who leave this school go to earning their living honestly, and lead respectable lives."

"And the girls?"

"Oh, the girls! Well,—the girls are a great deal worse. Women always are worse than men, you know, when they are bad. There's a peculiar devil in women, somehow, begging your pardon."

"You mean that you do not reform the girls," said the lady, curtly.

"No; there is no possibility of reforming the girls. It is merely a house of correction for them, and serves a very good purpose in keeping them out of mischief for a few years, at least."

"And you only reform more boys than girls," said Mrs. Keyes, with some indignant passion in her voice, "because you don't undertake to cure the girls of the same faults; and it is no matter, when they go out into the world, whether they have or acquire vices or not. No, there is another reason why you reform more boys. You treat them better, with more respect, and thus you inculcate self-respect in them. You teach them a useful trade. You give them a decent yard to play in. You give them good seats at chapel. But what do you give to the girls to reform them? Vacant minds, a dismal present, and despair for the future. There's a peculiar devil in women, is there? You remember what the Bible says. You may sweep that chamber empty of devils as many times as you please, and they will come back, if you put nothing else in the place. Take that child, in there, who had the rags for her doll. Anybody can see what a nervous, impressible, restless creature she is. If she is chained down to this of hopeless monotony, without change and without chance, of course her feverish feelings will find an outlet in some wrong way."

We have particularly called attention to this article because of its bearing on a subject of late made prominent by an apparently serious attempt to examine into the workings of some of the Reformatory institutions of Massachusetts. Other contributors furnish entertaining and important matter. To the students of Dickens, Mr. Edwin P. Whipple offers one of his best essays; Mr. Howells adds to his comedy, "A Counterfeit Presentiment"; and David A. Wells has an instructive paper entitled "Are Titles and Debts Property?" His opening sentence is a reminder of a common experience worth quoting: "People in general act very much like the crows in the fable. So long as the wood-chopper and his sons talked about cutting down the trees, the crows did not much concern themselves; but when the blows of the axe began to be heard in their immediate vicinity, the question of changing their roosting-place became a matter of practical individual importance."

LABOR NOTES.

—There is better feeling throughout the country.

—The reason of it is the faith of Americans is coming to their rescue.

—America is yet young, and whatever seems inevitable and necessary to be done, she has no misgivings. She will "do it up brown."

—We have not yet settled into the "sear and yellow leaf,"—so to speak. In fact, we have scarcely yet settled into anything we can call absolutely our own from choice. We have been drifting,—taking our chances.

—We have had to wear out our "old clothes,"—foreign clothes. We are getting threadbare of late, fast. Now then, a direct, straight look at first principles, and let us see if we have settled down to a system of labor and labor-exchange it will do to swear by.

—The "demand" is so great, the price of ink is likely to go up,—so many pens are busy solving the "question of questions." We shall get surfeited, no doubt. 'Tis as if we were all at school: so are we, and our master is necessity. Let each and every one take to his and her task; we shall find the answer in due time, if we faint not.

—One other admonition, good friends. Let us keep sweet-tempered. Now that we have had our "French Revolution," let us make an end of it, by some genuine display of good-nature over our folly; strong in the faith that we can straighten things if we have a mind to. We cannot recall the past. It was needed for our purging. Let us see that we get purged; but no more fighting.

—There are some things that stand in the way of the peaceful, coöperative disentanglement of our difficulties. One of those things is foremost, and needs a word, if not many, to demolish it. It is a miserable distrust and misrepresentation of one another. Not one of us is able to state an opponent's position without making him appear either a fool or a knave. What Whately calls "illegitimate inference" is more common than wilful misrepresentation; but both abound extravagantly. When we think that another believes something "awful," because it so seems to us, we may remember with profit that if it were awful in his eyes he would not cherish it; either he sees what we don't see, or he don't see what we see; try to see all he sees, or enable him to see all you see. Let denunciation and calling of names end!

—A curiosity-dealer carried with him to the studio of an artist a picture which he had just bought, with the view of re-selling it to advantage. "I gave only £10 for it," cried he, panting for breath. The artist ran his hands through his hair. "Ten pounds, eh? Well, that's about what it's worth." "Isn't worth more? Not more than ten pounds? Then I've been robbed!" This story is going the rounds of the papers, and everybody who reads it no doubt sees the point. The poor "curiosity dealer" considered himself "robbed" because he did not buy his picture for less than it was worth; that is, because he had not robbed somebody else. But, then, he belongs to an army out foraging, none of whom always find pastures green, and he can make it up another time. We do not denounce him; it is the way we trade.

—We are not unfrequently reminded that the working people are not all men and boys. There are women and girls who work, and who work hard and long hours, and get far poorer pay than men and boys do. Much of truth here; and no one thought needs to be more thoroughly grasped than this: that all work equally well done by women and men should be equally paid. It is not so; but it should be so. And another thing: boys and girls should be paid as much as men and women when they do the same work equally well. Under a system of equity this equality of remuneration would naturally occur. The conservative influence which shudders lest the world be upset should a woman teaching a school receive a salary equal to a man who taught no better and perhaps worse, is still in the ascendant; but it is also a fact that the moral sense of the world is moving to dethrone it, and will cast it out, let us hope, forever.

—If it be true that those who "lend to the poor lend to the Lord," then must it not also be true that those who "rob the poor" rob the Lord? That sounds like good theology. If granted, then this question arises: Which robbery does the Lord regard as greatest; that which deprived him of his "Sabbath," or that which withholds the just wages due for hard work on railroads, rivers, and elsewhere? We have our own opinion and venture to give it. If he burns cities and destroys life to square accounts for Sabbath stealing, what ought he to do to even out things when even their "bread and water" is taken from his (his children's) mouths? A "bigger riot" would not be advisable; let him not try that. We shall have a "standing army" (probably) to stamp that out. Suppose for once he should give over his lust for violence (he will pardon our plain speech; we have the same right to suggest things that Christians have); suppose he should try what virtue will come of giving the people a few right ideas as to how they may get along in a more brotherly fashion. We are a benighted set; we sit in darkness, Christians and infidels,—all. But what we surely need is light, inner light; not blood or fire. We wait a response. The Christian Statesman speaks for "the Lord" in so many things, perhaps it will in this. What we want to know is, how to stop stealing.

—Senator Conkling returns home from a brief sojourn in Europe to admonish all working people of this country that they are much better off than in France and England. This is the picture he paints: "Workingmen here are dissatisfied with wages, and unwise and lamentable counsels here recently led to lawless acts, from which in the end no one will suffer so much as their authors and abettors and those they assume to represent. I wish they could all go to France and England and see what the workmen and women do there, and hear of the wages they receive. England, excluding the twelve counties of Wales, is not larger than the State of New York. It contains twenty-four million people. Look at a fact or two! One or two hundred men own half of England. Their estates are princely reservations for game and pleasure and opulence. One man may ride thirteen miles in one direction and nearly as far in the other on his own estate, and when he dies his eldest son takes it all. The State of New York has less than five million people. Suppose there were five times as many, and then that one-half of the State was given up to the monopoly and pleasure of one hundred and fifty noblemen! Suppose, in addition, men and women labored in the fields and mines, and that the wages were only those paid in England. Suppose only one man in three had a vote or voice in public affairs, or in making laws, and the great body of workingmen were wholly excluded from all part in choosing members of the only house of Parliament in which the seats are not hereditary. Then suppose taxation to maintain a standing army, in which commissions are sold for money or given to sons and relations, and tithes taken to maintain an Established Church, in which the livings are sold to the highest bidder or bestowed as patronage. What would the workmen of Pennsylvania or Ohio think of such conditions?" What would they think? Why, Mr. Conkling, they think, probably, that if these "conditions" are so much worse than those in which they now find themselves, that they do not wish to drift into them. They will stop short where they are. They think also, we trust, that it is small comfort to draw their solace from the misery of others. They might say, especially those in the coal-mines of Pennsylvania, "If there are any people worse off, God help them!"

—But Mr. Conkling continues: "We are all workmen in America. No class has a monopoly of right to call itself a working class here. I have always worked, and have always been compelled to work, and my sympathies are all with honest labor. I believe in its dignity and in all its rights; but when the tidings of the strike reached me in Paris, under my eyes was a spectacle which seemed to heighten the madness of what the men in America were doing. The government of France was borrowing money, and on the curbstones in the street sat men all night to get each his turn in the morning to invest in the loan. They were workmen who were living as workmen do not and need not live here, and working for wages which American workmen would scorn. They had, by hook or by crook, saved fifty francs each. Fifty francs make ten American dollars, and these all-night watchers were there to buy a ten-dollar bond on which they were to get four per cent. interest. There sat the workman of France amid the luxury of the more fortunate, contented with what fate had sent him. Can it be that liberty and prosperity have spoiled any portion of the American people till they cannot endure their share in a season of common adversity?" That is not the gospel to preach in America,—"contented with what fate sent them." Mr. Conkling has not forgotten that the Southern slaves were said to present a picture of contentment quite as inspiring. But he adds, as though that followed: "Can it be that any portion of the American people are spoiled so that they cannot endure their share in a season of common adversity?" No; it is not so. This is the way of it: they have discovered by no inconsiderable experience that when this "season of common adversity" comes, they are reduced to a far worse state than sitting on the curbstones waiting for the morning to invest their savings. No: they object to the inequality of the burden. They will take a fair share in any ill-fortune; but not so great a load.

THE IDEAL SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

The ideal "Sunday-school University for the Million," as outlined by "T." in THE INDEX of July 12, already exists in Florence, Mass., under the auspices of the Cosmian Hall Association.

The departure from old methods, so successfully tried for years in this school, with an attendance of over a hundred, should be known and tried wherever there is the outreaching in societies for something better, for Sunday instruction and improvement for children and adults, than has been known.

Cosmian Hall is worthy of passing notice; it is the result of the united effort of the Cosmian Society. It has been handsomely ornamented in fresco by a native artist and member. But this is a minor attraction as compared with its admirable acoustic properties. One speaks to the several hundred before him with ease, and with as much security of being heard by the most distant-seated, as if addressing a small group gathered about him. The broad, raised platform for the speaker is adapted to theatricals, for which they have suited appointments, and plays are given by amateurs, in connection with the society, during the winter season.

The readers of THE INDEX have been already informed of the hopes of the members of the society, to have plays of an elevating character form an occasional part of their Sunday instruction.

Below, are rooms well suited to the social enjoyments of the society, and those who have had the pleasure of being entertained in them will know that genuine cordiality and fraternity of spirit enters largely into the religious element of the Cosmian Society.

Adjoining the social rooms are those for Sunday instruction. There are several, and they are well ventilated, bright, and cheery. The day I was present, the exercises began by the superintendent reading brief selections gleaned from various sources illustrative of the sense of justice that has been taught by all leading law-givers. Singing followed, of songs teeming with sentiments of brotherly love, and of appreciation of the works of Nature.

The classes then formed in groups about their respective teachers. One youthful class was abundantly supplied with the early spring flowers. They made themselves familiar with all of the various parts, forms, and development of the plant and flower. It was delightful to note their ready observation, and their enthusiasm over each newly-gained idea. Another class had a variety of entomological specimens, bottled and fresh. From the fixed attention they gave to the instruction and investigation of these little atoms of life, whose span of existence is often measured by a few hours, one could not doubt that even in these there is a law divine that shapes their being. There were geology and mineralogy groups, each supplied with the specimens they were studying. There were Shakespearean, history, and English literature classes. One room was devoted to drawing. An adult class was seeking for more light under the dispensation of such leaders as Darwin, Spencer, and Huxley.

Florence, a gem suburb of Northampton, is a centre for various manufactures, such as sewing-silk, stoves, and sewing-machines, and an important element in connection with the Coasian Hall Sunday-school is composed of those whose opportunities for consecutive and continued study are limited.

In this weekly hour thus devoted to study, each may receive such impetus and inspiration in the specialty for which he has a fondness and a talent, as will enable him, later, to grasp the subject with an intelligence that will not only enrich his own life, but add to the common fund of scientific research.

Florence illustrates the influence for good that individuals may exert upon a whole community, turning by example the tide of thought and action into generous, instead of sordid, channels.

One woman, in dying, wills her large worldly possessions to the endowment of a college for women, which bears her name,—Smith College. If the massive building and the broad acres surrounding it are indicative of the solidity and breadth of its educational advantages, we who are not friends to monastic education for men or women, will still be glad of good work done, even under these unnatural conditions.

A Smith brother left at his death a goodly sum of his estate as a fund, the income of which is given in certain specified sums,—three hundred for young women, and five hundred for young men who shall have served an apprenticeship at any trade that fits them to be self-supporting and skilled laborers. He also left a certain amount, the income of which shall be given, to the amount of fifty dollars per annum, to indigent, aged widows.

Another citizen, whose name deserves to be a household word, wherever true worth and nobility of character are cherished, gives of his worldly goods as abundantly as he has received, and so unostentatiously that but for their abundant fruits none would be the wiser for them. It would seem as if the satisfaction that must be derived from planning and executing one's own bequests would stimulate each one who hopes in the end to endow charities to do it while living, and reap the reward of well-doing; and more especially so, since it so frequently is the case that one's wishes, as to the disposal of one's property, are disregarded after death, and the money that was designed for benevolent purposes is squandered in law, through the wranglings and dissensions of relatives.

A model kindergarten is one of the many blessings that this noble man has conferred upon the community. The spacious, airy, and light building, with all its suited furnishings; the ample grounds, upon which the children cultivate flowers, and the charming cottage-home for the kindergartners, in the same enclosure,—are all his gift.

Little walls—for such we saw,—with home influences to curse rather than to bless, are welcome and free to come. None are asked to pay. All who send children who are able and inclined to give, do so, and no one else is cognizant of the amount. Such influences as go out from this kindergarten, presided over by women whom one feels to be truly inspired for the work; the tender regard for each other's rights here inculcated; the love of flowers; the respect for the life of the tiniest insect that crawls; the judicious guarding and guiding of the child's individuality,—in a word, the careful out-drawing and developing of all that is best in the child's nature, must help to weed it from evil developments, and give it strength to withstand evil communications later in life.

I can but hope that this great good conferred upon these children may be supplemented by a kindergarten system of progressive study for youths, in which the experiment shall be tried of evolving thought from within out.

If this could be done, it would be an entirely new departure in our system of education, and it would furthermore settle the question now being solved in this kindergarten of purely moral instruction, devoid of all sectarian bias.

LIBERALISM AND THE MASSES.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Sometime ago I saw in THE INDEX an article on Sunday-schools that recognized the importance of early education in liberalism for children.

From children to "children of a larger growth" the transition is easy, and the importance of liberal education as easily recognized in the one case as in the other.

"Give me the child until he is eleven years old; take him away from me afterwards if you can," one of the Popes is reported to have said.

Every Protestant church is recognizing and acting upon this principle; hence the strenuous efforts that are made to gather in the children to their respective flocks. The means used are the Sunday-schools, young people's prayer-meetings, etc.

Now the great majority of the people are just as ignorant of the modern liberal ideas as children are of the "plan of salvation"—they know nothing in either case until they are taught. It will be difficult for one whose ideas are gathered from THE INDEX and from Boston only to realize this; but let him launch out from some intellectual centre, let him mingle with the masses, and he will soon find that "darkness covers the face of the deep."

Of the great questions of the day, the vast majority of the people have but a superficial idea, if any idea at all. Some have heard of Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, Darwin; have heard of "science and religion"; have heard a din in the distance as of a skirmish; but, with Peterkin's grandfather, they can't exactly make out what it is all about; and it is safe to say of the simple majority of the men and women of this country that they are as innocently ignorant of the principles these men represent, and of their relation to religion, as if they never existed. They attend to their business in offices, stores, counting-rooms, in shops, factories, and on farms, read their newspapers, go to church, fortify their souls at the weekly prayer-meetings against infidelity; and are doing as well as can be expected.

I asked a friend some time ago why liberalism does not send out its missionaries as well as orthodoxy, to tell the people what it believes and the reason for that belief; why it does not popularize liberalism. I was told it could not be done; that the acceptance of liberalism presupposed a certain intellectual development and culture as yet unattained by the masses; that liberalism was a growth that could thrive only in rich and highly cultivated ground; in fact, that it partook of the nature of a caste-religion, and was not suited to the common herd, and that they were better off with their old forms of religion. The answer was not satisfactory to me, nor was it in accordance with facts gathered, knowing as I did that it is not only possible by teaching to awaken new and purer religious sentiments in illiterate but honest minds, but also, in many instances, how welcome is the smallest aid promising help to the individual in his struggle for religious freedom.

Some time ago I noticed in THE INDEX an article in which the writer intimated in substance that THE INDEX was too deep for the common people; to which THE INDEX replied that that was the highest compliment it could receive.

Though this does not indicate that THE INDEX is of the opinion of my friend alluded to above, it seems to indicate that its mission is not to popularize liberalism. In other words, it recognizes, in an indirect way, a plain fact conspicuous in the history of all religions; to wit, that for the successful propagation of any form of religion, the living voice is needed.

But is there any good and sufficient reason for believing that liberalism cannot be presented in a form to suit the capacity of the masses? I am convinced there is none. I am, on the contrary, convinced that free religion in its most liberal form, religion not only in harmony with modern science, but resting on a scientific basis, can be intelligently presented to the masses, and as intelligently received by them; and that the primary means to this end must be verbal teaching.

There is a complaint of apathy among the people. They do not organize as readily as we wish they would. They do not evince that zeal in secularization which they should; and the "transition from Christianity to free religion" does not go as fast as it might. Why? Is it not because we expect to reap before we have sown? How can we expect a transition from a time-honored institution like Christianity to anything else until the thing proposed as a substitute has been clearly set forth, its right to existence vindicated, its merits weighed, its adaptability proven, and the transition itself explained? But how can all this be done without teaching, or preaching, if you please, "and how shall they preach except they be sent"?

The apathy complained of as existing among the people is owing to this; they are as yet not in sympathy with liberalism.

As a work of philanthropy, a missionary work that will produce this sympathy would be the noblest by far that could be engaged in, in this our day. To those who feel the miseries resulting from orthodoxy it would be a work of mercy.

The dwarfing of intellect, the bondage of spirit, the anguish of soul, the changing of the whole current of life into bitterness and gall,—this is done by the religion of superstition. Intellectual growth, freedom of spirit, peace in a healthy conscience,—these are the fruits of the religion of truth. The happiness of passing from that to this, the difficulty of accomplishing it unaided, the vain regrets over life-long consequences of soul-slavery, the strength derived from sympathy, and the longings to extend a helping hand to those that are left behind,—these are known only to those who have gone through the transition, and their value to him who has paid the price.

COMMUNISM AND THE STRIKES.

MR. MORSE:—

I found so many things in THE INDEX of August 9 that pleased me (especially your two columns of "Labor Notes"), that my feelings underwent a stronger rebound when, this Sunday afternoon, I turned to the article on "Individualism vs. Communism," than I ever felt in so short a time.

"E. W." says, "The Communists, or rather leaders of despotic unions, who have begun by making war on railroad and corporate property, and who denounce the accumulation of even private property, make the mistake of fighting against the only form of cooperative labor that can possibly be successful (?). Capital, they pretend, should belong to all; that is, to the State. The State should employ all," etc., etc.

Now there is not a particle of evidence—and I challenge "E. W." to produce any if he can—that the leaders of these "despotic unions," or those who instigated or took part in the violation of the law, were Communists, in the sense intended by him in the above quotation; or that they had any such ideas as he attributes to them. The truth is, that all these "strikes" and all this destruction of property and violence differed from the generality of the strikes in England, as well as in America, during the past half century only in their magnitude—extent of territory included—and simultaneousness. Nor did these peculiarities arise from any superior or more despotic organization than common, nor from the "strikers" being imbued with communistic ideas.

The material of sullen and deep-seated discontent underlies the whole industrial community; and it only needed a concurrence of "reductions" of wages on a number of railroads and other more or less related industries, to bring about a conflagration as soon as a spark should be dropped at a place, and a moment favorable for the spread of the flame.

The people whom "E. W." speaks of as "Communists," and whom the "press" generally speaks of as "Communists," and with whom I am proud to enroll myself, had nothing whatever to do with the strikes, are entirely opposed to trades-union methods, are entirely opposed to the violation of law, and wish to supplant these "despotic unions" with a better form of organization of labor based upon political action and the ballot.

It is true that the Social Democrats of the Workingmen's Party have been somewhat prominent in these events, not only at the theatre of strife, but in all the large cities of the Union; not as disturbers of the peace, however, nor as inciters of riot, but as calm and rational peacemakers between the angry belligerents, and as exponents of the true causes of the disturbances. That has been our mission, and some day justice will be done to the value of our services in allaying excitement and preserving order in the midst of wide-spread exasperation.

The Social Democrats are revolutionists, but not Communists, even in that meaning of the word which Communists would themselves accept, which is very different from its ordinary acceptance by the press and by people who do not trouble themselves to inquire the meaning of the words of reproach they are so fond of using.

I am afraid of encroaching too much on your space, or should like to dissect "E. W.'s" article. I must point out one or two of his errors as regards what he calls Communism, but what we call Social Democracy.

He says, "Capital, they pretend, should belong to all; that is, to the State." True. "The State should employ all, no matter how fast they multiply, at comfortable wages." True again. "There is now no personal or selfish motive to accumulate, for all surplus belongs to the State." This would be Communism; but this is precisely what the Social Democrats do not hold. They hold that all surplus belongs to the individual workers; the State reserves only sufficient of the gross products for maintaining necessary capital and for public expenses. "As brains are to be no better paid than muscle, there is little motive left to seek office," etc. Wrong again. We hold no such thing; we hold that the reward of labor should be proportionate to the value to the public of each man's labor. All "E. W.'s" conclusions arising from these false premises are consequently valueless. Once more I ask those who undertake to criticize us to first ascertain what our opinions are, and not to jump at conclusions so hastily.

THE MAGIC STONE.

Once upon a time a noble youth watched with tender care over the last days of an aged pilgrim, who, dying, gave him a sapphire gem, the most wondrous for beauty that was ever seen in the world. But it had a property more marvellous even than its beauty, for it gave the possessor to see, wherever he should look, only its own hue; every clod became to his eyes a crystal, and the universe all one infinite sapphire purity and splendor; and in his heart, meantime, reigned a celestial calm, that no passion could ever trouble, no fear nor care invade. The recipient lived long in enjoyment of the gift, and at length sank to his rest like a star, bequeathing the gem to the youngest of his brother's sons, for he himself had remained unmarried, since his heart had no place for the passion of love. The new possessor, after a life no less serene, left it in like manner to a young relative. But this youth, before receiving it, had fallen passionately in love with a maiden as beautiful as the gem itself. No sooner had he obtained the gift than the blood-red lip and blooming cheek of his beloved lost their tint to his eye, while his love, though it could not die, lay panting and struggling with death in his breast. The maiden wept sore on perceiving his altered regard; but for himself he could neither weep nor smile. Unable either to forget or to recover the past, unable either to resist or enjoy the fascination of the jewel, he lingered long in a dull painlessness, worse even than pain. At length one day, with sudden resolution, he seized the lovely, fateful stone, ran with it to a cliff overhanging the deep sea, and saying as he gave it one last look, "Henceforth let me share with others the sweet and bitter of mortal existence," flung it away forever.

Has not every time its magic stone, of one hue or another? They call it the spirit or faith of that epoch. But the day ever comes when its charm ceases to be sufficient. And in that day he is the unhappy one who wants alike resolution to part with it and power to restore its enchantment.

THE funeral services of Edward D. Linton took place at the Unitarian Church, Charlestown, Sunday afternoon, 19th inst., and were conducted—in the absence of Rev. Pitt Dillingham, who had during his long illness been a very sympathizing and constant friend of the deceased—by Rev. Jesse Jones, assisted by Rev. Mr. Babcock and Lysander Spooner, who made short and excellent addresses. The Hutchinson family were present and furnished appropriate singing.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.

Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.

J. L. STODDARD, Boston.

ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.

C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.

W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or reading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1872, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. ## OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM AND THE NEW FAITH.

By EDMUND C. STEDMAN.

12mo, Cloth extra, with Portrait of Mr. Frothingham, 75 cents.

A clear and effective presentation of what is known as Rationalism in Religion in an analysis, by an admirer of acknowledged genius, of the life and work of one of its leading teachers.

"A brilliant and appreciative essay."—Boston Post.

"Radical ideas are here formulated, and expressed in a strong, clear light."—Liberal Christian.

LEWES' NEW BOOK!

THE PHYSICAL BASIS OF MIND.

Being the Third Volume of "Problems of Life and Mind."

By GEORGE H. LEWES, author of the History of Philosophy, the Life of Goethe, etc. 8vo. $3.00.

CONTENTS.—THE NATURE OF LIFE.—THE NERVOUS MECHANISM.—ANIMAL AUTOMATISM.—THE REFLEX THEORY.

Mr. Lewes is widely recognized as one of the most acute and independent of thinkers, and a writer of remarkable force and perspicacity. The two preceding volumes of Problems of Life and Mind have attracted in an unusual degree the attention of scientific and philosophical minds, and have taken rank among the most important of recent contributions to the philosophy of life and thought. The present volume is of equal significance, and will doubtless win equal study and admiration from those competent to follow the author's speculations and argument.

Its interest is by no means confined to specialists, but all persons of intelligence will find it in a high degree instructive and engaging.

"The book is one which will inevitably find its way into the hands of every student of mental science who wishes to obtain the freshest view of physiology in its relation to mind."—Saturday Review (London).

PROBLEMS OF LIFE AND MIND.

Vols. I. and II. $3.00 each.

Sent postpaid on receipt of price by THE INDEX, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

FROTHINGHAM'S WORKS.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY. An Essay. Third Edition—Revised. Price $1.50.

"Nobody can peruse this book without respect for the learning, mental honesty and skill in the statement of his convictions, possessed by the author, and for the essential integrity and philanthropic tendency of his spirit."—Springfield Republican.

"A profoundly sincere book, the work of one who has read largely, studied thoroughly, reflected patiently.... It is a model of scholarly culture and of finished and vigorous style."—Boston Globe.

THE CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION. For Sunday-schools and Homes. Price $1.00.

THE SAFEST CREED, AND OTHER DISCOURSES. 12mo, Cloth, $1.50.

Not "food for babes," but full of suggestion for earnest and thoughtful men.

STORIES FROM THE LIPS OF THE TEACHER. With Frontispiece. Cloth, $1.00.

"The Parables are so re-told as to absorb the attention of the reader, and to fasten upon the mind what the writer believes to have been the impression the Saviour meant to convey. It is in style and thought a superior book, and will interest alike young and old."—Zion's Herald (Methodist).

STORIES OF THE PATRIARCHS. With Frontispiece. Cloth, $1.00.

"A work of culture and taste; it will be welcome to all ages, and give the sublimest lessons of manhood in the simple language of a child."—Springfield Republican.

BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS. A Lecture. 12mo, Paper, 25 cents.

TRANSCENDENTALISM IN NEW ENGLAND. A History. With sketches and studies of Emerson, Alcott, Parker, Margaret Fuller, the Brook-Farm Community, etc. 8vo, Cloth extra, with steel portrait of the author, $2.50.

THE LIFE OF THEODORE PARKER. 8vo. With Portrait, $3.00.

The New York Tribune closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

THE CRADLE OF THE CHRIST. A Study in Primitive Christianity, illustrating the prime importance of the Messianic Idea in the New Testament, as the key to the development of Christianity from Judaism. Octavo, Cloth, $1.75.

Mailed, post-paid, on receipt of price, by THE INDEX, 231 Washington St., Boston.

$55 to $77 a Week to Agents. $10 Outfit Free. P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

$12 A DAY at home. Agents wanted. Outfit and terms free. TRUE & CO., Augusta, Me.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient co-operation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE 231 Washington Street, Boston.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental ideas on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE
FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

S. H. M.

SUMMER is gone. Vacation ends.

HAPPY the man or woman whose feelings the "mountains" and the "sea" have not lured into publicity.

GAIL HAMILTON is reported as not believing in woman's rights. She believes evidently in her own rights. See her letters to the Tribune.

THE PRESIDENT and his ministers have visited New Hampshire and found everything "beautiful,"—the weather and the people alike favorable to "reconciliation."

THE NEXT step, when the people have become reconciled one to another, will be to reconcile "man to his lot." When each man can sing of his lot, having earned it,

"I am monarch of all I survey," there will not be such a vast deal of trouble.

THE Independent insists that Mrs. Livermore is still a Baptist. The New Covenant says she is a Universalist. We are sure that both are in the wrong. Her name years ago was "dropped" from the record of Dr. Neale's church, and she has since joined no other.

THE FIRST article of a law signed by the King of Italy last June reads as follows: "Beginning with January, 1878, the office of spiritual director in lyceums, gymnasia, and technical schools is abolished." The New York Tablet calls this "the obligation of elementary instruction and the liberty of irreligion!"

THE Tablet also speaks of the Sisters of Charity expelled from Prussia who have come to America, "a country not yet affected by the ailments of age, where they can think and do as they please." Does this praise include the "liberty of irreligion"? Would it be so were the temporal power of the Pope spread over the country?

MR. BRECHER says he would not speak lightly of the necessity of prayer; but when "there are books published in our day which teach that a man can pray at a mark," he thinks it time to "see the thing explored." "If a man can pray down a mortgage which he cannot pay off; or if he can pray up a three-story brick house which he wants very much; or if he can steadily pray down his rent which it is inconvenient for him to meet; if there is in prayer a financial policy such that things like these are possible, the world ought to know it." One would think so.

THE Indo-European Correspondence quotes some of the answers to questions by candidates for Anglican Orders, who had been particularly cautioned to give their answers as "nearly as possible in the language of Holy Writ." One of these aspirants was asked to "note any special characteristics which distinguish the Gospel according to St. John from the other three Gospels." His reply was, "The Gospel according to St. John is marked by a tone of fervent piety totally wanting in the other Evangelists." It is needless to add that the young man was found totally wanting in all that should make his "calling and election sure."

THE Tablet eulogizes MacMahon. "Society was safe and the nation marching in the path of progress," when the general elections placed a radical majority in the Chamber which had "scarcely got to work before its first blow at religion was delivered at the free universities," and the "clergy were to be robbed of their stipends." MacMahon saw behind the shadow of Republic the "principles of the Commune," and he determined to "finish his task." That is, he would do all in his power to restore to France the "ailments of age," and make it a land where well-disposed, liberty-loving people cannot "think and do as they please."

FROM OUR point of view it looks very much in this way: in countries where the Catholic Church is not established or has not a controlling power, true liberty consists in letting everybody "think and do as they please." This gives the Church the chance she desires. In countries where the Church is already supreme, true liberty consists in the peaceable submission of non-Catholics to Catholic rule; all else is the "liberty of irreligion," which the Church is bound to suppress. Everywhere she fights to keep all the power she has, and gain all she can. In France she cries "Commune," which means her interests are losing ground, and she wants a pretext for a reactionary despotic movement. In America she pleads for liberty; but give her the power here she hopes one day to obtain, and "true liberty" will then consist in obedience to God as represented by the Church. If we are wrong in this, will the Tablet or the Review explain to us what the truth is?

WE HAVE no slightest doubt but that the above is a correct statement of the aims and the policy of the Catholic Church. It will use all the liberty a country offers to raise itself into power, and then it will manage liberty afterwards to suit its own ends; that is, it will suppress it. But, while this is true, it does not follow that those who are disbelieving in the pretensions of the Church should in any way compromise their own devotion to the method of liberty which the Church assails or only uses for the time being. They must fight the Church not by any resort to despotic force, for then they will stand on the same untenable ground with the Church, and lose thereby the vital power which adherence to liberty insures. American liberty demands a brave and comprehensive spirit. It is a challenge to all foes to a free competition. It is not blind to the dangers that threaten it, but it will not excitedly resort to despotic methods in defence of itself; for from that moment it would cease to be liberty; it would commit suicide. It hears one command: "Thou shalt not oppress even the would-be-oppressor; it is for thee to turn him from the error of his ways and not to forsake thine own. Be patient and fear not." To all opponents of the Catholic Church we would say: Increase the love of freedom and the practice of it, and the Church will end by being outgrown. Freedom begets knowledge, and knowledge increases the desire of the human heart for greater freedom.

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

The Paralysis of Labor.

BY GEORGE H. HOLTZMAN.

"A certain man had a goose, which laid him a golden egg every day. But, not contented with this, which rather increased than abated his avarice, he was resolved to kill the goose, and cut up her belly, that so he might come at the inexhaustible treasure which he fancied she had within her. He did so; and, to his great sorrow and disappointment, found nothing."—96th Fable of Æsop.

THE INDEX of July 12 contains a circular from Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, from which I quote as follows:—

"In this first year of our second century of national existence there are said to be three millions of unemployed persons in the United States.

"Who can tell us why or how this appalling situation arose? Who can set forth in colors sufficiently vivid the degradation and demoralization it is bringing upon the sufferers and upon our country? We are dealing with wide-spread effects; let us search into their causes. Are these the ripened fruits of our boasted civilization? Or is this crisis an ordeal through which every nation must pass? Now, if ever, is the time for our legislators, our political economists, and our social science reformers to exert themselves for the benefit of a bankrupt people."

She also appeals to thoughtful persons everywhere, urgently inviting the expression of views upon the situation and the remedy. It may be well to exercise ourselves upon the topic at this time, though it is doubtful if much can be suggested besides awaiting the course of events that are hardly susceptible of being hastened. It may at least be profitable to compare notes as to causes leading to a penalty too lasting and costly for frequent recurrence.

While there is doubtless a connection to be traced between hard times in America and that general stagnation which seems to have infected every reservoir of labor; and while some prime cause is to be sought for an almost universal inertia, yet the immediate or precipitating cause of the arrest of business in our case may be readily pointed out. It is forcibly suggested by the fable at the head of this article,—the silly transaction therein related fitly illustrating the insanity which possessed the people, especially the manufacturing class, during the closing years of the late war.

The necessary waste of war demanded increased and rapid production of nearly everything, while the corresponding consumption so completely absorbed the products of labor for a time, that all classes were fully employed, thus enabling all to share in the rather luxurious tastes of the period. As there cannot be excess of consumption—as we cannot use more than we have,—and as large consumption implies corresponding production, the waste of war or the demands of extravagance must of necessity cause prosperous times for labor so long as such a demand lasts. We can all easily recollect the flush times of the earlier part of the war. It is well known that old stocks and "dead" stocks of all sorts of merchandise were easily run off at the price of new. It was a "hot-cake" season for all hands, and everybody was happy.

It would have been prudent, at least, to have considered that so remarkable an easy-going state of affairs was not, in the natural order of things, to be permanent. Not that we were to look forward to such entire demoralization as followed, but rather that such a catastrophe might be averted. A wise foresight was imperatively demanded, and here was where we failed. Instead of preparing for peace in time of war, we acted as if civil strife was a fixed status in this country. A devouring greed seemed to seize upon every opportunity or pretext for augmenting capital. Profits realized and prospective were re-invested in increased facilities for production. Mills were enlarged and machinery added as if the whole earth were going to cut throats for the future. Erstwhile prudent men became large borrowers to erect vast appliances for continuing and even enlarging the scale upon which business was being done. The saddest reminders of this recklessness may now be seen like wrecks upon an inhospitable shore; fine estates bankrupted; splendid establishments dismantled; sound institutions crippled; human labor itself, that legitimate origin and prime element of capital, almost paralyzed,—like the great white wings of a ship becalmed, feebly flapping in a zephyr breeze after the spanking gale that filled them so grandly. The manufacturing centres furnish the most striking instances of the unwise inflation. Our observing visitors, the English commissioners, in their exhaustive report upon our Centennial exhibition, give some carefully collected statistics showing the enormous additions to our iron and steel-making machinery, furnace plants, and other facilities for rapid and increased production, and justly attribute the present depression to this unprecedented and unhealthy stimulus, altogether out of proportion to the more steadily-growing requirements of the country under a normal development. There are those, I am aware, who will dissent from this view,—those who contend that unlimited production means unlimited enhancement of wealth. It is not now the purpose to combat mere sophistry; but I will take occasion here to say, that while Mr. Carlyle's rather dogmatic assertion that there cannot be excess of production so long as the world is full of uncovered backs, may be true in a certain sense, yet the inequality of distribution which is not easily nor suddenly remedied, makes excessive local production quite practicable, and as stubborn a fact as though everybody had enough and to spare.

The national credit—happily still preserved—and individual credit, which partook of the aggregate stanchness for a time, but has now been largely impaired by abuse, sufficed to sustain the mania for sudden wealth so long as a state of war made expense a secondary consideration. But the war ceased, and the nation proceeded to count up the cost and balance its books. Retrenchment everywhere became necessary that our credit might not be overstrained; for this is the secret of credit that the debtor shall be plainly and persistently aiming towards discharging his debts. How successfully the government has managed its affairs and sustained its credit, the world-wide popularity of its securities is alone sufficient to attest. The task of individuals, however, was, unavoidably, a different and more complicated affair; but it had to be undertaken. Prudent people began to follow the example of the nation, curtailing at every possible point, and the rate of consumption gradually assumed a peace basis. But we were not prepared for even a moderate (and it was moderate at first) abatement of demand. With large stocks ahead and preparations completed for a larger business than ever before—preparations for which huge debts had been contracted,—the country could not bear any reduction of the rate of living and spending. The result was inevitable. A few years' struggling ensued, during which the now excessive production was partly absorbed by the now waning private and corporate extravagance which was an outgrowth of the free national expenditure, and then—CRASH! The only thing completely consumed was credit,—the only thing, too, of which redundancy could not be calamitous. Instead of husbanding consumption and yielding only to legitimate and steady demand, avarice had glutted the market, forced it to capitulate, and so killed the goose that laid the golden egg. It is also important to remember here, as a considerable item in the account, and showing wretched want of foresight, that no allowance was made for the million of soldiers who, when their occupation of war was over, came crowding into the ranks of general producers, where no available place was reserved for them. Their rate of consumption, too, being reduced from waste to frugality, increased the disproportion and added to the disaster.

The foregoing is but a brief outlining of a picture that any reflecting person can fill in from experience and observation. The theory being correct, all can, from their own knowledge, supply facts in detail to corroborate it; and a thoughtful exercise of this kind will not be unprofitable to many of us, who, unfortunately, have more leisure for rumination than ever before. Then, there is a course of suppuration and recovery before us, to which I will devote a few thoughts.

Time, and time proportionate to the thoroughness of the infection, is a necessary element in eradicating fever in the blood, to which our condition is analogous. Let Broadway, New York, become obstructed, and we have a good illustration of trade at the present time, while the means adopted for relief will point us towards what must be resorted to in the commercial emergency. Still, with the coolest heads at work, time, expiring time, must elapse. The matter grows worse, too, a long while before easement. Crowding behind adds compactness to the barricade, until confusion gives place to calm despair. There is but one way of it. Everybody must stop a little, and wait. Then follow the cautious preliminaries. Slowly, how slowly! the movement begins. It is like digging a man out of the sand. Gravitation precipitates fresh ruin into the excavation, until persistence and patience gain the ascendancy.

The process of recovery which we are now undergoing, involves an apparent paradox; viz., a necessary absorption of surplus without a generally diffused ability to absorb. Labor, as to a large number at least, is laid on the shelf for a while; and, without laboring, how can the man who lives by his work acquire the means to purchase and consume? What have those, whose labor is not in demand, to give in exchange for what they could advantageously use—what they need, in fact,—and what must also be got out of the way before labor can be profitably employed in producing more? This is the occasion for our wits,—a commodity upon which so many of us are now subsisting.

It is plain that distribution must be effected, and that the laborer, though but partially employed, and even though without remunerative work, must help and share more or less in the operation. So far as he can get his labor taken in exchange, it is the best trade he can make, even at greatly reduced rates. Thus wages come down and down, labor being wanted in quantity only by those who can afford to store up its product for speculation. Still, we must consume to live. When labor will not go at any price, then we must fall back upon our saved capital. One thing after another must be traded off,—things we would gladly keep but that we need something else more urgently. As these exchanges are forced, in a measure, on one side, concessions in price must be corresponding, and the speculator's opportunity is the main outlet. Those who can best afford to lay by what they do not now need constitute the relief of the clogged community. The pawnbroker even becomes a recognized public benefactor. We may anathematize his rates, but are glad to live upon his advances. There is really no help for it often but this means, and governments have come to regard the making advances upon personal pledges as a business to be fostered, the charges for which only need to be regulated a little to render the transaction a positive benefit to society. So, little by little, the comparatively superfluous things are exchanged for the essentials, the former going into hands that will not force them upon the market for a long time perhaps; and so we rub along. It is surprising how long one can subsist thus without laboring, provided there has been any previous thrift at all. There are really few in a community who have not some store laid by, the fruits of their own or another's labor, which can be made available in a pinch; for it is a pinch we are in, and must make the best of it.

The same shifting must be resorted to upon a larger scale by nearly all classes and organizations of society. In general, all individual accumulations must diminish. Houses, lands, stocks, etc., must be parted with in favor of those who can with least inconvenience hold them in permanence. The one engrossing idea is and must necessarily be the bare sustaining of existence for the time being, until the little rill towards which we are feebly contributing shall gather force enough to widen its channel. In a vital struggle sometimes Nature seems to halt while summoning strength for an appreciable effort. If the patient be only kept alive at this crisis it is all that can be looked for. We are passing through such a stage at present, and it is useless and hurtful to fret over it. We are consuming at a minimum rate it is true, but we are gaining surely if slowly, and there are no healthful measures for accelerating the process. That the former rate of lavish expenditure, inducing another era of reckless inflation of the producing capacity, will be attained within the average lifetime, I am glad to say I seriously doubt. It would not be desirable to witness a repetition of the suicidal folly. But that if we follow the dictates of prudence and are content to make haste slowly, we shall outlive the present peril and be stronger and wiser for its teachings, I am contrarily confident.

Mrs. Thompson asks the question, "Is this crisis an ordeal through which every nation must pass?" I should like to answer, No, not necessarily. It would seem that the growing intelligence of mankind ought to shield advanced nations from such calamities. But wisdom does not always keep pace with knowledge; and so long as hasty riches are coveted and striven for, so long will men blunder and the race be liable to the consequences of unseemly greed. I cannot see either that any new discovery is to abridge the usual course of recovery. The prizes so generously offered will, I fear, remain undistributed, if any efficient patent method or short cut to regain our prosperity be requisite to claim them. Legislation, alas! is powerless. Nature governs here, as in the physical and moral universe. We do not, as it is commonly expressed, break her immutable laws; but in vainly trying to resist them or pervert their action, we are remorselessly broken upon them.

There is still a deeper inquiry that presses itself upon the thinking person in other nations as well as our own, the consideration of which occasions sad and perplexing reflections. Why is it that in the whole civilized world, except perhaps in the very latest settlements, human labor is in apparent or real excess of the demand for it? Why is it that a willing offer of labor does not at all times and everywhere procure the necessary exchange required by individual consumption to render existence a blessing instead of a dreadful burden?

The field of inquiry here is extensive, and much has been written upon the subject. It cannot be treated here proportionately to its importance, but a thought or two may be ventured. Unless Malthus' doctrine—viz., that a man born into a world already occupied and overstocked with labor is a superfluity, having no right even to food—be accepted as true, we must search for the answer in some grave error committed by man himself in the arrangement of his household economy. It seems to me that our fable will still apply with some force. That any disparagement of the blessings of cheap production is by many thinkers and writers considered unsound, I am aware; but there are facts nevertheless which strongly favor the view that the introduction of labor-saving machinery has been too rapid for the general well-being of the race, and that the tendency of the excessive stimulus is to increase and perpetuate that disparity of condition which is the cause of so much unhappiness among men. Robert Owen, a true lover of his race, devoted long and earnest study to this momentous question. An extensive and prosperous cotton-spinner himself, his immense human sympathy led him to ameliorate the condition of his work-people in many ways. Investigation of the most searching kind, involving the collection of much valuable data, brought him to the conclusion that an entire reconstruction of society, by which coöperative industry should replace competitive labor, had become necessary in order that the vast labor-saving power should be brought to the aid of, instead of oppressing man. From his careful collation of statistics he established the astounding fact that the labor-saving machinery of Great Britain alone equalled, in productive action, the manual labor-power of two worlds as populous as ours. This was fifty years ago. Since then, what strides! A late number of the Iron Age says: "There are at present in France steam-engines of an aggregate horse-power of one million five hundred thousand, which is equivalent to the effective labor of thirty-one million men, or about ten times the industrial population of the country. Yet so very recently as 1852 there were only six thousand stationary steam-engines in the whole of France, and these were estimated at only forty-five thousand horse-power." A recent writer upon "The Sewing-machine and its Results," estimates that in the United States alone in 1862 there were in use two hundred and thirty thousand machines, and in 1875 the number had increased to seven hundred and fifty thousand. The saving in wages for each machine is set down at over six hundred dollars per annum, which, if not overstated, would aggregate nearly five hundred millions of dollars for the latter year!

These citations are sufficient for the present purpose, which is rather to arrest attention than to advocate strenuously any particular view. Are not the facts striking? Deducing some general aggregate from these instances, and supposing the entire, enormous, overwhelming mass in operation, what a hopeless condition seems that of the teeming, superfluous millions of mankind! The situation becomes more appalling when we reflect that a few months' turning of these competing wheels suffices for the supply of a much longer period, and that it is economical in a narrow sense to operate power in this way. Then, during the period of cessation the machines do not eat, nor do they require tending, while man, alas! must eat, or die.

What is to be done? Suppose we all stop and think. There is an awful power in quiescence.

Looking at the subject in its worst phase even, it is best to be hopeful. Labor strikes—O, worst of madness!—on the one hand, will not meet the difficulty; nor will galling insensibility and indifference discharge the weighty obligation devolving on the other. What the world needs is a more thorough humanizing, preparatory to the adjustment of so great a question. Men must learn as individuals to live and act with more regard for the general good. How long will it take to learn that lesson? Then let us reflect that it cannot be settled in a hurry. The bane of great reforms is impatience to pluck the fruit. It is wiser as well as grander, in movements affecting the welfare of the whole race, to be content to prepare the ground, to set the germ, and cultivate deep and well for the ages that will succeed; remembering that the mushroom will neither shelter us nor benefit posterity; and if we want the perennial shade of the oak, we must plant the acorn in patience, and be willing, like Nature, to wait.

THE MALTHUSIANS.

BY P. J. PROUDHON.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH BY BENJAMIN N. TOOKER.

[Le Représentant du Peuple, August 11, 1848.]

Dr. Malthus, an economist, an Englishman, once wrote the following words:—

"A man who is born into a world already occupied, his family unable to support him, and society not requiring his labor, such a man, I say, has not the least right to claim any nourishment whatever; he is really one too many on the earth. At the great banquet of Nature there is no plate laid for him. Nature commands him to take himself away, and she will not be slow to put her order into execution."

As a consequence of this great principle, Malthus recommends, with the most terrible threats, every man who has neither labor nor income upon which to live to take himself away, or at any rate to have no more children. A family—that is, love,—like bread, is forbidden such a man by Malthus.

Dr. Malthus was, while living, a minister of the Holy Gospel, a mild-mannered philanthropist, a good husband, a good father, a good citizen, believing in God as firmly as any man in France. He died (heaven grant him peace) in 1834. It may be said that he was the first, without doubt, to reduce to absurdity all political economy, and state the great revolutionary question, the question between labor and capital. With us, whose faith in Providence still lives, in spite of the century's indifference, it is proverbial—and herein consists the difference between the English and ourselves—that "everybody must live." And our people, in saying this, think themselves as truly Christian, as conservative of good morals and the family, as the late Malthus.

Now, what the people say in France, the economists deny; the lawyers and the littérateurs deny; the Church, which pretends to be Christian, and also Gallican, denies; the press denies; the large proprietors deny; the government, which endeavors to represent them, denies.

The press, the government, the Church, literature, economy, wealth,—everything in France has become English; everything is Malthusian. It is in the name of God and his holy providence, in the name of morality, in the name of the sacred interests of the family, that they maintain that there is not room in the country for all the children of the country, and that they warn our women to be less prolific. In France, in spite of the desire of the people, in spite of the national belief, eating and drinking are regarded as privileges, labor a privilege, family a privilege, country a privilege.

M. Antony Thourret said recently that property, without which there is neither country, nor family, nor labor, nor morality, would be irreproachable as soon as it should cease to be a privilege; a clear statement of the fact that, to abolish all the privileges which, so to speak, exclude a portion of the people from the law, from humanity, we must abolish, first of all, the fundamental privilege, and change the constitution of property.

M. A. Thourret, in saying that, agreed with us and with the people. The State, the press, political economy, do not view the matter in that light; they agree in the hope that property, without which, as M. Thourret says, there is no labor, no family, no Republic, may remain what it always has been,—a privilege.

All that has been done, said, and printed to-day and for the last twenty years, has been done, said, and printed in consequence of the theory of Malthus.

The theory of Malthus is the theory of political murder; of murder from motives of philanthropy and for love of God. There are too many people in the world; that is the first article of faith of all those who, at present, in the name of the people, reign and govern. It is for this reason that they use their best efforts to diminish the population. Those who best acquit themselves of this duty, who practise with piety, courage, and fraternity the maxims of Malthus, are good citizens, religious men; those who protest against such conduct are anarchists, socialists, atheists.

That the Revolution of February was the result of this protest constitutes its inexplicable crime. Consequently, it shall be taught its business, this revolution which promised that all should live. The original, indelible stain on the Republic is that the people have pronounced it anti-Malthusian. That is why the Republic is so especially obnoxious to those who were, and would become again, the toadies and accomplices of kings,—grand eaters of men, as Cato called them. They would make a monarchy of your Republic; they would devour its children.

There lies the whole secret of the sufferings, the agitations, and the contradictions of our country.

The economists are the first among us, by an inconceivable blasphemy, to establish as a providential dogma the theory of Malthus. I do not reproach them; neither do I abuse them. On this point the economists act in good faith and from the best intentions in the world. They would ask nothing better than to make the human race happy; but they cannot conceive how, without some sort of an organization of homicide, a balance between population and production can exist.

Ask the Academy of Moral Sciences. One of its most honorable members, whose name I will not call—though he is proud of his opinions, as every honest man should be,—being the prefect of I know not which department, saw fit one day, in a proclamation, to advise those within his province to have thenceforth fewer children by their wives. Great was the scandal among the priests and gossips, who looked upon this academic morality as the morality of swine! The savant of whom I speak was none the less, like all his fellows, a zealous defender of the family and of morality; but, he observed with Malthus, at the banquet of Nature, there is not room for all.

M. Thiers, also a member of the Academy of Moral Sciences, lately told the committee on finance that, if he were minister, he would confine himself to courageously and stoically passing through the crisis, devoting himself to the expenses of his budget, enforcing a respect for order, and carefully guarding against every financial innovation, every socialist idea—especially such as the right to labor,—as well as every revolutionary expedient. And the whole committee applauded him.

In giving this declaration of the celebrated historian and statesman, I have no desire to accuse his intentions. In the present state of the public mind, I should succeed only in serving the ambition of M. Thiers, if he has any left. What I wish to call attention to is that M. Thiers, in expressing himself in this wise, testified, perhaps unconsciously, to his faith in Malthus.

Mark this well, I pray you. There are two millions, four millions of men who will die of misery and hunger, if some means be not found of giving them work. This is a great misfortune, surely, and we are the first to lament it, the Malthusians tell you; but what is to be done? It is better that four millions of men should die than that privilege should be compromised; it is not the fault of capital, if labor is idle; at the banquet of credit, there is not room for all.

They are courageous, they are stoical, these statesmen of the school of Malthus, when it is a matter of sacrificing laborers by millions. Thou hast killed the poor man, said the prophet Elias to the king of Israel, and then thou hast taken away his inheritance. Occidisti et possedisti. To-day we must reverse the phrase, and say to those who possess and govern: You have the privilege of labor, the privilege of credit, the privilege of property, as Mr. Thourret says; and it is because you do not wish to be deprived of these privileges, that you shed the blood of the poor like water: Possedisti et occidisti!

And the people, under the pressure of bayonets, are being eaten slowly; they die without a sigh or a murmur; the sacrifice is effected in silence. Courage, laborers! sustain each other: Providence will finally conquer fate. Courage! the condition of your fathers, the soldiers of the republic, at the sieges of Gènes and Mayence, was even worse than yours.

M. Léon Faucher, in contending that journals should be forced to furnish securities and in favoring the maintenance of taxes on the press, reasoned also after the manner of Malthus. The serious journal, said he, the journal that deserves consideration and esteem, is that which is established on a capital of from four to five hundred thousand francs. The journalist who has only his pen is like the workman who has only his arms. If he can find no market for his services or get no credit with which to carry on his enterprise, it is a sign that public opinion is against him; he has not the least right to address the country: at the banquet of public life, there is not room for all.

Listen to Lacordaire, that light of the Church, that chosen vessel of Catholicism. He will tell you that socialism is anticatholic. And why is socialism anticatholic? Because socialism is the enemy of Malthus, whereas Catholicism, by a final transformation, has become Malthusian.

The gospel tells us, cries the priest, that there will always be poor people, Pauperes semper habebitis vobiscum; and that property, consequently, in so far as it is a privilege and makes poor people, is sacred. Poverty is necessary to the exercise of evangelical charity; at the banquet of this world here below, there cannot be room for all.

He feigns ignorance, the infidel, of the fact that poverty, in Biblical language, signified every sort of affliction and pain, not hard times and the condition of the proletaire. And how could he who went up and down Judaea crying, Woe to the rich! be understood differently? In the thought of Jesus Christ, woe to the rich meant woe to the Malthusians.

If Christ were living to-day, he would say to Lacordaire and his companions: "You are of the race of those who, in all ages, have shed the blood of the just, from Abel unto Zacharias. Your law is not my law; your God is not my God!" . . . And the Lacordaires would crucify Christ as a seditious person and an atheist.

Almost the whole of journalism is infected with the same ideas. Let Le National, for example, tell us whether it has not always believed, whether it does not still believe, that pauperism is a permanent element of civilization; that the enslavement of one portion of humanity is necessary to the glory of another; that those who maintain the contrary are dangerous dreamers who deserve to be shot; that such is the basis of the State. For, if this is not the secret thought of Le National; if Le National sincerely and resolutely desires the emancipation of laborers,—why these anathemas against, why this anger with, the genuine socialists,—those who, for ten and twenty years, have demanded this emancipation?

Further, let the Bohemians of literature, to-day the myrmidons of journalism, paid slanderers, courtiers of the privileged classes, eulogists of all the vices, parasites living upon other parasites, who prate so much of God only to dissemble their materialism, of the family only to conceal their adulteries, and whom we shall see, out of disgust for marriage, caressing monkeys, when Malthusian women fall,—let these, I say, publish their economic creed, in order that the people may know them.

Faites des filles, nous les aimons—beget girls, we love them,—sing these wretches, parodying the poet. But abstain from begetting boys; at the banquet of sensualism, there is not room for all.

The government was inspired by Malthus when, having a hundred thousand laborers at its disposal, to whom it gave gratuitous support, it refused to employ them at useful labor, and when, after the civil war, it asked that a law be passed for their transportation. With the expenses of the pretended national workshops, with the costs of war, law-suits, imprisonment, and transportation, it might have given the insurgents six months' labor, and thus changed our whole economic system. But labor is a monopoly; the government does not wish revolutionary industry to compete with privileged industry; at the work-bench of the nation, there is not room for all.

Large industrial establishments ruin small ones; that is the law of capital, that is Malthus.

Wholesale trade gradually swallows the retail; again Malthus.

Large estates encroach upon and consolidate the smallest possessions; still Malthus.

Soon one-half of the people will say to the other:—

The earth and its products are my property;
Industry and its products are my property;
Commerce and transportation are my property;
The State is my property.

You who possess neither reserve nor property, who hold no public offices and whose labor is useless to us, TAKE YOURSELVES AWAY! You have really no business on the earth; beneath the sunshine of the Republic, there is not room for all.

Who will tell me that the right to labor and to live is not the whole of the Revolution?

Who will tell me that the principle of Malthus is not the whole of the counter-Revolution?

And it is for having published such things as these—for having exposed the evil boldly, and sought the remedy in good faith,—that speech has been forbidden me by the government, the government that represents the Revolution!

That is why I have been deluged with the slanders, treacheries, cowardice, hypocrisy, outrages, desertions, and fallings of all those who hate or love the people! That is why I have been given over, for a whole month, to the mercy of the jackals of the press and the screech-owls of the platform! Never was a man, either in the past or in the present, the object of so much execration as I have become, for the simple reason that I wage war upon cannibals.

To slander one who could not reply was to shoot a prisoner. Malthusian carnivora, I discover you there! Go on, then; we have more than one account to settle yet. And, if calumny is not sufficient for you, use iron and lead. You may kill me; no one can avoid his fate, and I am at your discretion. But you shall not conquer me; you shall never persuade the people, while I live and hold a pen, that, with the exception of yourselves, there is one too many on the earth. I swear it before the people and in the name of the Republic!

ON THE PROBABLE FUTURITY (OF) THE LABORING CLASSES.

1. The observations in the preceding chapter had for their principal object to deprecate a false ideal of human society. Their applicability to the practical purposes of present times consists in moderating the inordinate importance attached to the mere increase of production, and fixing attention upon improved distribution, and a large remuneration of labor, as the two desiderata. Whether the aggregate produce increases absolutely or not, is a thing in which, after a certain amount has been obtained, neither the legislator nor the philanthropist need feel any strong interest; but, that it should increase relatively to the number of those who share in it, is of the utmost possible importance; and this (whether the wealth of mankind be stationary, or increasing at the most rapid rate ever known in an old country) must depend on the opinions and habits of the most numerous class, the class of manual laborers.

When I speak, either in this place or elsewhere, of "the laboring classes," or of laborers as a "class," I use those phrases in compliance with custom, and as descriptive of an existing, but by no means a necessary or permanent state of social relations. I do not recognize as either just or salutary, a state of society in which there is any "class" which is not laboring; any human beings, exempt from bearing their share of the necessary labors of human life, except those unable to labor, or who have fairly earned rest by previous toil. So long, however, as the great social evil exists of a non-laboring class, laborers also constitute a class, and may be spoken of, though only provisionally, in that character.

Considered in its moral and social aspect, the state of the laboring people has latterly been a subject of much more speculation and discussion than formerly; and the opinion, that it is not now what it ought to be, has become very general. The suggestions which have been promulgated, and the controversies which have been excited, on detached points rather than on the foundations of the subject, have put in evidence the existence of two conflicting theories respecting the social position desirable for manual laborers. This one may be called the theory of dependence and protection; the other that of self-dependence.

According to the former theory, the lot of the poor, in all things which affect them collectively, should be regulated for them, not by them. They should not be required or encouraged to think for themselves, or give to their own reflection or forecast an influential voice in the determination of their destiny. It is supposed to be the duty of the higher classes to think for them, and to take the responsibility of their lots as the commander and officers of an army take that of the soldiers composing it. This function, it is contended, the higher classes should prepare themselves to perform conscientiously, and their whole demeanor should impress the poor with a reliance on it, in order that, while yielding passive and active obedience to the rules prescribed for them, they may resign themselves in all other respects to a trustful insouciance, and repose under the shadow of their protectors. The relation between rich and poor, according to this theory (a theory also applied to the relation between men and women), should be only partly authoritative; it should be amiable, moral, and sentimental; affectionate tutelage on the one side, respectful and grateful deference on the other. The rich should be in loco parentis to the poor, guiding and restraining them like children. Of spontaneous action on their part there should be no need. They should be called on for nothing but to do their day's work, and to be moral and religious. Their morality and religion should be provided for them by their superiors, who should see them properly taught it, and should do all that is necessary to insure their being, in return for labor and attachment, properly fed, clothed, housed, spiritually edified, and innocently amused.

This is the ideal of the future in the minds of those whose dissatisfaction with the present assumes the form of affection and regret towards the past. Like other ideals, it exercises an unconscious influence on the opinions and sentiments of numbers who never consciously guide themselves by any ideal. It has also this in common with other ideals, that it has never been historically realized. It makes its appeal to our imaginative sympathies in the character of a restoration of the good times of our forefathers. But no times can be pointed out in which the higher classes of this or any other country performed a part even distantly resembling the one assigned to them in this theory. It is an idealization, grounded on the conduct and character of here and there an individual. All privileged and powerful classes, as such, have used their power in the interest of their own selfishness, and have indulged their self-importance in despising, and not in lovingly caring for, those who were, in their estimation, degraded, by being under the necessity of working for their benefit. I do not affirm that what has always been must always be, or that human improvement has no tendency to correct the intensely selfish feelings engendered by power; but though the evil may be lessened, it cannot be eradicated, until the power itself is withdrawn. This, at least, seems to me undeniable, that long before the superior classes could be sufficiently improved to govern in the tutelary manner supposed, the inferior classes would be too much improved to be so governed.

I am quite sensible of all that is seductive in the picture of society which this theory presents. Though the facts of it have no prototype in the past, the feelings have. In them lies all that there is of reality in the conception. As the idea is essentially repulsive of a society only held together by the relations and feelings arising out of pecuniary interests, so there is something naturally attractive in a form of society abounding in strong personal attachments and disinterested self-devotion. Of such feelings it must be admitted that the relation of protector and protected has hitherto been the richest source. The strongest attachments of human beings in general are towards the things or the persons that stand between them and some dreaded evil. Hence, in an age of lawless violence and insecurity, and general hardness and roughness of manners, in which life is beset with dangers and sufferings at every step, to those who have neither a commanding position of their own nor a claim on the protection of some one who has, a generous giving of protection and a grateful receiving of it are the strongest ties which connect human beings; the feelings arising from that relation are their warmest feelings; all the enthusiasm and tenderness of the most sensitive natures gather round it; loyalty on the one part and chivalry on the other are principles exalted into passions. I do not desire to deprecate these qualities. The error lies in not perceiving that these virtues and sentiments, like the clanship and the hospitality of the wandering Arab, belong emphatically to a rude and imperfect state of the social union, and that the feelings between protector and protected, whether between kings and subjects, rich and poor, or men and women, can no longer have this beautiful and endearing character, where there are no longer any serious dangers from which to protect. What is there in the present state of society to make it natural that human beings, of ordinary strength and courage, should glow with the warmest gratitude and devotion in return for protection? The laws protect them, wherever the laws do not criminally fail in their duty. To be under the power of some one, instead of being, as formerly, the sole condition of safety, is now, speaking generally, the only situation which exposes to grievous wrong. The so-called protectors are now the only persons against whom, in any ordinary circumstances, protection is needed. The brutality and tyranny with which every police report is filled, are those of husbands to wives, of parents to children. That the law does not prevent these atrocities, that it is only now making a first timid attempt to repress and punish them, is no matter of necessity, but the deep disgrace of those by whom the laws are made and administered. No man or woman who either possesses or is able to earn an independent livelihood, requires any other protection than that which the law could and ought to give. This being the case, it argues great ignorance of human nature to continue taking for granted that relations founded on protection must always subsist, and not to see that the assumption of the part of protector, and of the power which belongs to it, without any of the necessities which justify it, must engender feelings opposite to loyalty.

Of the workmen, at least in the more advanced countries of Europe, it may be pronounced certain, that the patriarchal or paternal system of government is one to which they will not again be subject. That question was decided when they were taught to read and allowed access to newspapers and political tracts; when dissenting preachers were suffered to go among them and appeal to their faculties and feelings in opposition to the creeds professed and countenanced by their superiors; when they were brought together in numbers to work socially under the same roof; when railways enabled them to shift from place to place and change their patrons and employers as easily as their coats; when they were encouraged to seek a share in the government by means of the electoral franchise. The working-classes have taken their interests into their own hands, and are perpetually showing that they think the interests of their employers not identical with their own, but opposite to them. Some among the higher classes flatter themselves that these tendencies may be counteracted by moral and religious education; but they have let the time go by for giving an education which can serve their purpose. The principles of the Reformation have reached as low down in society as reading and writing, and the poor will not much longer accept morals and religion of other people's prescribing. I speak more particularly of this country, especially the town population, and the districts of the most scientific agriculture or the highest wages, Scotland and the north of England. Among the more inert and less modernized agricultural population of the southern counties, it might be possible for the gentry to retain, for some time longer, something of the ancient deference and submission of the poor, by bribing them with high wages and constant employment; by insuring them support, and never requiring them to do anything which they do not like. But these are two conditions which never have been combined, and never can be, for long together. A guarantee of subsistence can only be practically kept up, when work is enforced, and superfluous multiplication restrained, by at least a moral compulsion. It is then that the would-be revivers of old times, which they do not understand, would feel practically in how hopeless a task they were engaged. The whole fabric of patriarchal or seigniorial influence, attempted to be raised on the foundation of caressing the poor, would be shattered against the necessity of enforcing a stringent poor-law.

2. It is on a far other basis that the well-being and well-doing of the laboring people must henceforth rest. The poor have come out of leading-strings, and cannot any longer be governed or treated like children. To their own qualities must now be commended the care of their destiny. Modern nations will have to learn the lesson, that the well-being of a people must exist by means of the justice and self-government, the δικαιοσύνη and αυτοκρατία, of the individual citizens. The theory of dependence attempts to dispense with the necessity of these qualities in the dependent classes. But now, when even in position they are becoming less and less dependent, and their minds less and less acquiescent in the degree of dependence which remains, the virtues of independence are those which they stand in need of. Whatever advice, exhortation, or guidance is held out to the laboring classes, must henceforth be tendered to them as equals, and accepted by them with their eyes open. The prospect of the future depends on the degree in which they can be made rational beings.

There is no reason to believe that prospect other than hopeful. The progress indeed has hitherto been, and still is, slow. But there is a spontaneous education going on in the minds of the multitude, which may be greatly accelerated and improved by artificial aids. The instruction obtained from newspapers and political tracts may not be the most solid kind of instruction, but it is an immense improvement upon none at all. What it does for a people, has been admirably exemplified during the cotton crisis, in the case of the Lancashire spinners and weavers, who have acted with the consistent good sense and forbearance so justly applauded, simply because, being readers of newspapers, they understood the causes of the calamity which had befallen them, and knew that it was in no way imputable either to their employers or to the government. It is not certain that their conduct would have been as rational and exemplary, if the distress had preceded the salutary measure of fiscal emancipation which gave existence to the penny press. The institutions for lectures and discussion, the collective deliberations on questions of common interest, the trade-unions, the political agitation, all serve to awaken public spirit, to diffuse variety of ideas among the mass, and to excite thought and reflection in the more intelligent. Although the too early attainment of political franchises by the least educated class might retard, instead of promoting, their improvement, there can be little doubt that it has been greatly stimulated by the attempt to acquire them. In the meantime, the working classes are now part of the public; in all discussions on matters of general interest they, or a portion of them, are now partakers; all who use the press as an instrument may, if it so happens, have them for an audience; the avenues of instruction through which the middle classes acquire such ideas as they have, are accessible to, at least, the operatives in the towns. With these resources, it cannot be doubted that they will increase in intelligence, even by their own unaided efforts; while there is reason to hope that great improvements both in the quality and quantity of school education will be effected by the exertions either of government or of individuals, and that the progress of the mass of the people in mental cultivation, and in the virtues which are dependent on it, will take place more rapidly, and with fewer intermissions and aberrations, than if left to itself.

From this increase of intelligence, several effects may be confidently anticipated. First: that they will become even less willing than at present to be led and governed, and directed into the way they should go, by the mere authority and prestige of superiors. If they have not now, still less will they have hereafter, any deferential awe, or religious principle of obedience, holding them in mental subjection to a class above them. The theory of dependence and protection will be more and more intolerable to them, and they will require that their conduct and condition shall be essentially self-governed. It is, at the same time, quite possible that they may demand, in many cases, the intervention of the legislature in their affairs, and the regulation by law of various things which concern them, often under very mistaken ideas of their interest. Still, it is their own will, their own ideas and suggestions, to which they will demand that effect should be given, and not rules laid down for them by other people. It is quite consistent with this, that they should feel respect for superiority of intellect and knowledge, and defer much to the opinions, on any subject, of those whom they think well acquainted with it. Such deference is deeply grounded in human nature; but they will judge for themselves of the persons who are and are not entitled to it.—John Stuart Mill.

OPINIONS OF A HORSE-CAR CONDUCTOR.

This evening I talked with the conductor of a horse-car on my way in from —. He was intelligent, educated, and seemed to appreciate the situation. He averaged twelve hours a day, for which day's work he received one dollar and seventy-five cents. He had seen the time when he would have "turned up his nose" at such pay; but now he couldn't help himself; he was glad to get anything to do, and most any kind of wages; he had friends enough who couldn't tell where their next meal was coming from; they belonged to the "tramp brigade," much against their will; they were "drafted, and couldn't get off, even on a furlough." I inquired after a conductor I used to know, whom of late I had missed. He had been discharged, not for anything he did, but for something he omitted to do. The "spotters" didn't hear the sound of the "punch" as often as they thought they were privileged to. When he was paid off, he informed the company that he had not worked for nothing. They judged he had not, as he soon went into a profitable business for himself. I said that I had read in some respectable daily journal that "the honest conductor regarded the punch as a badge of honor, the company thereby assuring the public that here was a man who could be trusted to record the number of his freight." He smiled, and said if they were obliged to wear a ball and chain, he supposed it would still be regarded as an honorable appendage by the enlightened press, which was always ready and eager to defend the upper dog. "Not so bad as that," I interposed. "They always take the side of the capitalist as against the laborer,—all the respectable journals do," he responded vigorously. I made some inquiries as to the management of the road in respect to the salaries of the different officers. "The president of the road is paid ten thousand dollars," he went on to say; "the chief conductor twenty-five hundred dollars,—or two thousand dollars by the railroad company and five hundred dollars by the punch company. He was influential in getting the punches introduced, and they have some sort of an arrangement. The punches are rented at twenty cents a day; each conductor has two. The punch company is making a big thing out of it; they wouldn't sell a punch for love or money. That makes forty cents a day for each conductor. If they would add that forty cents to the conductor's wages, and whatever else they pay for spies, in my opinion it would be a better investment. There would be a few who would steal all they got, any way; but most of them, when they knew the square thing had been done by them, would reciprocate. As it is now, the company says to every man, 'We've done our d—dest to fix you so you can't steal,' and that makes a thief even of an honest man. If he's got to wear the name, he may as well have the game. The fact is, no conductor has any sympathy with the company. If he does well, it's to keep his place. The thing ain't run right anyhow. If it's for the public, why don't the public manage it? Why does the city let a private corporation have such roads all in their hands? If the people had good sense, they would take all such things under their own protection. Fares on the roads could be reduced half, and gas could be furnished two-thirds less. All these corporations are just plundering the people, and there's no use in it." I must not omit to report one other remark, which will further serve to show that a conductor on a horse-car may not be without a commendable public spirit. "I have as much pride in Boston as any man dare have; but I would like to see Boston welfare include all classes of people. Boston, of all cities, ought not to measure her prosperity by a few rich people. What kind of success is it, when only a few succeed and the rest fail,—and fail, not because they don't deserve success, but because, as things are arranged, success for them is impossible? There ought to be one city in the world, just for the novelty of the thing, if for no better reason, which would secure a chance of prosperity to all. They may talk as much as they please, it isn't done; and those that have the upper hand don't want it done. I know, for I have been there, and have seen how things work. Don't you suppose I would like to do something besides just earn a living for myself? I would like to be able to contribute to the general good and pleasure by improving and beautifying the city. But I can't, and there are thousands like me. We can't on twelve dollars a week. But the President of the road, with his ten thousand, can. Now the question is, Are his two or four hours worth so much more than our ten or twelve?"

Of course I give this conversation from memory, but have made my report as faithful as possible. I have deemed its significance to lie in the expression of opinions indicating a new social science, which are by no means, as I have some opportunities for knowing, rare among this class of working people.—Chips from my Studio, Radical Review.

THE LADY SOCIALISTS OF RUSSIA.

The Russian socialists in London have published the photographic likenesses of the ladies who have been recently condemned to long years of hard labor or distant exile. Their faces are all those of women thoroughly in earnest, and some of them are very fair to see. For among the condemned are several ladies of position, young and handsome and cultured, against whom no charge was made of anything but such a protest against existing institutions as a strong government might well ignore, or, at most, lightly punish. One of them, the fairest of their number, is now fast fading away, her health having been altogether broken by the severity of the solitary imprisonment for nearly two years which preceded her trial. A poem written by her in prison, and now circulating widely but secretly in Russia, serves to some extent to show what are the feelings which mainly actuate such enthusiasts as M. Tourguéneff has described. The following lines contain a literal prose translation of its verse:—

"My deadly sin, my criminal design, punish, O Judge! but simply, rapidly; without pretence, without pharisaical mask, without speeches for the defence."

"Having donned peasant bonds instead of robes, and having 'criminally' doffed shoes, I thither went where groan our brethren, where the poor are and eternal toil."

"Surprised 'in the act,' on the scene of crime have I been brought up for a judgment. To what purpose are these witnesses and depositions? All things bear witness against me!"

"Ask not, O Judge! useless questions. Look at me! I am all proofs. On my shoulders the dress of the people, my feet bare, my hands callous with toil."

"All broken am I by hard labor. But know that in my heart of hearts, deeper than all others, is one proof buried: love to my native land."

"Know this, too, that however criminal I may be, thou, O my Judge, art powerless over me. No! I am inaccessible to harsh treatment, and not thou wilt conquer, but I."

"During my lifetime thou mayest punish me. But my malady has already entered a protest. And over me impends, as thou seest and knowest, only a brief arrest."

"Always holding that same love shall I die. And, dropping the prison keys, above my pillow will bend my punishers with a tear and a prayer."—London Spectator.

MR. FREDERICK LEIGHTON, the distinguished English artist, is a man of charming manner. In conversation he is always interesting, often brilliant; the most delightful of companions, the most genial of hosts, and the firmest of friends. For a brother artist Frederick Leighton has never an unkind word, and for his art nothing but single-hearted and unselfish devotion. As he comes forward to greet you on the threshold of his studio, you notice that silver threads are beginning to show among the soft brown that fringes his lips and curls crisply about his temples. But the old light flashes from his deep-gray eyes; the broad white forehead is unwrinkled; the chiselling of the face firm and unaltered; about the mouth a smile flickers, in which is a strange mingling of girl-like sweetness and manly power; the stalwart shoulders are turgent, and the activity of youth is in every supple movement of the well-formed limbs. On all subjects he talks with delightful animation; and his extensive reading and refined culture are a signal refutation of the charge which is sometimes made upon the literary acquirements and intellectual tastes of artists. One cannot, it is true, have imbibed classics in Frankfurt, studied art at the Royal Academy of Berlin and in Rome, have been the constant companion of such men as Ary Scheffer and Robert Henry in Paris, exchanged thoughts with the greatest artists and literary men of Brussels and London, and lived in the best circles everywhere, without acquiring a vast amount of knowledge; but more than this, Mr. Leighton is an accomplished linguist, and familiar with the finest works of German, French, and Italian authors, the beauties of which have not been diluted by translation. He is a musician, too.

TRANSITION.

The time of change has come,
And timid souls sit dumb
To see th' advancing strides
Of Freedom's rising tides.

Dead dogmas are decaying;
Half weeping and half praying,
The Church counts o'er its beads
And tightly grasps its creeds.

"We need no reformation;
We wish no alteration;
Our creed from Heaven descends;
Here mental progress ends!

"To onward-marching Science
We offer our defiance!
The Bible is our guide;
We trust in naught beside."

Thus walls the Church's chorus,
While steadily before us
Roll in the waves of light,
Resistless in their might!

Wall on, ye firm believers!
Denounce us as deceivers!
We calmly trust to Time
To prove our cause sublime.

No more may minds be fettered;
To e'en the most unlettered
Must truths be soon revealed,
In vain kept long concealed.

"We need no reformation?"
A foolish declaration!
Already in your fold
Have forms of faith grown old.

From Bruno's cruel burning
And Galileo's spurning,
To this your futile rage
At Tyndall and his age,

Your priests have been defeated
In conflicts oft repeated;
Compelled by facts to yield,
At length you quit the field.

The truths by Parker stated,
Though vilified and hated,
Are veritably tame
To those we now proclaim!

The sect which then expelled him,
The pulpits which repelled him,
Now gladly hear far more Than they refused before.

Thus Freedom's cause is gaining,
While Error's force is waning;
Beside fair Arno's wave
He conquers in his grave!

Not his to see the morn;
He only felt your scorn;
Alone through storm and night
He toiled to bring us light.

And now that light is breaking!
The world to Truth is waking!
Old dogmas disappear
And Reason's reign draws near!

Still, not for us to see
The age that is to be;
We hail the day of Truth,
But perish in its youth.

Yet oft our spirits range
Beyond this scene of change,
And on hope's pinions trace
The future of our race.

We catch by inspiration
Its coming exultation!
We hear its thrilling strains!
We mark its wondrous gains!

E'en now through Faith's clear vision
We view those fields elysian;
Inhale their peaceful air,
And all their freedom share!

F. R. A. ANNUAL REPORT.

The report of the recent annual meeting of the Free Religious Association has been published in the usual pamphlet form, and can be obtained at the office 231 Washington Street, or at A. Williams & Co.'s, corner of Washington and School Streets, Boston. It contains the Essay by Rev. W. R. Alger on "Steps Towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and the Essay by Mr. C. D. B. Mills, on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; also Addresses by Messrs O. B. Frothingham, William Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson,—with tenth annual reports of the executive committee, treasurer, etc. Price, single copy, forty cents; four, or more, twenty-five cents each.

Persons sending for it by mail will address, "Free Religious Association," 231 Washington Street, Boston, Mass. W. J. POTTER, Secretary.

WARREN's photograph of Emerson is excellent.

WE HOPE THE INDEX will receive a report from the Walcott Grove meeting. Judging from what was promised and from items in the daily press, we anticipate an account full of interest.

THE TWO POEMS we have had the pleasure to publish from the pen of Mr. J. L. Stoddard have been most acceptable contributions. The one of two weeks ago gave our readers great pleasure, and we are sure they will find the one this week equally to their liking.

THE PREDOMINANCE of the labor-question in our columns this week is owing to no premeditated effort on our part to press that one subject on the attention of readers, but is due rather to the complicity of the times which has for the time being turned the thoughts of nearly all our contributors into this one channel.

J. VILA BLAKE has gone to Quincy, Ill., to preach for a free church in that city. He takes with him the warmest regard and best wishes of very many Eastern friends. Mr. Blake is a young man of rare abilities and ripest culture. He will be able to well serve the people who have been so wise and so fortunate as to persuade him to make his home in their midst.

INSTEAD of dying out, the Indians are increasing. There are twenty-five thousand more in the country now than when the first white settlements were made. If, as they are swept Westward (by General Howard), for the next fifty years, they go on abounding in the same ratio, there will be then some five hundred thousand tasting the salt waters of the Pacific. A goodly number to smoke the pipe of a prolonged Peace and make a last "treaty" with the great Father!

THE Christian Union has made a discovery which promises much good. In its "Sunday-school" columns it has "Thoughts for the Class," which, if heeded, will grow a new style of Christian "apologists," as the reader will perceive:—

"Infidelity is not modern. The pantheism which makes all God, and the materialism which denies any God, and the philosophy which regards him, as at best, only the unknown and unknowable, are all borrowed from ancient times. Observe how Paul treats this scepticism:—

"He treats it cautiously. He uses no vituperation. So Christ reserved his denunciations for Pharisaism; that is, hypocrisy within the Church. He never uttered a philippic against Sadduceism, the infidelity of Palestine in the first century."

"Poor wretch of a Bismarck!" exclaims the Catholic Review. It seems that the Prince has been "sneering at the alleged miracle at Marpingen," and "laughing at the Papacy for having declared the Lourdes apparition a miracle notwithstanding the facts of the case had been officially ascertained." He has also spoken "with great kindness of those of the Evangelical pastors who are avowed infidels,—but he cautioned them not to go too fast." He further says that though they must not "allow Christ to be disowned, yet dogma requires to be developed; various beliefs have always existed, and no one has the right to appropriate to himself the exclusive privilege of being in the right." Poor wretch? Oh, no.

THE following note has a general interest which will be served by its republication in these columns:—

NEW BEDFORD, Mass., Aug. 10, 1877.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER:—

In your issue of August 11, Mr. James T. Bixby makes the assertion that "the maxim of Proudhon was that 'property is robbery,' and that the State ought to confiscate all estates and goods, and out of the general income provide an equal support for each." As a student of Proudhon, and in many things his disciple, I call upon Mr. Bixby to give chapter and verse from Proudhon's writings for so much of the above statement as relates to the duties of government. I not only deny that Proudhon ever advocated the doctrine attributed to him, but affirm that he improved every opportunity of refuting it. If Mr. Bixby is the candid man I take him to be, he will either comply with the above request, or plead guilty to my charge of reckless misstatement with respect to the ablest—I might almost say the bitterest—opponent of communism that the world has yet known.

Respectfully yours,

BENJ. R. TUCKER.

WITH THE thoughtful essay by Mr. Holtzman, which is respectfully commended to the attention of the committee to be appointed, at Mrs. Thompson's suggestion, by the Social Science Association; Mr. Tucker's timely translation of Proudhon's annihilation of the "Malthusians"; the extract from Stuart Mill on the "Futurity of the Laboring Class"; the editorial communication by "E. W.," which if it does not in all respects challenge assent, challenges attention, and leaves no doubt of the writer's profound and humane interest in the great question it treats; and Bishop Ferret's comments on the "Teachings of the Strikes,"—we are disposed to think that this number of THE INDEX may be regarded by those specially interested in labor reform as a good document for distribution. A copy will be sent gratuitously to any new address furnished by regular subscribers to the extent a small extra issue will permit. Names first received, first served.

THE NEW ENGLAND LABOR LEAGUE will hold a special Convention at 176 Tremont Street, Sunday and Monday, September 16 and 17, day and evening. This League has been holding meetings for a number of years, calling public attention to the question now uppermost throughout the land. Its voice is practically the expression of the opinions of Mr. E. H. Heywood, he presenting at each Convention the series of resolutions which, as they get reported or printed in the daily papers, give the tone to the proceedings reaching the public ear. It is to be observed, however, that very erroneous opinions of what Mr. Heywood teaches get in circulation. This is partly, as we think, his own fault; but largely comes from a disposition on the part of the public generally to caricature or place whatever new idea affecting established interests when it first makes its appearance in the worst possible light. It has been so from the beginning of the world, and perhaps it is no great misfortune. Ideas may have to get toughened to stand this world's racket, as well as men. The truth is, Mr. Heywood's labor doctrines are, when fairly analyzed, more in harmony with what people generally concede than those presented by any of the other, we may say, rival schools, that usually convene in this city. He is not an advocate of trades-unions, but defends the liberty of every one to make his own bargains; he does not advocate the eight-hour scheme, nor legislative interference of any kind. Even his opposition to interest, rents, dividends, etc., when fully set forth, amounts only to what he regards as a means of determining what are the demands of equity in these transactions. It is a peculiarity of Mr. Heywood's movement that the working-people themselves are not more captivated by it than the capitalists. His doctrines cut them off equally with all others from speculative increase, and so blight in their first estimation all the hopes they also are cherishing of one day getting abundance of riches. They are also not pleased to think that he will not invoke the strong arm of the law in their defence.

THE LIBERAL OUTLOOK.

We speak of that liberal sentiment which is spreading over the world inclining all people to listen more patiently one to another, of the tendencies to accept with more and more alacrity the appeal to right reason and fact as evolved by peaceful intellectual encounter. The spirit of dogma with the intelligent growth of mankind is dying out. The world's face is turning away from it. Our poet this week sings:—

"The world to Truth is waking!
 Old dogmas disappear
 And Reason's reign draws near."

We are leaving behind so many things our fathers held to be sacred, and which we inheriting have cherished, many feel as though they had been bereft, and wonder at times, like the doubting Israelites, if they have not been led out into a wilderness to perish. Instances are frequent where they return to the shelter of old institutions; and the prophecy is risked that a grand reaction is setting in: the prodigal age is about returning to the old homestead where authority and superstition are still venerated. Those, however, who have observed more closely the march of ideas have no such misgivings. They know that the march of events must be in the direction of ideas and not away from them. The Christian world is undergoing a transformation. In the thought of both clergy and laity Christianity is being made over. The old creeds may hold their outward forms; but could the believers of a past age listen to the interpretations of the "believers" in this present age, it is more than probable they would never suspect their old faith was so much as being talked of, much less defended. This transforming of Christianity is the beginning and the progress toward its complete abandonment as a system of religion. Men do not make over an old garment forever. The time comes when the new cloth, as Jesus understood, gets too vigorous by far for the old, and a new garment throughout is secured. That it will be so with Christianity we doubt not. The time will come when there shall be neither Jew nor Gentile, Christian or infidel; but an inclusive religion which shall deem it the highest reverence for each soul to be obedient unto its own heavenly vision.

"Still, not for us to see
 The age that is to be;
 We hail the day of Truth,
 But perish in its youth.

"Yet oft our spirits range
 Beyond this scene of change,
 And on hope's pinions trace
 The future of our race.

"We catch by inspiration
 Its coming exultation!
 We hear its thrilling strains!
 We mark its wondrous gains!

"E'en now through Faith's clear vision
 We view those fields elysian;
 Inhale their peaceful air,

CO-OPERATIVE REFORMS.

One reform treads upon another. The world cannot get on piece-meal. It must sweep the circle and include all that goes to make up human felicity. Professor Fisher, in his "Notes" to Seeborn's Protestant Revolution, shows how intimately the religious reformation was connected with other various and complex elements. "Events like the growth of monarchy, the spread of commerce, the new birth of art, the revival of learning, were essential features in that form of society which gradually arose and followed upon the Middle Ages." The religious movement may be central, but it is dependent on all else that affects the life and growth of nations. To quote Professor Fisher farther: "As regards the mediæval period, secular history and ecclesiastical history are inseparable. Neither can be studied apart from the other. If a division is more possible as relates to the modern era, still, even here, one class of phenomena are so closely associated with another, that ecclesiastical history cannot be understood apart from secular, nor can secular history be adequately studied apart from ecclesiastical. The life of nations, as of men, is one." When the historian comes to record the progress of the religious emancipation so perceptibly advancing in our age, he will find that it went hand in hand with other and apparently dissimilar interests.

The peculiarity of the Reformation as it extends to our time is, that it consciously includes all classes of people; includes them not as simply changing their form of allegiance from one potentate to another, but as people to be freed from all enforced outward authority. It is a gospel of self-dependence to be preached to every creature. Seebohm, contrasting old and modern civilization, speaks of the latter as "aiming at making all classes of the people, town and country, rich and poor, alike citizens for whose common weal the nation is to be governed, and who ultimately shall govern themselves. In this aim of modern civilization to secure the common weal of the people lies its power and strength."

This aim is nowhere more quickly recognized and approved than in America. Whatever it be that seems desirable, it is desirable not for a part, but for all. If it be a liberal religion, or rational living, the message is unto all human kind. Whatever hinders its progress becomes of concern. The doom of poverty resting on the mass of people, consigning them to ignorance, making them easy prey to superstitions and priestcraft, becomes a matter to take special notice of. All that tends to unfold the manhood and womanhood latent in all men and women tends to emancipate them religiously. The prominence the question of reformation in regard to labor has lately assumed, gives most encouraging assurance that a new element is to come in to aid the progress of free and rational religion. The new gospel is not to be "preached to the poor." It says, "You have had the poor with you always until now: henceforth, pure and undefiled religion is to banish poverty for all men and women of industry." In saying this, it deals the heaviest possible blow at the tyranny of churches and creeds. 'Tis a common cause: a rational religion, and the equitable reward of labor.

CAPITAL AND LABOR.

My friend, the responsible editor pro tem., says, "Well, let the old goose die. The people want a new one,"—apropos of my remark that what the working-people want is "not so much an increase of wages as a better custody for their possible savings." I have never denied the deficiency of wages. I only assert that it is not proved that an increase of wages would remedy the trouble; while it is quite possible that it might lead to worse, if the increase were such as to make capital unproductive.

That the employers of labor, capitalists who have got possession of other people's capital, do drive unreasonably hard bargains with the laborer nobody can deny. The question of all questions is, how to stop it. Yet, notwithstanding all the statistics that prove the evil, one may say with emphasis, and may cite every level-headed American, from Ben Franklin down to Peter Cooper to back him, that there is not on American soil an able-bodied and sound-minded man who loves work for its own sake—and if he does not, his life is not worth living—who cannot, in spite of all such capitalists, earn his living, feed a small and industrious family, and save a little something besides. What honest capitalists of large capital ought to do, and will do if they have much wit, is to see that the little savings of such a man may become available to him as capital. The crime of the capitalists, or rather the gamblers who manage capital, is not that they use their own capital for their own emolument, but that they have absorbed the savings of the poor for their own emolument.

Rivers of ink are shed just now on the labor question, but very little of it in stating and illustrating the following quite pregnant propositions:—

1. Capital is nothing but property, and belongs to its owners.
2. Capital is property because, almost without exception, it is created by labor, and it belongs to the laborer who created it till he has sold it.
3. Society consists of individuals. Society can own nothing, except by virtue of individual ownership, whether the individual shares are divided or undivided.
4. To say that the use of capital should be granted gratuitously to the laborer who does not own it or any share in it, is to say that he shall be partially supported as a pauper. It is a wanton and gratuitous attack on his manhood. It is also the destruction of his right of property as well as of every other man's.
5. Proprietorship is as much an inherent quality of human nature as attraction is of a magnet. So, as a general fact, is the love of labor for its own sake; but to this there are important exceptions. If property were not the certain reward of labor, famines would probably be more frequent and destructive.
6. Proudhon might just as well talk about water running down hill without gravity, as civilization existing after capital has ceased to be property. Such a thing is possible only in a purely imaginary world full of angels, and without lazy people, thieves, or Jay Goulds. Of course Proudhon is quite right in saying that after capital is made everybody's and nobody's, government will not be needed; there will be nothing for it to do and nothing to make it of. All that sort of philanthropy is nothing but surrendering to thieves, swindlers, and lazy people, and letting them eat us up.

What the real laboring man wants is what every honest man, rich or poor, wants: better protection against the great, big, glossy moths and parasites of society who grow enormously rich, not by the profits of capital but by the profits of lying. What they absorb is not the worst of their mischief. They set the fashion of cheating, and thus ruin thousands who try to follow them and fail.

The laboring men of this country are not to be confounded with the "workingmen's unions," "brotherhoods," or "strikes." They stand mostly on the broad ground of American citizenship, individualism, every man entirely his own man. The unfortunates who merge their manhood in classes and cliques, thus far but a small portion of our laboring population, do not seem to understand that when a crowd has fallen into the water, the poorest swimmer in it has a better chance to escape drowning, by his individual effort, than if all should join hands and cling together. The destitution of money, that is, of meat and bread, in the families chiefly of laborers imported by our miserable system of tariff taxation, a system which really taxes the meat and bread out of the mouths of those very laborers, by taxing the clothing which they must put on their backs, is surely deplorable enough. But their destitution of wit in striking just at this time, if, at all, is far more deplorable. If they could have had the benefit of wise counsel, instead of losing the miserable pittance they had in an ineffectual attempt to get a little more, they would have waited for the inevitable struggle of the mass of the people against the vampires who have been sucking the blood of mines and railroads, and made common cause with that honest side which will by-and-by bring more prosperous times, with honest and honorable pay-masters.

There are plenty of people who think the only way to set civilization right is to pull it all down and build anew, forgetting that they will only have the same materials, if not a little worse, to rebuild with. But the sturdy Anglo-Saxon common-sense, which has done about the best it could thus far, is beginning to see what is rotten and what is sound. It is going to cut out the one and save the other. It is not going to throw away its boast that here the poorest man has only to be a man, to be a rich one. And it will by-and-by make that true by taxing the rich to their faces—the richer they are the higher the rate,—and ceasing to tax the poor behind their backs.

This is not yet altogether a government of, by, and for the people; but it has got along so far that fugitive miners and railroad laborers are not hunted and brought back to work without any wages at all. If they don't like their wages, they have the same right all the rest of us have to carry their grievance into politics, where it is sure to come at last, and be righted in some measure. The more quietly they do that the better. Mobs have been entirely out of order in this country for one hundred years. Any cause that resorts to them, no matter how just, is likely to go under. If the wronged laborers must mob anything, or any body, it should be the custom-house and the superfluous priest. This, though dreadfully foolish, would be aiming at the fountains of their trouble. To mob a railroad, burn its buildings, or stop its trains for more than "ten minutes for refreshments," is to attack the carotid artery of society on which millions, besides the employes, depend for a living. It is worse for the latter than to kill their own goose; for other people have rights in it which they had much better, for their own sakes, respect.

The public has a deeper interest than can be measured in money in having all railroad employes intelligent, experienced, conscientious men, and consequently in having them well paid. The most melancholy revelation of the recent outbreak is the crime of the railroad managers in allowing it to take place at all. It was utterly unnecessary. The great stock-gamblers and stock-waterers who have mostly got the management of our railroads have no lack of intellect, and of course know well enough how to make such bargains and with such men as to make strikes impossible. The public ought to be, and ere long will be, wise enough to make them do it. By-and-by, if a strike occurs on a railroad, of a sort to stop trains, the managing officers will have to step out, and give place to men who are not so greedy in their private pockets as to thus endanger the lives and stop the food and fuel of the great public.

A FEW COMMENTS.

The "goose" whose death we were willing to record without shedding tears was the one that had fallen into the bad habit of laying its golden eggs only in a few nests. It is generally conceded that an old dog will not learn new tricks; and we surmised it would turn out pretty much the same with the old goose whose life "E. W." seemed to be imploring laboring men to save. We were wrong probably in saying that it was a new goose the people should desire. On further reflection we incline to think that the days of the goose-period are drawing to a close. A new goose would soon get as old and undoubtedly fall into ways as partial and unsatisfactory to human wants in general, as her mother before her. What we should all desire then, is, a new kind of a bird; or, to aspire still higher, some new characteristics developed in the human race. The day is coming on rapidly, we hope, when these better things will appear.

We do not share "E. W.'s" fear lest the increase of wages shall make capital unproductive. It should remain "unproductive" so far as its productiveness tends to accumulate it only in a few hands. "E. W." desires that the laboring men shall become capitalists, and we believe that if the products of labor were equitably distributed, all workers would be capitalists, and that capital would then be by coöperative effort far more productive than it now is. This is the "new goose" we were thinking of. "E. W." speaks of "capitalists who have got possession of other people's capital," and we agree with him that the question is, how to stop it. By these capitalists he means, however, "gamblers," and not the "honest capitalists of large capital." But when we come more thoroughly to examine into the real equities of business life, it is possible that we shall find much of that we now call honest, to be needing essential modification or reconstruction. There is a pretty general feeling that as things stand at present, capital in comparatively few instances, gets into the hands of its real producers. Whether it be wilful or otherwise, the evil remains to be destroyed. How? That is the problem before us. We are not satisfied thus far with "E. W.'s" suggestion that "in spite of all such capitalists," and all adverse circumstances, everyone, who loves work for its own sake, can "earn his living, feed a small and industrious family, and save a little something besides." Without going to further discussion, we affirm that the settlement of the question we look for is one that does not hold the mass of mankind down to any such close shaving. Suppose they can squeeze out some "little savings," it does not appear that the ends of equity are not thwarted all the same, and, as we believe, not alone by that class of capitalists whose whole ambition is to "get possession of other people's capital and drive unreasonably hard bargains."

To the first, second, and third of "E. W.'s" "pregnant propositions" we fully assent. As to the fourth, we do not know of anybody who makes precisely such an affirmation. The nearest approach to it we have noticed is a statement that capital should be "granted gratuitously," or otherwise, according to the cost or damage to the person granting it. To the fifth we subscribe, and would especially emphasize the last sentence, "If property were not (supposed to be) the certain reward of labor, famines would probably be more frequent and destructive." As to what Proudhon has said, we think "E. W." is laboring under mistake. It was in reply probably to some similar criticism that Proudhon was led to write the following:—

I protest that, in criticizing property, or rather the ensemble of institutions of which property is the pivot, it has never been my intention either to attack individual rights recognized by previous laws, or to contest the legitimacy of acquired possessions, or to provoke an arbitrary distribution of goods, or to place any obstacle in the way of the free and regular acquisition of property by sale and exchange, or even to prohibit or suppress, by sovereign decree, rent of land and interest on capital. I think that all these manifestations of human activity should remain free to all at their option; I admit no other modifications, restrictions, or suppressions of them than those which naturally and necessarily result from the universalization of the principle of reciprocity, and the law of synthesis that I propose.

With much of what follows in "E. W.'s" remarks we are in hearty agreement. We are not, however, convinced of the "destitution of wit" he thinks the laboring men displayed by their "strike"; or, at least, we believe the effect of their striking, as it has begun to show itself in the awakening of the public mind to the whole question, to be most wholesome and fruitful. We are not of the opinion either that there are plenty of people who think the "only way to set civilization right is to pull it all down and build anew."

All people know better. There is a certain amount of bad building, however, which, in time, is seen to be bad, gets "condemned," and has to come down, no matter how costly its construction may have been. "E. W." is himself no stranger to the importance of this work in the evolution of religious ideas and institutions. And is it true that we "only have the same materials, if not a little worse, to rebuild with"? No, far from it. No French Revolution—we say this because people generally think it is saying about the worst that can be said—but left the world better off with respect to "materials"—we mean ideas—with which to rebuild. It were, indeed, well if we could always preserve the true balance; if in the work of destruction the good could remain and only the bad get displaced. But the good is often so interwoven with the bad that its sacrifice becomes a part of the price paid for a new order of things. "E. W." will also understand this in its application to the uprooting of the chattel slave system in this country.

As to mobs being out of order, and the advisability of doing things more quietly, we are not at variance with "E. W." But we see also that whatever happens, happens as an expression of conditions, and that the main stress of our protest should go to changing the conditions which render such things possible. Our ability to change the circumstances of life is our pledge that they shall not master us.

LABOR NOTES.

—"Excessive selfishness" is said to be at the root of the matter.

—This must be "toned down" and employé and employer work for each other's interest.

—Which sounds well; but, unfortunately, without some guiding principle which illustrates the permanent advantage of unselfishness, things will remain as they are.

—The question is woefully mixed. Everybody talks all around it, and on both sides, top and bottom. A writer in the Science Monthly says "teach" this, "teach" that, "teach" the other thing, and many things besides, and ends saying, "All that we can do is to search after the laws governing such matters, and remove obstructions from the way."

—This writer also says, "Labor, like everything else in the market, is worth neither more nor less than supply and demand put upon it. It is sheer madness to battle fact by saying it should be worth more." And yet "the capitalist must not toy with men's wages at every whim he has." And yet again, "teach workmen that they bring down their own wages, and that this is not their employer's doings."

—The same writer says wages must fall and not rise, because all the world clamors for cheap goods. "Could workmen be made to realize the fact that high wages mean correspondingly high food, clothing, fuel, rent, with all else he would purchase, while low wages mean the opposite, I think they would agree with me in saying that the amount received per diem for their work was of secondary importance." Very well; suppose all this be true. The question still remains, is the permanent condition of workmen one of mere hand-to-mouth living? Of course, high wages or low matters not to men if their outgo keeps its due proportion. But "labor should leave an excess" is an axiom. What excess? How much labor shall a man do in order to live and still have an excess?

—The point these times suggest lies below the mere surface-question of how to ease up so men will feel the pressure less. What society demands is not only the removal of the pressure, but an assured opportunity for all people to improve their natures. For this they must have time and capital,—an excess of wealth daily accumulating over their cost of living. The day's work must end before they are exhausted. We praise the good boy who, when his hard day's work is done, turns to his books and gets an education; but society suffers more than we know by the inevitable break-down of health from this overstrain of faculties. Boys and girls that toil eight, ten, and twelve hours a day to live, as we say, are really tolling thus to die. And when this goes on through life, or, through such life as they may keep themselves in possession of, what remains? No; the labor question touches the evil of this present civilization more deeply, or we are mistaken.

—We have outgrown some things, and we shall outgrow others. We shall come to see that for the industrious the world over there shall be an opportunity for all the wealth their proper culture and life in this world demands. We shall outgrow the idea of class-distinction. All laborers shall be capitalists, and there shall be none others. To-day, with prevailing notions and the prevailing system, this is absolutely impossible. The idea of a capitalist is, as entertained to-day, one who, by scraping and economy, has laid by somewhat of his earnings, and then proceeded not to add thereto by his continued earning simply, but by using the capital he has gained to gather unto himself the earnings of others; the opportunities to do this are one in a hundred or a thousand; so the successful capitalists are few. A Stewart, a Vanderbilt, a Rothschild,—a few tall peaks of the mountain range. As these peaks could not be without the mountain range, so the mountain range could not be without the great valleys that stretch between them. Sometimes these valleys are deep gullies,—the coal-mines of Pennsylvania, for instance. "Now what!" we hear some voice, touched with indignation, exclaim; "do you propose levelling down all these peaks and mountain ranges until they also are low as the valleys or gullies? A pretty state of things you would bring us to. Do not these peaks and mountains send down their trickling streams, fertilizing the plains below, and making the broad rivers on which float their commerce and the smaller streams which turn the wheels of industry? And this is the 'goose' you would kill? Be warned; there are no golden eggs you can get out of that goose, kill her ever so dead."

—The answer to all this ought to be so self-evident, and is, where the self-evident vision is not lacking or remains undeveloped,—that words of reply were unnecessary. Simply, then, this: some of the peaks for their own good will have to come down,—we believe there is a general advice that they should not go up.—"Don't aspire to be a Vanderbilt," is a lesson taught now in pretty much every Sunday-school. If not there as much as it ought to be, most of the respectable dailies are teaching it. (We remember especially that the press generally at the time, said: "To be a Stewart is not the true path of ambition for any young man"; but since Mrs. Stewart has developed the Stewart plan for a great Memorial Cathedral, "to be a Stewart" is not esteemed so reprehensible a thing.)—The high peaks will come down, but the mountain range, which in the main represents the idea that at about that altitude the air is most bracing and pure, may abide. The work of the age is to fill the valleys up. We say, then, not levelling down so much as levelling up, is the motto of the future. Most people now are anxious to fill up the gullies; they don't like to see them,—humanity is so far humanized. How to bring up the valleys? This is the question that presses.

—We repeat again, it cannot be done by the system of business interests that prevails. Thrift, temperance, economy, more or less tobacco, have nothing to do with it. There is as much of these in one class of people as another. The improvidence of the poor is all in your eye, Mr. Economist,—we say it respectfully. There is as much improvidence in the nature of the rich or prosperous world as in the denizens of that lower world. The difference that you see in their conduct is a difference which depends entirely on the different circumstances to which—we were going to say, they are doomed—but not yet: we hope for better things. Let any man see himself on the road to the promised land, and he will be very apt to conduct himself accordingly. Let him find himself switched off and doomed to a ditch, and your providence or improvidence is all one and the same to him. When he becomes convinced that business life is a shaking of the dice—so many slices, he who gets them wins, and he who don't, don't win, but, for the most part goes to the dogs,—let him reach this conviction,—which lies so close to the fact the line between is indistinct, coupled with the conviction that the slices are not for him,—then what follows? Why, temperance societies, almshouses, charity bureaus, work-houses, prisons, dungeons, and, in the world to come, "hell." Go read this world's history and see the long track of poverty for the masses over which all the woe of the world has travelled. Are we complaining of this world and its history? No: we say only, that this world has now at length after long travelling and groaning reached the dawn of a new order of things, and that America is its prophet!

—A new idea of the capitalist comes in view. Let us look steadily and see if it be the Messiah. Do not echo the old cry, "Crucify it, crucify it." Enough of that. Try and see if it "indeed be the Christ." What it has to say of itself sounds something like this: I am he who claims as mine own that which I earn. My capital is the excess of my own labor; which labor consists in producing or in helping produce still greater wealth; not in gathering the wealth of my neighbors, as I should do if my "profits" came out of their earnings. We are all producers of wealth together; all doing certain necessary things. Each produces after his own genius; we need each others' products. Not to rob one another we must exchange equivalents. Time, the wear and tear of our lives, enter into and determine the nature of these equivalents. With the benefit my production may be to my neighbor I have nothing to do. My business is to say what it has cost me to produce it. We mutually exchange not benefits but burdens. That which costs me nothing, I give him, and so, vice versa, does he. In the ratio of our outlay and the damage done, we charge a price. We may not always hit the exact line, but enough that we try to approximate to equity. My motto is the old one, "A fair exchange is no robbery." What is fair is determined not by the distress of my neighbor, but by my own. He must pay me sufficient to equal what I render to him, as determined by me; or, if he thinks me extortionate, or incapable of doing the work except at too great a cost, he will exchange with others who are for that speciality more adequately gifted. I shall take the hint, and seek other ways of employing my time. I have done so, and I have an excess of labor reserved. I am a capitalist. I see now that I can conduct a large enterprise which will require the assistance of many others. I will do this as a means of obtaining the opportunity for work which will most gratify my tastes. I do not wish to sweep the streets or toil in a coal-mine. I am bound by my own inner desire to do that which I can do best, and which, while it gives me employment, will help keep the social welfare sweet and sound. I will do, in short, that for which I was made. I will use in this enterprise the excess of labor I have saved. I will charge for the average risk such enterprises run of failure, for the time and excess of mental wear I contribute; the demands of my capital will then be satisfied; all else will be the product of those working in my employ; they like myself working not on the profit system, but on the cost system. Our joint product will be disposed of at a price regulated by its cost to us. Each laborer constantly a capitalist by his "excess of labor" over his daily wants. This capital of theirs may be loaned to me to increase the facilities of doing business by whatever security we can mutually agree upon. For its use no price will be set; for its security adequate provision will be made. Use pertains to the benefit conferred on another; security to the cost of loaning it. Now by our joint efforts our capital would increase,—increase by a continued opportunity for labor; increase only by labor. Thus equality of distribution would be preserved in proportion to the labor done; the inequality would of course be the result of unequal amounts of labor. I am, then, a capitalist who denies the right of capital to self-increase. My capital is increased by the excess of my labor. All I ask is security for my labor thus reserved that I may have it to rely on in any future time of need.

—The New Bedford Mercury prints the following: "An able railroad man, with a large interest in one of the leading railroads of the Middle States, writes in a private letter: 'But I have no heart to aid in any way the corporations of the time. The complaints of suffering men are ringing in my ears; and when I say that I know of things of which many are ignorant, and am cognizant of brutalities exercised toward subordinates which, if generally known, would heat the blood of any right-minded man, I am sure that you will believe that I am trusting that a good Providence will ere long overthrow all scheming, cruel tyrants and brutal overseers, who live only by trampling upon their fellow-men, and scorn all thought of pity. I have for many months given much thought to some of the problems of the near future, and I tell you, sir, it will soon be time for considerate, thoughtful, earnest men to stand together, and insist upon improved methods of conduct, especially in our large corporations. I hope the nobler members of the American press, and the leading journals, with all their mighty power for good, will look into the workings of these juggernauts, and after close and critical examination give to the nation and the world facts supplemented by the soundest of advice. The time is ripe, and I think the duty is plain and unmistakable. Twenty of the leading and wealthy men of America could, by the exercise of reason, and by safe and profitable investment, ameliorate the condition of every honest person in the land, and render labor-troubles and bitterness and bloodshed things to be apprehended no more.'"

—The Labor Standard of New York publishes this platform:—

WHEREAS, political liberty without economical freedom is but an empty phrase; therefore, we will in the first place direct our efforts to the economical question. We repudiate connection with all political parties of the propertied classes, without regard to their name.

We demand that all the means of labor (land, machinery, railroads, telegraphs, canals, etc.) become the common property of the whole people, for the purpose of abolishing the wages system, and substituting in its place coöperative production with a just distribution of its rewards.

Strict laws making employers liable for all accidents to the injury of their employes.

Gratuitous administration of justice in all courts of law.

Abolition of all conspiracy laws.

Railroads, telegraphs, and all means of transportation to be taken hold of and operated by the government.

All industrial enterprises to be placed under the control of the government as fast as practicable, and operated by free coöperative trades-unions for the good of the whole people.

—Read in another column what Mr. Mill says in regard to "laborers as a 'class.' " It is a distinction Mr. Conkling should have remembered.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE STRIKE.

BY BISHOP FERRETTE.

Whatever views may be entertained of the good or evil effects of the recent strike, and of its creditable or disgracing character as a page of our national history, one thing is already evident to all thinking minds: it will be the starting-point of a new and more practical study of questions which had to be crowded back till some more urgent ones should be disposed of, but which have now forced themselves to the front rank.

Among these practically new questions will be the relation of the right of voting to the determination of enforcing the result of the vote at all risks by personal military service. Suppose a sleepy majority is prevailed upon by a few cunning devisers to deposit a care-nothing-about-it vote whereby the living interests of an important and determined minority are jeopardized; and suppose the minority will fight to resist the law, and the majority will not fight to enforce it, what next? Shall the tens be allowed to fight it out with the hundreds, the thousands quietly looking on? Or shall the tens be allowed to enlist, on the New York wharves, a foreign soldiery, such as is now for the most part the United States standing army, and employ that soldiery for the support of which the care-nothing-about-it thousands are taxed, in shooting down hundreds?

This leads us to a second question, that of the enforcement of State law by federal military force. The Constitution of the United States guarantees to every State a republican form of government, and protection against domestic violence. These two provisions need keen interpretation to be consistent with each other. A republican government is one in which no laws are passed of such exaggerating character as to raise within the State an opposition which the State has no sufficient strength, or no will, to put down. Suppose a State had a Quaker majority, and passed laws that the non-Quaker minority were unwilling to submit to, and the Quaker majority unwilling to enforce by strength of arms; would it be the duty of the President of the United States, on the application of the Quaker legislature or governor, to remove the militia of the two nearest non-Quaker States to help to enforce the Quaker laws? Or suppose a State finds it convenient to have only two companies of militia, and these are too far or too distanced to be of any use: shall the army of the United States be summoned to do military duty in their stead? This is too ridiculous almost to mention; and yet it is difficult to see on what other grounds—except, perhaps, that of having had too little time to reflect—the President's action in West Virginia and elsewhere could have been based. Assuming that a republican government has, at home, all the resources necessary to cause its laws to be obeyed of its citizens at least, the only kinds of domestic violence against which I can see the President called upon to protect a State are, first, domestic violence (if it can be so called) inflicted upon the State by persons belonging to another State or foreign country; secondly, domestic violence seizing as its opportunity the absence of the State troops, on federal service, or their inability to approach the disturbed district through a very unforeseen event, such as an unprecedented flood.

The more properly economic part of the labor problem, which is, of course, the core of the question, I need not here mention except to say that it is, from this moment, the main theme opened for general discussion. To anticipate its full solution would be above the reach of the ablest, in the present infancy of the science of political economy. But sufficient are already the acquisitions of that science to convince us that its further results will be like the earlier ones, matter of discovery; not of dogmatic assertion of what are not truly Nature's laws, nor of impatient rebellion against what are Nature's laws from whose control there is no escape. It is because this question, in Europe, has been made one not of reasons but of impulses, that it has made there so little satisfactory progress. What gives me an almost confident hope that in America the debate will lead to better results, is not only the fairer scope afforded by universal suffrage and republican institutions, but also the peculiar fitness of the whole American people to grapple with precisely such a problem. The question between laborers and employers is mainly one of mathematics, and I have always been struck by the fact that all Americans are naturally good at figures. However imperfect the educational advantages of an American may have been, his arithmetic is almost sure to be far ahead of all the other branches of his education.

But however confident I am of the results of science, and however complete my conviction of the futility of all authoritative anticipations of her discoveries, there is one point on which I will boldly venture to be dogmatic. One of the deleterious effects, not of modern industry itself, but of the crude form in which the application of its processes has taken place, mindful of production only and careless of social results, has been the creation of a numerous floating class of operatives, having no permanent homes, no means of existence except those which depend, from hour to hour, on the will of a few employers. To this class belong, without contradiction, even the most honorable of the generally respectable men who, from one end of the land to the other, have lately risen in rebellion against the laws of their country, half with her connivance. Now, the truest and kindest thing that can firmly be said both to those men and to their employers, is that the existence of such a class is a permanent threat to the existence of the republic. Such a class is, by the nature of things, an immense rebel army quietly organized in our midst under the blind connivance of our laws, and ready to take the field and supersede those laws the day that it pleases. The only way of practically controlling such a floating class is, as in France, through an overwhelming permanent army, which is itself nothing else but a dangerous floating class of the same kind, ready to lend itself to the support of any Napoleonade or Macmahonade to which its commander may choose to apply it. We cannot afford to have, and we will not have, a permanent army on the French system; and so we cannot afford, in this republic, to have any floating class. A floating class is incompatible, not only with the security of republican institutions: it is incompatible with the constitution of the true family, the most precious of all the things which a republican form of government is intended to secure. Gypsies have no marriages and no regular family ties. Make the family homeless, its head, its mother, each child, a separate carpet-bag bread-winner: free-love is the result. And this is what modern industry, in its present form, tends everywhere to effect.

When this republic was founded, it had no floating class; if it had had, it would never have been founded. Every American, then, had his farm, or his manly home however poor; and that, every American will have to have yet. Railroad corporations and mill-owners, and all other industrial lords will have, cost it what it may cost, to so modify their arrangements as to make that possible. Industrial lords can no more be suffered, for their own individual, selfish interest, to call into existence a floating class of dependent, underpaid, suffering men, than your next neighbor can be suffered to fill the five stories of his shell-house with pine shavings imbibed with kerosene oil, or than Aaron Burr was suffered to march through the country at the head of his army of yet unexplained purposes. Were it said that the operatives are oppressed not for the interest of their employers alone, but of the whole public who use the railroads and the manufactured products of industry, the answer would be simple. Cursed be the cotton shirt, the fibre of which an unpaid slave has raised, or an underpaid operative has spun. May that shirt cleave to its wearer's back as Nessus' tunic, and never be torn off it except with his skin and blood. No cheapness of railroad fares, nor of cotton goods, can compensate a civilization for the curse of pauperism, a nation for the danger and shame of having an oppressed class. The fathers and mothers of this republic, and their children, were clad in home-spun, and were so contented with what they had, that they fought for it. If modern industry, by her labor-saving processes, can give us more, well and right. But where are the boasted powers of her machinery if it cannot, after all, give those who run it a permanent home and sufficient bread, whereas the old-fashioned loom could?

CREEDS.

Theologies and creeds are attempts to formulate, or rather to humanize the infinite; but the infinite or the universe cannot be expressed in terms of humanity. True wisdom contents itself, therefore, with an approximate statement of the truth of things, and does not attempt to grasp truth in its entirety. All formulas of the infinite and all names, which pretend to define it, are barren and mean nothing, and can mean nothing except the vain endeavor of ignorance, fanaticism, and priestly arrogance to overawe and paralyze the minds of men. Theological creeds are invariably a lot of barren affirmations about non-entities, mere empty formulas.

Man having ceased to be almost purely an imaginative being, impersonating every kind of power, has at length come under the influence of his reason, which is an impersonal faculty, locus principiorum. Hence he no longer indulges in mere verbal propositions, which are neither subjectively nor objectively true. Once he fought for them and died a martyr for such propositions. Now only the stupid and unenlightened portions of the race believe them.

THE MISTAKES OF JESUS.

BY PROFESSOR WILLIAM DENTON, (FROM HIS FORTHCOMING BOOK ON JESUS).

The mistakes that Jesus made were great and numerous. His belief in the miraculous was unbounded. He constantly sought to increase that faith in others, and his doctrines on that subject have done much to produce the unphilosophic notions about the supernatural that so many entertain to-day. God clothes the grass of the field; he will much more clothe his children. He will give good things to them when they ask him; but sometimes as he teaches by a parable (Luke xi., 5-8) it is necessary to tease him, to keep asking until they weary him into granting their request. If two shall agree about anything which they may ask, God will do it for them (Matt. xviii., 19).

Nothing can be farther from the truth than such representations. God does not clothe the grass unless there is soil for the grass to grow in, and conditions have been favorable for the seed of the grass to obtain a suitable position in the soil. God clothes no grass in California from June to November, because there is no rain. There are no good things that we can get by merely asking for them. The price even of life is labor, and no asking or even teasing will enable us to evade the unalterable laws, which regard the prayer of the bishop no more than the hum of the beetle. When men profess to support orphan asylums and hospitals by prayer, it will be found that extensive advertising does the work, and prayer obtains the credit.

"If you had faith as a grain of mustard-seed, you might say to this mountain, Remove, and be cast into the sea, and it would remove, and nothing would be impossible to you" (Matt. xvi., 20; Mark xi., 23). All the facts demonstrate that if we had faith as a mountain we could not say to a grain of mustard, Remove, and be cast into the sea, with any prospect of its accomplishment.

In accordance with these doctrines of Jesus are the prayers that are offered by the million, generally by people who mean well, and under the influence of religious sentiment, but undirected by cultivated judgment. All is natural, from the birth of a gnat to the extinction of a sun, the father of a thousand worlds. The rocks are natural and all their contents. Here is a hill; a hard rock beneath it withstood the fury of the elements for ages, and thus it was produced. The people of the globe are as natural as the rocks they tread upon. The Indian is what ages of wandering and war have made him, and his disposition can only approximate that of the Anglo-Saxon by the operation of higher influences upon many generations. We are what India, Greece, Rome, Gaul, Britain, and America have made us. In many an American of to-day the shillalah Irishman of a century ago occasionally crops out. We are more musical for the shepherds of Greece, who played upon their pipes as they watched their flocks. The men who wrote Bibles developed the brain by which other men criticize them.

A careful study of the New Testament and the times when it was composed, shows that Jesus, his disciples, and Christianity were all as natural as the appearance of a comet or the occurrence of an eclipse. These were once regarded as supernatural; every comet was a miraculous messenger; every eclipse foretold some disaster. The astronomer has removed miracle from the skies; the theologian will eventually remove it from religion.

Jesus prays, and teaches his disciples to pray, "Thy kingdom come." His followers to-day pray, "Lord, revive thy work." All such prayers are requests for a miracle-worker to perform the impossible. Had the persons who offer them lived in the carboniferous age, when the highest animals of the world were reptiles, they would have prayed, "Thy kingdom come; O God, improve thy work"; that is, convert these hopping frogs and scaly fishes into birds, beasts, and men. God did improve his work, but it took ages for the needed improvement to take place, by causes such as had been operating for millions of ages previous, and that still are pushing the planet on. The reptile was infinitely lower than the worst man, and if God never performed a miracle to transform reptiles into men, but allowed the slow operation of natural causes to produce the result, why should we expect him now to advance low grades of men into higher? If the nebulae in the distant heavens are under the domain of law, condensing into suns and worlds, and, only during ages that are an eternity to our thought, advancing to life and intelligence, how can we expect human beings "to be hurried by miracle"?

IN THE Young Contributors' Department, St. Nicholas, we find this dainty little poem by "W. H., aged thirteen," which we cannot refrain from quoting:—

THE DESERTED HOUSE.

A SONNET.

There by the roadside stands the queer old house;
Deserted it has been for many years;
And when one enters first one has strange fears
Of what may be inside. But not a mouse
Raises its tiny head, or hides, afraid;
And the sole sound through the deep stillness heard
Is the shrill chirping of a mother-bird,
Who right above the door her nest has made.
While through bare, lonely rooms my way I wend
I feel a kind of pity for the thing
Left thus alone, like some fallen king
Deserted both by enemy and friend.
But life is short; so gently close the gate,
And leave the house to mercy and to fate.

DARWIN married his cousin. His eldest son, William Darwin, is a banker at Southampton; the second, George, took high honors at Cambridge, and is now a fellow at Trinity; the third, Frank, who has inherited his father's ill-health, acts as his secretary; the fourth, Leonard, is an officer in the artillery, and distinguished himself as one of the scientific corps sent to observe the transit of Venus; the fifth, Horace, is an excellent mathematician.

THE SMITH sisters of Glastonbury, Conn., live in a house one hundred and thirty-nine years old, sit under a tree one hundred and one years old, and are the possessors of the Gov. Saltonstall china, which is two hundred years old.

OUR brief editorial responsibility is now brought to a close. It was given us to freely express such thoughts as we deemed proper and on such topics as we were particularly interested in. We have gone through our task with what good-will we possessed, and hope our readers have been hospitable as well as charitable. We beg to say that the duties of an editor of a weekly journal like THE INDEX—though our own have in the nature of the case been comparatively slight—are not few, nor always the most agreeable. Our little touch of experience leads us into still stronger sympathy with our friend Mr. Abbot, the editor, who for seven years has carried THE INDEX through varying fortunes, but always with an eye single to the advancement of the general cause of rational thought and an improved humanity. His success thus far is by no means to be measured outwardly by any summing up of present results (though an excellent showing could be made even in that respect), but by the inevitable extension of his labor into the future. We have not in all respects found our own views in harmony with those he has so ably and earnestly presented; but we are always in agreement with him thoroughly as to the ultimate goal it is desirable society should reach, and in our radical faith in the high destiny awaiting the human race.

And now, at the risk of seeming in a degree impertinent, we would like to remind the friends of THE INDEX of the valuable service they can render its editor by a substantial manifestation of their sympathy and approval, while at the same time they help extend to others the ideas they themselves cherish. To make his paper all he desires it should be, an editor needs the yearly coöperation of all its friends and supporters. Especially does a journal that does not float on a popular current, but must be run on an up-hill unpopular grade, receive, if it is to prosper as it should, the steady reinforcing aid of all interested in its progress. Every one of its friends will say of a liberal journal that chances to die, "What a pity!" yet how few bestir themselves in time to ward off a catastrophe which, when consummated, they deeply lament. This is not as it should be. THE INDEX, friends, should live long and prosperously through your efforts! You know this as well as we do. You do not need to be told how you can render efficient aid. We will only say,—send the new address, plainly written, to the office of THE INDEX.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

" 13 " 25 "	"	8	"	"	"
" 26 " 51 "	"	8	"	"	"
" 52 "	"	5	"	"	"

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 26, 1872.

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEPHENS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

- O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
- WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
- WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
- Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
- GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
- DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
- Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.
- J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
- ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
- C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
- W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of our country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. 40 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wilson and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Reason and Revelation, by William J. Potter. 10 cents: ten for 80 cents; one hundred, $3.00.

For series of important Tracts see last page of THE INDEX.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1873 is quite limited. Orders by mail may be addressed either "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston," or to the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. ## OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM AND THE NEW FAITH.

By EDMUND C. STEDMAN.

12mo, Cloth extra, with Portrait of Mr. FROTHINGHAM, 75 cents.

A clear and effective presentation of what is known as Rationalism in Religion in an analysis, by an admirer of acknowledged genius, of the life and work of one of its leading teachers.

"A brilliant and appreciative essay."—Boston Post.

"Radical ideas are here formulated, and expressed in a strong, clear light."—Liberal Christian.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price by THE INDEX, 231 Washington St., Boston.

LEWES' NEW BOOK!

THE PHYSICAL BASIS OF MIND.

Being the Third Volume of "Problems of Life and Mind."

By GEORGE H. LEWES, author of the History of Philosophy, the Life of Goethe, etc. 8vo. $3.00.

CONTENTS.—THE NATURE OF LIFE.—THE NERVOUS MECHANISM.—ANIMAL AUTOMATISM.—THE REFLEX THEORY.

Mr. Lewes is widely recognized as one of the most acute and independent of thinkers, and a writer of remarkable force and perspicacity. The two preceding volumes of Problems of Life and Mind have attracted in an unusual degree the attention of scientific and philosophical minds, and have taken rank among the most important of recent contributions to the philosophy of life and thought. The present volume is of equal significance, and will doubtless win equal study and admiration from those competent to follow the author's speculations and argument.

Its interest is by no means confined to specialists, but all persons of intelligence will find it in a high degree instructive and engaging.

"The book is one which will inevitably find its way into the hands of every student of mental science who wishes to obtain the freshest view of physiology in its relation to mind."—Saturday Review (London).

PROBLEMS OF LIFE AND MIND.

Vols. I. and II. $3.00 each.

Sent postpaid on receipt of price by THE INDEX, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

FROTHINGHAM'S WORKS.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY. An Essay. Third Edition—Revised. Price $1.50.

"Nobody can peruse this book without respect for the learning, mental honesty and skill in the statement of his convictions, possessed by the author, and for the essential integrity and philanthropic tendency of his spirit."—Springfield Republican.

"A profoundly sincere book, the work of one who has read largely, studied thoroughly, reflected patiently. . . . It is a model of scholarly culture and of finished and vigorous style."—Boston Globe.

THE CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION. For Sunday-schools and Homes. Price $1.00.

THE SAFEST CREED, AND OTHER DISCOURSES. 12mo, Cloth, $1.50.

Not "food for babes," but full of suggestion for earnest and thoughtful men.

STORIES FROM THE LIPS OF THE TEACHER. With Frontispiece. Cloth, $1.00.

"The Parables are so re-told as to absorb the attention of the reader, and to fasten upon the mind what the writer believes to have been the impression the Saviour meant to convey. It is in style and thought a superior book, and will interest alike young and old."—Zion's Herald (Methodist).

STORIES OF THE PATRIARCHS. With Frontispiece. Cloth, $1.00.

"A work of culture and taste; it will be welcome to all ages, and gives the sublimest lessons of manhood in the simple language of a child."—Springfield Republican.

BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS. A Lecture. 12mo, Paper, 25 cents.

TRANSCENDENTALISM IN NEW ENGLAND. A History. With sketches and studies of Emerson, Alcott, Parker, Margaret Fuller, the Brook-Farm Community, etc. 8vo, Cloth extra, with steel portrait of the author, $2.50.

THE LIFE OF THEODORE PARKER. 8vo. With Portrait, $3.00.

The New York Tribune closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

THE CRADLE OF THE CHRIST. A Study in Primitive Christianity, illustrating the prime importance of the Messianic Idea in the New Testament, as the key to the development of Christianity from Judaism. Octavo, Cloth, $1.75.

Mailed, post-paid, on receipt of price, by THE INDEX, 231 Washington St., Boston.

$55 to $77 a Week to Agents. $10 Outfit Free. P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE 231 Washington Street, Boston.

CIRCULATE IT

EVERYWHERE!

The new Liberal League Tract of 24 pages, entitled,

"PATRIOTIC ADDRESS,"

contains:

1. PATRIOTIC ADDRESS of the National Liberal League to the people of the United States.
2. CHIEF RESOLUTIONS of the League.
3. PROTEST of the League against shutting the International Exhibition on Sundays.
4. CONSTITUTION and List of Officers.
5. EXTRACTS from Approving Letters by Distinguished Citizens.

This is the Liberal's best CAMPAIGN DOCUMENT in the great impending contest over amending the Constitution of the United States with reference to the school question. It should be in the hands of EVERY VOTER, and has been published expressly for gratuitous distribution by earnest friends of State Secularization.

Local Liberal Leagues

Cannot do better than to order this Tract by the quantity, as an excellent auxiliary in their local agitation.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.

2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.

3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.

4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.

5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.

6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.

7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."

8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.

9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.

10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.

11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.

12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.

13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

THOMAS JEFFERSON once said: "All error may be safely tolerated where reason is left free to combat it." That is the fundamental principle of secular government.

THE MOST sensible of the resolutions adopted by the workmen of Philadelphia, as the platform of the "Protective Labor Party" which they organized on August 25, was one in favor of "compulsory education and a liberal application of funds for the purpose."

PROFESSOR HALL's discovery of the moons of Mars, one of the most important services to astronomy ever rendered, and one which must be set down to the credit of American science, is explained in another column by Professor Newcomb, in a letter which we copy from the Tribune.

BRIGHAM YOUNG's death removes from active influence one of the men who have done most to corrupt and pervert the development of American institutions at the West. There is little doubt that the fate of Bishop John D. Lee ought to have been shared by his chief; and that justice has been cheated by his being allowed to die peacefully in his bed. The Mountain Meadow massacre, however, has written his name on the page of history in blood-red colors, as one of the most cruel and perfidious of religious impostors.

WENDELL PHILLIPS' "open letter" to Lord Dufferin, protesting against the surrender of Sitting Bull to the United States Government, reflects severely on the dealings of the American people with the Indians, as cruel, grasping, and unjust. The worst of it is that he understates the fact. The perfidy with which the Nez-Percés have been treated by this government has been exposed in detail by the Nation; and this case is but a sample of the unvarying iniquity of our "Indian policy." For once, Mr. Phillips and the Nation are agreed.

SIGNATURES to the petition of the National Liberal League for the adoption of a Religious Freedom Amendment to the United States Constitution have been received as follows, since our last acknowledgment in THE INDEX of August 2: from Mr. George M. Wood, Washington, D. C., 112; from Mr. V. Sinz, Trent, Michigan, 41; from Mr. R. L. Bunting, Fowler, Michigan, 60; from Mr. John D. Courzet, Greenwood, Minnesota, 71; from Dr. M. L. Weems, Columbus, Ohio, 87; from Mr. W. O. Mack, Canby, Oregon, 100. Total number of signatures thus far received—7,727.

A CONDENSED REPORT of the Wolcott grove-meeting, and of the formation of "The Free-Thinkers' Association of Central and Western New York," with its articles of association, has been forwarded to THE INDEX by Mr. H. L. Green, Corresponding Secretary, and will be found in this issue. We heartily congratulate the friends of Liberalism on this signally successful meeting, as a most auspicious omen for the liberal cause. The audience numbered about sixteen hundred; and (what gives us the greatest encouragement and pleasure) the new association proposes to coöperate in the best manner with the National Liberal League. We share Mr. Green's hope that the proposed new local societies may all be organized as Liberal Leagues, affiliated with the National League; for in that case they will be enabled to work effectively in a growing national movement of vast importance, without being in the slightest degree hampered in their local work. Success, glorious success, to the enterprise so finely inaugurated at Wolcott!

IN HER TWENTIETH and closing letter to the New York Tribune of August 25, Gail Hamilton says: "No responsibility attaches to belief. Belief is a result of evidence, not of will. You believe because you must, not because you choose." If Gail Hamilton understands the full force and implication of these words, she is "anti-Christian" to the core. To "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ" is, according to the New Testament, the one supreme duty of every human being to whom the gospel is known; and not to believe on him is, according to the same authority, to merit and to receive damnation in an eternal hell. Personal responsibility to God for religious belief is the very foundation of Christianity; and in the above-quoted words Gail Hamilton flatly and bluntly denies it. It will be interesting to learn whether she has the courage of her opinions, and will publicly confess herself to be the "infidel" she really is, if she comprehends the full scope of her own explicit and unqualified declaration on this decisive point—all the more interesting because she has been hitherto supposed to be an Orthodox Evangelical believer.

PROFESSOR ALLAN THOMSON, in his address at Plymouth as President of the British Association (an extract from which will be found on a succeeding page), spoke as decidedly as Professor Huxley did at Buffalo, last year, respecting the logical necessity of the Evolution "hypothesis" to science. It will be remembered (see THE INDEX of Sept. 7, 1876), that Professor Huxley said explicitly that Evolution is no longer a "matter of speculative reasoning," but "is now a matter of fact and history as much as the monuments of Egypt"; and also that, in his third lecture in New York (see THE INDEX of Sept. 22, 1876), he said with even greater emphasis: "The doctrine of Evolution at the present time rests upon exactly as secure a foundation as the Copernican theory of the motions of the heavenly bodies." Professor Thomson now uses language no less positive and emphatic. "I consider it impossible," he says, "for any one to be a faithful student of embryology, in the present state of science, without at the same time becoming an evolutionist." Mr. Darwin, like Mr. Garrison, has lived long enough to see the arduous reform to which he gave his youth and early manhood, and which brought at the time only obloquy and scorn upon his name, become now in his old age a wreath of imperishable laurel about his brows; and never was so brilliant a crown more worthily won or more modestly worn. It is beautiful justice, delighting every noble heart, that the scientific men of England should now, by a nobler appointment than that of the Queen, unanimously place Darwin on the highest pedestal of their admiration and esteem, as the Poet Laureate of Science.

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 2, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX; so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

Who are Infidels?

A DISCOURSE PREACHED IN THE CHURCH OF THE UNITY, ON SUNDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1876.

BY REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

One year ago this month, perhaps many of you will remember, I preached a sermon on the subject "Who are Infidels?" Not once, but many times since then, I have been requested to repeat that sermon. I cannot readily comply with the request; never having written a word of it, of course it is not in existence to-day. I simply have in mind the substance and the line of thought which I followed on that occasion, somewhat changed, as everything changes in a man's mind from year to year; and, this morning, in answer to that request, I shall preach, not the same sermon, but on the same subject, once more.

I take for my text what would ordinarily be supposed to conflict with my subject, to be even diametrically opposed to it, and yet what I believe to be in perfect sympathy and accord, the first verse of the lesson I read this morning: "Now, faith is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen."—Heb. xi., 1.

That is, that which is called popularly infidelity in the world seems to me, in its higher and better phases, to answer with wondrous accuracy to this definition of faith which Paul has given us, or, rather, the writer of the first verse of the eleventh chapter of Hebrews. I said Paul, because we have got in the habit of thinking that Paul wrote this work, although in all probability he did not.

The epithet "infidel" has, in the past, when applied to earnest and thoughtful men, carried with it a weight of opprobrium hard to bear; it has had a sting, a reproach in it, that has startled a man's self-respect and caused the instinct of self-defence to rise in him; and if the word be properly used it ought to come as an insult; it ought to sting a man's self-respect; it ought to create in him a sense of injury and wrong, as much as though he were called a thief, a perjurer. For what does the word "infidel" mean? It means faithless, false; that thing which of all others is opposed to true manhood and true womanhood, and which, were they widely distributed, would be subversive of all civilized society; and yet we stand in this nineteenth century face to face with the fact that some of the most respectable, the most intelligent, the most cultivated, the noblest men of the time, have this label "infidel" tacked on them by popular rumor or popular estimation. It is even true, perhaps, as you shall travel over the country, that if you go and visit the village infidel, or the prominent infidel of the small city or the large town, you shall find him not a man who lacks the trust of the community as to integrity; not a man lacking in moral character; not a man lacking in intelligence. He shall even stand somewhat higher than the average grade of the thought and the culture about him. That is, the infidel, perhaps, is the peer of the noblest man in his place of residence; and yet, logically, if the word be properly applied to him, he ought to be the one that should be shunned; the one that respectable men would not associate with; the one to be left on one side in all the movements of philanthropy and humanity that are going on about him; the one man tainted and spotted that should be left outside of the finer and better society and culture and morals of his neighborhood.

What does this mean? How has this change come about? It means simply this: that the word "infidel," as popularly used, has ceased entirely to indicate anything which was supposed properly to attach to it when the word was first originated and used. It has ceased to be an impeachment of a man's character; it has ceased to be an impeachment of his culture, of his intelligence, of his standing in the community. I will even go farther than this. Over a large part of this country, to-day, a large part of the world, I should even consider it something derogatory to my own intelligence if I were not, by popular rumor, where I was known, regarded as at least verging towards what is called "infidelity." The patronage, the love, the estimation of large masses of men are things not to be taken as a compliment, but to be received as questionable; something not to be sought after; something almost to be shunned; for the simple reason that it is, as unbiased thought and study will reveal to you, the intelligence, the culture, the independence, and the thought of the age that create what is popularly called the "infidelity" of the age.

To come at our subject at the beginning, let us go back a little and find out when this word was first used, and what it meant at that time, and out of what sprang the necessity for its use. If you travel back in imagination far enough, and come to that period in the history of humanity before society, as we understand it to-day, was organized, you find it, as you travel up the ages, less and less organized every step you take. We have here to-day, over the world, great nations, confederacies, unions of states, unions of smaller empires, making one great empire like that of the German nation; but if you go back, you will find that you are travelling toward more and more of disintegration, year by year, until you come to a time when the largest aggregation of humanity was the family. There was no city, there was no town, there was even no tribe.—Man stood, except with the family organization, practically alone. If you will think of it for a moment, then, you will see that the first body of men that was capable of organizing around some central principle had reached the very condition by which they were to become superior to their surroundings; just as when a regiment of the Macedonian phalanx, under Alexander, could march back and forth, through and through, the borders of the Persian army, simply because of their disciplined, compact organization. So you will find that the first body of men that was capable of organizing upon some central principle had attained to a condition of supremacy over their fellows; and you will see how naturally and necessarily there sprang from this, and from the necessity of this organization to success, the idea that loyalty to the tribe, loyalty to the organization, to the clan, whatever it was called, was the one grand virtue of man, the thing that overtopped, that out-towered everything else. A man might be what he would, if he were only loyal to his clan; and strong enough to be of service to it, he could be one of its masters. It was a necessity of that stage of human civilization and progress. But, as you see it in some nations to-day illustrated, if they stopped here, being loyal simply to their clan and their organization, in other words, if there were no infidelity to the popular organizations as they stood, there could be no progress. Those nations that have been organized after this old pattern, like the Chinese to-day, have stood stagnant for thousands of years, making no progress beyond that which they attained when they first grasped the supremacy of their nation and their time. So that you see, after the organization which gave supremacy, if there was to be anything like progress, there must be some one that was to think differently from his fellows, to think outside of them, to think beyond them, and so start a movement which should lift up and lead forward. And what was this man who was capable of doing this? In the eye of the clan, of the organization that was about him, he was the one that was faithless to that clan, to that organization,—"infidel," in other words; so that the very condition of advance, in this early period of humanity, was that there should be somebody thoughtful and brave and strong enough to defy that organization, come outside of it, and be an infidel according to popular clamor.

That we may understand this and see how it has worked, let us glance at a few of the illustrious infidels of the world, and see in what kind of company the prominent infidel has always trained. Without going very far for my illustrations, take those inside the religious line of history; take Moses, commended for his faith in this chapter which I have read this morning. What kind of faith did he have? To the whole kingdom of Egypt, to the civilization of his time, he was the arch-infidel. He had no faith in Egypt; he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and he went out with a rabble of slaves at his heels, the scum, the outcast of his age, because he believed in a larger, grander God, and a larger future than that in which the Orthodoxy of his time believed. Who were the prophets of Israel, that today are the glory of their nation, the lights of the Hebrew civilization? They were the men who defied the priesthood; they were the men who were driven by popular clamor into the wilderness, like Elijah going out and pleading with his God, and saying that, because of his faithfulness to him, he was left utterly alone. The prophets were not popular in their time; the prophets were not the leaders of their people; the prophets were the infidels, from first to last,—every one. They were organized to overthrow the popular Orthodoxy of their age, and lead the way to something higher and grander than the nation had then conceived.

Come down to him who, with reverent and loving adoration, with a tenderness of heart second only to that which I feel towards God himself—come down to him whom I hold in this estimation, and what was he,—Jesus of Nazareth? He was, according to the popular estimation of his time, the arch-infidel of the world; he who dared to speak against the temple, which was the centre and life of his time; he who dared oppose that which was established, not because he disliked the divine principles which were under it, but because of his faith in something larger and greater. He who, in popular estimation, set himself against God, because he would not locate God on a mountain, on the top of Gerizim or Mount Moriah; who said "God is a spirit; he is everywhere." That is, he gave the people of his time so large and grand a conception of God that to the popular thought it meant nothing at all, and they thought him an atheist.

Go outside of the line of Christian history; take the first Grecian scientist, Anaxagoras, who first guessed at the nature of the sun and of the earth; the forerunner, the John the Baptist of our modern thought and intelligence concerning this grand universe in which we live,—persecuted by the people, outcast because he denied that the sun was a god. Come down to Socrates,—he who more nearly approached the brightness and the power and the glory of Jesus of Nazareth than any other man who has ever lived. Not only persecuted, not only sneered at by his time, not only made the scoff and the sport of the play-writers and of the theatres of populous and cultivated Athens, but at last, by the grave and reverend judges of his people, condemned to death as an atheist because he taught a god grander than had ever entered their thought or imagination; because he would not put any trust in the old-time conceptions, but strove to lead them on to something higher. Take Paul, another infidel, the scum, the outcast of his time; the one person who not only was hated by the Jewish Orthodoxy of his age, but hated even by the Christian Orthodoxy of his time, until he created another Orthodoxy that agreed with him. Paul was another of the old infidels of civilization. Come down the centuries to Savonarola, Huss, Wickliffe, Jerome of Prague,—the great lights that preceded the Reformation. Come down to Martin Luther, who to-day, in spite of the honor which we give him in this country—who to-day, I say—and I ask you to think of it—is judged by the prevailing Orthodoxy of Christendom as the blackest heretic and the most malignant infidel of ecclesiastical history. He stands as one of the leaders and lights of civilization; one whom we worship, almost, as we look back to him, although the air about him in the midst of the battle which he fought, and in which he came off the victor, was thick and dark with ecclesiastical curses.

And so we may take the leading lights of modern science.—Giordano Bruno, Kepler, Copernicus, Newton. Almost every man who has created some thought, who has given a new impulse to civilization, who has led to the advancement of the world,—almost every such man, I say, has been branded by his time with those fearful ecclesiastical epithets, "infidel" and "atheist," a subverter of the right ways of God. And so it has come down until to-day, by one of our most eminent ministers, in one of our prominent pulpits (and it is not an uncommon thing; it is repeated by somebody almost every Sunday), the men who stand leading the thought and lifting up the world to-day are branded as "infidels" and "atheists." The same old game of epithets played over, age after age,—a game lost every time; a game still untiringly renewed. One might think they would become discouraged in it at last.

These, then, are some samples of the infidelity of the world. But you will notice that this is not a distinction simply of words; it is not simply arguing to carry a point. You must transport yourselves backward, up the ages, if you would appreciate what it means. The cross of Jesus Christ to us to-day has become a centre of glory, like the sun in the heavens; but the cross, when Jesus hung on it, was simply a gibbet, and it meant nothing but infamy. Remember the words of Jesus himself to his people, when he said, "Your fathers stoned the prophets and cast them out; but now that you have grown up to their time, and can appreciate their truth, their power, their glory, and their influence, you build their sepulchres." And so, although the world now builds sepulchres, and raises monuments to, and honors the memory of, Luther, and all the long line of those who have protested and stood out for some higher conception of God and truth, yet remember that they stood as outcast, they stood as infamous in the popular conception of their day, as Thomas Paine, as Theodore Parker, as Channing, as Martineau, as Conway, as the first and most advanced thinkers of this time stand in relation to the thought of to-day.

Let us ask the question and attempt to answer it: What is the meaning of this word of which we have been speaking? What does it mean, historically, to be an infidel? It means nothing more nor less than this: that the man who is independent enough to dare, who has studied enough to conceive, who is intelligent enough to comprehend, he takes something grander and higher than the age around him has as yet laid its hand upon, and he marches with this as a standard one or two or three steps in advance of his time, calling the recreant and slothful world up to him, and looking forward with faith in God for the justification of the truth that he wields. That is what infidelity has meant in all the history of the world.

Conceive how it must be so. You go to a fetish worshipper in Central Africa, or one of the South Sea Islands, and you sneer at the stick or the stone, the toad or the serpent, that stands to him for his conception of divinity, and in his eyes you are a blasphemer, you are an atheist, you are an infidel; you have denied that which to him is sacred and which stands for God. Take the position of Anaxagoras, to whom I have referred, in his relation to early Greek history. The Greeks, in the height of their civilization, believed that the sun was not what we know it to be, a flaming globe around which the earth moves in the heavens, but they believed that the sun was a god. They named it Phœbus, or Apollo, or what not; a god who rode in a flaming chariot, with horses, across the sky from east to west. When, then, Anaxagoras dared to broach the idea, as he did, that the sun was a flaming stone, of course the Greeks took it that he had denied their god. He was then the highest infidel; he was dethroning their deity from the heavens, taking away the object of their worship; and, since they regarded their god as of such disposition as would lead him to punish those that were opposed to him, or sought to overthrow his power, they dared not countenance such a philosopher lest they should bring the wrath of the heavens down upon their cities, their country, their farms, and their homes. They cast him out, then, as a blasphemer, an infidel, an atheist.

Come again to the time of Jesus. What did Jesus do in his relation to the thought of his time? The Jews believed in a god who was simply a magnified man, somewhat grander than Moses, who sat on a throne like an Oriental despot, holding in his hands the thunders, like Olympian Jove; a grand man, sitting in the higher stories of the universe which they called heaven, manifesting himself specially in a temple and on their mountains; and when Jesus, with his higher thought swept the heavens clear of this anthropomorphic conception, and said, "God is not in the temple; God is not on a mountain; God is not on a throne; God is a spirit," not being able to rise up to the grander comprehension of this higher divinity, to their minds he was simply destroying their god. And I dare prophesy to you to-day that precisely this same thing is being played over again before our eyes, and will be recognized in a very few years. Huxley and Spencer and Tyndall, those men who are branded atheist and infidel to-day, are simply giving to the world the most magnificent conception of God that the human mind has ever attained; one so far beyond the common thought of the people that they think it means nothing at all, and they say, "Why; they have taken away our God!" without ever thinking that they have given them anything in return. This, then, is what infidelity means.

And I remark further, this one principle comes out apparent from our discussion; if there is to be ever anything like continuous progress on the part of the human race; if we are not to grant that we have reached the limit and sit down where we are forever, leaving God infinitely in advance of us, then not only have there been infidels in the past, but there must be infidels to-day and in the future. Through the ministry of this kind of infidelity has come every single step of progress that the world has yet attained; for the man who thinks outside of his circle, who dares to give utterance to something that is above and beyond the thought of his time, this man, of course, in the conception of his circle and of that time, becomes a denier of that, in the interest of the larger something that he offers them in exchange. And so I say to you, young men and young women, all that are young enough still for new thought, for progress and for advance, I say to you that you must choose this day what you will be; whether you will be infidel in the thought of those that are behind you, or whether you will be false to the grander revelation of God and of truth that is coming. You stand here on the dividing line between the Past and the To-be. You cannot be faithful to both in the sense in which this word is properly used. I believe, indeed, that the man who is called "infidel," in the popular sense, and who is willing even to accept the name in that sense, is yet not infidel in reality. He is faithful to the life that there has been, as a tree is faithful to its roots; but the faithfulness of a tree to its roots, to its last year's growth, does not mean that it must not throw out a new leaf, or new twig, or advance its branches, and spread abroad on every side. The tree is faithful to the life that made the past when it also goes on to accept the making of a larger and a better future. I say, you must choose whether you will be faithful to the common, thoughtless Orthodoxy of the time about you, or whether you will accept the larger and grander mission of receiving the new truth that God ever holds in his heart ready to bestow upon his children.

You will see that this necessity (and this is my third remark) is grounded in the very nature and constitution of things. Consider it just a moment. All of us admit that God is infinite. It is a part of our common definition of God. We cannot believe there is any God who is not infinite. What follows? We, of course, are finite. The conception which the human mind entertains of God at any particular period of its history must of necessity be a partial conception. It can only approximate the complete idea of God; and we may travel forward this year and next year and the next century and the next millennium, and still, if God be God, he is infinitely in advance of the human race. You will see, then, how logically this inference follows: the man who is nearest to God, who has that conception of him that most closely approximates the truth, he, of necessity, is in advance of the crowd, and must be looked upon by the crowd as faithless to their old-time ideas. That is, he who is nearest to God must forever be an infidel, according to the popular definition of that word. I have one more remark to make, and that is, that we should dislodge from our thoughts entirely the question as to whether, in this sense, we are infidels or not. That man who is intelligent, fair-minded, honest with himself and with the truth,—that man, I say, has no sort of control over the question as to whether, according to popular estimation, he shall be an infidel or not. The honest, intelligent, fair-minded man must separate his judgment utterly from his will. You have no right to say, "I will believe so-and-so." You have no business to say it. You have no right to believe anything except that which is true; and, in order that you may find the truth, you should make your intellect, if you can, like a reflector, a glass; like a clear and placid lake under the heavens above it, to reflect in clearest outlines the images of the facts that surround it. You should make your brain like a balance, that should go up or down, on one side or the other, according as the evidence preponderates, in the slightest degree, one way or the other.

I had the pleasure of hearing Prof. Huxley in New York, the other night, and he gave utterance to one of the grandest sentiments I have ever heard; one that, it seems to me, the honesty of the world must recognize by-and-by as one that every man should adhere to. He says, "We men of science get an awkward habit—no, I will not call it 'awkward,' for it is a valuable habit—of reasoning, so that we cannot accept anything that has for it no evidence;" and he added, "Not only do we regard it as illogical to do so, but immoral." And if you will think of it, and estimate the weight and meaning of these words, you will justify him. It is this acceptance of ten thousand fancies that no one has proved, or can prove, that opens the way for the coming in of all sorts of crudities, distortions, superstitions, things that stand in the way of the world's advance. Huxley was only quoting the advice of St. Paul when he said, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good"; that is, that which stands the proof.

I say, then, that if we are honest in our investigations after truth we must simply abide by that; we must simply seek after that which will stand the test, and then, no matter what the world thinks or has thought, hold this which can prove itself true as being the last utterance of God; for if there be anything in this universe that is divine it must be truth; if there be anything that God has made, it must be truth. Let us not care, then, whether we are called infidel or not.

But, in another sense, there is an infidelity that ought to come to us as an opprobrium and a reproach, by which we ought to be stung, which we ought to resent, or which, rather, we ought not to deserve; and that is the only infidelity which I would advise you to avoid. That is the infidelity that is so common in practical life,—faithlessness to the principles of righteousness in human conduct; the faithlessness that honeycombs the business and commercial life of the world, so that men stand as they do to-day, and as they have stood for the last several years, the one thing that more than any other creates the uncertainty and instability of business life, that makes men stand in their offices looking with suspicion at every buyer that enters their door. They know not whether it is safe to sell to this man or to that man, or who may deliberately fall and bring down not only his own business but theirs, with a crash about their ears, some day. One of our own business men said to me, the other day, when I asked him how business was, "It is as good as I want it to be." That is, he could make all the sales he dared to make. He simply meant that he knew not to whom he could safely sell, or who was to fail and bring disaster, if not ruin, on him next. I say here is infidelity; an infidelity that permeates and honeycombs our civilization; that is not even excluded from the membership of the most respectable churches; an infidelity high in honor; in deacons' chairs many a time. This is the infidelity that we should shun; that we ought to ostracize and fear.

Then there is the infidelity of social life; the falsity to the principles on which rests the stability of our relations with one another; the confidence between man and man; woman and woman; man and woman; the sensitiveness to the principles of right, of truth, of justice, of purity.

And then there is an infidelity in our political life. To indicate what I mean I wish to instance the grand arch-infidel of America, and hold him up to you for just a moment by way of contrast. Thomas Paine, although declaring in the very first words of the book which has made him, with the Orthodox community, infamous, "I believe in one God, and one only, and I hope for happiness in a future life," has occupied, for the writing of this book, a position of preëminent infamy in America for the last hundred years; and yet no man rendered grander service to this country; no man ought to be more cherished or remembered for his patriotic service in "the times that tried men's souls." Do you know that Thomas Paine originated that phrase: "The times that tried men's souls"? He wrote the book which caused the Declaration of Independence to be made, and which, probably, more than any other one thing, secured our separation from Great Britain; a book in such great demand that the presses groaned for months in endeavoring to meet that demand; a book, the income from the circulation of which, to-day, would make a man rich; and yet he steadfastly refused to receive a single cent from the necessities of his time for all the services which he rendered to it; and he put on record this declaration that I wish could be written over the main entrance of the Capitol at Washington, as well as over the State Houses of every State in the land: "I could never reconcile it with my principles to make money either by my politics or my religion"; and when he was clerk of the Pennsylvania Legislature, the first remunerative office which he held in this country, and Washington wrote him that the troops were in need of money, he sent them his whole year's salary, and then among his friends raised a large amount more to meet the wants of the troops. This man, I say, simply because he was not in accord with the popular Orthodoxy of his time, has been made the bugaboo of the century. He stands in his real character an illustrator of the most grand and noble fidelity in all the practical concerns of his political and public life; and yet men who are not worthy to carry his shoes, men who under the name of Christian statesmen are plundering and thieving by the year, will shudder and shake in their shoes at the mention of the name of Thomas Paine! This is the infidelity that we ought to avoid.

And, as my last words (for I have time for nothing more), I charge you, be faithful. Beware of infidelity in the practical matters of conduct, in the real, vital relationships between your souls and your God; and then, following the light of God's truth as fast as it shall be revealed to you,—being careful, indeed, that you are not chasing a will-o'-the-wisp that shall lead you into a swamp,—following the light of God's truth as fast as it shall be revealed to you, do not stop to think or care whether men are shouting their plaudits after you, or whether they are blackening you with the mud of their epithets. Only stand true and firm on the principles of right and of God, and then by-and-by He who is the centre and the source of right, of truth, and of love, whatever the world may do, He to whom you have been faithful, will fold you in His arms as a little child, and be faithful to you forever!—Boston Commonwealth.

A REMARKABLE sermon was recently preached by the English Bishop of Manchester, near Bolton, in the course of which he said everybody deplored the comparative failure of results which Christianity had produced in the world. No one, he supposed, would say to-day that Christianity had done in the world what it might reasonably have been expected to have done. He could not account for the failure. It was easy to say, if it were God's work, it surely must have prospered more than it had done. That was not his way of arguing. He could see, from its own inherent excellency, its own admirable structure, its own entire harmony with and adaptation to every want of Nature, that Christianity must be divine. But if they ask him why it had failed—why there were perhaps fifty thousand out of the eighty thousand people in Bolton and the neighborhood living as if there were no such thing as Christianity—he could not explain it; he could only say it illustrated that important truth of the power which man had in his freedom of will to resist and to quench the sanctifying power of the Holy Ghost.

CELEBRITIES AT HOME.

M. GAMBETTA IN THE CHAUSSEÉ D'ANTIN.

M. Gambetta's recent change of residence may be taken as one of the chief signs of a change in his manner of strengthening his influence with his party and the country. When he lived in the Rue Montaigne the ex-Dictator was before all things the parliamentary chief; and his residence was in what may be called the semi-official quarter. He was within a stone's throw of the Ministry of the Interior, and consequently quite near the Elysée, too near it considering the disposition shown by its successive residents for the perpetration of coups d'état. An order for the arrest of the great leader of the Left could have been executed in ten minutes if the agents had found him at home. In the Rue Montaigne he lived very simply; he lives very simply still; but then it was the simplicity of a party chief who has but a very distant prospect of power. There was a room in his apartment for himself and a few select visitors; but his tenant had evidently not arrived at that stage of the housekeeping of greatness which obliges a man to have open doors for the human race. His secretary alone stood between him and his acquaintance; and the antechamber was so small that it was impossible for the occupant of the adjoining room to say that he was not at home, without the greatest risk of being overheard.

Gambetta has now become a great journalist as well as a great parliamentary leader. In truth, journalism offers him a still better field than the Chamber for the display of those qualities of guidance in which he excels. He has the Italian genius for combination, and that demands for its free exercise a mode of working which does not necessarily betray the author of the work. M. Gambetta is one of the few writers in Paris who never put their names to a line. The République Française is known to be his organ, but no one can distinguish his articles from those with which he may be supposed to have a general sympathy, and he can thus often hit his hardest without enabling his antagonists to identify the author of the blow. They are struck—as he himself was struck, in another fashion, at St. Lazare a year or two ago—by one in a crowd, but by which one it is impossible to say.

He has followed his journal and made his home under the same roof—followed it to nurse its latest offspring, the Petite République Française, which has just come to life. The offices are in the Chaussée d'Antin, and the virtual director-in-chief lives on the premises. But, although he has his own rooms, he may more accurately be said to share those appropriated to his infant charge. He is with the paper all the earlier part of the day, and he returns to it again after he has taken his walks abroad. The great salle de rédaction is virtually his drawing-room, a use for which it seems to have been originally designed. Here, at one vast table, sit the writers who are associated with him in the undertaking, and who are always ready to cover his responsibility with their own. They are physically a "fine body of men," and that fact, it is well-known, counts for something in the composition of a French newspaper staff. The journalism of Paris, in particular, is still journalism militant; and many a smooth-spoken person who calls at the Chaussée d'Antin may be suspected to have come to have a look at a man who has written an article against him before asking him to fight. That first impression can hardly be an unfavorable one for the person observed: the Radicalism of Paris is always scrupulously well-dressed. It is in the traditions of the faith—that all should be meet and seemly in the vestments of its priesthood. The writers who came forward to testify against Pierre Bonaparte at the historic trial that presaged the fall of the Empire would have been positive dandies but for a too general fondness for the wearing of black in the daytime, incompatible with our notions of the habits of the order. Their gloves, if not their writings, were without blemish, and the violence of their opinions was not betrayed by the faintest want of order in the arrangement of their ties. The men who work under M. Gambetta are as these, due allowance being made for the fact that they are not in the witness-box every day, and that necessarily on all but the most solemn occasions their coquetry of neatness is laid aside.

The ex-Dictator's room, the room in which he is more truly at home than in any other in the house, seems to be little better than a former passage converted to its present use. It is almost as sparsely furnished as the cell of one of the monkish transcribers of the Middle Ages—a writing-table, a case of books, a chair for himself, a chair for a visitor, and that is all. Judge of a man's character by these surroundings, and you would say that he had a horror of the superfluous, and you would not be wrong. His Republic, when he has fashioned it in his own way, will not be the République aimable of M. Jules Simon, but the République méthodique. His disposition is shown in the appearance of his work-table. He has no litter of pamphlets, books, manuscripts, about him, although he receives some dozens of them by every post. You see the sheet of paper on which he is now writing, his pen and the inkstand; but all that he has written or read in the past is neatly stowed away, either here or in an adjoining room, with as much precision as if it belonged to the dossiers of the department of police. If he preserves but a tenth of what he receives, no other private collection can be so rich in mémoires pour servir relating to the history of his own time. The extent of his political information at first hand is wonderful. He seems to know everything needful to a leader of parties in regard to the state of the commerce, the finances, the military strength, and the political opinion of France. He is as well served by his unpaid agents as the government by its prefects—better indeed, for the former have no inducement to deception. They need not communicate with him unless they have something to say; and, as they are under no responsibility for the political movements of the districts with which they are acquainted, they escape the temptation to misrepresent them. It would be, of course, an exaggeration to say that he is never wrong in his forecast of the issues of a great question; but he has so often been right that he is at present about the best political "tip" in France. If his inmost thought on the new crisis could be revealed, business men might with confidence speculate on the announcement. He does not, indeed, conceal it from those whom he knows he can trust; but, on principle, he only opens his lips on the subject on the condition of perfect secrecy in the bearer. He is a statesman and a journalist; if the general public wishes to know his views in the one character, let them listen to his speeches; if in the other, let them read his paper. The on dit in regard to his unpublished opinions are, as a rule, to be received with extreme caution, as the mere fact of their being put into circulation tends to convict the person who reports them either of a direct breach of confidence or of deliberate invention. Interviewers may therefore spare themselves the trouble of intruding on his privacy, for Gambetta is not to be drawn.

The prime characteristic of his appearance and manner is robustness. With his burly build he is something of a Danton in frame; his voice is loud, clear, and decisive, and both its accents and the substance of his talk give you the impression—always invigorating to those who are looking to another for their cue—that he is strong enough to disdain finesse. Yet it would, perhaps, be more accurate to say that he is strong enough to disdain the appearance of it—the effect is the same for the majority of mankind. He is really, if one might go behind immediate appearances and judge by what one knows of his past, a politician as rusé as Bismarck or as M. Thiers; only he differs from the latter (and resembles the former) in not flaunting his astuteness before the world. M. Thiers at first mistook the purport of this reserve, and was even disposed to think that there was nothing to be hid. His estimate of Gambetta as a fauz furieux may continue to serve party purposes in this generation, but in the next it will be seen to be wholly wrong. Its author has virtually admitted his error by staking his chance for the next Presidency on the support of the man he so rashly condemned. Grossly as he blundered, however, he was out only by a word, and by hardly so much as a sound. Gambetta is certainly no fauz furieux; but call him a fauz furieux (pour le bon motif), and you will not be far wrong. There is infinitely more difference between the two, it may be observed, than between tweedledum and tweedledee. A fauz furieux, in the sense which it is now applied to him in a political salon in which he is always most warmly received, is one who keeps a cool head for the guidance of a warm heart—one who, without being an actor, has his passion under command, and who knows when the time has come to let it loose, and when and how to stop it in its full career. M. Bonnet Duverdiere for an instance to the contrary, is very decidedly not a fauz furieux, though the other appellation might suit him to a nicety whenever the ex-Dictator's enemies consent to divert it from its present use. Feeling wrath with the Marshal, he spluttered out an absurd accusation about cowardice and cunning at Sedan. M. Gambetta is at least as angry with the head of the State as the President of the Municipal Council, but he takes care to set both of them a perfect example of discretion. He thunders at him in his paper, as from the tribune; but while his every word on the subject is a masterpiece of eloquent denunciation, he takes care to say nothing to put himself in the wrong. Your fauz furieux, indeed, are your only successful rulers of men: there must be passion; or how will you touch the feelings, the imagination of the mass, and obtain your motive-power? There must be the predominant policy; or how are you to direct that power to an end? The two qualities are natural growths of Gambetta's mind; for you cannot be with him five minutes without finding one and the other appear. When you catch fire from your own enthusiasm, he is ready to put you out in an instant by some cold douche of fact or calculation which you have not taken into account.

His character has, of course, been largely modified by circumstances since first he came before the world. The change is shown in his social habits quite as much as in those of public life. The author of one of the best accounts of his earlier days ever written—a period to which the personal knowledge of the present writer does not extend—has told us how the young Gambetta used to employ his somewhat too abundant leisure before he was known to fame. He has taken us into the famous Café Procope to show us "a dark Italian-blooded young Frenchman, blind with one eye, not over well-dressed, but with a voice as sounding as brass. It was the magic of the man, this voice. When silent he looked insignificant enough; but once he began to speak the rather Bohemian crew of friends around him woke to admiration. The desultory customers scattered about the other tables would prick their ears, and the landlord would hurry up in a scared fashion to beg the impetuous orator to speak lower, because—and here a whisper. But he with the ringing voice would shrug his shoulders at the "because," even when there was M. Pietri's name tacked on to it. He held the evening newspaper in his hands with the report of a speech delivered by some one of that twenty-three—say Jules Favre or Ernest Picard—who breasted in the Corps Législatif the mob of M. Rouher's blatant henchmen; and until the speech had been read through from end to end, with sonorous braves at the telling-points, there was no stopping him with dread of eavesdroppers. Then, when the paper was laid down, more drinking of beer would ensue than perhaps the matter strictly required, and the young barrister would blaze out into flashing comments on what he had read, adding what he would do and say if the chance were afforded him. Nor did his Bohemian friends smile at this. Each man among them felt in himself that limitless confidence which impecuniosity begets, and they were also firmly persuaded that if their companion could only find the opportunity, he would soon set men's tongues rattling about him.

The famous café knows Gambetta no more, and the Bohemia of law and letters has to mourn a personal loss in what has been the gain of all the rest of France. He is in a new couche sociale, it was inevitable; and when he goes out now it is among those whose position, while it still permits them to aspire, also enables them to act. He is not at all narrow in his preferences; and he is as often to be met in a house in which he runs a risk of encountering his most vicious antagonist, M. Paul de Cassagnac, on the threshold, as in those of his own political set. It is good for both of them, for, if it does not bring them together in speech, it compels each to learn to listen to what the other has to say. When a charming woman presides over a drawing-room debate, there is no need of a President's bell. Those who have derived their chief knowledge of M. Gambetta from intercourse of this kind declare with satisfaction that he is a patriot, a very decided patriot, and, by consequence, not at all a cosmopolitan in sentiment—that his first thought is for France, and that he is a good deal less concerned for the welfare of her neighbors than most others of his school. This trait of common sense, perhaps, may be due to his familiarity with Englishmen and English modes of thought. In all that he has taken from us, however, he has not been a blind receiver of good things; our system of decentralization, for instance, is but one of many benefits for which it would be difficult to induce him to hold out his hand.—London World, July 4, 1877.

DARWINISM IN ENGLAND.

ADDRESS OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION'S PRESIDENT—CONCLUSION OF AN ARGUMENT BY PROF. ALLAN THOMPSON—UNIFORMITY OF THE PLAN OF ANIMAL LIFE—THE HYPOTHESIS OF EVOLUTION A NECESSITY OF SCIENCE.

The following are the concluding portions of the President's address delivered on Aug. 15, at Plymouth (England), by Prof. Allan Thompson before the British Association for the Advancement of Science. A large portion of the address was technical in its character, dealing chiefly with the embryonic changes of living forms. From first to last the address refers to the doctrine of evolution of animal life as having secured general acceptance. The extract is from the full report of Nature :—

"But I am warned by the lapse of time that I must not attempt to pursue these illustrations further. In the statement which I have made of some of the more remarkable phenomena of organic production—too long, I fear, for your endurance, but much too brief to do justice to the subject,—it has been my object mainly to show that they are all more or less closely related together by a chain of similarity of a very marked and unmistakable character; that in their simplest forms they are indeed, in so far as our powers of observation enable us to know them, identical; that in the lower grades of animal and vegetable life they are so similar as to pass, by insensible gradations, into each other; and that in the higher forms, while they diverge most widely in some of their aspects in the bodies belonging to the two great kingdoms of organic nature, and in the larger groups distinguishable within each of them, yet it is still possible from the fundamental similarity of the phenomena, to trace in the transitional forms of all their varieties one great general plan of organization.

"In its simplest and earliest form that plan comprises a minute mass of the common nitrogenous hydrocarbon compound to which the name of protoplasm has been given, exhibiting the vital properties of assimilation, reproduction, and irritability; the second stage in this plan is the nucleated and enclosed condition of the protoplasmic mass in the organized cell. We next recognize the differentiation of two productive elements, and their combination for the formation of a more highly-endowed organizing element in the embryonic germ-sphere or cell; and the fourth stage of advance in the complexity of the organizing phenomena is in the multiplication of the fertilized embryo-cell, and its conversion into continuous organized strata, by further histological changes in which the morphological foundations of the future embryo or new being are laid.

"I need not now recur to the further series of complications in the formative process by which the bilaminar blastoderm is developed, and becomes trilaminar or quadrilaminar, but only recall to your recollection that while these several states of the primordial condition of the incipient animal pass insensibly into each other, there is a pervading similarity in the nature of the histological changes by which they are reached, and that in the production of the endless variations of form assumed by the organs and systems of different animals in the course of their development, the process of cell-production, multiplication, and differentiation remains identical. The more obvious morphological changes are of so similar a character throughout the whole, and so nearly allied in the different larger groups, that we are led to regard them as placed in some very close and intimate relation to the inherent properties of the organic substance which is their seat, and ever-present influence of the vital conditions in which alone these properties manifest themselves.

"The formative or organizing property, therefore, resides in the living substance of every organized cell, and in each of its competent molecules, and is a necessary part of the physical and chemical constitution of the organizing elements in the conditions of life; and it scarcely needs to be said that these conditions may be as varied as the countless numbers of the molecules which compose the smallest particles of their substance. But, setting aside all speculation of a merely pangenetic kind, it appears to me that no one could have engaged in the study of embryological development for any time without becoming convinced that the phenomena which have been ascertained as to the first origin and formation of textures and organs in any individual animal are of so uniform a character as to indicate forcibly a law of connection and continuity between them; nor will his study of the phenomena of development in different animals have gone far before he is equally strongly convinced of the similarity of plan in the development of the larger groups, and, to some extent, of the whole. I consider it impossible, therefore, for any one to be a faithful student of embryology, in the present state of science, without at the same time becoming an evolutionist. There may still be many difficulties, some inconsistencies, and much to learn, and there may remain beyond much which we shall never know; but I cannot conceive any doctrine professing to bring the phenomena of embryonic development within a general law which is not, like the theory of Darwin, consistent with their fundamental identity, their endless variability, their subjugation to varying external influences and conditions, and with the possibility of the transmission of the vital conditions and properties, with all their variations, from individual to individual, and, in the long lapse of ages, from race to race.

"I regard it, therefore, as no exaggerated representation of the present state of our knowledge to say that the ontogenetic development of the individual in the higher animals repeats in its more general character, and in many of its specific phenomena, the phylogenetic development of the race. If we admit the progressive nature of the changes of development, their similarity in different groups, and their common characters in all animals, nay, even in some respects in both plants and animals, we can scarcely refuse to recognize the possibility of continuous derivation in the history of their origin; and however far we may be, by reason of the imperfection of our knowledge of paleontology, comparative anatomy, and embryology, from realizing the precise nature of the chain of connection by which the actual descent has taken place, still there can be little doubt remaining in the minds of any unprejudiced student of embryology that it is only by the employment of such an hypothesis as that of evolution that farther investigation in these several departments will be promoted so as to bring us to a fuller comprehension of the most general law which regulates the adaptation of structure to function in the universe."

BRIGHAM YOUNG.

By the death of Brigham Young the most capable and notorious religious impostor America has produced is removed. His career illustrated the advantage which a shrewd man may acquire by working upon the imaginations and weaknesses of the ignorant. That he had great executive ability cannot be denied. When this is said all is said that may be said in his favor. Wealth and the gratification of his lust were the prime motives of his action, and in the attainment of his ends he gratified the passion for power which was a ruling constituent of his nature. He was capable of being a despot, and he was one in a degree that it will hardly fall to the lot of another to enjoy. His name is inseparably associated all over the world with an imposture as shallow, as scandalous, and as degrading as ever rose to prominence in a civilized nation. He has achieved fame as one of the organizers of a commonwealth of iniquity, which is in itself infamous.

But for him the congregation of fanatics which Joseph Smith collected would in all probability have perished long ago. They were a feeble folk, who could never have endured the persecutions they provoked if the adventurer, Young, had not given them the benefit of his talent and executive faculty. He was a slightly educated Vermonter, who early drifted away from commonplace surroundings in search of an opportunity to exercise his craving appetite for leadership and nomination. The strange peculiarities of the new sect of latter-day saints appealed to his unregulated desires with such effect that he early enrolled himself as one of them. How much of conviction and how much of calculation there was in this act it is impossible to say; but it was not long before he found opportunity to exercise such talents as he had, by which he was brought into prominence among them. He joined them in Ohio, and was with them throughout the rough experiences in Missouri and afterwards at Nauvoo, where Smith was killed and Young chosen to be the head of the church, and subsequently dignified as a god, next in rank to Jesus, who was inferior to Adam. It was at Nauvoo that polygamous or rather adulterous practices were begun by Smith, although after the pretended revelation was received authorizing the faithful to have more than one wife, it was authoritatively denied to the outside world.

Brigham Young led the saints to Utah, and selected the great Salt Lake basin as their future home until such time as they should return to New Jerusalem in Missouri. In Utah they were for a time secure from the influences of decency and civilization, and the doctrine of polygamy was openly proclaimed as a part of their faith. Missionary operations were begun on a systematic scale, extending over this country and Europe, but were most successful among the ignorant classes of the Old World. All who could be induced to immigrate were encouraged and assisted to come to Salt Lake City, and before the Pacific Railroad was built the valley had a Mormon population of over fifty thousand, the greater part being ignorant and bigoted men and women, who were subject to the absolute rule of Brigham Young. Nominally there were councils and presidencies and quorums which had a share in the government; but in fact it was an essential despotism, of which Young was prophet, priest, and king. That he showed great capacity in planning, organizing, and building up the city must be recognized. He ruled firmly, preserved order, doubtless secured as much happiness and prosperity as was compatible with the conditions, and for many years was almost unmolested. One dream of his ambition was, however, disappointed. He desired to be independent of the United States, and when he could not accomplish this he organized a State government and applied for admission to the Union. If he had succeeded we should, before this time, have seen the doctrine of State rights and State sovereignty invoked to protect the security of another peculiar institution. Congress refused to admit the State, but created a Territory, of which the prophet was made governor. He exercised his authority in an arbitrary way, but was not much interfered with until he showed a disposition to prevent anybody but Mormons from living in the country. In President Buchanan's time it became necessary to despatch a considerable army to the Territory to compel him to relinquish his authority and suffer another governor to assume the office. During the war the Mormon settlement was closely watched, for naturally their leaders sympathized with the enemies of the Union.

Young had accumulated immense wealth from tithes and business operations. To all practical purposes he commanded the possessions of the entire community. Tithes were always large and rigidly exacted. Joseph Smith, before he died was judged to be worth more than a million dollars, exacted from his devoted dupes, and Young's accumulations were probably much larger. Of wives he had sixteen, besides an uncertain number of connections who were "sealed" to him for his felicity here and theirs hereafter, as they were taught to believe. His youngest son by his legal wife, a man of education and wide travel, who inherits in a large degree his father's business talent, who once renounced polygamy, but has recanted in order to be his father's successor, inherits the possession, and was some time ago named as the President in case of his father's death. Whether he will be able to perpetuate the prosperity of the Mormon Church remains to be seen. It is not all harmony in that community, and of late years all the Prophet's authority and address were required to prevent its being riven by dissensions. A portion of the people have never accepted the revelation sanctioning polygamy. Since the building of the railway to the Pacific and the discovery of mineral wealth in the territory there has been a considerable increase of population, and the presence of the Gentiles, with the diffusion of intelligence, has made a large proportion of the Mormon Church restless and ashamed under their restraints and disgraces. A new removal out of sight of the rest of the world has been contemplated. That, or a dissolution in the not distant future, appears to be inevitable. But whatever happens to the Mormon Church hereafter, Brigham Young's place in the roll of artful and corrupting impostors is assured.—Boston Advertiser.

THE MOONS OF MARS.

A LETTER FROM PROFESSOR NEWCOMB—FAVORABLE POSITION OF MARS FOR OBSERVATIONS—THE SMALLEST KNOWN CELESTIAL BODIES—VALUE OF THE DISCOVERY TO ASTRONOMICAL SCIENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE:

Sir,—Some particulars respecting the newly-discovered satellites of Mars may not be uninteresting to the readers of the Tribune. The first question which will naturally arise is, Why have these objects not been seen before? The answer is that Mars is now nearer to the earth than it has been at any time since 1845, when the great telescopes of the present had hardly begun to be known. The next opportunity for seeing them occurred in 1862, but we may suppose they were then not especially sought for with the two or three telescopes which alone would show them. The next favorable opposition was in 1875, but Mars was then so far south of the equator that it could not well be observed in our latitudes. The present opposition is about the best possible for observation in the middle latitudes of our hemisphere, because the very smallest deviation from the greatest possible approach to the earth arises from the opposition occurring a few days after the planet reaches its position, and this throws it farther north in declination than it would be at the time of absolutely nearest approach. The next opposition will occur in October, 1879, and there is some hope that the satellites may then again be observed with the Washington telescope. During the ten years following they will probably be entirely invisible, with all the telescopes of the world, because, owing to the great eccentricity of the orbit of Mars, the planet will be too far away at the times of opposition. In 1892 a favorable opposition will again occur. During the present year it is hardly likely that the satellites will be visible after October.

Of the two satellites now discovered, the most extraordinary feature is the proximity of the inner one to the planet, and the rapidity of its revolution. The shortest period hitherto known is that of the inner satellite of Saturn—twenty-two and a half hours. But the inner satellite of Mars goes round in seven hours and thirty-eight minutes. Its distance from the centre of the planet is about six thousand miles, and from the surface less than four thousand. If there are any astronomers on Mars with telescopes and eyes like ours, they can readily find out whether this satellite is inhabited, the distance being less than one-sixtieth that of the moon from us.

That kind of near approach to simple relationships between the times of revolution is found here which we see in the satellites of Jupiter and Saturn. The inner satellite of Mars revolves in very nearly one-fourth the period of the outer one, these times being:

Outer satellite, 30h. 14m.

One fourth this period, 7h. 38m.

Period of inner satellite, 7h. 38m.

These satellites may also be put down as by far the smallest heavenly bodies yet known. It is hardly possible to make anything like a numerical estimate of their diameters, because they are seen in the telescope only as faint points of light. But one might safely agree to ride round one of them in a railway-car between two successive meals, or to walk round in easy stages during a very brief vacation. In fact, supposing the surface of the outer one to have the same reflecting power with that of Mars, its diameter cannot be much more than ten miles, and may be less.

Altogether, these objects must be regarded as among the most remarkable of the solar system. Not the least service which Professor Hall's discovery will render to astronomy is that of an exact determination of the mass of Mars, and a consequent simplification of the theories of the four inner planets. The most profound researches on this subject hitherto made are those of Le Verrier, and we may regard his mass of Mars as the product of a century of observations, and several years of laborious calculation by a corps of computers. From Professor Hall's measures on four nights there is obtained by ten minutes' computation

$$\frac{\text{Mass of Mars}}{\text{Mass of the Sun}} = \frac{3,090,000}{\text{Mass of the Sun}}$$

This is more certain than that declared by Le Verrier with so great labor. The latter was about one three-millionth that of the sun, so that the agreement of the two results is quite striking.

SIMON NEWCOMB.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 22, 1877.

VEGGIS, the favorite barber of the Viceroy of Egypt, is dead. It was said of this important personage that he "had the Evil Eye," and though he learned to treat the matter as a joke, the consequences of this reputation were not always pleasant. One morning, as he was leaving the vice-regal chambers, Ismail called out to him: "Stop on the landing of the stairs." Veggis stopped, and the order was not reversed till the Viceroy had gone out for his usual airing. This order was repeated every morning for two years, and Veggis had to submit. At the end of that time, however, the Viceroy said to him one morning, "You may go right home for the future, after you have finished your work." Seeing his master in a good humor, the barber ventured to ask the reason of this long and weary command. "I will tell you," said Ismail. "The fact is, I was informed you had the Evil Eye. To prove this I tried an experiment which has succeeded perfectly, and I see that my informants were right. You bewitched my staircases, and every one of my enemies who has come up those stairs has since died. It's all over now, and I am much obliged to you." Veggis was an antiquary. He was said to be the owner of the famous copper globe made for Alexander the Great, that this distinguished warrior might learn geography.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

AN INVOCATION.

We move in diverse ways to thee,
Eternal Mystery profound,
As men, lost in uncertainty,
Diverge to find the surer ground.
We raise our hands, and give thee praise
In words that inharmonious seem;
Yet, through the discord of our lays,
Thou risest clear, the one great theme.

As waits the sun the morning gray,
So wait we thy informing light;
Our reason is as dawning day,—
Is but a glimmer in the night.
And yet, as infant eyes we hide
From too great light, perchance may we,
Till stronger grown, in peace abide,
And live in lenient charity.

CASH RECEIPTS.

FOR THE WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 1.

J. M. Barr, $2.05; E. H. Sargent, 35 cents; A. M. Comstock, 50 cents; John Jurgens, 80 cents; E. C. Walker, $3.44; J. W. Roberts, $1.50; Albertson Wright, $6; D. T. Harriott, $5; American News Co., $19.88; Wm. H. Allen, $3.30; T. W. Brigham, $3.20; G. A. Ellis, $3.20; S. K. Hazleton, $1.00; E. W. Pendleton, 10 cents; R. W. Jess, $6; D. E. Mayo, $10; Miss M. S. Devereux, $10; C. D. B. Mills, $3.20; Isaac Russell, $3.20; William Sterns, $3.20; Z. G. Wallingford, $3.20; A. O. Dunham, $1.70; Geo. W. Mead, $3.20; Reuben Fribley, $1.00; Geo. W. Baxter, $1; Lizzie Richards, $2; Martha White, $1; J. W. Fowler, $5; J. L. Fort, 40 cents; Harry Wheeler, 50 cents.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on Boston or New York. Checks on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

The Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 6, 1877.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FAY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

It is with deep regret that we are called upon to record the death of Rev. Thomas J. Mumford, editor of the Boston Christian Register, at his residence in Dorchester, on August 29. Possessed of a very unusual aptitude for journalism, and gifted especially with a brilliant wit (which its victims sometimes felt to verge on injustice), he was most successful in his editorial labors, and did much to increase the prosperity of the paper with which he was connected. It will be hard indeed to find a substitute so exceptionally skilled in the difficult art of "paraphrasing." But it was his sunny, affectionate, and most lovable disposition, his warm and faithful heart, his utter innocence of any intent to wound even when his love of fun tempted him into sallies decidedly aggravating to their objects, which endeared him to many and will make him long and tenderly remembered. He was most constant and true in private friendship, as we have excellent cause to know. At our ordination on August 31, 1864, Mr. Mumford made the "ordaining prayer"; and we shall never forget the sweet fervor, simplicity, and beauty of his words, or the touching religiousness of his spirit. If the "laying-on of hands" by a true minister of Christ could indeed bring the Holy Ghost, we see not how we could ever have strayed so far from the fold. But no divergence of religious views ever cooled our mutual good-will; and it is with deep sorrow that we say good-by to one of the gentlest and best of humankind.

IN RESUMING our editorial labors, we cannot refrain from thanking our friend Mr. Morse for the admirable fidelity and ability with which he has edited THE INDEX during the last month, and especially for the too kind words with which he alluded to us at the close of the last issue. It was our wish that he should be untrammelled by any traditions or directions, but rather be just as free as we had always been to edit the paper according to his own ideas of what is right and true. In no other way could he do himself or his readers justice; and we rejoice that he followed the bent of his own mind, without seeking in any degree to consult ours. That he has done excellently well, is patent to all; and we are thoroughly glad that he has given his attention so largely to that which most interests him, without stopping to consider how far his views agreed with ours. This is exactly as it ought to be, and as we wanted it to be; and though we have dissented pretty stoutly in our own mind from some of the opinions he has expressed during the past four weeks, we have seen vastly more to delight in, to admire, and to applaud. Every word he has written has been the expression of a mind of transparent honesty and truthfulness, steeped in the love of liberty and illumined with a kindness as radiant as it is rare. Who cares whether his thoughts and ours wholly agree? Not we, assuredly. It is enough that what he thinks and says is well worth thinking about, and that the readers of THE INDEX need no cautious sifter of thoughts to do their thinking for them beforehand. They have certainly gained not a little by our month's absence; and as we have gained to a considerable extent also, we step into the treadmill once more with a cheerful conviction that nobody is the worse off because for a brief season we ran away from it to recruit our wasted energies.

MOUNT DESERT ISLAND.

For over twenty years this wonderful little insular Switzerland of America has been attracting public attention more and more, as a spot quite unique on the Atlantic shore for combined beauty and grandeur. Lying close to the coast of Maine about one hundred and ten miles east of Portland, and containing about one hundred square miles of surface, Mount Desert Island strikingly resembles the human lungs in its general configuration, with the eastern and western portions divided into lobes by a long and narrow inlet of the sea, which penetrates into the very centre of the island and is called Somes Sound. Enormous masses of granite rise in parallel ranges to the altitude of mountains, running uniformly from north to south, and separated from each other by deep gorges or wild and lovely lakes. Seen from either north or south at a sufficient distance, these mountains, six of which are over a thousand feet high (the highest of all, Green Mountain, being over fifteen hundred feet), present a sharp, serrated horizon of unsurpassed boldness and beauty. They all slope gradually towards the west; but their eastern faces are jagged and steep, forming in many cases precipices which it would be absolutely impossible to climb. Dog Mountain, for instance, confronts Somes Sound with a perpendicular wall of granite six hundred feet sheer down to the water's edge; while the eastern sides of Newport and Green Mountains, if not quite so steep, are loftier and nearly as impracticable of ascent. Only the eagles, one of which, white-headed and white-tailed, with great black pinions, we saw soaring up the craggy side of Mount Robinson in solitary state, can scale in safety the battlements of these mountain fastnesses.

The lakes which lie imbedded among the numerous spurs of the chief peaks are wonderfully beautiful. Echo Lake, viewed from the top of Carter's Nubble, lay blue as a sapphire in a setting of emerald; and if the light skiff of the "Lady of the Lake" had shot out upon its smooth waters from the shelter of the surrounding woods, it would have seemed in perfect harmony with the lovely landscape. On the other hand, the Upper Hadlock Pond, skirted by the road which winds through the gloomy ravine between Mounts Sargent and Brown (a very lonely road which no one should fall to ride over who would behold the most impressive scenery in the interior of the island), fascinates the imagination by the desolateness of the sterile and lofty crags that gird it on all sides, by the impenetrable mystery of its dark and unruffled surface, and by the singular weirdness imparted to it by the abundance of sedges, reeds, and lily-pads that make it seem the refuge of water-snakes and nameless sublacustrine monsters. Surely there cannot be found on this side of the Atlantic a wild mountain tarn that better tallies with what one dreams of the solitary Highland Loch.

From the summit of Green Mountain (or Newport) a prospect spreads before the eye that simply beggars description. The mainland, with the Gouldsboro Hills, Blue Hill, and the Camden Hills redeeming from tameness the long horizon that stretches from east to west on the north; Frenchman's Bay with its numerous islands to the east, and Point Schoodic far beyond; the Cranberries, Isle au Haut, and the countless islands to the west and southwest; the blue and illimitable expanse of the ocean to the south, looked down upon from a height of fifteen hundred feet above its own level, and studded with innumerable sails whose swiftest motion is absolute motionlessness at such a distance,—all this is but the frame enclosing a picture of surpassing and enchanting loveliness. The broad summit of the mountain must be faithfully explored, seizing a fresh view from every minor peak. To the south lay the exquisite valley of Otter Creek, smiling and green, dotted with farm-houses, with the sea-mists alternately advancing and receding, to retire completely at last only as the sun was declining towards the western horizon, and even then permitting only a view of the ocean which left the actual sky-line a subject of jocular controversy impossible of settlement. Across a lovely foreground of green, here lay Bar Harbor, with the chain of the Five Porcupines mapped out clearly beyond; there the Gorge, with Newport Mountain rising loftily behind it,—Eagle Lake, and the rolling hill country in its rear,—Mounts Sargent and Pemetic, cutting off the neighboring summits,—Southwest Harbor, and bits of Somes Sound, and all the bewildering archipelago at its mouth. But it is useless, we fear, to attempt giving even a faint idea of the matchless panorama here unfolded to the vision. No one who has not seen it can imagine the glories it reveals.

And the shore, with its mighty masses of rock piled up confusedly into towering and overhanging precipices, seamed with rifts through which the breakers thunder evermore, hollowed into caverns which swallow up the waves only to spew them forth in sheets of foam,—how can pen or tongue do justice to such things as these? Otter Cliffs with the vast "Detached Rock," split off to its base by a straight perpendicular chasm from the cliff to which it belongs, and seemingly built up out of huge blocks by some baby giant in his sport; Schooner Head with its "Spouting Horn," into which, after a storm, the surf dashes under an arch of solid rock to shoot up in spray, through a cleft behind it, far above the top of the lofty crag itself; Anemone Cove, extending from fifty to seventy-five feet into the very bowels of the cliff, accessible only at low tide, holding then small pools of water in which living sea-anemones, muscles, barnacles, star-fish, eels, etc., can be studied at leisure, and in its deep recesses receiving a tiny stream of cool fresh water most grateful to the thirsty palate; the Ovens, a series of smaller caves in cliffs of most exquisite coloring and shape; and, above all, Great Head, the very prince of rocky promontories, magnificent beyond imagination in the boldness and grandeur with which it confronts the angry sea, and opposes its enormous walls of broken and overhanging granite to the endless assaults of its enemy,—these are but a portion of the wonders of this most wonderful island, which can only be known thoroughly by months and years of patient exploration.

One little picture we must indeed try to paint. Seat yourself in fancy on a rock at the rear of one of the cool caves known as the Ovens, and let the irregular, ample arch of its gateway be the frame of the picture; note the long pebbly beach, with its fine slaty color, sloping gradually to the water's edge before you, where the becalmed waters of Frenchman's Bay kiss the shore with a low plash, but without a noticeable ripple; observe the glassy smoothness of the mirror in which the sky, mostly hidden from view by the rocky frame of your picture, reflects its own bright azure and snow-white cumulous clouds without a flaw; and, beyond this glorious daguerreotype of the heavens on the sea, admire the far distant coast of the mainland, and the noble outline of the Gouldsboro Hills, softened by that beautiful haze which is erroneously supposed to be the peculiar charm of the "Indian summer." Is not that a picture to be hung up in one's "chambers of imagery," and resorted to for imperishable delight when the hand of duty relaxes for a while its tenacious grasp?

But it would take a volume to record, however inadequately, the impressions left on our mind by this island-epitome of all earth's loveliness, during ten blessed days of rest from ever-aggressive care,—rest made a thousandfold more restful by pleasant companionships and the renewal of sacredly cherished intimacies of early years. Let us close with a little incident which conveys a radical lesson of no slight significance.

Climbing the rugged steep of Newport Mountain one afternoon, in company with a young lady whose light and agile foot made pastime of what would have exhausted many a stalwart man, the broken branch of an old stump caught our companion's dress and inflicted an inconvenient rent. This impeded her progress somewhat over the rough pathway of the ascent; and, while clambering up the inclined plane of a broad granite ledge, we expressed a regret that we were unprovided with one of those pocket-pincushions which gentlemen sometimes carry, and had not even a single pin that might obviate the inconvenience. The words had not fairly passed our lips, when a bright metallic gleam from the smooth face of the rock just in front of us arrested our attention; and, stooping, we picked up a blue-steel pin of the finest quality! This we immediately presented to our fair fellow-climber, with congratulations on the good fortune which made even Mount Desert rocks minister to her needs. Probably Newport Mountain could have been raked and swept from base to cope without yielding a duplicate of this timely pin, which had undoubtedly been dropped by some other lady who had ascended to the summit before us. The finding of it at the very nick of time, when we had just expressed a particular desire for it, was one of those extremely rare coincidences which nevertheless do occasionally occur, and which, if we had only prayed for it, would have been triumphantly cited as a signal instance of the Divine answer to prayer,—as a "special providence" which ought to confound the sceptic with shame and confusion! Nobody, however, will be so sanguine as to aver that the Almighty intended this pin as a response to the informal and merely constructive petition of a careless wish, or that it is likely he busies himself in scattering pins about to anticipate the wants of in-commoded mountaineers. Yet the countless stories of miraculous answers to prayer have seldom so good a basis as this little incident affords; and it is worth remembering as a probable explanation of many of those marvellous tales which our Orthodox friends expect to overwhelm the radical's incredulity. The rigorous universality of natural law is not to be discredited by any such coincidence, however amazing; and the next time our faith in Nature is attacked with a narrative of supernatural interposition, we shall retort by rehearsing this wonderful history of "The Pin of Newport Mountain."

SECLAR SCHOOLS.

When the entire secularization of our public schools is advocated, many persons are at once seized with an apprehension that the schools are to be made "irreligious and godless," and that the religious education of the young is to be utterly neglected. As if the brief, formal religious exercise at the opening of our schools were all the religious education which the youth of America receive! In point of fact, though this brief exercise is doubtless an immense aid in maintaining certain popular theological beliefs and assumptions, it is capable of imparting very little genuine religious culture. It may be questioned, indeed, whether such an exercise, in which no questions can be asked or answered, does not tend to present religion to youthful minds as a very technical and mechanical thing instead of a living power, and therefore in the end work directly against a true religious education. If this short service of worship were to be omitted, and our public schools were to be devoted wholly to that kind of instruction which is admitted to be their chief office to give, we should then be doing, with respect to religion in the schools, what our fathers did for it in the National Constitution and Government,—leaving it, as they said, where it belonged, to the nurturing care of the home and the Church, in order that freedom of conscience might suffer no detriment. And, since the voluntary system of Church-support has been amply vindicated as wise and safe by its success in America, there is no reason to fear that the religious culture of the young would suffer if the State were to withdraw the slight provision now made for it in the few opening moments of Scriptural reading and prayer in the public schools.

Again, it is sometimes objected to the secularization of the schools that it is impossible to carry the principle thoroughly and strictly into practice; that religion is so universal in its relations that it is impracticable to teach anything without trenching on the religious domain; that history and literature and the very reading-books will have to be expurgated of all references to religion and to theological ideas; if the schools are to be consistently secular; that even natural science, as botany, astronomy, physiology, cannot be taught except as a dry and lifeless mechanism, a mere bundle of dead facts, without touching that mysterious secret of power and life which is hidden, yet evident, in the infinitely little and the infinitely great, and runs through the whole vast web of material and human phenomena, and which theology names Deity. But this objection rests upon a caricature of secularism rather than its true character. Secularism has to do with all the interests of human life on earth, in distinction from those ecclesiastical theories (with which the Christian religion has been specially identified) that regard the future life as the one grand concern of mankind. Everything comes into secular instruction which belongs to the domain of natural, material, or human phenomena, and knowledge of which may be acquired by man's natural faculties. Even the history of religion and of religious ideas may be studied from a secular point of view,—though naturally it is not a branch of learning that would come so early as to be adapted to the age of children in our public schools; and in any event, it is a kind of study which, on account of its close connections with sectarian views, had much better be left to private culture. But if any kind of knowledge is secular, it is certainly natural science. And secularism does not and cannot teach it as a lifeless bundle of dry facts. It must show the phenomena with all their relations, energies, forces, precisely as they disclose themselves to the human eye and mind. If the facts teach of a boundless power and life and unity, so be it. It is still secular knowledge and has a legitimate place in public instruction. It only becomes sectarian, to be debarrd from the public schools, when the teacher should proceed to dictate to his class that all this proves the Hebrew or the Christian or the Hindoo or the Confucian scheme of theology to be correct. That is a kind of teaching—this drawing of a theological inference—which belongs to the province of the special Church and creed. But let the great facts of the universe, in all their relations and powers, be freely taught just as they are: they are a monopoly of no sect nor creed.

Again, it is objected that secularism would not only make the schools irreligious, but would make the teachers so. Secularism, however, by no means requires that public school-teachers should be void of religious faith nor of specific religious and theological beliefs,—only that they shall not bias nor indocinate their pupils' minds by their beliefs. The secular principle asks only what are the mental and moral qualifications of teachers, and not what may be their ecclesiastical relations or their religious creeds. It demands that those teachers shall be employed who are best qualified intellectually and morally for their positions, without reference to their theological attitude, whether Orthodox or heterodox.

But what I suppose thinking people mean when they object that secularism of the public schools implies teachers of a non-religious or irreligious type of mind, is that a deep and genuine religious faith gives a certain spiritual flavor and beauty to character, a certain moral grace and refinement, which is a subtle but most important element in educational influence, and of which for youthful minds to be deprived would be a grievous loss indeed. For one I am ready to say that I would rather have my own children under the instruction of a teacher having this element of character, though such teacher belonged to the Roman Catholic Church, than under the care of a teacher void of this element of character, though the latter teacher were of my own theological views,—provided the Catholic teacher could accomplish the difficult but not impossible feat of separating this refining influence of a consecrated and beautiful character from a habit of ecclesiastical propagandism. But this kind of educational influence, so precious when it can be secured, is not dependent on this or that mode of theological conviction, and is not under the ban of secularism. It is a spiritual quality of life belonging to religion which has become character, and not to that kind of religion which is enmeshed in the web of theological opinion. We know it and confess its beneficent power when we meet it, though it may not be easy to describe it. I have seen it in connection with Orthodox forms of faith, and I have seen it in connection with forms of faith which in Orthodox circles would be pronounced dangerously heretical and infidel.

Now there is and can be no law against religion going into our schools in this high form of consecrated character and life. On the contrary, this is just what we want, and must if possible have, in all educators of the young. We can and should keep out of the public schools the sectarian teaching of the creeds; but we cannot wish to keep out that which is the best fruit of all religious faith, the serene and constant influence of practical goodness. The formal services of worship may go and should go; but the "beauty of holiness," which shines in the face and graces every act and word of a true and devoted teacher who has this primal qualification of character, is a power in the schools that makes for righteousness, stronger than any recitation of Scripture or prayer. Against this kind of religion in the public schools secularism makes no protest; and with such secularism, we may be sure, our schools and our children are safe.

MR. BABCOCK'S COMPLAINT.

Rev. J. M. L. Babcock's article in THE INDEX of August 16, to which of course we could not reply in our absence, contained nothing which there seems the least need of noticing except his complaint that we "misrepresented" him, in attributing to him the opinion that "it is the right of the trainmen to say who shall take their places when they strike." This complaint we consider to be both puerile and disingenuous.

In the first place, we republished the full report of his speech in the same issue that contained our comments, that all might see for themselves whether these comments were fair or unfair; we simply criticised the speech as we understood it then and still understand it.

In the next place (and this is the main point), Mr.

Babcock carefully avoids disavowing, in his article, the opinion which he claims it was a "misrepresentation" to attribute to him in his speech. If he will declare without ambiguity or equivocation that his real opinion is that "the trainmen have not the right to say who shall take their places when they strike," we will promptly confess that we have wofully misunderstood him, and therefore unintentionally misrepresented him. But until he does this, we shall believe that we represented his opinion on this point exactly as he meant his hearers to understand him at the time. His speech was utterly meaningless on any other construction. He said explicitly: "It was the right of these men to be heard by these railroad officials. And what was left them but to resort to a species of riot or war? They strike and blockade the road as the only resort left them." What is this, if not to adopt and defend the opinion in question? It is a conclusion to which we are irresistibly compelled that Mr. Babcock meant to be understood then and there as asserting the right of the strikers to drive off all men who volunteered to take their places; but that now, when called to account for the monstrous immorality of such a doctrine before another audience, he neither dares to maintain his ground boldly nor yet to abandon it frankly. In all this we find precious little to respect. We believe we did not "misrepresent" him in the slightest degree in what we wrote; and we shall remain of this mind until he explicitly disavows the opinion which we then attributed to him after a very careful consideration of his speech. Let him show his hand openly. If he admits that "the trainmen have no right to say who shall take their places when they strike," we shall be swift to withdraw our "misrepresentation," though we shall think that he was himself to blame for it by talking to the crowd in a way that necessitated such an understanding of his words. But if it was and is his real opinion that the trainmen do possess such a right, then we consider it pretty small business to whine over a "misrepresentation" which only represented him as holding his real opinion.

THE WALCOTT MEETING.

ARTICLES OF ASSOCIATION OF A NEW ORGANIZATION.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Enclosed I send you the Articles of Association of the new organization formed at the Walcott meeting, August 17, 18, and 19, and the names of the officers, and ask a place for the same in THE INDEX. As your readers who were not present may desire to know something as to the result of the meeting, I will say, what I think was the unanimous opinion of those present, it was a grand success. The audience numbered not less than sixteen hundred, and a large number of those were earnest, intelligent persons from various sections of the country who came to the meeting, as many expressed themselves, to organize for practical work. It was evidently one of the most encouraging meetings to the friends of free-thought and secular government ever held in this country.

Mr. J. M. Coe, the host of the occasion, had made the best of preparations for this large gathering. It had been advertised more extensively than any meeting of the kind ever had been, and during the whole session nothing transpired to mar the harmony of the occasion. The meeting was held in a beautiful grove on the premises of Mr. Coe, and under the tent belonging to the County Fair of the county. Mr. C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, presided, and Mr. Edgar M. Sellon, of Wyoming County, was Secretary. Speeches were made by Horace Seaver and J. P. Mendum, of the Investigator; D. M. Bennett, of the Truth Seeker; C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse; Giles B. Stebbins, of Detroit; J. H. Harter, of Auburn; Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton; Mrs. R. M. Scott Briggs, of Herkimer Co.; Mrs. Celina Gardner, of Rochester; H. L. Green, of Salamanca, and many others, including one of great interest from an intelligent gentleman who had just left the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Words of encouragement were received from Col. B. G. Ingersoll, of Illinois; from Hon. George W. Julian, of Indiana; Hon. E. P. Hurlbut, of Albany; Miss Susan H. Wixon, of Fall River, Mass., and from many others, regretting that circumstances prevented their attendance.

As to the new organization, the reader will see that any person, wherever residing, can join by sending in his or her name and twenty-five cents to the Recording Secretary, and we hope many will do that at once. Each Vice-President will also see that he is required to appoint at once two associates to act with him as a county committee, and notify the Corresponding Secretary of the names and post-office address of each of these appointments.

The united opinion of the meeting was that Free Religionists, Materialists, and Spiritualists should all unite in this Association, and all others who agree with its objects. From what was expressed at the meeting, we expect to see one society at least organized in each of the thirty counties in the course of the next three months, and we hope these may be Liberal Leagues.

The President of the Association, the Chairman of the Executive Committee, and the Corresponding Secretary will answer calls to lecture in any portion of the territory within the bounds of the Association.

H. L. GREEN, Secretary.

The name of this Society is the "Freethinkers Association of Central and Western New York."

TERRITORY INCLUDED.

The territory of the Association shall include the counties of Allegany, Broome, Cattaraugus, Cayuga, Chenango, Chemung, Chautauque, Cortland, Erie, Genesee, Herkimer, Livingston, Lewis, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Niagara, Oneida, Orleans, Onondaga, Oswego, St. Lawrence, Schuyler, Seneca, Steuben, Tioga, Tompkins, Wyoming, Wayne, and Yates.

OBJECTS OF THE ASSOCIATION.

First—To stimulate freethought and investigation among the people in relation to their civil, religious, and political rights, and encourage the investigation of questions relating to religion, science, and reform; and to that end to sustain freethought speakers, hold liberal meetings, and circulate liberal, scientific, and reformatory papers and periodicals.

Second—To act as an auxiliary to the National Liberal League in its efforts to accomplish the total separation of Church and State, and to organize local Liberal Leagues in the counties above named, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the National Liberal League.

THE CREED OF THE SOCIETY.

Universal, mental liberty.

PLATFORM OF PRINCIPLES.

The platform of principles is the "Demands of Liberalism," as published in the Boston INDEX; namely:—

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

MEMBERSHIP.

Any person may become a member of this society by signing the Articles of Association and paying the Treasurer twenty-five cents.

THE OFFICERS.

The officers shall be a President, one Vice-President from each county, a Recording Secretary, a Corresponding Secretary, and a Treasurer; also an Executive Committee of seven, who shall have the general supervision of the Association. The duty of the officers shall be those usually pertaining to these positions, with the additional duties hereinafter mentioned.

The Vice-President of each county shall, immediately after his election, appoint two other persons of the county to act with him, and the three shall be the "Freethought and Liberal League Committee" of the county, the Vice-President to be chairman; and it shall be his duty to notify the Corresponding Secretary of this Association of the names and post-office address of each of said appointees.

The duty of these county committees shall be to carry out the objects of this Association, and also to cooperate with the National Liberal League in all practical ways.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

The officers of this Association shall be elected annually and hold their positions until their successors are elected. The President shall have power to fill vacancies.

AMENDMENTS.

These articles may be amended at any regular meeting of this Association by a two-thirds vote of all members present.

MEETINGS—WHEN HELD.

The annual meeting and other meetings of this Association shall be held at such times and places as the Executive Committee shall direct.

OFFICERS,

For the year commencing August 20, 1877:

PRESIDENT.

Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, N. Y.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

MORE ABOUT THE WOLCOTT MEETING.

EDITOR INDEX:—

However valuable the space in THE INDEX may be, I am sure your readers will consent to have considerable of it devoted to some further account of the Wolcott meeting, and I wish an abler pen might perform the task. In many respects I believe that it was one of the most important liberal gatherings ever held in this country. For my own part, after the meeting was appointed by Mr. Cosad, I took it upon myself to see that it was well advertised. There were full notices of the meeting published in all the papers known as "liberal," and in every paper of any consequence in Central and Western New York, and most of the leading freethinkers were invited to be present. A notice of the meeting also appeared in most of the New York dailies, the Tribune and World devoting space in their editorial columns to that purpose.

The result was that nearly every town of any size in Central and Western New York was represented. There were live, earnest, intelligent liberals at the meeting, representing some thirty counties, and also from Pennsylvania, Ohio, New England, and Canada. There must have been not less than five hundred delegates present from their various localities. Mr. Cosad had made extensive preparations to accommodate the multitude. He had procured at considerable expense, from his own pocket, the large tent owned by Wayne County, with a capacity of seating a thousand people or more, and erected it in his beautiful grove for the use of the meeting, and had made arrangements with the hotels to provide board at reasonable rates. He kept some fifty at his own large residence, including most of the speakers free. Then there was a provision tent on the grounds.

On Friday, at two o'clock P.M., the meeting was organized by the appointment of C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, as President, and Mr. Edgar M. Sellen, of Castile, Wyoming County, as Secretary, with thirty Vice-Presidents, each representing a county. The readers of THE INDEX all know Mr. Mills; and, while I am mentioning his name, permit me to say that I have often heard him speak, but was never more charmed with his eloquence than on Sunday afternoon, while he was addressing thousands of people. That grand speech must have had a telling effect upon the hundreds present who were probably listening for the first time to progressive ideas. One word as to Mr. Sellen, the young man from Wyoming County, who acted as Secretary. He is not over twenty-three or twenty-four years of age; is the son of a Baptist minister; a telegrapher on the Erie Railroad by occupation; and if he lives, he will be heard from in the liberal ranks. I never remember seeing a more earnest, intelligent liberal of his age, and I was pleased to make his acquaintance.

The announcement that Mr. Horace Seaver and J. P. Mendum would attend the meeting attracted many of the old subscribers to the Investigator, and a solid, intelligent class of men they were. Mr. Seaver was very popular with the audience, and, although I had heard him a number of times in Boston, I thought I had never heard him speak so well. He did himself great credit. Mr. Mendum made interesting speeches and an effective appeal for Paine Hall. The other person present who attracted much attention was Mr. D. M. Bennett, the editor of the Truth Seeker. He gave a most interesting address on the various religions of the world. This was a most able production, and gave evidence of much study and research, and, if published, should be extensively circulated.

At the first session of the convention, Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, made a strong argument against modern spiritualism. This was answered by Giles B. Stebbins, of Detroit, to the perfect satisfaction of the Spiritualists. During the meeting, Dr. Brown made a number of pointed and earnest speeches that were well received, and Mr. Stebbins, as he always does, spoke eloquently and with evident effect. I must not forget to say that Mrs. Celia Gardner, of Rochester, spoke decidedly well, and, as Mr. Seaver truly said, surpassed any woman now in the Orthodox ranks who was "standing up for Jesus" at camp-meetings and at "revivals." She is about to take the lecture-field for freethought and free religion.

But I am confident that the speech that had the best effect on that large audience was delivered by Rev. Mr. Ellis, of North Huron, formerly and for many years a minister of the Methodist denomination, and at one time (I understand) presiding elder of the district, who has recently left the church from an honest conviction that he could no longer preach Orthodoxy. He was evidently a thoughtful, honest man, and it was a brave move in him to take the freethinkers' platform there among his old church associates.

The conference sessions, held Saturday evening and Sunday morning, at which persons from various localities made short speeches, were very interesting. At these meetings brief addresses were made by G. F. Junkerman, of Cincinnati; Dr. M. Woolley, of Streator, Ill.; Mrs. Cornelia Gardner, of Rochester; Mr. John W. Truesdale, of Syracuse; Mr. William D. Hunt, of Cortland County; Mr. M. B. De Lano, of South Barre, Orleans County; R. C. Trowbridge, of Onondaga County, and a number of others whose names I do not remember. I must not forget to mention that Sunday forenoon Mrs. R. W. Scott Briggs, of West Winfield, read a well-written paper, and the secretary read a short address to the convention on practical work, by Miss Susan H. Wixon, of Fall River, Mass.

The new organization, to be known as the "Freethinkers Association of Central and Western New York," was entered into with great earnestness, and by a unanimous vote the "Demands of Liberalism" was adopted as its platform, and the society was made an auxiliary to the National Liberal League in its efforts to accomplish the total separation of Church and State. It includes thirty counties; and, since I arrived home, I have learned of three or four places where they contemplate organizing at once local societies, and probably they will be organized as Liberal Leagues. The President of the society is Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, and I am confident he is the right man in the right place. The Dr. has talents of a high order and money, and he informed me he should devote both freely to the cause during the next year. Mr. Mills, of Syracuse, is Chairman of the Executive Committee, and I know he is very hopeful of the new society, and will give it the benefit of his character and services. The Corresponding Secretary will do what his humble abilities will permit.

This large meeting of earnest people has attracted much attention. A short notice of it appeared in the associate telegraph reports, and editorial notices in the New York Tribune, Herald, and Sun. Editorial notices have also come to my knowledge from the Elmira Daily Advertiser, Syracuse Daily Courier, Syracuse Daily Standard, Watertown Daily Despatch; and quite a lengthy report containing the platform was published in the Rochester Daily Democrat and Chronicle. Probably many other papers have given it notice. So much for the Wolcott meeting.

WHAT IS RELIGION, AND WHAT IS NOT RELIGION?

It is religion:—

To do our daily duty towards God, ourselves, our fellow-men, animals, and all creation:

To live this life as well and nearly right as we can, and let everybody have his or her opinion about another life:

To ascertain the divine laws and the laws of Nature, and use them for the best good of all; for if a man cannot believe that there is a God, yet obeys his laws, he is more religious than another who prays to God and violates his laws:

To make the best efforts for the development of our own and others' reason:

To have sincere faith in that which our reason dictates us to believe, and sincere doubt of that which we cannot believe:

To aspire to true manhood and universal liberty and all other good attributes of the human soul.

It is not religion:—

To bow-wow about God, Moses, Jesus, Mohammed, etc., and, acting like the devil, Cain, Judas, etc., to build costly temples surrounded by the poor and needy:

To try to believe or make believe that a Pope or the Bible is infallible:

To make long faces on Sunday, and during the week speculate with the so-called religion for the gain of selfish ends:

To pretend that an emperor or a king is born with an extra mercy from God, while some of them act as if they had an extra share of folly from their devil:

To assume positive knowledge of something, which is our individual belief or theory only, or to make believe that we have a holy office, while the most of it is speculation, money-making, "cheek," and "gab":

To presume that our faith or theories are right and all others wrong,—that we are saved, and all who do not believe as we do will be damned.

If the Pope, sultan, czar, or the commander-in-chief over Stewart's Hotel in Saratoga, calls his unreasonable and selfish acts religion, I consider it just as much a mistake as when Mr. Einstein says, "Religion is an evil."

"Religion must do everything for the good"; therefore, it cannot be evil; but hypocrisy, selfishness, vanity, and fanaticism are often called religion. Just as much as I must, in accordance with the development of my reason and faith, call God the highest, all-ruling Power, I have to define religion as "the concentration of the best thoughts, aspirations, and actions of the human soul."

Mr. Beecher's criticism of Judge Hilton's silly sect is good; but do we not find similar exclusions in the churches? Do they allow Jews at their communion-tables? Do the Jews give Christians and others equal rights in their synagogues? With regard to the "cotton and codfish aristocracy," we think Plymouth Church has as full a share of them as Stewart's Hotel in Saratoga. All such actions as Hilton's are the fruits of Church education. When the reason and common-sense of our priests and judges and all others are better developed, then the time will come when we shall have the true religion of humanity, and all speculative forms of religion, sectarianism, and false theories must fade away. "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do," said that good and (for his time) well-reasoning Jew. But we have to say: "Reasonable people, forgive them, and try your best to make them think and reason."

There is a perfect and an imperfect; the perfect we believe in and aspire to, the imperfect we have to acknowledge and regret. Are not science, morals, ethics, politics, component parts of religion? Rev. T. G. Bonney finely says: "Beware, then, I pray you, of the arrogance of a theology which claims that all things have been revealed to it, no less than that of a science which claims that all things have been discovered by it." All forms of religion with another name appended, as Christian Mohammedan, etc., are aggressive, and offend the genuine religion of other souls. Massacres and wars have not been caused by religion, but by such offensive names. One man cannot shape the religion of all souls!

RAILROADS AND THE PEOPLE.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—In your issue of August 2, you say in an article entitled "The Right of Riot":—

"This was simply a quarrel about wages between corporations and their employees, both being merely private parties so far as the government is concerned."

In my opinion, the railroad corporations are not private parties, but, having received a charter from the government to open highways, they stand in the same relation to the people as the government does, and ought to be controlled by the government in all that concerns the people, be it railroad fares or the pay of the employees. If you should give room in your paper to these lines, I wish you would give your answer in a few remarks.

Yours, C. P.

[It is true that the special charters, giving to the companies the right to take private lands for the use of the road on paying damages, render these corporations public bodies to some extent; but we do not see how it puts them in the same relation to the people as the government. The charters are really contracts between certain individuals and the State, each party binding itself to do certain things; and we do not think that either party acquires thereby any special right to exercise control over the other not directly conferred in the contract itself. But this is a subject for the lawyers to discuss; and, as it is not at all material to our main position, we had better leave it to them.—ED.]

DION BOUCAULT ON THE DECLINE OF THE DRAMA.

When you ask me, dear R—, to afford some reason for the decline of the drama which we have witnessed during our time, I feel inclined to reply in the words of the Trojan exile:—

"Quoniam animus meminisse horret luctuque refugit, Incipiam."

It is comforting to reflect that the fine arts, together with every form of literature—in truth, all the staple products of the brain,—have suffered a decline during the last half-century. There is a certain satisfaction in reflecting that the drama has been steadily declining for two thousand years since Cæsar, deploring the falling off in the Roman stage of his time, when compared with the Greek, stigmatized Terence as a half-bred (demidatus) Menander. We, dramatists of this age, can therefore hope there is a still lower depth in years to come, when we shall be regarded as men of stature by a pygmy posterity. . . . During the last hundred years the mind of mankind has been eagerly devoted to the application of scientific discoveries to useful purposes, and particularly to the unification of political and commercial interests. Information has become a drug; investigation has set bounds to romance and rendered fancy ridiculous. The whole world is plotted out and turned into real estate. The island of Prospero is a thriving settlement, and if Rosalind should trespass into the forest of Ardenne, a sturdy keeper would take her into custody. Even the spiritual world has been staked out into claims. The ghosts that visited the couch of Richard were spirits in which the Shakespearean public devoutly believed. Ghosts are now secured by patent and produced by machinery by Professor Pepper. Such is the positive generation that calls its drama into existence, requiring the mind of the dramatist to be practical, utilitarian, to be in sympathetic accord with the minds of the people. He must not consider anything too deeply; his audience cannot follow him. He must not soar; their prosaic minds, heavy with facts, cannot rise. He cannot roam; their exact information turns him back at every step. I earnestly believe the human mind always maintains the same average level. There is always a Homer, a Virgil, a Dante, and a Shakespeare in existence, but mankind is pleased not to call them forth. A great artistic passion prevailed three hundred years ago. The world, setting all other things aside, called forth painters and sculptors to beautify the temples of God and the palaces of princes, and immediately the great classic band appeared, headed by Rubens, Titian, Michel Angelo, Raphael, and Murillo. Such crops of great artists or great poets are not freaks of Nature, but the necessary results of human demand. If we have no such poets, painters, sculptors, or philosophers now, it is simply because the mind of the nineteenth century has other aspirations. So our Milton has been directed to dismount Pegasus and bestride the lightning which science has bridled, Shakespeare is occupied in editing a morning newspaper, Dante is exploring the Isthmus of Panama to locate an interoceanic canal, Bacon is trying to reach the North Pole, while Michel Angelo is inventing a sewing-machine. Great intellect, no longer meditative, is active. It has been diverted by command of the world to other objects and has accepted other functions.

These, my dear R—, seem to me the main cause for the decline of the drama, and why Hercules is a spinster. If it has descended below the level at which it ought to have rested, it owes its further decline to the destructive influence of the newspaper press.

This literary machine was invented about a century ago. In the language of the turf, it was sired by Essay out of Flying Post. At first its object was simply to circulate news. Then it began to manufacture opinion. As mankind became more and more busy in commercial affairs they had less time for meditation, and it was very convenient to buy opinions ready made, and to have their minds made up for them without the trouble of consideration. So this machine soon came into universal use, and the slow craftsman of literature, the old-fashioned thinker, the weaver of sound, strong argument, finding no market for his laboriously-fashioned brain-produce, became a pressman. The inexorable machine now calls upon him for so much composition, not for thought. He writes by the yard. It matters not whether his faculties are ill at ease or well disposed, in vain or out of gear; copy must be had. This daily milking of his brain, this eternal diarrhoea of thought has debilitated his mental system. He is under instructions to write for commonplace intellects,—that is, to treat his subjects in a shallow or showy manner, as "the impression" is only intended to live for one day. He is appreciated not for the truth of what he writes (that is a secondary matter), he is urged to be racy, and so learns to cover with pertness of style his baldness of treatment, and to put a satin face upon a shoddy argument.

I speak of the newspaper press as a literary man, and as it affects the constitution of literature. It is needless here to allude to its power and services as a cohesive agent in civilization. But to effect its purpose and to consolidate its dynasty it was obliged to absorb our power as essayists and degrade our independence. We became subject to a training in which, it may be said, the march of intellect was regulated by the editorial goose step. By this means it raised a disciplined force, but by the process the race of literary heroes was extinguished. As the newspaper press has prospered, so in proportion have the poet, the novelist, and the dramatist disappeared. In the commencement of this century the list of authors, headed by Byron, Shelley, Moore, Scott, Sheridan, Colman, Bulwer, and Knowles, formed but a few of the phalanx. Where are their compeers of this period? They are private soldiers in the ranks of the press. Have you ever examined meditatively the counter of a bookseller? Have you not found nine out of ten new works of fiction, displayed there for sale, to be the product of female brains? Why do women almost monopolize this branch of literature? The answer is, that men are recruited for the ranks of the press. That is wherefore we see women doing their work in the fields of literature. But it may be remarked that surely some sturdy brain would rebel against this conscription and resolutely preserve its freedom. Such there are; but the press has, by depreciating the products of literature, cultivated millions of readers with no intelligence above or beyond the scope of a newspaper article. This multitudinous fry inhabit the shoals of thought, overwhelming the select few who still have stomach for works of greater reach and power.

In the drama the mischievous influence of the press is still more fatal in its effects. It has superseded and displaced the band of critics that used to stand upon guard over the production of a new play or the appearance of a new actor. This self-elected troop of exercised and experienced folk, priding itself in its power and its office, was cheerfully recognized by the rest of the public as a leader in taste. It was the body-guard of the drama. Its functions have been of late years usurped by the newspaper press, and the old critical band has been dissolved. Unfortunately the newspaper critic is, and always has been, incapable of discharging these functions. I speak from a personal acquaintance with the most distinguished of these gentlemen that have misguided London, Paris, and New York during the last thirty years. It has happened to me to address an eminent artist on the morning after a first performance with the complaint that not only had he misrepresented the character confided to him, but that he had altered it and had interpolated language of his own to the detriment of the play. He answered this reproach by directing my attention to the columns of the London Times, where his performance was eulogized, and the success of the play attributed largely to his buffoonery.

As a low state of health is liable to let in a score of maladies, so a low state of the drama has developed the commercial manager. This person in most instances received his education in a bar-room, possibly on the far side of the counter. The more respectable may have been gamblers. Few of them could compose a bill of the play where the spelling and grammar would not disgrace an urchin under ten years of age. These men have obtained possession of first-class theatres, and assume to exercise the artistic and literary functions required to select the actors, to read and determine the merit of dramatic works, and preside generally over the highest and noblest efforts of the human mind. The great theatres of London are filled by men of this class, who have thus succeeded to the curule chairs of John Philip Kemble, Richard Brinsley Sheridan, Macready, George Colman, and Charles Kean. To the commercial manager we owe the introduction of the burlesque, opera bouffe, and the reign of buffoonery. We owe him also the deluge of French plays that set in with 1842, and swamped the English drama of that period. For example: the usual price received by Sheridan, Knowles, Bulwer, and Talfourd at that time for their plays was £500. I was a beginner in 1841, and received for my comedy, London Assurance, £300. For that amount the manager bought the privilege of playing the work for his season. Three years later I offered a new play to a principal London theatre. The manager offered me £100 for it. In reply to my objection to the smallness of the sum, he remarked: "I can go to Paris and select a first-class comedy; having seen it performed, I feel certain of its effect. To get this comedy translated will cost me $25. Why should I give you £300 or £500 for your comedy of the success of which I cannot feel so assured?" The argument was unanswerable and the result inevitable. I sold a work for £100 that took me six months' hard work to compose, and accepted a commission to translate three French plays at £50 apiece. This work afforded me child's play for a fortnight. Thus the English dramatist was obliged either to relinquish the stage altogether or to become a French copyist.

But the most irreparable loss inflicted on the stage by this management was the loss of tradition. From the earliest days there existed in the leading theatres of London groups of actors inhabiting Drury Lane, Covent Garden, and Haymarket theatres, these being especially entitled to perform the highest class of drama, for which they had the monopoly, and consequently companies of artists were selected for the object of cultivating legitimate comedy and tragedy. These actors were the lineal artistic descendants of the great tragedians and comedians who preceded them on the same stages. The prompt-books were heirlooms of the art. From hand to hand, from mouth to mouth, the movement and gestures of every scene and every play were transmitted from generation to generation. The way in which Garrick or Betterton acted a certain part was compared with the manner and treatment of their predecessors in it, and the best parts of each performance were retained and employed by John Philip Kemble. He in turn was studied by Cooke and Young, who transmitted their traditions to Kean and Macready. The grouping of the actors on the stage, their relations to each other, their movements and gestures, all the product of the careful study of two or three centuries, formed this artistic treasure which we call tradition; and all this is utterly lost. The commercial manager having debanded these leading companies of artists, all the wealth of the past has been dispersed.—North American Review.

THE TURKS AS THE "LITTLE HORN."—The millenarians are finding much encouragement in the present yeasty condition of the East, and Daniel and the Apocalypse are being overhauled and made note of in a way to delight Captain Cuttle. The latest and most careful computation of dates points out 1883 as the year of the culmination of prophecy, and not this year, as some of the Adventists have declared. In fact the recent Adventist calculation closed up affairs last Saturday; but neither the Russians nor any other instrumentalities, earthly or heavenly, came to time with anything decisive, and the earth still lingers. Now good sober Episcopalian scholars bestir themselves; and, starting from the accepted interpretation that Daniel's "time and times and the dividing of time," which they call three and a half (lunar) years of three hundred and sixty days each, coincides with the Revelator's forty-two months, or twelve hundred and sixty days of years,—go on to observe that this term, projected from the time when Phocas made Bishop Boniface pope, ended in 1886, and as the papacy didn't end completely at the same time, it became necessary to look out for something else to fill the rôle of the "little horn." Accordingly they foist that ungrateful part upon the Turk—who has so long been expected to come out "at the little end of the horn,"—and, dating the rise of the Mohammedan power from the Hegira in 622, find the fated termination of the prophetic twelve hundred and sixty days in 1882. This is giving the "unspeakable" a long shift; but the interpreters console themselves in the belief that both Islam and the papacy will end together at that time, and the restoration of the Jews begin,—which will be nuts for Daniel Deronda, as well as for his distinguished prophetic godfather.—Springfield Republican.

A BACHELOR'S CHOICE.—"Oh, Mr. Grubbies," exclaimed a young mother, "shouldn't you like to have a family of rosy children about your knee?" "No, ma'am," said the disagreeable old bachelor; "I'd rather have a lot of yellow boys in my pocket."

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1873.

To THE INDEX ASSOC., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEBBINS.

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.

Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.

J. L. STODDARD, Boston.

ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.

C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.

W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.25 for one year, including postage, or 90 cents for three months on trial.

RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Fifth Annual Meeting, 1872. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains essays by J. W. Chadwick on "Liberty and the Church in America," by C. D. B. Mills on "Religion as the Expression of a Permanent Sentiment of the Human Mind," and by O. B. Frothingham on "The Religion of Humanity," with addresses by Rowland Connor, Celia Burleigh, Lucretia Mott, A. B. Alcott, C. A. Bartol, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loos, and others.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. S. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity, as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keeshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morris.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. 40 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Reason and Revelation, by William J. Potter. 10 cents: ten for 50 cents; one hundred, $3.00.

For series of important Tracts see last page of THE INDEX.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1873 is quite limited. Orders by mail may be addressed either "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston," or to the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of these several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 30 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practicing the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE
FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

WOULD IT NOT be more appropriate for M. Jules Grévy to become President of Greece than of France?

THE PAN-PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL at Edinburgh is said to have represented a general membership of thirty-four millions.

IT IS ANNOUNCED that "Bogus Charley," the Modoc Indian who fought under Captain Jack, is a recent convert to Christianity. We are afraid that poor Charley will now be more "Bogus" than ever.

HOW AGREEABLE it is to find the latest science coming to the rescue of the fairy tales discredited by its earlier dicta, though stoutly clung to by imaginative childhood! Here is Professor Marsh, telling us in his Nashville addresses before the American Association that the Pterosauria, or flying lizards of Mesozoic times, "were veritable Dragons, having a spread of wings of from ten to twenty-five feet." St. George will now hold up his head again.

THE NEW YORK Tribune fairly groans over the fact that the Permanent Exhibition was opened on Sunday, September 2, for the first time, "with the result of nearly doubling the receipts"! But it groans, as it were, in its sleeve, and does not dare to give full vent to its mighty emotions. Hence it only "questions a little, too, the policy of this Sunday-opening, as a mere matter of business, without venturing to touch at all upon the moral aspect of the case," and timidly hints that "the Sabbath-keeping, church-going community" is "the class which, after all, has the quarters to give at the stiles." What sneaking Orthodoxy is this!

THE CHURCHES know how to crack the whip over the heads of business men. Says the Boston Advertiser: "The exhibits of the American Tract Society of this city and the Presbyterian Board of Publication have been withdrawn from the Philadelphia Permanent Exhibition, in consequence of the determination to open it on Sundays. The Young Men's Methodist Episcopal Alliance of Philadelphia has adopted resolutions protesting against the Sunday opening." Does anybody go to the Exhibition to see a lot of dusty old fire-and-brimstone tracts? What a fearful penalty it is to withdraw such a vision of glory from the eyes of the weeping public!

THE DEATH of Col. Higginson's wife at Newport, Rhode Island, on Sunday, September 2, will awaken the sympathy of thousands who are personally unknown to him. Mrs. Higginson had been for a long time a confirmed invalid, and there never was a more devoted, attentive, or self-sacrificing husband than Col. Higginson showed himself during all these painful years. In the midst of constant literary labors which taxed his strength to the utmost, he spared no effort to alleviate the sufferings or promote the comfort of his chosen life-companion. He has achieved a high reputation by his never idle pen; but his noblest crown has been won in the seclusion of his own home.

ADOLPHE THIERS has bequeathed to his countrymen one of those great names which are a permanent tower of strength to any people. He lived for France in no metaphorical sense, and the irrefutable proof of the fact lies in the universal consternation and grief called forth by his death. Seldom indeed does the departure of an octogenarian throw a great nation into such commotion. There is something very noble in the clear and proud consciousness which dictated those words of his, in one of his last speeches in the Assembly: "I do not fear for my memory, because I do not expect to appear at the tribunal of parties. Before such a court I should be at fault. But I shall not be ashamed before history, and I desire to appear at its tribunal."

THE DEATH of ex-President Thiers adds a new interest to the approaching French elections. As one of the New York papers well observes: "The general anxiety, already sufficiently painful, is at once doubled, and Marshal MacMahon may henceforth count on the potent ally of Fear." Gambetta shows himself a true patriot in promptly putting forward Grévy as candidate for MacMahon's successor, in the event of the latter's resignation. Thiers' fou enragé is proving himself to be far better than the hasty epigrammatic phrase of the old statesman described him, as Thiers himself evidently came to believe at last. Notwithstanding the blackness of the gathering clouds, we earnestly hope that the French Republic will weather the storm, and our hope depends largely on the unselfish wisdom of Léon Gambetta.

NOT LONG SINCE the New York Graphic had this paragraph, which suggests the only just remedy for the difficulties described: "The familiar 'Bible war' has broken out in the schools of New Rochelle. It seems that all the children were compelled to be at school at a quarter before nine, and that, during the next fifteen minutes all children except Catholics were gathered in the school-room to participate in religious exercises while the Catholics were shut in a room below waiting for school to begin. Father McLaughlin thereupon petitions for the right of some Catholic to instruct the Catholic children in the lower room during their enforced presence of fifteen minutes, and adds: 'We would be far from desiring that the Protestant Bible and Protestant prayers should be thrown out, while there are parents or children who wish either, or both; but at the same time we respectfully suggest, to the sense of honor, justice, and fair play of your honorable Board, that the Catholic children should be allowed to read their Catholic Bible and say their Catholic prayers together, and under the direction of persons authorized for the purpose by us.' The dilemma is a difficult one; the request of the Catholic priest is rather a plausible one, and it appeals to the sense of fair play; and perhaps the best way 'out of the woods' is to omit all religious exercises, keep the public school for secular instruction, and remit the religious education of children to the mother's side and the Sunday-school. This settlement will not please the Catholics, and it will not satisfy all of the Protestants; but the offence will be a passive and negative, not an active and positive one, and the omission would unquestionably be according to law. Can anybody think of any other solution of this difficult question that would be less offensive to the various interests involved?"

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

The Duty of Liberals.

BY J. L. STODDARD.

The pages of history are eloquent with examples of boundless devotion on the part of propagandists of cherished faiths. The Buddhist missionaries laboring with tireless energy and love; the liberal Papi enthusiastically proclaiming his new religion from city to city along the shores of the Mediterranean and Aegean; the caliph Omar waging incessant warfare upon the believers in the Trinity; the Jesuits heroically braving death in every quarter of the globe; and many of the Protestant missionaries who have gone to barbarous tribes and dreadful climates with their "tidings of salvation,"—all attest how great may be the heroism of men inspired with an intense desire to extend their faith.

The motive impulse which fires these different enthusiasts is a vivid realization that all who are not converted to their faith will suffer future retribution and wretchedness. They therefore carry, as they think, salvation to the perishing! If these noble-hearted heroes should once conceive the idea that all forms of religion are kindred aspirations after the Infinite; if they should realize that the race is not confined to one, but may advance along many avenues of spiritual progress, immediately the very spring of their enthusiasm would be gone. Convince Protestant Christians that, under different symbols, pure-minded Mohammedans, Jews, Buddhists, and Catholics all over the world are worshipping their highest ideal of goodness, and that the future happiness of the race does not exclusively depend upon a knowledge of their particular founder, Jesus, and they will cease spending millions in maintaining discouraged proselyters among these various peoples, and will turn their charities into more useful channels.

Now the Free Religionist has attained to this belief. He views in amazement the horror with which different religious partisans regard each other. He smiles at the imagined doom to which each party fancies its opponents will be devoted. And thereupon, feeling that no souls are running any risk of hell-fire by his indifference, and consequently actuated by no fears concerning the eternal welfare of his fellow-men, he frequently settles down to the affairs of this life and does not try to disturb the faith of others. "To what purpose?" he asks. "It does them no harm. Why should I seek to force my views upon any?" In one sense this attitude of the indifferent liberal is right. In another it is wrong. He is certainly to be commended for his tolerance of others' beliefs and for his non-interference in their forms of worship, since believers in every religion should be allowed perfect freedom of conscience and liberty to worship as they please. He is wise, too, in not attempting to uproot a long-cherished faith in those cases where manifestly no good will be accomplished by such dislodgement, and when the believer is one whose age or mental incapacity prevents his accepting broader views. But for the freethinker to sink back into the comfortable cushions of inaction and selfishly to neglect the means of spreading a freedom of opinion which he feels to be priceless and dear to him as life itself, is wrong and blameworthy.

But here we are met by the common question, What motives has the freethinker to urge him to the diffusion of liberalism? There is no scarcity of such motives, although a yawning gulf of perdition does not rank itself among them.

The first which suggests itself is the natural desire of any generous heart which has found happiness to point out to others the means of obtaining it also. This claim of "happiness" doubtless appears incredible to the majority of Christians, for they have been taught to look upon unbelievers with pity, as being miserably discontented. It is nevertheless true that the calmness of a life devoted entirely to the truth, and swayed alone by the dictates of reason, possesses a happiness immeasurably greater and deeper than that founded on traditional statements, inquiry into which must be constantly repressed by the doubting soul, and fanned spasmodically heavenward by gusts of feeling fickle as our New England climate.

A second powerful motive urging the freethinker to action is a desire to free men from the miserable thralldom of numerous superstitions, out of whose palsied clutch the liberal finds himself delivered. Let us look at a few of these. It is, for example, surely a worthy object of endeavor to remove from men's minds that hateful incubus of fear known as the "Doctrine of Eternal Punishment," which has brought anguish to so many millions of terrified souls, who have believed themselves or their dear ones hopelessly doomed to the gnawing worm and the quenchless flame. Much has already been done to dispel this superstition; so much, in fact, that probably not one professing Christian in a hundred at present believes the infamous dogma or dares to apply its conclusions to the case of his own unconvinced dear ones. Few Orthodox preachers now venture to proclaim it in all its ghastliness to an intelligent congregation. But more remains to be done. The chilling shadow of this fearful doctrine still broods over the great mass of more ignorant believers. Its miasmal breath still lurks about country churches and reeks from crowded camp-meeting grounds, poisoning many an otherwise happy existence.

Another superstition which should be banished, is a belief in the devil and his diabolical assistants. The absurdity of this dogma will doubtless provoke a smile from the liberal reader, so incredible does it appear that such a doctrine is still believed and upheld in our churches. Yet it is a serious fact that the existence of an arch-fiend of evil, who, assisted by swarms of imps, is constantly at work alluring men to destruction, is actually taught not only in many a church, but in some, at least, of our theological seminaries! This belief is, it is true, rapidly on the wane. But from its having been taught by Jesus and the Apostles, upheld by the Church Fathers, and handed down through centuries of bloody witch-killing in Europe and America, it still retains a marked influence over Christian thought. The writer has himself heard and copied extracts from many sermons, delivered within the last ten years, containing repeated allusions to the "Great Adversary of Souls," the "Roaring Lion," the "Devil and his emissaries," the "Warfare between God and Satan," the "Evil One," the "Prince of Darkness," etc., etc. Will it not be worth many an arduous endeavor if we can banish such a degrading idea of the universe and such a relic of barbarism as this from minds in which it is still dominant?

Another superstition which the liberal should endeavor heartily to dispel is the belief that God commanded men to keep Sunday holy. This day, for the sacred observance of which there is not a shred of authority, save its long-established observance by the Christian Church, which on its own responsibility adopted it in abandoning the Jewish Sabbath; this day, on which even Luther declared it lawful to dance, to sing, and to indulge in any festivity rather than associate it with the fourth commandment of the decalogue,—this, our modern Sunday, is believed by a vast number of Christians both in this country and in England to be a period of time during which, according to a special command of the Almighty, no work is to be done, and in whose hours even innocent recreation or mental cultivation is wrong! Consequently all places of amusement are on this day closed. All concerts, not of a sacred character, are forbidden. In most places an entrance even to libraries and art museums is prohibited. Public gardens and parks are in many towns shut against the people during the only day on which they have leisure to enjoy them. Travel is largely suspended. It is by law forbidden to play at cards during its hours. In fact a depressing gloom is cast over this day of the sun. People who do not wish to pass in church their only period of freedom from business are not allowed to indulge in many harmless recreations, being opposed in them by the law or by the bitter invectives of bigoted intolerance. Now the liberal should gladly devote time and strength in laboring to make this day a season of true freedom for all.

It should be his aim to have the present unjust Sunday laws repealed, and thus to enable every citizen of this nominally free country to pass his Sunday time as shall seem agreeable to him: whether worshipping in church, roaming in the forest, fishing on the lake, hunting among the hills, or gaining instruction in the lecture-hall and enjoyment in the theatre. Will not thousands whose Sunday liberty is thus secured return grateful thanks to those who accomplish it? The establishment of complete freedom on Sunday is surely not far distant. We may well take heart when we see meetings held in London for this very object presided over by such men as Dean Stanley of Westminster Abbey, Tyn-dall, Huxley, and others!

This delusion of Sunday sanctity suggests another superstition from which it should be the liberal's aim to free men; namely, the idea that many innocent amusements are sinful,—even upon week-days. Is it not almost incredible that here, in enlightened, cultured Boston, there may be found thousands who deem it a sin to go to the theatre, there to be ennobled by the witnessing of Shakespeare's tragedies; and who think it an act of dishonor to Jesus to listen there to the music of Beethoven's Fidelio, Mozart's Don Giovanni, or Wagner's Lohengrin? Is it not pitiable that intelligent men and women of this nineteenth century can still be so bound hand and foot by Puritan prejudices as neither to enjoy and profit by many inspiring pieces of acting, nor to recognize the great educating and ennobling influence which the drama is capable of exerting, and to regard such noble tragedies as Salvini, Ristori, Booth, Cushman, Janauschek, and others, as agents of the devil in leading men astray?

Yet such are the facts. Do not call this picture overdrawn. I have weighed my words and they express merely the actual truth. Thousands of church-members in our city are through this prejudice ascetically depriving themselves of much pleasure and benefit. Some of these persons are indeed ashamed to acknowledge that they think it sinful for people to attend the opera and theatre, but plead, as an excuse for not doing so themselves, that in this country, at least, there is to them no pleasure in such performances! Verily, they have their reward.

This same spirit of superstitious avoidance of the "things of the world" leads many Christians also to shun, as sinful, all games of cards, billiards, and the like. Dancing is still looked upon as wicked by probably half the number of professing Christians. A noted clergyman, a few days since, on the eve of his summer vacation, warned his flock not to pass their summer holidays in any place where excitement and pleasure might cause their present spiritual glow of feeling to grow cool. Whether his sheep will obey their shepherd may be fairly questioned, since his own name has appeared on the hotel register at Saratoga! Surely if the liberal can aid men to distinguish in this matter of amusements, as well as in other things, between their USE AND ABUSE, he will contribute much to the happiness and freedom of thousands.

Still another superstition which the liberal should strive to destroy is a blind acceptance of the Bible as an infallible book. A great fermentation is at present going on in the Church. People are too much alive to the discoveries of science and historical criticism not to be aware that their Bible is in many places incorrect, childish, and decidedly untrustworthy. Hence arises a terrible state of anxiety, which will continue just so long as Christians persist in claiming that it is an infallible, God-inspired production, and refuse to apply to it the same canon of criticism to which we subject all other books.

Not long ago, the writer sat at the table of a wealthy and prominent Christian gentleman. His son, a bright lad just coming into manhood, fresh from his books, inquired of his father if it could be true that Joshua had caused the sun and moon to stand still in their courses. His father instantly replied in a way to put an end to any further interrogation, "Certainly; every word in the Bible is true!" What is that young man destined to think of his father's creed ten years hence? If the liberal will bend all his energies to the work of showing people what the Bible really is,—a book not essentially different from, but allied to, other great compendiums of religious aspiration; a book not of divine but human authorship; a book in whose varied pages may be found many errors, inaccuracies, obscene stories, a passionate love-song, and puerile myths,—and, at the same time, beautiful religious thoughts, noble ethical principles, and pure spiritual instruction; a book whose wheat is mingled with chaff, which must be carefully judged like any other collection of ancient myths and precepts that have accumulated under many hands through centuries of slow development,—if, I repeat, he can do this (as Matthew Arnold has nobly striven to do), he will confer incalculable benefit upon thousands of hearts now secretly tormented and distressed.

In truth, something must be done, and done quickly, in the Orthodox churches, if they wish to escape the convulsive throes of approaching mental revolution. A different tone must be assumed by Orthodox Christian leaders in regard to their Scriptures, or they will witness an anarchy of confused and misdirected scepticism which even the most ardent radical would deplore. The masses do not like to be deceived, or even to have truth concealed from them. When that mental revolution comes, as come it surely will under the present Orthodox system, it will be seen that such men as Rev. M. J. Savage, of Boston, have been really doing an eminently beneficial work. No bitter reproaches will then be flung at him by disappointed members of his congregation, for he has led them steadily and firmly on to the truth as fast as he has been able to conduct their march. But how it will be with the Pentecosts and other narrow upholders of the plenary inspiration of the Bible, I will not venture to predict.

Still another superstition to be expelled is that involved in the doctrine of the "fall of man." Here is one of the foundation-stones of Christian theology. Upon a Hebrew legend, whose main elements are a garden, Adam and Eve, a serpent, and a fruit tree, have been reared the enormous superstructures of a Golden Age of Innocence, the fall and condemnation of the race, federal headship in Adam, total depravity, need of an atonement, etc., etc. Science, however, knows nothing of a Golden Age in the past. It weighs all the myths of such an era in the balances, finds them wanting, and rejects them. Its Golden Age is in the future, not in the past. It finds the early origin of the race in the midst of barbarism and degradation. It traces man's progress painfully and laboriously onward and upward until he emerges into the dawn of history. This is now settled beyond a reasonable peradventure. Whether man has ascended from a lower species may be by many regarded as still unproven. The picture of the history of mankind is thus entirely reversed. On the one hand, is the spectacle of our race grovelling downward from a primitive state of innocence and perfect happiness,—cursed from the very first pair, and only to be redeemed after countless generations by a scheme so ridiculously limited that, even nineteen hundred years after its denouement, not one-third of the race are acquainted with it, while men are dying at the rate of thirty a second! On the other hand, we have the picture of man's progress from his humble and degraded origin up to his present stage of enlightenment and civilization; while science, which has already done so much, promises in every field of investigation glorious results of future growth.

It is the privilege of the liberal to substitute the latter hopeful conception of the race, founded upon the facts of scientific research, for the former gloomy and depressing view, whose only authority is a Hebrew legend and the ingenious inventions of theologians.

A third motive, which should spur the freethinker to energetic action, is the consciousness that he is thus striving to establish throughout his race the broad fellowship of humanity. He views all religions, even the lowest, as similar in kind and only different in their various degrees of perfection. He has no one teacher, whose claims and precepts he follows exclusively. On the contrary, he draws to himself the wisdom and influence of all past and present sages. From all the great master-minds of the world he rejoices to receive instruction. Isaiah, Confucius, Mencius, Buddha, Socrates, Jesus, Epictetus, Spinoza, Goethe, Shakespeare, Emerson,—these are all his masters. His eyes are opened to welcome, not alone the rays of one bright luminary of the boundless sky, but to receive the blessed light of all the kindred suns, which sweep indeed upon different courses through the interstellar depths, but are all obedient to the same grand laws. As Coreggio exclaimed rapturously, when he beheld the St. Cecilia of Raphael, "Anch' a son pittore!" so we, filled with the inspiration of kinship with these noble spirits of our race, may cry with joy, "We also are men!"

It is this great religion of humanity that it is the privilege of the liberal to diffuse. He is to urge men to take a broad, not a narrow view of their race.

All are not to be "lost" who do not adopt the special path in which one single division of mankind is walking. Millions of the race have not perished, merely that a handful of believers on Jesus might march, like the Old Guard of Napoleon, over the dead bodies of their comrades into the kingdom of heaven!

And now the very practical question arises: "If these are my duties, how can I best perform them? Stimulated by the motives of conferring upon men the priceless boon of freethought, of removing superstitions from their minds, and of promoting a broader fellowship of the race, what are the means of success in my attempt?" Let me suggest a few practical methods.

1. Circulate the best literature on these subjects. If, for example, you read a plain, correct statement of the reasons why our present Sunday laws should be repealed, take pains to have that statement read as widely as possible. Purchase copies of the article. Send them broadcast. Remember that the great thing necessary for the more rapid progress of Liberalism is to make men THINK. Adopt a system precisely the opposite of that expressed in the significant motto of the Young Men's Christian Association, "Avoid argument." Court it rather! Remember you have nothing to fear from the freest discussion! Call men's attention to these topics, bid them use their reason without prejudice one way or the other, and the result is only an affair of time.

2. Form, if possible, a nucleus of half a dozen friends with whom you may discuss these subjects. Read together, and talk over what you read temperately and judiciously. Let each member of that little society try to exert as much influence as possible either to induce others to join it or to disseminate its views by the distribution of the right books, pamphlets, or articles.

3. Secure, if possible, in your town a course of lectures on liberal or scientific subjects, and make every effort to render them successful. If possible, get a clergyman to discuss these questions in public with an opposing freethinker. The result will take care of itself, if the men are at all evenly matched. Lastly, recollect that it is a matter of vital importance that freethought should have as many good exponents as possible in the form of newspapers and reviews. At present, however, it is better to rally firmly to support a few of these organs of liberalism than to waste our strength upon too many. Take for example this very paper, THE INDEX. It ought to be supported by the friends of freethought at all hazards. Minor disagreements should be forgotten in the great necessity which exists to maintain such an intellectual exponent of liberalism. Do you say, "It is not exactly as I would have it?" So say we all. None know its deficiencies better than its friends. Let us then make it better. And how? By filling its list of subscribers, and thus replenishing its treasury! For with sufficient means the present overworked editor of THE INDEX, who does with his own hands an amount of labor that few men would think of assuming, might enlarge its columns, secure the best talent of this and other countries to write for it, and thus make his paper a journal of immense power and incalculable good. Do you wish some different views advocated in THE INDEX? Advocate them there yourself. The columns are open. The editor is a model of tolerance, who will give every man a fair hearing, and either support him warmly or oppose him calmly and courteously. Do not reject a paper of this kind because an occasional expression upon politics or some minor matter offends you. Recollect that we liberals need this organ. Let us then cordially ignore its few faults for its many excellences, and strengthen and improve it by every means in our power.

One final word as to how we shall increase the circulation of this paper.

In a city of twenty thousand inhabitants I recently met with a man who had been for years a subscriber to THE INDEX. But though an admirer of its views, he had never loaned a copy of it, never made any use of his "talent," and the paper was completely unknown there. The inference, fellow-liberals, is plain. Let every friend of THE INDEX make personal endeavors to increase the number of its supporters. Let him make out a list of names of the liberals in the town in which he resides, to whom specimen copies of the paper can be sent. The result may be far greater than we think, for the chief objects of importance are, first, to awaken sluggish thought by the presentation of these topics; and, secondly, to offer a journal where such objects are freely and ably discussed.

[Mr. Stoddard's wise practical suggestions, at the close of his article, tempt me to add a word. The very best way to assist THE INDEX to accomplish its great work is, as he states, to get new subscribers for it. If every subscriber now on its list would only determine to secure three new names within as many weeks (and this could be done far more easily than is imagined), it would be very soon within my power to make this journal so good that it would be a pride to the liberals and a mighty power in the liberal cause. No one knows its defects half so well as I do; but it is impossible to remedy them without such an increase of means as would be in this way secured. No one man can make a good paper; and the systematic cooperation of many minds cannot possibly be had without adequate compensation. Is there not far-sightedness and disinterestedness enough among American freethinkers to create one first-class journal, sufficiently powerful by its ability and character and wide support to command the world's respect for that free thought by which alone mankind can be educated out of their miseries? I have clung to this hope tenaciously for eight tedious years, and cling to it still. Am I the victim of my own credulity? It is for you, brothers and sisters who love "liberty and light," to answer.—F. E. A.]

[FOR THE INDEX.]

"WHAT THINK YE OF CHRIST?"

BY CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

This question, often and variously answered for nineteen centuries past, still so retains its interest as to be thought, by vast numbers of people, the most important of all inquiries. Among those who entertain it, however, investigation seems to produce rather diversity than unity of opinion. Gail Hamilton, in a little book just published, has given her notion of the New Testament answer to this question; and I offer, to those who care to pursue the subject further, my notion of the Old Testament answer to it.

The conception of the Messiah, or, as we have it through a Greek version, the Christ, originated, confessedly, with the Hebrew prophets. Confiding in Jehovah, their national deity, and assuming, not only that the Hebrews were his chosen and favorite people, but that he would ultimately make all other nations subordinate and tributary to them, they represented the culmination of this prosperity as destined to take place under and through the rule of a lineal successor of David, the most venerated of their previous kings.

Great numbers of declarations and intimations occurring in the writings of those Hebrew prophets have been seized on by Christian sermonizers and commentators as Messianic predictions. Many of the matters claimed under this title are trivial and incidental, and not a few have been pressed into the service of the Messianic idea by misquotation or other perversion. But if we look for the essential characteristics of Messiahship, as they were conceived and recorded by the prophets, and cherished by the Jewish people, we shall find them to include the following, with or without other additions:—

The Messiah, or the Christ, was to be a lineal descendant of King David.

He was to be a king, as David was, ruling the Hebrew people, and joyfully accepted as their ruler.

He was to deliver that people from all foreign oppression, gather them from all countries into their own land, and rule them there, permanently, in peace and righteousness.

After having accomplished the supremacy of the Hebrew nation, and the subjugation of its enemies, he was to bring in a period of permanent and universal peace. No nation would make war, no people would learn the art of making it. All men would live in amity, transforming their weapons into useful implements; and he who should accomplish this glorious work was to be called "The Prince of Peace."

The messenger of Jehovah who was to accomplish all this was not to supersede the Hebrew religion, but to establish and perpetuate it. Jehovah was still to have his special dwelling-place on Mount Zion. The Temple at Jerusalem was still to be served with burnt-offerings and meat-offerings by the ministrations of priests and Levites; the day of the new moon and the Saturday-Sabbath were still to be sacredly observed, and all nations of the earth were to send their delegates to participate in these observances. As the prophetic declarations upon this last head are passed over in silence by the Christian clergy, and so are comparatively unknown to the members of their churches, it may be well to quote some of them:—

"The word that Isaiah the son of Amos saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem.

"And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths. For out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem.

"And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people. And they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."—Is. ii., 1-4.

"They shall declare my glory among the Gentiles; and they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the Lord; out of all nations upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to my holy mountain Jerusalem, saith the Lord; as the children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessel into the house of the Lord.

"And I will also take of them for priests and for Levites, saith the Lord.

"For, as the new heavens and the new earth which I will make shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain.

"And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the Lord."—Is. lxvi., 19-23.

"Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will perform that good thing which I have promised unto the house of Israel and to the house of Judah. In those days, and at that time, will I cause the branch of righteousness to grow up unto David; and he shall execute judgment and righteousness in the land. In those days shall Judah be saved, and Jerusalem shall dwell safely; and this is the name wherewith she shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness.

"For thus saith the Lord, David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel; neither shall the priests the Levites want a man before me to offer burnt-offerings, and to kindle meat-offerings, and to do sacrifice continually."—Jer. xxxiii., 14-18.

Not one of the essential conditions and accompaniments of Messiahship above rehearsed has yet been realized. During twenty-five hundred years which have elapsed since the utterance of the predictions referred to, not only has no descendant of David reigned in Palestine, but the Jewish people have had no king whatever. They have ceased to be a nation, and are only a scattered people. Instead of dwelling in their own land, they are dispersed, and consent to remain dispersed, among all nations of the earth. Instead of having their own king, they are still under the rule of Gentile despots. Instead of being ruled "in peace and righteousness" by a son of David, they still suffer various forms of persecution from the peoples among whom they dwell, as well as from the rulers. Instead of possessing their temple on Mount Zion, and seeing tributaries from all nations come up there to worship, according to the prophecies of Isaiah, they have to content themselves with such small and obscure synagogues as their Gentile rulers are willing to tolerate. Instead of having a grand central worship maintained in Jerusalem by their own priests and Levites, as Isaiah and Jeremiah promised, they are forced perpetually to witness the triumph of an adverse faith, and are teased by Christian missionaries to accept as the predicted Messiah one who failed to fulfil the most important of the predictions; one who neither assumed the attitude, nor accomplished the results, which the Messiah, according to Isaiah and Jeremiah, was to assume and to accomplish.

Messiahship, then, is an idea of the Hebrew prophets never yet realized, and never likely to be realized. The Jews are, and have been, perfectly right in demanding that the functions of that office be performed, or at least assumed, before they accept the pretensions of any one who claims it. On the other hand, they greatly mistake it not seeing that a higher faith than theirs, a purer morality and better modes of living than Moses taught, are now extant, ready for adoption by any who choose to adopt them. The universal Father is better worth worshipping than the patron of a "chosen people," who was expected to make all other nations subordinate and tributary to them. The love of God, a love which casteth out fear, is unspeakably higher and better than "the fear of the Lord," especially of a Lord who, through passion, jealousy, and caprice, was really dangerous to his subjects. Acceptance of the idea of a brotherhood of mankind, under the rule of a Deity at once just and beneficent, is a better basis for the expectation of universal peace than the messianic doctrine that peace is to be expected only after all other nations shall have been subjugated to the Jews. To understand that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands is better than to suppose him specially resident in an earthly habitation, whether at Mecca or Jerusalem. To worship in spirit and in truth, addressing the ever-present Father directly, without depending on priest or mediator, is better than pilgrimage to a place reputed holy; and to cultivate purity of body and spirit is better than all ablutions, penances, and rites of purification. When the Jews learn these things, they will be in a good position to send missionaries to the Christians.

MR. SPURGEON.

So much has been written about this most famous of English preachers, that it savors of temerity to venture upon an attempt to gauge the secrets, if secrets they be, of Mr. Spurgeon's unique position and influence. Within the limits of a single article it is possible to do little more than give a rapid outline of the facts as they score the development of a remarkable phase of non-conformist effort in our midst. The Baptist denomination has a singular history. Whatever its precise origin, we find that the Anabaptists as such were known in 1521, who not only held peculiar views upon the necessity of rebaptism at conversion, but were given to raising great social tumults, drawing upon themselves the wrath of the powers that were. Another sect were known as Abecedarians, because they declared it was wicked and useless to learn their A B C, since all human learning is founded on the alphabet, and knowledge was an obstacle to the reception of divine truth. Is it possible that Abecedarianism lingers among us yet under an alias? The Anabaptists paid dearly for their principles; in 1575, twenty-seven were apprehended for worshipping in Aldersgate Street, and ordered to recant; four consented, eleven were burnt, and nine were banished. Since then, no Baptist has been burnt in England, and only one imprisoned for life, in Newgate, in 1611, for conscience' sake. The Baptists of later times have been free from the extravagances of their ancestors, and with their sister-sect, the Congregationalists, may fairly appropriate their favorite expression, that they have been for the last two centuries the backbone of English liberalism,—a limited liberalism, doubtless, but sturdy and brave. The two grand divisions of the Baptist communion—the General or Arminian, and the Particular or Calvinistic—still exist, and lively is the internecine strife in the camp. We cannot now speak of the sub-sections which still exist, unfamiliar to the world without the pale, or much curious information might be extracted from the records of the Free-will Baptists, the Old School Baptists, the Six-principle Baptists, the Seventh-day Baptists, the Se-Baptists, the Hard-shell Baptists, the Campbellites, the Tunkers, and the rest. In the United Kingdom there are now some six thousand Baptist places of worship, and about two hundred and sixty-four thousand members,—membership involving adult immersion. Of late years, the growing resemblance of Non-conformist and Episcopal places of worship has become so striking that it promises to become a matter of no little difficulty to distinguish by the exterior church from chapel; indeed, the latter term is already becoming obsolete. This is but a phase of national development, though it has its deep significance; but the quest for the true cause of its hold upon the people must be made in rural districts. It is in the villages and small towns where the system can best be seen, and the intensity of its grip appreciated. The little whitewashed Zoar or Zion is something more than a "place of worship." There gather the earnest-hearted conservers of that grand old Puritanism which, if it lacked grace and culture, kept England sweet during a sultry time. With these meet the workers, all underrated they feel by the votaries of a more fashionable faith, and Zoar beams as a paradise below to the refugees from the social cold-shoulderings, who unconsciously transform it into a literal cave of Adullam. Here they weep over sin, and sing for salvation with all the zeal of the persecuted; and here they drink the cheering-cup as brethren to whom the parish church and its ritual are as rags of popery foisted into their own inheritance. Under such conditions men are produced whose lives and works are mysteries to the Church and the world. These latter know only the preacher, the pulpit orator, and ascribe, without thought or insight, successes to mere power of jaw. To how many is Spurgeon still a name without a meaning! The Churchman regards him coldly as an unlicensed trespasser on holy ground, but has found it prudent to bestow a gracious pat on the back for the passable imitation of the apostolic gift, as also in token of the valiant service done in the common cause. The man of the world thinks Spurgeon "a clever fellow," and his flock the opposite. The truth lies beyond these estimates. At seven years of age, Charles Haddon Spurgeon, son of a village pastor, was smitten with the desire to preach like his father. At sixteen, the ruling passion compelled the then usher of a small school to take a service each evening of the week, and two on Sundays. A precocious mind and a fluent speech started in the narrow channel of village Dissent were not allowed to broaden by contact with the great world. The "boy preacher," son of one whose life helped to fix that resolve, could not but follow his bent in the path cut before him. There is a strange but well-understood fascination in preaching to the reasonably capable mind. It offers a wide, an almost boundless field to the imagination. A man may speak his own thoughts as he cannot upon the stage; the political platform cannot be occupied from week to week; and in other departments of public work the audiences are more critical, and less under the spell of the speaker. The pulpit alone lets a man lash at will the follies, the hypocrisies, the sins of the people, and from its height alone can he reach down the terrors of eternity to lend human lips a power greater than his own. To the youthful this is an irresistible temptation. Young Spurgeon felt its charm, and, true to his training, rightly and with all honesty, resolved to proclaim the message he deemed put into his mouth. Naturally of a fearless, free-speaking temperament, the young man grew to be a wonder the country round. So unconventional a character struck the village mind, and in the ordinary course of events, he "went up to Jerusalem." The same results followed in London, where crowds, first of the brethren who welcomed one from their own ranks ungilded by university bookishness, and later by wondering outsiders, who mingled jeers with their praises of the palpable honesty of the stranger. At nineteen—possibly because he was nineteen—Mr. Spurgeon preached to larger crowds than flocked round any other minister. Unlimited abuse and ridicule, balanced by indiscriminate adulation, were the tutors of this period of his career, and the lesson was learned well. Mr. Spurgeon's theology was, and is, of the narrowest order; but this enabled him to paint his pictures in glowing colors, lit up with backgrounds of flame and lurid-lightning strokes of vengeance. It was the vehemence of his denunciation and the literal pictures of his heaven and hell that arrested the common mind; while his native geniality and bluntness, aided by a telling voice, had charms for others who cared only to listen as to an entertainment. The impetus thus given was wisely directed. At a cost of £30,000 the Tabernacle was built in 1861, and the fame of this man was spread the world over by the visitors to the World's Fair of the next year. The fund of common-sense which forms the stock-in-trade of Mr. Spurgeon's work, except his theology, has raised his name to a noble altitude. Great divines may have built up doctrines and reformed malpractices; but Spurgeon has reared enduring works which will live when "ologies" are dead. Six thousand hearers, comfortable pew-renters, smugly proud of the bigness of themselves and their edifice, gather together twice each Sunday to listen to a man who follows the conventional preaching idea in an unconventional way; they hear him lay down the narrow views of sectarian theology, illuminated here and there by gleams of homely wit and simplicity of eloquence; but the preaching is not the secret of the crowd. His preaching is not to the intellect, nor always to the heart, but sometimes to the sense of weakness and fear. Sometimes again, that clarion voice summons out of lethargy to national duty, in time of social agitation or struggle. Practical politics, party politics, are here preached, and preached with consummate effect. This lets light upon the secret of Spurgeon's continued influence. He lives the life of his people, of the people; he throbs with their sympathies; he is still the comforter, the guide, the brother of the little group in the Cave of Adullam, but now expanded until the cave is a stately temple, and the flock are a power in the first city in the world. There is the old fraternity, the community of interest, the homeliness of the little village group. And the worldling's ridicule, empty and wanton at best, has been transformed into admiration at the noble outcome of what looked like mere talk and applause. Mr. Spurgeon set to work early, practical man that he ever has been; to let something visible, tangible, grow out of that admiration of the boy-preacher. A church membership of three hundred and thirteen in 1854, which had grown to four thousand eight hundred and thirteen in 1875, should show results of earnestness; so, obedient to the wise plans of the leader, first there grew a college, wherein other young men inspired to do mission within the circumscribed area of Baptist work have been licked into shape by able tutors and professors for some eighteen years past. Scores of Spurgeon's men are now scattered over the country, ministering to flocks of from three thousand down to village conventicles. Each man of these tells of his schooling and of the beloved master by some personal trait, or unconscious (in some cases) imitations of Spurgonic peculiarities. £5,000 a year is given to this Pastors' College, mainly by the weekly offerings at the Tabernacle. A few years ago, a lady gave Mr. Spurgeon £20,000 to found an orphanage; and there, in Stockwell, stands the splendid institution, anything but institutional in its homely care and training of the two hundred and forty boys who are clad, fed, and started well in life. Another £5,000 is unfailingly forthcoming to maintain this noble work. The Colportage Association is another undertaking, in which the pastor is the life and soul. Forty-five men carry what are popularly said to be good books in various branches of literature to the poor and the working classes, doing missionary work. Looking over the list of good works ever being prosecuted around the Tabernacle, we see Bible-classes, a book fund for poor preachers, missions to Jews, town-missions, services for the blind, and social gatherings for kindred objects. Mr. Spurgeon is more than pastor,—he is political guide and counsellor; and while showing hospitality to the primitive Methodists, teetotalers, and other neighbors, he keeps open-house for political disestablishers of the National Church. Once a year the Tabernacle resounds with the cheers of those who would place every church in the land, and every professed minister upon the same level, with the same open field as that which was the only lot of the congregation and minister whose praise now fills the churches. But if he is a stalwart foe to the Establishment, Mr. Spurgeon is a valiant champion of the faith. That his sterling virtues have now universal recognition is not less a credit to his once revilers than a tribute to his rare geniality and superiority to everything petty. Such an influence as this comes from the life rather than the lips; it speaks in deeds more potently than in sermons. It is the exceptional instance of a man, floated up into notoriety by indiscriminate criticisms, who himself discriminates, takes a prompt and wise view of the situation, and, from that critical moment, sets to work to earn and win that which is best worth winning, instead of lapsing into the mere idol of a sect or grasping an empty bubble. Here, at last, is a true bishop of souls, with heart enough to have refused years ago rewards well earned from a willing people, remaining content with an annual stipend far below that pressed for his acceptance, and insignificant compared with emoluments pocketed by Episcopal laborers who could not personally conduct, much less initiate, the vast machinery, spiritual and material, in full work for years past at the Metropolitan Tabernacle.—London Echo.

THE OFFICE OF THE PRIEST.

PROFESSOR ADLER'S OPINION OF ANCIENT PRIESTS AND MODERN MINISTERS.

Professor Felix Adler lectured recently at Standard Hall before a large assemblage on "The Office of the Priest." He said: "The present movement for emancipation, which is travelling all over the world and agitating the souls of men in every civilized community, is not the product of individual minds; it is the rising reaction against the ungenerous systems of the past. It is idle to attack the leaders. The leaders are not the leaders; they are the white caps on the waves; the force lies below. It is not the men who are to blame; blame, if you must, the spirit of the age. The main thing is to control the elemental forces in this new movement, which have broken loose. A new feeling of freedom often intoxicates and leads some to destruction for destruction's sake, which is against reason and conscience. We should think well before giving up anything that is useful or that may be missed. Every ancient monument to religion has a claim upon us,—this, at least, that we study it; everything that has enjoyed the reverence of men must have had something of good in it. If it can be shown that some old religious usage was good in some bygone day, this, of itself, is often sufficient to show that it is time to abolish it now. The new thought needs new expressions.

"It is in this spirit that we come to consider the office of the priest. It may be viewed in two aspects: one singularly beautiful and impressive, a pure and saintly man devoted to the cause of religion, his thoughts and aims far removed from the multitude; the other most repulsive, making the name of 'priest' synonymous with 'knave,' a deep, artful, ambitious schemer, than whom there can be no worse enemy to human liberty. Both these are false; both are true. The priesthood richly deserve all the blame and condemnation they have received; but do we not also owe them much gratitude for their early services to mankind? To the ancient Grecian priests, and especially to those of the Delphic shrine, we owe the plastic arts for which Greece is famous. They encouraged healthful gymnastic exercises and the development of manly beauty; they were not merely idealistic, they were practical; they encouraged commerce, held great festivals for commercial transactions; they even performed, to a great extent, the office of the modern banker, guarding great treasures and lending money for great public enterprises. By their aid, too, Grecian sentiment and Grecian culture were planted beyond the seas. They gave us the alphabet. Astronomy was theirs, and the first computations of the calendar belong to them. History, too, had its birth with them; but of all their services the greatest was that of throwing a common bond of union around all the Hellenic race and thus forming the Greek nation. This was achieved by means of their religion; to Delphi all the Greeks turned their regards; at the Delphic altar they learned to join hands in mutual aid and help; there they sought mediation in times of war, and thus the worship of Delphi founded the Greek nationality. As in Greece, so in Palestine. Among the Hebrews the central sanctuary at Jerusalem served to combine the various parties in a spiritual bond of union. So far the influence of the priesthood was undoubtedly beneficial; they presided over science and art, pursued knowledge and took morals in their keeping.

"It is a grateful task to recall the services of a class with whose present representatives we have so little sympathy. It is asked, How is it that they have so degenerated, becoming oppressors of the people and enemies of liberty everywhere? It is by long and uninterrupted tenure of power too often abused,—a power constantly arrogated to themselves. For them, God is a king like a human king, having his ceremonials, and they, the priests, are his courtiers. All petitions must pass through them; to them he delegates his authority; they are his lieutenants, governors, or vicegerents on earth. Hence their arrogance. They are selected not for merit, but by grace; their follies are clothed with sanctity; with them obstinacy is zeal, stupidity is faith; they condemn whoever offends them and denounce the offenders as reprobates and outcasts. Observe the Christian priesthood! The author of Christianity, in mending the old, did not wish to make new methods. According to his teaching, the kingdom of heaven was close at hand, so the early Church was as little formal as possible. Every day might witness the millennial period; any hour might bring the Messiah; but after long waiting Christ did not come. It was upon the non-fulfilment of prophecies that Christianity was founded. The Church became a close corporation, a copy of the heavenly kingdom.

"Some one was wanted in place of Christ. Then arose the class called 'Episkopoi,' and 'Presbyters'; hence bishops and priests, or, according to the Greek derivation, superintendents and elders. They derived their power from God; every bishop was called a pope, or master, and styled himself 'Vicar of Christ.' When, in the person of Constantine, Christianity ascended the throne, it became necessary to limit the power of these popes, and so a system based upon the imperial civil service was adopted. At this time, the fourth century, there were still four coördinate bishops; but one supreme ruler was wanted. First, the title of Universal Bishop was conferred upon the Bishop of Constantinople; but Rome, the rival capital, was jealous, and afterwards succeeded in having her bishop styled the Pope and exercising the supreme power. How this power was used we know; how a man assuming to be a god became less than a man; what a career of profligacy, crime, oppression, and bloodshed was inaugurated in Rome,—all these things we know.

"With the Reformation there came a partial reform, but only partial. The excommunication was retained; the Protestant ministers also assumed the functions of 'vicars of Christ,' and remember the treatment of Puritans in England and America. To all these characteristics of the priesthood the Jews form an honorable exception. For eighteen centuries they had the sense not to revive the institution. Their so-called rabbis were only teachers, and their positions depended upon their merits and ability. The Jewish ministry of to-day is only seventy years old; it came in with the decrease in religious learning, which had formerly been the property of every intelligent Jew. The Jewish ministry includes many men whose names should ever be spoken with high praise for their noble efforts to reform the religious usages of their people. All honor to these noble men. But it is to be regretted that dogma has entered the synagogue. Alas! it is the dogma that makes the priest. Every priest is a rudimentary Pope; and, morally speaking, the office of the priest is no less perilous to the community than to the person who fills it. Then there is the danger of personal ambitions and clash of selfish interests. Hear their discussions, their reckless defamation of character, their invective. The basest, emptiest pulpit harangue passes unchallenged in the Church if only accompanied by a few quotations and set to the regular jingle. Hear them: 'In God's name I command you! In the name of heaven I forbid you!' as if the whole universe rested upon their shoulders. Poor, puny babblers. Ah, there comes a time when men outgrow their leading-string. Science, art, and morality are no longer the possession of the priesthood. With the new age a new evangel has come, and its motto is: A new redemption, not by the creed, but by the deed."—New York World.

AN ADDRESS

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE FREETHINKERS' ASSOCIATION OF CENTRAL AND WESTERN NEW YORK,

BY THEIR PRESIDENT, T. L. BROWN, M.D.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—

At Wolcott, N. Y., on the 19th of August, you organized a Freethinkers' Association of earnest, energetic men and women, in the interests of mental liberty as opposed to the usurpations of Church authority over those who cannot honorably subscribe to her dictum or teachings. Your demands seem fully to accord with the design and doctrine of the Constitution of our country and the teachings of science, while the fact that the clergy and the Church will be alike benefited in the consciousness that they are soon to cease using, in the name of their religion, money obtained by unjust church non-taxation will of itself be of sufficient importance to prevent their honest opposition to your efforts in the interests of a just God. You will not expect them to return the money they have already clerically wrung from you by extorting the taxes they should have paid on church property; but you will expect every honest Christian to help you obtain your rights and freedom from the tax he ought to pay. That which truly belongs to the Church as a religious body no free-thinker would, by the influence of liberty or science, try to extort from it in opposition to the Constitution of the country. Your first duty is to form town and county organizations in the interests of mental freedom, science, and free speech, not to oppose and war with those who think differently, but for the honorable purpose of removing the unjust fetters they have tyrannically put upon you. In your deliberations you will be directed by the reliable and honest teachings of the fathers of liberty, such men as Paine, Jefferson, Franklin, Washington, Lincoln, and Ingersoll. And instead of the superstition, dogma, faith, and belief, forced upon the young and innocent through the influence of Sunday-schools, books, tracts, Bibles, clerical and revival preaching, you will find in the writings and teachings of men in the ranks of science, like Dr. Wm. B. Carpenter, Herbert Spencer, Charles Darwin, Prof. Thomas H. Huxley, Prof. John Tyndall, Dr. John Wm. Draper, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, and many others, not less capable, but more timid, all you will need to liberate the mind from clerical errors and Evangelical tyranny. As available teachers you will first think of the educated, industrious, and efficient, Underwood, Bell, Jamieson, Miss Wixon, and other brave champions on the free platform, of what should be a free nation. Above all, avoid the selfish errors and angry strifes which to-day, as in the past, have kept the religious world defaming each other's honest intentions, and murdering one another for a difference of opinion. Promote liberty in its most radical claims in support of freethought, free investigation, free speech, free labor, free press, and a free use of all that can produce health of body and correct thought. Liberate children, women, and timid men from the fear and slavery of superstition, creed, and religious social oppression, by taking, reading, and distributing the Popular Science Monthly, the Boston Investigator, THE INDEX, the Truth Seeker, Common Sense, Banner of Light, Religio-Philosophical Journal, and like papers, books, tracts, and publications. Take into membership all persons of every class, who are willing to listen to the facts and truths of science, in the interests of universal liberty.

Remember that temperance, industry, health, honesty, justice, and success depend wholly upon the practice of human knowledge of the forms and uses of matter, the only available providence of our race. It is science in or out of the church you need most, to the exclusion of the Christian-adopted Pagan fables and myths of theology.

In the love of right, because it is right to you, organize in the honor of all you know that can promote a higher and truer estimate of human life, equal rights, and "universal mental liberty."

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Sept. 1, 1877.

THE POPULATION OF THE EARTH AND THE PROGRESS OF HYGIENE.

The most trustworthy estimate of the number of people in the world for the year 1876, as furnished by statisticians, is 1,423,917,000. This is an increase of over twenty-seven millions on the estimate of 1875; but the augmentation is not due entirely to the excess of births over deaths, but largely to the obtaining of more accurate information regarding the population of regions hitherto little known, and to more perfect census returns from all countries.

Asia is still the home of the majority of the human race. About four-sevenths of the earth's population, or 825,648,590, is Asiatic. Europe comes next with over a fifth, or 309,178,300; Africa with about a seventh, or 199,921,600; America with less than a sixteenth, or 85,519,800; and finally Australia and Polynesia, with the very small fraction of 4,748,600 people. Europe is the most densely populated, having 82 persons to the square mile; Asia, 48 to the square mile; Africa, 17½; and America and Australia, 5½ and 1½ respectively.

There are 215 cities with populations of over 100,000; 20 of half a million or more, and 9 containing a million or more inhabitants, each. Of these last, four are in China. New York—including Brooklyn, as we may rightfully do for purposes of comparison—and the greatest cities of the world stand in this order: London, 3,489,428; Paris, 2,851,792; New York, 1,635,822; Vienna, 1,091,999; Berlin, 1,044,000; Canton and three other Chinese cities, one million each. New York being third in the list of great cities, without counting our New Jersey overflow.

Though there are not at hand statistics upon which to base an accurate statement of the fact, yet it is the general conclusion of all observers that the average longevity of the human race has largely increased within a hundred years. The reported death-rates everywhere support this conclusion; and it is thoroughly proved that the devastations of epidemics are nothing like so great now as formerly. Medical science, in its preventive aspect especially, shows a steady advance in its ability to discover, prevent, and check diseases which in past ages devastated large communities. In London, for example, two centuries ago the mortality was 50 per one 1,000 and the average duration of life was only 20 years. The death-rate, 1680-79, 80; 1681-90, 42.1; 1746-55, 35.5; 1840-55, 24.9; 1871, about as at present, 22.0, and the mean duration of life is now 42 years. The same holds good throughout England. There and elsewhere in Europe, as also in this country, the subject of public hygiene has received great attention of recent years, and its difficulties are being steadily overcome. Men unquestionably live longer now than their ancestors lived, and have better average health, and that our descendants will gain on us in these respects there is but little reason to doubt.

As to great cities, New York is easily third in population, but behind all England, and English cities, many other European and most of other American cities, in health and average longevity. If it took in all its children, it would press hard on Paris for the second place in population, and before the next century is reached, or before it has advanced far, will probably know no superior in population except marvellous London.—Sanitarian for April.

ANOTHER CASE OF HERESY.

The Reformed Church has its hands full of heretics. Only a few weeks ago it deposed the Rev. Dr. Blauvelt from its ministry, and now the Rev. O. L. Ashenfelter, pastor of the Reformed Church, Carlisle, is about to be formally tried before Zion's classis on a charge of heresy. The New York Sun says: "At the regular meeting of Zion's classis, in Gettysburg, in May, a committee composed of ministers was appointed to investigate the case, and its report was laid before a special meeting of the classis at Littleton, Pa., last week. The long report in substance charged Mr. Ashenfelter with preaching doctrines inconsistent with those of the Reformed Church; that he denies the inspiration of the Bible, especially the Old Testament, and teaches that it is not to be regarded as an absolute rule of faith and life; that he denies eternal punishment of the wicked and teaches the final restoration of all men to heaven, contrary to the teachings of the Heidelberg catechism; and that he used unguarded and seemingly irreverent language in the pulpit, and permitted the same to be published, thus bringing reproach on the Church, undermining the faith of some in sacred things, and preparing the way for looseness in morals. The report was adopted as a bill of indictment, and the trial for heresy will take place in a few weeks, as soon as both sides are prepared."

The Rev. Mr. Ashenfelter is thirty-two years of age. He belongs to the Mercersburg school of theologians. His father was a freethinker. He is an able and attractive speaker, and his eloquence and social qualities secured for his church a large membership, which upholds him in his trial. He is known as the most attractive speaker in the ministry of Carlisle, and abstracts of his most important sermons were published in the Carlisle Mirror, his occasional radical utterances giving him numerous hearers and readers. His views are about as radical as those of Dr. Blauvelt, and are to a marked degree similar. He also stands boldly by his views, and his contributions to the newspapers, even to those of radical thought, always appear under his own name. He has resigned his pastorate, to take effect September 1, a step he has for some years contemplated on account of failing health. The trial will excite considerable interest, as his has been the first promulgation of heresy in the Cumberland Valley, where the Orthodox teachings and influences of the Presbyterian settlers still strongly prevail.—Investigator, Aug. 29.

SAND.

BY MRS. H. T. CLARK.

A careless hand on wayside sand
Flung withering sprigs of "morning" vine,
Nor ever dreamed that fruitage fine
Should rise from wrecks of "glory" past.

Scanty and poor the soil it clasped
With elfin fingers underground;
Yet, groping silently, it found
Its tiny food, and joyous grasped

The thing it longed for; swift and sure,
Into the sunlit air, it reared
Its graceful head, nor ever feared
That it should lack for dainties pure.

From the brown bosom of its nurse
Life of all life the suckling drew.
It crowned itself with fire and dew,
The nectar of the Universe;

Then flamed in royal Tyrian forth,
And flanked itself with crimson, blue,
And silver, proudly to the view,
Among the kings of all the earth.

Oh, heart! cast down on barrenness,
Dread not that you will starve and die;
The chemistry of love apply,
To make the flinty soil confess

Its hidden stores and yield them up,
That you may lift your fruitage fair,
Shed beauty on the golden air,
And match the morning-glory's cup!

The Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 13, 1877.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FEET, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

REV. DAVID A. WASSON has favored us with a noble specimen of his own agricultural skill in the shape of a very large and handsome potato, belonging to the new "Snowflake" variety and weighing one and three-quarters pounds! It was mealy in two senses, being not only remarkably nice in quality, but also sufficient in quantity to furnish what the Westerners style a "good square meal." But Mr. Wasson is doing very wrong, if he seriously contemplates getting up next winter a snow-storm of such flakes as these, without giving timely notice of his performance and furnishing the pedestrian public with cast-iron umbrellas.

"J. D." A WRITER in the Christian Register of Sept. 1, in an article headed "A Layman's View of the Freethinkers' Convention," at Wolcott Grove, regards "these freethinkers" as "the product of a ruder or a less advanced civilization," and, while conceding that they are honest and intelligent, asks: "Why, then, do they stand in their equivocal position, and, with an apparent air of defiance, decry those sentiments which have been always near and dear to us, and which are, in fact, the whole basis of our ideal life? It is because they are in the dark. They have revolted from the faith in which they were born, or to which they were expected to bow in submission; and, as is usual in all revolts, their acquired momentum has carried them too far, and has led them to take and to defend positions which their cooler judgments can scarcely justify. They have not known that there was another and a higher ground,—a ground whereon every true man may stand, where we have the ideal Christianity from which all superstition is eliminated; which, in short, is Unitarian Christianity. Many of these men are to-day Christians, and follow the teachings of the Divine Master far more closely than they who bow to creed and dogma, and who forget the spirit. Personal integrity, a careful regard for the rights of our fellows, charity, forgiveness, self-sacrifice, unselfishness, what are all these and where do we find them? They are the fruits of Christianity, the products of the seed sown eighteen centuries ago, and wherever exhibited in their fulness they mark the true Christian. Shall we look for them alone where truth is shrouded in incomprehensible mystery, or shall we accept these fruits as evidences wherever they may be, and say to him who exhibits them, 'Thou art a Christian?'" There is a self-complacent conceit in these criticisms which is positively ludicrous. A Unitarian, forsooth, complaining of a "freethinker" for holding "an equivocal position"! What infatuation! The adopted "creed" of the Convention was "Universal Mental Liberty"; while that of the Unitarians from the beginning has been "Spiritual Freedom and the Authority of Christ." We will leave it to common-sense to decide which of these is the "equivocal position." Further, as to being "in the dark," this writer believes that "personal integrity, regard for the rights of our fellows," etc., are the "fruits of Christianity, the products of the seed sown eighteen centuries ago"—as if there had been no such thing as integrity before Jesus was born! If "J. D." can find anything half so absurd or "dark" as this in any utterance at Wolcott Grove, we will admit without hesitation that he is himself the one kerosene lamp created by Providence to enlighten the solar system.

"WHAT IS THE CREED OF LIBERALISM?"

A communication from Mr. H. Clay Neville, published under the above caption on a succeeding page of this issue, raises a question of such great moment, and one on which it seems so difficult to remove certain misapprehensions rooted in the universal preconceptions of the Christian community, that we are impelled to make it the topic of a special article. The over-generous personal reference which Mr. Neville prefixes to the pertinent questions he puts has alone made us hesitate to avail ourselves of his permission to print his letter; for such things as these, gratifying and encouraging as we confess they are, we seldom communicate to our readers, and never, we trust, except for some better reason than vanity or egotism. But the concluding portion of Mr. Neville's letter, containing the questions which we wish to answer as plainly and as unequivocally as possible, would lose much of its weight, if not viewed in the light of the pure and elevated aspirations unconsciously revealed in the writer's mind by the earlier portion; and therefore, in justice to the writer himself, we publish the letter entire.

"How far, I would like to know," inquires Mr. Neville, "do the principles expressed in 'Truths for the Times' represent the creed of Liberalism?" So far only, we reply, as these principles find an approving response in the minds of liberals themselves; and how far this is the case, only the liberals themselves are able to tell. It was our object and aim, in preparing that Index Tract (which we did with the utmost pains, long reflection, and careful revision), to draw up such a clear and condensed statement as should contain all that is essential to Liberalism, and nothing that is non-essential—one that should commend itself, by its comprehensiveness of scope, depth of insight, and exactness of expression, to all the best minds in the liberal ranks, and yet should be perfectly intelligible to all those who, without demanding philosophical or systematic entirety, are yet inspired by the hunger and thirst for freedom in the search for religious truth. Very few, we knew at the time and know better still now, appreciate the value of systematic thinking; it is taken (we think very foolishly) to be a mark of superior intellect to treat all systems with contempt, as if they were attempts to cram the universe into a baby-house; a vast deal of gasconade to this effect has passed current among liberal-minded people, as if it were double-distilled wisdom. Nevertheless, the truth of Nature is an absolute unity in itself; and the knowledge of all truth, could it be attained, would reflect this unity in a perfect and all-embracing system. Hence we sought, at the very outset of our endeavor to give to Free Religion, Radicalism, or Liberalism (we care not what name is preferred) an organ intellectually worthy of it, to present a bird's-eye view of all that really constitutes its essence,—to give to the aimless and discordant elements of the great liberal movement a consciousness of unity, both in thought and effort, yet without compromising or imperiling in the least that perfect freedom which all ecclesiastical attempts at unity have invariably destroyed. That this result has not yet been achieved in full, though it has certainly been promoted to some degree by THE INDEX, is as evident to us as to any; yet the fault is not ours. A time will come when this result will be reached—when "the principles expressed in 'The Truths for the Times'" will not only be comprehended intellectually, as the only "creed" that free humanity can ever unite upon, but constitute the framework of that nobler society towards which the world is slowly tending. This is simply our individual belief; of course it "represents" the belief of nobody who objects to it.

"How do we know what the belief of Liberalism is?" Not by any vote on a "creed," no matter if all who call themselves liberals could be induced to adopt one unanimously,—any more than we know the real belief of ecclesiastics by the creeds they profess to believe. The moment it comes to votes on such matters, a thousand influences combine to render the votes worthless in the estimation of every philosophic mind. Self-interest, timidity, stupidity, fashion, misunderstanding,—countless causes operate to prevent the creed from being a trustworthy exponent of many minds. It is time to comprehend this fact. No farce could be so grotesque, had it not been historically so ghastly and cruel, as the pretence that the creed adopted by a multitude of voters expresses a real unanimity of thought. Men have burned each other at the stake for rejecting dogmas which no two minds ever construed alike. What barbarity—what idiocy! There is no way to arrive at the common belief of any large number of religionists which can claim a higher certainty than that of mere approximation—of guess more or less lucky, of observation more or less acute, of analysis more or less profound. You may easily get at the formulas which bodies of men unitedly profess to believe; but the subtle variations of thought, the inevitably different meanings attached to words, the mental reservations or qualifications made by each votary to suit his own case, render all such formulas mere rough symbols, inaccurate and defective, of the beliefs really entertained. When churches adopt creeds, it ought to be understood that they merely agree to exact from their members a profession of belief in certain forms of word, but that they are powerless to secure a real unity of thought by any such device. What their members really believe can be determined only approximately from the most rigorously enforced creeds. Hence Liberalism is not so much worse off than the churches as is supposed, with respect to a criterion of common belief; a large allowance for individual deviations from professed standards must be made in any case, and a creed of definite tenets, even if adopted by all liberals, would still leave Mr. Neville in great doubt as to what they really believe.

"Who is authorized to speak for this heterogeneous mass of freethought?" Nobody. The very essence of Liberalism (as the derivation of the word from the Latin "liber, free," denotes) is the love of liberty; and that is why we like the name. No liberal even pretends to define the belief of others than himself, except as his own statement based on his individual observation and reflection. The value of such an unauthorized statement may be very great, but it must be measured by the degree of its actual conformity with the fact. He who sees the most and the deepest into the logic of liberty will make the most valuable statement of what Liberalism is; but no authority can be claimed for it save the authority of truth. With such authority as this the true liberal must be and will be content; to ask more is to ask that which denies liberty, the very essence of Liberalism. When the new Freethinkers' Association of Central and Western New York adopted "universal mental liberty" as the only "creed of the society," they were perfectly true to the genius of Liberalism; though perhaps a better word than "creed" could have been chosen to designate it. Faith in the principle of free humanity—freedom of the human mind to search for truth according to its own laws, and to determine what truth is according to the preponderance of scientific evidence,—that is the only principle that can unite all liberals, and it is a principle whose enormous cohesive power is little suspected by the world to-day. It will by no means leave the human mind empty of definite conclusions. Just as scientific men unite in associations for the discovery and spread of physical truth without any "creed" whatever, and by this common coöperation build up vast structures of definite knowledge on the basis of simple freedom of thought, so will liberals, if they unite on the same basis, gradually establish a unity of religious belief without dogmas. The inherent self-demonstrativeness of truth must be trusted to create this unity. We must all be patient enough to wait for it; any impatience to anticipate the results of discovery by adopting a premature creed would end necessarily in bigotry, intolerance, tyranny. It is exceedingly useful to multiply individual statements grouping the results of study and thought on religious matters into systematic form; the more of these, the better; and the best will in the end gradually win universal assent, as intrinsically true. The "Truths for the Times" is such an individual statement as this—nothing more; and if it is good, it will yet be appreciated at its just value. Let every thinker try his hand at constructing such a statement, for it will teach him, at least, much that is useful to know by personal experience, and much that can be learned in no other way. But all such statements will be utterly valueless as exponents of Liberalism, if they in one particular violate the logic of intellectual liberty.

"But what is the representative belief, either religious or moral, of Liberalism?" We have already answered this question: "universal mental liberty," as the Wolcott meeting declared, and as the Free Religious Association declared in substance long before it. This belief is not a dead product (such as all dogmas always are), but a living, eternally productive principle. With this we must be satisfied, or else prove our own incapacity to comprehend the new civilization that is slowly dawning on the world. To put any specific belief, such as theism or atheism, spiritualism or materialism, Christianity or any other special religion, in the place of this great principle, would be to go back to the sterility of dogmatic authority, not forward to the fertility of scientific and spiritual freedom. Between these two we must take our choice.

This conclusion applies to all that is the subject of human thought, not excepting the sphere of morals. Moral truth must substantiate itself to the human mind exactly like any other kind of truth; there is no more room for dogmatism in ethics than in geology; scientific morality is the only morality that can permanently sustain itself, and this position is a part of Liberalism. Out of the love of truth and the love of liberty must all knowledge of the truth grow. If the "free love" theory is true, it will prevail; if, as we believe, it is a monstrously silly and sophistical piece of diseased sentimentality, it will die out like any other ephemeral folly. But it cannot be combated by proscription, which is only kicking burning embers into the midst of combustible matter, nor yet by any collective vote in favor of ethical common-sense; it will perish of its own bad logic, if not dignified by persecution.

"How can we expect any unity of action among liberals until there is some unity of belief? Mere negotiations will not make a basis of union for active workers. We must have a common affirmative belief before we can accomplish any constructive work." Mr. Neville certainly represents a large class of perplexed minds in propounding these questions. We wish we could convince them that faith in liberty is the most thoroughly "affirmative belief" that can be named; for this is true. The vast body of verified truths known as modern science is the result of this faith in liberty, and of nothing else. The human mind is naturally constructive; take off its fetters, and it forthwith proceeds to construct. What constitutes to-day the construction supremely necessary to human welfare is such social and political conditions as shall foster, and not repress, this natural constructiveness of the freed mind of man. To create these conditions is the sublime task and mission of Liberalism. The moment that liberals in general comprehend this supreme duty, and leap to their feet like men to perform it, they will find that they do already possess such an "affirmative belief" as shall lead them at once to "unity of action." The National Liberal League is but an embodied voice inviting them to this great destiny. Would that we could make it heard in every liberal conscience throughout the land! If liberals want to know the power they possess but despise, let them give themselves to the work of the National Liberal League in heroic self-devotion, and they will find all the moral forces of the universe at their back. "Construct?" Aye, but not a new creed! Give the world a radically new society—a social state of which the foundation shall be the universal love of truth, freedom, justice! Let us not hanker after the creed-fleets of Christianity, but press forward to build up that Commonwealth of Man whose corner-stone shall be the enfranchised human soul!

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S CHALLENGE.

Every liberal will hail with great satisfaction the bold and original proposition by which Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, in the appended letter, challenges the Orthodox world to prove the defamatory stories it has so long circulated concerning the death-beds of Paine and Voltaire. If the challenge is declined or ignored, so much the worse for the sincerity of those who profess to believe them. If they are true, never was there a better or fairer opportunity to establish their truth; and if those who have so loudly and dogmatically affirmed them in their pulpits really believe them to be true, there will be no dodging. We suspect, however, that the Orthodox press and pulpit will neither cease to retail them nor yet pick up the gauntlet so pluckily thrown at their own feet. Let all who would gladly see justice done in this matter help at least to give the widest possible publicity to Colonel Ingersoll's challenge, so that the cowardice of calumny may be exposed to the general contempt. A more effective vindication of the slandered dead could not have been devised; and the dignified, just, and formidably earnest spirit of the letter will command universal applause.

PEORIA, Ill., Aug. 31, 1877.

F. E. ABBOT, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—I have sent a letter to the editor of the New York Observer of which the enclosed is a copy. You can publish it if you think best.

Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

PEORIA, Ill., Aug. 31, 1877.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK OBSERVER:—

I have been informed that you accepted, in your paper, an offer made by me to any clergyman in San Francisco. That offer was, that I would pay one thousand dollars in gold to any minister in that city, who would prove that Thomas Paine died in terror because of religious opinions he had expressed, or that Voltaire did not pass away serenely as the coming of the dawn.

For many years religious journals and ministers have been circulating certain pretended accounts of the frightful agonies endured by Paine and Voltaire when dying; that these great men at the moment of death were terrified because they had given their honest opinions upon the subject of religion to their fellow-men. The imagination of the religious world has been taxed to the utmost in inventing absurd and infamous accounts of the last moments of these intellectual giants. Every Sunday-school paper, thousands of idle tracts, and countless stupidities, called sermons, have been filled with these calumnies.

Paine and Voltaire were both believers in God—both hoped for immortality—both believed in special providence. But both denied the inspiration of the Scriptures—both denied the divinity of Jesus Christ. While theologians most cheerfully admit that most murderers die without fear, they deny the possibility of any man who has expressed his disbelief in the inspiration of the Bible, dying except in an agony of terror. These stories are used in revivals and in Sunday-schools, and have long been considered of great value.

I am anxious that these slanders should cease. I am desirous of seeing justice done, even at this late day, to the dead.

For the purpose of ascertaining the evidence upon which these death-bed accounts really rest, I make to you the following proposition:—

First.—AS TO THOMAS PAINE: I will deposit with the First National Bank of Peoria, Illinois, one thousand dollars in gold, upon the following conditions: This money shall be subject to your order when you shall, in the manner hereinafter provided, substantiate that Thomas Paine admitted the Bible to be an inspired book, or that he recanted his infidel opinions—or that he died regretting that he had disbelieved the Bible—or that he died calling upon Jesus Christ in any religious sense whatever.

In order that a tribunal may be created to try this question, you may select one man, I will select another, and the two thus chosen shall select a third, and any two of the three may decide the matter.

As there will be certain costs and expenditures on both sides, such costs and expenditures shall be paid by the defeated party.

In addition to the one thousand dollars in gold, I will deposit a bond with good and sufficient security in the sum of two thousand dollars, conditioned for the payment of all costs in case I am defeated. I shall require of you a like bond.

From the date of accepting this offer you may have ninety days to collect and present your testimony, giving me notice of time and place of taking depositions. I shall have a like time to take evidence upon my side, giving you like notice, and you shall then have thirty days to take further testimony in reply to what I may offer. The case shall then be argued before the persons chosen; and their decision shall be final as to us.

If the arbitrator chosen by me shall die, I shall have the right to choose another. You shall have the same right. If the third one, chosen by our two, shall die, the two shall choose another; and all vacancies, from whatever cause, shall be chosen upon the same principle.

The arbitrators shall sit, when and where a majority may determine, and shall have full power to pass upon all questions arising as to competency of evidence and upon all subjects.

Second.—AS TO VOLTAIRE: I make the same proposition. If you will substantiate that Voltaire died expressing remorse or showing in any way that he was in mental agony because he had attacked Catholicism—or because he had denied the inspiration of the Bible—or because he had denied the divinity of Christ.

I make these propositions because I want your people to stop slandering the dead.

If the propositions do not suit you in any particular, please state your objections, and I will modify them in any way consistent with the object in view.

If Paine and Voltaire died filled with childish and silly fear, I want to know it, and I want the world to know it. On the other hand, if the believers in superstition have made and circulated these cruel slanders concerning the mighty dead, I want the world to know that.

As soon as you notify me of the acceptance of these propositions I will send you the certificate of the bank that the money has been deposited upon the foregoing conditions, together with copies of bonds for costs. Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

THE LABOR QUESTION AND THE LAUNDRY.

The following brief communications, published in successive issues of the Boston Advertiser, are sufficiently spicy to interest the general reader:—

The Chinese and the Laundry.

Dear Sir:—Please make this appear in your paper as soon as possible, and oblige—I know you will—

A GREAT NUMBER OF THE GENTLER SEX.

The Chinese people seem to have a natural instinct for the laundry, and also for low prices in doing laundry work, and by their so acting under these instincts greatly injure a number of poor American women, together with a great many foreign women who are poor also, and who maintain themselves entirely by washing and ironing. We have struggled long enough now with this direful and formidable affliction. We women consider the laundry a place for women only; and when we see this one and only support of the poor women monopolized by a set of men, and those men the half-civilized Chinese, we think it is about time to plead to the authorities to see if they can't mitigate our misfortune. I think there ought to be a very strict law in governing these Chinese laundries. If they be allowed to keep them they ought to be charged a good round sum for a license; they ought to be made to carry to and bring from the houses the clothes they receive to be done up; and there ought to be a fixed lowest price, not descending to a less sum than seventy-five cents per dozen, and any clothes "done up," i. e., washed and ironed, for less money than this (seventy-five cents) to be considered as a criminal offence, and punishable as such. This is a subject which ought not to be passed off thoughtlessly, but which ought to be read with a good deal of feeling and a determination to help along the wives of a good many of our former best citizens and soldiers, who are now deceased. When it comes to this part of our history where the citizen's wife, sometimes being a native of the country, is pushed behind the door to be superseded by one of these "pig-tailed" foreigners, I must say things have come to a pretty pass.

KATE MANSELL, a Boston female, for the rest of the washerwomen.

Boston, August 29, 1877.

"Rally Round the Tub, Girls."

I would suggest that, in addition to the new law which "Kate Mansell" thinks should be passed, if those horrid, "half-civilized," "pig-tailed" Chinese will insist upon offering to do our washing, it should also be provided that the said Chinese shall not only charge "not less than seventy-five cents per dozen," and "carry and bring the clothes from the houses," but also that they shall furnish new clothes, of the best quality, free of cost, whenever their patrons need them; also, that "a good, round sum for a license" shall be charged any one (white, black, or yellow) who shall offer to do any washing, unless recommended by "Kate Mansell, a Boston female." In short, let us so arrange things that nobody shall do anything but "We and our friends," and let us charge accordingly. It really looks as if the old saying of "every tub to stand on its own bottom" might have to be upset. A BOSTON HOODLUM, for the rest of the hoodlums.

"The Chinese and the Laundry."

There appeared in your paper dated August 31 an article headed "The Chinese and the Laundry," which seemed to me so unfair that I cannot let it pass without a protest. To quote from the writer: "The Chinese people seem to have a natural instinct for the laundry, and also for low prices in doing laundry work." I wish to know why any one should object to that? If our washing can be done cheaper and better by some real and dexterous Chinaman, why should we give it to some not over-particular Irishwoman, who will charge us more? As for the plea urged by the writer of the article, that "the laundry is a place for women only," we wish to inquire why, when men are so efficient in the kitchen and tailor-shop, they should be debarred from any "woman's work" when they can enter and compete fairly with her. I am not aware that any license is required to enable Bridget to take in our washing; therefore why expect John Chinaman to "pay a good round sum"? Neither do I know why the writer refers to washing as "the one and only support of the poor woman." Apart from the various kinds of needlework, there are many good places waiting for those who are not too proud to "live out." In conclusion, let me say that there is no need for any citizen's wife to be pushed behind the door if she is able to stand in front of it, and that the slur of being "half-civilized" need not be applied to a foreigner because he washes at seventy-five cents a dozen.

A FRIEND TO SUFFRAGE.

RELIGIOUS SNOBBERY REBUKED.

Here is a bit of correspondence which illustrates at once the insufferable impudence of a Christian clergyman and the dignified self-respect of a Jewish Mayor. Will Christians never learn that they make fools of themselves by claiming an especial right to administer this government, and tyrants when they succeed in any degree in doing it? Here are the letters:—

"TAUNTON, July 7, 1877.

"Sir,—It appears to be very generally supposed that you, who have become our mayor, are an unbaptized person, and, consequently, not a Christian. If, as I hope is the case, there be no truth in this supposition, will you authorize me publicly to say so, and thus relieve very many persons in our town from an exceedingly painful and distressing impression? It would also be an act of justice to the aldermen and town councillors who have elected you to free them from the imputation under which they now rest of having knowingly chosen for the chief officer and in some sense representative of our town one who does not believe in Him whom they themselves profess not only to believe in, but to worship as their Lord and God. I propose to publish this letter, together with any answer which you may send to it.

"I am your obedient servant,

"FRED'K SMITH,

"Vicar of St. John's, Taunton.

"To the Worshipful the Mayor."

"TAUNTON, July 9, 1877.

"TO THE REV. F. SMITH, VICAR OF ST. JOHN'S: "Rev. Sir,—I have received a letter bearing your signature, and, but for recognizing your writing, would have deemed it a forgery. I am proud to avow myself a member of the Hebrew faith and of a people who in free England have attained some of the highest official positions in the land. I am equally proud to know that my Christian neighbors and friends have not permitted religious differences to influence them in the choice of their first mayor.

"I shall ever retain a pleasing recollection of the high distinction that has been conferred upon me, and shall not permit anything to mar the pleasure I feel in subscribing myself

THE SCIENCE OF UNIVERSOLOGY.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

NO. XVI.

The absolute and the relative were the burden of the preceding article. These stand correlate with matter and form; more properly with substance and form. The substance of things is absolutoid; the form of things is relatoid. Substance repeats the absolute; form repeats the relative. Substance and the absolute are unisimal; form and the relative are duisimal. Again, substance and the absolute accord with homogeneity, which is also unisimal (all-of-one-sort-of); form and the relative accord with heterogeneity, which is also duisimal (of-other-sort-of); hence of two-or-more-sorts).

Spencer establishes the fact that evolution proceeds along a line of progression from a state of indefinite, incoherent homogeneity, to a state of definite, coherent heterogeneity. Let us see if these several specifications cannot be reduced to a broader, and, in fine, to an all-inclusive generalization. Homogeneity is the unity, or rather the spirit of the unity, of the substance; not of the form, of things. Indefiniteness—the absence of limits—is the unity or unisim of the form; and not of the substance of things; and incoherence is the unisimal state of either or both the substance and the form of things, considered or held separately or apart. So, again, heterogeneity is the duism (or diversity-element) of the substance, not of the form of things. Definiteness is the duism (or diversity-element) of the form, not of the substance of things; and, in fine, coherency is the duism in unisim, the trisim, or higher and compound unisim, of the substance-and-the-form, in a combined harmony, inseparable in nature, while yet distinguishable as two.

There is, in addition to all these, the phase of trisim; which is the combination (unisimal) and the differentiation (duisimal) of all the three preceding phases, the unity in variety, or the variety in unity, which is the final and integrative aspect of all beings, of all particular spheres of being, and of all objects, things, thoughts, or ideas, whatsoever.

It results from this analysis that Spencer's complicated definition of evolution (First Principles, p. 216) is resolvable into this simple formula: a progressive change from unisim (the spirit of unity or oneness) to duism (the spirit of duality, twoness, and higher diversity), and thence to trisim (the spirit of three as uniting the one and the two) and so to tri-unisim, as recombining all the prior aspects in a complex but intricated unity—(Integralism). To restate this revised definition of the law of evolution, omitting parenthetical inserts, it is as follows: Evolution is the natural and orderly procession from a unisimal to a duisimal state of existence; and thence by combination, to a trisimal state; and thence again, by reversion and subsumption, to a tri-unisimal state or stage which is final or ultimate.

It is a great point in the progression of scientific philosophy, as Mr. Spencer has himself shown, when we can enlarge and thereby simplify our generalizations; and it is an immense simplification when his formidable definition of evolution can be referred to the simple progression of the numerical series, through its first stadium, from one to three, lapping back upon one, and subsuming the two. We have, indeed, not merely enlarged the generalization, and simplified the definition, but we have extended the definition itself, and the view of evolution so given, two degrees higher than the point to which it is carried by Mr. Spencer. He goes only from 'one to two,—from unisim to duism; whereas, we now go forward to the trisim (only faintly embraced in his term coherency), and thence to tri-unisim, as the complicated and integrative final aspect of things. But we have done still more; when, by referring these first principles to the first, principal, or head numbers of the numerical series, we discover the source from which principles emanate, and, at the same time, procure a canon of criticism upon the whole current of our reasoning on the subject.

This recurrence to numerical considerations, as the origins of truth, may excite suspicion in some minds of a theological animus; and the skittish Unitarian theologian may reluct to concede so much to Trinitarianism as that the trinity and the tri-unity of Orthodox theology, should turn out after all to be legitimate and fundamental technicalities of the philosophy of science. Radical philosophy, tending ultimately to universal reconciliation, must at times trench upon existing prejudices; and while Unitarian theology must concede this point, the surrender will be more than compensated by the demand on Orthodoxy to concede that the doctrine of the Trinity was no original theological dogma at all, but was borrowed by the Church from the metaphysicians. The earliest abstract thinkers, it cannot be doubted, had their attention focused on inceptive mathematical conceptions with an intensity which has had no parallel in the subsequent ages. When mathematics as a science began to be developed, the thoughtful attention of the world swung away from the consideration of the fountain to follow the stream; and it is only now, and from the universo logical point of view, that we are recurring to the mental posture of the earliest thinkers. Recall the fact, now almost never reflected upon, that for many generations the best thinking faculty of mankind must have been concentrated on elaborating so much of mathematics as would furnish an incipient multiplication table, say three times three, and upon establishing the distinct idea of a cube and a triangle. Indeed, to reach the construction of a multiplication table, even in its simplest form, was a finality of achievement, and not by any means a beginning-point in this earliest scientific curriculum. Think then how much more closely the primal numbers of the series of numbers one, two, and three must have been studied by those ancient students than they ever are by us. Think how naturally they would find in them something more than mere numbers; how certain the head numbers would be to become eminent symbols, the sources of principles and laws, in the distribution of all other things and ideas. When, subsequently, mathematical science took on an enlarged growth, and these primitive speculations were left behind, so far as the purposes of science were concerned, the ideas had of them remained, traditionally, as the basis of metaphysics; and falling into the common mind, and only partially understood, they first became antique mysteries; and, finally, were absorbed into theology as sacred dogmas. Thence they have come down to our day, to make the staple of Church doctrine, and of the disquisitions of the saints; in all which, however, the Church has been doing excellent service in preserving the seeds of a larger truth than that with which the mere scientific career was concerning itself.

The discussion between Trinitarians and Unitarians reduces itself under this analysis, to the simple primitive question which must have arisen among the earliest thinkers as to whether the first three numbers (one, two, three,) are the collective head of all number or count, or whether the single number, one, is the true head of the whole series; and we may fancy a very lively conflict of opinion on this then governing question of the hour among those primitive scientists of the olden world. On the one hand, one being the head of the odd numbers must have seemed in some sense unfitted, by this special destination, to serve as the total head; and two being the head of the even numbers, and three the head of the joint series, the one-two-and-three advocates had a strong case. On the other hand, the demand in the human mind, which is very strong, for simplicity and simple unity, favored the champions of the number one.

We are the inheritors of that old controversy in its theological and later form; and in this simple reversion to its origin is the solution and the reconciliative finality of the contest between Trinitarians and Unitarians. Each contestant is right, from a given point of view; and each is wrong in so far as denying the rightfulness of the other. Indeed, as the general basis of reconciliation, in controversy at large, we may assume it to be safe to affirm the affirmations and to negate the negations of each party in the discussion; for, usually, wherever any human eye, material or mental, sees an object or a truth, there there is an object or a truth to be seen; whereas, the failure to see what another sees is no certain indication of its non-existence.

The evolution of the doctrine of the Trinity was doubtless this: the number one, as a universal symbol, could not maintain itself without breaking into two; any more than the absolute can maintain itself (Spinoza-like) without breaking into the relative. One (after this revolt and fall from the primitive heaven) then remaining (so bereft) became the symbol merely of what was deemed good and true, whole (or holy), and hence, divine; while two, signifying revolt, transgression, in-fraction, and opposition, became the symbol of what was bad, un-holy, partial, un-divine. In other words, one (ro'ev) was, thereafter, the symbol of God and his goodness and two, of their Satan or opposite (fiend or enemy), and his badness or evil,—“the devil and his works.” In the old Persian theology, these two were recognized as equal and eternal counter-operating principles in the nature of things,—as they are shown to be, universo logically; except that each is in turn shown to functionate in the rôle of good-and-evil. Later, the unity was redistributed, not now into two but into three aspects or parts, omitting the element of evil; one being God the Father; two, God the Son (proceeding); three, that which proceeded from, enveloped, and united the other two,—the Holy Spirit.

We may now note that these discriminations, purely metaphysical and related to numbers or the origins of mathematics, reveal another and higher source of metaphysical reasoning than that which we find in our Histories of Philosophy,—a prehistoric exposition of philosophy, only or chiefly preserved to us through theology. The later and historical origin of philosophy was not a metaphysics of number or mathematics, but a metaphysics of material Nature. We are all familiar with Thales and his water-origin of things; with Anaximenes with his air-origin, etc.,—the Ionic school. “They sought for the universal essence of concrete being; they found this essence in a material substance or substratum; and they gave some intimation respecting the derivation of the elements from this original matter.” Pythagoras alone stands out, mystical, uncomprehended, as doubtless a reversion to the older and higher form of philosophy of his day, traditionally descended, asserting that the origins of all things are to be sought for and found in number, or the principles of number.

When, five hundred or a thousand years later, the fathers of the Christian Church found themselves confronted by the necessity of forming some theory of the relations of the Christ of their theology to God the universal Father, this old, original and traditional strain of philosophy touching the relations of the one, the two, and the three, came fittingly to their relief. The natural proclivity of religious speculation for what is ancient, mystical, and obscure also favored the adoption of this more antique and less hackneyed form of philosophy; and so the body of Christian theology was gradually elaborated by the smelting of the Jewish and older Persian systems which rested on the primal difference of one and two (God and devil), with the later Gnosticism which rested on the larger difference of the one, two, and three. The two cosmical principles already received, viz., the world-soul and the world-reason, were distributed to God the Father and God the Son (the logos), and a third was added by the new Platonists, which was assigned to the Holy Spirit.

To recur to Mr. Spencer's definition of evolution, we may now say that homogeneity and heterogeneity are the unisim and duism of substance; that indefiniteness and definiteness are the unisim and duism of form; and that incoherency and coherency are the unisim and duism of embodiment, as compounded of substance and form.

But as between the substance, the form, and the embodiment of things, as in part already shown, it is the substance which is unisimal, the form which is duisimal, and the embodiment which is trisimal. It is especially the difference between substance and form to which I wish now to direct attention. These, we have seen, are repeated by the subdivisions of substance into homogeneity and heterogeneity. This discrimination is much insisted on by Spencer; but he has founded nothing upon it in the region of classification. Elsberg has supplied this deficiency. Spencer makes the fundamental difference between the sciences to be that which separates the abstract from the concrete sciences. Elsberg, recognizing and insisting on this difference, also as very fundamental, goes back of it, and discriminates between what he calls the “aspectual” and the departmental sciences; aspectual science relating to the substance of things (and to form and force treated as substances), while departmental science relates to those regional divisions of being, which are form in situ, and which are therefore morphological in a higher and more definite sense,—the realm of limitation as definitely affecting particular objects or spheres.

This difference between the aspectual and the departmental is, therefore, virtually the difference between matter (ingredience or substance) and form, and is thus again allied with that between homogeneity and heterogeneity; so that, in the order of evolution, aspectual considerations are unisimal and prior, and departmental considerations are duisimal and second, or later in order. The further application of these discriminations to the classification of the sciences will be made in next following article.

THE INTEREST DOCTRINE.

See INDEX, June 28, July 12, August 2. In the last of these numbers there is, besides my answer to the editor, and his new remarks on my answer, a very clear and intelligent note of Mr. E. W. Allright, bearing on one of the points which, in previous articles, I had, though only in general terms, eliminated from discussion. But I am not at all unwilling to go back upon my steps both to examine this point, and show that I had properly eliminated it from “The Interest Doctrine Briefly Stated.”

Mr. Allright's argument is not new; and his “first” and “second lesson” are all one. Money, the writer concedes, is not of itself productive of income; but this, he says, is immaterial, for money is the means of buying things, such as farms, mills, which, of themselves, bear an income. To lend money, therefore, is to transfer to the borrower the power of becoming possessed, during the time of the loan, of property bearing an income, and is virtually the same as letting to him that property for that time. But it would be morally right to let to him that property for a yearly rent. Therefore it will be equally right to exact from him that rent for the use of the money during the same time. The answer is, that no kind of property, whether money, land, mills, or anything else, yields of itself to its owner any income beyond what is his fair remuneration for the labor and care bestowed by himself upon such property. Any excess of the owner's share over this either is found on examination to be imaginary, or leads to contention for the possession of it, in which contention all mankind participate. The intensity of that contention has for its adequate measure the amount of the excess of lucre above the value of labor. The intensity of the contention is itself the exact measure of the amount of military exertion necessary to subdue it. The expense of that exertion, when not carried to the point of actual war, is equal in value to the parting by the owner with all excess of the product of the thing over the value of his labor. When actual hostilities take place, the waste of life and property incidental to them are so much deducted from the dividend, out of which all—owner, laborer, and eventually militia and standing army—are to be paid, in one shape or other. This disposes of Mr. Allright's argument. The doctrine that there is a kind of property which yields an income to its owner otherwise than as the wages of his stewardship is immoral, condemned by the Church, and disowned by every decent advocate of property. Mr. Allright might have soberly limited his argument to what I have given, but he speculates. He shows that the mill bought by him with the $2,000 borrowed at five per cent. will enable him, at the end of twenty years, not only to repay the capital after having all the while saved the interest and paid his household expenses; he will, besides, own as profit a handsome balance in cash, with the mill itself thrown in as a sugar-plum. This milkmaid's calculation will, in some cases, be realized; but as an average will not. In the cases in which it will, it may be considered as a stroke of good luck, to be taken together with the chances of unluck which adequately affect it.

Coming now to the editor's remarks, I must first tell him how much I appreciate his keen perception of the necessity of limiting the controversy to the lawfulness or unlawfulness of receiving interest for the loan per se, that is, for the use of the money; leaving aside, as merely calculated to throw dust into the eyes, all that is commonly urged to show, what is not denied, that interest may sometimes be due on accounts extraneous to the loan itself. Without admitting that my putting a negative proposition in the form of the affirmative of a negation, now that it is no more customary to dispute in formâ, throws the burden of proof upon me, I will waive the question of rule, and endeavor to prove my proposition.

Suppose men were immortal; absolutely solvent; their powers of enjoyment and the value of money always the same; it is clear that the loan of a sum of money by an immortal to another could never have suggested the least suspicion of anything being due by the borrower beyond the capital itself. Here are ten thousand dollars which I own, and which represent a given amount of enjoyment in eating, drinking, or any other sport fitted for immortals; and that amount of enjoyment will be the same whether I have it now or in ten thousand years. But if I enjoy it now, I cannot have it to enjoy in ten thousand years; nor, if I wish to have it to enjoy in ten thousand years hence, can I enjoy it now.

Among my acquaintances is another immortal who will have ten thousand dollars in ten thousand years, and may enjoy them then. This, to him, will be exactly the same enjoyment in intensity as if he had it now. We make an exchange; I lend to him my ten thousand dollars, that he may enjoy them now in my place. In payment he promises to give me his ten thousand dollars when he gets them in ten thousand years. There is a loan divested of all accidentals. No interest is stipulated, and who would ever dream that any be necessary in order to make the transaction exactly and precisely just?

But we are not immortal! That is true, and that is precisely what entitles the lender to receive interest beside the reimbursement of his capital. Did he not lend his money, he might purchase with it at once, for himself, the enjoyments which that money represents, instead of running the chance of his being dead when the money is refunded, and his heirs having the pleasure of spending it instead of him. For running that chance it is just that he be indemnified; but by whom? By those who have the benefit of that chance; namely, his heirs. What has the debtor to do with that family arrangement between the creditor and the creditor's heirs? So far as the debtor is concerned, the creditor and his heirs or legatees, or, in defect of either, the State who will inherit by escheat, are one immortal person to whom the debt is to be paid, in any case, by the debtor and his heirs as another immortal person; and I have previously proved that no interest can be due on a loan per se between immortals.

JULIUS FERRETTE.

[1. The circumstance of "mortality" or "immortality" is, in our opinion, totally irrelevant in this discussion, and does not affect the nature of the transaction in the least. The lender sacrifices power by his loan in favor of the lender, who receives it—power to gratify his own desires and supply his own wants; he therefore has a right to compensation for this sacrifice from the person who benefits by it, i. e., the borrower. The loan on interest is a freely made contract, profitable to both parties; the interest itself is a quid pro quo, and due like any other just debt.

2. Bishop Ferrette himself, however, now perceives and admits that (being mortal) the lender is "entitled to receive interest besides the reimbursement of his capital." This concedes the whole point at issue. It only remains now to determine who is to pay this just debt of interest. Why, of course, the party who profits by the transaction; it would be grotesquely unjust to hold anybody else to payment. Since, therefore, the heirs gain nothing at all by the loan, while the borrower gains the use of the money (which the Bishop now admits ought to be fairly paid for by somebody), could anything be plainer than that it is the borrower, and not the heirs, who ought to pay the interest? Our ingenious friend has yielded the whole point in debate by conceding that interest is justly due the lender, over and above the return of the money lent; and we leave the question as settled wholly to our own satisfaction, since he no longer denies the essential equity of requiring interest on borrowed money—ED.]

THE SCRIPTURE ON USURY.

EDITOR INDEX:—

When the blind lead the blind, we all know what happens; and it seems to me that when the Jewish and Catholic churches respectively undertook to enlighten the popular mind concerning the doctrine of money interest, something of this sort occurred. Both priests and people (and Almighty God also, according to the Bible) engaged in a futile crusade against usury for the reason that they failed to see where the real issue lay.

Interest is nothing else than a rent on the use of money, or, practically, any sort of convertible property. Therefore to denounce interest is to denounce rent; but to denounce rent is to denounce property, because a right of property in any wealth, in excess of an insignificant quantity needed for personal service, means a right to levy rent for the use of that wealth. Otherwise it means nothing.

Well, now, property has its drawbacks as well as its advantages, and the question is whether the drawbacks outweigh the advantages, as the disciples of Proudhon contend, or the advantages the drawbacks, as is commonly believed. The worst evil of property is, that it leads by a direct road to slavery. So far as the law is concerned, the proletaire who cannot afford to wait, is, just for that reason, at the mercy of the capitalist who can afford to wait as completely as any slave is at his master's mercy; for suicide, at worst, is always open to the latter, and, failing compliance with the capitalists' terms, nothing but starvation is open to the former. But practically this despotism of capital is always tempered by the action of two very different sentiments in the minds of the property-holders; namely, the natural benevolence of the human heart, and, secondly, the fear of incendiary violence. Ordinary men seldom speak of their generosity, and still more seldom speak of their fears; nevertheless these two sentiments are real forces in constant operation. As the typical government of the Orient has been called "despotism tempered by assassination," so the typical government of the Occident may be called plutocracy tempered by the dread of confiscation. This may not be quite satisfactory, but, on the other hand, property fulfils tolerably well two very essential offices; it provides the mass of the citizens with an effective incentive to thrift and industry, and it acts as a check on the increase of population; whereas simple communism would do neither one nor the other, and must for that reason speedily terminate, should it be anywhere established.

The palmist ranks the receipt of interest on a par with the most infamous kind of subornation, saying: "Blessed is the man that hath not lent out his money upon usury, nor taken reward against the innocent." This estimate was quite common in ancient communities, especially in Rome at the period of the agrarian agitations; and indeed Shylocks have always and everywhere been very subject to the vulgar odium. The clever allegory of the pound of flesh speaks to the people's heart.

In fairness it should be remarked that the attitude of the Bible on this matter sufficiently refutes the shallow eighteenth century calumny that religion is invariably favorable to the rich. So far is this from being fully true that, on the contrary, all religions have, of necessity, on one side of them, a strongly socialistic tendency.

Yours truly, CHARLES ELLERSHAW.

WHAT IS THE CREED OF LIBERALISM?

OZARK, Mo., Aug. 19, 1877.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Please allow me to thank you for your kindness in sending me the noble little tract, "Truths for the Times," in answer to my communication published in THE INDEX of July 26, entitled "What is Liberalism?" You were mistaken, however, in supposing that I had not read this definition of Free Religion, for it was one of the first tracts I obtained through the medium of THE INDEX.

Let me assure you that it is not your liberalism, as set forth in "Truths for the Times," or in any of your other writings that I have read, for which I have any censure. I consider "Truths for the Times" to be a grand gospel of itself, for those who can appreciate its manly, heroic principles. It utters, I think, the noblest thought and the loftiest faith of this eventful age; and did all liberals feel the inspiration of courage and duty as you do, the cause of liberalism would stand before the world without reproach. I can never tell you, without using more freedom than becomes a stranger, how much I admire your manly course as a leader of our common cause. On all questions of right and justice between man and man, you seem to me to stand on the eternal foundation; and I never read your brave utterances in behalf of truth and equity here and now, without having my faith in man strengthened. Many times I have been on the point of writing to you to express my hearty appreciation of some editorial in THE INDEX, but have been prevented till the impulse abated. Let me encourage you to hold aloft the banner of liberalism and keep it unsullied by bigotry or supineness to the universal cause of humanity. Too many so-called liberals construe liberalism to mean a selfish independence for the individual and an ignoble indifference to the social duties of life. A cold, sordid view of man's public obligations characterizes many of those who make conspicuous pretensions to mental freedom on the subject of religion. They are willing to let the world alone, if they are left to follow their own supreme selfishness. They have no enthusiasm for the cause of humanity. They believe in letting the future take care of itself, not realizing their own obligations to the self-sacrificing philanthropists of the past who have worked so nobly to prepare the present for their enjoyment. In endeavoring to leaven this sluggish mass of indifference, one of your generous nature must, I know, become very indignant at the meanness of spirit manifested by many who claim to be your co-workers.

How far, I would like to know, do the principles expressed in "Truths for the Times," represent the creed of liberalism? How do we know what the belief of liberalism is? Who is authorized to speak for the heterogeneous mass of freethought? In all other bodies of religionists there are certain cardinal doctrines that constitute a representative creed; and, when one identifies himself with one of these organizations we know just what he believes, as far as his church claims jurisdiction over the belief of its constituents. But what is the representative belief, either religious or moral, of liberalism? You have defined the movement as you understand it in your tract, "Truths for the Times." Have you any authority to speak for the whole body of liberals? Has liberalism ever affirmed anything as a collective and coherent body? Has not an atheist just as much right to claim that he represents liberalism as a theist has to claim that he represents it?

Leaving the realm of speculative belief, has liberalism ever affirmed a single moral principle? Your views on the integrity of marriage and the sanctity of home I endorse with my whole heart; but may not the free-lover claim that his theory of sexual freedom is just as genuine liberalism as your beautiful plea for the monogamic system that would "make manhood more manly and womanhood more womanly by blending them in one pure and happy home"? How can we determine what liberalism is so long as every one is at liberty to define it for himself? How can we expect any unity of action among liberals until there is some unity of belief? Mere negations will not make a basis of union for active workers. We must have a common affirmative belief before we can accomplish any constructive work.

I may be very much deluded in my views of the defects of liberalism, and if I am I should like to be enlightened. You are at liberty to make any use of this letter you wish.

Believe me to be as ever,

Yours truly,

H. CLAY NEVILLE.

PRIESTLY EXTRAVAGANCE.

It has been said that nine-tenths of the common, unskilled laborers of what used to be called the "free States" are Roman Catholics. Everybody knows that this class is burdened with the support of an aristocracy of priests who, in their style of living, are expensive, and who flocked to this country during the flush times which prevailed during the war and for years after it in great numbers. These priests went into the business of church-building to such an extent as to literally stud certain quarters of all our cities and large villages with church edifices, some of them of the costliest description, and with magnificent residences for the bishops and priests and sisterhoods and fraternities. There was a priestly tithe-gatherer on all the lines of railroad in process of construction. Serving-men and servant-girls, hock-carriers and railroad laborers were all taxed without stint to support priestly extravagance and build up a proud hierarchy in America, with palatial abodes and splendid cathedrals, and money to travel abroad with in luxurious ocean steamships, and bags of gold for Cardinal Antonelli in the shape of Peter's pence. Well, even in these hard times, the bishops and priests and religious orders are still in clover. They own an untold amount of untaxed, ecclesiastical property paid for by the hard earnings of laborers who are impoverished and scarcely able to earn their bread. Are not these priests in the same category with the railroad vampires and stock-waterers who reckon their ill-gotten wealth by millions? What right have priests to build vast cathedrals and episcopal palaces when their people are mostly living in tenement barracks and are reduced by failure of employment to beggary and the poor-house and to crime? What wonder that the Catholic mob of Pittsburgh jeered the Roman Bishop who harangued them during the riots? They doubtless recognized him as a capitalist whose coffers they had filled to overflowing. Catholic newspapers and periodicals have much to say about "holy poverty"; but the priestly order in this country is a well-to-do class. They live above board, and relatives in Ireland are continually getting a good thing over here out of the settlement of the estates of deceased priests. The wealth of the Roman hierarchy here, gathered as it has largely been in a very few years, has become a scandal taken in connection with the extreme poverty of the vast majority of their people, thousands of whom would now have had comfortable homes, had it not been for the holy horse-leeches, who diverted a large fraction of their hard earnings to the building of showy and costly churches. ECONOMIST.

HOW TO "DO SOMETHING FOR RELIGION."

LAKE CITY, Minn., Aug. 12.

FRIEND INDEX:—

Peter's story about the three men in the boat, which you print in your last issue, reminds me of one Prof. Denton told before an audience here a few years since. For some reason he had been requested to call for a collection to defray some lecture expenses, and it was evidently not fully in accordance with his feelings to do so; but he did it by relating the following. He said: "We are situated much like the three men who were cast away at sea, and were hanging to a piece of the wreck in a very perilous situation, when one said to another, 'Can you pray?' 'No, I can't pray.' Then to the third man, 'can you pray?' 'No, I don't know how to pray.' 'Well,' said the first man, 'I can't pray, but we must do something for religion; let us take up a collection.'" The result was a generous contribution by Mr. Denton's audience. B.

IT IS, OF COURSE, contrary to all recognized canons of taste to say that the pictures to be seen in Belgium soon tire. The frequent repetition of one treatment of the crucifixion, by however great masters, is annoying, and I should think must drive any but those whose souls are steeped in Catholic ideas into a more pronounced rejection of all that that representation implies. It was with growing feelings of strong distaste that one of us sat before a picture of this sort, and asked the attendant by whom it was painted. "Monseigneur," was the answer, "c'est le 'Dieu Mourant' par—" These words at once gave form and definiteness to vague thoughts, and they took shape then and there somewhat as follows:—

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
" 13 " 25 "	8 " "
" 26 " 51 "	6 " "
" 52 " "	5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent. On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 26, 1872.
TO THE INDEX ASSN., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address:

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON, publish

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tena-ly, N.J.
J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.20 for one year, including postage, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

WM. J. POTTER Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

THE INDEX aims—
To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.
The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.
Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.
Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.
The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

FROTHINGHAM'S WORKS.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY. An Essay. Third Edition—Revised. Price $1.50.

"Nobody can peruse this book without respect for the learning, mental honesty and skill in the statement of his convictions, possessed by the author, and for the essential integrity and philanthropic tendency of his spirit."—Springfield Republican.

"A profoundly sincere book, the work of one who has read largely, studied thoroughly, reflected patiently. . . . It is a model of scholarly culture and of finished and vigorous style."—Boston Globe.

THE CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION. For Sunday-schools and Homes. Price $1.00.

THE SAFEST CREED, AND OTHER DISCOURSES. 12mo, Cloth, $1.50.

Not "food for babes," but full of suggestion for earnest and thoughtful men.

STORIES FROM THE LIPS OF THE TEACHER. With Frontispiece. Cloth, $1.00.

"The Parables are so re-told as to absorb the attention of the reader, and to fasten upon the mind what the writer believes to have been the impression the Saviour meant to convey. It is in style and thought a superior book, and will interest alike young and old."—Zion's Herald (Methodist).

STORIES OF THE PATRIARCHS. With Frontispiece. Cloth, $1.00.

"A work of culture and taste; it will be welcome to all ages, and gives the sublimest lessons of manhood in the simple language of a child."—Springfield Republican.

BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS. A Lecture. 12mo, Paper, 25 cents.

TRANSCENDENTALISM IN NEW ENGLAND. A History. With sketches and studies of Emerson, Alcott, Parker, Margaret Fuller, the Brook-Farm Community, etc. 8vo, Cloth extra, with steel portrait of the author, $2.50.

THE LIFE OF THEODORE PARKER. 8vo. With Portrait, $3.00.

The New York Tribune closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

THE ORACLE OF THE CHRIST. A Study in Primitive Christianity, illustrating the prime importance of the Messianic Idea in the New Testament, as the key to the development of Christianity from Judaism. Octavo, Cloth, $1.75.

Being desirous to more fully introduce the Celebrated

STEAM WASHER

OR WOMAN'S FRIEND.

Will for the next thirty days FURNISH (for about the cost of boring, drayage, and shipping) one of my Steam Washers. Over 400,000 have already been sold at $10.00 a piece, and this in itself is a sufficient endorsement. There is nothing like it in use. Every family needs it, and will have it. It is a simple arrangement by which steam is applied to the washing of clothing, and enables all to wash without labor, loss of time, wearing of clothing, etc., etc. (It will do the washing of an ordinary family in 30 minutes.)

CUT THIS CONTRACT OUT

And inclose with it $1.50 to cover cost of boring, drayage, etc., etc., and I will forward you one of my new and improved STEAM WASHERS. And if you will not act as agent or introduce some one else to act, either on salary or commission, I will return the money paid for the sample when you make your first order, consequently YOU GET A SAMPLE WASHER FREE. Do not order a sample unless you have a reasonable expectation of engaging in the business or can introduce some one else to do so.

J. C. TILTON, Pittsburgh, Pa.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

To any one who will act as agent, I will pay a liberal salary per month, or a LARGER COMMISSION. I will not limit you to a certain territory; and if you decide to send for a sample, do so at once, as I want but a limited number of live agents.

A CHEAP OFFER.

A COMPLETE SET of INDEX TRACTS, from No. 1 to 15 inclusive, will be mailed to any address on the prepayment of 80 CENTS.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient co-operation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

CIRCULATE IT

EVERYWHERE!

The new Liberal League Tract of 24 pages, entitled,

"PATRIOTIC ADDRESS,"

contains:

1. PATRIOTIC ADDRESS of the National Liberal League to the people of the United States.
2. CHIEF RESOLUTIONS of the League.
3. PROTEST of the League against shutting the International Exhibition on Sundays.
4. CONSTITUTION and List of Officers.
5. EXTRACTS from Approving Letters by Distinguished Citizens.

This is the Liberal's best CAMPAIGN DOCUMENT in the great impending contest over amending the Constitution of the United States with reference to the school question. It should be in the hands of EVERY VOTER, and has been published expressly for gratuitous distribution by earnest friends of State Secularization.

Local Liberal Leagues

Cannot do better than to order this Tract by the quantity, as an excellent auxiliary in their local agitation.

WHOLE NO. 404.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT: PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.
SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

THE PERSECUTION of Gambetta by the infatuated MacMahon government will go far to neutralize the effect of the death of Thiers. It will kindle in the Republican party of France a deep and terrible indignation against the treachery of the President and his clerical advisers. The hand-writing on the wall is visible to all eyes.

THIS ITEM of news in the Tribune would indicate that extraordinary "piety" is getting to be a very disreputable distinction: "Paul A. Thupe, late book-keeper at the Russell Paper Mills, Lawrence, Mass., has been arrested on a charge of embezzlement. Mr. Thupe was distinguished for his piety. He used to impress his fellow-boarders by spreading a silk handkerchief upon the floor, kneeling thereon, and offering prayer before dining. His notions of literature, it is stated, were 'proper and of a high order.'"

ON THE SEVENTEENTH of September, the Army and Navy Monument on Boston Common, the grandest memorial of the kind yet erected, was solemnly dedicated. It is an honor alike to the living and the dead. May the great lesson it teaches sink into all hearts! Two years ago, on the same day of the same month, which was the date of the adoption of the United States Constitution and was selected for that very reason, the Preliminary Convention which resulted in the organization of the National Liberal League was held at Philadelphia. Read aright the meaning of these two events, and it was the same—love of liberty, of country, of mankind.

A GLORIOUS SENTENCE is this, in the oration of General Devens at the dedication of the Army and Navy Monument on Boston Common: "As in the Roman story which tells of Hannibal, the mightiest enemy Rome ever knew, it is related that his father Hamilcar, himself a chieftain and a warrior whose renown has been eclipsed by that of his greater son, brought him when a child of nine years old into the temple of the gods, that he might lift his little hands to swear eternal hostility to the tyranny of Rome,—so shall those who succeed us come here to swear hostility, not to one grasping power only, but to every tyranny that would enslave the body or enchain the mind of man, and eternal devotion to the great principles of civil and religious liberty." Amen and amen—a thousand times amen!

A DISPATCH from Chicago, September 13, states that "when the train on the Illinois Central Railroad arrived last evening, an officer was at the depot to arrest Father George, who, according to the story of the conductor and passengers, had, without provocation, thrown from the car-windows, during the trip, two Bibles placed in the racks by religious societies. He explained to the police authorities that he did so on account of obscene sketches which he found on the fly-leaves, and was released without ball." If Father George is a Catholic priest, his explanation was probably only half of the truth; but it at least exposes the absurdity of parading Bibles in such places. This is a piece of impertinence to which the public are subjected by the superserviceable fanaticism of the "religious societies," and the good it does is well illustrated above.

COLONEL F. M. HALLIDAY, now candidate for Governor of Virginia, strenuously opposed last year the opening of the Centennial Exhibition as a member of the United States Commission. In one of his speeches, addressing Mr. Corliss, he flapped his wings and soared to the rhetorical zenith in this fashion: "That magnificent engine of yours, sir, is a thing of beauty. Each mighty revolution made by it, as it puts and keeps in motion, for six days in the week, the varied machinery which covers fifteen acres of space, is beautiful beyond a question. But is there any truth in it? No, sir! Not unless, on the seventh day, that mighty engine stands silent before Almighty God." That was certainly a wonderful engine, and a wonderful colonel to see that it told more truth when it held its tongue than when it talked. In this respect the engine and the colonel were precisely alike. But the Sunday School Times, quoting the above excerpt, solemnly and unctuously exclaims: "It is good to see such men candidates for high political station. The more of them we can have, the better for all concerned." From which we infer that buncombe is better than brains in "high political station."

SIGNATURES to the Religious Freedom Amendment petition of the National Liberal League have been received as follows since our last acknowledgment: from Rev. George W. Cooke and George Stickney, Esq., Grand Haven, Mich., 28; from Mr. Leopold Goepper, Union Village, O., 4; from Ingersoll Lockwood, Esq., New York City, 19 (including signatures of Mr. O. B. Frothingham and the late Hon. Robert Dale Owen); from Messrs. P. V. Wise, Jacob Sprinkel, John Demond, and the German Turnverein, St. Joseph, Mo., 78; from Dr. D. K. Boutelle, Lake City, Minn., 196. The total number of signatures thus far received is 8,052. Dr. Boutelle writes: "I meant to get a larger number, but my health has been such the past summer that I could make little personal effort, and I sent out several papers by others. I have some out which are not yet returned. I may have some more by-and-by. I have with a pencil marked some of the names on the list I got myself [this list had 141 names]. It is amusing to notice how differently persons talk about the matter. For example, Mr. Robertson, the fourth name on the list, said: 'I am a Christian; I believe the Bible; I belong to the Congregational Church; and I want everybody to pay his own taxes. I am ashamed of the church for not paying its taxes, and for that reason I sign this paper. Now I want you to go to Judge Stout, and have his name on next to mine.' I went to Mr. Stout, who is a leading Baptist man, and got his name next. A day or two after, I was in Judge Stout's office, when he said to me: 'I want to ask you one question, which I expect you will answer candidly.' 'Well, what is it?' He asked: 'Do you understand that the petition you are circulating is intended to favor the taxation of church property?' I replied that I did so understand it. 'Well, then,' said he, 'I want my name taken off from it.' I threw the paper on his table, saying: 'Very well, you may erase it.' He read the petition carefully over, and remarked that he could not see but that was all right! And his name stands."

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

Brigham Young and Mormonism.

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah, Aug. 29.

Brigham Young died this afternoon at four o'clock. He was attacked by cholera morbus last Thursday night, which was followed by inflammation of the bowels, which prevented from the first all passage through them, and by continued swelling toward the throat finally stopped respiration. He was conscious as long as failing breath permitted him to speak, but only briefly answered questions during the last forty-eight hours.

Brigham Young, Prophet and Ruler of the Church of the Latter-Day Saints, is dead. The singular religious delusion commonly called Mormonism, compounded of Judaism, Mohammedanism, Paganism, and perverted Christianity, has been kept alive for the past thirty years in spite of the influences of civilization and modern morality, chiefly by his force of character and his remarkable talent for leadership. He was an extraordinary man. With scarcely any education, and with no such gifts of eloquence and spiritual insight as are possessed by the founders of most new sects, he established a powerful theocracy in the midst of a vast desert, gathered adherents from all nations of the earth, and introduced a system of domestic life wholly at variance with the religion, moral ideas, and temperament of the peoples from whom he drew his proselytes. Polygamy, an institution confined in all ages to the luxurious races inhabiting warm climates, he domesticated among the rocks and snows of Utah, and so associated with religious fanaticism that it has held ground in defiance of the laws of the United States. He became possessed of great wealth, and ruled with an absolute sway thousands of men accustomed to the traditions and methods of self-government, interfering at his pleasure with their business and private affairs, disposing of their lives, families, and property with the tyranny of a Tartar Khan. Recent times have produced few such phenomenal characters. Most famous men achieve prominence by dexterity and power in riding on the current of their age; but the Mormon leader successfully antagonized all the forces of modern thought and civilization. His wonderful career was made possible only by the fact that there is, even in the most advanced communities, a sediment of superstition, fanaticism, and bestiality which a strong and unscrupulous man can stir up and utilize to serve his selfish ambition.

Brigham Young was born at Whitingham, Windham County, Vt., June 1, 1801. His grandfather was a surgeon in the French and Indian war. His father, John Young, was born in 1763 in Hopkinton, Middlesex County, Mass., served under General Washington in three campaigns, married Nabby Hume in 1785, settled in Vermont in 1801, and removed to Sherburne, Chenango County, N. Y. Brigham was the ninth of eleven children. All of the family became Mormons, and the father died in 1839 at Quincy, Ill., with the honors of first Patriarch of the church.

The chronicles of Mormonism are silent as to the youth and early manhood of Brigham, except to say that he learned the trade of a painter and glazier, was converted and baptized as a Baptist, and, it is said, showed some ability as a religious exhorter. It does not appear that he did anything remarkable for a working mechanic until his thirty-first year, when he was converted to Mormonism by Samuel H. Smith and Eleazer Miller, who were then preaching the new gospel in Central New York. The Book of Mormon had been printed two years before, and the first company of the Saints had already gathered at Kirtland, Ohio, at the house of Sidney Rigdon, whither Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum proceeded in January from their home in Manchester, Ontario County, N. Y., where Joseph pretended to discover the golden plates of the original volume. Young made his way to Kirtland soon after, and was there "gathered" with the Saints and ordained as an elder. He began preaching, and although deficient in education, he had a certain rude, strong oratorical power, and succeeded in making converts. He displayed great shrewdness and knowledge of character, and his powerful will enabled him to impress his opinions upon others, so that he soon gained a firm footing in the infant church.

ORIGIN OF MORMONISM.

It was an epoch of great religious excitement, a season of ferment, and gave birth to many new forms of faith. The Campbellites, or Disciples, now a large and respectable denomination, arose about the same time,—indeed, the first converts made by Smith and Rigdon at Kirtland were Disciples who had just seceded from the old sect. Millerism, or Second-Adventism, was just beginning to make headway. A number of other new sects, that have since died out or dwindled down to small dimensions, were then vigorously proselyting in the same field where Mormonism made its first efforts. The Latter-Day Saints were at first looked upon as only a new sort of Christians, and their revelation, pretending to be a sacred book of one of the lost tribes of Israel, was only put forth as a supplement to the Old Testament. They were not polygamists as long as they remained in Kirtland, and their departure from that place was caused more by the failure of their bank and the pressure of their debts than by hostility to their religion. In 1835 Young was ordained as one of the Twelve Apostles, a body organized for the special purpose of spreading the faith. Four years before, Joseph Smith had received a revelation that the final gathering-place of the Saints was to be in Missouri, and in the summer of 1831 he had founded a Mormon settlement at Independence, in Jackson County. Smith went backward and forward between the two colonies; but Young remained in Kirtland until after he was made an Apostle, and thus escaped the dangers of the miniature war between the Missourians and the Independence settlement. Receiving the "gift of tongues" in 1835, Young was sent on a mission to the Eastern States, and returned with a number of converts. His next advancement was in 1836, when he was chosen President of the Twelve Apostles. In 1837 the Kirtland colony was abandoned, the fine stone temple erected there (still standing) was seized for debt, and Young, with Smith and others, went to Davis County, Missouri, where the town of Far West had been founded by Mormons driven from Independence. As the city of revelation, Independence had grown to be the principal Mormon settlement, and the religionists when expelled by the Missourians, had gone to the Counties of Davis, Carroll, and Caldwell, then quite new. In Davis County new troubles arose, conflicts occurred between the Mormons and the militia, in which blood was shed on both sides, and Young, who failed to distinguish himself as a military hero, fled for his life to Quincy. Shortly after, Gov. Boggs, of Missouri, the "Nero" of Mormon historians, called out fifteen thousand militia, and drove the Mormons from the State, declaring that they should be expelled, "even if it were necessary to exterminate them." They scattered through the western counties of Illinois, where they were kindly received by the settlers. They began to gather in 1839 in the new town of Nauvoo, laid out by Joseph Smith on a high plateau on the bank of the Mississippi, and christened by a name which he said was reformed Egyptian, and meant "The Beautiful."

From this new city of promise Brigham Young departed in the same year with a company of Apostles and Elders to "open up the gospel" to the inhabitants of Great Britain. He landed at Liverpool on the 8th of April, 1840, and commenced preaching. He published an edition of the Book of Mormon, and established The Millennial Star, a periodical still living. Ever since the chief publication establishment for Mormon works has been in England, the largest depository of church funds has been the Bank of England, and Great Britain has been the most fruitful field for missionary labors. In 1841 Young sailed for New York, having shipped seven hundred and sixty-nine converts in advance, and founded many churches. He returned to Nauvoo, which had prospered greatly during his absence. The colony continued to flourish until 1844, when Joseph Smith's revelation of polygamy, his arbitrary conduct, his protection of criminals, the habit of his followers voting in a body at elections, dissensions about the civil government, and many other causes gradually irritated the people of the surrounding country, until they became bitterly hostile to the new sect. The whole region rose in arms. Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum were arrested for destroying an opposition newspaper, and were murdered by a mob in the jail at Carthage. The church was without a head. Sidney Rigdon, as the first councillor of Smith, assumed the Presidency; but Brigham Young, seeing the golden opportunity for seizing upon the leadership had come, went hurriedly to Nauvoo, and denounced Rigdon as an impostor, and his revelations as emanating from the devil. Then ensued a sharp struggle for the mastery between the two Apostles; but Young, who was a man of more personal influence than his antagonist, carried the majority with him, and Rigdon, together with about a hundred men who had voted for him, was "cut off" and "handed over to the buffeting of Satan for a thousand years." Rigdon left Nauvoo, and with a small band of followers went to Pennsylvania.

BRIGHAM BECOMES THE LEADER.

Brigham was now supreme. All opposition was driven away or silenced. He hastened the completion of the temple and put the people through the mystical ceremony of the endowments, in which they swore to obey the priesthood. He claimed the gift of revelation, and assumed the authority of a prophet and priestly autocrat. He saw that the blood of the Smiths had only allayed for a time the storm of persecution, and knew that there would be no peace for the saints among the Gentiles. In 1845 he professed to have a revelation of a Canaan in the West, flowing with milk and honey, where the hated Gentiles should never come,—a land of promise reserved for the faithful. In February, 1846, the whole body of the Mormons abandoned their houses and their temple in Nauvoo, and under his guidance started directly west across Iowa. This terrible winter journey, through a country almost entirely wild, is the vita dolorosa of the Mormon annals. Hundreds perished of cold and exposure; but the fanaticism and the firm will of their prophet drove the survivors on. In the following spring they concentrated at Council Bluffs, and the next fall they crossed the Missouri and built five hundred log huts for winter-quarters at a point six miles below the present city of Omaha. Here, on the 27th of December, 1847, Brigham preached to his followers, and by imitating the voice and manner of Joseph Smith, he made them believe that their dead prophet stood before them. They declared that the mantle of Joseph had fallen upon Brigham, and immediately elected him President of the church. Before he had governed only as President of the Twelve Apostles. The great event at the winter-quarters was the enlistment of five hundred men as volunteers in the Mexican War, by the direction of Young. It is charged that he received the bounty of the men, amounting to $10,000, and that with this money he fitted out the expedition of one hundred and forty-three men and seventy wagons, with which he started in April, 1847, to find a home for his followers in the valley of the Jordan. They arrived July 24 at a gap in the Wasatch Range, from which they saw the valley before them. It was covered with a growth of stunted bushes and had a soil the color of ashes. Anything but a land of promise it seemed to be,—walled in by bare and savage mountains and washed by a lake as salt and lifeless as the Dead Sea. Young saw that irrigation was all that was needed to make the soil productive, and that the mountain streams would furnish plenty of water. A dam was made and a few fields of potatoes planted. Some of the party remained, and Brigham returned with the rest to the winter-quarters on the Missouri. In 1848 the whole body of Mormons, under his orders, made the journey over the plains, suffering severe hardships, and marking the road with the graves of their dead. When they arrived at the valley, they found it a desert that looked as forbidding as anything they had passed through. Starvation stared them in the face. Brigham quelled all mutinies, however. He scolded, pleaded, threatened, and prophesied. With a relentless energy he set them all at work, directing their labors and controlling their domestic affairs. He told foolish anecdotes to make them laugh; got up dances and theatrical performances, and sought in every way to make them cheerful and contented.

HOSTILITIES IN UTAH.

After a year or two of privation the colony began to flourish. In 1849, after the cession of the territory to the United States, a convention was held, and the "State of Deseret" was organized, with Brigham Young as Governor. Congress refused to admit it, and organized the Territory of Utah in the succeeding year. President Fillmore appointed Young Territorial Governor. The other officers were Gentiles, and did not arrive until 1851. The stream of emigration to California, passing through the Mormon settlement, rapidly enriched them by making a constant market at high prices for the cattle, grain, and vegetables, which the Territory began to produce in abundance. In 1854 Col. Steptoe came to Utah with three hundred troops and a commission in his pocket as Governor; but the adroit Mormon leader was determined not to lose his civil authority. With the aid of two Mormon women he entrapped the new Governor, and forced him to sign a resignation and a recommendation of himself for continuance in office. He held the place, quarrelling all the time with the Federal courts, until 1857, when President Buchanan appointed Alfred Cumming to succeed him. An armed Mormon mob had broken up a United States court. The Federal authority was openly defied, and the Judges left the Territory. The Mormons were now in open rebellion. President Buchanan sent an army of three thousand men across the plains, under command of Col. Albert Sidney Johnston, to subdue them. Brigham Young proposed to defend the passes leading to Salt Lake Valley, and armed his militia. The Mountain Meadow massacre, the blackest blot on Mormon annals, occurred during the excitement caused by the approach of the troops, when a fierce hatred was developed against the Gentile population. Young gave up his war plans as Johnston's army neared the Mormon settlements, and opened negotiations which resulted in his acceptance of the new Territorial Governor. He was often in hot water with the Federal authorities afterwards, and rumors of a Mormon war frequently came over the plains; but he was too sagacious to provoke an actual collision. His subsequent history is the history of the development of the Mormon element in Utah, the culmination of its power, and its decline by reason of the growing strength of the Gentile population brought in by the Pacific Railroad. Young maintained his hold on the great body of his superstitious followers to the last. There were a number of schisms, however, and the contact with the civilization of the East, through the travel over the railroad, and the opening of mines by Gentile capital and labor, was steadily undermining his power.

POLYGAMY.

The institution of polygamy may be said to be of Brigham Young's own establishment. It is true the first revelation sanctioning it came to Joseph Smith, and the prophet preached the new doctrine of plurality; but this was done in a furtive kind of way, with many denials to calm the rising anger of the surrounding Gentiles and of many of the Mormons. The revelation is said to have been first given at Nauvoo in 1843. The denials were made publicly, repeatedly, and with all possible solemnity over the signatures of Smith and his chief associates. It was not until the Mormons were firmly established in Utah that Brigham ventured to proclaim to the world what had been for nine years the most characteristic, although esoteric, doctrine of the church. The disclosure was made at a meeting of the Saints in September, 1852. "You heard Brother Pratt state this morning," said Brigham, "that a revelation would be read this afternoon which was given previous to Joseph's death. It contains a doctrine a small part of the world is opposed to, but I can deliver a prophecy upon it. Though that doctrine has not been preached by the elders, this people have believed in it for years. The revelation will be read to you. The principle spoken upon by Brother Pratt this morning we believe in. Many others are of the same mind. They are ignorant of what we are doing in our social capacity. They have cried out, 'Proclaim it!' but it would not do a few years ago; everything must come in its time, as there is a time for all things. I am now ready to proclaim it. This revelation has been in my possession for many years, and who has known it? None but those who should know it." Then the revelation was read. It is long, verbose, and ridiculous. The important section is the following:—

"If any man espouse a virgin, and desires to espouse another, and the first give her consent [Note: the next section lays a heavy punishment upon any wife who refuses her consent]; and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins and have vowed to no other man, then is he justified; he cannot commit adultery, for they are given unto him; for he cannot commit adultery with that that belongeth unto him and to none else; and if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law he cannot commit adultery, for they belong to him and are given unto him; therefore is he justified. They are given unto him to multiply and replenish the earth, according to my commandment."

The revelation made a tremendous stir among the Gentiles, and for a while broke up numbers of the missions in England and the States; but the Mormons in Utah were well prepared for it. Brigham himself had long been a polygamist. His first wife was Mary Ann Angell. His second, Lucy Decker Seely, he married in Nauvoo, and his third while in winter-quarters in Nebraska; and as soon as he got his people established in Utah, he urged all Mormons, especially the bishops, apostles, and elders, to follow his example. Polygamy became general, and a supply of women was obtained from the converts in England, Wales, Denmark, and other countries, who were usually of the ignorant peasant class, and were told nothing of the peculiar institution of Utah until they arrived there. From being permitted to the Saints, polygamy came to be enjoined, and Brigham promulgated a revelation to the effect that the men who had great numbers of wives and children would have the highest glory and authority in heaven.

BRIGHAM'S WIVES.

It was never easy to ascertain in Salt Lake City how many wives Brigham had. The Gentiles had different reports, and the Mormons, when questioned, usually replied that they did not meddle with "the President's" family affairs. The most authentic accounts in late years placed the number at twenty-three, and the number of women "sealed" to him brought the total up to fifty-two. In 1866 he had twenty-nine regular wives, who were all named and described in a work by Mrs. C. V. Waite, called The Mormon Prophet and his Harem, published by Hurd & Houghton. Most of them lived in a large building called the "Lion House," and had rooms like boarders in a hotel. The first wife had a house to herself, however, and for the favorite, Amelia Folsom, who usually accompanied Brigham to the theatre and in his drives, a handsome dwelling was built, with a private passage leading to the President's office. In his later life Brigham established homes in a number of the smaller towns of the Territory, which he had occasion now and then to visit. One of his wives—about the twentieth in order—Eliza Snow, was a woman of some intellectual ability and a writer of poetry. Brigham practiced entire impartiality in the allotment of affection and worldly comforts among plural wives; but in practice, like Eastern Sultans, he was usually ruled by a favorite. As to the prophet's children, their name is legion. He provided carefully for their education. Some of his sons exhibit good business talent, one being the President of the Salt Lake Railroad. Many of the daughters grew up beautiful and accomplished women. The father instilled his religious fanaticism into their minds, and gave them, as they came of age, in polygamous marriage to his prominent supporters. Two of them married the same man and at the same time, it is said. The fifteenth, or, according to some reckonings, the nineteenth, wife was Ann Eliza, whom he married in 1868, and who has recently earned celebrity by lecturing on the horrors of Mormonism and suing the prophet for a divorce. The United States Court in Salt Lake City denied the petition on the ground that the marriage was polygamous, and therefore null.

There is not space here to go into a history of polygamy as it rose and flourished in the Mormon Church. It reached its climax in Utah in 1856, when a general demoralization seized upon the community and the most abominable practices prevailed; whole families of girls being in some cases married with their mother to the same man. Divorces became exceedingly frequent, and there were instances of women being divorced and re-married nine or ten times. Vulgarity of language in public discourses and private speech became so common that many Mormons were themselves disgusted, and a reaction set in. A powerful influence working against polygamy in late years has been the increase of the cost of living in Utah, which has restrained the young men from following the precepts and example of their elders. It is as much as they want to do to support one wife, now that the women are no longer satisfied with a sun-bonnet and a calico dress, but must have the latest fashions in apparel, and must live like the Gentiles, instead of on corn and potatoes, as in the early times of the Territory.

THE COURTS AGAINST POLYGAMY.

Only one serious effort was ever made to break down the institution of polygamy by the aid of the courts. During the year 1871 the Federal officials in Utah, headed by Chief-Justice McKean of the Supreme Court of the Territory, began an organized attack upon the polygamists, which necessarily involved a personal attack upon Brigham Young. At the September term of that court, objections were made to the acceptance of several Mormons of prominence as grand jurors on the ground that they were living in open violation of the law of the land in practicing polygamy. Chief-Justice McKean rendered a characteristic decision, sustaining the challenges with a florid eloquence seldom heard on the bench, and combating the argument that polygamy was a religious practice, and could therefore claim the benefit of a religious toleration secured by the Constitution. He closed his opinion by declaring that "when the burglar is a fit juror to inquire into the crime of burglary; when the robber is a fit juror to inquire into the crime of larceny; when the assassin is a fit juror to inquire into the crime of murder,—then the bigamist, who swears in substance that his crimes are his religion, may be a fit juror to inquire into the crimes of bigamy and adultery." The Judge concluded: "But, thanks to centuries of Christian civilization, that time is not now; and, judging from the steady progress of the human race, that time will never come." At the same term of court a number of prominent Mormons were indicted under a statute of the Territory, which prescribed a penalty of imprisonment (not exceeding ten years and not less than six months) and a fine to the crime of unlawful cohabitation or "open and gross lewdness." Brigham Young himself was among those indicted, as was also Daniel A. Wells, Mayor of Salt Lake City. Young was brought before the court on the 3d of October. Judge McKean refused to allow him to give bail, but granted him the privilege of being imprisoned in his own house. The Judge also overruled a motion to quash the indictment. One conviction was reached under these suits, that of Thomas Hawkins, whose first wife brought suit against him for adultery. He was sentenced to three years hard labor and a fine of $500, Judge McKean explaining that he did not wish his judgment to be "so severe as to seem vindictive, or so light as to seem to trifle with justice."

This passage from his speech in passing sentence was evidently aimed at the head of the Mormon Church: "My experience in Utah has been such that, were I to fine you only, I am satisfied the fine would be paid out of other funds than yours, and thus you would go free—absolutely free—from all punishment; and then those men who mislead the people would make thousands of others believe that God had sent the money to pay the fine; that God had prevented the court from sending you to prison; that by a miracle you had been rescued from the authorities of the United States. I must look to it that my judgment gives no aid and comfort to such men." No other conviction was ever reached, either in these cases or in the indictments found subsequently against Young and others for the murder of Buck at Iron Springs, in 1857, about the time of the conflict with Cumming, the newly-appointed Territorial Governor. These indictments were evidently brought in the hope that they might help to break the Mormon leaders, but they came to nothing. The funds of the court were insufficient to defray the expenses of these trials, and Judge McKean and Attorney-General Bates visited Washington and applied to Congress in December, 1871, for an appropriation. But such slight prospect as existed of their getting funds to carry on the war against Young was destroyed by a unanimous decision of the United States Supreme Court, reversing one of Judge McKean's test cases. In this he had advanced an absurd and fantastical theory to the effect that the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah was in some way a part of, or allied to, the Supreme Court of the United States. The decision of the court showed plainly that Judge McKean was either ignorant of the law, or willing to pervert it to gain his object, and the judicial crusade against Mormonism was over. It had never gained any great popular sympathy, as it was evidently a fight made by one faction in war upon another, rather than a honest attempt to do away with a great evil.

THE DANITES.

The blackest spots in the history of the Mormon Church are the murders and crimes committed by the "Danites." This was the name given to an organization of cut-throats who committed the most atrocious crimes without suffering the slightest penalty of the law, or forfeiting the favor of the Mormon leaders, under whose orders it was often evident that they were acting. It was a sworn society, the members being pledged, according to the confession of John D. Lee, "to obey all orders of the priesthood of the Mormon Church, to do any and all things as commanded." From this order were selected "the Destroying Angels of the Mormon Church," who undoubtedly acted under the personal direction of Young himself. Books on books might be filled with the record of their brutal murders, mysterious or unconcealed assassinations, as it was thought best, and wholesale massacres. Many of the instances already on record would seem incredible if it had not long ago been seen that the number and atrocity of these crimes could hardly be exaggerated. One instance that is narrated is that of the revenge which Hickman, the "Danite" captain, took upon a man by the name of Drown, who sued him upon a promissory note. A few days after Drown had obtained judgment on the note, he was in a friend's house in Salt Lake City, when Hickman and seven or eight of the "Danites" appeared and called to Drown to come out. He refusing, they dismounted, burst in the doors, and shot the offending Drown and his friend, both dying of their wounds. The "Danites" were not molested. At the same term of court, a sergeant named Pike in the United States forces was indicted for assault with intent to kill, upon the son of a Mormon Bishop named Spencer. Pike was arrested and brought to Salt Lake City, and the next day was shot by Spencer who stepped up behind him for that purpose. Spencer then rode off with the "Danites." This was all in revenge for a blow, and a leading Mormon paper commended the young man for his bravery. The courts took no action in either case. Ann Eliza Young, Brigham's rebellious wife, after charging upon him the crime of organizing and directing this murderous band, narrates this incident as illustrating their methods: "Henry Jones and his mother lived in a house near where I lived when a girl. We were startled from our sleep one night by loud cries and pistol-shots. No one took any notice of them; but in the morning a wagon was driven through the street of the city, containing the dead bodies of the murdered mother and son, with a placard attached, "Apostates, Beware!" This was done as an example to terrorize the people." Another and more notable instance of the same sanguinary spirit was the "Morrisite massacre." One Morris undertook, with others, to start an offshoot of the church. He alleged that Brigham was a false prophet, and he the only true one. He went, with his followers, about thirty miles to the north of Salt Lake City, and encamped there in tents. Brigham Young quickly despatched the Mormon militia to root them out, under command of Daniel H. Wells, Lieutenant-General of the Nauvoo Legion (another name for Danites). They were all massacred. Whether true or not, these statements are of a kind with many that are known to be true about this secret society of assassins. Whenever it was necessary to remove an ambitious Mormon or an obnoxious Gentile, to exterminate a whole settlement or surprise and destroy an emigrant train, these men were ready for the work. They were proficient in all varieties of murder, and the least horrible of their deeds was sufficient to prove the existence of that reign of terror which it was their business to sustain, and on which Young's authority so much depended.

CHARACTER AND APPEARANCE.

Brigham Young grew immensely rich. He owned farms, mines, and factories, and had large deposits in the Bank of England. Probably his fortune amounted to several millions; but how much he chose to regard as belonging to himself, and how much to the church, is not yet known. In person he was tall and stoutly built, and during the last ten years rather corpulent. He had a large head, a broad, florid countenance, reddish hair, and a fringe of beard of the same color, and a pair of small, keen, blue eyes. His habitual expression was bland and oily. At seventy he was active and vigorous, and looked no older than many men of fifty. Bayard Taylor, who visited the Prophet at Salt Lake City in 1870, gave the following description of him:—

"I was ushered into a handsome, well-furnished room, divided by a wooden screen from a dim back office. The floor was carpeted; a circular table, with a great globe of gold fish, was in the centre, sofas and chairs were on either side, and the walls were covered with pictures, portraits of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, Alpine landscapes, and a chromo tint of Bierstadt's "Sunshine and Shadow," which the artist had sent to Brigham Young. We took seats upon one of the sofas, while two or three strangers, apparently Mormons from the country, waited on the opposite one. In a few minutes Brigham Young came out from his office. At the first glance you would take him to be a successful bank or railroad president, and his quick, straightforward, business-like manner carries out the impression. After he is seated, however, and you have a chance of observing his features more closely, the signs of a quality with which bank presidents are not accustomed to deal begin to manifest themselves. He is both short and broad, but his thickness gives the impression of strength rather than corpulence. Although sixty-nine years old, there is no gray in his sandy hair, and his small blue eyes are keen and full of power. His head is large and approaching to squareness in its form, and his complexion is a strong, healthy red. His thin, firm-set mouth and large jaws express an indomitable energy. The general expression of his face is at once reticent and watchful. In his greeting there was the blandness of an acquired rather than a natural courtesy. His voice is mild, even-toned, and agreeable, and I can imagine that he might make himself fascinating to women, most of whom find a peculiar charm in a playful and purring lion. He said but little at first, and, I thought, seemed to be holding himself secretly at bay for questions which I did not intend to ask. By-and-by, when I referred to the similarity of the scenery to that of Asia Minor, and led the conversation to the resources of the Territory, he spoke freely and fluently, and gave me considerable information concerning the remote southern counties. On all points of material growth he was frankly communicative. While he was talking, I studied his face sufficiently to detect the three chief qualities of his nature,—great prudence, great determination, and great belief in himself."

The reverence of the Orthodox Mormons for Brigham Young exceeded that of Catholics for the Pope, and they sought his counsel in all important business and family affairs. They believed him a God in embryo, destined to reign over a celestial kingdom in the future life. In his death the Mormon Church has undoubtedly received a fatal blow. All its men of intellect and force of character joined it in its infancy, and but few of them are left. Its later proselytes were drawn from the ignorant classes. Among the second generation, now men in middle life, no one has developed capacity for successfully wearing the mantle of the Prophet.

Interview between Horace Greeley and Brigham Young.

THE MORMON LEADER'S VIEWS.

Horace Greeley's noted interview with Brigham Young was reported by himself as follows. It took place in 1869, when Mr. Greeley was on his way to California. It will be seen that Young's replies give, in a condensed form, the teachings of the Mormon Church:—

My friend, Dr. Bernhisel, M.C., took me this afternoon, by appointment, to meet Brigham Young, President of the Mormon Church, who had expressed a willingness to receive me at two P.M. We were very cordially welcomed at the door by the President, who led us into the second-story parlor of the largest of his houses (he has three), where I was introduced to Heber C. Kimball, Gen. Wells, Gen. Ferguson,

Albert Carrington, Elias Smith, and several other leading men in the church, with two full-grown sons of the President. After some unimportant conversation on general topics, I stated that I had come in quest of fuller knowledge respecting the doctrines and polity of the Mormon Church, and would like to ask some questions bearing directly on these, if there were no objection. President Young, avowing his willingness to respond to all pertinent inquiries, the conversation proceeded substantially as follows:—

H. G.—Am I to regard Mormonism (so called) as a new religion, or as simply a new development of Christianity?

B. Y.—We hold that there can be no true Christian Church without a priesthood directly commissioned by, and in immediate communication with, the Son of God and Savior of mankind. Such a church is that of the Latter Day Saints, called by their enemies Mormons. We know no other that even pretends to have present and direct revelations of God's will.

H. G.—Then I am to understand that you regard all other churches professing to be Christian as the Church of Rome regards all churches not in communion with itself,—as schismatic, heretical, and out of the way of salvation?

B. Y.—Yes, substantially.

H. G.—Apart from this, in what respect do your doctrines differ essentially from those of our Orthodox Protestant churches,—the Baptist or Methodist, for example?

B. Y.—We hold the doctrines of Christianity as revealed in the Old and New Testaments, also in the Book of Mormon, which teaches the same cardinal truths, and those only.

H. G.—Do you believe in the doctrine of the Trinity?

B. Y.—We do; but not exactly as it is held by other churches. We believe in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, as equal, but not identical,—not as one person (being). We believe in all the Bible teaches on this subject.

H. G.—Do you believe in a personal devil, a distinct, conscious, spiritual being, whose nature and acts are essentially malignant and evil?

B. Y.—We do.

H. G.—Do you hold the doctrine of eternal punishment?

B. Y.—We do; though perhaps not exactly as other churches do. We believe it as the Bible teaches it.

H. G.—I understand that you regard baptism by immersion as essential?

B. Y.—We do.

H. G.—Do you practise infant baptism?

B. Y.—No.

H. G.—Do you make removal to these valleys obligatory on your converts?

B. Y.—They would consider themselves greatly aggrieved if they were not invited hither. We hold to such a gathering together of God's people as the Bible foretells, and that this is the place, and now is the time appointed for its consummation.

H. G.—The predictions to which you refer have usually, I think, been understood to indicate Jerusalem (or Judea) as the place of such gathering?

B. Y.—Yes, for the Jews; not for others.

H. G.—What is the position of your church with respect to slavery?

B. Y.—We consider it of divine institution, and not to be abolished until the curse pronounced on Ham shall have been removed from his descendants.

H. G.—Are any slaves now held in this Territory?

B. Y.—There are.

H. G.—Do your territorial laws uphold slavery?

B. Y.—Those laws are printed,—you can read for yourself. If slaves are brought here by those who owned them in the States, we do not favor their escape from the service of those owners.

H. G.—Am I to infer that Utah, if admitted as a member of the Federal Union, will be a slave State?

B. Y.—No; she will be a free State. Slavery here would prove useless and unprofitable. I regard it generally as a curse to the masters. I myself hire many laborers, and pay them fair wages; I could not afford to own them. I can do better than subject myself to an obligation to feed and clothe their families, to provide and care for them in sickness and health. Utah is not adapted to slave labor.

H. G.—Let me now be enlightened with regard more especially to your church polity. I understand that you require each member to pay over one-tenth of all he produces or earns to the church.

B. Y.—That is a requirement of our faith. There is no compulsion as to the payment. Each member acts in the premises according to his pleasure, under the dictates of his own conscience.

H. G.—What is done with the proceeds of this tithing?

B. Y.—Part of it is devoted to building temples and other places of worship; part to helping the poor and needy converts on their way to this country; and the largest portion to the support of the poor among the Saints.

H. G.—Is none of it paid to bishops and other dignitaries of the church?

B. Y.—Not one penny. No bishop, no elder, no deacon, or other church officer, receives any compensation for his official services. A bishop is often required to put his hand in his own pocket, and provide therefrom for the poor of his charge; but he never receives anything for his services.

H. G.—How, then, do your ministers live?

B. Y.—By the labor of their own hands, like the first Apostles. Every bishop, every elder, may be daily seen at work in the field or the shop, like his neighbors; every minister of the church has his proper calling, by which he earns the bread of his family; he who cannot or will not do the church's work for nothing is not wanted in her service; even our lawyers (pointing to General Ferguson and another present, who are the regular lawyers of the church) are paid nothing for their services; I am the only person in the church who has not a regular calling apart from the church's service, and I never received one farthing from her treasury. If I obtain anything from the tithing-house, I am charged with and pay for it, just as any one else would. The clerks in the tithing-store are paid like other clerks; but no one is ever paid for any service pertaining to the ministry. We think a man who cannot make his living aside from the ministry of Christ, unsuited to that office. I am called rich, and consider myself worth $250,000; but no dollar of it was ever paid me by the church, or for any service as a minister of the everlasting gospel. I lost nearly all I had when we were broken up in Missouri, and driven from that State. I was nearly stripped again when Joseph Smith was murdered, and we were driven from Illinois; but nothing was ever made up to me by the church, nor by any one. I believe I know now how to acquire property, and how to take care of it.

H. G.—Can you give me any rational explanation of the aversion and hatred with which your people are generally regarded by those among whom they have lived, and with whom they have been brought directly in contact?

B. Y.—No other explanation than is afforded by the crucifixion of Christ and the kindred treatment of God's ministers, prophets, and saints in all ages.

H. G.—I know that a new sect is always desecrated and traduced; that it is hardly ever deemed respectable to belong to one; that the Baptists, Quakers, Methodists, Universalists, etc., have each in their turn been regarded, in the infancy of their sect, as the offscouring of the earth; yet I cannot remember that either of them were ever generally represented and regarded by the older sects of their early days, as thieves, robbers, murderers.

B. Y.—If you will consult the contemporary Jewish accounts of the life and acts of Jesus Christ, you will find that he and his disciples were accused of every abominable deed and purpose, robbery and murder included. Such a work is still extant, and may be found by those who seek it.

H. G.—What do you say of the so-called Danites, or destroying angels, belonging to your church?

B. Y.—What do you say? I know of no such band, no such persons or organization. I hear of them only in the slanders of our enemies.

H. G.—With regard, then, to the grave question on which your doctrines and practices are avowedly at war with those of the Christian world,—that of a plurality of wives,—is the system of your church acceptable to the majority of its women?

B. Y.—They could not be more averse to it than I was when it was first revealed to me as the divine will. I think they generally accept it, as I do, as the will of God.

H. G.—How general is polygamy among you?

B. Y.—I could not say. Some of those present (heads of the church) have each but one wife; others have more; each determines what is his individual duty.

H. G.—What is the largest number of wives belonging to any one man?

B. Y.—I have fifteen; I know no one who has more; but some of those sealed to me are old ladies whom I regard rather as mothers than wives, but whom I have taken home to cherish and support.

H. G.—Does not the Apostle Paul say that a bishop should be husband of one wife?

B. Y.—So we hold. We do not regard any but a married man as fitted for the office of bishop. But the Apostle does not forbid a bishop having more wives than one.

H. G.—Does not Christ say that he who puts away his wife, or marries one whom another has put away, commits adultery?

B. Y.—Yes; and I hold that no man should ever put away a wife except for adultery,—not always even for that. Such is my individual view of the matter. I do not always say that wives have never been put away in our church, but that I do not approve of their practice.

H. G.—How do you regard what is commonly termed the Christian Sabbath?

B. Y.—As a divinely appointed day of rest. We enjoin all to rest from secular labor on that day. We would have no man enslaved to the Sabbath, but we enjoin all to respect and enjoy it.

The Mountain Meadow Massacre.

During the summer of 1857 a large train of emigrants from Arkansas started for California. They numbered one hundred and forty souls, and, according to an officer of the United States Army, constituted the finest train that had ever crossed the Plains. The train was owned by wealthy men, and had fine stock, richly ornamented carriages for the women and children, and a considerable sum of money in its possession. Reaching Salt Lake City in safety, the emigrants were advised to take the Southern trail, the old route being liable to obstruction by snow. When two thousand miles south of Salt Lake they inquired of prominent Mormons where good pastures for their stock could be found, and were directed to Mountain Meadow. The day after they left Cedar City a council of Mormon leaders was held, and it is believed the massacre was then determined upon. On the same night about sixty white men, in Indian disguise, with a large number of genuine savages, followed the emigrants, who were overtaken the next morning while at breakfast. Without a note of warning a volley was discharged in their midst, and ten or twelve persons were killed outright. The astonished emigrants hastily recovered from their surprise, and prepared for defence. For five days and nights they withstood the attacks. Unable to overcome the emigrants in open fight, the Mormons at last resorted to strategy. The firing was suspended, and the Indians apparently disappeared. On the morning of the sixth day a wagon-load of white men, carrying the United States flag, appeared in the valley. The emigrants sent out a girl in gay attire and cordially received the new arrivals as their defenders. Among the men in the wagon were John D. Lee and Isaac C. Haight, who at once charged the emigrants with having poisoned a certain spring from which Indians had drunk and died. Lee and Haight said this was the cause of the Indian attack, and offered to bring about a treaty of peace. They then retired, and in a few hours returned, saying that the Indians were greatly enraged, and insisted upon a surrender of the emigrants' property and arms and the return of the whole party to the East by the route they had come. The terms were agreed to by the emigrants, and, with the Mormons as guides, they proceeded northward on foot. After walking a mile they entered a thicket of scrub oaks near a large pile of rocks. Here the Indians and disguised white men were concealed. John D. Lee gave the signal, "Halt!" and the bloody work began.

GRAPHIC DESCRIPTION OF THE MASSACRE.

"Suddenly," wrote a correspondent of the Sacramento Record-Union recently, "Lee brought his gun to his shoulder and fired at a woman in the forward wagon, killing her instantly. It was the signal for the massacre. Indians rose from behind bushes, painted Mormons stepped from behind concealments, and all along the line the men and women were shot down like cattle in the shambles, while Lee and his aids dragged women and youths from the wagons and cut their throats from ear to ear. It was the most heartless, cold-blooded deed that ever disgraced the pages of history. The cowardly assassins could not have performed one single act that would have added to the blackness of their perfidy; they feigned friendship and sympathy; they induced those poor men to lay aside every weapon and then shot them down like dogs. The venerable gray-headed clergymen, the sturdy farmers, the stalwart young men, and the beardless youths,—all were cut down one by one, and above their dead bodies waved the Stars and Stripes. Sick women, too ill to leave the corral, were driven up to the scene of slaughter, butchered and stripped. Some of the younger men refused to join in the disgraceful work. Jim Pearce was shot by his own father for protecting a girl that was crouched at his feet! The bullet cut a deep gash in his face, and the furrowed scar is there to-day. Lee is said to have shot a girl who was clinging to his son."

The property of those murdered people was quietly divided among the Mormons, and it was not until a year afterward that it was proven that white men had anything to do with the deed. A man who visited the scene eight days after the massacre said on the trial of Lee in 1875, that he saw the bodies of murdered emigrants left without a particle of clothing, save a torn stocking-leg that clung to the ankle of one body. There were one hundred and twenty-seven bodies in all, and all except one—a beautiful lady—bore the marks of wolves' teeth and ravens' beaks. Most of the bodies had been thrown into three piles, distant from each other about two and a half rods.

TRIAL AND SENTENCE OF LEE.

All possible efforts were made to prevent any knowledge of this monstrous wickedness from ever coming forth to the world. No survivor was left to tell the tale. Every man engaged in the murders was pledged to secrecy, and Brigham Young commanded his leaders not to talk of it even among themselves. But in the course of time, as fact after fact came out, he was generally believed to be one of the guilty men. In July, 1875, he was tried, but the jury disagreed. In September, 1876, he was again tried, found guilty, and sentenced to be executed January 26, 1877. The law of Utah gave him the choice of being beheaded, hanged, or shot; he chose the latter. A stay of proceedings was granted, pending an appeal, but on February 11, 1877, the verdict of guilty was approved, and Lee was remanded to the court below for sentence. On March 23, 1877, he was shot over the graves of his victims at Mountain Meadow, his last words being, "Let them shoot the balls through my heart. Don't let them mangle my body." Thus did justice revenge the horrible deeds of September 15, 1857. Lee declared, on the day of his death, that he was resigned to his fate; that he had used his utmost endeavors to save the emigrants, and that he was "sacrificed to satisfy feelings, and used to gratify parties."

The exact motives which led to the massacre will probably never be known. In his confession Lee said that when he reported the massacre to Brigham Young, the latter said: "Brother Lee, not a drop of innocent blood has been shed; I have direct evidence from God that the act was a just one,—that it was in accord with God's will." As to Brigham Young's part in planning the murders Lee's confession was vague. He made no distinct charge which seriously implicated Young. But his statements of what occurred between him and Young after the massacre, if true, would seem to show that Young was at least an accomplice after the fact. All the statements implicating Young were denied by him at the time. In an article published in 1875, Ann Eliza Young, who was then seeking a divorce from Brigham Young, said: "The feeling has long been entertained by Gentiles and Apostles in Utah, and even among many of the Saints, that Brigham Young gave the order himself for the massacre. Not only was the jewelry taken from the emigrants worn by the leading Mormons, but Brigham Young used for many years to ride in a carriage taken from the emigrants."—New York Tribune.

"THERE is one good thing about babies," says a late traveller, "they never change. We have girls of the period, men of the world; but the baby is the same self-possessed, fearless, laughing, voracious little heathen in all ages and in all countries."

ROMANISM IN BOSTON.

The Evangelical Alliance held its first meeting after the vacation, in the Melrose, yesterday morning. The Rev. Daniel Dorchester, D.D., read an essay upon the "Rise and Progress of Romanism in Boston." The essayist began by stating that he did not intend to eulogize or anathematize the Catholic Church, but to simply present a comprehensive, historical sketch of Romanism in Boston. He first spoke briefly of the early days, when the laws provided banishment or death as the penalty to be inflicted upon a Catholic priest who might venture among the Puritans of Boston, and then alluded to the time immediately after the Revolution, when the Catholic population of Boston consisted of about thirty Irishmen, with a few Frenchman and Spaniards. From the time of the Revolution, when the old, harsh laws were repealed, the Catholic Church began to make progress. The first church was built in 1803, though public services had been held for several years before that time. In 1825 there were in New England 15,000 Catholics, about one-half of whom were in Boston, 3 priests, and 8 churches, only one of which was worthy of the name. In 1877 the statistics of the church in New England were as follows: 1 archbishop, 6 bishops, 549 priests, 508 churches, 167 chapels and stations, 2 colleges, 168 ecclesiastical students, 32 academies and select schools, 86 parish schools, 15 asylums, 6 hospitals, and a population estimated at 900,000. There are in Boston 30 churches and chapels; 1 Portuguese, 1 Italian, 1 German, 3 under the direction of Jesuits, 89 priests (14 of whom are Jesuits), 4 convents, 9 asylums and hospitals containing 1275 children, and caring in the course of a year for 750 patients, 9 parochial schools, taught by 85 sisters and 13 brothers, and containing 4686 pupils. Since 1840 the Catholic churches in Boston had increased five-fold, and those of the four leading Evangelical denominations, Methodist, Congregationalist, Baptist, and Episcopal, a little more than two-fold. Then, besides, the Catholic churches were larger as a rule than the Protestant, and had each three or four audiences every Sunday. The speaker said that, according to the editor of the Pilot, the Catholics numbered half the population of Boston; but his own estimate was that they were not more than thirty-five per cent. He said that it was claimed in a recent article in the Catholic World, and Dr. Nathan Allen's calculations seemed to substantiate the claim, that the Catholics, with twenty-five per cent. of the population of New England, had seventy-five per cent. of the births. The essayist, in closing, said that though the Catholic Church in America was now in a better condition than ever to take care of those who belonged to her, she seemed to be out of joint with the progress of the time, and, therefore, could not expect to keep up in the race of the next hundred years. At the conclusion of the essay short encouraging speeches were made by Rev. H. M. Parsons, Rev. Mr. Carleton, Rev. Doremus Clark, Rev. Asa Bullard, and others. The meeting adjourned until November 12.—Advertiser, Sept. 11.

GAIL HAMILTON

ON "THE DISTORTED WAY OF MAKING CONVERTS TO CHRISTIANITY."

Much debate is characterized as useless on questionable grounds. What is a mere truism to the comprehension of the critic may be matter of doubt to the inferior intellect of the congressman, and even of his constituent. It is not enough for the "hard-money" man to know that a specie basis is best; he must get the "paper-money" man to believe it also. It is not enough for the granger to know that the cost of transportation is too high; he must put the railroad man under conviction of sin. Whatever is of broad and vital interest is not likely to be passed in the House without prolonged and even heated debate, no matter how closely it may have been discussed in committee.

Religious papers may well quarrel with Congress here. They "know a trick worth two" of these national debates. A minister preaches a sermon through, and lets no dog bark. We may think he has left out a fact or two in his argument on the atonement; that there is a flaw in his reasoning on original sin; a cloud in his definition of the doctrine of substitution; but the good minister has put us under such training that we dare not open our lips, and he has it all his own way. How long would a sermon last, if, every time the Congregational Evangelical preacher struck a snag, Brother Charles K. Whipple and Brother Voysey and Brother Bishop Potter and Brother Falton and Brother Abbot and Brother Patton should rise and say, "Will the gentleman allow me to ask a single question?" "Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him a moment?" "Will the gentleman grant me a few minutes of his time to correct a statement of fact?" "Will the gentleman kindly repeat his last assertion?"—if, in short, he were surrounded by eager antagonists, ready to claw and clutch at every lapse from logic, and every weak statement or forced inference? Let me not be arraigned for a mover of sedition; but I sometimes think when I hear, as I sometimes do hear, a good man plodding serenely onward in the pulpit, assuming his premises, begging his questions, confounding his terms, mistaking assertions for conclusions, and upsetting his dish generally, that it might not be wholly insalubrious to have a little "useless debate" introduced into the churches. When I read in the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church, that "elect infants, dying in infancy, are regenerated and saved by Christ, . . . others, not elected, . . . never truly come to Christ, and therefore cannot be saved," I think I should like to see that poor little non-elect infant run the gauntlet of the debate in the House of Representatives.—"Sermons to the Clergy," p. 284.

ZEAL OR IMPUDENCE?

A correspondent of the Boston Christian Register wrote some time since as follows:—

In your last issue one of your "Brevities" says: "We question the right of self-appointed and brazen-faced religionists to thrust their meddlesome operations into homes where they are unwelcome." Let me give you one of several instances within my own parish limits, the past month.

A mother and daughter, living alone, are visited by a woman, who says she has heard there is sickness there, and asks to read with the invalid. Rising to go she asks leave to bring a friend, and, after hesitancy, confesses that the friend is a man, and her object is to have him pray and talk with the sick one. Leave is granted, as such leave is granted by quiet and lone people to the pushing and prying religionist.

The man enters, and going up to the bed, abruptly exclaims: "You are a very sick woman." The patient replies: "I know that I have been very sick, but am better now, and trust to be well again." "Are you afraid to die?" "I do not know that I am. I would like to live, but I do not fear death." "Are you a Christian?" "That is a difficult question to answer, but I hope that I am." "Where do you go to church?" "I do not go anywhere now, because I am unable to." "What do you call yourself?" "I was brought up Orthodox, but my husband was a zealous Unitarian. I always went to church with him, and I call myself a Unitarian." "Hell and damnation! I see nothing before you but that. If you should die to-night you are lost," and he made his exit.

On being told of this incident the next day, the physician said that in nine cases in ten, such a conversation with a woman in such a condition would have thrown her into convulsions. When appealed to to know what they could do to be clear of such intrusions, as they had no man in the house, I could only advise prompt refusal to let any such people cross the threshold.

I do not know that these and others are Mr. Moody's visitors. I do know that in one instance great indignation was expressed because a woman refused the offer made to have Mr. Sankey come and pray with her. If homes and sick-beds are to suffer from this kind of invasion, it would seem as if the outrage committed under the name of the Gospel needed to be met by the administration of the law.

THE FRIEND'S PHILOSOPHY.

We know our God existeth,
And to the spirit listeth;
We know by his revealings
Unto our conscious feelings.

A law indeed enduring,
A blessedness securing,
This oft our being filleth
And to the spirit willet.

Concerning faith and duty
And good and truth and beauty,
A model thus we cherish,
For we know it ne'er can perish.

And though Nature's royal forces
Are constant in their courses,
Yet through the soul's clear vision
We view the heart's Elysian.

For in God's vast creation
We find no dread negation;
But the Infinite is near us
With an inward voice to cheer us!

This is powerful in attraction—
It is manifold in action,
And is graciousness to all
Who heed its righteous call!

And as river or an ocean
'Tis perpetual in its motion,
With its energies increasing,
And a love that is unceasing!

Yes, 'tis reason, speech, and feeling,
'E'en to each man appealing,
With forces all internal,
And a love that is supernal!

What wonder then we love it?
What wonder that we covet?
That blessed spring diurnal,
That Holy power ETERNAL!

CASH RECEIPTS.

FOR THE WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 15.

T. B. Skinner, 20 cents; E. C. Walker, $4.75; Gilbert B. Hings, $1; G. M. Blair, 60 cents; W. F. Abbot, $2; Cash, $3; T. B. Wakeman, $3.50; T. C. Evans, $4; P. V. Wise, $3.20; H. C. Witmer, $3.50; Dr. E. Moyer, 50 cents; Frank Heman, $3.20; W. S. Bradley, 25 cents.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on Boston or New York. Checks on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or single numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

The Index.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 20, 1877.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street; J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

AT POUGHKEEPSIE, New York, about three years ago, the Catholic priest, Father McSweeney, leased the building of the parochial school of St. Mary's Church to the Board of Education. The Board pay rent and all the expenses of repair, books, teachers, etc., while the priest has the nomination of all the teachers, seven of whom are Sisters of Charity. By this arrangement the city is made to pay all the cost of educating the children in the Catholic catechism and faith! Are the people to be henceforth taxed in this country to train the rising generation to give their supreme allegiance as citizens, not to the State, but to the Pope?

THE "SOCIETY OF HUMANITY," 141 Eighth Street, New York city, have published An Epitome of the Positive Philosophy and Religion, explanatory of the objects of that society, together with its Constitution and Regulations. It is a well-printed tract of fifty-nine pages, which will be mailed to any address on receipt of twenty-five cents. A letter by Harriet Martineau on her religious convictions is also included in it. The tract is full of material for reflection, and exhibits a scheme for human advancement which is in many respects admirably planned. There is much in it to command sympathy from persons of thought and aspiration, and nothing to offend good taste. Though there seems to be, according to our own views, an excess of sentimental conservatism in the attempt to retain certain outgrown words of the older cults, the new meanings are often tender and full of beauty. It is undoubtedly a mistake to suppose that even so great a mind as that of Comte can mould the "religion of humanity" after his own often whimsical thought, and the chief danger of his influence lies in its tendency to create another new sect. If this "Society of Humanity," can escape all conceit of this nature, it may render true and lasting service to the world.

WITH GREAT pleasure we are permitted to announce that Mr. B. F. Underwood, so well known to the independent thinkers of the United States, will be in future an editorial contributor to THE INDEX. Mr. Underwood was born in New York City, July 6, 1839, and became a radical at a very early age. During the war, he was among the first to offer his services to the government; and he served faithfully till the close of that great contest, bravely encountering wounds, sickness, and confinement in the terrible prison-pens of the rebels. He was promoted to be Adjutant of his regiment on account of his fidelity, and held this position when mustered out of service in July, 1865. Since that time he has been prominent as an earnest friend and promulgator of liberal principles. In 1868 he entered the liberal lecture-field, and has here achieved a most remarkable success. No other lecturer or public debater on behalf of "scientific materialism" attracts such large audiences or commands such thorough respect from friends and foes alike. Clear and strong in reasoning, bold in statement, yet always calm and gentlemanly in manner, he has won a great influence by his character and abilities among the multitudes who have taken their stand wholly outside of the dominant religion of the day. Several of his debates with Orthodox clergymen have been published in book form; for instance, those with President Burgees, of the Northwestern Christian University, Rev. Clark Braden, etc. An article from his pen in this issue well illustrates a quality of his character with which we have great sympathy—uncompromising plainness of speech unalloyed by the least tinge of bitterness towards individuals.

"EDUCATION AND FAMILY RIGHTS."

The Catholic, denouncing all schools, public or private, in which children are not taught the Catholic faith by Catholic instructors, always plants himself ostensibly on "parental prerogative," "family rights," or (more explicitly) on the rights of the father; for the father is, on the Catholic theory, the supreme ruler of the family. But, by the same theory, the father himself is subject to the priest, the priest to the bishop, the bishop to the Pope; and the upshot of this theory is that the Pope, by the "grace of God," has an absolute and Divine right to control the education of all children born on the planet—a right reverently and obediently acknowledged by all good Catholics, but wickedly denied and disregarded by all non-Catholics. Moreover, wherever and whenever the Roman Church has the power, the Pope not only claims, but exercises, this universal prerogative by arrogating supreme control of the educational system of the country, putting it exclusively into the hands of his ecclesiastical subordinates, and suppressing all schools not thus governed. That is the logic of "infallibility"; and it is a logic everywhere sternly and despotically enforced up to the full limit of the political power held by the Church. If the Church ever gains the ascendancy here, that will be the logic to which the people of the United States must submit with such grace as they can. It is well for them to comprehend fully the nature of the issue between the Catholic Church and the public school system.

But Catholic writers are seldom candid enough to proclaim this theory with all its hideously tyrannical consequences. Adroitly adapting themselves as far as possible to the prevailing phraseology of the time, they tickle the public ear in this country with catchwords, to which they attach one meaning, but to which (as they well know) non-Catholics attach a meaning widely different. Here is this phrase, "parental rights," or "family rights." It sounds beautifully. Nobody questions it; everybody admits that there are such rights as these. Yet the Catholic means by it, in the last analysis, merely the right of the Pope to command and of the father to obey,—merely the right of the father to surrender his conscience and reason absolutely into another's keeping; while the ordinary citizen means by it the right of the parents (mother as well as father) to follow their own independent conscience and reason. The Catholic really means only the right to be a slave—to put another's will in the place of one's own; the non-Catholic means the right to be free. By not carrying the argument beyond this convenient but delusive stopping-place of "family rights," Catholic writers sometimes entrap liberal thinkers into a sympathy with their sophistical reasonings by which they hope their church will profit, yet at which they themselves must secretly laugh.

We do not propose now to go over again the ground covered in our discussion with Bishop McQuaid, published by the Free Religious Association in its tract on "The Public School Question." That this question involves, not merely "parental rights," but also the personal rights of the child and the collective rights of society,—and that the exaggerated, exclusive emphasis put by the Catholics on "parental rights" is nothing but the protrusion into modern times of the obsolete and despotic "Patria Potestas" of ancient Roman law,—is in that tract, we believe, made sufficiently plain. But we were not so sanguine as to hope that justice to our argument would be done by any Catholic writer; it is much easier to reiterate the exploded fallacies, since Catholic audiences are guiltless of reading both sides of the question. But it is not useless to keep prominently before the reading and thinking public the essential elements of a problem which threatens grave practical evil to our institutions, and whose gravity is only due to the impenetrable opacity of mind which characterizes the bulk of our Catholic population. Hence it seems worth while to reproduce the following passage from an article published by the Brooklyn Catholic Review (one of the ablest representatives of the Catholic press), under the caption which we have quoted at the beginning of this article, in order to show afresh that the doctrine of "parental prerogative," or "family rights," is the central strategic position of the Catholic attack on the public schools:—

"Purely secular education, at least, is but a pale moral moonlight, having in it none of the heat that is given by the bright sun of true religion. It is religion directing knowledge, and not mere book-learning of itself that has civilized the world. We are firm believers like our Westphalian brethren, and all true Catholics the world over, that children should be trained up in the way they should go, so that when they are old he [sic] will not depart from it. Worldlings, on the contrary, affect to think that the whole duty of the parent or the State is accomplished when children are instructed in that knowledge which will make them good subjects of the State. Those who propound this theory build their arguments on an essentially false foundation, the assumption of a principle which is subversive of society itself; namely, that the child belongs to the State first and then to the family, or rather not to the family at all. If this were laid down as an unalterable principle, the whole social edifice would soon crumble into primitive barbarism; nay, perhaps, into the savage state. We hold, on the contrary, that the State has no right to pass upon the violability or inviolability of the family tie. We think our adversaries, Darwinians included, will be forced to concede that the family existed before such a thing as the State was ever dreamed of; that stateship was only a mutual compact of alliance between families desirous of protecting themselves and one another from the encroachments of turbulent and rapacious neighbors. And even supposing that the turbulent and rapacious were the first to band together for aggressive purposes, our argument will not be one whit the weaker. Looking at the matter in this light, how can any one, and especially a father of a family, encroach upon rights which it is his duty to respect and cause to be respected by others? The parents and not the government have the first rights over the child for whose existence they are responsible, at least as long as they are able and willing to give it the proper care; this condition failing, the State has even then no right to influence the growth of its mind as long as others are found willing to undertake and faithfully perform the same duties. But the worldliness of man, his innate propensity to evil and consequent opposition to the Catholic Church, of which Christ himself has told us, has ever inspired the powers of this world to try every means to destroy that Church which neither sanctions their usurpation, tyranny, and immorality, nor allows them to pass without pronouncing upon them the severest judgment that lies within the power of man to give. Else why should these powers be so opposed to the teaching of the Catholic Church, a teaching and a Church that have civilized the world and kept it from relapsing into barbarism? But this modern tyranny will fall to crush the Church as all the others have failed, and also will save society at another critical moment. Education is now the fresh point of debate, and it is in the school that the battle is being fought of which it is not difficult to foresee the issue."

To those who are interested in reading an extended analysis and refutation of the central sophism in this kind of reasoning, we can only refer to the tract above mentioned. A few points, however, are worth noticing here.

1. The Review imagines that those who defend the secular principle in public school education teach that "the child belongs to the State first and then to the family, or rather not to the family at all." This is an instance of gross misinformation or of reckless misrepresentation. They teach, on the contrary, that the child belongs first of all to himself; that neither the State nor the parents have any right of proprietorship in him; that all the right which the parents and the State have over his education is that of joint-guardians during the period of his immaturity, and that they are together responsible for his preparation for the duties of his future life as a member of society.

2. "We think our adversaries, Darwinians included," says the Review, "will be forced to concede that the family existed before such a thing as the State was ever dreamed of." In the same manner Bishop McQuaid (whom the Review has been diligently studying) declares that "parental rights precede State rights." Yes, we admit that; but individual rights precede both. In the state of absolute brutishness, before family relations could possibly exist, the individual existed, and had his rights,—whether recognized or unrecognized it matters not. First the individual, then the family, at last the State: that was the order of evolution. Now the Catholic Church swallows up all other rights in her own pretended right of absolute Divine rule; her ostensible recognition of "family rights" is only a delusion and a sham, as we have above shown. But the secular republican State recognizes first of all, as its own foundation, the natural rights of the individual, whether as an individual, a member of a family, or a citizen; it exists solely to protect these natural rights of individuals from invasion by other individuals or other communities. Hence it protects every parent in his or her real parental rights, but equally restrains all parental encroachment on the rights of the child. The impregnable citadel of the secular theory of education is that it recognizes the rights of children as individuals, and does not, like the Catholic theory, make children a mere appendage and possession of the parent. Hence the State punishes a parent who physically starves his child; and it ought to punish one who starves him mentally. Inasmuch as the State has even more at stake in the child's future than the parent has, since the period of his citizenship is much longer than that of his nonage, it has a just jurisdiction over the parent to the extent of forbidding him to rear the child in such a manner as to impose on society at last a pauper or a criminal, instead of sending forth a decently educated citizen. It is the child's individual right to be protected to this extent from the ignorance or cruel selfishness of his own parents; and it is the duty of the State to claim and to exercise so much jurisdiction over the parent as is necessary to defend the child's own personal rights. Let the Review overthrow these positions, if it can.

The Catholic Church hates and dreads this doctrine of natural individual rights, anterior and superior in sanctity to its own supernatural claims; and because she has not logic enough to disprove them, she either cunningly ignores them altogether or misrepresents them to suit her own purposes. Before marriage (and thereby family ties and rights) can exist, the individuals who contract it must pre-exist; "family rights" are only a complex combination of individual rights. Let the Review, and all other Catholic journals or spokesmen, take notice that the secular theory of education does not, as they allege, begin with "the State," but with the individual,—that it teaches that individual rights precede both family and State rights,—and that "the State" is nothing but an aggregation of individuals for the effectual protection of their own rights as individuals. To represent this theory as anything else, after the repeated expositions of it, is neither candid, respectable, nor in the long run useful. We commend to the Review the policy of fairer statement and better reasoning.

"A RELIGION WHICH BY ITS VERY NATURE IS INTOLERANT."

Some time ago Rev. Dr. Thompson, who is much praised as a Christian scholar, said in a lecture, reported in the New York Tribune:—

"This god [Serapis] was set up in the temple as the god of Alexandria; the one protecting deity, invented for a class of men who had agreed to disagree, and live as good neighbors together, each agreeing to allow the other to think as he pleased. . . . But now in the fourth century of the great city's existence, when the population numbered about two million, in this enormous wealthy city, there appears one day an unknown man, preaching an unheard-of story that God has come to earth; and he established a religion which, by its very nature, is intolerant; which declares war against all difference; which has a clear-cut, definite faith and creed, and says, 'There is one God and one Lord Jesus Christ; and there is no other name given among men whereby they can be saved'; and this man plants that faith there, and gathers a Christian Church, distinct from Jews and idolaters, which grows and spreads till it has a clergy and bishops, and comes to be a power in Alexandria."

So I have thought, and this is the view of the subject entertained generally by freethinkers. But when we say this, we are charged with misrepresenting Christianity through failure to distinguish between the system itself and a perversion of it. We are usually reminded of some saying of Jesus such as "Love your enemies," or "Overcome evil with good."

But Dr. Thompson is undoubtedly right. The influence of a positive theological dogma, firmly believed and zealously taught, never has been and never can be neutralized or counteracted by the inculcation of a few general precepts of morality, however much the precepts are opposed in spirit to the dogma. Christianity makes persecution inevitable in proportion as it is believed and there is power to persecute. It makes unbelief and heresy a crime, and unbelievers and heretics criminals. It makes it the religious duty of Christians to legislate for the extirpation of heresy and the punishment of heretics. Is not God angry with the heretic, the unbeliever? Are not his views an offence to God? Is it not natural that the sincere Christian should try to please his Maker by removing whatever is displeasing in his sight?

But the most powerful consideration is the belief that the unfortunate victims of heresy will suffer unending torment; that "he that believes and is baptized shall be saved—he that believeth not shall be damned"; that, as Dr. Thompson reminds us, "there is no other name given among men whereby they can be saved." In view of such an awful thought, can the sincere Christian permit the spread of heresy, if he can prevent it? Having the power to prevent the damnation of souls, will not benevolence prompt him to use it, and will he not punish open offenders to deter others from leaving the true faith? In an age of intense faith, will not the most earnest and devoted Christians be the most active and zealous persecutors? Reasoning a priori, we cannot avoid this conclusion, the correctness of which is too sadly confirmed by red records of history. The founders of the Inquisition, as Llorente has shown, were men who acted from philanthropic motives. They destroyed their fellow-beings by thousands, often torturing them most horribly, to please God and to lessen the number of the lost and damned. The same is true of the Puritans. They whipped women and hanged Quakers for the glory of God and the salvation of souls. What were a few hours of suffering here, if by it multitudes could be saved from eternal torture beyond the grave? The worst religious persecutors, as Buckle has mentioned, have been, like Theodosius and the English Mary, most sincere and conscientious persons. Their cruelty was the result of their faith, the result of a false and bad principle. In proportion as men believe that correct theological beliefs involve merit and are essential to salvation, and that theological errors involve guilt and will be punished with torments in hell, they will persecute to the extent of their power. And such has been the case. "But few persons," says Lecky, "can follow the history of Christian persecution without a feeling of extreme astonishment that some modern writers, not content with maintaining that the doctrine of exclusive salvation ought not to have produced persecution, have ventured, in defiance of the unanimous testimony of the theologians of so many centuries, to dispute the plain historical fact that it did produce it."

No amount of special pleading can disprove Dr. Thompson's statement that Christianity is "a religion which by its very nature is intolerant." * When we consider the history of Christian persecution, the ill-will and bad feeling that have sprung from this faith, its suppression of honest doubt, without which there can be no progress; when we trace it back through centuries and think of the hundreds of thousands that have been scourged, confined in dungeons, tortured by the rack, the thumb-screw, and hundreds of other infernal instruments of religious cruelty; that have had their bones broken, their flesh torn, and their joints one by one dislocated; that have expired amidst flames, reproached and mocked while dying; that have been led out in garments covered with hideous representations of devils, and burned to amuse royal guests; when we remember the countless thousands that have been massacred for their faith; the millions that have perished in religious wars which subjected whole nations to their awful curse; giving them over to pillage, torture, and destruction; that "converted Syria into an Aceldama, and inundated with blood the fairest fields of Europe"; when, coming down to this age and to our own land, we consider the immense numbers that are ostracized from society, injured in their business, subjected to numerous hardships on account of their views, made untrue to themselves, forced into concealment of their opinions and hypocritical conformity to the popular faith, with that other class of victims of which Channing speaks; those "who, spellbound by early prejudice, or by intimidation from the pulpit and the press, dare not think, who anxiously stifle every doubt or misgiving in regard to their opinions, as if to doubt were a crime; who shrink from the seeker after truth as from an infection, who deny all virtue that does not wear the livery of their own sect; who, surrendering to others their best powers, receive unhesitatingly any teaching which wars against reason and common-sense, and who think it a duty to impose upon such as live within their influence the grievous bondage which they bear themselves,"—surely we find sufficient illustration of the truth of the statement that Christianity is "a religion which by its very nature is intolerant." It has been the cause of more unprovoked strife and war and more unmerited suffering than any other religion of which history gives an account. The multitude of its victims can never be numbered.

Christian intolerance to-day, as in the past, is greatest where its adherents are least divided into conflicting sects; where faith is the strongest, and where scepticism and freethought have exerted the least influence.

MR. MORSE ON "INTEREST."

Mr. Morse sends us the following letter, which we are very glad to print:—

DEAR ABBOT:—

It seems to me you turn aside from the point the opponents of interest make. They would say, "If A lends B a thousand dollars, he has a right to charge B for all sacrifice and for risk. But that is a different thing from charging for the use of the money. B might use the money, and A's sacrifice being nothing, not wishing himself to use it, and his risk nothing, no price whatever could be set. It might even occur that B's taking the money was a great favor to A. If taking care of it was in any way a burden to B, there would be a ground for charging A instead of A's charging him." This, I fear, is a poor statement, but it gives what I consider the strong point; one which you in your various responses to correspondents seem never to heed. Parting with power lays no basis for a charge, unless you do so at a sacrifice. This, in your last response to Mr. Ferrette, you realize. You put the right to a price on the ground of sacrifice. Each lender must determine the extent of his sacrifice, and charge accordingly; if it be a hundred per cent. it is perfectly equitable for him to do so. The point is, he charges the cost to him of parting with his money, not for his neighbor's using it. That he confers a benefit on his neighbor, is no concern of his, so far as charging a price for the money goes. He is concerned simply with the damage done to himself.

Now this does not "concede the whole point at issue" in favor of interest. Interest is "premium paid for the use of money." The opponents of interest deny that the use of money of itself justifies any such premium. They therefore deny interest, and put the right to compensation for loaning money on other ground.

I might say more, but I will respect the virtue of brevity. Yours truly, S. H. MORSE.

1. So far as practical importance is concerned, the only question about interest that has seemed to us really worth discussing is this: when a man borrows $100, and repays it a year later, shall he in equity pay only $100, or $108? If equity requires him to repay $8 more than he borrowed, it is practically of no consequence on what ground the interest thus paid is demanded. We have imagined that the position taken by the opponents of interest was that the borrower ought in equity to repay only the original sum borrowed, and that any additional sum required, no matter for what reason, was unjustly extorted. To concede that any additional sum, however small and for whatever reason, is justly due the lender, seemed (and still seems) to concede the only real point at issue.

2. But it now appears that, at least in the opinion of Mr. Morse, it is the reason for which interest is asked, and not the asking of it, that constitutes the justice or injustice of the transaction. The lender may justly exact 100 per cent. for one reason, while it is rank injustice to exact 1 per cent. for another! We confess that this is rather an astonishing view of the matter, and takes us a little by surprise. Instead of having a fixed rate of interest, based on the ascertained value of the use of the money and approved as just by the experience and consent of the community, we now have only the lender's capricious estimate of the "sacrifice" he makes by lending, as the rule of justice. Nobody is entitled to revise his estimate or call it in question; he alone makes the sacrifice, and he alone can estimate the amount of it. Would the substitution in business of such an arbitrary standard for the standard of a fixed rate, generally approved, really conduce to equity in business transactions? We suspect not. We suspect that lenders would practically measure their own "sacrifice" by the amount they could extort from the necessities of the borrowers; and that the proposed reform would practically end in such usurious oppression as would make mankind gladly return to the fixed rate, as now.

3. Looking at the question theoretically, however, ought interest to be charged on account of the lender's "sacrifice" or the borrower's "use" of the money? These two elements appear to us to be only different slices of the same fact. Of course there are cases when people wish to lend money to have it well taken care of, and to lend it to such parties as are qualified by integrity and sagacity to take good care of it. In such cases, it is even now customary to pay money for such care to agents or trustees, and not to receive interest on the loan. But, throwing out exceptional cases, whenever the borrower wants money, the lender wants it too; they both want it for the use they can make of it; what the lender "sacrifices" is this use, and what the borrower receives is nothing else. Do not the lender's "sacrifice" and the borrower's "use" always go together, and are they not in fact only the same thing looked at differently from their respective points of view? What is it that the lender "sacrifices," if not the "use" of the money he lends? And what is it that the borrower receives, if not the "use" of the money "sacrificed" by the lender? The loan is simply a "sacrifice" of the "use" by the lender, and a "gain" of the "use" by the borrower; and the interest paid by the latter still seems to us to be only a just compensation for this "use." The cost of the lender's "parting" with the money and the benefit of his neighbor's "using" it seem to us to be both justly measured by the current rate of interest; and the two ways of viewing the transaction come to one and the same thing.

If this is not true, why not? We do not see how we "turn aside" from the point; but if we do, we shall not evade considering it when it is made plain. Why is it not true that the "premium for the use of money" borrowed by B is, looked at from the other side, merely the premium for the sacrifice of that use made by A? We wait to be enlightened.

NATIONAL PATRIOTISM.

EDITOR INDEX:—

A true, enlightened national patriotism is one of the chief factors of civilization. Anything that invigorates, harmonizes, purifies, and exalts that sentiment is a blessing; anything that divides, distracts, degrades, and weakens it, is an enemy to human progress.

The first stir of national life in the American colonies developed two theories of government and two qualities or kinds of patriotism. These two theories have come down to our day under the names, "State sovereignty" and "National sovereignty." The first theory prevailed at our first attempt to set up a national government, and a Confederacy was formed. This Confederacy was so inefficient and poorly adapted to national purposes, that, after a fair trial, it was abandoned. The wise men met in council and devised our present Constitution. This new instrument of national government combined the two theories as far as possible, and retained the actual sovereignty in the general government. It was considered a signal victory for the national theory, and was vehemently opposed. Had it not been for the energy and ability of the clergy of New England, it might never have been adopted.

Unfortunately, the first named theory found a congenial abiding place mainly in the southern half of the Republic, while the second took root mainly in the northern half. One became the shield and bulwark of chattel slavery and collateral barbarisms; the other dwelt in the hearts of all lovers of equal rights.

The natural and inevitable consequence of this dual growth was a terrible civil war. The national patriots conquered in the fight, preserving us legally a nation. In point of fact, however, we remained as inharmonious and disunited as before. The serpent was "scotched" but not killed; and the fight was transferred to the arena of politics and discussion. The final result is yet to be determined.

From this slight outline of our past history the inference is plainly drawn that true patriotism, for many years, has had to encounter one deadly enemy in the extreme doctrine of "State rights" and its "peculiar" patriotism. But another powerful opponent has arisen. The most conspicuous foe of national patriotism in modern nations is the Roman Church. Its natural tendency is to distract and weaken that sentiment, thus more surely blinding the masses to her infallible sovereignty. Slowly, silently, but surely, the Roman Church has acquired great power in our Republic. She is the close ally, the fast friend of "home rule," and all other forces and influences that render by their opposition the growth of national patriotism so slow, difficult, and uncertain.

To these two mighty enemies of national harmony and patriotism, the priestcraft of Protestantism, which seeks to mould our Constitution to ecclesiastical ends, must be added. In view of these three foes of true liberty, and the minor influences that corrupt a noble patriotism, may not we be justified in growing concerned over the future of our Union?

That noble man and shrewd observer, Theodore Parker, once expressed his belief that our nation would be divided into four Republics. But we will trust that our fate be grander than that. If Bunker Hill meant anything of importance, it meant that we were to be a united, harmonious, freedom-loving nation, not a jangling Confederacy; it meant, not only that we must attain to equal rights and efficient protection to the national citizen, but that we should aim to be a shining example to the world of a democratic liberty that means order, security, and peace. In order to reach this desirable conclusion it is essential that patriotism be redeemed from its localized, narrow, and corrupted condition. Our safety lies in seeing the necessity of this, and applying the appropriate educational remedies.

The learned historian of rationalism, Mr. Lecky, says: "Religion and patriotism are the chief moral influences to which man has been subject; and the separate modifications and mutual interaction of these two agents may almost be said to constitute the moral history of mankind." Again he says: "The creation of a strong and purely secular political feeling, diffused through all classes of society, and producing an ardent patriotism and a passionate and indomitable love of liberty, is sufficient in many respects to modify all the great departments of thought, and to contribute largely to the formation of a distinct type of intellectual character."

THE INDEX is destined to do as good a work for patriotism as for religion,—a much needed work for both. Despite all evil appearances, let us continue to hope that "home rule" patriotism will gradually be transformed into a superior national patriotism; that priestcraft, Roman and Protestant, will be foiled in its hopes of dominion over our fair land; that war, intemperance, avarice, and sensuality will be successfully resisted; and that we shall emerge from the coming ordeal purified as by fire—a truly united, harmonious, peaceful nation,—a nation exalted to the highest standard of the noblest patriotism.

IOWA.

CABANA, Sept. 3.

[To this most penetrating and far-seeing article we heartily subscribe. The views it expresses as to the necessity of "efficient protection for the national citizen," and especially for his equal religious rights, command our unqualified assent. That is the central principle of the National Liberal League, as patriotic as it is religiously just to the individual. Come what may, that great principle is destined to revolutionize American politics. Who are ready to step forward bravely, and pledge themselves to its service? Have we no heroes among us?—ED.]

TRUTHS FOR THE WORKING-MEN.

"KNOWLEDGE IS POWER"

Mind governs matter. The superiority of the Anglo-Saxon over the Hindoostanee, of the Caucasian over the Abyssinian, of the highly-cultured European over the semi-bestial Australasian, is only to be explained by the relative weight of their brains. A race of giants destitute of mental ability would be utterly exterminated by a tribe of pygmies capable of inventing gunpowder and breech loaders. Therefore, in any contest between opposing forces, it is the habit of mankind to gauge as accurately as possible, the comparative intellectual calibre of the contestants, and to award the victory by anticipation, to whichever side indicates the possession of the larger amount of brain-power. Particularly is this the case in all civil, social, and political convulsions. So far as a single skirmish is concerned, Sitting Bull may have the advantage of the United States troops; but we all recognize that ultimate victory will remain with the whites as against the native American Indians. Nor is this merely because the latter are so largely outnumbered, but by reason of our confidence in the capacity of the white race to out-wit, out-last, and out-manceuvre the Sioux, or any other tribe of semi-civilized mankind. The English soldiers in New Zealand were not as brave as the Maories; but the latter are now hardly more than a memory of the past. King Theodorus of Abyssinia was fighting against fate, although his devoted warriors outnumbered their assailants ten to one. Lopez of Paraguay succumbed, and the Emperor of Brazil survived, by virtue of that same law of "natural selection" and "survival of the fittest" that causes the rattlesnake to perish in ninety-nine out of every hundred instances where it comes in contact with mankind. So is it with thieves and burglars and murderers, those vermin of civilization; here and there an occasional instance of undetected knavery is reported, but the police records will show some years later, at the longest, that society is avenged. Nothing endures except the principle of justice in our human communities; that cannot be done away with except at the cost of abolishing civilization.

Herbert Spencer, than whom the working-men have no warmer friend, and John Stuart Mill, who devoted the best efforts of his life to the amelioration of their condition, have both pointed out in luminous language the fatal error of the laboring classes in supposing because they form a majority of the population in Europe and the United States of North America, that they can therefore dictate terms to the wealthier classes, who are in such a small minority. All their efforts to dominate either the industrial, financial, or political movements of society, are destined to be failures so long as they lack that essential education, without which none of these questions can be correctly apprehended. Spencer says (Study of Sociology, chapter x., page 281): "Members of the regulated classes, kept in relations more or less antagonistic with the classes regulating them, are thereby hindered from seeing the need for, and the benefits of, this organization which seems the cause of their grievances; and they are also hindered from seeing that the improved industrial organizations of the future can come only through improvements in their own nature." And again: "Feeling keenly what they have to bear, and tracing sundry real grievances to men who buy their labor and men who are most influential in making the laws, artisans and rustics conclude that, considered individually and in combination, those above them are personally bad, selfish, or tyrannical, in special degrees. It never occurs to them that the evils they complain of result from the average human nature of our age. And yet were it not for the class-bias, they would see in their dealings with one another plenty of proofs that the injustices they suffer are certainly not greater, and possibly less, than they would be, were the higher social functions discharged by individuals taken from among themselves. The simple fact, notorious enough, that working-men who save money and become masters are not more considerate than usual towards those they employ, but often the contrary, might alone convince them of this. On all sides there is ample evidence having kindred meaning. Not to dwell on the occasional killing of men among them who assert their rights to sell their labor as they please, or on the frequent acts of violence and intimidation committed by those on strike against those who undertake the work they have refused, it suffices to cite the despotism exercised by trades-union officers. The daily acts of these make it manifest that the ruling powers set up by working-men inflict on them grievances as great as, if not greater than, those inflicted by the ruling powers, political and social, which they decry." And John Stuart Mill remarks in the fifth book of his Principles of Political Economy (chapter x., §5):

"If it were possible for the working classes, by combining among themselves, to raise or help up the general rate of wages, it needs hardly be said that this would be a thing not to be punished, but to be welcomed and rejoiced at. Unfortunately, the effect is quite beyond attainment by such means. The multitudes who compose the working-class are too numerous and too widely scattered to combine at all, much more to combine effectually. If they could do so, they might doubtless succeed in diminishing the hours of labor, and obtaining the same wages for less work; but if they aimed at obtaining actually higher wages than the rate fixed by demand and supply, the rate which distributes the whole circulating capital of the country among the entire working population, this could only be accomplished by keeping a part of their number permanently out of employment. As support from public charity would of course be refused to those who could get work and would not accept it, they would be thrown for support upon the trades-union of which they were members, and the work-people collectively would be no better off than before, having to support the same numbers out of the same aggregate wages."

There is but one tiresome and difficult way for the laboring classes to elevate their condition, and that is, by working more instead of less; by strenuous study out of working hours, and by economizing their scanty means so as to enable them to provide for the better education of their children. The history of the great engineer Stephenson, of Benjamin Franklin, of Stephen Girard, George Peabody, Peter Cooper, the Harper Brothers, and many, if not most, of the great money kings of Europe and America, fully illustrates the possibilities open to working-men. Industry, economy, and—more than all the rest—patient perseverance, united to good health and habits of sobriety, are sufficient to assure success in any legitimate business; but political power requires education in addition, in order to dominate other men. The reign of mere brute force was terminated a century ago, and it is no more possible for a brutal majority of working-men to coerce an intelligent minority of capitalists, than it would be for a tyrant to do the same thing. The utmost the communists can accomplish is to unsettle, for a brief period, the normal condition of social affairs at the expense of the laboring classes! "Mind governs matter," and superior minds rule their inferiors, as naturally as the farmer's boy causes the yoke of dull-witted oxen to obey his wishes. Not till eagles shall surrender to house-flies, because the latter are the more numerous, will the working-classes reign supreme.

"NOTHING TO DO WITH IT"

TIPPECANOE CITY, O., Sept. 4, 1877.

MR. ABBOT:—

In THE INDEX of Aug. 30, under the head of "Labor Notes," I find the following: "The writer in showing the good of our civilization requires the high peaks of our mountains [the rich] to be torn down, and the valleys [the poor] to be raised up." To this I have no objection. Then the writer (as temporary editor) adds: "We repeat again, it cannot be done by the system of business interests that prevails. Thrift, temperance, economy, more or less tobacco, have nothing to do with it. There is as much of these in one class of people as another. The improvidence of the poor is all in your eye, Mr. Economist. We say it respectfully. There is as much improvidence in the nature of the rich or prosperous world as in the denizens of that lower world."

Now I am not about to deny that there is improvidence in the "rich and prosperous"; but that "thrift, temperance, economy, more or less tobacco," have nothing to do in keeping the poor poor, I utterly deny, and appeal to every man's experience for proof. I add further: such things not only tend to keep the poor poor, but they tend to make, if practised by the rich, them poor also; and, if not, supply the means to make the rich richer, to build still higher the highest peaks. Take the want of "thrift, temperance, economy, and the use of tobacco" from the poor, or let them voluntarily abandon such habits, and it will do more towards bringing mankind on a level as to riches than any other means that could be devised.

I speak from my own experience and that of thousands of others I have known: if a man can get a dollar and twenty-five cents per day, there is nothing between him and his full share of this world's goods (for his full share is only four or five hundred dollars) but the "want of thrift, temperance, and economy." Of course I mean such as have reasonable health and no particular accidents. I hold that any man who at thirty, has not his share of this world's property, has by no means done his duty; and if any one is to blame for the unequal distribution of property (and I think there is something wrong somewhere), he, as a general thing, is most to blame. If a man will not save something of his daily pay, but chooses to spend it, perhaps, he has the right to do so; but he should not complain of his neighbor who saves what he spends. The world would be in a desperate condition, if no one saved the products of labor. It is continually rung in our ears that the "products of labor belong to the laborer." I say so too. But has the laborer no right to spend what he earns? If he chooses to spend it, to whom then does it belong? Is the old adage at fault, "A boy can't eat his cake and have it"? I know there are many ways employed by the rich to get means which are unjust. Such ways our laws do not sanction, and should not. I know also there are many ways of avoiding the law resorted to; I justify none of them. But what now,—shall we have mob law? Would that give us justice? Of late, we have had some experience given of the justice of mob law. The subject grows.

THE GREAT STRIKE.

ROCK FALLS, Ill., Sept. 4, 1877.

DEAR INDEX:—

The few back numbers of THE INDEX, particularly the last one, have given me great gratification. I am rejoiced that we have had that great strike. I honor and respect those who inaugurated it, for their attempt to get from under their grievous yoke. They may have done wrong in some cases; but this feeble resistance to the moneyed power was as natural as the first drops that precede a copious shower that comes to refresh the parched earth after a long drouth. The drops have fallen; we shall not be disappointed in expecting the shower that will surely come. For the last thirty or forty years, I have predicted that this slavery of the working-classes would go down in blood; but I did not expect to see so auspicious a beginning,—auspicious only that it was so wide-spread, and the actors manifested such deep and solemn earnestness, that it has drawn the attention of the whole world to it, and enlisted the sympathy of thousands of the best men and women of the land in their favor. It is now discussed in all our papers for or against the toilers. This agitation will greatly help to purify the moral atmosphere, and give to all a clearer perception of the great wrongs under which the poor are laboring. This is the first step in every reform by arguments and information to present the subject in such a light, that all can see the evil to be reformed. I hope this discussion, let it take whatever range it may, will not only show that there are great wrongs in our present civilization, but will throw some light on the means by which we are to get rid of the greatest curse that ever afflicted the human race. It seems to me that there are but two ways we can remove our present burdens of labor: either by a bloody revolution that will cost millions of lives, or by wise and harmonious political action that will turn the power that statute law wields in favor of the rights of the long-enslaved working-classes. Hitherto their oppressors, the capitalists, have had undisputed possession of the field of political power. The working-men now are without unity of action. They have strength of numbers, but they lack organization; without combined strength their superior numbers count them nothing. I hope the example set them in Ohio will be followed by all the States, and that they will never suffer temporary defeat to paralyze their efforts until they free themselves from the intolerable oppression that capital has imposed upon them.

Respectfully, W. E. LUKENS.

MR. BEECHER ON BREAD AND WATER.

Mr. Beecher has come down to bread and water,—at least to preaching a bread-and-water diet, which we suppose of course he would not do except upon practical knowledge. In his sermon on the railroad strikes, as reported in the New York Herald of July 23, he says: "Water costs nothing; and a man that can't live on bread is not fit to live. The man whose culture has lifted him away from the power of self-denial is falsely cultured. A family may live, love, and be happy, that eats bread and good water in the morning, water and good bread at noon, and good bread and water at night."

A recapitulation of Mr. Beecher's bills of fare for the last thirty years or so would be interesting, owing to the complete corroboration of these dietary doctrines which they would doubtless afford. Still, as Mr. Beecher has not during that period habitually performed exhausting manual labor, his experience may not be considered conclusive for laboring people.

As I am unfortunately the victim of an incurable mania for dietetic science, and also for comparative psychology, I read the above-mentioned discourse to a number of laboring people and invited a statement of their views and experiences. I was surprised and pained to notice a certain bluntness with which they expressed their non-concurrence with some of its sentiments. Said one, in substance: "It is provoking past endurance to hear this prate about frugality from men who live in luxury. Mr. Beecher gets his twenty thousand a year for spouting on Sundays, and has made himself so notorious that he can command five hundred dollars a night for making a rare-show of himself,—he calls it lecturing. He has always evinced a heavy capacity for money and honors. If he chooses to take his twenty, fifty, or one hundred thousand dollars a year out of the general stock of wealth, why, it is all a matter of taste; but preaching starvation rations to people who actually work and produce value doesn't come with good grace from such a man. In these matters, precept without practice doesn't do much good,—is rather insulting than otherwise. We expect our saints and heroes to bear our burdens with us. Who is Beecher, anyhow? He is the spiritual whitewasher of an association of traffickers, leeches on the country's industry, whose essential thievishness necessitates a disguise of ultra sanctimony. It is rare to find as good and great a man as Beecher naturally is, who is willing to justify the money-changers in the temple and give them his moral support, instead of casting them forth. Beecher is a noble man; a splendid man; but he believes pleasant and profitable things too readily; he has sold himself to the devil, the devil of Orthodoxy, wealth, and pride."

Now I think my friend, in common with many rather secular-minded people, hardly does justice to Mr. Beecher and his clientage. I am aware that it is estimated by many that Plymouth Church contains (along with many humanly good people) a dominant coterie of the most arrogant hypocrites the world ever produced; that the church is run in the interest of a club of merchant princes who in intent and effect are piratical toll-takers in the gates of commerce; and that Mr. Beecher is their hired flatterer and pettifogger,—a histrionic prodigy on whom they are pleased and profited to lavish much misgotten cash. But this comparison between piracy and traffic seems to me defective; piracy hinders exchange (upon which civilization confessedly depends); while, generally speaking, the mercantile desire for gain furthers exchange. The fact that both merchant and pirate seek to get something for nothing should not mislead us. Rapine is illegal, except in some localities, or under special circumstances (as in privateering; confiscation and appropriation or destruction of enemy's property; or expelling from their lands and homes heathen people who are not strong enough to defend themselves); while trade is universally legal, and, besides, pays better, in the long run (to the winner), than square robbery. As to Mr. Beecher's right to preach for the association that will give him the largest salary, no one is insane enough to dispute that. To struggle after fame and gold, or to go without them,—that is the question. One may impale himself very neatly and thoroughly on either horn of the dilemma. Mr. Beecher has enjoyed the pleasures of an alliance with the stiffest Orthodoxy and the solidest wealth; and if there are certain disadvantages inseparable from the connection—such for instance as a base distrust of the genuineness of his aflatus by common-people, "no-account" people,—why, without doubt, he will bear up under them like a man.

Considering how difficult it is in this rough world to do anything satisfactorily, I think Mr. Beecher has done well,—few better. He has entertained and pleased; he has contributed to the happiness of mankind. He makes us think better of humanity,—makes us better satisfied with ourselves. While we are with him, we are all good fellows. We are, it is true, permanently aware of this fact,—only sometimes we forget it; Mr. Beecher rarely forgets it. He never trots the skeleton out of the closet when there is nothing to be made by it. His moral digestion is excellent; his appetite for happiness unflagging. This makes him popular, for everybody loves happiness and those who love and believe in it. All hate those who croak of it as something difficult, deceitful, and dangerous. Jeremiah, John Baptist, and all that sort of men, were not highly appreciated by the well-to-do people in and around Jerusalem.

Undoubtedly Mr. Beecher never could be a profound philosopher or a stern moralist; Nature never meant martyrdom for his strong point,—but something much more pleasing, entertaining, and perhaps full as useful; she intended him to delight, cheer, soothe, and mildly enlighten the minds of a numerous class of well-circumstanced and eminently respectable and superficial people. The lowly have also their ministers, but they have been in all times poorer than their flocks, and surer of dungeon and gibbet than of any other salary. Mr. Beecher is well-beloved of many; he is a success; he has overcome his enemies; he has made piles of money; he is a lovable man, a fine man,—but he is not just the man to preach bread and water to the laboring poor.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y.

SCIENCE AND THE APOSTLES' CREED.

DEAR INDEX:—

In this valley of the Mississippi we are not indifferent to the religious movements at and near the "hub," such as that of Brother Cook and the inaugural of President Seelye, of Amherst. And possibly you may be interested in such things in this distant land. Hence I send you a slip for your comment, with a brief explanation.

We have in this city of Davenport, Iowa, an Academy of Natural Sciences. All classes of persons—saints and sinners—may be members thereof; and, in the common church sense of the term, it is probable that the sinners predominate. We are doing our best to erect a suitable building, and are soliciting funds. An amiable lady has given us a lot, and others are contributing according to their means.

The Episcopal Church has a college here, Griswold College, which has been in rather a collapsed state for several years; also a large block of land on which the cathedral is built, making more than two blocks and three dwelling-houses exempt from taxation. The church has a new bishop, Bishop Perry, who is highly cultured, much of a gentleman, and a thorough-going ecclesiastic. He also has proposed to lease our academy a lot on the church property for the consideration that the students of the college have the free use of the academy. That was the first impression which the good people of this city received; but here I send the proposition reduced to writing, that you may see with what unconscious simplicity a bishop addresses a free scientific association, and how naturally the assumption is that there is a kind of authority embodied in ecclesiastics which outsiders should respect.

The communication is from Trustees, who state the substance of the bishop's plan. Now read it, and give it to your readers; comment on it as you please. Mind especially the fourth section in all its bearings. Observe how science is welcomed as an ally to religion! See how much freedom is proposed for the freest association in the city!

As you read those articles given out of an honest Episcopal heart, do you not get a hint of the working of honest conviction in ecclesiastical circles? There is not a suspicion that such propositions might be regarded as insulting to the scientific intelligence of this age; but all is simple honesty of purpose, the church only hinting what its rights are when the question of science is up. The buildings not to be used on Sunday, though on cathedral ground! No lecture to be given therein assailing the Christian religion as taught in the "Apostles' Creed"!

Probably the questions which touch religion will never be discussed directly; but when the science of life is treated by some biologist, and the laws of generation are explained, some persons might get the hint that virgins do not have children, and the inference might be that it would be impossible for a virgin to have a child, and this might conflict with one statement of the "Apostles' Creed"!

Then again, it is shown that all bodies, after death, return to dust and gas, which combine with other bodies, and this might conflict with the doctrine of the "resurrection of the body." It opens some of our eyes to have a bishop invite an Academy of the Natural Sciences into fellowship, and prescribe that nothing shall be taught in conflict with the "Apostles' Creed."

Does it not strike you as funny? I imagine that you smile. The whole document is courteous and kind, honest and true to the conviction of a representative bishop, representing the ecclesiastical heart of the country. What inferences do you draw from such facts? Truly yours, SPECTATOR.

DAVENPORT, Aug. 22, 1877.

Academy of Natural Sciences.

A special meeting of the Board of Trustees was held last evening, at which the following members were present: Rev. S. B. Hunting, Dr. Preston, Cochran, Hazen, Farquharson, and Messrs. J. D. Putnam, Reipe, and Pratt.

President Hunting occupied the chair, and stated that the especial object of the meeting was to receive and consider a proposition from the Trustees of Griswold College. Mr. C. E. Putnam, who was present by invitation, handed in the following communication, which had been received by him:—

TO THE ACADEMY OF SCIENCE:—The Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees of Griswold College (subject to the approval of said Board) make the following offer:—

I. To grant by perpetual lease so much land as may be needed for use of the Academy of Science for its buildings in the north-east corner of Cathedral block, the Academy of Science to pay all taxes or assessments, municipal or otherwise, that may be lawfully levied upon the lands or the buildings thereon; the buildings to be used for the appropriate objects of the said Academy of Science.

II. The architecture of the buildings to harmonize as nearly as possible with the buildings on said block; approaches to be so made as not to interfere with the use of the grounds not taken up by the Academy of Science building.

III. The lease to end when the academy dissolves or ceases to act, and buildings to become the property of the college.

IV. Premises not to be sub-let or used for any other purpose than as above indicated; the lease not to be transferred; the buildings are not to be used on Sunday; no lectures assailing the Christian religion are to be delivered therein (the doctrines of such religion being those set forth in the Apostles' Creed). This restriction is not intended to prevent the full and free discussion of scientific truth.

V. In case of the dissolution or extinction of the academy, its collections, books, manuscripts, etc., as well as the buildings, to become the property of the college.

VI. To identify the college and the academy the curator of the academy shall be ex officio an officer of the college.

VII. The heads of the several departments of Natural Science in the academy are to be ex officio professors of the corresponding departments in the college, each to deliver each year not less than four (4) free lectures to the students on subjects connected with their departments: Mr. J. Duncan Putnam to be Professor of Entomology, Dr. Parry Professor of Botany.

VIII. The collection of Griswold College in natural science, as well as its library of works on scientific subjects, to be added to the collection and library of the academy.

This is but a rough outline of what is proposed. As the academy advances more professors can and will be added. The details can be arranged hereafter, as well as legal forms.

S. E. BROWN, Chairman.
J. L. DAYKUD, Committee.

Mr. J. D. Putnam presented the following resolutions, and moved their adoption:—

Resolved, That while the proposition from the Trustees of Griswold College to erect the academy building on the Cathedral block is supported by many inducements, and offers great advantages, yet as the location proposed is less central and accessible than that so generously donated by Mrs. Newcomb; and, moreover, as the offer is accompanied with conditions and restrictions inconsistent with the free action and independent existence of the academy, it is therefore most respectfully declined.

Resolved, That the thanks of the academy be extended to the Trustees of the college for the recognition of the educational value of our society, which is implied in their friendly offer.

Resolved, That we extend to the Trustees of Griswold College our congratulations upon the proposed revival of that institution, and tender to them the free use of our museum and library for the benefit of its faculty and students.

After very brief discussion the resolutions were unanimously adopted.

On motion of Dr. Cochran, the following was also adopted:—

Resolved, That the free use of the museum and library connected with the academy be granted to the public schools and all other educational institutions of our city, and that, under proper regulations for their preservation, they be allowed the use of such specimens as may be needed to illustrate studies in natural science.

Mr. W. H. Pratt presented the following resolution, which was adopted by a unanimous vote:—

Resolved, That, in consideration of his valuable services in archaeological research and large contributions to the museum, Mr. W. P. Hall, of Davenport, be enrolled a life-member of the academy.

Mr. J. D. Putnam, Corresponding Secretary, stated that a letter had been received from Miss Emma Smith, of Peoria, proposing to give a course of lectures before the academy, on the subject of Entomology, and illustrated with models. He moved that the President be requested to procure the use of the old high school room for that purpose.

The motion was carried and the meeting adjourned.

A BLACKSMITH was summoned to a country court as a witness in a dispute between two of his workmen. The judge, after hearing the testimony, asked him why he did not advise them to settle, as the costs had already amounted to three times the disputed sum. He replied: "I told the fools to settle; for I said the clerk would take their coats, the lawyers their shirts, and if they got into your honor's court, you'd skin 'em."

WEBB HAYES is reported to be responsible for the statement that the temperance society to which his father belonged once fined a member for carrying a penknife with a corkscrew attachment.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quick advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " " "
 " 26 " 51 " 6 " " "
 " 52 " " 5 " " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.
 J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
 ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
 C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
 W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
 BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later "till I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.25 for one year, including postage, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testament. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seat, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

O R G A N I Z E !

CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE IV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE 231 Washington Street, Boston.

C I R C U L A T E I T EVERYWHERE!

The new Liberal League Tract of 24 pages, entitled,

WHOLE No. 405.

CALL FOR THE FIRST ANNUAL CONGRESS OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Boston, Sept. 25, 1877.

In obedience to the Constitution of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July First to July Fourth, 1876, the Directors hereby issue a call for the FIRST ANNUAL CONGRESS of the League, to be held at Rochester, N. Y., October 26, 27, and 28, 1877. The best Hall in the city is engaged for those days. Further particulars, including list of speakers, etc., will be announced hereafter. For information respecting cheap hotel accommodation, reduced fares, etc., apply without delay to Mr. H. L. GREEN, Salamanca, N. Y.

After the hearing of reports and election of officers for the ensuing year, the most important business of the convention will be to decide whether the National Liberal League shall adopt a political platform and nominate candidates for the Presidential election of 1880; and, if so, whether this platform shall advocate the following principles and measures, to wit:—

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, etc.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

In order to give to this First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League the representative character befitting the gravity of the questions which will come before it for decision, the Directors suggest and earnestly recommend to the liberals of the United States that they immediately organize themselves throughout the country in Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, each of which, on receipt of a charter, will be entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other members as DELEGATES. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay. Charters are indispensable to secure the unity of organization without which efficient coöperation is impossible; but Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues remain absolutely independent, and recognize no authority in the National League to control their action in any particular. The small fee of ten dollars (which will surely be grudged by no one) is only desired in order to help defray the necessary expenses involved in the conventions and other public work of the National League, which has no salaried officers. Life-memberships of twenty-five dollars, annual memberships of one dollar, and voluntary donations, will also be gladly received for these public purposes. Time presses; and it is hoped that hundreds of new Local Leagues will be organized forthwith. Any existing Liberal society can be represented in the convention by applying for and receiving a charter in the usual way, and transmitting to the Secretary a certified copy of the following vote:—

"Voted, That this society, desiring to coöperate with the National Liberal League in the furtherance of its general and specific objects, hereby declares itself a Local Auxiliary Liberal League, according to the true intent of the Constitution of said National Liberal League, and has duly elected the following persons to represent it at the next Annual Congress of the same; to wit, —, —, —, —, —."

Persons desiring full information respecting the history, principles, and objects of the National Liberal League, in the shape of a closely printed book of 190 octavo pages, can obtain it by sending for Equal Rights in Religion: Report of the Centennial Congress of Liberals. Price (reduced), in advance, paper covers, 75 cents; handsomely bound in cloth, $1.00.

Address the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

By order of the Directors of the National Liberal League:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.

WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

GLIMPSES.

PLEASE READ the "Call for the First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League" very attentively, and bring it to the notice of all your liberal friends. Now is the time to prove your earnestness in a most righteous cause by active aid!

THE LONDON Quarterly Review speaks of the Methodist denomination as being above all others "the American Church." The Methodists themselves are inclined to take the same view of the matter.

REV. F. F. EDMONDS, of Vienna, Ohio, as reported in the Cortland Gazette of August 3, expatiated on the sin of Sabbath-breaking in a manner decidedly amusing. He accounted for depression in the iron business and in the cheese business by the fact that rolling-mills and cheese-factories employed their hands on Sunday. Said the speaker: "My impression is that, unless a new order of things is instituted in cheese-making with reference to the sanctity of the Sabbath, there is in reserve such a financial crash in the cheese business as will compel the great Western Reserve to feel that there is a God of Sabbath." The railroad strikes, also, he considered a result of Sabbath-breaking by the companies. Who can set limits to the follies of superstition?

AN EXTRACT from the Paris SŒciste, which we clip from a copy of Galigan's Messenger for August 24, shows what a floodtide of superstition is sweeping over France: "We are at present in the full tide of pilgrimages to Lourdes, and miracles abound. Hardly had the correspondent of the Univers arrived when he had the delight of chronicling six perfectly authentic cures. A member of a religious sisterhood had suffered for seven years from chronic rheumatism; she descended into the piscina, and was cured instantaneously! A lady, paralyzed for eight years, had almost expired on the road: cured! A nun of Boulogne suffered for three years from an affection of the knee: cured! Finally, Mother Marie-Joseph, of Sainte-Enfance, badly consumptive, and given up by the medical men, 'sang the Magnificat twice before the whole congregation.' The correspondent adds, with rather puzzling candor, 'The six patients cured are doing well.' Doubtless at Lourdes some sick persons who have been cured are doing badly. Astonishing country! 'Joy incomparable!' the writer adds. 'Prayers are being redoubled, and our two hundred sick are in the utmost hope.'"

MR. CONWAY writes: "The authorities of the House of Detention in Clerkenwell, London City, finding that their chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Horsley, is a member of the Holy Cross Society, and refuses to leave it, have given him notice that he must leave that society or cease to be their chaplain, their reasons being not theological, but practical, they being unanimously convinced that the introduction of such morbid soul-anatomy as the said society enjoins among the inmates of the establishment would foster the vicious ideas they are trying to extirpate. Mr. Horsley will probably resign his chaplaincy and become a Ritualist martyr; and as long as the dogmatic views of human nature inculcated by the national Church remain, the logic will be on their side. The bishops are terribly excited. The Archbishop of Canterbury has at last had the confession wrung from his lips that the Church is in danger. The plain fact which the bishop cannot face is, that in the determined front of the Ritualist priesthood the England of to-day meets its dead self—nay, to that antiquarian corpse is bound fast, and must either be cut loose from it or be stifled and poisoned by its putrescence."

THE FOLLOWING NOTICE of one of the noblest women that America has ever produced will surely be of interest to readers of THE INDEX: "Lydia Maria Child, though one of the oldest of living writers—she will be seventy-six next February,—is said to be in vigorous health, and her mind to be as clear and strong as that of most persons twenty years younger. Her father, David Francis, was a baker, and the original manufacturer of the once famous biscuit known as the Boston cracker. When she was twenty-four she published The Rebels, a Tale of the Revolution, some of the characters being the historical men of the period. The book was for years a standard novel, the subject and its treatment rendering it very popular in its day. It has long been out of print; but, even at this date, a speech which Mrs. Child put into the mouth of James Otis is still declaimed in New England, and often believed to have actually been delivered by that patriot. An imaginary sermon of George Whitefield (Garrick said he was so great an orator that he could make his congregation tremble and weep merely by varying his pronunciation of the word Mesopotamia) also appeared in The Rebels, got into the New England school-books, and was long thought to be genuine. She was one of the original Abolitionists, and published one of the first distinctively anti-slavery books—An Appeal in behalf of the Americans known as Africans—issued in this country. For a while she resided here, and was the editor of the National Anti-Slavery Standard, assisted by her husband. She has done no literary work recently; but she is still a student. She lives in Massachusetts near many friends, and is enjoying peacefully the fruits of a well-spent and thoroughly conscientious life. Very few have been from the start so wholly devoted to principle, or have so earnestly and ably defended what they conceived to be right."

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

Woman: Her Past and Present, Her Rights and Wrongs.

A LECTURE DELIVERED AT DENVER, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION, SUNDAY EVENING, MAY 6, 1877.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

MADAME PRESIDENT, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—

I feel much honored in having been invited to speak under the auspices of the Woman Suffrage Association, and I have availed myself of the invitation with a great deal of genuine satisfaction. At the same time I want it understood that this Association must not be held responsible for any opinions or principles which I advocate, nor is any officer or member of the Association to be considered responsible therefor. I say this without the least suggestion or hint from that organization, and I say it because I know that there are persons who are members of it, and there are those who are in hearty sympathy with the Woman Suffrage Association, who do not share some of the convictions which I entertain, and to which, incidentally, I may give utterance this evening. The subject, as has been announced by the worthy president, is "Woman: her Past and Present, her Rights and Wrongs." Woman is one-half of the human race. Since the dawn of civilization her position has been acquiring additional importance with every age. If we would understand what is the earliest condition of woman, that previous to the period with which history begins, we have to go among the lowest tribes of the earth to-day; for their condition coincides apparently, as far as we can learn, with those early races that lived away beyond the historic periods, and of which we have no remains but those rude implements that have survived the bones of those who made them. From those early ages in which man was a savage, to the full meridian of the nineteenth century, the course of humanity, on the whole, has been progressive, and corresponding with this progress has been an elevation of woman, until now in some countries we are beginning to admit that she is entitled to a place by the side of man as his companion and as his equal. If we go among the low tribes to-day in different countries we find that woman is a servant and a slave. She is the minister of man's wants and pleasures; her individuality is merged into his, and she has no rights which he is bound to respect, except so far as they are compatible with his own immediate selfish interests and gratifications. Marriage is communal. At the birth of a child it is a common thing for the husband to go to bed and receive the sympathy and congratulations of the neighbors, while the poor wife waits upon him, and does the drudgery consequent upon that occasion. This illustrates the low and exceedingly degraded character of woman among the rude and undeveloped tribes of the world. Her position is one that is so essentially subordinate that we in our present state of civilization can have but a faint conception of it.

WOMEN IN HISTORY.

If we look at the historic period, if we go back to one of the oldest nations in history, ancient Egypt, we find that woman's position is gradually improving in proportion as that people become civilized, and that at the height of its civilization woman occupied a position that was remarkably high, higher than any other nation of antiquity. The recent discoveries that have been made by the efforts of Egyptologists in deciphering the old hieroglyphics of that land, have brought to light the customs and the habits and the institutions of that country so fully, that we are almost as familiar with the history and with the manners of ancient Egypt as we are with those of ancient Greece, and woman's position there stands so high that indeed in some respects it is not surpassed at the present day either in Europe or in America. Perhaps no nation from that time to this has ever treated woman with more consideration and regard than she received in the Egyptian empire. If we go from Egypt to Greece, there we find in the Homeric age some of the most beautiful examples of female excellence that we have in literature; but in those rude ages there was necessarily a great deal of harshness and severity and rigor. In the historic periods of Greece, woman's position was always one essentially subordinate. The wives of Greece were always condemned to seclusion, and it was a remark of Thucydides that the greatest merit of a wife was to so live that no one should ever speak well of her or ill of her,—that is, that she should be a cipher, intellectually speaking. The honors were reserved for a class of women that were not the wives of Greece, and who had very little to do either with the education or with the intellectual or the moral culture of the rising generation,—a class of women that would correspond with a disreputable class among us, but entirely different in many respects. They were the women that received the admiration of the ancient Greeks, even in the days of Pericles. Aspasia, you remember, was as remarkable for her genius as she was for her beauty, and to her Pericles became most devotedly attached. She taught him oratory, and indeed was his tutor in many other respects. This class of women in ancient Greece were cultivated; they had their parlors, in which they appeared in the most intellectual conversation, and they took as much pains to add to the brilliancy of their minds as to the charms of their bodies; and thus grew up in ancient Greece what may be considered an anomaly,—a class of women for whom were reserved all the honors, while the wives and the mothers of that land were left in seclusion to do the needle-work and other work of that kind, and to enjoy only the society of their husbands. Is it strange that ancient Greece, renowned as she was for her learning, remarkable as she was for the genius of her statesmen, her philosophers, her poets, her warriors,—is it strange that she declined, that the sceptre of empire passed from her when she thus neglected and insulted the wives and the mothers of that classic land? Surely those to whom was intrusted the education of the youth should have received all the honors and all the attentions which man could bestow. But by some strange insanity, for it can be hardly called anything else, this was omitted; and at a comparatively early period the corruption of Greece commenced and finally culminated in what we see that people now, the "degenerate sons of an illustrious ancestry."

If we pass from Greece to Judea there we find woman's position also very inferior. It was a common maxim among the ancient Hebrews that woman was made especially for man as he was made specially for the glory of God, and consequently woman's position by the side of man should be one of inferiority. A man could divorce his wife at pleasure, himself writing the bill of divorce; he could buy or sell his wife, in any of the periods of Jewish history, or even dispose of his daughter, by sale, to become a slave of her master. This condition of things naturally kept woman in a comparatively degraded state, and it was only with the advance of Hebrew civilization and culture that woman took a place beside man, and occupied anything like a respectable position.

Stepping from Judea to Rome, we find another and a very different condition. Woman's position was always one of extreme honor and pride in the Roman empire. Very corrupt, very degenerate Rome became, treading the lowest depths of vice and infamy; but in her worst days there never was a time when honors were not paid to woman, when there were not monuments erected to her name. Monogamy, the marriage of one woman and one man, was the system that prevailed throughout the Roman empire, from the earliest period down to the latest, even in the most corrupt days of the empire. There were in some periods three forms of marriage, but every one of them was monogamic. What was known as usus was a form of marriage of a man and woman living together with a simple declaration recognized by law and binding equally on each. The woman held property in her own name, disposing of it by her will, and having an amount of liberty which Sir Henry Maine says that with the decay of Roman civilization she lost, and has never regained up to the present time.

UNDER THE CHRISTIAN SYSTEM.

Under the influence of the Christian system we find many things advancing and some retarding the progress of woman. The revival of the old Jewish ideas naturally contracted her sphere and somewhat derogated from her intellectual worth; and so we find in the early ages the doctrines of St. Paul becoming very prevalent, that woman being subordinate, she should have no participation in affairs of State. Saint Paul said, "I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man"; and his reason was this: "For man was made first, and woman afterwards, and Adam was not deceived; but the woman being deceived, was in the transgression"; and in accordance with this doctrine—first that man was made before woman, and second that woman was first in the transgression,—with this opinion there came into the world a contempt of the very character of woman, as is illustrated by the fact that there was a council convened which passed an edict that no woman should take the eucharist in her naked hand lest she should pollute it by the contamination of her touch.

In those days asceticism became general; there were more men and women living a monastic life in Egypt during the fourth and fifth centuries of the Christian era than comprised the entire population of the cities of that land.

If we now consider the ancient Germans, who are the fathers of most of the great nations of modern times—they having broken up into the Goths, the Vandals, and other savage tribes that overrun the Roman empire,—we there find woman in a position which seems anomalous. They allowed women to occupy positions in Church and State, and to enjoy all the honors of the one and the other. It was a land in which purity and chastity were honored more than among any other of the nations of antiquity, not excepting one. The ancient Teutons were in this respect a most remarkable people, and overrunning the Roman empire, carrying their severe ideas of purity and their idea of woman's equality by the side of man. They impressed their character upon succeeding generations, and it is the statement of many historians who have examined this subject minutely and extensively that Roman monogamy and German rigor and severity in regard to chastity and purity went largely to give us the dominant type of marriage that we have to-day. We come down through the Middle Ages and we find woman's position a very low one, indeed. She was burned to death and she was hung for offences for which man was only mildly punished. She lived a life that intellectually and morally exerted scarcely any influence on society, and received no recognition from man. But finally the Saracenic invasions took place, the Germanic influence began to exert itself, and chivalry and knight errantry and all those follies appeared, which nevertheless had some tendency to attract attention to woman. Even when the knight went out with his shield, fighting for his lady-love, attacking almost every man he came across, imagining that he was thereby defending his honor and the love of the woman for whom he conceived an attachment, yet that had a tendency to elevate her character, by bringing her into notice and making her an object of contention. From that time down to the renaissance there was a gradual improvement of woman's condition; and still it continued, with the growth of science, with the progress of enlightenment, and the advance of liberal thought, woman becoming all the time a more prominent figure, until finally she began to be recognized as entitled to some consideration, and some, at least of advanced minds, began to maintain that she was the equal of man.

This is, as I intended it to be, only the most cursory sketch of the condition of woman in different lands, preparatory to some remarks that I shall make as to

HER CONDITION TO-DAY.

Many women say they have all the rights they wish, and many men think it disgraceful on the part of one of their sex to plead for a larger amount of liberty and a greater equality for woman. Yet her position to-day is one of essential inferiority by the side of man. Man may do with impunity in every part of this enlightened nation that which, if woman does it, is to her worse than death. And it is considered as a matter of course. It is something to which there is scarcely any objection, and yet it is simply an implication that woman is not the equal of man, else it would never be that that which shall bring disgrace and social infamy to one may be tolerated in the other without anything derogatory to his character. Go into our schools and the various places where both sexes are employed, and for the same amount of work woman rarely receives the same amount of pay. There are various secondary reasons given for this; but trace them back, and you will find they are based upon the thought that woman is not of as much importance as man, and therefore we do the injustice of depriving her of the same amount of pay, even when she does the same amount of work, and does it just as well. In Washington, Mr. Spinner, whose honesty we all admit and admire, said the most useful clerks he had were women, and he recommended to Congress that the salary of the female clerks be increased. He did not ask that it should be raised to the same amount the men were receiving, but something like two-thirds of that amount; but Congress—it was the Congress that was composed of the men who speculated in Credit Mobilier stock, and voted themselves back-pay,—that same Congress had the meanness to refuse to comply with that righteous request. If you go into a community where teachers are employed, you rarely find that a woman receives the same amount of money that a man does, although she may be a most efficient and most admirable teacher, in every way qualified, both by experience and by education. Now I ask every honorable, fair-minded man or woman, why ought not a woman, if she does the same amount of work as a teacher or a clerk, to receive the same amount of pay as a man? Why, because of this old idea that man was made first and woman afterwards, and Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression; in other words, the view expressed based upon the essential inferiority of woman, that supposes whatever she does must be of less value than what a man does. We want to get rid of this notion, in order to do justice to all parties, and any government that is not based upon the principles of justice can have only a transient and temporary existence. [Applause.] Then we find, further, that of the great avenues of employment there are very few that now are or have been open to woman. The professions that give money and distinction are reserved for men, and whenever in some cases women have endeavored to qualify themselves for them, so that they could occupy positions, under the influence of habit and custom, combined with some amount of selfishness, men have raised their voice in protest and declared that women were getting beyond their sphere, just as though they had any definite sphere—as men have not—beyond which their ambition should not carry them. We find that positions that give honor, that call out talent, that make men ambitious,—they are all so many glittering prizes which are beckoning man on and stimulating him to do his best, to improve his mind and put forth his efforts; but woman, standing beside man, has none of these inducements, and it is not strange, therefore, if there is not the same intellectual activity. Again, we find every little boy, when he goes to school, is encouraged by the thought that he may become a lawyer, a physician, a minister, a merchant, a senator, may be a

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

I once thought I was going to be President of the United States. [Laughter.] I begin to abandon gradually this notion; but every boy that has any ambition at some time of his life doubtless labors under the illusion that not improbably he will occupy the highest position that can be attained. This is a real incentive and a great encouragement. But little girls, sitting beside these boys, have nothing of that sort to encourage them. They possibly may entertain the thought that they may become the wife of some doctor or lawyer or senator, or possibly they may be the wife of some man who will become President of the United States,—it is always that they are going to occupy a position subordinate to that of man, he being the glorious central figure towards which all eyes should be directed. She is taught by custom, by habit,—she is taught to think from an early period of what is considered her chief duty and her highest aim,—to get a husband; and then, by the tricks and deceptions that are in society, she sets her cap, as the saying is, for somebody, or adorns and prepares herself that somebody may fall in love with her. This is degrading. None of us have a word to say in disparagement of that institution that has given us the home with all its refining influences, and which, in my opinion, has done more to civilize and cultivate mankind than any other institution. But with man marriage is an incident. Sometimes, indeed, it aids him and assists him in the performance of the duties of life; but he never abandons his pursuit nor relinquishes his ambition because he takes a companion to travel with him the journey of life. But woman at marriage becomes thenceforth a cipher. She changes her name; she loses her individuality; she is supposed to have no ambition beyond her own family; she loses very frequently her taste for music and literature; she becomes absorbed in her husband and her family, which is proper enough in its way; and, indeed, she lives a life that is comparatively secluded. Her range of thought is circumscribed; there is nothing to call out her intellectual nature; and as she grows old she is liable to grow more ignorant; and with her beauty faded, her health impaired by the demands on her vitality in rearing a large family, the poor woman lives this life, while her husband, in contact with the world, is daily growing larger and stronger intellectually.

The disparity between them becomes so great that it is not strange so many husbands find nothing to attract them in the society of the women with whom they were enamoured in early life! And thus we find a reason for many of those marriages which, however beautifully and blissfully they may have commenced, and in anything but a pleasant picture. While but few will question the propriety and utility of the marriage system, anybody can see that it is far from what it ought to be when woman's position excludes her from the professions, subordinates her to man, and is one in which her whole life is dwarfed and narrowed into such a range of thought and action. Then again she is not allowed the same opportunities for education. She is not supposed to have any independent opinions. If she becomes cultivated, independent, expresses her views, she is a "strong-minded woman," and the great mass of women will laugh at her as though she were a kind of monstrosity that Nature had produced to illustrate the contrast between a true woman and an unnatural woman, when the fact is, probably, by her intellectual culture, by her application to things of interest to mankind, she is one of the noblest of her sex. She is rewarded by the contempt of a superficial class of women who are unable to feel the humiliation of the subordinate position which they occupy. All this, I say, only illustrates what I remarked,—that woman's position to-day is far from being what it ought to be and what it one day will be.

THE ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

And then another illustration, and one to which I may devote a little more time. Woman is not allowed to exercise the elective franchise, and to have the rights of a citizen in a free republic, where the government is supposed to be based upon the choice of the people. All just governments derive their powers from the consent of the governed. Woman constitutes one-half of the governed of this nation, and yet she has no voice in making those laws to which she is amenable, or in forming the institutions in accordance with which she lives and which are wound up with her own interests, and those of the generations that shall come afterwards. And what are the reasons? It is said that "woman is not the equal of man intellectually." Suppose that is true. Are citizenship and the elective franchise based upon the amount of intelligence that a person has? Suppose you go among the negroes of the South, the millions that have been enfranchised lately,—are they, intellectually, the equal of the people of Denver? Certainly not. You don't deprive them of the ballot, notwithstanding their intellectually undeveloped condition, and why do you urge this as an argument against giving the ballot to women? But the fact is, many of our wives and sisters and mothers are far more intelligent than a great proportion of the men who cast their ballots and who participate in the government of the country. It is not necessary to notice here the question as to equality of man intellectually with woman. I can only say it would be very surprising if, considering the way that woman has been treated in the past, the repressing influences to which she has been subjected, if she had shown as much intellectual activity as man has; but then this question of giving to woman all her rights and privileges is not connected with the question as to the amount of brain or the quality of the brain in the man and the woman. Another objection is, that women would vote just like their husbands. Well, supposing that were true, it is no reason why they should not vote. It would add to the aggregate vote, and it would not then be a disturbing element in our politics. Suppose that woman is such a passive creature that she would have no opinions of her own and that she would acquiesce in those of her husband. It would swell the vote without changing the ultimate results. For that reason should we deprive her of the privilege of voting? Is that an objection that is valid and logical against the granting of a privilege that is obviously just and right? But another objection is, that sometimes comes from the same class, it would produce family discords and would lead to tumults in society. That is a contradiction of the statement that the woman would vote just as her husband in every case. I say let the discord come. If men are so bigoted and intolerant that they would not let their wives enjoy different political views from those which they have, it is about time something should be done to break up that intolerance and substitute, therefore, something like charity. There is a vast amount of bigotry on all subjects, social, political, and religious, and anything that will have a tendency to destroy this will be in the way of a benefaction. When we see women voting, interested in politics, showing their preference on great questions, my opinion is it will tend somewhat to destroy the asperity and the bitterness which are so often infused into our political elections; for when men see that their relatives, their wives, their mothers and sisters are in parties opposite to those to which they belong, demagogues will not have the disposition, while praising without stint the party to which they belong, to denounce in such unqualified terms the party to which they do not belong. The common practice now is, to denounce the opposite party, whether Republican or Democrat, as guilty of all meanness and deceit. The party to which the speaker belongs is spoken of as everything good, true, and noble; while the adherents of the other are characterized as robbers, thieves, and murderers. Now, if our mothers, wives, and sisters belonged to that party, perhaps we would not be quite as willing to apply such epithets, and, in my opinion, the result would be to soften somewhat the asperities of politics. [Applause.]

WOMEN AT THE POLLS.

Another objection is, that it would interfere with woman's domestic character and it would impair the delicacy of her womanly nature. I never could see the force of that argument. A gentleman, a very good friend of mine, too, whom I invited up here this evening with a view to having him on the platform, said to me the other day, "Why, I never want to see my wife go to the polls. Just see the rudeness, the profanity, the vulgarity. What woman of delicacy would want to breathe such an atmosphere?" But if the atmosphere is so impure, if men are so vicious and have so much "cussedness" in them that they cannot even make it tolerable for ladies to be in their presence on election days, it is very easy to have other places where women can go and deposit their votes, just as they go to the church or into the parlor. This objection is very frivolous. My experience in the army and in civil life is that the presence of respectable women is the guaranty of order and decorum wherever you go. [Applause.] The very reason that there is so much profanity, drunkenness, and vulgarity on election days, and so much that is disgusting to every woman of taste, sense, and refinement is this: that the presence of women is not permitted, and consequently that restraining, that softening and elevating influence that noble women always exert over men is absent. Many of you have had experience in the army, and you know that when the restraints of civil life are absent, and when woman's society is not known, what demoralization follows. All army life is demoralizing, from the highest officer down to the lowest soldier, because it is an unnatural, abnormal life; but let the presence of respectable women be known in the camp, at once rowdiness and ruffianism are hushed into silence, and the disorder and rudeness, before so prominent, hide their diminished heads in shame. What is true in army life is true in civil life. How is the exercise of the elective franchise going to interfere with the domestic duties of woman? You are all familiar with the way in which the objection is put. It is the duty of women to remain at home and take care of their children, and to attend to the duties of married life. Very well, there are a great many respectable and noble women that are not married; there are some who were married and are no longer; and there are many who have no disposition to enter married life, because of the restrictions which it imposes upon them,—what do you say as to these classes? How is it that going to the polls and quietly depositing a vote when the election comes round, is going to interfere with the domestic duties of women? Such as do not wish to go, certainly will not be dragged to the polls and required to vote. There are men whose physical condition will not permit them to vote at certain times; that is never urged as a reason for interfering with the elective franchise. But then it is said the right to vote involves the right to hold office. It don't follow that woman must be made to hold office when she don't want it. Many speak as though if they give the ballot to woman, the very next thing they have got to elect some woman as policeman or sheriff. Do we necessarily take every person that votes and elevate him into a position to which he is not qualified? We have given the elective franchise to who have only just had the manacles and shackles thrown from them. It does not follow because we have tried to do justice to them we must pick out one of those uneducated, undeveloped negroes and elevate him to the chief magistracy of the nation. It doesn't follow that because woman votes we must, whether she be best qualified or not, vote her into a position incompatible with her nature. But where there are positions that woman can have properly and with profit to herself, let them be opened to her. Indeed let all positions be opened to women; but, naturally as a weak cripple would not be chosen for police officer, constable, or marshal, just as a very illiterate, ignorant man would not be chosen for judge or governor, so a position that needed strength and masculine energy would not be forced upon a woman. These arguments have no strength. As John Stuart Mill says, there is no argument whatever against the right of woman to the ballot. Then another objection is, there are a great many women who don't want to vote. Nobody thinks of forcing them to vote, except the political engineers who sometimes go round and hold out certain inducements to vote and swell the lists of the party. However, this argument has no force. Another and a powerful one, so considered, is, women can't fight. I don't know about that. [Laughter.] I think some of our friends who make this objection have had some experience that women can fight. But, seriously, what is meant is, that woman can't shoulder the musket and take the sword and go into the field and fight the battles of the country to which she belongs. Well, if I were to descend to details, I might show you how women have fought in the history of different nations, and with what gallantry and with what splendid success they have carried out their martial undertakings. But we may consider that woman, being weaker, with her feminine nature, with less actual physical courage than man, we may concede she is less adapted to go into the field and participate in the barbarisms of war. Nevertheless she is not disqualified for office. How many men, intelligent, moral, upright, who go to the polls, but if the country should be involved in war could not go to the defence of their country, for the reason that they are suffering from disease and disabilities that would destroy their effectiveness, and they would be thrown out by the surgeon upon medical examination. Do you remember in war times that long list of diseases they used to publish, with the unpronounceable names you never before saw nor have seen since, standing opposite the names of men supposed to be well and hearty, their disqualification from going into the draft? Certainly you all remember that. Suppose we should tell those fellows they can't vote because they have rheumatismus chronicus, or some other disease of that kind, which was published at the time mentioned. If consumption, tic doloureux, or any other disease may disqualify a man from fighting, it don't disqualify him from throwing a ballot. War is a barbarism, and it is one of those relics of the cruelty and savagery of human nature which, unfortunately, have descended to this time, and exist among us just the same as the old gladiatorial exhibitions in Rome, when she was at the zenith of her glory, were an anomaly among the Romans. Strange that any of us, professing to have love toward our fellow-beings, to practise the Golden Rule, to be engaged in philanthropic pursuits, should be apparently pleased with the prospects of a terrible war, saying that it will make good times; pleased with the thought that it will put a little more money in our pockets; not considering or caring, perhaps, that hundreds of thousands of innocent men, who have hardly a knowledge of what is involved in the contest, will be destroyed, children made orphans, wives made widows, mothers robbed of the idols of their affection, fields drenched in blood, and the whole country in grief and mourning, and for generations after poverty, suffering, and distress in ten thousand ways, of which the mind looking from the present time can have no adequate conception. Because woman, by her refined and noble virtues is not adapted to participate in these terrible scenes of carnage and distress, to bring that up as an evidence that she ought not to participate in trying to improve her country by making good laws and good institutions, is indeed the very height of absurdity itself.

MILLIONS OF NEGROES IN THE SOUTH

THERE ARE OTHER OBJECTIONS URGED

sometimes by our liberal friends; I suppose some of them are here. Some of them say that woman has been under the dominion of superstition more than man has, and were she given the right to exercise the ballot, she would throw her influence in favor of restrictive measures, circumscribe personal liberty, and very much impair the rights of men. For instance, the question of the exclusion of the Bible from public schools, those schools in which we are equally interested, which we think should be entirely free from religious influences; it is said the majority of women would naturally vote in favor of keeping King James' version of the Bible in our schools, and thus perpetuating the wrong to the Catholics, liberals, pagans, and freethinkers. Then it is said, further, that woman, owing to her religious nature and her religious teachings and tendencies, will be sure to deposit her vote in favor of evangelizing the Constitution of the United States, "putting God in the Constitution," and recognizing that form of religion to which she is specially attached; and it is said she would oppose the taxation of church property, because woman reasons in a narrow manner, only taking note of parts, and never reasoning from large generalizations; and if the question should come up for removing the disabilities now resting on freethinkers in some States of the Union, on account of religious belief, it is said woman would throw her influence in favor of their continuance; that woman would encourage sumptuary laws, interfering with personal liberty, thereby joining a large party of men in favor of these measures.

An objection of some of our German friends is, that if woman should have the vote, she would throw all her influence generally in opposition to their customs of spending their time in their own manner in their gardens on Sunday, and having their music and their beer and everything that makes their social gathering pleasant.

Well, I confess I believe that from woman's education and the influence by which she has been surrounded, that she would at first exert some influence in that way. I am rather inclined to believe it, and one of my best and noblest friends, Mr. Abbot, of Boston, is so impressed with this view, that he feels some lukewarmness practically on the woman suffrage question until the secularization of the State can be secured. But I remember the saying of Macaulay, that the best way to prepare a people for liberty is to give them liberty. If a person has been in a cave or dungeon, and his eyes are dim from want of light, the best way to prepare him for receiving the light is to shed light upon him. I have discovered this, speaking from an independent stand-point. I have found, wherever I have gone, the great majority of women who are in favor of suffrage are taking a liberal view of these subjects, discussing them, agitating them; and I believe to-day, if you will go through the country and talk with the women who are in favor of woman suffrage, you will find eight out of ten of a liberal turn of mind, and disposed to take a liberal view of all these questions. They are thinking women; and when women begin to think they see that any interference with the liberties of any class of our citizens is something that cannot be justly maintained; and they see that the perpetuation of any of these disabilities to which I have referred would be unjust. And if the woman should be admitted to the polls to-morrow, and throw her influence in favor of restriction, I should oppose such measure with all my power. The only way to make women just to us is to be just to them. If we deprive them of their rights, as we habitually have done, and do not allow them to exercise the elective franchise when they are intellectual and rational beings, it is not strange if many of them, under the influence of churchcraft and priestcraft, should now be so slow to do justice to us, and acknowledge our rights. Now we find they will be discussed; they will be agitated; women will be interested in them, and matters of dress and frivolity, which ought not to be ascribed exclusively to women—since there is a large class of men as much addicted to small talk and fine clothes as women are,—these matters would be subordinated, and their minds would be filled with these matters of great and general concern. The question of temperance, for instance, would be discussed with due regard to the rights, tastes, and liberties of all men. These ideas of religious freedom will all come before the public in a way they do not now. Woman will be brought out from under the influences of these objectionable organizations to the exercise of her judgment and independence. Woman will be more charming because more rational and more intellectual, with no diminution of her refinement and delicacy of nature. I believe the exercise of the elective franchise would infuse a good element in our politics. I believe the instincts and tastes of woman would be on the side of purity and goodness. I believe, while there might be many mistakes—indeed there have been under the present regime,—there would be, on the whole, an infusion of purity and a diminution of corruption. Some think that both parties participating it would naturally generate corruption; that the supreme benches and the houses of Congress would become dissolute owing to the introduction of this element. On the other hand, it strikes me it would purify the atmosphere of politics, and give society a normal and natural condition. I base the right of woman to the franchise upon this: all just governments derive their powers from the consent of the governed. Woman is a part of the governed; therefore she is entitled to a voice in the government, in the laws of the country. If she is not, you might as well deny, for some trifling reason, that you have a right to participate in the government. If she violates a law, is she not punished, just the same as a man? If there is a law made, does she not suffer from, or is she not blessed by it, the same as a man? If she has property, is she not taxed just the same as a man is? In some States of the Union women have been wealthy, and a large tax has been assessed on their property by the votes of men in some cases who had no property; and the women are taxed perhaps much more than many others in the town for the building of a bridge or the carrying out of some project in which they had no voice whatever. Is there any justice in that? Surely it is a perversion of all the principles of justice and equity. Now since women have to help support the government by taxation; since their interests are wound up with the progress of the government in every way; since men and women rise or fall together; since they are a part of the government,—in the name of right and common-sense, I declare that women have a right to vote; they have a right to help make the laws; to participate in the government; and as long as we continue to withhold from them this obvious right or privilege, whichever name you apply to it, we do a great injustice to them and to ourselves; for the sexes are so constituted that an injury inflicted upon one is necessarily and quite as greatly inflicted upon the other. We cannot withhold a right from our wives or sisters without doing injustice to ourselves, as they indeed cannot neglect the exercise of any privilege to which they are entitled without doing injustice to us as well as to themselves.

SUPPOSE THESE QUESTIONS COME UP,

AN APPEAL TO REASON.

Then in this coming contest in Colorado, I feel some degree of interest; and while I have not spoken on this subject of woman for a long time, and may not for a long time to come, and while I am not considered a representative of the woman suffrage party, having never connected or identified myself with it, I believe it is right, I believe it is just; and I wish every young man who has a vote to cast would look at this subject, not from the stand-point of the old politicians, not from the stand-point of men who have become fixed, stereotyped in their opinions, brought up under the influence of tradition and custom, but from the stand-point of common-sense, and answer for themselves whether their sisters are not as much entitled to cast a ballot and participate in the government as themselves; and whether, when we admit hundreds of thousands of ignorant men to vote who are just out of servitude in the South, it is not an insult to our mothers, our sisters, and wives, to say that they are not fit to vote, or entitled to exercise one of the highest privileges men or women can enjoy,—the privilege of helping to form and construct human society. This is all I have to say on the subject. I have expressed myself very freely, not always attempting to represent those who are exclusively occupied with the woman suffrage movement, because there are other measures in which I am just as much interested,—for instance, the emancipation of the minds of men and women from the thralldom of superstition. A man or woman need not be confined to one reform. We should be broad, liberal, cosmopolitan, giving all these reforms a generous support and uncompromising aid every time we have an opportunity; and for that reason I came here this evening, and have spoken in favor of woman suffrage. I thank you for your very respectful attention.

A resolution of thanks was adopted.

PAGANISM IN FRANCE.

BY ELIE RECLUS.

SINGULAR REVELATIONS BY PAUL PARFAIT, FROM OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS—HOW FRANCE IS LEARNING TO WORSHIP LOCAL GODDESSES—THE MULTIPLICITY OF BLESSED VIRGINS, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE CLERICAL PARTY—VIRGINS WHITE, BLACK, AND YELLOW, AND THEIR DIVERSE GIFTS.

LONDON, August 16, 1877.

Every one knows that the present political crisis in France is the work of the clerical party, which has led Marshal MacMahon to his coup de tête, hoping that the coup de tête will end in a coup d'état. However, the public does not seem to us sufficiently to realize the immense influence which the prevailing religion exerts by its manifest workings, and especially by its occult action on the affairs of that country, of which so much is said and so little understood. People are too apt to discuss that prevailing religion theologically; there is too much of controversy and not enough of history; too much attention is paid to its theory and not enough to its practice.

A BOOK ABOUT PILGRIMAGES AND SHRINES.

In this respect there is no book more instructive than that which has just been published by M. Paul Parfait, a young writer well known by the readers of the Charivari and of some of the moderate republican journals. Under the title Le Dossier des Pèlerinages, the author has endeavored to draw up the balance sheet of clericalism, to relate its industries great and small, to reveal its workings. He denies having intended an anti-Christian work, and even having any evil designs against Catholicism. On the contrary he claims to have wished "to put people of good faith on their guard against that rising tide of superstition which threatens Catholicism itself"; he expects to be supported "by all thoughtful people who desire to separate from a gross fetishism the religion in which they have placed a hope of moral regeneration and of supreme consolation."

Again, these pilgrimages will interest Americans for a special reason. Several inhabitants of the United States, led by the fashion of the day, have been personally to pay their homage and to present their offerings at the sanctuaries of Rome and of Lourdes. No one has yet forgotten the alarm felt by the country when for several weeks there was no news of the steamship which conveyed many pilgrims to Europe from Canada and the United States.

THE OFFICIAL AUTHORITY FOR THE FACTS.

Let not the reader of Le Dossier des Pèlerinages suppose that M. Paul Parfait has allowed himself the least exaggeration. Under the government of the priest party it would have been far too imprudent to advance against their policy assertions which were not superabundantly proved by facts. Fearing lawsuits, fearing fine and imprisonment—we may say, by the way, that no editor has dared to assume the responsibility of this work,—the author speaks only proof in hand, when provided with documents emanating from the tribunals and the prelates. It is therefore not here that we must look for the secret history of French Catholicism. No allusion, even distant, is made to many episodes which everybody knows, but which the papers do not mention. But enough is said to enable us to guess at the other side of more than one official account. The author wisely abstains from being wholly explicit, but he lays before us an uncontested, an incontestable record, which is simply sufficient to enable men of good sense to form a reasoned opinion of the intelligence and honesty of the faction which, to the shame and misfortune of France, pretends to represent it altogether.

PAGANISM IN FRANCE.

In the book which lies before us we might study several interesting subjects,—that of miracles, for instance, or that of relics. We have preferred to draw some information on the worship of Virgins, which has received a powerful impulse from the solemn proclamation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. There is no need of long argument to establish the fact that under pretences of religion and of Catholic, apostolic, and Roman Orthodoxy, paganism—true paganism—has been restored through the action of the party of order in the country of Voltaire and of Rabelais. The philosopher and the historian can henceforth seek in the Greek novels, The Golden Ass and The Syrian Goddess, for notes and commentaries on the mandates of the French bishops and of the primate of the Gauls. It is only too true that the donation of France to the Virgin Mary, by Louis XIII., has been ratified by the last Legislative Assembly. Indeed, it will be remembered that at the pilgrimage of Chartres one hundred and fifty deputies of the Right declared that the Queen of the Angels would throne in Paris, and would reign from Dunkirk to Perpignan. Before instituting the charming MacMahonate, before promulgating its delightful Constitution, the Assembly voted that an immense cathedral, consecrated to the Sacred Heart, should be raised on the summit of Montmartre, overlooking the whole of Paris. It was an official symbol of the triumph of the Jesuits over the Revolution. We possess a small drawing which we found in a service book, and which would deserve to be kept in the national archives. It represents a cock—the Gallic cock—who parades and struts on an eminence; he spreads his tail, pricks up his comb, and sings cock-a-doodle-do; he crows victoriously because a large saltier crows, which dangles upon his crop, has been fastened about his neck. A flag is floating from the top of a steeple, with the device, Gallia Christiana.

A MULTIPLICITY OF VIRGINS.

You must know that the "Mothers of God" swarm in France, and multiply as rapidly as the phylloxera. Every year, every month, new sanctuaries spring up, or old sanctuaries are restored or improved. As multiplicity produces variety, we have Virgin Marys of all kinds; as in the song of Malbrook, we have brunettes and blondes, and auburn ones too; we have yellow ones and red ones, and even negresses as black as soot. There are some to suit all tastes. Some are elegant, others are poorly rigged; some are fat, others are lean; there are some aristocratic ones; there are some mere bourgeoises, and even some wretched beggars. "Our Lady of Victories," said a devotee to M. Jules Baissac, the author of Les Origines de la Religion, "Our Lady of Victories is a great lady; she intimidates me. But Our Lady of Chartres is a good sort of a woman, and I love her much more."

DIVERSITY OF GIFTS.

What one virgin will not do another virgin will; what one virgin cannot do another can. At Bétharram a woman finds relief for her pains in the bowels, for which she has unavailingly implored Our Lady of Lourdes. A young girl afflicted with St. Vitus' Dance obtains from Our Lady of Pontmain the cure that Our Lady of Chêne had refused her. After this there is nothing more natural than to ask oneself whether Our Lady of Lourdes and Our Lady of Bétharram, Our Lady of Pontmain, and Our Lady of Chêne are really the same virgin. . . . "Our Lady of Rodez," we read in a mandate of Monseigneur the Bishop of Rodez, "is about to pay her visit to Our Lady of Lourdes. The virgin of Rouerque wishes to leave her mountains to pay homage to the virgin of the Pyrenees. . . . Nowhere does the idea of plurality of the virgins appear so strikingly as at Chartres, where the cathedral alone possesses two virgins under two different names,—the one, Our Lady of the Pillar, in the nave; the other, Our Lady Underground, in the crypt. The latter is white, the former is black; the black one is crowned, the white one is not."

THE VIRGINS AS LOCAL DIVINITIES.

Among all these virgins the worshippers have only the trouble of choosing; they are all goddesses, and mothers of the same child. Patronesses of sanctuaries, they are above all local divinities, as were the famous Diana of the Ephesians, the Artemisia of Tauris, the Minerva of Athens, the Juno of Argos; like the innumerable gods of the Termini in the campaigns of Greece, Sicily, and Italy. The faithful never mistake them; they know how to distinguish them; they discern differences in their features and physiognomies; they recognize distinct aptitudes and virtues in them. And even, if we are to believe their worshippers, each one of them cares more for her own little specialty than for the whole of heaven; cares more for her own parish than for the vast world. Some have even been known in time of drought to cause it to rain on their district, and on their district alone, taking care that the beneficial rain should stop at the hedge between the two parishes. One is powerful against cholera, a second against jaundice, a third against gout and rheumatism, a fourth exempts from conscription, and so on. This little virgin attempts only easy cases; but that great virgin cares only for difficult things. This one causes Normans to gain their lawsuits, and that one Auvergnats to win theirs. None is more stirring and active than Our Lady of the Sacred Heart of Issoudun. Her commercial house has taken for its device the maxim commended by the Manchester school: small profits, but multitudes of sales. She transacts business to the extent of more than a million francs a year; she receives orders from all parts of the globe; she exports to the interior of China and Tibet, and to the Sandwich Islands. Here is the true Cheap John store; she retails an immense amount of indulgences, rosaries, and remissions to the souls in Purgatory.

GIFTS, PRIZES, CROWNS, AND JEALOUSIES.

But it is with divine virgins as with common servants,—for one who does her work heartily, there are several who are mere larybones and sluggards. These latter are justly neglected. There are some who, after having been formerly illustrious, are now consigned to the supernumeraries. Those who work best are rewarded. Prizes are awarded them, as in French schools they are given to the young ladies who have distinguished themselves in their classes. A golden crown is placed upon their head in the midst of a congregation of prelates and an efflux of devotees and curiosity-seekers. This distinction, which is equivalent to the patents, medals, and licenses distributed by the government at official examinations, gives rise to violent competitions, to bitter rivalries between the competitors. After our Lady of Lourdes was crowned, the Bishop of Grenoble hastily started off for Rome; in his trunk he carried a crown, on which there were forty-five thousand francs' worth of precious stones, which the Pope was obliged to bless immediately that it might adorn the head of Our Lady of La Salette. But Our Lady of La Salette having become a princess, could Our Lady of Pontmain consent to be a mere plebeian? In their turn Saint Michael, who is only the archangel of the celestial militia, and Anne d'Auray, who is a mere saint, obtained nobiliary crowns as a reward for the miracles which they have wrought.

THE PATRONAGE OF THE VIRGINS.

Better still, some virgin who has made her fortune is adopted as a mother and patroness by several young virgins who are making their first appearances in the world. Thus the grotto of Lourdes has a host of "daughters." The hospital of Sèvres has a grotto which Monseigneur the Bishop of Versailles has himself deigned to open. A pool of stagnant water on some pebbles represents the Gare, a mountain torrent; a few zigzags through the clouds of earth laid out upon the pebbles represent the network of the mountain. Porters pour pailfuls of water in the reservoir, and on holidays the faucets of the pseudo grotto give passage to a pseudo eau de Lourdes, which works pseudo miracles. In certain localities the reservoir is filled with water which is sent from Lourdes itself in casks or bottles; but this water, whose transportation has cost something, is husbanded. The Holy Father also has caused a little grotto, imitated from that of Lourdes, to be set up in the gardens of the Vatican, and several casks are sent him from the sanctuary itself, and offered him by pilgrims. Of all the "daughters" of Our Lady of Lourdes, the favorite, that one of the little grottoes which she must look upon with most satisfaction, is certainly the fac-simile of Oostakker, near Gand. Profiting by the material lessons, the young grotto is making her way at a great rate, challenging publicity, reaping offerings, beating the drum on the backs of the subjects of her miracles, and indulging in all the eccentricities which draw attention. Jealous persons even accuse her of disloyal competition. Belgium, you know, has the genius of counterfeiting.

THE POLITICS OF THE VIRGINS.

A curious chapter would be that of the political opinions set forth by all these virgins, their priests and zealots, in the midst of the internal agitations of France. Ex-Empress Eugénie counts several protectresses among them, others favor him who already assumes the title of Napoleon IV.; but the majority are still faithful to the cause of Henri V. But four or five years ago they were unanimous in conspiring with the legitimists to nurse up another civil war, to prepare craftily an expedition against Italy. How many times they had prophesied the restoration of the Chaste Roy, Prince des Lys Blancs! We must do them the justice to say that none is republican.

A COMMON CHARACTERISTIC.

Notwithstanding the diversity of their opinions, of their tastes, of their industries, and of their appearance, the attentive observer will notice that all these virgins resemble each other in certain respects; that they have several characteristic traits in common. In general their intelligence is but little developed; they are exceedingly coquettish, jealous, and vain, and they envy one another. But their greatest defect is that they are interested. They cannot resist the attraction of a compliment, or the seduction of a new velvet or rose-colored satin dress; still less can they resist the allurements of a pearl necklace, a river of diamonds, or a great purseful of gold. It is a sad thing to say, but it must be confessed, all these "Virgin-Mothers of God" are covetous and rapacious.

In conclusion we shall make only one remark, that made by the celebrated theologian, the Lutheran Mosheim, who, after relating the first great triumphs of Catholicism under the Emperor Constantine, asked with a shake of his head: What are we to think? Is it the Christian Church that has converted the pagans, or the pagans who have converted the Christian Church?—New York Evening Post, Sept. 4, 1877.

A LITTLE BOY in Springfield, Mass., after his customary evening prayer, a night or two ago, continued, "And bless mamma and Jenny and Uncle Benny," adding, after a moment's pause, the explanatory remark, "his name is Hopkins."

LINES.

A path obscure; a feeble ray
To guide my steps, to lead me hence
Towards a realm of lustrous day,
Bright promise of an inward sense!

Yet, doubtful of the falling light
That reason holds to feet of clay,
I pause and halt, as one in night
Awaits the fuller light of day.

Then comes to me sweet voice of hope,
As one to take a blind man's hand:
"Step forth with me; thou canst but grope Along the road towards the strand."

And lo! there gleams, as from a star,
A light that maketh all serene,
My pathway rendering clearer far
Than ever it before had been.

MR. UNDERWOOD will lecture in this city next Sunday morning, Sept. 30, at Paine Hall, on "The Positive and Constructive Side of Free Thought." The public are invited, and there will probably be a large attendance.

"THERE MUST have been a party victorious and a party vanquished," said General Devens, in his oration at the dedication of the Army and Navy Monument on Boston Common; "but there is no true victory anywhere unless the conclusion is for the interest of each and all." It is in that spirit and with that faith alone that the National Liberal League would create a new party for the establishment of secular government and the perpetuity of universal religious liberty.

AT THE RECENT STATE CONVENTION of the Ohio Republicans, Colonel George G. Minor, of Cleveland, tested his party on the church taxation question in a very straightforward and manly way, as follows:—

The following resolution was read by Colonel G. G. Minor, as a minority report of the committee, the resolution being the one adopted by the Cuyahoga County Convention:—

"Resolved, That under the statutes of our State as they now stand there exists a very unjust discrimination against the tax-paying community, and in form of denominational and sectarian institutions and societies, which discrimination should be at once abolished by the legislature, and that we believe all property in the State should be taxed and none be exempt from taxation, except such property as is purchased and held by the public and used solely for public purposes."

Colonel Grosvenor moved that the majority report of the committee be adopted as a whole, and that the previous question be put. The previous question was ordered and carried, and, after a short parley, the motion to adopt the resolutions as a whole was adopted with great applause.

Colonel Minor then moved that the minority resolution be adopted, and that the previous question be ordered.

There was a demand for a second reading of the resolution and it was again read, and there was considerable applause. A report, however, started in the convention that it was a church taxation resolution, and that it would be a weight to the platform.

Finally a motion was made by Major Bickham that the resolution be laid on the table, which was carried almost unanimously.

Nobody can say that this challenge is not a fair and manly one, and we unhesitatingly comply with Mr. Teed's request to publish it:—

Free Platform Convention to be held in Moravia, Cayuga County, N. Y., commencing October 12, 1877, continuing seven days. The opposers of the Bible and Christianity, as manifest in a variety of phases—the most menacing of which is in anti-Christian Spiritualism,—have defiantly challenged Christianity to contest with them its claims to Divine authority. I accept the challenge, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and in behalf of Christian principles, and, therefore, call upon all opposers of the Bible, as given by Divine Inspiration, and of Jesus Christ as the Lord God and Creator of heaven and earth, and of Christianity, to send their representative men, or men and women, materialists and spiritualists. This may include the foremost scientists of the world. Speakers who wish to enter the arena in opposition to Christianity, should send in their names as early as October 1. From such names, the parties being present at the opening of the convention, there may be selected twelve men, or men and women, the choice to be made by the anti-Christian element present at the opening of the convention. Three meetings will be held daily. The first four days—twelve meetings—to be occupied by the twelve speakers chosen, who shall confine themselves to one hour each, the remainder of the time, nine meetings, if required, to be occupied in the defence. A full report will be made of the proceedings, and given to the public, who are constituted sole arbiters of the question at issue. Letters of inquiry will be promptly answered. Preparations will be made for the entertainment of strangers, with the least possible expense to them while in attendance. Let it no more be declared that the gauntlet thrown by anti-Christ, finds no ready hand to take it up.

WANTED—A NEW CONSCIENCE-PARTY. AN APPEAL TO ALL PATRIOTS AND LIBERALS.

FELLOW-CITIZENS:—

The time has arrived for holding the First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League; and the Directors, in fulfilment of the duty imposed upon them by the Constitution, have issued a public call for the assembling of this convention at Rochester, N. Y., October 26, 27, and 28, 1877. Questions of the gravest import, both to the Liberal League and to the nation, will be submitted to the members of this convention for free discussion and equally free decision.

The first of these questions is this: Shall the consistent advocates of secular government, as represented by the National Liberal League, now boldly take the necessary initial steps towards the formation of a great national party, by adopting an independent political platform and nominating candidates for the Presidential election of 1880?

The second question—provided the first question is answered by the convention in the affirmative—is this: Shall the platform adopted present the following principles and measures?—

"I. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, etc.

"II. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

"III. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education."

These questions must be answered by the convention itself, to which they are simply submitted by the Directors; and it is greatly to be desired that the liberals of the country may send a sufficiently large delegation of their best and wisest representatives to insure a deliberate, intelligent, and patriotic answer. Convinced as I am of the paramount importance to the future welfare of my country of the three great principles above stated, and equally convinced that they can be practically established by nothing short of a further and higher development of the National Constitution, I am urged by a sense of duty to plead their cause at once in these columns—not at all as President of the National Liberal League (for I have no right to speak officially in this matter), but simply as an American citizen whose whole mind and heart and soul are enlisted on their behalf. Bear with me then, fellow-liberals, while I address myself directly to your consciences and your intellects, and set forth as best I can the reasons why you are called upon by true patriotism to take a new, bold, and seemingly audacious step.

Last year, at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, I opposed in advance the idea of the new League's going into politics as a distinct party, with platform and candidates. A few weeks were enough to teach me better. In the Senate of the United States, an amendment to the Constitution was proposed which, if it had passed both houses, would have covertly but effectually recognized the Divine Authority of the Bible as the Word of God in the Constitution itself, and destroyed its secular character as completely, though not as ostentatiously, as if the "God-in-the-Constitution" party had carried out their whole programme. This insidious and infamous measure received in the Senate a vote of 28 in its favor to only 16 against it, and thus barely failed to get the requisite two-thirds majority. Often had I heard it confidently boasted, by liberals who derisively or pityingly smiled at all warnings of danger from the Christian Amendment movement, that the whole country would rise in indignation, if that bigoted scheme were ever seriously broached in Congress; and, not unnaturally, I looked to see some signs of this promised popular rebuke, now that the bigots had almost succeeded in carrying this very scheme through the Senate. But I looked in vain. Nobody seemed to understand what had happened, or what a fatal disaster the cause of religious liberty had so narrowly escaped. Here and there a solitary journal, wiser than the rest, pointed out the rock on which the precious secularity of the Constitution had been so nearly wrecked; but (what filled me with amazement) most liberals themselves appeared just as blind to this threatened shipwreck of their cause as others were indifferent to it, and were unable to see "what harm the amendment would have done." From that time the immediate necessity of a new conscience-party in politics—one that should make it a sacred duty to educate their fellow-voters in the alphabet of religious freedom and equal rights—became evident. There is no way to do this, no way to get the attention of the giddy and thoughtless public, except the resolute way of putting the truth into a political platform, nominating worthy candidates to represent it, and refusing to vote for any others. It is not with any expectation of carrying the next Presidential election that I have come now to favor such a course; to success of that sort I confess I am indifferent. But I see the terrible ignorance which pervades this nation respecting equal rights in religion and the only permanent safeguards of religious liberty; I see the terrible peril to which this ignorance exposes us, as revealed with startling plainness in the nation's narrow escape last year from an Orthodox amendment of the Constitution. All possible objections to the contrary notwithstanding, it is in my opinion a solemn duty for the resolute friends of secular government to form now a new conscience-party, invincible by the truth of its ideas and the justice of its measures, willing to risk defeat at the polls rather than to be longer silent or unheard, and inspired by omnipotent moral enthusiasm to raise a standard of principles which shall at last compel the homage of mankind.

So much for the general movement proposed: now for the principles which constitute its life. The first and central of these is the total separation of Church and State, which implies that the State exists for itself, not for the Church, and has its foundation in the right of every national community to administer their secular affairs by exclusively secular methods. The second is national protection for national citizens, and necessarily follows from the acknowledgment of the reciprocal secular obligations of the nation and the citizen—the nation claiming supreme allegiance from the latter, and being bound in return to afford that personal protection which is the only just warrant for the claim. The third is universal education the basis of universal suffrage in this secular republic, and affirms the impossibility of sustaining secular republican government without virtue and intelligence in the people. These three principles are really one and the same; each implies the other two; and no clear or logical mind, having affirmed the first, will long hesitate to affirm the rest.

Now the Constitution of the United States is wholly built on the first of these three principles, that Church and State ought to be totally separated; it totally separates them so far as the government is theoretically concerned, though it fails to give explicit and adequate guarantees for this separation in practice. To seek such guarantees, therefore, and to claim the faithful application of this underlying principle of the entire Constitution, is the high duty of every patriot who understands the true spirit of secular popular government. Surely I need not dwell long on a point so plain and elementary.

But the second principle of the three—that the national citizen is entitled to national protection—is not yet fully recognized in the Constitution. Abroad, in foreign lands, the United States government acknowledges the obligation to protect its own citizens by the whole power of the nation, if necessary; but at home it does nothing of the sort. Here at home it turns over to the separate State governments all responsibility for protecting United States citizens in their fundamental personal rights; and if any State refuses or neglects to afford such protection, the oppressed citizen can get no redress from the national government. Yet the national government claims from every citizen his supreme allegiance—taxes him, conscripts him in war, demands of him the last great sacrifice of life in its own defence! There is here a fatal defect in our political system. If the nation as such claims supreme allegiance from the individual citizen, and forbids him to yield his supreme allegiance to his own particular State, then it is bound, as a nation, to protect him in return, and not to evade this sacred duty by turning him over to his State without appeal. We are no nation at all, if this reciprocal obligation of supreme allegiance, on the one hand, and personal protection, on the other, is not acknowledged and discharged. That the American people are inflexibly resolved to be a nation in the true sense of the word, was settled forever by the great civil war; and it is only a question of time how soon they will acknowledge the obligation they have thus assumed towards the individual citizen. Local self-government for local purposes, and national government for national purposes—that is the true and accepted theory of free institutions; but the personal protection of the citizens, in their fundamental individual rights, is to-day erroneously classed among the local purposes of State government. This is a great and perilous mistake. The towns and counties of each State to-day enjoy local self-government; but it is the State itself, not the towns or counties, that is responsible for the personal protection of the citizen, and that discharges this obligation through its own State courts. All that is needed is to carry out more thoroughly this same system, and, without violating in the least the principle of local self-government, extend the arm of national protection over the individual citizen. Not until this is done shall we become a true nation; not until this is done has the national government any right to demand from its citizens their supreme allegiance. But this will be done, and every far-seeing national patriot will seek to hasten the day.

This great principle of national protection for national citizens has immediate and momentous applications to the living questions of the day. Let me point out a few of them.

1. Every friend of EQUAL RIGHTS IN RELIGION should be heartily in favor of this principle; for it will protect him, as he is not now protected, in the enjoyment of these rights. The National Constitution is strictly secular, and gives no shadow of excuse for the violation of equal rights in religion; whereas almost all the State Constitutions, in some of their provisions, more or less deny them. The rights of free conscience and free thought are the most precious of all rights, dearer than life or property to all who cherish a noble self-respect; and for the protection of these rights, above all others, the individual citizen must look at last to the power which claims his supreme allegiance,—that is, the nation, and not the State.

2. Every friend of the FREEDMEN should be heartily in favor of this principle. The Southern question is not yet settled. Thoughtful men have no quarrel with the policy of "pacification and reconciliation" of President Hayes; but this policy does not settle the grave questions involved. From the day when the slaves of the South were emancipated by the national government, the people of the North have recognized and felt the obligation thereby imposed on the nation to protect these poor creatures in their fundamental rights. President Grant tried to discharge this obligation by bolstering up Republican State governments at the South by means of the army. This experiment failed, naturally enough; that is not the way by which a republican nation must protect its citizens. President Hayes has withdrawn the troops, as was right under the circumstances; no other course was in fact open to him. But how is the question left? The nation is utterly unable now to protect the freedmen in their individual rights; yet millions of citizens are vaguely and uneasily conscious of their obligation to do so as a nation. Universal handshaking is a very good thing; every true patriot rejoices in the prospect of restored good-feeling between the South and the North. But all this effusive demonstration of amity leaves unanswered the grave question which lurks in the background: how is the nation to protect the freedmen whom it has emancipated? For this question President Hayes has no answer. He can only point to the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution, which do not protect the freedmen as individuals, but only forbid certain kinds of State legislation. He can only hope that the separate States, to which this duty is now solely entrusted, will faithfully protect the freedmen in their individual rights. In case of any failure, however, to protect these rights, the nation cannot interfere at all, unless the oppression takes the shape of formal State laws. Is this enough? Are the American people willing to leave a question of such magnitude, involving their own moral obligations to the poor and feeble, in such a state as this? They cannot protect the freedmen by the United States army, nor is that the way desired by any large-minded patriot. But they can do it, and ought to do it, by the United States courts; and therefore every friend of the freedmen ought to favor this great principle of national protection for national citizens through the national courts.

3. Every friend of WOMAN SUFFRAGE ought to favor heartily this same great principle; for women have been already recognized by the Supreme Court as citizens of the United States, and, if all such citizens are equally protected by the nation in their equal political rights, women-citizens will enjoy all the political rights of men-citizens, including that of suffrage. Moreover, this platform of the National Liberal League, if successful in the appeal to the people, will secularize the State at the same time that it enfranchises women, and thereby remove the greatest objection felt by so many liberals to this latter step—the objection that woman suffrage would tend to favor the designs of those who aim to Christianize the State. Is it not a great gain to put the woman suffrage movement into such a shape that it shall command the hearty support of all who believe in secular government? If the friends of the woman suffrage movement comprehend the principles and true practical interests of their own cause, they will be ready, and more than ready, to give their heartiest support to the political platform now proposed, and sustain the movement on its behalf to the utmost extent of their power.

These and other practical consequences which would follow the success of the platform to be submitted to the National Liberal League ought to insure a vast vote in its favor at the polls; and this will be the ultimate result, if the League should now boldly take the field on its behalf. I have not touched on the third principle—that which would make the nation require every State to sustain good public schools, just as some of the States to-day require the towns to do so. This is the only way to solve the educational question at the South efficiently, yet without military force. The nation has the highest right—that of self-preservation—to require that all its own citizens shall be decently educated; and the day is approaching when this abstract right will be intelligently and effectively asserted.

Fellow-liberals, I have briefly and inadequately pointed out the chief bearings of the principles advocated in the platform which is, I hope, to be the subject of your own grave deliberation and action at Rochester. I appeal to you, with a strength of earnestness which I am powerless to express, to step forward bravely and assert these great principles in the hearing of the whole American people. I appeal to you to form a new conscience-party for the maintenance of those high ideas and noble measures which are now indispensable to the national welfare. This is no narrow or crack-brained enterprise; it is nothing but the sober dictate of the purest and most enlightened patriotism. Think for yourselves on the subject here so imperfectly presented; follow no man's whims or dreams, but rather the noblest promptings of your own highest nature; and be sure that, however misjudged or abused, you will enjoy the proud consciousness of having labored unselfishly in your generation for the welfare of your country and your race.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

A WORD ABOUT TAXATION.

In regard to the subjection of women, we have seen how the teachings of Paul have borne sway in the past, and are, in fact, the chief obstacle to a practical recognition of the social and political rights of women at the present time. Paul is still revered and scrupulously followed, both in Church and State, where he was wrong, where he accepted and taught the morals of a barbarous age; but where he broke through barbarism and was gloriously right, let us see whether he is revered or obeyed. As the great Apostle of the Gentiles, nobly throwing off the prejudices of race, and proclaiming the brotherhood of man, he lays down a principle of justice, which the Church, and the State at the instigation of the Church, utterly disregard in the matter of exempting church property from taxation.

The passage is very pungent. Let us quote the substance of it, merely changing the word Jew to Christian:—

"Behold thou art called a Christian—and art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind, a light of them which are in darkness; thou therefore which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal?"

To exempt church property from taxation is to increase clandestinely the taxes of those who neither belong to the church nor use the property. It is simply stealing so much property which belongs to them and not to the church. It is taken generally without their knowledge, and of course without their consent. The character of the theft does not depend upon the amount taken. Suppose the property exempted from taxation is $10,000,000, and that only one-tenth of the people are without interest in it. Then if the tax is $1 per $1,000, or $10,000 in all, only $1,000, as a matter of average, will be stolen. But the principle of honesty so emphatically taught by St. Paul, is as wickedly violated as if the amount were larger. A well-concealed theft, if of so small an amount, is naturally borne without remark. But should the property exempted amount to $100,000,000, and the rate of taxation rise to $15 per thousand, the theft of $150,000 would become noticeable. When noticed, there is little reason to expect politicians who hold their places by the will of the majority to alter the law of their own motion. But there is reason why every Christian should either vote to discontinue this mode of stealing for the benefit of the Church or reject the authority of St. Paul. Would he who taught, "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's," have justified his disciples in asking Cæsar to exempt from taxation half their property invested in a church, leaving the burden thus taken off their shoulders to rest upon those of the poor heathen around them? It is quite certain that Christians, being wise as serpents and harmless as doves, did not, till they had gained the political power to enforce it, ask for the exemption from taxation of their consecrated any more than of their unconsecrated property. We now hear great complaint of the increasing numbers of people who never go to church. Did it never occur to the churches that some of this absence may be accounted for by the exemption of church property from taxation? If such exemption is contrary to justice and good morals, what is more natural than to doubt whether any moral benefit can be derived from being present at the services? Suppose in order to promote the multiplication of theatres, they were exempted from taxation, would not that be an additional reason why Christians, not inclined to visit theatres, would stay away? Supposing it to be the duty of every person to attend some church, so long as we admit that there are a good many who never will, is it the right thing to increase their disgust and give them a pretty plausible reason for staying away, by increasing their share of the taxes? This is a pretty serious question for the churches. It is possible that the Church can afford to stick to the teaching of Paul about women, for a good while longer. But, evidently, it cannot afford much longer to disregard Paul's well-expressed sense of the inconsistency of piety and theft.

The actual exemption of ecclesiastical property from taxes which would otherwise be paid by those best able to bear them, is one of the causes of hard times to the poor, both in and out of the churches; and, surely, the liberals in seeking to put an end to such exemption, ought to have and will have the aid of all sincere Christians of every denomination.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S POSITION.

Mr. Frothingham began another year of his arduous work in New York city on September 18. The subject of his discourse, in the Masonic Temple, was "The Rising and the Setting Faith." We find the following epitome of it in the Tribune:—

"It may be considered audacious, weak, or idle, to characterize the faith of Christendom as the 'setting faith,' and the beliefs held by a few handfuls of people in the centres of civilization as the 'rising faith' of the world, but such is to speak the truth. Christianity is passing away. It may be a thousand years before its decay is visible to all eyes, but its decline is plainly apparent to thinking minds. What is this setting faith? Christianity, of all phases, holds to the cardinal proposition of the unquestionable authority of the Christ. This implies dependence upon Christ for help, for redemption, for salvation. It means the helplessness and imbecility of man. It leaves him a straw upon the tempest-tossed ocean of existence. The signs which indicate the decline of this system built upon Christ are these: It has lost its hold upon cultivated people, for loss of faith is synonymous with intellect. It has also lost its hold upon the uncultivated classes,—the working-people. The strikers of the summer past had undoubtedly been educated in some system of Christian faith, either Protestant or Catholic; but what effect had religion upon those men when they rebelled against society? Did they take lessons from Christ? Did they make the Sermon on the Mount their vade mecum? Another sign is the decline of theology. No-body preaches theology now. Mr. Beecher tells his congregation that they will hear none from him; and even Mr. Moody, that prince of revivalists, keeps his dogmas in the background, knowing their weakness. Now emotion is put forward. Again, our common life is not run on Christian principles, nor based upon the New Testament. People nowadays are actuated by common wisdom and prudence. People, in fact, never did live out their religion. There is a great gulf fixed between creeds and practice. And the tendency to substitute humanity and kindness for faith is another sign of decay.

"The characteristics of the rising faith are these: The absence of Christ. It has no Savior,—no Redeemer. Yet it reveres all leaders of the race, even some of those whom Christianity condemns. It believes in the possible, essential man—in manhood,—in deep and dear humanity, struggling in sin and sorrow, but which has within itself power to solve all questions fairly submitted, and to give peace to all. This new faith does not overthrow immortality; it cherishes every hope of it, but it sets the hereafter in new relations with this life. If the believer holds to a hereafter, it is as a completion of this life, and only to give dignity to the present existence. Again, the new faith does not believe in the supernatural. It does not pray, for there is no answer to come. George Müller believes that he sustains a large orphan asylum by prayer alone. We cannot prove that he is wrong, but we do not believe that it is so sustained. Kind friends, knowing of his work, felt impelled by the kindly impulses of their natures to send him aid. By strange coincidences, this aid came just when it was most needed. The new faith does not do the work of the old. It does not claim to satisfy the same needs. It satisfies only the needs of to-day. It lives in to-day. Let us be satisfied with the faith that suits us. 'Tis not the music of angels we listen for, but the sad sweet music of humanity. The salvation we have in view is salvation from doubt, dishonesty, and fear in this present rugged pathway."

These are the words of truth and soberness. They utter what the world, however reluctantly, has got to admit to be such. They utter what is destined to be the commonplace of the future. Christianity certainly rests upon the "cardinal proposition" here set forth; and this "cardinal proposition" (expressed, in New Testament diction, in the Christian Confession that "Jesus is the Christ") is certainly untrue. The ultimate fate of Christianity is decided by this one fact.

Substantially the same position is taken in Mr. Frothingham's instructive volume published last spring, and entitled The Cradle of the Christ, of which "the original purpose was to indicate the place of the New Testament in the literature of the Hebrew people, to show in fact, how it is comprehended in the scope of that literature," but in which (from the nature of the case) the essential untruth of the Christian Confession was necessarily exposed. Frankly admitting (page 13) that his revision of the New Testament is "fatal to Christianity's claim to be a special revelation," he yet, in the Preface, states that he has "as little purpose or desire to undermine Christianity as to revive Judaism." His attitude to Christianity is thus that of a candid critic, a "disciple of no special school." "All polemic or dogmatical intention he [the author] disavows, all disposition to lower the dignity, impair the validity, or weaken the spiritual supports of Christianity. His aim, truly and soberly speaking, is to set certain literary facts in their just relation to one another." [Page 2.]

While this position as author is substantially the same as that of the present discourse, in which Mr. Frothingham appears rather as the oral teacher, we welcome with special satisfaction the clear and bold declaration now made that "loss of [Christian] faith is synonymous with intellect." That is literally true. We do not deny that many persons of high intellectual ability still retain more or less "Christian faith," since they do not use it freely on Christian tenets. But we do deny that any strong and free intellect can thoroughly study the "cardinal proposition" of Christianity, in the full light of modern criticism and scientific knowledge, without inevitable "loss of faith" in its truth. The time is certainly approaching, and is not very far distant, when the whole system of Christian doctrine, with the unanimous assent of all instructed and cultivated minds, will be put precisely on the level of the old Greek mythology. The ancient religion of Greece and Rome acquired the name of "paganism" because belief in it had died out in the cities, and found refuge only in the pays, or rural districts; and, as we pointed out years ago in THE INDEX, the Christianity of to-day is inevitably destined to become, in this sense, the "paganism" of the future. It is vitally important to mankind that the natural process of decay now going on should not be artificially arrested, disguised, or in any way hidden from the knowledge of the common people; and it is therefore to be regretted that attempts should be anywhere made to wrest the word Christianity from its original and historical meaning, or to smuggle it into use as synonymous with mere moral goodness. All such attempts are predestined failures, it is true; but they retard the progress of knowledge, galvanize dead beliefs into a semblance of life, and confound all those distinctions by which things that differ ought to be honestly distinguished. It is a good sign, therefore, to see men of Mr. Frothingham's ability and influence setting the example of calling things by their right names—of holding up Christianity to public view as what it really is, the "setting faith" of the past, and pointing out unequivocally wherein it differs from the "rising faith" of the future. Such bold contrasts as this are the only means of making the common mind understand the momentous change resistlessly going on in religious thought, and of guarding it from a distressful and not harmless sense of intellectual bewilderment. The time has come already for enlightened religious teachers to "talk in parabables" no longer, but point out simply, clearly, and bravely that Christianity is indeed dying, but only to be replaced by a humanitarian religion infinitely more free, helpful, tender, and true.

THE INTEREST DOCTRINE.

See INDEX, June 28, July 12, August 2, September 13.

1. How the editor could call "irrelevant," with regard to the morality of interest, the circumstance of mortality or immortality of the creditor, is a cause of wonder to me. Any one who has followed my line of argument from the beginning, or even paid due attention to the three last paragraphs of my last article, must be convinced that it is the only relevant point, and that all treatises, in favor of money interest or against it, which fail to take into consideration this only relevant point, must be re-written, being rethought first.

2. The editor's memory is at fault when he thinks that it is only "now" that I perceive that the lender, being mortal, is entitled to receive interest besides the reimbursement of his capital. I not only said as much in my first article, but even gave the basis, on which to calculate the amount of interest due to the creditor. This basis is nothing else than the tables of mortality on which the life-insurance and life-annuity business is founded; and the data are the age of the lender, and the stipulated duration of the loan. If the loan is for a hundred years, it amounts, on the part of the lender, to his parting with his money in favor of his heirs. If he wishes to do this gratuitously, good and right. But if he does it for an adequate consideration, that consideration must consist in his heirs paying to him, as long as he lives, an annuity equal to the capital divided by the number of years he is expected to live, whether he lives that number of years, or more or less. If, instead of being for a hundred years, the loan is for a period beyond which the lender has ~~no~~ hope to live, the annuity he is entitled to must decrease in proportion as that hope increases. The annuity, in either case, has a surrender value, which can be scientifically and precisely determined on insurance principles.

3. What I have just said shows how incorrect it is to say that "the heir gains nothing at all by the loan." He is the gainer of an estate, so easily calculable, that any insurance and annuity company, on condition of becoming in his place heir of the lender to the extent of the loan, would undertake to pay the annuity or its surrender value to the lender or to his heirs; namely, to whichever is so possessed of the heirship as to have power to validly transfer it to the company.

4. Nothing, assuredly, can be more emphatic than my admitting, and having admitted from the beginning, that the lender is entitled to receive interest; but this does not "concede the whole point at issue," the point at issue being, "from whom is the lender entitled to receive interest?" Everything, in what precedes, evidently shows that he is entitled to receive interest from his heirs, who are his continuation, and the same party as himself so far as the debtor is concerned. Nothing has gone to prove that he is entitled to receive anything from the debtor, who will have to repay the principal when due, whether the creditors or his heirs are then alive to receive it, and who, therefore, is in nothing benefited by the circumstance of the creditor's mortality.

5. If, beside the interest from his heirs, the lender is entitled to receive interest from the debtor, it must be on other grounds than those of the mortality of the creditor; and it is here, and here alone, that the circumstance of mortality or immortality is irrelevant. Of grounds for receiving interest from the debtor I have shown that there may be many, insurance against his possible insolvency being the principal one; or there may be none at all, and in that case no interest is due by him. There may even be cases when the interest is due by the lender to the borrower, as when the money is safer with the latter. When such circumstances exist, "the interest is a quid pro quo, and," whether due by the creditor or debtor, "is due like any other debt." But circumstances which may or may not attend a thing are unessential to it.

6. The editor fails to show the least ground on which, in a loan per se, that is, in a loan unattended by accidental circumstances, interest could be due by the debtor. "The lender sacrifices power by his loan in favor of the borrower, who receives it,—power to gratify his own desires and supply his own wants; he therefore has a right to compensation for this sacrifice from the person who benefits by it; i. e., the borrower." Very well! As a compensation, the borrower, at the stipulated time, repays an equal sum, thereby in his turn sacrificing, in favor of the lender, an equal power to gratify desire and supply wants. It is use for use, power for power, amount for amount. The reciprocal anticipation and postponement of the enjoyment being a benefit to both, and thus far the cause of the contract, but immaterial to its equality; the mortality of the creditor being not the debtor's concern; and accidentals being not essentials: ON A LOAN per se NO INTEREST IS DUE BY THE DEBTOR.

The lender who takes interest from his debtor on a loan pure and simple may take no more than belongs to him; but, being ashamed or embarrassed to ask it from those who owe it, takes it from the wrong man. It is as if, having lost a cow, he compensated himself by stealing the first cow he met. This would be as much a theft as if he stole a cow, having lost none; and yet, many men would be able to quiet their consciences in the one case who could not in the other. In some communities such thefts, from being universal and circular, have come to be looked upon as moral. So has, among us, the custom of taking advantage of the helplessness of borrowers.

This might be the place to show that the borrowing of money at all is a mere circumlocution and a farce. Money-lenders never lend any money except to solvent parties, in exchange for solvent paper. These solvent parties might purchase anything they needed through their own solvent paper, quotable in a free market, were they not debarred by legal penalties from issuing it in bills small enough to be convenient. These legal penalties on the use of all but a limited amount of privileged money, are nothing else but a compelling the people either to stop all work and transactions and starve, or to buy, every man, what he already owns, his own credit, from the owners of that privileged money, at such premium, called interest, as they may ask. In other words, all the money yearly paid as interest on public and private debts is nothing else but a yearly public grant annually voted by a few men to themselves through the legislature; i. e., the militia. The recipients of that bounty, far from deserving it by any public or private service that may be considered as a quid pro quo, ought to be punished for corrupting the public powers and robbing every individual in the land. But this last consideration belongs to a subject vast and complete in itself, and can, in this connection, only constitute a duplicate line of argument. I mention it, therefore, by way of protection.

Without this last paragraph, I have made this matter as clear as I can, deriving great help, as I thankfully acknowledge, from the courteous interest manifested by the editor in making his objections. Whether I have, as I believe, brought into relief, through new spectral bands, some overlooked but essential elements of the question—or, as I fear he believes, done nothing of the kind,—I am willing, at this point, subject to his permission and to the summing up of the editorial chair, to let the case go to the jury.

JULIUS FERRETTE.

[1. The point at issue we understood to be simply the morality or immorality of charging a "premium for the use of money"—that is, interest. By the usage of the whole commercial world, as well as by the science of political economy, the charge of interest on this ground is sanctioned as right and proper. The Bishop affirmed, however, that it is "usury" and "extortion"; and the discussion should be narrowed to this one point. We certainly think it "irrelevant" to discuss any other point than this, such as the propriety of charging interest for other reasons than the use of the money.]

2. So far as this limited discussion is concerned, the "tables of mortality" have nothing to do with the question, and we must decline to consider them at all.

3. A loan is a transaction between lender and borrower, as much as a lease is a transaction between landlord and tenant. The "heirs" have nothing to do with it. The landlord charges rent for the use of his house; the lender charges interest for the use of his money. Shall a landlord look to his own heirs for the rent due from the tenant? It seems to us precisely as absurd (our good friend must pardon the word) to say that the lender should look to his own heirs for the interest due from the borrower.

4. The Bishop has unfortunately forgotten the "point at issue." He himself expressed it tersely in THE INDEX of August 2: "When a loan is divested of all accidentals, so that interest can be charged on it on no other title than for the use of the money (that is, for the loan itself), that interest, however small, becomes usury, and is an extortion." We must positively decline to discuss further the totally different question—"from whom is the lender entitled to receive interest?"

5. The possibility of insolvency on the debtor's part affects only the rate of interest; it has nothing to do with the point at issue.

6. At last the point is reached. The Bishop argues that the lender, by repaying the principal, returns "use for use, power for power, amount for amount." Not so. On Jan. 1, 1877, A lent to B $100; and on Jan. 1, 1878, B repays it, but refuses to pay any interest. Now during this year B has had the use of the money, and during this year A has lost it. Some $6 (of course we raise no question of rate) are due from B to A for the use of the money during the particular year when he had it; and this year's use he cannot restore to A at all. If A had refused to lend, he would have had the use of the money all the time,—not only from Jan. 1, 1878, but also for the year preceding. B has received from A the use of the money for a year for nothing; his restoring the principal does not give "use for use," etc., for A can never enjoy the use of the money for the particular year during which he relinquished it. Therefore B, if he refuses to pay the interest due on account of the use of which he has deprived A, will be as much a swindler as the tenant who pretends to have paid his rent for a year by simply vacating the house he has occupied.

We should be quite unwilling that the Bishop, for whose good-nature and politeness in debate we return cordial acknowledgments, should refrain, on account of his own closing words, from offering any rejoinder he might otherwise wish to make. Though unable to share his conclusions, we certainly admire the ingenuity with which he defends them; and we, too, now submit the case to the jury.—ED.]

DEFINITION WANTED.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

You speak almost contemptuously of Mr. Babcock's "Complaint"; and yet I am sure many readers of THE INDEX who, like myself, have often remarked your rare keenness of vision and clearness of statement in definition, would be glad to have you define the act of the Boston tea-party of 1773, from the stand-point of that year.

Yours truly,

E. R. BROWN.

ELMWOOD, Ill., Sept. 12, 1877.

[The act of the Boston tea-party of 1773, considered "from the stand-point of that year," was an act of resistance to the tyranny of the British government, with the purpose of securing better government. Those who participated in the act hoped at the time to secure this better government by revolutionizing the British ministry; they were subsequently obliged to seek it by a more radical revolution. The object of the act was strictly revolutionary, and not riotous, as we explained these terms in our original article on "The Right of Riot," August 2.

The act of the railroad strikers, which Mr. Babcock wildly compared to that of the tea-party, was strictly riotous, and not revolutionary, because it did not aim to revolutionize the government in any sense, but simply to compel certain corporations to pay higher wages, and because it was a resort to private war for private objects. In all civilized countries, such a resort to private war is justly regarded as a high crime against all civilization, to be suppressed at once at all hazards as the only way to escape a universal carnival of anarchy, robbery, and murder.

If any one wishes to dispute this broad and clear distinction in a sober manner, his right to do so will be recognized in THE INDEX. But we trust he will begin by giving explicitly his own distinction between riot and revolution.—ED.]

MR. ANDREWS' "ADDRESS."

TIPPECANOE CITY, O., Aug. 12, 1877.

MR. ABBOT:—

Your correspondent, S. P. Andrews, I have been acquainted with for thirty-five or more years,—not personally, but from articles I have seen from his pen. So far as I can see, his mind now is in the same channel it ever was. That there is an inside, outside, and middle to all physical things, I think no one will dispute; and that there is an analogy between all materiality and immateriality (if there is such a thing as immateriality), I am not inclined to dispute; and that such analogy holds good in all the "mentis-mus" of the universe, I leave undisputed. But I can't see that such admission enables me to understand things any better than I did before making the admission. Mr. Andrews is certainly a man of many thoughts; but from want of capacity, or something else, I can't see their congruity.

My object in writing this article is to make a few observations on his "Address to his Fellow-Citizens on the Situation," published in THE INDEX of August 9. He is right in saying he has prophesied for the last thirty or more years that some dreadful thing is to happen between labor and capital; that capital had always been cheating labor; and that labor would sooner or later take the matter into its own hands and right the wrongs.

He now appears to justify the means labor is using to effect the end. Hear him: "The ballot is his [the laborer's], but he can't wait to use it, and he might be cheated in the use of it as he has been." "The fact is, that the laboring man (and he is the immense majority) gets no justice on the present plan of conducting business, and that he has discovered that fact, and means to right things at all hazards." And more of the same kind. Well, what is the remedy Mr. Andrews proposes? Hear him again: "The poverty of the current talk about 'enforcing the law first' becomes evident. It is then mere babble. The case has gone into the higher court" [the mob court], and this court is to "revolutionize the present manner of doing business." The justice established by the product of the ballot is to be superseded by the justice established by the mob! Now hear the remedy proposed by this advocate of mob justice. Nothing but: "A ready acceptance of the situation on the part of the rich and great will tide us safely over this crisis. . . . The execution of the laws as they now stand must all be stopped, and the demands of the laborer [mob] must be complied with and freely discussed. . . . Such extreme and gigantic measures as the forced transfer of all railroads, magnetic telegraphs, and great public works to the government, with the laborers paid fixed and equitable prices, as government employes; the organization of great government workshops; or organized government colonization and other similar enterprises, and the honest effort that the government shall become the social providence for the whole people."

Mr. Andrews then tells us that "there are a few dozen of men and some women in the United States, and a handful scattered over the world, who have been trying to tell their contemporaries what was coming, but they could get few to heed"; that he has been one of them, a John the Baptist; and that in consequence of this he now "feels authorized to speak." He has spoken, and told us what must be done. It just amounts to this: the ballot must be abandoned, because it is entirely too slow a process [for the mob], and they might be again, as they have been, cheated by it. Now, who but Mr. Andrews would be fit for President of this mob, since for the last thirty years he has seen what was coming, and (unconsciously, I suppose,) has done his best to bring it about?

Our government, as I have understood it, was founded on individuals. They are the units of the government; and, in order to give our institutions a firm basis, every unit should be developed, or have a chance to develop himself into a man. To this end our laws should secure to him his individual rights, and, in order to secure him in such rights, the ballot was given to each and all. Such wrongs as cannot be immediately corrected by the ballot should be patiently endured until they can be. But Mr. Andrews tells us the ballot is not enough; it has been tried and found wanting. Nothing is more common than for minorities to think the decisions of majorities wrong. What then? Should minorities govern? But the working-classes are "largely in the majority"; therefore, our laws are of their own make. Then why refuse to obey them?

Look over the United States, and you will at once see that it is the children of the poor of the last generation who have the property of this.

Now, working-men, whoever you are (I am one of you, but too old to do much), would you now, if you could, have our laws so altered that, if you should wish to hire another, the man you wished to hire should have it in his power to dictate the wages he should receive; and, if you could not give such wages, then he have the right to prevent you hiring any other person? Would you vote for such a measure, if the opportunity were offered? Working-men, we have a large majority of the votes; and, if we want such a law, we can bring it about. I would have no objection to submitting such a proposition to the working-men of this country, and abide their decision. I know the good sense of a very large majority would vote it down. None but the reckless, idle, unthinking, vicious, and visionary would vote for it.

Again, working-men, would you vote that all the property of individuals, such as railroads, telegraphs, workshops, and all other industries, should "forcibly" be taken from their owners, and be conducted by employes of government? Think for a moment of such a state of affairs. One-tenth of our population would have to be government officials; this would leave ninety out of a hundred to do the work; and the highest point of independence the ninety could ever reach would be to be laborers for the government! Here would commence a scramble,—who shall be the official, and who the worker? who the master, who the slave? But, you reply, it is or will be all in the hands of the laborers, for they will be ten to one, and they can fix the matter according to their own tastes; they can make a law that the official shall have no more pay than the laborer. But what about the stealings? The officials would have all that chance, and such opportunities would be numerous. Is it contended that this new order of things would make saints of all? But would all hands, good or bad, be willing to take the same pay? Would not the man of superior capacity think he should have superior pay? Who would be willing to confess himself the inferior? No doubt that multitudes would think themselves superior; how could this be settled?

But suppose this is settled by making compensation ample for the superior, and it would be a noble act of charity to help the weak and inferior by giving them equal wages. Let compensation be $5 per day (who would think $5 per day too little for a "fixed and equitable price"?), and eight hours be a day's work. I think this matter could hardly be compromised on a less sum. The officials might agree to it, for their pickings would, no doubt, supply all deficiencies. $5 for every eight hours work done! Now add to this the known fact that it costs governments (for many reasons well understood) double the amount for anything produced that it costs individuals; and it will make an aggregate of ten dollars for every eight hours work,—one dollar and a quarter an hour! So everything produced by government would cost at least five times as much as it does to-day.

Now comes in the important question: "Where would government find profitable sale for articles at such a cost?" There is not more than ten per cent. profit on the aggregate productions of the country now. This shows that any business not run by the government would be broken down by heavy taxation. If all business were run by government, such government would be bankrupt in less than a year. And what would we laborers do then? A government promise to pay five dollars would not buy a ten-cent loaf of bread. You should remember that the government could not force sales at any price it would ask; its products would have to come in competition with the products of the world.

It appears to me that neither of the plans proposed by Mr. Andrews is feasible. The laborers themselves, on sober second thought, would not adopt either; but, having the ballot, they will go to work with that, and elect honest, upright men; men not to be awayed from the grand principle of justice to all. All "rich and great men" should do the same. Let the employer and the employed say to all legislative, executive, and judicial officers: "We want no special favors. We are all men, with equal natural rights. All we ask is to have the laws so framed and executed as to secure such rights to us." All incorporations having their franchises from the government should take such franchises as subject to the control of the power giving them, liable to be altered, amended, or annulled, by making suitable compensation for all wrongs done, when the public interests require such alterations or changes. All persons and corporations should act upon the principle that a wrong done to the lowest individual (if such there be in our country) "is an insult to the whole body politic." I now think much of the complaint made by laborers is just, considering the way that rings have managed the business of railroads and other companies. I have heard many stockholders in companies complain more bitterly of the management of their officials, than I ever heard from their employes. Stockholders say it is done in this way: "A few will secure a bare majority of the stock. They then have the whole company in their pockets, elect whom they please as officers, pay such salaries as they please, pay favorites for fictitious services, change the rates of freights to favor speculating favorites in their rings, and, in this way, wring many a dollar out of the pockets of its rightful owner." I have heard a good many strikers say that the step taken was injudicious, and that they now regret it; for they now see they were in a position not to be justified. I have the most unbounded confidence in the good sense, on their sober and second thought, of the laborers of this country, in general. But there are societies (and a few individuals, foreign and native,) in this country that have no love for our institutions, or anything else but their own aggrandizement; and they stir up every discontented element they can get hold of. Such need ropes or bullets. 'Tis the only cure.

UNIVERSOLOGY.

No. 16 of the contributions of Stephen Pearl Andrews on the subject of Universology, published in last number of THE INDEX (September 18), would alone, it seems to me, establish him as the greatest thinker on the planet. No one doubts that Herbert Spencer has a greater intellect than any man in England; but his definition of evolution is so dim, dubious, and wordy as to make it repellant to a mind desiring clear-cut expressions of thought. The world has now a definition of evolution, exact, comprehensive, final. Why is this great man and his great subject so neglected? It is so easy to be one-sided; so consoling to one's pride to think a partial, fractional view all the view there is, because it is my view; so easy to argue a flippant, shallow materialism, a vapory, cloud-bestriding idealism; so difficult to see both sides, to be all-sided, to be whole or holy, to be, in short, INTEGRAL. Thousands of grand men are wandering over this globe, intellectually speaking, without hope or shelter. The glib and smirking partialist says: "See with my one eye, walk on my one leg, and be happy." The grand men may do many things; they NEVER can do that. To all such, Universology is the haven of rest. As for me, I thank God for the sun, moon, and stars, and for Stephen Pearl Andrews.

"LIVING" WORDS.

Agos ago, a man stood in the market-place of an old city, and spoke words of wisdom. They fell upon the ears of men who marvelled over their mysterious meaning, treasured them in their memories, and, when old, told them to their children. The children held them in honorable recollection till they, in their turn, grew gray and, full of years, repeated them to their children. And so the generations went and came, but the wondrous words lived on. Time at last wrought the ruin of the old city, and grass grew in its market-place. The sea washed up to where its walls once were; fishermen spread their nets where once had towered its temples; and at last its site and its name were lost from human remembrance. But the words of wisdom uttered in its ancient market were spoken in a newer language in other cities by the sea. Some one engraved them with a sharp stylus upon a waxen tablet. In the course of time the tablet turned to dust, and the hand that had held the stylus became a feast for worms. But the words, now written upon the soft bark of the papyrus, lived on and on through the wrecks of the years. At length they were transcribed upon the dried skins of beasts, and laid away in the great libraries of the world. Men came from the uttermost parts of the earth to read them and to carry copies of them away. The years and the ages glided by, and men learned the miracle of making books and multiplying them in all the myriad dialects of earth. And then those words which came from the wise old man in the market, and which, surviving the ruins of many a realm and splendid dynasty, had lived on through the lapse of the ages, were put upon the printed page; and there in imperishable letters they will live as long as there is a language among men.

"As the beaded bubbles that sparkle on the rim of the cup of immortality, As wreaths of the rainbow spray from the pure cataracts of truth, Such, and so precious, are the words which the lips of wisdom utter."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " "
 " 26 " 51 " 5 " "
 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON, publish

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.
 J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
 ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
 C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
 W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
 BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interest in Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

WHOLE No. 406.

CALL FOR THE FIRST ANNUAL CONGRESS OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Boston, Sept. 25, 1877.

In obedience to the Constitution of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July First to July Fourth, 1876, the Directors hereby issue a call for the FIRST ANNUAL CONGRESS of the League, to be held at Rochester, N. Y., October 26, 27, and 28, 1877. The best Hall in the city is engaged for those days. Further particulars, including list of speakers, etc., will be announced hereafter. For information respecting cheap hotel accommodation, reduced fares, etc., apply without delay to Mr. H. L. GREEN, Salamanca, N. Y.

After the hearing of reports and election of officers for the ensuing year, the most important business of the convention will be to decide whether the National Liberal League shall adopt a political platform and nominate candidates for the Presidential election of 1880; and, if so, whether this platform shall advocate the following principles and measures, to wit:—

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, etc.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

In order to give to this First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League the representative character befitting the gravity of the questions which will come before it for decision, the Directors suggest and earnestly recommend to the liberals of the United States that they immediately organize themselves throughout the country in Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, each of which, on receipt of a charter, will be entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other members as DELEGATES. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay. Charters are indispensable to secure the unity of organization without which efficient coöperation is impossible; but Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues remain absolutely independent, and recognize no authority in the National League to control their action in any particular. The small fee of ten dollars (which will surely be grudged by no one) is only desired in order to help defray the necessary expenses involved in the conventions and other public work of the National League, which has no salaried officers. Life-memberships of twenty-five dollars, annual memberships of one dollar, and voluntary donations, will also be gladly received for these public purposes. Time presses; and it is hoped that hundreds of new Local Leagues will be organized forthwith. Any existing Liberal society can be represented in the convention by applying for and receiving a charter in the usual way, and transmitting to the Secretary a certified copy of the following vote:—

"Voted, That this society, desiring to coöperate with the National Liberal League in the furtherance of its general and specific objects, hereby declares itself a Local Auxiliary Liberal League, according to the true intent of the Constitution of said National Liberal League, and has duly elected the following persons to represent it at the next Annual Congress of the same; to wit, —, —, —, —."

Persons desiring full information respecting the history, principles, and objects of the National Liberal League, in the shape of a closely printed book of 190 octavo pages, can obtain it by sending for Equal Rights in Religion: Report of the Centennial Congress of Liberals. Price (reduced), in advance, paper covers, 75 cents; handsomely bound in cloth, $1.00.

Address the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

By order of the Directors of the National Liberal League:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.
WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

GLIMPSES.

MACMAHON'S manifesto tells the story plainly enough. The issue for France is self-government or "personal government" once more.

PLUTARCH says that Agesilaus, being asked which was better, valor or justice, answered: "We should have no need of valor, if we were all just." The Spartan king saw what so many Christians fail to see, that universal equity is the road to the abolition of all antagonisms—the reign of "peace on earth and good-will to men."

THE Daily Graphic says: "The clergymen of Philadelphia make a good point in rejoicing over the downfall of Morton, the embezzler, because he is the man who opened the Permanent Exhibition on Sunday. However, he happens also, unfortunately, to be the man who was converted last winter and had made all arrangements to join the Congregational Church last Sunday."

THE LIBERAL LEAGUE of Denver, Colorado, holds a convention to-day, October 4, at their rooms in that city, No. 338 Larimer Street, for the purpose of organizing a State Liberal League. This society already maintains "Free Library and Reading-Rooms," open to the public; their "Children's Fraternity" is held there every Sunday afternoon, their "Socials" every Friday evening, and their "Regular Meetings" on the first Tuesday evening of each month. That is the kind of Local League that ought to exist in every city, town, and hamlet of this country! We shall be anxious to hear about their convention, of which we hope the best results.

AT THE Annual Convention of the Massachusetts

Universalists, held in Worcester on September 26, a report on "Secular Dangers" was adopted in which it was declared that "it does not appear that anything more was meant by the fathers of the Constitution than equal toleration of all Christian sects, thereby giving broadest play to all Christian effort, and securing the largest practicable measure of Christian influence in and upon the government itself." That is a plump denial of the equal rights of freethinkers as citizens, made a part of the platform of a large denomination. The Christian Amendment party are steadily making headway; shall not the National Liberal League be supported in season?

AFTER MR. UNDERWOOD'S exceedingly fine address at Paine Hall last Sunday, the meeting passed a resolution declaring itself a Local Auxiliary Liberal League, and elected delegates to the Rochester Congress, among whom (we regret not to have a full list) were Messrs. Horace Seaver, B. F. Underwood, and John S. Verity. When Mr. Underwood told the audience that a little money was needed to take out a charter in due form, the people flocked to the platform, and much more than enough was contributed in three minutes. A genuine enthusiasm in the movement was manifested, which augurs a fine success at Rochester. May the liberals everywhere go and do likewise!

ARRANGEMENTS for the First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League at Rochester are not yet completed. But it gives us great pleasure to announce that a telegram from Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll was received last Monday, saying: "I will, if possible, attend the convention at Rochester." This is excellent news. Mr. Horace Seaver, editor of the Investigator, Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor of the Truth Seeker, Dr. T. L. Brown, President of the Freethinkers' Association of Central and Western New York, Mr. B. F. Underwood, and F. E. Abbot, have already signified their intention of being present as speakers; and others who have been invited remain to be heard from. There is every indication of a large and important convention. Many new Local Leagues are reported as about to be formed, and their number promises to be very encouraging.

THE Tribune of September 27 says: "Dr. S. Irénée Prime has not taken up Col. Robert G. Ingersoll's gauntlet. The original challenge seems to have been an offer of $1,000 to any person who should prove that either Paine or Voltaire recanted his anti-Christian sentiments before he died, or approached his end in fear and trembling. Dr. Prime, in this week's Observer, says that he has received a letter from Col. Ingersoll, in which is proposed the establishment of a court of arbitration for the consideration of certain propositions in regard to the deaths of Paine and Voltaire. The Colonel suggests that the religious side shall have ninety days in which to collect and present testimony in the affirmative of these propositions; that the respondent shall then have ninety days to present evidence on the other hand; that the affirmative shall have thirty days to bring forward testimony in rebuttal; and that the decision shall then be argued before the Court of Arbitration. Dr. Prime contends that not one of the propositions mentioned by Col. Ingersoll was contained in the offer which was made in the Observer. What he volunteered to do was to produce evidence 'that Tom Paine died a drunken, cowardly, and beastly death.' Without accepting the arbitration plan, he lays this evidence before his readers. One of the strongest links in the chain of testimony is a letter which appeared in the Tribune a year ago, containing an extract from Stephen Grellet's Journal. Without passing judgment upon the completeness or incompleteness of the proofs, every reader will be relieved to learn that the bottom has fallen out of this absurd scheme for settling this controversy." Col. Ingersoll may possibly have something to say in reply to all this.

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

The Orthodox View of Theatrical Entertainments.

BY CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

I have read with very great pleasure the article in THE INDEX of Sept. 13, entitled "The Duty of Liberals," by J. L. Stoddard. In that article, the author's desire to make a candid, fair, and just statement of the Orthodox stand-point is no less apparent than his liberality. I am persuaded, therefore, that he will willingly see the suggestion of a view different from his of one of the points in question, a view which may show the Orthodox practice in regard to theatrical entertainments to be less wholly unreasonable than he now deems it. I state this different view with the more confidence, as I feel sure that Mr. Stoddard is not old enough in years to have known anything of those conditions of the theatre which mainly produced the Orthodox sentiment of which he speaks.

The passages in Mr. Stoddard's article where, as I think, the Orthodox idea is inaccurately represented, are the following, just below the middle of the second column. I italicize the phrases in which I consider the inaccuracy to lie:—

"Here, in enlightened, cultured Boston, there may be found thousands who deem it a sin to go to the theatre, there to be ennobled by the witnessing of Shakespeare's tragedies";—and,

"Is it not pitiable that intelligent men and women can still be so bound hand and foot by Puritan prejudices as neither to enjoy and profit by many inspiring pieces of acting, nor to recognize the great educating and ennobling influence which the drama is capable of exerting?"

The point of view under which the Puritan sentiment grew up, was not what the drama and establishments for dramatic exhibition might, could, would, or should be, but what they actually were. Let us see what they were.

Only forty or forty-five years ago, here in Boston (as everywhere else where dramatic entertainments were publicly given), each theatre maintained, within its own premises, and understood to be among the inducements to attend it, a place for the sale of spirituous liquors, and a place to which avowed prostitutes were attracted by gratuitous admission, while special facilities for negotiating with them were given to the male attendants of the theatre. Unexceptionable plays from Shakespeare and other authors were, from time to time, given at those theatres; but, whether the play were good, bad, or indifferent, special opportunities for drinking and meeting with lewd women were invariably given with it; given by the owners of the theatre, as part of the attraction of their establishment.

At a time when every theatre, as a matter of course, had the two departments above mentioned, probably Mr. Stoddard would not have said that the people who conscientiously abstained from attendance there did so because they deemed it a sin to see the performance of Lear or Macbeth. He would see, I think, that the more intelligent Orthodox people of that time probably said to themselves: Since the managers of theatres, without exception, consider systematic incitement of the grosser appetites an appropriate accompaniment of dramatic representation, and a condition essential to its pecuniary success, why should we not assume that they understand their own business? and why should we not conclude that that business naturally tends to immorality, and that no purification of it is to be expected?

These two features of the theatre have now passed away, as far as Boston is concerned. I do not know whether this beginning of purification has yet been reached in New York, London, or Paris. We are now talking of Boston. Has the removal of these special impurities left the stage pure here? Let us scrutinize a little further.

There are tragedies and comedies of Shakespeare and other authors, the adequate representation of which would have, on the whole, a good moral influence. There are private dramatic representations which have a moral influence unexceptionably good. At the same time, there is probably not one theatre in the world, carried on upon a business basis, and designed to pay a fair profit to its managers, a full half of whose nightly performances do not exercise, on the whole, a bad moral influence.

The evening's entertainment in our theatres usually consists of three parts: a tragedy or comedy to begin with, which may be good, bad, or indifferent, in moral character; a farce to end with, which usually contains some objectionable features; and dancing in the interval between, the chief feature of which is its indecency. Ballet-dancing, which, either by itself, or as a feature of one of the dramatic pieces, is one of the things chiefly relied on to draw an audience to the theatre, is the intentional display of the female figure to an extent, and in a manner, which would not only seem, at the first view, impossible to a modest and decent woman, but which would subject any woman to arrest for "indecent exposure" who should practice it with equal publicity elsewhere. Most of the dancing of women on the stage would be accurately defined by calling it an elaborate system of indecent exposure, although long custom and the patronage of wealthy and fashionable people have thus far screened it from the operation of penal law.

But, it will be said, since a pruning of some other vicious accompaniments of the theatre has already been effected, why may not this, and such other objectionable features as yet remain, be attacked and expelled in their turn? Why not at least try to do this, and make organized effort for such a purification?

tion of the stage as to make it really a school of good morals? These are fair questions; let us see what answer experience gives to them.

There have been two practical attempts, in this city, at a very partial and limited measure of theatrical reform. The Boston Theatre, and afterwards the Globe Theatre, were founded for the purpose of illustrating "the legitimate drama," and with the intention of restricting their performances to that. To be sure, the reform thus intended was from the standpoint of art, not at all of morals, for "the legitimate drama" includes a good deal of indecency and immorality; still, this restriction, could it have been adhered to, would have excluded a portion of the more vulgar sort of indecency. But it was found, in both cases, that the carrying out of reform, even to this moderate extent, would involve serious pecuniary loss. So the Boston, and afterwards the Globe, yielded to this pressure, gave what would pay best, irrespective of its grade either in art or morality, and sunk fully to the depth of the "Howard," both in the vulgarity and the indecency of their performances. What chance of pecuniary success would there be for an attempt at reform which should insist upon high art and good morals also?

The experience of these two theatres shows us, I think, the insuperable difficulty of radical reform in the theatre. The legitimate drama does not pay. A refined and purified drama would fall very far short of paying. Sensational clap-trap does pay, and if spiced with indecency it pays still better. Those who take up this business as a means of living will certainly try to make it pay, and will use the means to make it pay; and so the objectionable features of theatrical performance are likely to last as long as the theatre itself lasts. I think a conviction of this sort is the true ground of Orthodox objection to the theatre.

It would be a mistake to say, in rejoinder to this view of the case, that since there are good plays, and people competent to perform them, and other people desirous to witness them, therefore a reformed theatre is possible. Until a person shall appear who, with the wealth of a Stewart or a Vanderbilt, is disposed to apply a large part of it to the expenses of such an establishment, we must look primarily at the business aspects of the case. And the experience of the Boston and the Globe shows us clearly where the shoe pinches.

It will take a population considerably large, say fifty thousand, to support a theatre which plays five or six nights a week through the year. But, of the people who attend it, not one in ten cares about high art or the legitimate drama, and a still less number are so particular about moral tendency as to stay away on account of infraction of it. Such is the fact about the mass of people whose attendance on the theatre maintains it. Do you expect that those who get their living by managing its concerns, or acting on its boards, or playing in its orchestra, will be more scrupulous? They will prefer what pays, irrespective of all other considerations.

See the attitude of the daily papers towards dramatic establishments, under the influence of the same ruling motive. As advertising for the theatre is profitable, and as that sort of entertainment is established and popular, the editors announce whatever the managers choose to present, and attend the performance, and criticise it from the stand-point of art, mentioning, or not mentioning, the indecencies accompanying it. But, if an individual, without the prestige of custom and establishment, should desire to announce, for his own benefit, an exhibition as indecent as "The Black Crook," or as any one of a dozen specimens of "Opera Bouffe" played in this city for a few years past, the more decent members of the daily press would utterly refuse to advertise for him. Even now, these more decent editors feel obliged to say from time to time, not only that pieces performed at the Boston and the Globe are indecent, and otherwise of immoral tendency, but that certain women and certain men among the players and dancers take pains to exaggerate these vicious characteristics, making the show grosser and viler even than the author intended. Incidents like these have always occurred from time to time in the history of the stage, English and American as well as French. Is it strange that the Puritans assumed such excesses to be natural results of the system of theatrical representation? Were they entirely wrong in making that assumption?

The melancholy fact is, that when a modest young woman sits through an entire theatrical performance for the first time, she will probably see and hear, interspersed among the features of attractiveness and interest, more or fewer things suited to shock and disgust her. If it were possible to withdraw unobserved, she would very often do so. But, feeling obliged to sit still, she observes with amazement that fashionable people, cultured people, decent-looking people, take those things as a matter of course, perhaps laugh at them, perhaps applaud them. Under these circumstances, she tries to conceal her repugnance, especially as any mention of the offences in question would call the hot blood into her cheeks. If she continues to attend the theatre, and through the influence of custom and example comes to tolerate and excuse the things that formerly shocked her, so much the worse for her.

But it is men, not women, who are most injured by the allowed indecencies of the theatre. After subjection to them, the young man who wishes to keep his soul and body pure finds it more difficult to do so; and the man, young or older, who seeks exciting pleasures regardless of their vicious character, finds the broad road made smoother and easier for him at the theatre.

Probably the main support of a theatre comes from young unmarried men, who, seeking the amusement and excitement natural to their age, are frequent in their visits to it. They are at a period of special susceptibility, both to good and to evil influences. If there were no theatre except one conducted with the predominant purpose of combining good moral influence with recreation, that theatre might be an unimpaired benefit to them, as it would be to society at large. But if, beside such a dramatic establishment, another existed, conducted as unscrupulously as the theatres in Boston above mentioned, ten young men would choose the latter for every one who would choose the former. The consequence is, that while the latter might prosper financially, the former would certainly become bankrupt unless, as I said before, some philanthropic capitalist would back it up. And, judging from the reference to stage management in this city above referred to, we have no reason to think that the proprietors of the prosperous theatre would care one copper for the fact that their establishment was a corrupter of youth, and a nursery of sensuality. They are following Iago's counsel, to put money in their purse.

These things being so, it seems but just to our Puritan ancestors, and to those of the present day who cherish their traditions and follow their customs, to suppose their objection to the theatre to be founded on its faults, not on its merits; on the corrupting influences that are customary on its stage, not on its occasional exhibitions of unexceptionable character. It is true that excellent men and women have occasionally been found among actors and actresses; but it is also true that Soldene, Almée, and Lydia Thompson have done ten times more harm to their audiences than Mrs. Siddons and Charlotte Cushman have ever done good to theirs.

If it be said in reply to this—you can select the good performances and stay away from the evil, the further question arises: Is it well for me to assist with my money and my influence an institution the evil of which outweighs the good, and a manager who unscrupulously engages profligate performers, and gives corrupting exhibitions, whenever he thinks it will pay better to do so?

On the whole, I think that, in regard to the theatre, the Puritans have the best of the argument.

Still, there is within the limits of possibility one partial exception to the unfavorable view of the theatrical future stated above, which, being possible, ought in justice to be mentioned. In a city of five hundred thousand inhabitants, there might perhaps be people enough particular about the moral character and tendency of their recreations to support an unexceptionable theatre, after some rare philanthropist had assumed the labor, expense, and risk of establishing such an one. In Boston, with only two hundred and fifty thousand people, and people at their present grade of character and aspiration, such an enterprise would almost certainly fail.

THE BRADLAUGH-BESANT CASE.

BY MONCURE D. CONWAY.

LONDON, July 21, 1877.

On Tuesday evening Alderman Luak, M.P., presented in the House of Commons a petition from seventy-seven gentlemen, who, last Sunday evening, attended the Hall of Science, praying the House to enact a measure to make more clear the law relating to the question of over-population. These petitioners were, no doubt, moved by the eloquence of Mrs. Annie Besant, which would be sufficient at any time to stir earnest men to action, but which, on Sunday night, acquired thrilling power from the fact that she spoke as one standing on the threshold of a goal into which she is about to enter, having been sentenced to pay £200 and pass six months with felons, with the enemies of society, for publishing a work with intent of saving society, as admitted by Judge and jury. The same sentence was passed on Mr. Bradlaugh. This young lady (who, as I have before had occasion to say in my correspondence, is possessed of many accomplishments, is highly educated as well as beautiful, speaks various European languages) did not bring to bear on her case the high influences which may be assumed to be within the reach of a near relative of Lord Hatherley's to save her from prison. She and her partner in publication, Mr. Bradlaugh, have plainly resolved to fight it out with the law at any and every cost, and the prospect is strange and melancholy. I have said nothing on this subject in my recent letters to the Commercial, because, knowing the large circulation which your paper has in Europe, I had reason to fear that anything I might write was liable to be used while the case was pending. The case is, indeed, not yet entirely ended, but it has passed out of the phase in which it can be influenced by expressions of opinion by those known to be acquainted with the parties. With reference to this continuance of the case, I may say that Mrs. Besant, whose legal conduct of her own case, and three days' speech in Court, were declared by eminent lawyers to have never been surpassed for learning and ability in the history of English jurisprudence, moved that the verdict of "guilty" be set aside, on the ground that the indictment charged wicked intent; whereas the Prosecutor (Solicitor-General) gave up that point, and the jury expressly brought in an exoneration of the defendants from evil intent, the verdict "guilty" having been ordered by the Judge on the ground that the verdict that the book published is such as to injure morals amounted to that. Mrs. Besant pleaded that it did not amount to that; that a prosecution has no right to draw her into basing her defence on one line and then desert it. In this she has a good weight of legal opinion on her side; yet the Court in banco decided the point against her. Mr. Bradlaugh moved a writ of error on the ground that the indictment did not set forth fully all the portions of the book on which it rested the case. In this Mr.

Bradlaugh was opposed by two American decisions (Commonwealth vs. Holmes, 17 Mass., and Commonwealth vs. Sharples, vol. 2, Sargerton, Penn.), which have caused a good deal of surprise over here. In the American cases it was held, unless the cases were misstated, that in an obscene libel it was not necessary to produce in court all particulars which might further disseminate the evil and obscenity; but the prudery of such sentiments in a court of justice occasioned some contemptuous smiles in court, and the justices refused to be bound by them. While they did not decide that the matter was favorable to the defendants, they have allowed them to appeal.

If they get an arrest of judgment or a new trial, I suspect that the reasons for it will be quite as much political as judicial or legal. The defendants are not morally guilty. The jury has so declared, also the Judge, and there is not a man or woman in England who does not know that the defendants were animated by philanthropic and altogether honorable motives. The pains and penalties of law are not framed for persons of that character, but for the evil-minded. They cannot be successfully inflicted on such. The defendants would have been only too gladly released by Chief-Justice Cockburn—himself a Malthusian, who charged the jury favorably for the defendants,—had they not honestly avowed their intention of disregarding the verdict and selling the book all the same. Such defiance of the Court, and possibly some irritating comments which had been made on the Judge's Malthusianism, led him to inflict the vindictive sentences already recorded. But to the defendants the sentence to six months' imprisonment is of no more importance than if it had been six weeks or six years; for they will decline to give the required sureties for what the Court asks—good conduct,—and the government will have to imprison them for the rest of their lives before they give in, or else it will have to close their publishing premises in Stonecutter Street and mount guard over them,—in which case it will also have to close a good many other premises, and maintain a special police force to suppress the publications of the new Malthusian League, which has grown out of this trial. The authorities have thus a long row to hoe. The defendants might truly say as Bruno did, hearing his death sentence, to his Judges: "Probably you have more terror in passing that sentence than I in hearing it."

But there is a very large portion of the community which has heard the sentence with alarm, and it will be very difficult—I believe impossible—to carry out the sentence. As for the book itself, it contains so much that is trashy, embodies so many of the medical heresies of forty years ago, that many men of scientific position, even though Malthusians, are not willing to stand by it, or to have their names connected with it. Although it be true, as declared by the Judge, that there is nothing in it more obscene than is to be found in other medical books, it contains passages (irrelevant to its main point) of a trashy character, which have induced reserve in many who at the same time freely express their conviction that the prosecution was unwise, and the verdict a disgrace to the jury. The question has now passed out of all connection with the bad style of the special treatise, the prosecution and the jury having stigmatized as immoral and illegal advocacy of the principle which distinguishes it from previous Malthusian works. For a long time many of the ablest men in this country have advocated Malthusianism. The view of the learned clergyman of whom Miss Martineau has given such a pleasant account in her autobiography, was that the increase of population in Great Britain was so much more rapid than the means of support that great suffering and crime must result. Dr. Chalmers, Miss Martineau, Mr. Mill, Professors Cairnes, Bain, Fawcett, and many other eminent economists, have advocated the same opinion, and the truth of their prognostications is abundantly manifest already, as the Chief-Justice said in his charges. But such is not the opinion of the average Briton. He reads in his Bible the command to increase and multiply as he reads the command to remember the Sabbath; and to him any dissuasion from multiplication of offspring is immoral for the same reason as Sabbath work. But this average would not be able to bring in such a verdict as this were it not reinforced by another class, who have been startled at the novelty of the means for preventing population suggested in Knowlton's Fruits of Philosophy; namely, physical checks on conception, instead of the moral restraints advocated by the philosophers mentioned. Of these, however, Mr. Mill was an exception. He came to the conclusion that the moral restraint plan was an absurd thing to advocate, and many years ago began circulating a pamphlet of this kind—this very book, I believe, but am not certain,—and narrowly escaped a prosecution. The objectionable point, of course, is, that the checks suggested may tend to diminish the restraints on vice by enabling the vicious to escape some of its most inconvenient results. The subject is too offensive to go into, but it is necessary to sum up the Solicitor-General's case thus far, in order that the very serious situation which this community has to face may be fully understood. Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant claim before the public that they are severely sentenced for advocating the only conceivable remedy of what leading thinkers of the country, including the Chief-Justice, who tried them, admit to be a great evil on the ground that the vicious may abuse what is meant for public benefit. They claim that this is as unjust as it would be to punish a man for manufacturing a pistol, because some people use pistols for murder.

But, as I have intimated, a large portion of the community, including many who are indifferent to Malthusian questions, have been made parties to this case because of a ruling which has been made on a point of a law. The ruling is, that the moral intent—the mens rea—is not pertinent to the question of punishable illegality.

The danger of this ruling is obvious. In every free country the vulnerable point of liberty of the press lies in the fact that all agree that a restriction shall be placed on publications which infringe on decency and good morals. And because this restriction (including personal libel) is unanimously conceded, it is the one point which, in the interest of truth and science, has to be most jealously guarded. The common-sense of the community has always hitherto claimed that the only safe principle by which this limitation can be imposed is the principle that the mens rea is essential. Where decency or good morals are infringed the law must indeed assume that the depraved intent was also present; but if the person so charged proves clearly that the intention was good and pure, that intention clears them so far as any penalty is concerned, though the practice complained of may be prevented in future. Such a case is manifestly different from those not criminal, in which the law admits no excuse of ignorance, accident, or motives. Criminal law does take cognizance of criminal intent. This was always held in England until two or three years ago, when a miserable book, called The Confessional Unmasked, was hawked about the streets until suppressed. It was claimed in that case that the publishers of the filthy book were animated by the good intention of exposing the corruptions of the Romish Confessional. It was ruled that the good motive did not exonerate them, and they were punished. This ruling was foolishly overlooked at the time as to its consequences, because most people regarded the plea in that particular case as a subterfuge, and believed that the real object of The Confessional Unmasked was to make money by pandering to both meretricious tastes and sectarian prejudices. But that ruling, so disregarded at the time, now rises with formidable proportions. Solitary as it is, it can now only be reversed or altered by an act of Parliament. Mr. Darwin's Descent of Man contains physiological and sexual descriptions much more likely to shock ignorantly prudish minds than the Knowlton pamphlet. If twelve Orthodox simpletons whom Darwin may be unfortunate enough to have for his "peers" in Kent, were anxious to suppress him and his books, and his scientific intent were left out of consideration, he might be sent to prison; so might Dr. Carpenter for his Physiology; and so might the majority of the Anthropological Society, who are continually putting out memoirs concerning the manners and customs of savages which might scandalize many a pannelled twelve. It is indeed not impossible that the new Malthusian League may be compelled in self-defence to get up a case of such crucial kind in order to reverse this new judge-made law.

But it is not Malthusians who are interested, nor they alone who have already been involved. No sooner had that decision against The Confessional Unmasked been made, than the Society for the Prevention of Vice (which has earned the reputation of being nastier than anything it ever suppressed) began to utilize it, and they have compelled publishers to stop the sale of some of the most important historical, biographical, and classical literature, by threatening to visit them with the crass ignorance of twelve men, who might readily be found prepared to expurgate Shakespeare himself, after a few skillfully selected passages were read. No Biblical plainness of language is tolerated by the average paterfamilias, outside of his Bible. Already the Grammont Memoirs, Boccaccio, Rabelais, and all of Bohn's extravaganza series have been suppressed, and the process threatens to go on until, by the inevitable reaction and secret trade, the land is flooded with things really indecent. The prosecution of the Fruits of Philosophy raised its sale in one month to one hundred and twenty thousand; whereas in all the forty years before its sale had not been ten thousand. At every street-corner throughout the country hawkers offer Fruits of Philosophy, which, indeed, is not the real book, but indicates that the vendors of cheap literature recognize an awakened demand, which will surely not wait long for its supply.

There are several regards in which I think the defendants have been unwise; mainly in having reprinted a trashy book instead of having got Dr. Drysdale, their most eminent witness, or Professor Bain to expurgate and post it up; or, better still, write a new one detaching the principles they wished to defend from the antiquated stuff connected with it in Knowlton's book. Their motive for not pursuing this course was, as I understand it, because Charles Watts, who was the first charged, pleaded "guilty," and so left, as they considered, an undeserved stigma upon the pioneers of Secularism for having published, and on the present organization for having circulated thus long a book confessed by its latest authorized publisher to be obscene. Indignant at this, Mr. Bradlaugh denounced Watts as a coward, and withdrew from all connection with him; and when Watts (who escaped danger of imprisonment by pleading guilty) challenged Bradlaugh to incur the same danger, the latter could not vindicate the fathers of the secular movement or his own attitude towards Watts without publishing the ipso facto verba of the pamphlet. Being an outsider, I will not criticise the course adopted by Mr. Bradlaugh as standard-bearer of an organization which is to him as sacred as any church is to its devotees. He regarded its good name as involved, and chooses to vindicate it at cost to his purse and his personal liberty. It is not for those free from such perils and burdens to carp at his position, while no doubt he understood well enough beforehand that many liberal thinkers unconnected with his organization would be compelled to preserve themselves and their own several societies from all connection with trashy and unscientific literature, even when well meant. He has sacrificed a great deal of the outside coöperation which he would have secured had the book been up to the standard of liberal literature and science; he has endangered the seat in the next Parliament which would almost certainly have fallen to him (and is not yet lost); and in all this, an outsider who fails to see wisdom cannot help respecting courage. The case has, moreover, split the Secular Society into several fragments, a vigorous minority sympathizing with Mr. Watts. But, after all, such matters as these, their wisdom or unwisdom, appear to many persons—and among them several distinguished lawyers with whom I have conversed—to be very small compared with the service which a thick-headed prosecutor and jury may have enabled Mr. Bradlaugh to do. Of course it could not have been done (if it shall be done) without the man's pluck and his ability, but neither could it have been without a silly verdict; but, as it now stands, these sentenced defendants mirror not only flaws in English procedure, but dangerous innovations on the Common Law; and the agitation surrounding them can hardly fall before it ends to establish on a firmer basis some principles of English liberty which have been left in a perilously loose way. Though Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant may not be granted a new trial, the whole subject will have to be gone over again in November, when Truelove, the venerable bookseller, is to be tried for selling the pamphlet of Robert Dale Owen (Moral Philosophy) on the same subject. Professor Hunter, of University College, is to defend Mr. Truelove. This prosecution is undertaken by the Vice Society, and I have good reason to believe that it is much to the disgust of the Home Secretary, who has taken good care to let the public know that, though legal usage required the Solicitor-General to prosecute in the Bradlaugh case, the prosecution was not instituted by the government. Who did institute it remains a mystery. No doubt the Vice Society is behind it, and a severe snub administered to its chief and lawyer (Collette) by the Magistrate who heard the first presentation of the Truelove case, shows what the official feeling is towards those who are stirring up all this mephitic malaria.—Cincinnati Commercial.

WENDELL PHILLIPS ON "LABOR AND CAPITAL."

Touching this quarrel between the employer and employed, there are one or two things to be specially noted. In the first place, the law is to be obeyed and enforced in any event and at any cost. There are wrongs which demand and justify revolution. This is not a case of that kind; and, in present circumstances, every resort to violence is crime. No man has a right to prevent any other man from working when, where, and for what wages he sees fit. No man has a right to destroy public or private property, or to derange business by sudden refusal to work, or plot to effect such derangement. All these acts are grave offences against the public welfare, and do only harm. They are to be prevented or punished at all hazards. While this is said to labor, capital is bound to remember that labor has been heavily and unnecessarily burdened by the recklessness, worse than childish quarrels, incapacity, and mismanagement of capital, and capital has no right to complain or be surprised that labor is impatient or discontented under these heavy and unnecessary burdens.

In America we boast of the practical and executive ability of our business men. So far as mines, factories, and railways are concerned, the nation has not produced ability or integrity enough to manage these large-moneyed interests. In regard to railways, the so-called managers of them, judged by results, have shown themselves a set of incapables. Trusted with vast interests, heralded to the world as men of marvellous ability, and with all the means of success in their hands, one-half of them has landed the stockholders in bankruptcy, and the other half has helped to plunder them to an enormous extent. Express companies and Pullman car companies and other cliques, made up from the so-called managers of the roads, have been allowed to take the cream of the business and eat up the earnings of the road. This fraud or incapacity has lessened the fund out of which the ordinary employes of the roads were to be paid. Hence one source of distress to labor. Enormous salaries have been paid—from $5000 to $50,000—to the higher class of officers; and in some cases large dividends have been declared, while the ground tier of employes have had their wages reduced to starvation point. Twenty-five cents a day is a great loss to them, which, by such reduction, the company does not save as much, perhaps, as it would by dispensing with two comparatively useless vice-presidents. Who wonders that labor frets under such unfair and unequal arrangements? Recklessness in running into debt has added another burden to labor by mortgaging the fund out of which its wages were to come.

THESE DEBTS

were incurred on the Micawber principle, that "something would turn up"; that a large and sudden increase of business would soon lift the load. There is no reasonable expectation or probability of any such increase of business during the next twenty years. Hence very few of the railways will ever be able to pay their debts if managed as they are now. Legislatures have almost unlimited authority over the corporations which they have created. If honest dealing and the protection of property be objects sought for by legislation, then every railway and every similar money corporation which is in debt should be obliged by law to lay by at least one per cent. of its net earnings as a sinking fund to pay its debt. In no other way will the present generation or the next ever see these immense railway debts paid. Labor and capital are the tools civilization needs and uses. Both are to be protected. But labor, as it is human life, has the first claim. Out of the gross earnings of any business the first expense to be considered and met is wages. Such wages as men can comfortably live on are first to be paid; then a safety fund is to be provided for burdensome debts, in order that capital may be secured against risk or loss; what is left may be divided as dividend or profits to stockholders. Appropriate legislation should secure such arrangements for the protection of labor and capital. We demand legislation because experience has shown that so-called business men are either too blind or too wicked to provide such protection. If such a rule of apportioning wages and dividends should result in these last being so small that some capital would be withdrawn from the business it would leave the business healthier, and less competition would soon give to the remaining capital employed larger returns.

BUT THE MAIN CONSIDERATION

is still another point. What constitutes "such wages as men can comfortably live on"? Who shall settle and define the amount of these? This is the ground of the present quarrel, and peace will never come till this is settled. The employed have something to sell: it is labor. Men who have coal, metal, or corn to sell, do not let the buyer fix the price. The price is settled after mutual conference. The employed claim the same right of settling the price of what they have to sell (that is, labor) in the same way: that is, by mutual conference.

Corporations that employ a large number of working-men should, from time to time, appoint a committee to meet a committee of working-men. Before such joint committee should be laid open all the details of the business. The price of raw material, loss of interest in process of manufacture, interest on dead capital, repairs to keep the stock good, etc., and the price at which the goods are finally sold and in what quantity; all the facts necessary to make up an opinion as to what rate of wages the company can afford to pay,—of course only such facts. After mutual consultation, such committee should decide the amount of wages to be paid. If they cannot agree, an umpire should be chosen to make the final decision. Such a method has been occasionally resorted to in New England, and with good results. But to secure content and harmony this should be the regular, established, and recognized method. Such a course has been followed in England in a very large number of its manufactories; and wherever it has been adopted strikes have been for twenty years unknown. Thomas Hughes, well known in literature, has been frequently chosen as an umpire. Christianity dictates and sound political economy indorses such a procedure. How broad and sound must be, in years, the education gained by and brought to the close, practical consideration of such large interests,—acting, too, under such grave responsibilities! The effect has been very marked in England. Mr. Mundella, member of the House of Commons, assured me he had known instances where the workmen on such committees proposed even a greater reduction of wages than that named by the employers; declaring as the result of their examination, that the corporation could not safely pay as large wages as it offered. This shows how acting under grave responsibility educates men, both morally and intellectually. Weak and embarrassed companies would never be obliged to make such an exhibit of their affairs. Half a dozen firms or corporations doing so would fix the rate. The rest would follow, and those companies unable to pay it must show cause why they do not, or go to the wall. And such a result would be no harm to sound business concerns.

We have more than enough of the babble and chaff of "supply and demand." That is a political economy which forgets God, abolishes hearts, stomachs, and hot blood, and builds its world as children do, out of tin soldiers and blocks of wood. Here every man reads, votes, and carries arms. The physical force, the voting majority, and a large share of the intellectual ability, are in the possession of the employed. Hence such questions are far more complicated than in countries where despotism holds iron sway over disfranchised ignorance. Equally out of place and absurd is the argument that capital will only pay what it pleases, and labor must submit. That is slavery. The millions employed in mines, factories, and on railroads have usually that one trade and no other. They cannot easily shift into other employments. Very few families of working-men have means, when turned out of work, to travel hundreds of miles in search of other employers. Hence the majority of the employed are chained to one place and to one trade. Saying to such men, "You shall have no voice in fixing your own wages, and you shall take what is offered to you or starve," is slavery. No American will submit to that.

NO AMERICAN OUGHT TO SUBMIT TO THAT.

If the day ever comes when, by any means, Americans are obliged to submit permanently to that, a republic here will be impossible. A class of such workmen will do well for the footstool of a despot; they can never serve as the sturdy bedplate for the heavy working of republican institutions. The capitalists of the country do not, as a class, contemplate or desire such degradation or enslavement of labor. Supply and demand is a true rule rightly interpreted and applied. This ignorant prattle about it, and the equally idle threat that labor must take what is offered it or starve, is the mischievous talk of men who have the use of types and words but no brains. One of the gravest misfortunes of our time is that thousands can talk and write, while only a few can think. Of course there are many plans suggested to help us out of our present trouble. Some propose that the government assume all lands and property; others that the government own all the workshops, factories, and railways. Some seek financial changes, and others industrial ones. Some of these plans may be in the course of time adopted as discussion or experiment bids. But preliminary to all these, and immediately, if possible, labor and capital must make peace. This quarrel must be settled, and nothing is in any true sense settled until it is settled right. The only just, safe, and lasting basis of peace is that which calls labor into conference and allows it a full share in setting the rate of wages.

I ABHOR AND DENOUNCE ALL VIOLENCE,

every assault on private right or property, on the liberty of the individual working-man, and, above all, on life. But these outbreaks are transient and exceptional. In spite of them every thoughtful man must rejoice that the laboring men are awake, intelligent, and independent. Lord Chatham said he rejoiced that America had resisted British injustice. Submission to it would have shown the Americans to be slaves and ready to make other men slaves. I rejoice in the clear judgment which enables the working-man to discover the danger which threatens him, and in the wide-spread and unconquerable determination to avert it. I rejoice in his readiness to resist a state of affairs that degrades him, threatens to undermine republican institutions, and to condemn his children to want, ignorance, and dependence. It is one of the chief benefits of education, civilization, and progress that they make, and are intended to make, such violations of right, such injustice and oppression dangerous and almost impossible. The inevitable dangers (and there are inevitable dangers) which attend such injustice are enough to rouse the keenest anxiety of capitalists. That is spur enough to quicken their consent to do justice. I counsel working-men to frown on resorts to violence. It can only delay the remedy they seek. Let them rely on agitation, discussion, and on associations for mutual help and protection; but only such as discountenance violence and abstain from all interference with the rights and free action of individual workmen. Voters under a representative government, let them unite in political action and appeal to the moral forces of the age. The necessities which underlie free institutions and the soundest maxims of political economy are their strong allies, and the conscience of mankind is on their side. Yours, WENDELL PHILLIPS.

SEPT. 18, 1877.

ARE "LABORERS" THE MAJORITY?

Mr. Wendell Phillips, . . . in a recent letter about the strikers to the Herald, says: "Here every man reads, votes, and carries arms. The physical force, the voting majority, and a large share of the intellectual ability, are in the possession of the employed."

It is not true, in any proper sense, that the numerical or voting majority in this country is "in the possession of the employed." Mr. Phillips really refers to those who are not identified by their interests with the capital by which wages are paid, but with those who earn wages. The sons of farmers, working with them on their farms, may be employed, but their interests are with the owner. There were 2,650,085 farms in the United States, and, exclusive of those enrolled as "farm laborers," only 2,653,305 persons between sixteen and sixty years of age employed in all agricultural occupations, whence it is certain that a large proportion of those enrolled as farm-laborers are, in fact, the sons of farm-owners. If only one-half are of this class, the number of persons directly identified with capital, as farm-owners or their sons, is about 3,650,000. But there are also of the professions, and engaged in other employments in which they do not receive, but pay wages, about 330,000; there are also merchants and traders in number about 388,000; there are 352,000 manufacturing establishments, and each must have at least one person in the capacity of an owner or employer of labor. Already the number of persons not employed, in any sense within the purpose of Mr. Phillips, exceeds 4,800,000, out of 9,486,734 persons between the ages of sixteen and sixty engaged in all gainful occupations, according to the census. And yet there are very many more, such as teachers, clerks in banks, railways and stores, agents and commercial travellers, who are in some sense employed, but whose interests are wholly diverse from the interests of those to whom Mr. Phillips appeals, who would neither vote with the force of capital, nor fight with them. These number about 270,000 more. And there still remains the large class of persons who are no longer in any active occupation, but are living upon the fruits of former labor by themselves or others. Thus it is plain that persons who are in any proper sense employed, with respect to any struggle between capital and labor, do not form the numerical majority in the country, of persons of the fighting age, and still less are they a majority of persons of the voting age.

It is a fact that a great proportion of the workers in this country look forward to become at no distant day employers of labor, and are already capitalists. The savings banks hold the earnings of more than 2,300,000 of them; many more are stockholders in railways, and nearly 200,000 in banks; and an army of young men laboring on the farms, have already begun to accumulate in order to buy or rent a farm, and hire labor themselves. It is this broad distinction in the condition of labor here and in other countries which gives ground for hope that no professional agitator, nor reckless demagogue, will ever be able to array in this country the more intelligent and enterprising workmen in a crusade against capital. The more ignorant, and especially those whose habits or lack of capacity forbid them to rise to more independent positions, may be misled here as in other countries. But those who have intelligence enough to lift themselves above the position of wage-earners, also have enough to know that in this land the door is open for every man who desires independence. There will never be one-half of the wage-earners in this country who will consent to condemn themselves by trade-unionism to a life without hope or individual ambition, or by listening to agitators to embroil themselves in lawless violence. There are enough to make mischief, but not enough to rule this country by ballots or "physical force."—N. Y. Tribune.

THE GREEN FIELDS OF THE MOON.

When the moon is at the full, the unassisted eye readily distinguishes on her face certain dark gray spots more or less sharply separated from the brighter portions. Through the telescope these spots appear as broad level spaces resembling terrestrial seas. Indeed, the earlier observers mistook them for seas, and by that name (Latin, mare) they are known to this day. They are not seas, however, but ancient sea-beds, now probably nearly, if not quite, destitute of water; vast arid basins like the Sahara, or the great interior Utah Basin of our own continent.

Examined more closely these dried-up sea-beds—to which Nelson applies the irregular but convenient plural mares—are seen to have a rolling surface like some of our Western prairies, or to be traversed by numerous long ridges, resembling the wave-like sand-hills which give so marked and particular an appearance to the deserts of Western Australia, the level portions being dotted with low mounds interspersed with small crater pits. In many places formations of an apparently alluvial character abound, while the ancient coast-lines show distinct traces of water action. Two of these lunar plains—Mare Humorum and Mare Crisium—are walled in completely by lofty mountains, presenting stupendous precipices to the vanished sea. The larger mares are more like ocean beds. They run together as terrestrial oceans do, and sometimes merge into the brighter continental regions, without a distinct line of demarcation. In other places they show a rugged coast-line, rising into cliffs and peaks, and pierced at times by valleys and ravines.

One of the most conspicuous of these lunar ocean beds, also one of the deepest, is known as the Mare Serenitatis. Its area is nearly one hundred and twenty-five thousand square miles. Within its dark, gray border, from thirty to eighty miles wide, is an extensive inner plain which at times presents a fine, clear, light green tint, with a central streak of pure white, the green area lying lower apparently than the gray exterior. The green tint is difficult to catch, except under favorable conditions, and is much weakened by the effect of numerous small white round spots and gray ridges.

Another of the moon's green plains was discovered by Mädler in the Mare Humorum, already mentioned. This is one of the smallest as well as most distinctly bordered of the dark gray plains. Its area is fifty thousand square miles. The greater portion of its interior is distinctly tinged a dusky green, sometimes very marked, affording a strong contrast with the pure gray of the borders and high enclosing ridges. On the west the green area extends nearly to the edge of the mare, but elsewhere, as in the Mare Serenitatis, it is separated from the border by a narrow, darker gray fringe, except on the north-west, where the gray and green areas merge insensibly into each other.

Still another area of green is observed in the Mare Crisium, one of the most conspicuous of the moon's dark plains. It is completely enclosed, and is, perhaps, the deepest of the lunar mares. Its area is seventy-eight thousand square miles. Its general tint is a gray mixed with an unmistakable tinge of green, especially under high illumination. This verdant hue is seen to best advantage for several days before and after the moon is full.

These and other color-changes on the face of the moon—as, for instance, the darkening of the great ring plain of Plato with increasing light, and like changes in certain long, winding lunar valleys—led Beer and Mädler to suggest that they would indicate vegetation, were vegetation possible on the surface of the moon. But having accepted Bessel's conclusion that there could be neither air nor water on the lunar surface, and consequently no life, those much-respected selenographers could not entertain the hypothesis of lunar vegetation, however strong the evidence might seem.

But Bessel's opinion, as our readers already know, is inconsistent not only with the conditions on which he based his calculations, but also with the results of more recent studies of the state of the moon's surface. So far from being an airless, waterless, unalterable desert, a changeless mass of dead matter, like so much volcanic scoria, the moon is now known to have an atmosphere of considerable volume and density, to present abundant evidence of physical activity and change, and to have in all probability water enough to make life easily possible on its surface.

The moon is dying, but very far from dead. Being so much smaller than the earth, it has run its course more rapidly, but is still a good way off from that goal of ultimate deadness to which so many astronomers have theoretically assigned it. There is not the slightest adequate evidence, Nelson says, of the popular view, and "its truth would be admitted by no astronomer who had devoted sufficient attention to selenography to enable him to thoroughly realize the probable present condition of the moon."

Such being the case, the hypothesis that the moon's green plains derive their color from vegetation ceases to be impossible or absurd. The evidence is not of a character to justify a positive assertion that the mythical man in the moon may have abundant pasturage for his cattle; but his case ceases to be absolutely hopeless when a thorough-going selenographer can say, as Nelson does, that the moon may possess an atmosphere that must be regarded as fully capable of sustaining various forms of vegetation of even an advanced type; that it does not appear how it can justly be questioned that the lunar surface in favorable positions may yet retain a sufficiency of moisture to support vegetation of many kinds; and that in a very considerable portion of the entire surface of the moon, the temperature would not vary sufficiently to materially affect the existence of vegetable life.

Who can tell but that the aforementioned man in the moon may not follow the plan of the African tribe which Livingstone tells of, and keep himself and his cattle in extensive lunar caverns, where the temperature is uniform and water abundant; driving them forth upon these green fields for a fortnightly feed when the sun is up for its long days and the grass in good condition? Jules Verne ought not to neglect so inviting a field of exploration.—Scientific American.

NOUNS OF MULTITUDE.—A little girl was near the picture of a number of ships, when she exclaimed, "See what a flock of ships!" We corrected her by saying that a flock of ships was called a fleet, and a fleet of sheep was called a flock. And here we may add, for the benefit of the foreigner who is mastering the intricacies of our language in respect to the nouns of multitude, that a flock of wolves is called a pack, and a pack of thieves is called a gang, and a gang of angels is called a host, and a host of porpoises is called a shoal, and a shoal of buffaloes is called a troop, and a troop of partridges is called a covey, and a covey of beauties is called a galaxy, and a galaxy of ruffians is called a horde, and a horde of rubbish is called a heap, and a heap of oxen is called a drove, and a drove of blackguards is called a mob, and a mob of worshippers is called a congregation, and a congregation of engineers is called a corps, and a corps of robbers is called a band, and a band of locusts is called a swarm, and a swarm of people is called a crowd, and a crowd of gentlefolk is called the élite, and a miscellaneous crowd of city folk is called the community or the public.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE MARCH OF LIBERTY.

BY HARVEY HOWARD.

My heart leaps up with rapture at the coming of a maid, Whose swift advancing footsteps make the tyrant's soul afraid;
For she stoops to lift the down-cast and to comfort the dismayed,
As she goes marching on.

Her neck is clothed in thunder, and her eye the lightning seems;
Her smile is like a maiden's in a raptured lover's dreams;
Her cheek can answer back with fire the sun's devouring beams,
As she goes marching on.

She carries in her hand a sword to smite the prisoner's chain,
But no shield to parry any blow of those who smite again.
Her limbs are like some pillars tall that deck the Eastern plain,
And she is marching on.

Her bearing is as regal as a goddess's may be,
For on her brow and in her breast sits throned majesty.
God gave dominion unto her; she rules as wide as he,
While she is marching on.

I have seen her lift her hand and break the fierce oppressor's rod;
And where her smile has fallen, blood has crimson-stained the sod;
And prejudice's victims were the chosen ones of God,
Where she is marching on.

The throbbing of her bosom is the heaving of the sea,
And the trailing of her garments is the music of the free.
Her step awakes the nations; for her name is LIBERTY,
And she is marching on.

At her coming every vestige of the olden night must flee,
And passion's reign surrender to the reign of purity.
We stand and face the dawning of the era of the free
For she is marching on.

A WORD IN SEASON.

Just as we go to press, Mr. Green sends us this excellent note, which we most heartily second:—

Local Liberal Leagues. How to Organize Them.
EDITOR INDEX:—

Many Local Liberal Leagues are being organized these days in Central and Western New York, preparatory to sending delegates to the Rochester Congress, October 26, 27, and 28. Some of them are being organized in this way: ten, fifteen, or more liberal persons are invited to some private house, and there, without trouble or expense, an organization is perfected—a charter ordered, delegates elected, and, as the saying is, "the child is born" with very little "labor." Any earnest freethinker in any town where there are a few liberals can organize a League in this manner. If some one of your readers in every town will try this experiment immediately after reading this notice, we can have three thousand delegates at the Rochester Congress. Reader, will you try it?

H. L. GREEN.

PROFESSOR ALEXANDER LOOS, of Germantown, Pa., died at his home on the fifteenth of September. One of the best educated and most self-sacrificing liberals in the country, and a gentleman whose personal character was universally respected, his services as a member of the General Centennial Committee, to which was intrusted the responsibility of making all arrangements for the Centennial Congress of Liberals, were very valuable and highly appreciated. An obituary notice of his career was received at this office too late for insertion in the present issue, but will appear next week.

BENJAMIN HALLOWELL, of Sandy Spring, Maryland, one of the earliest friends of this journal and a stockholder in the Index Association, has just died at an advanced age. He was one of the sweetest and noblest spirits of this time, and won the affectionate regard and profound respect of all who came into relation with him. A Quaker or "Friend" of the most liberal school, his sympathies were with all that is good and true; and though we never had the privilege of meeting him in person, we shall always retain the most grateful remembrance of his beautiful letters. The world is poorer to-day by his departure from it.

A NEW Freethought Journal has been started in Canada by the Toronto Liberal Association. The first number, dated September 14, has just been received, and is a very promising one, being very well printed and very well filled. Among its contents we notice Mr. Stoddard's translation from Renan on "Prayer," and Mr. Ball's poem on "The Gods,"—both honorably credited to THE INDEX. B. F. Underwood, William McDonnell, Allen Pringle, Edward Meek, William Sisson, J. Ick Evans, R. B. Bulland, W. B. Cooke, and W. J. R. Hargrave are editorial contributors. THERE IS as much mystery how Dean Swift, who made no pretence of a special inspiration, could write this astonishing passage on the moons of Mars, as shrouds the alleged revelations of Swedenborg:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRIBUNE:

Sir,—I have found something in Gulliver's Travels which I think is quite curious. In A Voyage to Laputa, chapter iii., p. 284, of Lippincott's Edition of 1876, I find the following in relation to the astronomers of Laputa:—

"They have likewise discovered two lesser stars, or satellites, which revolve about Mars; whereof the innermost is distant from the centre of the primary planet exactly three of his diameters, and the outermost five; the former revolves in the space of ten hours, and the latter in twenty-one and a half; so that the squares of their periodical times are very near in the same proportion with the cubes of their distance from the centre of Mars."

Gulliver's Travels appeared in 1726, one hundred and fifty years ago; and these two satellites were discovered on August 16 of this year. Although the distances and times are not quite true, yet they will be found to be in proportion to the actual figures. E. H.

"NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS."

"Equality under the laws of all citizens," said President Hayes, in reply to an address of welcome by Colonel Charles S. Venable, at Charlottesville, Va., on September 25 (the date of the call for the First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League).—"Equality under the laws of all citizens is the corner-stone of the structure of restored harmony, from which the ancient friendship is to rise. In this pathway I am going, the pathway where your illustrious men led—your Jefferson, your Madison, your Monroe, your Washington." If in this statement President Hayes is thoroughly sincere and in earnest,—if he is indeed resolved to "go in this pathway," and not pause half-heartedly before the goal is attained,—then he will not hesitate to approve emphatically the principle of NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, proposed in the call which was sent forth to the American people on the very day when he uttered the above most excellent words. He will see that nothing is contemplated by it inconsistent with the complete reconciliation of the North and the South, or the most unfeigned and cordial amity between them; he will see that the protection of all national citizens in all their equal rights, civil, political, and religious, not by the muskets of United States troops, but by the peaceable authority of United States courts, is not a principle which applies to a single section of the country, but to all sections alike; he will see that the incorporation of such a principle into the Constitution cannot be regarded as a measure of force imposed upon the vanquished, since it would be law alike to the vanquished and the victor; in short, he will see that there is no other sufficient guarantee of that "equality of all citizens" which he well declares to be the "corner-stone of the structure of restored harmony." If President Hayes sincerely aims to build the temple of assured and stable peace, he will be the last man in the country to oppose the placing of the finishing stone on this august edifice.

Let no sanguine soul delude itself with the dream that a Presidential tour, how redolent soever of handshakings, compliments, and applauses, is enough to achieve this consummation. Contrasting the former and present conditions of the freedmen very favorably to the latter, Hon. George F. Hoar, President of the recent Massachusetts Republican Convention at Worcester, nevertheless said: "I do not doubt that there is still grave and serious danger. There are men, able and numerous at the South, who mean, having first driven out from their States all white men who differ from them, to deprive the negro of the political and legal rights" [imperfectly] "conferred on him by the amendments to the Constitution, and to reduce him to such a condition of political and personal dependence upon the whites that the will of the latter shall be the law which determines his personal rights, and fixes the price and condition of his labor. This is partly a conscious purpose, and partly the effect of that curious mental hallucination which, while persuading itself of a desire to treat the colored man with justice, seems to lose unconsciously all understanding of what justice and equality really are wherever he is concerned." (We may add—just as Christians lose all understanding of what justice and equality really are wherever freethinkers are concerned.)

Still stronger testimony to this state of facts was borne by the New York Tribune of May 21, after a somewhat similar contrast, as follows: "This is the pleasant side of the prospect. On the other hand is the certainty that though the negro may be safe in his person and property, yet for some time to come he will not be recognized as the political equal of the whites, and will not be permitted under any circumstances to regain political power. He may be fairly treated in the courts and the schools; he will not be fairly treated at the polls. Probably we shall hear little more of shot-gun campaigns and masked riders; but the negro majorities will melt away; the colored people will be 'discouraged' from voting; they will be strongly confirmed in the belief, already gaining ground with them, that politics for black folks will not pay, and that they will find it easier to get work and make friends if they let the affairs of government alone. Ways enough will be found to nullify the provisions of the enforcement acts without infringing upon the boundaries indicated in the recent decisions of the Supreme Court. The State election laws will be unassailable by Federal authority; and yet it will be found that negro suffrage is to all intents and purposes abolished whenever it threatens to lead to the restoration of a negro and carpet-bag administration. If the whites cannot keep in power by fair means, they will not hesitate to secure themselves by fraud."

So shrewd an observer as the New York Nation, in its issue of Sept. 27, as if in confirmation of Senator Hoar's testimony, declares (the italics are ours): "Our belief is that at present the Southern whites are determined to accept him [the negro] as a voter under white guidance, and, as long as he chooses to accept this guidance, to protect him in the fullest manner in the security of person and property." In plain English, the negro shall not be secure in person and property, if he will not vote exactly as the whites dictate! We regret to say that, notwithstanding the Nation's anticipation that the negro may achieve political independence in the future, it apparently sanctions his political serfdom in the present, by speaking of "the delight which Governor Wade Hampton feels at seeing his State once more in the hands of those who own it!" As if, forsooth, the State of South Carolina belonged to the white citizens exclusively, and not to the colored citizens as well!

Is any one so fatuous as to suppose that the Southern question can be eliminated from politics by any such settlement as this? Or that the shouts and huzzas of Southern crowds, jubilant over a fraternization which puts the colored people under their feet, are loud enough to drown the voice of the Northern conscience which declares: "You have made these people citizens of your own Republic—now protect them by the power of its laws!" Friendship is good, but not such as made Pilate and Herod friends.

This demand of national protection for national citizens is fated to grow louder every day. The government of the United States is powerless to give a just equivalent for the supreme allegiance it claims.

Said the Boston Journal of July 19: "It is an unspeakable disgrace to the authorities of the State of Mississippi that they have not taken measures to punish the perpetrators of the De Kalb murders; but if they fail to do so, we cannot see in what manner the federal government can interfere. There are cases where it seems as if the Constitution should empower the federal government to step in and protect the citizen in the State when the local authorities are in league with the assassins; but as it now reads no such provision exists. That the Constitution does not make such provision is not the fault of the President. If it is the result of oversight on the part of any parties, it must be attributed to leading Republicans, who had it in their power once to change the Constitution so as to give the most ample powers to the general government."

When Attorney-General Devens was charged last May with negligence in not prosecuting the parties accused of the Mountain Meadow Massacre, his defence was that this horrible crime was not against the United States, but against the Territory of Utah. Yet it was a great company of industrious, honest, unoffending United States citizens who were foully and brutally murdered in cold blood!

When Chief-Justice Waite gave his charge to the jury in the Ellenton conspiracy cases at Charleston, S. C., on the first of last June, he said: "That a number of citizens of the United States have been killed, there can be no question; but that is not enough to enable the government of the United States to interfere for their protection. Under the Constitution, that duty belongs to the State alone. But when an unlawful combination is made to interfere with any of the rights of national citizenship secured to citizens of the United States by the national Constitution, then an offence is committed against the laws of the United States; and it is not only the right, but the absolute duty of the national government to interfere and afford to the citizen that protection which every good government is bound to give." Should not such protection as "every good government is bound to give" extend to all the civil, political, and religious rights of citizenship?

"General Hawley, in his recent college address," said the Boston Journal of May 14, "gives a very pertinent answer to a complaint sometimes heard. Why, it is asked, does our government permit outrages in a State which it would exert all its authority to redress, even at the risk of war, if they were perpetrated under a foreign government? Are the rights of American citizens more sacred on the soil of Great Britain or France than on the soil of one of our own States, like Mississippi or Louisiana? Not at all, it might be replied; but the government of the United States is clothed with power to act with imperial sovereignty in the one case, while in the other its authority is limited, to the degree of utter impotency in certain circumstances. The State sovereignty excludes the federal over most matters of dealing between man and man; and if the State laws are properly enforced there is not likely to be any ground of complaint; but if not, the federal government, unless specially called in according to the terms of the Constitution, is helpless. As General Hawley states it: 'Citizen A B, grievously wronged, beaten, and robbed, lynched within a hair's breadth of death, may apply utterly in vain to any and all prosecuting officers of the State. The forms of law that might give him redress are all there; the prosecuting officers, judges, and sheriffs that might act are there; but, under an oppressive and tyrannical public sentiment, they refuse to move.' In such an exigency the government of the United States can do no more than the government of any neighboring State,—that is, unless the State concerned calls for aid, or unless the offence rises to the dignity of insurrection or rebellion. The reason is that the framers of our governmental system left to the several States the sole guardianship of the personal and relative private rights of the people. The United States government has passed no laws against murder, mayhem, rape, robbery, theft, and the whole range of crimes against person and property, save only when committed in ports, arsenals, dock-yards, or other places 'under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States,' or on the high seas or elsewhere within admiralty and marine jurisdiction. A few other exceptions, as in the case of treason and specified crimes against the government, do not militate against the general principle that to the States are reserved the protection of life and property, and the punishment of all crimes ordinarily committed within their borders."

Such is the imperfect development of our nationality in this respect that we have really no right as yet to call ourselves a nation in the true sense of the word, nor shall we have while this state of things continues. Thousands have begun to feel this keenly, of which a few illustrations must suffice.

A communication to the Tribune of June 9, signed "Merchant," was as follows: "Before getting into a quarrel, and perhaps a war, with Mexico about the treatment of our flag and citizens, would it not be as well, think you, for the government to try and make the flag a protection to our citizens on our own soil? That is what it never has been since the foundation of our government in a large portion of our common country. The kind of government the people of this country expect and intend to have, State rights or no State rights, no matter how much blood and treasure it may cost, is a government able to protect the humblest citizen in the exercise of all political, civil, and religious rights. When the rebellion of the South against the government began, one of the most noted secessionists of Baltimore asked one of the regular army officers what the government expected to gain by making war on the South. 'Well,' the officer replied, laying his hand on the cannon by which he was standing, 'we intend to use these until it is as safe for a Northern man to express his political opinions in the South as it is for a Southern man to express his in the North.' That has not been accomplished, notwithstanding the good use the gallant officer made of his guns (and he used them well, and it was not his fault that the war closed before it was accomplished). We shall not have a government to be proud of until it is accomplished."

Hon. James G. Blaine declared at the Robeson banquet in Trenton, N. J., July 2, that "a government which did not offer protection to every citizen in every State had no right to demand allegiance."

Ex-Senator Wade, of Ohio, in a letter to the Washington National Republican of July 16, said of the "President's policy": "I greatly fear this policy, under color of what is called 'local self-government,' is but an ignominious surrender of the principles of nationality, for which our armies fought, and for which thousands upon thousands of brave men died, and without which the war was a failure, and our boasted government a myth." For our own part, we believe that there is no reason to quarrel with this "President's policy" so far as it goes, provided it is followed up by such a practical recognition of the "principles of nationality" as shall give national protection in return for national allegiance. General Devens, in his oration of September 17 at the dedication of the new monument on Boston Common, perhaps unconsciously implied this, when he said: "We strive to render the Republic one whose firm and genial way shall protect with just and equal laws each citizen who yields obedience to her power." The Republic can never become such as this until it guarantees and affords protection to the individual citizen in its own name and by its own immediate power, and no longer delegates this high responsibility to local authorities which may or may not discharge it. We believe in "local self-government" as firmly as any one possibly can; but we deny emphatically that the protection of national citizens in their fundamental equality of personal rights ought to be left to the separate States any more than it ought to be left to the separate towns—or the separate wards of a city. That is a function which every nation as such must exercise, or it is unworthy of the title.

The truth and justice of this position are so clear that it needs only a bold and persistent public affirmation of it to command thousands and millions of votes. It is on this principle, and on this alone, that liberals should claim protection for themselves against the too long endured encroachments and oppressions of the Church; and it is on this principle that the National Liberal League should now fearlessly take its stand as the advance-guard of a vast national party. Let its voice be now raised with dignity in defence of this precious principle, and it will be immortalized by the gratitude of posterity. The Rochester Congress will have it in its power to render such a service to public liberty as shall instantaneously arrest the attention of the whole people and command the enthusiastic support of multitudes of voters. Do not delay, then, liberal friends, in assembling, taking out charters, sending delegates to Rochester, and ensuring such a convention as shall lift into instant prominence and power the great cause of NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS.

AUTHORITY OF CHARACTER.

There is one kind of authority in religious matters as in all others that is very vital and genuine. It is the natural power which truth and right carry with them when uttered by word or deed as living personal conviction. It makes all the difference in the world whether a word or deed stands by itself in its own strength, or whether it has the support of strong character behind it, vitalizing it, as it were, with personal life. In one sense, it is true, it can make no difference to the force or weight of a proposition whether it be uttered by saint or sinner, by a wise man or a fool, by one who believes it or one who does not. A moral precept no more than a geometrical theorem is logically altered by the character of the person who teaches it. But the immediate influence which intellectual or moral truth may have upon the world greatly depends on the quality of the personality throughout which it flows. There are great words that fall dead and are void of any immediate result, because no magnetism of personal conviction is felt behind them. And, on the other hand, there are quite ordinary words that are sometimes spoken with such fresh and earnest energy of belief, and are so penetrated and vitalized with genuine experience, that they arouse enthusiasm in the hearers, and so kindle thought and feeling and purpose as to become a genuine life-giving inspiration in the community.

And any man who so speaks as to awaken or to deepen the mental and moral life of those who hear, speaks with authority, whatever the truth he utters, whether it be old or new. That earnestness of belief which shows itself in strong personal character always commands, always leads. It has an authority inherent in itself, which does not rest on any outward credentials or official insignia. The test of its authority is its actual success in rousing the energies, satisfying the thought, developing into active beneficent life the moral nature of those with whom it comes in contact. Let the thought be high and noble and fresh, and the words a fit embodiment of it, and a true and strong personality be felt behind the words and thought, and we have the authority possessed by the genuine moral and religious teacher,—the reformer's and prophet's power.

We have no need to look for credentials of miracle in order to find those who "speak as having authority." It is a power that carries its own evidence with it. Jesus, Socrates, Zoroaster, Sakya Muni, all had it. It is a power found in all religious faiths, and is not yet extinct. It is a power that is specially dominant in any great moral and religious movement. Liberals sometimes complain of the slowness with which their ideas advance, and of the indifference of fellow-liberals with regard to the adoption of the requisite outward means of success. But perhaps one secret of the indifference and the slowness is that liberal ideas are not yet grasped with sufficient enthusiasm. They are perceived mentally by large numbers of people, are accepted logically; but it is only a comparatively few who so feel their pressure upon the conscience and heart as to become their devoted and consecrated servants. It is of the first importance, of course, that truth be perceived by the mind; and vast mischief has been wrought in the history of mankind by conscience and emotion acting without the authority of rational thought. But, again, rational thought needs the attracting power of heart and the impelling power of conscience to set it in its full authority before the world. In other words, it needs the power of a complete personality behind it to give it full vigor and vitality. W. J. P.

THE INTEREST QUESTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—It seems to me that a pertinent question to ask in connection with this controversy is: "How do capitalists or those who have money to lend succeed in getting interest for their money? The answer is because there is competition for it. Those who can profitably make use of it are prepared to bid against one another up to a certain point; and naturally the money goes to the one who can, upon the whole, offer the best terms; which means that it goes to the one who is prepared to pay the usual rate of interest while offering the best security. On what grounds should money be loaned without interest, or at one or two per cent., when very worthy people are not only willing but anxious to obtain it at a higher rate? The sole grounds could be those of private friendship, which would not be a very satisfactory regulator in matters of business.

Secondly, what advantage would accrue from the abolition of interest? Does not the existing system work in favor of a great many poor as well as in favor of the few rich? When a poor man invests his savings in a savings-bank, or in a house which he intends to let, does not he reap an advantage from interest? Why compel such a man to be always consuming his capital?

Lastly, what steps could possibly be taken for doing away with interest; or, in other words, for preventing people paying for what they want and what it pays them to pay for? Are not men accumulating money every day through the use of borrowed capital? It seems to me that interest is a very necessary reminder that the borrowed money is not yours, and a useful spur to help you to get rid of the debt.

At the same time, like yourself, I am open to conviction.

Ever faithfully yours,

WM. D. LE SUEUR.

FREETHOUGHT NOTES.

The first number of a freethought paper has appeared at Toronto.

The Liberal Association of Toronto has steadily grown since its formation three years ago, till it has become a large and flourishing organization.

The Boston Investigator is in its forty-seventh year.

The first volume of Lange's History of Materialism has been published by Osgood & Co. It is a profound and comprehensive work.

Lewes' Physical Basis of Mind is a valuable contribution to scientific and philosophic literature. The "Reasoned Realism" of "Problems of Life and Mind," of which the above named work is the third volume, is a sort of compromise between the materialism of Hückel, Vogt, Moleschott, and Büchner, and the philosophy of Herbert Spencer. Spencer, in his Principles of Sociology, leaves but little foundation for the theories of Max Müller and other "mythologists" in regard to the origin of religious beliefs.

"What are you then by nature?" "I am an enemy of God, a child of Satan, and an heir of hell?" "What will the wicked do in hell?" "They will roar, curse, and blaspheme God." These are questions and answers taken from a catechism published in 1864, and used in the Sunday-school of a prominent Congregational Church in Eastern Massachusetts. So says the Gospel Banner.

The subject of State secularization is receiving considerable attention in Oregon.

Liberalism is making rapid strides in Canada, especially in Ontario, where at the book-stores works are displayed the sale of which a few years ago would have been punished by imprisonment and fine.

Mr. Peebles, a prominent Spiritualist, takes the ground that Darwinism is utterly inconsistent with the facts and philosophy of modern Spiritualism.

It is fortunate for Spiritualism that Mr. Wallace and other Spiritualists quite as well qualified to judge as Mr. Peebles take a different view.

Charles Bradlaugh says that the Knowlton pamphlet has reached, since the prosecution of Mrs. Besant and himself, a sale of one hundred and thirty thousand copies. The usual sale before was about a hundred a year.

The Toronto National says of the clergy of Canada: "They are not content even with what they legally keep back from the public treasury. It is with them a game of grab, in which the 'dead hand' of the Church takes all it can snatch from the State, and gives nothing in return. It is time the whole system was swept away. . . . If people can afford to build churches costing thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars, they can afford to pay for the roads, sidewalks, gas, and sewerage they are not slow in clamoring for. These buildings spring up in Toronto week after week like mushrooms, and the creation of every one of them means the deduction of so much from the ratable property of the city." There is quite a strong sentiment in Ontario in favor of taxation of church property and complete State secularization.

REPLY TO MRS. ELIZABETH THOMPSON'S "HUMANE APPEAL."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Inspired by the earnest appeal from a noble soul in behalf of human suffering which appeared in THE INDEX, the writer offers a few suggestions concerning causes that have brought about prevailing misery to the greater portion of this nation. More especially is this observable among the producing and industrious classes; while, however, thousands of people, unseen and unsuspected, suffer atonement for wrongdoers' sinful acts and for omission on the part of the strong to do their duty to the weakened in these days of trials.

In connection with the exposition of causes that have brought about the present state of affairs, it is proper to suggest remedies which, when applied in practice, will alleviate the distress and prevent its repetition in the future.

The prominent cause of the people's financial distress, the nation's apparently bankrupt state, and the many out of place crimes committed by unprofessional criminals, are plainly traceable to culpable national mismanagement.

The mismanagement has chiefly consisted in the protection given, through corrupt law-making, to usurers, stock and estate gamblers, bondholders, and monopolists generally, while unjust neutrality has been observed on the part of government in the uneven struggle of necessity against luxury. Persecution, even, has been extended to upright-thinking philanthropists and honest laborers, when either of these had exhausted their resources and become poor in pocket through charitable disposition and fair dealings.

Back of these causes, however, a primary and principal one can be found which is the more important, because it constitutes the root of the evil, and suggests itself the remedy for preventing repetition; namely, to root it out and plant a new.

When we look to the characteristic narrow-mindedness and Orthodox pedantry exhibited (with exceptions) by the class of officials entrusted with the control of public schools; when we observe, on the one hand, the severe constraint put upon competent but independent progressive tutors by these despotic trustees; when we observe, on the other, the servility with which incompetent, ignorant persons lend themselves to teach what is dictated them by their unscrupulous overseers, because it is their interest; when we notice how one text-book is thrown out and another accepted, not for its merit or demerit, nor for the good or bad effect its teachings may have on the mind of the scholar, but on account of the dollars and cents involved,—can we then wonder that the educational system is deficient and ineffective in performing what reasonably might be expected from so important an institution?

As long as public education is limited to memorizing and mouthing over and over again doctrines prepared and suited to the past, so long can we not reasonably expect to raise wise and judicious legislators fit to frame laws suited to the present. For that kind of learning the present generation has outgrown through intellectual progress and scientific discoveries.

Is it consistent with reason or common-sense to study "man" as he was, and measure present human nature of a higher type with the lower "beings" of the past? Why not study "man" as he is, that we may learn our own nature what we can do, and what must be done, if we desire to prepare a happy future for our own posterity?

We have learned from Nature around us how by cultivation we can change the nature of a sour orange-tree so that it may bear sweet fruit; why not learn from school how by discipline and moral culture we may change our own natures and the nature of our children, so we and they shall think more righteously, and so that in deeds and dealings we shall act more honorably?

Why should we study sun, moon, and stars in their true relationship to each other, and not study the true relationship of individuals to society and society to individuals? Is it wise to give all our attention to the physical sciences and sharpen the carnal appetite of our minds to know all about the body, how to clothe and feed it well, and then totally ignore and omit to teach the metaphysical sister-science, so necessary to practical moral culture, when by this neglect we cause minds to famish or grow corrupt for want of knowledge about the soul?

As long as we have this one-sided kind of education in the school, and instruct our children out of school how to obtain the most money in the shortest time by compound interest or fraudulent acts, demonstrated in every-day-life, so long shall we rear our children up in ignorance and debar them from the higher and nobler attainments in life, attainable only through knowledge of using ourselves rightly as providing instrumentalities; so long shall we perpetuate our degradation in the scale of humanity, and more and more become a nation of unscrupulous money-mongers; and so long will the noblest of institutions—the public school—prove a failure.

We wonder, under such educational management, our legislators and senators have proven themselves inadequate to the trust imposed upon them. What do they know of first principles in ethics, or of sound economy based on natural law? In school it is not taught, and out of school they have no time to study it, nor have they ambition to understand that which would tie them with bands of honor.

Once we had a species of ethics clothed in ecclesiastical garments, which, under the name of religion, held in check for a while the inordinate appetite for public plunder and oppressive acts. Now and then a timid knave would be conscience-stricken from fear of a coming hell; now even this bridle has snapped, and to the intelligent rogue it is but a relic of the past, with neither smoke nor smell to rouse the fear of fire.

But what is worse, while we have outgrown the old admonitor, we have not yet fairly begun to grow, in the new order of things, and slaves to evil have no conscientious restraint put upon them that will modify their brutal passions.

When we consider this fact, well may we feel alarmed about the consequences; for whoever knows anything about social economy and national polity understands that no system, social or political, is sound, or can be safe without some ethical foundation.

The ethics to be taught in our public schools should be pure, and simplified so that every voter, however limited in intellect, or however much superfluous learning he might possess, could not find an excuse for misunderstanding, nor find learning enough to prevent it by sophistication.

No one should be considered fit to hold an office of trust under the people who could not remember the first lesson in ethics, taught in school, defining "equitable" relationship when applied to social economy, to mean, "that every member of a social or national body should be to the whole what the whole body should be to each individual member." Neither should anyone be eligible as representative of the people, who was not willing voluntarily to contribute a proportionate share of property accumulated in excess of the needful, whenever the nation's life was jeopardized for want of resources.

Each member of the national body should learn in the public school that the omission to do justice to fellow-members of the same body is equally guilty with commission of offences against the law. The relation of money to products and labor should be taught in the public school. It should be shown that money in itself is of no life-giving value, but mere representatives of the commonwealth, the same as letters written and spoken are merely representatives of "sense," or as congressmen are merely representatives for the people. A commonwealth should be defined in school to mean the yearly produce and products of the whole country raised by labor and expenditure of vitality,—which products and produce, when utilized by the nation's members, would give life and vigor back again. It should be taught that, when a monetary system was based upon an exact ratio of collateral commonwealth, when no more money was issued than corresponded to the raising of this commonwealth, such an amount of money properly and freely circulated effectually replaced the more inconvenient barter-system. But it should also emphatically be explained that every dollar raised by interest, without any corresponding collateral equivalent that could be converted into life, was of fictitious value, a constant drag on free labor, and invariably leads to depreciation of the capital circulated.

Is this not natural law, and is natural law not supreme? Do we not find this order of things throughout the universe and in every healthily organized body? Why should we not teach in schools how to organize our national body in conformity to natural law? If we know and understand what is needed to keep the animal individual body in a healthy condition, why not apply the same knowledge to keep healthy and thriving the national body? Both are associated organizations. The nation is a vast organism of many lesser organs, each of which has specific functions to perform, yet all aiming at the sustenance of the whole,—while in a healthy state. So with the individual human body, made up of many cells and groups of cells, which severally and unitedly combine to sustain the whole. One is the giant with the spacious senate chamber in which is done the nation's thinking and reasoning; one is the Lilliputian, with the tiny skull in which the constituent's thinking and reasoning is done.

If the Lilliputian thinks and reasons wrongly,—aye, perhaps by temptation driven commits a crime,—though weak he be, must he not suffer the penalty?

How, then, if the giant who is so strong reasons falsely and thinks wrongly? Suppose he by wilful neglect omits to do what is just and right, and by this omission becomes the indirect cause of offence, shall there be no law to punish him as well, giant though he be,—or shall might be right before we have drifted into anarchy?

When we look to the general make-up of these bodies, we find a striking resemblance in the organism. In the human animal economy we find a circulating medium called blood. By fitting avenues it ramifies throughout the body and flows uniformly and freely. In its course it distributes itself equitably (not equally) to every working organ, feeding it with suitable nourishment and clothing it with new tissue as the old one wears out; never overtaking any nor denying any its just share. By this fair dealing in return, the working organs of a healthy body perform their functions with will and vigor. In the national system we find a similarly related circulating medium called money intended to perform precisely the same office as the blood in the animal body. By properly directed channels it could be made to flow as freely, to nourish and clothe as well, and be made to convey in return a constant addition to the actual commonwealth, which then would naturally increase the circulation without appreciating its value by adulterous inflation.

But has capital of late done its duty to laboring organs? No; it has been waylaid in its course and absorbed in monopoly by mercenary drunkards, far more dangerous to society than the liquor-tippers; and yet, while so much has been said and done to reform the common drunkard, not a word of reproach has been raised publicly against that kind of intoxication, the fearful consequences of which we now see around us in the wide-spread human wreck and ruin. These unscrupulous debauchees have, under protection of unjust laws, used the vitalizing resources to inflame and corrupt one portion of the nation, while another portion of that same body is famishing for want of necessities. It does not require much leaving to see the analogy between the national and the individual body. Suppose we tie a string tightly around a limb—say an arm or a leg; will not that blood thus cut off from general circulation inflame and swell up the monopolizing limb? And will not the whole body suffer and its constitution be impaired? This the monopolists have done; they have most successfully tried to break down the national Constitution. Should a surgeon be consulted in such a case, where a leg or an arm was mortifying, would he not be likely to advise bleeding or amputation? And would any reasonable being thus affected not prefer such a course rather than death? We for our part would sooner die than be eaten up of foul ulcers, or consuming cancers.

Had the men who for the last half century have filled the offices of trust assigned by the people been educated in the public school to understand this simple relationship of the two bodies,—had they learned to value the producing worker's life at least as much as the idle consumer's property,—had they been instructed to aim at honor rather than wealth, how different would our law-makers and laws have been to-day! Prosperity would have crowned the nation, and peace, happiness, and harmony would have reigned supreme in this once glorious land.

Is it possible that a nation so great can be so utterly devoid of independent manhood among its influential men, that a woman must take up the cause and spur them on to do their duty? Is there not one in the land whose voice can be heard that has courage enough to speak the truth, say boldly?—

"Gentlemen bondholders and capitalists, you have with a margin of profit received in full the amount advanced as a loan to the government some years ago, when the nation's life was threatened by dissolution; you still hold, under protection of law, the principal as a claimable debt against your less favored fellow-citizens. Again the nation is visited with calamities, and decline jeopardizes its life. Now, as then, the nation appeals to the stewards entrusted with the commonwealth to come to the rescue, to save the country from further distress, and to enable the government now, as then, to protect your lives and property. Give up your bonds as patriotically as did the brave defenders of the Union give up their lives on the battlefield. Once more lend the United States your property, say for twenty-five years, take mortgage bonds bearing three per cent. interest from the government, and on this property the government will found a new issue of bills bearing one per cent. interest, which will be instituted legal tender for all debts and dues excepting customs. Do this, or adopt some other practicable measure, and you will crown yourselves with glory; continue your stubborn resistance to the country's need and surely will follow the penalty of your shameful inhumanity."

REPLY TO MR. CHANE.

In THE INDEX of Sept. 27, Mr. E. L. Crane, of Tippecanoe City, attempts a restatement of my "Address to the Country on the Strikes." I do not wish to be led into any discussion on that class of subjects. I am not mainly interested either in politics or political economy, and the address in question was merely an episode in the current of my ordinary pursuits. My main interest and labor in life is to elaborate the integral and in a sense final form of philosophy, and especially as a philosophy of the sciences, culminating in sociology, or the true and typical order of human life. Practically, my main interest is, then, as I have said, not in politics or political economy, but in something higher and farther than either; namely in social reconstruction, pantarchy, or on the large planetary scale, and upon the basis, type, and model of the pure science of the subject, and of its high art; as replacing the spontaneous, sporadic, chaotic; in a word, the merely naturalistic societies and naturalities which have always hitherto covered and cumbered the earth. What I believe in and labor for is, therefore, a quasi-millennial state of society of which only a handful of people as yet have any distinct conception. I live, ideally, in that future world, which many might concede to be probable enough for one thousand, five hundred, or, even in these fast times, one hundred years ahead; but which I also believe in as very near,—as liable to come suddenly (as slavery was abolished in these States) and at almost any day. I regard all the past savageries, barbarisms, and civilizations, which have existed and do exist, as merely so many stages of preparation for a true human, and truly human state of society, which could not exist until science and religion culminated and embraced each other.

Of course, residing habitually in this high visionary and attenuated atmosphere, I am, so far as the actual world around me is concerned, "among it, but not of it"; and of course, again, when I come down from my heights to talk about matters and events here, I am very likely not to make myself quite well understood by those who have no conception of my habitual standing-point of observation. But, still, I can hardly think that I ever presented such an incongruous jumble of ideas as Mr. Crane attributes to me. In the address he refers to, I said nothing about justifying anything that had been done by the strikers, except as we justify earthquakes and cyclones, by noting the facts and accounting for their meaning. I did not recommend that government should take possession of railroads, establish industrial colonies, or any thing of the kind. I noted the fact, again, that these and a thousand other extreme and gigantic changes were about to be proposed and forced on the attention of the world during the transition from an old to a new form of civilization, many of them perhaps to be tried and prove better or worse. By an attentive reading of my address no one can tell whether I favor any one of those measures or not. My purpose was to emphasize the fact that we are in, or approaching, a great social transition, which will amount, before it ceases, to the greatest social revolution that the world has ever witnessed. Just this I had in mind, and nothing more. It is my object to keep out of rather than to involve myself in the detail of special measures incident to this transition, and to concentrate my efforts upon the preparation for and the organizing of the germ of the new and higher civilization which I anticipate. If Mr. Crane had read my former writings as attentively as he says, and if his memory were good, he would know that I have never prophesied that "some dreadful thing is to happen between labor and capital," except as the opening door to some vastly better thing beyond it; and he would know that I have stood stanchly and in an extreme sense upon precisely his doctrine of individuality, and hands off on the part of government. But I have shown that individuality and free competition can only work well along with equity. For what I mean by commercial equity or equity in trade the reader is referred to an article entitled "The Labor Dollar," in the second number of the Radical Review. But as the capitalists and the world at large are not prepared to adopt equity merely because it is just, as the slave-holders were not prepared to adopt abolition, they will have to be driven into it, probably, by a series of intermediate measures of government interference, as distasteful to me as to Mr. Crane. For the further treatment of this point the reader is referred to a book-notice of Mr. Larned's book in the first number of the Radical Review,—having my initials. Mr. Emory E. Barnum, a new but an original and logical writer upon this class of subjects, in the New York Republic expresses this whole train of thought, in a couple of sentences, as follows: "There is great danger of our oscillating from the present system of ownership and monopoly of wealth by a few to the extreme system of communism. The present order of things, however, will change, and higher laws, based upon moral intuitions, must [ultimately] take the place of a system where might makes right."

STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

AN INSTANCE OF ORTHODOX CANDOR.

The proposition made by Col. R. G. Ingersoll to the clergymen of the country, in the last INDEX, reminds me of a circumstance I am tempted to relate, which shows how extremely anxious clergymen are to seize upon the slightest pretext to disparage those whom they term "infidel."

About thirty or thirty-five years ago, Orson S. Murray, who had been a Baptist minister, and editor of the Vermont Telegraph, started with his press and fixtures to Ohio, intending there to publish a radical paper called the Regenerator. When he reached Buffalo, N. Y., he took passage in a vessel (name forgotten) for Sandusky. They had not been long out when they encountered a strong gale, so severe that without the most powerful exertion of the passengers and crew all must have been lost. But they finally succeeded in getting their wrecked vessel to the Pennsylvania shore. They made out to get up a fire to warm and dry themselves and talk over their narrow escape. Mr. Murray took this occasion to convince them that in such emergencies, work was much more effective than prayer. He found part of his press injured, and had to send it back for repairs. He then went to the Allegheny River, purchased a skiff, and he rowed himself down to Cincinnati. Shortly after he reached there, he was surprised to read in a religious paper of Brandon, Vermont, an article under the heading, "An Infidel in a Gale," stating that there was an infidel on board this vessel going West with his press, types, and fixtures to establish an infidel paper. When the storm became violent and the vessel became unmanageable, he was the first man to fall upon his knees to pray; but the next surge swept him overboard! Mr. Murray wrote immediately to the editor of this paper, telling him he was not swept overboard, and did not fall on his knees nor pray, but relied on work alone for safety; that frequently, during their struggle to save the ship, he found others whose hope had failed on their knees in prayer. He assured these that there was yet hope, if all would work; and invariably they sprang to their feet and worked like men to save the ship. He requested the editor of that paper to publish these statements, that his friends might know he still lived. This he neglected or refused to do. As soon as Murray could get his shattered fixtures from Sandusky, and put them in running-order, he sent out the first number of the Regenerator printed in Ohio, containing a full account of the shipwreck, and a denial of the statement that he had prayed, and was drowned. This number he not only sent to Brandon, but to numerous other editors of religious journals who had copied the "Infidel in a Gale," requesting each to correct this misstatement of the matter, that his friends everywhere might know he was not dead, but at his post again. This reasonable request was not granted by one; but the "Infidel in the Gale" was published in the religious papers all over the country for years, notwithstanding the infidel who was swept overboard was sending out his weekly rebukes of superstition and bigotry in his Regenerator.

Ministers of many denominations took it up, and made it a text to warn their hearers of the terrible results of "infidelity." Fifteen or twenty years after the transaction, the same awful story of the praying infidel being swept into eternity was told in a sermon preached here in Sterling, Ill. Even to this day it is told by preachers as a solemn truth. Like Beecher's dog, they cannot stop barking at that hole.

Mr. Murray had all his Bibles and theological works in one box, and his "infidel" works in another. The religious works were sunk in the lake, but his "infidel" works were saved. If it had been the other way, how clearly they would have said it proved a special providence!

Can it be possible that preachers who resort to such mendacious means to sustain their cause are honest?

LIBERAL SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

CANASTOTA, N. Y., Sept. 13, 1877.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I am glad to see you have taken up the subject of Liberal Sunday-schools, a subject which has been too long delayed, and to the detriment of our children. While we have been arguing against superstition, and casting right and left for something or somebody to help us in our wholesale iconoclasm, our children have been fed upon what is nothing but dry husks to them, and they have wandered away to other churches, and grown up in utter indifference to any belief whatever. I do not object to meat for men and women who are strong enough to digest it; but let us have milk for babes. Tell a child about a Father who loves the world; a dear, manful Friend who took little children in his arms,—and its affections are engaged and its interest excited; but talk to it about the great "Unknowable," the "fact behind all facts," the Spirit pervading space and the eternities, and he brings out a long sigh of weariness, and fumbles a pocket handkerchief, or bites his fingers. Poor little ill-used monster, with heart full of tender affection and a thimble-full of reason,—who would delight in the story of Joseph and his brethren, but does not care whether we were born of a monkey, or dropped down bodily, full-made babes from heaven, which is most probable to him, because rainbows and stars are there!

The Liberal Church has absolutely nothing for the child,—nothing to satisfy its undeveloped understanding or its more restless imagination. In our terror of creeds, we leave them like the little boy who was admitted to the dinner-table on condition that he asked for no fruit, etc., and was found crying, and gave for a reason, "he had asked for nothing and he got it."

Most of us of the Liberal Church were fully indoctrinated in original sin, atonement, hell-fire, and armies of devils, and we are none the worse for it, for we all had an inward dissent, which grew upon us, as it grows upon all minds sufficiently developed by heredity to receive anything more clear and more elevating; and the benefit to us of Bible study, intellectually, and its natural aid in aspiration, cannot be over-calculated. The truest characters and best cultured minds have been fed more or less upon this pabulum. Take the Bible out of Shakespeare and Milton, and what would remain? The best writers in THE INDEX show whence grew the fervor, no less than the mental grasp, of the authors.

F. A. Hinckley, in THE INDEX of August 9, would have us suppress the Lord's Prayer, and substitute for it "a simple aspiration." Now no child, unless he is a precocious creature of dry intellect, will ever go along with this. The child prays to an intensely personal God—a heavenly Father,—and he finds something in his little heart elevated and comforted by drawing near to this divine Father. He may outgrow all this and be the worse for it; but the child-life must have appropriate aliment. Either let him grow up utterly without spiritual culture, or, while he is learning to take hold of life, give him something mentally proportionate to his development.

A great deal can be trusted to the natural evolution of the child-life. Children allow much of their reading to roll over them without holding a thought. It is the play of the faculties,—dew upon the lion's mane; they are not predisposed to creeds; they like the Arabian Nights and Robinson Crusoe better, and grow wise upon them.

I am not wishing or expecting to say what will be instructive; I see an evil—a hiatus—in our liberal ideas, which some of your writers are trying to supply, and I speak to ask enlightenment. Let us not be such inveterate Gradgrinds that, while we are casting about for scientific facts, and are endeavoring to digest strong meat, our children be not left mentally, morally, and spiritually unkempt, and unsupplied.

Pastor Independent Church, Canastota.

SHORT CUTS TO THE "WILL OF GOD."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I am reminded by Mr. Neville's excellent letter, and your excellent comments thereon, of my frequent attempts at studying up a creed for liberals. The utmost limit, however, of my effort was always just one short article; namely, "No authority other than that of reason shall be invoked in the discussion of any question that may come before the church for settlement."

We might have a by-law in relation to this article somewhat as follows: "Any liberal pretending to know of some cross-road or shorter cut to the 'will of God' than the way of reason and experience (such, for instance, as revelation, emotion, intuition, etc.), in regard to whatever subject the human mind can be interested in, not excepting that of morals or religion, shall be church-mauled." Perhaps the above article would be a suitable formula of your "faith in liberty." It is to be hoped that many of those who shall be saved will soon declare their acceptance of this creed. I will add, however, that the church-mauling of heretics will continue to be done mainly through THE INDEX.

J. N. C.

KING DAVID'S DOCTRINE.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I attended church recently, and, among other things, the minister repeated the text, that "children were conceived in sin, and brought forth in iniquity."

I want to hear from you on this subject, whether there is any reason outside of theology for such a monstrous idea.

Respectfully,

A. A. B.

MADISON, Ga.

[We think "theology," as taught by King David, is entitled to the exclusive credit for such an absurdity. If there is any "reason" for it, somebody else must furnish it.—ED.]

TALMAGE performed, last Sunday, down at Pittston, and when he concluded his discourse, wiped his perspiring brow, and sat down, the local clergyman arose and, with a wholesome snarl, remarked: "We will now begin the service of God by singing the 84th hymn!"—Graphic.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quick advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
" 13 " 25 "	" 8 "	" "
" 26 " 51 "	" 6 "	" "
" 52 " " "	" 5 "	" "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent. On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers. Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

Office, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON, publish

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.
J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
O. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
W. D. L. SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyses the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. CHRISTIANITY AND INFIDELITY!

A DISCUSSION BETWEEN

Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian, New York, and

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of the Truth Seeker.

SUBJECTS DISCUSSED:

Part I. The Relative Services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Independence.

Part II. The Relative Services of Christianity to Learning and Science.

Part III. Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

A thick 12mo volume of over 500 pages, well bound, sent post-paid by mail for One Dollar. Address D. M. BENNETT, Publisher, 141 Eighth Street, New York.

A POPULAR LITERARY PAPER.*THE LITERARY WORLD.

A Monthly Review of Literature.

$1.50 PER YEAR.

The low price of the LITERARY WORLD puts it within the reach of all.

The LITERARY WORLD is now in its eighth year, and has won a high position among the literary authorities of America. It is the only monthly periodical in the country devoted exclusively to books, is comprehensive in its views of current literature, and absolutely independent in its judgments. Its usefulness to all who are interested in literature is conclusively shown by the following testimonials from the most eminent literary judges.

We do not know of any publication that gives so much valuable information and honest criticism of books in so compact and cheap form as this. It deserves a wide circulation, and all interested in books and literature will find its perusal of great advantage.—Manchester (N. H.) Daily Mirror.

It is now a journal which neither the rest of the literary world, nor hardly any one else who is anybody of any consequence, can very well do without. Its purpose, plan, and preparation alike entitle it to a hearty and substantial welcome.—The South.

E. H. HAMES &amp; CO., Publishers, BOX 1153, BOSTON.

Specimen copies sent free.

FROTHINGHAM'S WORKS.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY. An Essay. Third Edition—Revised. Price $1.50.

"Nobody can peruse this book without respect for the learning, mental honesty and skill in the statement of his convictions, possessed by the author, and for the essential integrity and philanthropic tendency of his spirit."—Springfield Republican.

"A profoundly sincere book, the work of one who has read largely, studied thoroughly, reflected patiently. It is a model of scholarly culture and of finished and vigorous style."—Boston Globe.

THE CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION. For Sunday-schools and Homes. Price $1.00.

THE SAFEST CREED, AND OTHER DISCOURSES. 12mo, Cloth, $1.50.

Not "food for babes," but full of suggestion for earnest and thoughtful men.

STORIES FROM THE LIPS OF THE TEACHER. With Frontispiece. Cloth, $1.00.

"The Parables are so re-told as to absorb the attention of the reader, and to fasten upon the mind what the writer believes to have been the impression the Savior meant to convey. It is in style and thought a superior book, and will interest alike young and old."—Zion's Herald (Methodist).

STORIES OF THE PATRIARCHS. With Frontispiece. Cloth, $1.00.

"A work of culture and taste; it will be welcome to all ages, and gives the sublimest lessons of manhood in the simple language of a child."—Springfield Republican.

BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS. A Lecture. 12mo, Paper, 25 cents.

TRANSCENDENTALISM IN NEW ENGLAND. A History. With sketches and studies of Emerson, Alcott, Parker, Margaret Fuller, the Brook-Farm Community, etc. 8vo, Cloth extra, with steel portrait of the author, $2.50.

THE LIFE OF THEODORE PARKER. 8vo. With Portrait, $3.00.

The New York Tribune closes a tour and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

THE CRADLE OF THE CHRIST. A Study in Primitive Christianity, illustrating the prime importance of the Messianic idea in the New Testament, as the key to the development of Christianity from Judaism. Octavo, Cloth, $1.75.

Mailed, post-paid, on receipt of price, by THE INDEX, 231 Washington St., Boston.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE INDEX

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE. For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!*CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE 231 Washington Street, Boston.

CIRCULATE IT*EVERYWHERE!

The new Liberal League Tract of 24 pages, entitled,

"PATRIOTIC ADDRESS,"

contains:

1. PATRIOTIC ADDRESS of the National Liberal League to the people of the United States.
2. CHIEF RESOLUTIONS of the League.
3. PROTEST of the League against shutting the International Exhibition on Sundays.
4. CONSTITUTION and List of Officers.
5. EXTRACTS from Approving Letters by Distinguished Citizens.

This is the Liberal's best CAMPAIGN DOCUMENT in the great impending contest over amending the Constitution of the United States with reference to the school question. It should be in the hands of EVERY VOTER, and has been published expressly for gratuitous distribution by earnest friends of State Secularization.

WHOLE No. 407.

CALL FOR THE FIRST ANNUAL CONGRESS OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Boston, Sept. 25, 1877.

In obedience to the Constitution of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July First to July Fourth, 1876, the Directors hereby issue a call for the FIRST ANNUAL CONGRESS of the League, to be held at Rochester, N. Y., October 26, 27, and 28, 1877. The best Hall in the city is engaged for those days. Further particulars, including list of speakers, etc., will be announced hereafter. For information respecting cheap hotel accommodation, reduced fares, etc., apply without delay to Mr. H. L. GREEN, Salamanca, N. Y.

After the hearing of reports and election of officers for the ensuing year, the most important business of the convention will be to decide whether the National Liberal League shall adopt a political platform and nominate candidates for the Presidential election of 1880; and, if so, whether this platform shall advocate the following principles and measures, to wit:—

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, etc.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

In order to give to this First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League the representative character befitting the gravity of the questions which will come before it for decision, the Directors suggest and earnestly recommend to the liberals of the United States that they immediately organize themselves throughout the country in Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, each of which, on receipt of a charter, will be entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other members as DELEGATES. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay. Charters are indispensable to secure the unity of organization without which efficient coöperation is impossible; but Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues remain absolutely independent, and recognize no authority in the National League to control their action in any particular. The small fee of ten dollars (which will surely be grudged by no one) is only desired in order to help defray the necessary expenses involved in the conventions and other public work of the National League, which has no salaried officers. Life-memberships of twenty-five dollars, annual memberships of one dollar, and voluntary donations, will also be gladly received for these public purposes. Time presses; and it is hoped that hundreds of new Local Leagues will be organized forthwith. Any existing Liberal society can be represented in the convention by applying for and receiving a charter in the usual way, and transmitting to the Secretary a certified copy of the following vote:—

"Voted, That this society, desiring to coöperate with the National Liberal League in the furtherance of its general and specific objects, hereby declares itself a Local Auxiliary Liberal League, according to the true intent of the Constitution of said National Liberal League, and has duly elected the following persons to represent it at the next Annual Congress of the same; to wit, —, —, —, —."

Persons desiring full information respecting the history, principles, and objects of the National Liberal League, in the shape of a closely printed book of 190 octavo pages, can obtain it by sending for Equal Rights in Religion: Report of the Centennial Congress of Liberals. Price (reduced), in advance, paper covers, 75 cents; handsomely bound in cloth, $1.00.

Address the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

By order of the Directors of the National Liberal League:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.

WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

GLIMPSES.

MR. EDWIN P. WHIPPLE, in his new memoir of Thomas Starr King, remarks: "To many of our present young students, 'exegesis' practically means 'exit Jesus.'"

THE SPRINGFIELD Republican, announcing the proposed platform of the Rochester Congress, says: "They are very much mistaken if this platform will not some time need attention."

A MEETING of the Boston Liberal League will be held Friday evening, Oct. 12, at 7½ o'clock, at No. 383 Washington Street, Room 9 (opposite Franklin Street), to elect delegates to the Rochester Congress.

A CHARTER has just been issued to another new Local Auxiliary Liberal League, at Palmyra, N. Y. The officers are J. M. Jones, President; C. C. Everson, Secretary; Henry M. North, Treasurer. The following persons have been elected as delegates to the Rochester convention: John M. Jones, Joseph Fritts, Samuel Cosad, Lewis B. Keeler, and A. R. Sherman. Numerous other Leagues are reported as about to organize.

SIGNATURES to the Religious Freedom Amendment petition of the National Liberal League have been received as follows since our last acknowledgment: from Miss M. Augusta Kellogg and others, Hyde Park, Mass., 139; from Mr. Walter Walker, P. M., Farmington, Utah, 42; from Mr. C. A. Seckler, Perry, Iowa (in addition to 53 formerly reported), 13; from Mrs. Almira L. Tracy, Peterboro, N. Y., 120. Total thus far acknowledged—8,366.

INFORMATION is sent from Rochester that delegates to the approaching convention of the National Liberal League will be entertained at the hotels in that city at the reduced price of two dollars a day. Negotiations with the railroad companies are also making for excursion tickets from New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Chicago, Cincinnati, and Cleveland; and the arrangements, when completed, will be announced. Mr. Green writes: "All things look well. We shall have a very large Congress—you can be sure of that."

DELANCEY CRITTENDEN, Esq., of Rochester, N. Y., informs us that a local Committee of Reception has been appointed by the friends of the National Liberal League in that city. He writes: "I would refer all you can to the Brackett House,—one of the best and most centrally located." A letter from the managers of the Brackett House puts the rates for members of the Congress down to $2.00 a day. Mr. Green also writes: "There is no doubt that good boarding-houses will take people at $1.00 a day, and many liberals will open their houses free." The thanks of the Directors are due for the hearty and efficient coöperation of the local friends of the Congress.

A RECENT ISSUE of the New York Times says: "The ministers of the gospel, who held a meeting to-day, so far forgot their calling as to gloat over the downfall of Morton, because he opened the gates of the Exhibition on Sunday. The Rev. Dr. E. H. Nevins said that when he heard the intelligence he felt a joy somewhat like the children of Israel, who, after they passed through the Red Sea, looked back on Pharaoh who did not get through. The Rev. Dr. W. O. Johnstone said that although one man had fallen by the hand of God, the Ministerial Union would show themselves very recreant if they took no further steps in the matter. The Rev. George W. McLaughlin said this was the time for those who believe in Jesus Christ to stand up fairly on the question. Suppose one man falls and another occupies his place, does that change the purpose of the corporation? This is about a fair sample of the manner in which the ministers of Philadelphia demeaned themselves to-day, instead of taking the fallen brother by the hand."

IN ADDITION to the speakers mentioned last week, we are now encouraged to hope that Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Mr. William J. Potter may be present at the Rochester Congress. Mrs. Stanton writes: "Most gladly would I be with you to take part in the discussion of those vital principles of republican government announced in your 'Call,' if my regular lyceum engagements do not interfere. From the first of October to the last of May, I cannot promise any day with certainty; but I may be near Rochester the last of this month, and, if I can, I will attend the Congress." Mr. Potter writes, after mentioning private reasons that may possibly prevent his attendance: "I want to go very much. The proposed political platform, whether adopted or not (and I am by no means sure that the time is not ripe for it), brings up very important principles which must ensure interesting and serious discussion—a discussion I should like to hear, if not take part in. The point of national protection for national citizens is especially attractive. It has long seemed to me an outrage and a shame that the federal government cannot protect by the Constitution its citizens from gross injustice and abuse." Hon. Ellizur Wright, of Boston, if unable to be present, promises to send a paper on "Republican Taxation," especially with reference to the taxation of church property; and Mr. Theron C. Leland, of New York city, will read a paper on "Organization." Many others who have been invited still remain to be heard from. P. S.—Hon. Geo. W. Julian, of Indiana, writes: "I may be able to arrange matters so as to attend, but it will be uncertain." Rabbi Max Landsberg, of Rochester, will give an address.

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

God is King.

EXTRACTS FROM A SERMON BY REV. HUNTINGDON LYMAN, OF THANOLE, N. Y.

TEXT.—The Lord is our Judge; the Lord is our Law-giver; the Lord is our King.—Isaiah xxxiii., 22.

I have in hand a theme which comes to you less in your character of parishioners than in that of patriots.

The hour of achievement was the fit hour for grateful acknowledgment. Was it possible, then, when the grace was so fresh, to forget God, whose hand had wrought for us on both sides of the sea? Alas! so it was. Forgetfulness was the plea. When Dr. Rodgers expressed his grief, on meeting Hamilton, that the name of God was not in the Constitution, he replied, "Indeed, Doctor, we forgot it." The guilt of forgetfulness is not so flagrant as would have been design, premeditation; yet in view of the doom impending over "all the nations that forget God" the substitution affords very imperfect relief. If ingratitude be mitigated, danger remains. Still, the anomalous fact meets us,—God has no standing in our Constitution.

We have good citizens who, upon the whole, regret the omission, yet are blind to the consequences which now, like meteoric disturbances forecasting the earthquake, are looming and flashing around. The rude shock is at hand which must open all eyes to see the excellent service which a few words inserted in our supreme law, acknowledging Jesus in the dignity which our text asserts for him, would have rendered. At what disadvantage would those few words have placed all that nefarious array, who are conventing and resolving and vociferating, intent by hue and cry to eject God and all tradition of his agency and authority from the political domain.

If the plea of forgetfulness may extenuate the omission of God from the Constitution, credulity is burdened beyond its strength when asked to accept that plea for the omission of God from the oath. The most elementary idea of an oath makes it an appeal to something higher and holier than the heart from which it issues. But the oath prescribed for our highest officers springs from themselves and returns to themselves, and there ends. Like Noah's dove, it goes forth, but finding nothing upon which to alight, comes back to the ark. It is virtually this: I swear to support the Constitution; I will upon honor. He who believes that this nullity was enacted without a clear perception of its character, has an inadequate idea of the astuteness of the men of the time. It is not necessary to suppose that the chief part of the Congress were cognizant of the chicanery. An engineer may as readily be supposed to project a bridge into the air, forgetting to provide an abutment for the other end.

The jugglers of India astonish the spectators in the arena by throwing one end of a rope high in the air while they hold fast the other end. Presently an elephant appears walking slowly down the sloping rope, then another, then another. The great interests of our country are elephants that pass over a way of equal peril on like equivocal support. This is blasphemy, for it is a mockery of that solemn rite instituted by the command, "Thou shalt swear by his name."

Still, well-meaning men will say "our land is Christian if it be not so nominated in the bond," and it will be no more Christian if the oath be recovered from its absurdity, or if Jesus be named in the capacity of Supreme Ruler, while a move to mend the law will arouse all Jewry and all Pandemonium to battle array.

Dear conservators of peace! The news of last year has not reached you yet. Your caution does credit neither to your courage nor your intelligence. While you are practising a velvet tread lest you disquiet the sleepers, Jewry and Pandemonium are alert and rampant. Strong bulls have beset your camp. Listen, and you shall hear them roar out of Bashan and thunder from Edom.

I have before me the proceedings of the "Liberal League" which was in session on the fourth of July, 1876, at Philadelphia. It seems you did not know that you are upon the defensive. Read the papers. Our failure to acknowledge God in our organic law returns upon us this day in alarming reaction in the shape of assaulting Philistines, and in the loom of indefinite evil impending. That sad omission first made a pretext for the retraction of our Christianity in a public transaction with Tripoli, a Mohammedan power in 1797. "We are not a Christian nation," said Mr. Morris in a deprecating tone. That chicanery secured for us a treaty! Peter denied his Christianity from fear,—we from policy.

The President of the League is a man who gives special prominence to the position that he is not a Christian in fact or in sympathy. The Vice-Presidents are Atheists, Jews, Spiritists, with a mingling of Reverends. The proceedings are given with a manly frankness as follows, all witnessing that Christianity has no confessions in that fraternity:—

EXTRACTS FROM THE RESOLUTIONS.

"All American citizens possess an equal right to enjoy for seven days of the week all public libraries, art galleries, museums, parks, gardens, thoroughfares, or other institutions or facilities for the support of which they are taxed.

"The State secularization question can never be got out of politics until it is settled forever by being settled right.

"Other things being equal, we will vote for such candidates as favor this object and withhold our votes from such as oppose it.

"All religious exercises should be prohibited in the public schools; . . . and to allow in these schools the present practice of Bible-reading, prayer, and singing of religious hymns, or the use of text-books which are so written as to inculcate religious dogmas of any kind, is a great moral wrong to large classes of citizens.

"We deny emphatically the right of the President to issue a civil proclamation of any religious fast or festival; . . . and we protest against the recent proclamation of President Grant inviting the people to celebrate the fourth of July by religious observances.

"The closing of the International Exhibition on Sunday is a fresh usurpation of political power by the Church, . . . and a monstrous denial of the religious equality of all citizens who disbelieve in the alleged sacred character of Sunday.

"The conversion of the United States government into a missionary society by the present administration which has made it an avowed object to 'Christianize the Indians' is another encroachment on the principle of secular government.

"The stamping of the inscription 'In God we trust' on the national coinage is analogous to striking the stars from the national flag and inserting the cross in their stead, or throwing down the statue of Liberty from the national capitol and setting up that of the Virgin Mary in its place, and such encroachments on the secular character of the government should call forth the loud and swift rebuke of an outraged people."

The League receives from the Michigan State Association of Spiritists its "able and earnest statement, and tenders thanks for its assurance of cooperation."

It resolves that "we regard the bust of Thomas Paine, now on our platform, executed in marble by Sidney H. Morse for presentation to the city, as a noble and fit testimonial of his heroic and patriotic public career." The sentiments that I shall further quote are those of the President and editor of the League, and are constructively theirs since with full knowledge of his views they elected him to the chief dignity in their gift. [The preacher quoted at length the Demands of Liberalism which are familiar to our readers.]

It is pretty easy to understand these Demands in the main. The churches must be taxed. This they could well afford, if a fair return were made to them for the education imparted by them in which the rich and the poor participate. A school is maintained in every church. It has been thought decorous to acknowledge God daily in the halls of legislation, and chaplains have been invited to lead in the observance. Chaplains have been sent out with our armies, charged with the duty of ministering to the dying and of caring for the living. It has been thought good for the welfare of society to shut chaplains in with our prisoners, that they may be reformed and saved. It has been thought that the oath appealing to God was conservative of the rights of property, life, and justice. All this is obnoxious to the liberals, and they demand that the oath be abolished, the reference to God found on our coins be erased, thanksgivings be suppressed, the hymns which the little ones sing in our schools be silenced, chaplains be discharged from prisons, navies, and legislative halls, and that "our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis, and that whatever changes shall be found necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made." While these Demands are frank and plain, a shadow of ambiguity rests upon the single phrase that makes against "Christian morality," and require that "all laws be conformed to the requirements of natural morality." Who knows precisely what natural morality is? The Feejee people, when in their natural condition, might have afforded examples. But Christian morality has latterly made such inroads even among them, that it would be difficult to find natural morality in virgin Inadmixture even in Feejee. According to the scheme, natural morality is by-and-by to be brought into law, when doubtless it will be defined. It is no idle pruriency that makes the demand for a definition; it might savor of cynicism, therefore, to discourage it.

A scrutiny of the proceedings, has, I think, been rewarded by a discovery of the thing as it presents itself to the President of the League. An episode in their proceedings, please remember, afforded an opportunity for laudation, evoked by the bust of Thomas Paine which stood before them. Call to mind the terms of panegyric in which they recalled his excellent qualities. Here is our clue. Those who have had access to an ampler biography of this remarkable man, have observed that while practising a broad morality, no tinge of Christian morality obtrudes. We follow him from his home in England, through all his toils in this country,—in his transactions with the Congress of that day, and with the men of Revolutionary times in scenes of social and domestic life (for he maintained what, for lack of a graphic word, we call domestic); and then we follow him to France, admiring the unbroken consistency of his entire course. He realizes what in geologic science is known "a prophetic specimen" prefiguring the mode that is to be. Indeed, not the President himself, nor any member of the League, can excel him as a model of natural morality, nor need they desire it. And this it is that has secured to him his post-mortuary fame.

Christian morality has much in common with the Ten Commandments. Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not bear false witness,—or covet. The President of the League is on record against morality of this sort, and the life of this hero comes up to his ideal. Here, then, in the life of Paine, we have an object-lesson defining this occult phrase natural morality. His morality sums up his whole conspicuity. No instructed man is so fond, certainly, as to suppose that if Paine had been a devotee of Christian morality, that anything in his history would have attracted to him any favor from the body who have indorsed him. When the qualities of "patriotism" and "heroism" are attributed to Paine, nothing in his life corresponds to the significance which those terms define when applied to Adams or Henry, and those who knew him think they must start off to find some cabalistic or pick-wickian sense in which the history of the subject and the eulogy of the League may harmonize. They need not search so far. The same adjective that qualifies his morality will solve all questions. Natural heroism, natural patriotism, and natural morality were the distinctive features of Thomas Paine.

To say that success to the League is impossible, is to contradict facts that have already passed into history. In several seats of influence—great cities—partial success alights upon their banners. . . . All this presents the surface-aspect only. The scope of operation is far deeper than yet appears. A few pregnant words cover a meaning that reaches down to the deepest foundations of society, and if carried out will destroy it. Look at these words:—

"Our entire political system shall be founded upon a purely secular basis, and whatever changes shall be found necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made."

No civilized community has ever stood upon such a basis as is here proposed; nor can it. I pronounce that that theory put in practice, not only destroys all religion but all science. Every advanced study in our schools must be cancelled when that rule obtains. But the writer of these words meant all that they mean, as is witnessed by the acrimony with which he strikes at any phrase in which the name of God occurs. Upon some of our coins is stamped the legend, "In God we trust." What a spasm and what an outflow of virus did that little phrase provoke in the League!

The decree quoted above will require that every sentence found in our school-books that suggests the being or agency of God shall be expunged. Indeed, the work is begun and advanced. The Bible is interdicted in the schools of New York, Chicago, Rochester, and I know not how many other cities; and while I preach, the following action has been taken in Chicago: the physical geography of Guyot, which stands in the first rank of school-books, has been proscribed by the Board of Education in Chicago, because it teaches this "sectarian dogma," that the Creator organized this world upon a plan. These are the objectionable words: "The conclusion is irresistible,—that the entire globe is a grand organism, every feature of which is the outgrowth of a definite plan of the all-wise Creator," etc. Let it be carefully noted that the theory against which the Chicago censors of expurgation level their artillery, is not a religious dogma but a scientific result. Mr. Guyot had gone over every latitude of the earth's surface for his data, and in the end he states his conclusion. His result is sectarian in the same sense as Mr. Tyndall's, who, after laborious experiments, concludes by saying, "Heat is a mode of motion," thereby contradicting the ancient dictum, "Heat is latent caloric brought out," or Hulton's plutonic theory against the neptunian, concerning the origin of rocks. The action at Chicago then goes to this absurd extent, that no scientific result must be stated in schools if it happens to coincide with theistic belief.

But we have not reached bottom yet. When the new statutes shall appear that enforce this scheme, we shall read

"Be it enacted, it shall not be lawful for teacher or pupils in anatomy while studying the eye to talk about wisdom and contrivance, because by implication the idea of a person who is wise and contriving is suggested thereby.

"It shall be unlawful for any teacher to affirm that the ultimate condition of matter is atomic, and that the atoms are uniform in shape and size, because the pupils will be led to think that this could not have happened without personal agency. It shall be unlawful to teach or to say that milk was designed to nourish the calf. In history it shall be unlawful to say that such a man was raised up for the occasion; or, that one event prepared the way for a succeeding one, on account of the dangerous implication hidden under the word prepared. Nor shall it be taught that one event in history is intelligently related to any other event. For obvious reasons it shall be unlawful to teach the class in geology that there were beginnings to the various races of vegetable or animal life, or that there were any such things as 'prophetic species,' as geologists profanely teach, etc. Do not teach that salt, marble, coal, gold, or anything else was stored up in the earth for future use. Do not teach that the breaking up of the earth's crust was intended to make the deposits accessible."

The teacher may affirm "things are as they are"; or, that "it so happened." Yes, my hearers, these changes in the schools are to be "consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made."

I trust that it is seen that education, as the term is popularly understood, is impossible under this regimen. . . . Let it be understood that no wisdom, power, intent, design, nor adaptation is to be found in chemistry, anatomy, geology, or in any work above human achievement, and the human mind is so constituted that it will revolt against application. It cannot be drawn to those studies. For my own part I would as soon study Radford's Annals of the Silurian Oyster-beds, in seven quarto volumes, with copious foot-notes, wood-cuts, and appendix, as to study history under these conditions.

The Lord, because we have forgotten him, has allowed this murky menace to confront us. What shall we do? Put in our Constitution the words of our text, "THE LORD IS OUR JUDGE; THE LORD IS OUR LAW-GIVER; THE LORD IS OUR KING."—Philadelphia Christian Statesman, Sept. 6.

RENAN'S GOSPELS.

PARIS, Aug. 22, 1877.

M. Ernest Renan has added a fifth volume to his History of the Origins of Christianity. After the Life of Jesus, the Apostles, Saint Paul, the Anti-christ, he gives us the Evangelists,* and informs his readers that, as he could not exhaust the difficult subject of the authorship of the Gospels in one volume, the series will therefore include a sixth volume. There is something truly admirable in the serenity of Renan; he continues his researches and his studies as quietly as a Benedictine monk: impavidum ferient ruinae. Not that he is indifferent to the misfortunes of his time and of his country; he has shown in his Réforme Intellectuelle et Morale de la France that he can feel as well as think; but Nature has given him a sweet and calm disposition, a great simplicity of heart and an almost childlike faculty of curiosity, which preserves him from melancholy and sadness. He, besides, discovered long ago that intellectual labor is the great, perhaps the only, remedy against acute mental sufferings. The astronomer who studies the movements of a double star is, for a while, far away from the present; so are the historian and the critic. The traveller, says Boileau, cannot escape his own thoughts:

"Le chagrin monte en croupe et galope avec lui."

Travelling is too easy. The same can hardly be said of Renan's favorite science of exegesis. To all the difficulties of positive science, of grammar, of philology, of history, you must add the peculiar difficulties of what I can only call the science of religions,—a science which is almost new, and which tends to discover the laws of the development of religious ideas, of the creation of dogmas, of the embryogeny of myths and their transformations, of the relations between the characters of the various human races and the spontaneous growth of the religious instinct in different directions.

Renan has always been guided, since his earliest studies, by this fundamental idea; viz., that the Semitic races had a peculiar fitness for religion. His study of the Semitic languages is the corner-stone of all his work. He likes the society of naturalists and of scientific men generally, and it is probably in the society of such men that he has learned to classify everything; he has tried, at any rate, to classify the human races, in point of their religious dispositions and, if I may say so, of their religious affinities. Nothing, in this respect, is more admirable than the contrast which he draws in this new volume between the Roman world, still in possession of the political supremacy, and the embryonic Christian world, still unknown and merged in the despised Jewish community. Let us consider a moment the situation of the Jews after the destruction of the Temple. Nothing was left of their institutions; Pharisaism alone survived the Temple; but Pharisaism had no life,—it was the blindest form of obedience to the law. Israel became more exclusive than ever. Jerusalem was a heap of stones. The Jews spread themselves in the towns and villages which were between the mountains of Judea and the sea. The Christians had been as much surprised as the Jews when the Temple was destroyed; they looked upon this misfortune as the chastisement for the condemnation of Christ. They expected that Christ would soon reappear, and kept faithfully the tradition of his teachings. The nearest disciples called themselves ebionim, or Ebionites. Christ had said: "Happy are the ebionim." There are many passages in the Old Testament where ebion represents the saints of Israel, the humble, despised of men, beloved of God. This chosen congregation of the ebionim lived in Bashan; their neighbors called them Nazarenes, as it was known that Christ and his family were from Nazareth. All over the East the Christians have to this day been known under this name. These early Christians were not the enemies of the old law; they celebrated the Sabbath as well as Sunday, and followed all the prescriptions of the law. Jesus was considered by them as the chosen of God, but as a man; their churches were called synagogues. These churches of Bashan and of Galilee (for the ebionim were allowed to return even to Jerusalem after a while) were in constant relations with the Jews. These Nazarenes did not give Christianity its final character; but they had one privilege,—they had the true tradition of the words of Christ; and the Gospel was born among them in its definitive form.

This question of the Gospels is the great problem of exegesis:—

"While the origin of the fourth Gospel," says Renan, "attributed to St. John, remains enveloped in mystery, in a corresponding degree the hypotheses on the mode of composition of the so-called synoptic Gospels have attained a high degree of probability. There have been, in reality, three sorts of Gospels: 1st, the original or first-hand Gospels, composed solely from oral tradition, and without any anterior text before the author's eyes (in my opinion there were two of this kind: one written in Hebrew, or rather in Syriac, now lost, but many fragments of which have been kept, translated in Greek or in Latin by Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, St. Jerome, etc.; the other in Greek, written by St. Mark); 2d, the Gospels which are partly original, partly second-hand, made by combining anterior texts and oral traditions (like the Gospel falsely attributed to the Apostle Matthew, and the Gospel composed by Luke); 3d, the Gospels of second or third-hand, coolly composed by the aid of written documents, and whose authors drew by no living root upon tradition (such was the Gospel of Marcion, and such the Gospels called apocryphal, taken from the canonic Gospels and amplified)."

I have given here the condensed form of Renan's opinion, based on the most complex and elaborate criticism.

The life of Jesus had not been written in his lifetime; his sayings were confided to the memory of his disciples, and it was only after a while that some of them were written. Many collections of the words of Jesus were made, and these collections became the framework of the Gospels. The biographies came afterwards; they were made up partly of these sayings, transmitted by tradition and confided to memory, partly of the Messianic prophecies which had to be satisfied. They had something solid and something elastic at the same time; this pliability explains partly the differences of the various Gospels. The tissue of the life of Christ was composed of all the facts which were in accordance with ancient texts. Such a work was neither personal nor conscious; the Gospels became, in one sense, the unconscious work of the believers; they existed before they were written; they were preserved in the heart before they were painted on parchment.

According to M. Renan, the first attempt to delineate completely the life of Jesus was made in Babylon, and the first Gospel was written there in Syro-Chaldaic. The Gospel, though first conceived in a Semitic language, found its perfect form in the Greek language. Only such a language could hold the proper proportion of materialism and spiritualism, could give the proper mould to a purely ideal doctrine.

"The Epistles of St. Paul would not have won for Jesus a hundred disciples. What conquered the hearts was the Gospel; that delicious mixture of poetry and of moral sense, that narrative which floats between fantasy and reality, in a paradise where time is not measured. Some allowance must be made in the success of the Gospel for the astonishment caused among our stolid (lourdes) races by the strange charm of the Semitic narration, by those clever arrangements of sentences and of speeches, by those conclusions (chutes) so happy, so serene, so full of cadence. More was needed, however, in order that the Gospel should become among all nations what it is, the old family book whose worn leaves have been wet with tears and marked with the finger of many generations. The literary fortune of Jesus is explained by Jesus himself. He was, so to speak, the author of his own biography."

The proto-Gospel, written in Syro-Chaldaic, was preserved until the fifth century among the Nazarenes of Syria; it was translated into Greek. All the Fathers of the Church were struck with the resemblance of this Hebraic Gospel to the Gospel of St. Matthew. The Hebraic text disappeared with the destruction of the Judeo-Christians of Syria. The translations were equally lost, and we know it now only by the numerous citations of the Fathers. The characteristic traits of this proto-Gospel were as follows: the virginal birth of Christ was not a part of it; the supernatural element was, however, very prominent. In this respect especially does it resemble the Gospel of St. Mark. The apparitions of Jesus after the resurrection all take place in Jerusalem; the Apostle James, of Jerusalem, plays a more important part than in the following Gospels. Jesus makes his first apparition in the house of his brother and for him alone.

The Greek churches received their Gospel from Mark, the disciple of Peter. Mark knew some of the men who saw the drama of the last days of Jesus. He accompanied Peter to Rome, and it was probably in that city that he wrote the pages which became the first Greek Gospel. Peter hardly knew the Greek language, and the Gospel of Mark was written after his death; still, Peter may be looked upon as the inspirer of this Gospel. As an historical document this Gospel stands first. Peter was dry, narrow, and hard, but realistic and exact.

"It can hardly be denied," says Renan, "that Jesus appears in this Gospel, not as the delicious moralist whom we love but as a terrible magician. The sentiment which he chiefly inspires in those about him is fear; the terror inspired by his prodigies is such that people beg him to leave their frontiers. It must not be concluded from this that the Gospel of Mark is less historical than the others; on the contrary, things which shock us exceedingly were to Christ and his immediate disciples of the first importance. The Roman world was, even more than the Jewish world, the dupe of these illusions. . . . The Gospel of Mark is less a legend than a biography written by a credulous man."

As the Gospels of Matthew and Luke arose from a mere revision of the Gospel of Mark, this last assumes an extraordinary importance. Its characteristic trait is the absence of any genealogy of Christ and of any details regarding his infancy. It was, in all probability, written during the first years of calm which followed the war of Judea, when Mark was hardly more than fifty-five years old. Rome was then, after Syria, the most important centre of Christianity. Renan believes that Peter went to Rome; the church of this great capital became, so to speak, heir to the Church of Jerusalem. The spirit of traditional authority, of hierarchy, what may be called Judeo-Christianity, soon became dominant in the Church of Rome, Alexandria, Ephesus, Antioch, were not yet great Christian centres.

Vespasian had done his best to repair the evils of the reign of Nero. After him came Titus; under his mild rule the Christians of Rome lived in peace. Under the Flavian family the Christian communities became almost free; the relations between the disciples of Christ and the Gentiles were easy, and often friendly. In many cities there were two episcopi, one for the Christians of Jewish extraction, the other for the Christians of pagan origin. It was supposed that the second had been instituted by St. Paul, the first by some apostle of Jerusalem. Egypt received the germs of Christianity under the Flavians. A tradition will have it that Mark went to Alexandria; but the life of Mark is now better known; he went, as we said before, to Rome, and not to Alexandria.

The great defect of the Gospel of Mark is the abbreviation of the beautiful speeches of Christ. The men who had some knowledge of these speeches from the translations of the Hebraic Gospel naturally were inclined to introduce them into the Greek Gospel. The Gospel of Mark was thus completed and corrected. The author of the Gospel according to St. Matthew took for his basis the Gospel of Mark, followed it, and made interpolations. He introduced the long speeches which gave so much charm to the Hebraic Gospel, and he added also some traditions which were the creations of the times. The Sermon on the Mount was thus added, as well as the reproaches addressed at various times to the Pharisees, and many parables. This work of interpolation was done without much art, and many repetitions are the consequence of this carelessness. The legends which found their way into the new gospel were the genealogy; the supernatural birth; the visit of the Magi; the flight into Egypt; the massacre at Bethlehem; Peter walking on the waters; his pre-rogatives; the suicide of Judas; Pilate's washing his hands; the prodigies at the death of Christ; and a few others. The new Gospel was exquisite, in a literary point of view. "It is," says Renan, "the masterpiece of popular literature, and in one sense the most ancient popular work ever written."—Nation.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE NATION.

THE RELATION OF CHRISTIAN MORALITY TO OUR HIGHER SOCIAL AND PUBLIC LIFE.

The following report, drawn by the Rev. Dr. Miner on the preamble and resolutions presented by him to the Massachusetts Convention of Universalists a year ago, was made to the body September 20 at its session in the city of Worcester, and after a protracted discussion was adopted by a large vote:—

The undersigned were made a committee at the session in 1876 to consider and report upon the following preamble and resolutions:—

WHEREAS, The character and continued prosperity of a nation depends in a large measure upon the pervading presence and power of Christianity; and whereas the influence of Christianity upon our social and civil institutions is threatened from manifold sources,—from Romish bigotry, assailing our public school system and laboring to advance the dominion of the Pope; from irrational scepticism and secularism in government, seeking to abrogate Sunday laws, abolish chaplaincies from every department of the civil service, and eliminate Christian morality from our statute books; from the ignorant greed and inconsiderate good nature that would tax our churches and our educational and charitable institutions for the support of government, at the same time sanctioning those criminal enterprises that flood a commonwealth with every form of woe, thus in two ways repressing its noblest life; from the ever-swelling tides of incongruous immigrants, threatening to become millions, especially from the distant East, where heretofore they have been but thousands; and from the time-serving policy of our political parties,—therefore,

Resolved, That every Christian patriot is most imperatively called upon to do everything in his power to conserve our higher social life, to assimilate to the genius of our institutions all classes of our population, and to perpetuate and intensify the power of Christianity in the usages, the morality, and the laws, both civil and criminal, of our governments.

Resolved, That since the silence of our fundamental law is being construed as a rejection of Christianity as a source of national strength and prosperity, giving countenance to the claims that our government should be made entirely secular, we heartily sympathize with the aims of the National Reform Association in seeking a legal recognition of God and his government.

Resolved, That we deeply regret the disposition of our governments to sanction the drink traffic by law, and the demand from certain sources that our church, educational and charitable institutions shall be taxed to relieve our communities of the burden.

Your committee have carefully considered the subject presented to them, and submit the following report:—

1. Christianity is the pervading life of a healthy State. All civilized nations have derived their strength from it, and have found themselves, in any emergency, weak in proportion as its principles were absent.

2. Convinced of this truth, the various States and kingdoms of Christendom have commonly allied themselves with some particular Church, seeing no other way of allying themselves to Christianity itself.

3. States and nations which have not maintained government churches, especially the States of our own Union, have commonly recognized, in the most explicit manner, the truth of Christianity in their respective constitutions. They have also extended impartial encouragement to all churches by exempting their property from taxation. Wherever systems of public schools have been established, instruction in Christian morality, excluding all sectarianism, has been emphatically enjoined.

4. Born of this conviction of the dependence of the State upon the principles of Christianity is the whole body of Sunday laws, arresting the world of traffic which by the laws of business must in every community be continued or suspended in gross, and not a little else of what goes to make up the criminal code of our several commonwealths.

5. The foregoing facts taken in connection with the usages of our several State and national governments, from the beginning, in appointing Fast and Thanksgiving days, and establishing chaplaincies by law in all our legislative bodies and penal institutions, show that ours is, and was intended to be, a Christian nation.

6. This method of reaching the result is a wholesome mean between two extremes; viz., a union of the State with some particular church on one hand, and an elimination of all the principles of Christianity from our government and laws on the other hand. By the means above referred to and the like of them, the State seeks, not to patronize the Christian religion, but to preserve to itself its life-giving power. It gives a general welcome to all Christian endeavor, presuming that all sincere Christian effort contributes directly to the general stock of morality in the community, and indirectly to the permanence and purity of our civil institutions.

7. As related to this subject our general government presents one glaring inconsistency; namely, utter silence in our fundamental law touching the claims of that religion, the truth of which we assume and legislate upon in various subordinate domains of law. On this silence rests the assumption that the fathers intended to make the government purely secular, and those who so interpret their design claim that every element of Christianity in our government, whether in law or usage, should be removed. State constitutions should be altered to conform to the national Constitution. Chaplaincies in every department of the government should be abolished. All Sunday laws should be repealed. Criminal statutes punishing departures from Christian morality should be no longer maintained, and the State should be content to rest on mere natural morality, whatever that may prove to be. The Bible, they claim, should be rejected from the public schools.

The "Liberal League," at its session in Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, adopted among their resolutions the following:—

"All religious exercises should be prohibited in the public schools, . . . and to allow in these schools the present practice of Bible-reading, prayer, and singing of religious hymns, or the use of text-books, which are so written as to inculcate religious dogmas of any kind, is a great moral wrong to a large class of citizens."

It will hence appear that all scientific works which recognize design in creation, or hint at the being of a God, are a "great moral wrong." If anything more were requisite to show the radical and consistent character of the anti-Christian demand, it will be found in the denunciation of President Grant for his recommendation that the 4th of July be religiously observed and his attempt to Christianize the Indians, and of the "treach usurpation of political power by the Church in closing the International Exhibition on Sunday."

It is also claimed that churches should be taxed like all other property, and Paganism, Mohammedanism, Judaism, Mormonism, Atheism, and Christianity should be placed on precisely the same level.

8. These several positions are deduced from the fundamental assumption that our fathers intended to establish, and that we ought to complete the establishment of, a purely secular government. On the contrary, it does not appear that anything more was meant by the fathers than equal toleration of all Christian sects, thereby giving broadest play to all Christian effort, and securing the largest practicable measure of Christian influence in and upon the government itself. It is not denied that freethinking was rife with some of the leading men of Congress when the Constitution was adopted. It is not necessary to assume anything touching the purpose of those who drew that instrument. But it is inconceivable, in the light of the facts, that in adopting the instrument thus drawn, or however drawn, Congress and the several States understood themselves thereby to reject every vestige of Christianity from our organic life, or to put Christianity itself in any measure under ban as a life-giving function of the State. The known opinions of the country a hundred years ago; the current usages of the governments in appointing Fast and Thanksgiving days continued ever since; the current maintenance of chaplaincies in legislatures and prisons, and, especially the universality, then and now, of Sunday laws, as well as laws punishing unchastity and infidelity to the marriage vow, particularly characterizing the influence of Christianity upon our social state, all show that the adoption of our Constitution could not have been understood to be a declaration of mere secularism in government. A suspicion that such was the meaning of the instrument would have filled the land with controversy and led to the indignant rejection of the proffered Constitution.

9. Starting with this mistaken premise, the secularist reasons that if the United States Constitution is silent touching God and Christianity, the several State constitutions should likewise be silent; and if our fundamental law, both State and national, should be silent, all laws made subordinate to these should be silent; hence all laws born of Christianity should be swept away.

10. It will now be seen that by recognizing God and Christianity in our fundamental law we remove the major premise of the secularist's reasoning, justify the Christian elements of our civil organisms, and preserve to the State the leavening and diffusive influence of Christian truth. Not a few of those who object to such recognition claim that we should continue the influence of Christian legislation and usage as at present existing. Can it be inexpedient to do confessedly and openly whatever it is wise to do at all? And who can say what value may not attach to the discussions requisite to secure this result?

11. Besides: the very problem to be resolved is, can we long perpetuate the influence of Christianity in our government and laws, if we allow the basis of the secularist's argument permanently to remain? If the attacks upon Christianity were broadly made and the fight were always an open one, and especially if the whole country, or an entire State even, were summoned to a simultaneous discussion, the issue would hardly be doubtful. But the attack is usually covertly made, upon some single element of the problem, touching its application in some city where adverse influences give hope of success; and when success is attained, it is pleaded as a precedent for like changes in other quarters. Our peculiar civil polity is especially favorable to this piecemeal destruction of what is most valuable in our organic life. The rivalries of political parties furnish the utmost facilities for success to the sinister and the intriguing; and the Roman Catholic Church, joining hands with Jews, Atheists, Rationalists, and the indifferent, has already carried some points and is vigorously assailing others. To meet these assaults intelligently we need to observe their family likenesses, and that they are all attacks upon the Christian elements of the State.

12. One of the more recent developments is the demand for the taxation of educational, charitable, and religious institutions, against which every consideration of State policy earnestly pleads. The work begun by the State, providing by taxation for the support of the poor and unfortunate and for the intellectual and moral training of the young, is carried forward by the voluntary sacrifices of Christian philanthropists in establishing higher institutions of learning, special instrumentalities of charity, and the various Christian churches as means of moral and religious culture. These voluntary contributions are in aid of the very ends which the State taxes its citizens to support. Strike these away, and increased taxation to supply the deficiency would become inevitable.

13. This is apparent on the face of the problem so far as respects education and charity. It is no less certain as respects morality and religion. There can be no abiding morality that is not born of Christian truth; and, without a high moral tone and the general prevalence of virtue in the community, there can be no success under free institutions. Sweep away these voluntary contributions and the State would necessarily replace them; to tax these voluntary contributions is so far to repress them; and to repress them is to overthrow the State. Such a policy is, to say the least, short-sighted and suicidal; and the extent to which the proposition has been entertained is one of the marvels of the age.

Were the policy of taxing such institutions determined on, there is no standard by which their valuation for the purpose could be estimated. Would you assess them at their cost? Such a rule applies to no other property in the State. Would you assess them according to the annual income or net profits they produce, as you do most other property? But they produce no net profits. They are neither established nor administered with any view to return in money. Would you assess them at what they would bring under a forced sale in the market-place? But under a forced sale in the market-place, conditioned to be maintained in their own proper character and at the same time pay a tax to the government, they would bring absolutely nothing. What rule of assessment would you adopt? The truth is, these institutions are established and maintained by citizens who voluntarily tax themselves therefor, with no aim at, or hope for, profitable returns, but from purely philanthropic motives, not less toward the State than toward individuals. To tax them is therefore to the last degree absurd.

14. Let it not be overlooked, however, that the maintenance of such institutions is not only conducive to public order, but is an enrichment of the State. Not only is property located in their immediate neighborhood enhanced in value, but the State in which they abound is the richer for their presence. But the enrichment accrues not to those who voluntarily tax themselves in their establishment and maintenance, but to the general public, placing in yet another light the folly of repressing them by taxation.

15. There is one objection to the perpetuity of the Christian character of our government much urged and worthy our consideration; viz., that it is an infringement of the rights of conscience of all those who reject Christianity. But what institution or proposition is there to which some conscience may not object? Reject Christianity, and the Jew is satisfied; but what of the atheist? Reject the being of a God, and the atheist is satisfied; but what of the Jew? Reject Christian morality, and the Mormon is satisfied; but what of the Christian? Reject any given scheme of philosophy, and all its opposers are satisfied; but what of its defenders? The truth is, neither we nor our fathers have entered on the insane policy of rejecting everything to which any conscience stands opposed. There are some consciences which need to be disciplined rather than pampered. The atheist should remember that it is as far from his house to ours as it is from ours to his.

16. The objection that the proposed amendment to the Constitution would render necessary a definition of Christianity and further legislation to secure the anticipated good is already answered by facts. Most of our States now have, and we think all of them originally had, constitutions equivalent in character to what is proposed for the United States; and not one of them has felt constrained either to define Christianity or to proceed to legislate toward any sectarian end. Until recently, Christianity has been held by all the courts to be a part of the common law of the land, with no adverse sectarian results; and the late counter-decisions, with the action of some States in striking such recognition of Christianity from their fundamental law, well illustrate the drift of the hour and the subtle mode of procedure. In concluding a treaty with Tripoli, a Mohammedan power, in 1797, the representative of our government said: "We are not a Christian nation." The people of the country generally think we are. Which of these opinions shall be sustained is the problem in hand.

The need of special Christian and patriotic effort to assimilate the "awelling tides of immigrants" to the genius of our institutions, is too apparent to require discussion; and the folly of repressing our better life by tolerating the drink traffic and other criminal enterprises has already so far arrested public attention as to justify a mere passing allusion to the matter in this connection.

Without protracting this report by the mention of many other appropriate considerations, your committee deem the foregoing sufficient to warrant them in recommending the adoption of both the preamble and resolutions.

BENJAMIN HALLOWELL.

A TRIBUTE TO HIS MEMORY—WORK AND CHARACTER OF THE PROFESSOR—HIS CONNECTION WITH THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

Several years ago, when Benjamin Hallowell was only a name to me, I was a guest at a beautiful home near Sandy Spring, the seat of the Montgomery Friends. My host, a prominent Marylander, was of the community, and I accompanied him one Sunday to the Quaker meeting-house, a rude, old-time, brick structure, in the margin of a primitive forest of considerable extent. Most of the congregation were in their places when we entered. I had hardly taken my seat when my attention was arrested by one of the most striking-looking men I have ever seen. Almost in front, facing me, on the raised platform against the wall with the elders, sat a man of seventy, of just less than gigantic mould, with a grand, massive head, scantily crowned with longish white hair, a lofty brow, and noble features bowed in reverential reverie, with closed eyes, with his shoulders above the heads of the common men about him, dwarfed to pygmies by his presence. I was not familiar with the leading names of the Friends, but knew I was looking at an extraordinary man. I glanced from him over the silent assembly of serene, silent men and women, and back at the noble form before me, in moulding which Nature had reverted to the great primitive type, which she now so rarely produces. The spirit and presence of the silent worship stole upon me.

It was a June morning, and the notes of thrushes and robins came to me from the surrounding forest. Suddenly little twittering sounds, like the first notes of a bird's song, fell on my ear, and I turned just as the form I so admired was rising. He rested his trembling hands on the back of the seat before him, with a little stoop in his shoulders, and a bending of the head, revealing deep-set, but very fine blue eyes. The voice was sweet, tender, and flute-like, a little monotonous, but could never have wearied. The sermon, if such it might be called, was a sort of lofty and beautiful chant. It was an expression of the depth, purity, and peace of that holiness of heart and life to which man may attain, and its outer manifestation of love, benevolence, and widest charity. The language was nervous, happily chosen, simple and pure, and beyond the power of the mere rhetorician. The matter was so arranged that its clear statement was a great and beautiful argument, while a trill of the voice rendered it touching. The delivery of this rare homily may have occupied fifteen minutes. As the preacher was sitting down, another train of thought opened to him, when, with the same little murmur, he arose to his full height, and spoke, perhaps, five minutes longer, not in continuance of the first discourse, but of a germane topic, which illustrated and supplemented it. He sat down, observed a moment's silence, turned and shook hands with the man next to him, a signal that the service had closed.

That was Benjamin Hallowell. As he passed out, men and boys, matrons and maidens gathered about him, followed him out to his carriage, and did not part with him till he drove away. He was of them, lived their daily life, went in and out before them, ministering, beautifying, and elevating their lives; helping to improve and adorn their homes and fortunes, lighting and conducting them along the upper paths of virtue, culture, and beneficence; yet so natural and common, that, in a way, they lost the power of appreciating the more striking of his remarkable qualities and powers.

I came to know him well, all these years since I first saw him. He was a man rarely endowed, and doubtless in his philosophy of life, he secured as much of real value from the world as it is capable of yielding. Nature had given him most of the striking qualities of intellect, will-power, and the rudiments of the strongest human passions, and clothed them with a form of dignity, beauty, and grace. Seemingly he had but to choose his career, and will his own fortune. Among his gifts the religious element was large, and this, with his early training and surroundings, determined his course. In history there was but one model. The spirit of Mary's Son he made his own. It restrained his ambition, opened his pathway, enlightened his studies, formed his manners, and informed his life. Politics and the government of the nation, all great enterprises, were very much, and he kept well informed of them. The unfolding and fashioning the minds, the frame and structure of the character of the chosen young men of the land, were to him much more. To that he dedicated himself with a devotion and unreserve which marked his appreciation of its importance. No youth was ever under his care who did not carry with him through life something of the bent and bias imparted by his hand, as none approached him without reverence or left him without love.

His work was that which lay nearest his hand. Emphatically he loved his neighbor. His neighborhood was the universe, and all living things were the objects of his care. As his manners were the manifestation of his heart and spirit, he was naturally the most graceful and polished of cultured men. The servants, the coachmen who drove him to the railroad station, always remembered his consideration for them. If a man may apply the term "lovable" to a man, that was eminently his due. Nothing bearing life ever came under his care that did not love him as it was capable. It was beautiful to see him break from a clinging group of lads and maidens and hear him say: "Farewell; now I must go to my Margaret," toward whom he manifested the same ardor of love, and tender observance at seventy-five as in the first day of wedded bliss.

If his life was lovely beyond the usual, his last illness and death were beautiful and touching beyond earth. His Margaret passed away nearly two years before his own exit, and it was a sore trial of his faith that he must remain longer. That the example of his life might lack no perfection, that illness was a protracted bodily torture, gradually growing more intense, till the sources of life were exhausted, yet such were the strength and fortitude of the spirit, that all was endured with a serene smile, calling forth assurances of the mercy and goodness of God. Sometimes when the anguish was at its greatest, he said to his attendant: "Thou must allow me to groan a little." He refused anodynes and anesthetics, saying, "If permitted, he would retain his faculties unclouded." He wished to note the shades of on-coming death, which were, also, to be the opening dawn of immortality. Such an intellect could never be shattered. Once it seemed to wander, making a luminous track. As if his great sufferings might disquiet the faith of a favorite daughter in the mercy of Providence, with clearness and energy he demonstrated two or three great mathematical problems; concluding with: "So thou sees, daughter, that it is all clear and right." His method of clarifying and refreshing his mind, even in this illness, was by the solution of a problem. As the end approached, the glow of the perfect faith became a luminous nimbus, on the almost transfigured countenance,—instances of which many have read of, but few ever witnessed. His last words were assurances that the way was clear, the light broad and steady, and the glory serene.

—N. Y. Tribune, Sept. 29.

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher asked a bright little four-year-old, "Who made you?" "Dad," replied the cherub. "What did He make you out of?" continued the teacher. "Yoses ond v'l'ets," lisped the little sunbeam. The teacher said, "O no, little girl; He made you of the dust of the earth." The innocent meditated one moment, then looked up, said, "I des don't be'leve you; tause when I get in my bat tub why don't I tome to pieces den?"

ON GUIDO'S AURORA.

O Guido, never did thy master hand
A nobler work achieve than is portrayed
In Rospigilios's art-embellished hall,
Where radiant Morn awakes the wave-washed land
To dimpled smiles of varying light and shade,
As o'er earth's reddening cheek the sprinkled rosebuds fall.
Embodiments of beauty, life and grace,
How deftly glide the rainbow-mantled Hours,
A glittering garland round Apo'lo's car!
While robed in light, their leader in the race,
Floats fair Aurora scattering fragrant flowers,
And o'er the bounding steeds fast fades the morning star.
Loved symbol of a faith outworn, e'en now
Thy gods their coronal of beauty wear,
Though but the faded fancies of Earth's youth;
As wisdom's wrinkles gather on her brow,
Those graceful myths dissolve like mist in air!
We mourn,—yet hold more dear our disillusioned Truth!

MR. GILES B. STEBBINS, of Detroit, is lecturing in Central and Western New York on Buddha, Confucius, and Mohammed. The local papers speak very well of these lectures.

A. B. BROWN, Esq., of Worcester, Mass., will lecture in Paine Hall next Sunday, at half-past ten o'clock, A.M., to which the public are invited. Subject: "Progressive Life."

WE ACKNOWLEDGE with thanks the receipt of a donation of ten dollars, to "promote the objects of the Liberal League," from Mr. William Green, of Orange, N. J., the veteran abolitionist whose sympathies for human freedom never grow cold.

THIS WEEK we invite attention to the extraordinary sermon which we copy from the Philadelphia Christian Statesman, the organ of the "National Reform Association." It is a kind of reasoning not profitable in itself, but very necessary to be understood by those not aware of the insidious advances now rapidly making by that nefarious project.

IT MAY AMUSE some of our readers to know that an "Anti-Death Convention" is to be held in this city at 176 Tremont Street, Oct. 14 and 15, three sessions each day. Probably an indignation meeting will be held by the sextons, undertakers, and coffin-makers, at this barefaced attempt to deprive them of a living; for success of the "Anti-Death" reform would be sure death to them.

IT IS NOW stated that "the Bible which Father Grogan, of St. Bridget's Church, Chicago, tossed out of a window of a railroad car, has been found near Kankakee, and placed in the hands of the conductor who procured his arrest. The scandalous illustrations and obscene interlineations which shocked the reverend gentleman cannot be found in the book. The conductor has turned the pages from Genesis to Revelation, and the only pencil mark is a slight tracing opposite a verse in the first chapter of Samuel."

THIS GEM is from the Sunday School Times, which reports the incident of "a faithful Christian lawyer" in Pittsburgh: "A cloth band had been stretched across the bed, a little above him, by holding on to which he could turn himself more easily. As he reached toward it one day, he said, 'I have somewhere read of Eastern herdsmen, who, when dying, grasp the tail of a cow, superstitiously expecting thus to be dragged over the river of death. I do not need that. I shall cross the dark river clinging to the garments of the Lord Jesus.' Of the two, the tall warranted the stronger confidence."

THE NEW YORK Nation says very pertinently: "Morton's fall has had the extraordinary result of eliciting from some of the Philadelphia clergy and one or two religious papers the opinion that the revelation of his villainy is the judgment of God on him for consenting to or promoting the opening of the Exhibition on Sunday. If this be true, we are bound to believe that God Almighty would have connived at Morton's frauds by assisting him in covering them up, and have allowed him to go on cheating innocent people, if he had only kept his show closed on the Sabbath day. We hope the rational portion of the religious world is alive to the effect which this blasphemous nonsense has on the influence of the pulpit and of religious teachers generally."

REV. J. Z. TAYLOR having delivered some lectures on the "Evidences of Christianity" at Oskaloosa, Iowa, Mr. R. G. Eccles, one of the audience, rose and stated that, though he had never read "Infidel" books, but had read his Bible for the purpose of knowing how to refute "infidels," he had become an "infidel" by reading the Bible itself! He then offered to debate the matter publicly with some competent clergyman. Instead of accepting his challenge, the local press and clergy abused him roundly. A Rev. G. T. Carpenter intimated pretty broadly that he only refrained from taking up the gauntlet himself because "there are those brave enough to meet a lion who would shun another animal no larger than a cat!" Verily, Christian courtesy is beautiful to contemplate.

AN EMINENT LAWYER'S OPINION.

E. W. Meddagh, Esq., of Detroit, confessedly one of the ablest members of the bar in that city, and one of the Commission a year or two ago appointed by Governor Bagley to revise the Constitution of the State of Michigan, though declining on account of imperative professional engagements to read a paper at the Rochester Congress, writes so warmly in favor of its proposed work that we think it no sin to quote a telling passage from his letter: "I need not assure you of my hearty sympathy in your movement and plan of action. I believe your several propositions entirely sound, and that they are certain to become popular in the future and to find a permanent place in the National organic law. The second one [national protection for national citizens] is my hobby, and, if I felt equal to the task and could spare the time, it would be a pure labor of love for me to undertake to demonstrate its soundness and great practical importance. 'It is the logical sequence of the idea—settled, I hope forever, by the result of the civil war—that the United States is a NATION, and not a league or confederation of States merely. A nation without the power of affording to its citizens, or subjects, full protection in all their civil or political rights is an anomaly in the civilized world. The United States stands among the nations of the earth in unamiable distinction in this respect. Its position is a burning disgrace to us. Demanding and insisting that each of its citizens shall yield to it primary allegiance and duty, even as against the State in which he resides, the United States still denies to him its protection from the consequences visited upon him by his State, or supposed to be, as a penalty for loyalty to the National demand.'"

A UNIVERSALIST STATE CONVENTION VOTING FOR "GOD IN THE CONSTITUTION."

The Massachusetts State Convention of the Universalist denomination, at their annual session in the city of Worcester, September 28, adopted by a large vote the report of a special committee, appointed last year, in favor of a so-called "Religious Amendment" of the United States Constitution by which the Divine truth of Christianity may be recognized in the fundamental law. The report of this committee, made through Rev. Dr. Miner, will be found in full on a preceding page of this issue, and we recommend a careful reading of it to all who take the slightest interest in watching the drift of opinion and the course of events on this superlatively important question. Nothing could be more explicit than the following resolution, adopted by the convention as a part of the committee's report:—

"Resolved, That, since the silence of our fundamental law is being construed as a rejection of Christianity as a source of national strength and prosperity, giving countenance to the claims that our government should be made entirely secular, we heartily sympathize with the aims of the National Reform Association in seeking a legal recognition of God and his government."

The Universalists are always classed among the so-called "Liberal Christian" sects. Their action suggests queries which no thoughtful man will disregard:—

1. If "Liberal Christianity," uttering itself through a State convention of one of its most important bodies, already casts its vote in this public manner in favor of a project which is the very quintessence of bigotry, arrogance, and persecution, what is to be expected from the far stricter Evangelical denominations, when it comes their turn to speak?

2. If the representative bodies of all the leading Christian sects come to unite in demanding that the general creed of Christianity shall be incorporated in the Constitution, what can prevent their success, in the present dumb and unorganized condition of the great mass of religious liberals? Remember the Philadelphia Exposition of 1876.

3. Is there not already abundant warning for the friends of secular government to assert their own positive and beneficent principles within the hearing of the whole people, unless indeed they are willing to let their sacred cause go by default, and to add one more to the melancholy list of nations which have lost their liberties because they were too sluggish to defend them? Is it not time to lay down these principles as a conscience-platform in national politics, to be tolled for, sacrificed for, and fought for against all odds, as men defend that which is as the apple of their eyes?

It is one of the cunning tricks of the advocates of this Christian Amendment to represent it as only a defensive measure against the wicked innovations of "infidels" who are seeking to destroy the system of Christian government handed down to us from our forefathers. They attempt to disguise, by this artful device, the fact that they themselves are plotting to change totally the whole spirit and tenor of the Federal Constitution by injecting into it the poison of persecution. They even have the effrontery at times to represent the "National Reform" movement as originating in a reaction against the Liberal League—diplomatically oblivious of the fact that, by their own account, the "National Reform" movement started in 1883, while the Liberal League was not so much as mentioned till 1873! As a matter of fact, the Liberal League, though aiming to carry out more fully and thoroughly the principle of secular government, and not merely to keep things as they are, was called into being in consequence of the existence of the National Reform Association. But it is ten years younger than the latter; and to insinuate that the attempt to Christianize the Constitution is either directly or indirectly a result of the Liberal League movement is neither more nor less than a "pious fraud." The true origin of this attempt is nothing but that sometimes unconscious lust of domination which makes every believer in a bigoted and exclusive creed eager to cram it down the throat of every one he can lay his hands on; and the true origin of the Liberal League was a determination to defend, if possible, the equal rights of believer and unbeliever, as entitled equally to enjoy their several opinions.

When we see how insatiable is this thirst for empire which marks all types of Christianity in greater or less degree,—how it betrays itself even in those milder forms of it which attempt to make peace with civilization by labelling themselves "Liberal Christian,"—the grand words of Bryant are brought so forcibly to our recollection that we cannot forbear to quote them here:—

O FREEDOM! Thou art not, as poets dream,
A fair young girl, with light and delicate limbs,
And wavy tresses gushing from the cap
With which the Roman master crowned his slave,
When he took off the gyves. A bearded man,
Armed to the teeth, art thou; one mailed hand
Grasps the broad shield, and one the sword; thy brow,
Glorious in beauty though it be, is scarred
With tokens of old wars; thy massive limbs
Are strong with struggling. . . .

. . . Tyranny himself,
Thy enemy, although of reverend look,
Hoary with many years, and far obeyed,
Is later born than thou; and as he meets
The grave defiance of thine elder eye,
The usurper trembles in his fastnesses.

Thou shalt wax stronger with the lapse of years,
But he shall fade into a feeblar age—
Feebler, yet subtler. He shall weave his snares,
And spring them on thy careless steps, and clap
His withered hands, and from their ambush call His hordes to fall upon thee. He shall send Quaint maskers, wearing fair and gallant forms
To catch thy gaze, and, uttering graceful words,
To charm thy ear; while his sly limbs, by stealth,
Twine round thee threads of steel, light thread on thread
That grow to fetters,—or bind down thy arms
With chains contained in chaplets. Oh, not yet May'st thou unbrace thy corset, nor lay by Thy sword—not yet, O FREEDOM! close thy lids
In slumber; for thine enemy never sleeps,
And thou must watch and combat till the day
Of the new earth and heaven!

Verily, these words were inspired, if ever inspiration visited mortal breast. Are our ears so deaf and our spirits so dull as neither to hear nor comprehend them?

DO INFANTS GROW IN THE SPIRIT-WORLD?

I clip the following from the Message Department of the Banner of Light:—

CONTROLLING SPIRIT.—We are ready for suitable questions, Mr. Chairman.

QUESTION.—[By R. M. Adams, Vineland, New Jersey.] I notice in the Philosophy of Creation, by Thomas Paine, these sentences, on page eighty-six: "When the infant dies, its little spirit is transported hither and ushered into the presence of its friends, who attend upon it with affectionate care, and aid and assist in the development of its intellectual and moral powers, though in stature, form, and size it will ever be an infant. Infants, though ever infants in stature, may yet progress intellectually. They may unfold and develop the powers given them, but can never attain remarkable intellectual power." If that is the true state of infants in the spirit-world, must all infants going there remain infants in size in that world, or go to some other to receive the size they have lost by dying prematurely?

ANSWER.—Your correspondent has presented us with a question filled with thought. We can only give you ideas experience has taught us. We do not believe, in fact we know that infants do not remain infants in the spirit life. They are received there as little infants, as children, and are placed under the kindest care. All that is necessary for their development is given to them. They are brought to earth and carried into the homes of individuals where they may receive material experience; they are also taught to control mediums. An infant does not remain an infant all through eternity, but each year, each month, each week, each day it unfolds and advances higher. The little rose-bud which comes to us is not a rose-bud twenty years from now, but every petal is unfolded, as every influence is brought to bear to make that bud a beautiful rose in the spiritual world. Standing on your platform beside me are spirits of those who were children and infants when they went away, but are now grown to the stature of men and women, developed and unfolded intellectually far beyond what would have been possible had they lived here in your world. There is no curtailing the influences which unfold a spiritual being in the spirit-world. Many times children are not unfolded as they should and would be, simply because parents do not understand them, or try to study their natures; but spirits and spirit-teachers comprehend at a glance the wants of each infant, and it is carried where it can receive what it needs to unfold it. You who have lost infants regret it not, for you will meet them developed far beyond what they would have been had they remained in this earth-life.

Who is right, Thomas Paine or the "controlling spirit"? When the Philosophy of Creation was written, its alleged author had been—if Spiritualism be true—in the spirit-world half a century. Paine was a keen observer and a truthful man. If after fifty years' experience in the land of spirits he comes back to earth and deliberately and solemnly declares that a person who dies in infancy "in stature, form, and size will ever be an infant," what must be thought of the equally emphatic statement of the Banner's "controlling spirit" that "we know that spirits do not remain infants in the spirit-life,—that each year, each month, each week, it unfolds and advances higher"?

Here are two statements diametrically opposite, made by two spirits who attempt to enlighten the inhabitants of earth in regard to the spirit-world. Their statements are not about some speculative question, in regard to which even spirits might not agree, but relate to a matter of fact, concerning which, if spirits retain the power of observation and the disposition to tell the truth, any essential difference of statement seems utterly inexplicable.

There appears to be the same disagreement among spirits in regard to everything pertaining to the spirit-world. For instance, whether food is required in the land of spirits; whether beast, bird, and reptile exist there; and whether reproduction and birth are among the conditions of spirit-life,—are but a few of the many questions on which the testimony of the "immortal" is just as conflicting, yet quite as positive, as the statement above quoted in regard to those who die in infancy. Difference in the conclusions arrived at by spirits on subjects of a philosophical nature would not be urged by me as a difficulty in the way of accepting Spiritualism; but such various and contradictory statements, made, too, with so much positiveness, and given as the result of observation or experience and as a matter of knowledge—as in the case quoted from the Banner of Light,—are sufficient to incline one to the view that these "messages from the spirit-world" are simply from the minds of those who write or utter them.

OUR CHILDREN.

In regard to the education of their children, "Liberals" are under a very heavy responsibility; and, I may add, are being watched by very jealous eyes. To be sure, looking at the average of attainment in Orthodox families they have no need to be very apprehensive of comparisons; but still they are in this position, that any conspicuous failures they may make in training up their children to honesty and virtue will be made far more of by the community than similar failures on the part of the Orthodox. We should, however, not only not be apprehensive of comparisons, we should be prepared to invite them; for if our principles are true we ought to be better fitted than our Orthodox neighbors for conducting the moral education of children of any age. We say their doctrines are, many of them, immoral; and so they are. We say that others, like that of total depravity, are false; and so they are. Well, having shaken ourselves free from these, and not being required to recommend them in any shape to the young minds under our control, but being at full liberty to bring before them our own highest and best conceptions of natural and moral truth, do we not possess an advantage of which we should be prepared to yield a satisfactory account? I think we do.

It is needless to say that all Liberals are not satisfactory educators of their own children. I have cases before my mind's eye at this moment where young people, the children of "Liberal" parents, have developed very unhappily,—even betaken themselves to crime. On the one hand, perhaps, we have a young girl starved for want of moral sympathy, and of some interpretation of the universe which shall not rob it of all glory and life of all meaning, and whose mind has consequently become a prey to apathy alternating with feverish and disordered fancies. On the other hand we have youths who have heard at home that all that is taught in the churches is rubbish, but who have never had their affections drawn out, or their higher faculties cultivated in any other way. Here again we have a "Liberal" father who seems half afraid, half ashamed of his liberalism, and whose children, without any effort on his part to prevent it, lapse back into orthodoxy, and take up with creeds which divide infants into "elect" and "non-elect."

Of course I have instances of a very different kind equally or even more prominently before my eye. I see whole families growing up strong in every good principle,—families made one, as Mr. Chadwick beautifully expresses it,

"In hatred of all wrong,
One in the love of all things sweet and fair," and who manifestly owe this to the rectitude and high sense of duty of Liberal parents. Examples such as these give one an earnest of what may be accomplished, and show conclusively that whatever the older forms of religion may have done to nourish high sentiment, the human soul is not dependent on them for its growth in the future. Education consists, above all, in the influence of personal character. Give us Liberals of the right stamp, and we need not fear for the next generation; but if liberalism should come to mean mere contempt for the Christian creed, unaccompanied by any high ideal of life or duty, then the salt of the earth will still be found among those who, with whatever intellectual darkness, recognize a rule of life that summons them to moral effort,—that sets before them, as the highest object of endeavor, purity of heart.

But, in regard to our children, let me set down here a few thoughts that seem to me of special importance to Liberals who have children to educate.

1. Inasmuch as the ordinary means of cultivating a child's faculty of reverence are lacking, we should do our utmost to draw out that faculty by other means,—as for example by an habitual tone of respect or solemnity (according to circumstances) in regard to all great truths, and all the more important aspects and incidents of life. The tone of mockery is one a child should seldom, if ever, hear; and constant levity on the part of its elders is to a child one of the most sterilizing of influences. If we want our children to grow up noble men and women we must train them betimes to dignity and seriousness of thought; we must cultivate their sense of moral proportion; we must make them feel that to treat a serious subject with levity is a fault of the same nature as to treat an elderly person with disrespect. It is true that the literature of the day abounds with this very fault, some of our leading humorists making death an inexhaustible subject of merriment. We must not, however, plead a passing fashion, and one so demonstrably false to Nature, as any excuse for similar injurious trifling on our part. We who have young souls committed to our care should see that the unfolding blossoms are neither nipped by a frosty cynicism nor blighted by any perverted sentiment. Let them expand under the genial sun and amid all the healthful influences of Nature, and rise up to whatever fulness of beauty, grace, and strength is possible for them. I am strongly of opinion that the more distinctions we introduce into the life of our children, the more sharply we mark off hours of play, hours of study, and hours of work, and the more sharply we separate the subjects that may properly give rise to mirth from those which ought to excite graver feelings, the happier the child will be, the less he will suffer from that too frequent bane of childhood, listlessness.

2. The next point I would urge is, that we should be careful not to repress imagination in our children, but rather to give it free and natural scope. A great many Liberals do not understand, cannot be made to understand, that imagination is aught else than a misleading play of the mind. Professor Tyndall himself might teach them otherwise, but they are slow to learn. They know that two and two make four, and do not want to lose hold of that saving truth, which they think they would be in danger of doing if they gave a moment's heed to imagination. They want their children to grow up practical; and therefore they would guard them against all reading that takes them out of the realm of the actual. All this is the result, however, of a narrow way of thinking. Imagination is nothing else than the faculty which comes in, after observation has done its work, to sum up and shape into theory the results of observation. There are many plodding observers who have not the least idea what to do with the facts they have collected; their minds lack the divine the crowning faculty of imagination. If I am asked for any further definition of this faculty, I say that it is a rapid motion of the mind causing it to traverse a thousand associations in the same space of time that a person destitute of the faculty would take in passing from one point to another. It is intensified mental vision; it is a light-begetting vibration of the intellect. It is essentially the same faculty with wit; it is that which adds lustre to style by the constant invention of happy turns, allusions, and illustrations. Yet this is the very faculty which so many Liberals set themselves sternly to repress, in the interest of the multiplication table; as if the multiplication table were not well able to take care of itself. There is something worth considering, I think, in the following words of Sir Henry Taylor: "Those who are much conversant with intellectual men will observe, I think, that the particular action by which their minds are most frequently warped from wisdom is that which belongs to a pride and pleasure taken in the exercise of the argumentative faculty; whence it arises that faculty is enabled to assert a predominance over its betters. With such men the elements of a question which will make effect in argument—those which are, so far as they go, demonstrative—will be rated above their value; and those which are matter of proportion and degree, not palpable, ponderable, or easily or shortly producible in words, or which are matters of moral estimation and optional opinion, will go for less than they are worth, because they are not available to insure the victory or grace the triumph of a disputant." Let us be Liberals without being Gradgrinds; let us realize that we are heirs of the past, and that, while the multiplication table and the syllogistic form of argument are inestimably precious, they constitute no measure or index of the moral and intellectual treasures to which we may lay claim.

3. The last point on which I shall dwell to-day—for I am exceeding my limits—is, that we should guard against placing our children at too early an age in a position of conscious antagonism to society at large. We should be careful not to teach them contempt for the opinions of others wiser than themselves, and, to all appearance, quite as wise as ourselves. A child who prides himself on the fact that he does not believe what so many others believe is not a pleasant spectacle. I think a child should be taught to regret that opinions are current in the world which his parents are unable to share; and should be told that when he is older he will be able to judge of these things for himself. He should be encouraged to exercise his observing and reasoning faculties to the utmost, but not to express confident opinions. Let him understand—without, however, in any way impairing his self-respect—the littleness of his own grasp in all intellectual matters; but particularly in such as still divide the opinions of able men. Do not foster the thought that difference of opinion in regard to theology should so need alienate men from one another or prevent their cooperation for social objects. Teach him to regard any difficulties that may spring from this cause as superable by patience and kindness; and incline him to meet his fellow-men at all times in a spirit of confidence and good-will. It is easy to give the youthful nature a permanently anti-social bent by constant unfavorable criticism of one's neighbors and society generally; and this, I fear, is an error into which some Liberals fall. Its result, when the child has attained to manhood, is most unhappy: some of the best sources of happiness have for him been dried up, and a great many things present themselves to his mind in a distorted shape; distrusting others, he begins to feel that he is himself distrusted, and instead of a genial play of social sympathies he displays through life little else than the tone and temper of a sour secessionist. The future either belongs to us Liberals or it does not. If it does, and if we feel that it does, the sooner we drop sectarian habits and begin to be catholic—that is, widely-human—in our sympathies and aims the better. And in educating our children let us see to it that they do not imbibe less, but rather more, of this spirit than we have done ourselves.

A PRIZE was once offered to the person who could find a rhyme to the word "window." The prize was awarded to the following effort:—

"A cruel man a beetle caught,
And to the wall him pinned, oh!
Then said the beetle to the crowd,
'Though I'm stuck up, I am not proud;
And his soul went out of the window.'"

"USE" AND "SACRIFICE": A DIFFERENCE.

DEAR ABBOT:—

Your response to my note calls for a few words more.

I. I think you have been entirely right in regarding interest as properly "based on the ascertained value of the use of money." That is what interest has always been held to be by the authorities and by custom. It is the premium paid for the use of money. I trust, therefore, that you will allow me to make the distinct issue that compensation on the ground of "use" alone is interest, while compensation on the ground of "sacrifice" is not interest. It can thus be more clearly shown what those who are opposed to interest really mean.

II. By your saying "at least in the opinion of Mr. Morse," you seem to imply a suspicion that my statement of the ground of the opponents of interest may be in some sort a conjecture of my own. If so, you are mistaken. I have given the subject as discussed by others some attention, and have nowhere met with any extended argument which did not turn on the point I have emphasized. Indeed, if I mistake not, a like presentation has several times been made in the columns of THE INDEX. It was for that reason I was led to say it seemed to me you turned aside (of course I did not mean to infer you did so intentionally) from what I esteemed to be the main issue.

III. I agree with you now when you say "the only real question worth discussing is this: when a man borrows $100 and repays it a year later, shall he in equity pay only $100, or $108?" That is, shall he pay any additional sum whatever, be it more or less. On the ground of use, supposing that to be right, the answer would always be "yes." On the ground of "sacrifice," the answer would sometimes be "yes," but oftener "no." Your question is, Shall he in equity pay, etc. It is agreed on all sides that the transaction ought to be an equitable one. So I regard your further statement—"if equity requires," etc., "it is practically of no consequence on what ground," etc.—as hardly a thoughtful one. As you will see there would be little sober sense in saying, if equity requires $8 more than is borrowed, it is practically of no consequence that it is demanded on the ground that the lender has an uncle very sick, or that he wishes to make the purchase of a horse. Yet you seem to imply that the "reason" for which compensation is conceded or denied by the opponents of interest is about as flimsy and inconsequential as this. You say, too, if equity requires, which is the very point of the discussion.

IV. Your line of argument appears to be somewhat as follows: you seem to say,

1. I will call it interest, no matter whether it be for "use" or "sacrifice."

2. To be sure I am astonished to hear that it is the reason for which interest is asked, and not the asking of it, that constitutes the justice or injustice of the transaction.

3. Nevertheless, looking at the question theoretically, whether interest ought to be charged on account of the borrower's "use" or the lender's "sacrifice" of the money, I say it makes no difference. Whenever the borrower wants money, the lender wants it too; they both want it for the use they can make of it; what the lender "sacrifices" is this "use," and what the borrower receives is nothing else. Lender's "sacrifice" and borrower's "use" go together. The loan is simply a "sacrifice" of the "use" by the lender, and a gain of the "use" by the borrower. Hence, interest is still only a just compensation for this use.

4. It is, therefore, best to have a fixed rate of interest based on the ascertained value of the use of the money, and approved as just by the experience and consent of the community, instead of the lender's capricious estimate of the "sacrifice" he makes by lending, as the rule of justice.

V. Now, if you were to continue your meditations over these points, I do not see why you should refuse to consider them somewhat in this way. Passing by the first and second, you would be likely to dwell on the third and fourth as follows:—

1. As to any third proposition, let me see. "Use," of course, as interest is defined by Webster, and as I have usually regarded it, refers to the borrower. He is to pay a "premium" for using money that belongs to another. Why? Simply because he uses it? Of course he cannot use it without the other's consent. Now on what ground may that other be supposed to consent? I see he must do so either on the ground that he does not wish to use his money himself, or because, if he does, the borrower offers to make up to him any loss he will suffer by lending it. It is plain, then, that in the latter case he would sacrifice the use he would make of it, and the borrower would pay for that sacrifice. In the former case, if the borrower paid any premium, it would clearly not be paid for sacrifice, since none was made. Hence I am led to see that "use" and "sacrifice" to be identical, must always go together. They do not always go together, since where there is no "sacrifice," "use" must go alone. It is precisely this distinction that interest, as I have hitherto viewed it, does not regard. It bases itself on the borrower's use, and does not raise the question of sacrifice at all. There may, and there may not, be sacrifice; interest neither knows nor cares. It says to the borrower, "You use the money; it is of advantage to you; you shall pay for it." To the lender it has nothing to say, unless it be, "The rate is fixed; take it." But, hold a moment. What I said was, the cases are exceptional where the lender does not want to use his money himself. Hence, practically, it is use—the lender's sacrifice of use—that is paid for. But, wait again. I don't see, after all, that I get rid of the fact that it is the lender's "sacrifice," and not his "use" of the money that is compensated. It appears now that borrower's "use" and lender's "use" are not exactly the same thing. What the lender sacrifices is the opportunity to use the money he lends. His opportunity! what is there to say about that? What opportunity has he? I cannot of course argue that it is his opportunity to lend money to some one else at six per cent. If it is wrong in the one case, it is wrong in the other. Sacrificing a chance to do wrong is no sacrifice I can defend. If I say he sacrifices the opportunity to put his capital into his own business, there at once arises one or two, if not more, apparently decisive answers. The number of those who need their money in their own business and will lend it at six per cent. must be exceedingly small. Besides, there might arise a question as to the principle on which business is done. If the money was needed in any way to conduct a business calculated to defraud mankind, then again, the sacrifice of opportunity would not count. I do not see but I must reconsider my proposition that, practically, all who lend money want it for the use they can make of it. They may want it; but have they a right to want it for the use they make of it? After all, I see that my proposition is reduced to this. Interest defended on the ground of the lender's sacrifice of use, in the great majority of cases, is simply saying: The lender charges one man interest because he sacrifices his opportunity to get interest from another man;—which won't do. It sounds much like saying, Interest is right because it is right. Quod erat demonstrandum. It appears, then, instead of those who can and should lend money without interest forming the exceptional cases, the exceptional cases are those where bona fide sacrifice can be shown. If interest, then, is based only on a sacrifice of the opportunity to do right, I do not see why, practically, interest ought not to be abolished.

2. I observe now, in looking at my fourth proposition, that a fixed rate of interest is, on any equitable ground, a sheer impossibility. The rate must always vary with the degree of sacrifice. To base it on the ascertained value of the use of money, is to confess that, whatever people will pay for the use of money to carry on whatever nefarious business, is the measure of equitable price. That I cannot defend. The old question of what constitutes true sacrifice cannot thus be disposed of. I see also that the lender's capricious estimate of which I spoke is not likely to be so capricious after all. He cannot force his money on other people. If he wants to use it himself, he will not want to. If he does not, he will ask nothing. The one wishing to borrow may not in one sense revise the lender's estimate, but he may call it in question, and he may go elsewhere. And so my fears of usurious oppression vanish.

VI. Pardon me for thus putting words into your mouth. It was by mere accident I have been led to do so. But I think I will let them stand. For I confess I am curious to know whether you also are willing to let them stand, or will proceed to erase them. You see I have ventured putting it the way I would think if I were you.

VII. I have made this letter so long already, I suppose you won't mind if I make it a little longer. There are one or two things I would like further to refer to,—indeed, there are a number; but I desire to be moderate in claiming your space.

The subject of interest or no-interest covers a good deal of ground, and is likely to have, in my judgment a growing importance in the discussions of this country. By the practice of interest capital is piling up in few hands and reducing the large producing class to a state of vassalage. It stimulates non-producers who claim a privilege without further effort to live off the production of others. This is not my individual conviction alone,—nor that of a few others who have taken up the discussion. It is, I find a very serious consideration which is working its way in the minds of many people who have, as yet, said nothing publicly. Certainly no earnest person can have a desire merely to make out a case one way or the other. If interest is right, be it proclaimed so, come vassalage or whatsoever else. If it be wrong, then, let that be known. We of this country hope to see things that have not been started right, made right by intelligent conviction, and kept so. I wish, therefore, the subject might be thoroughly sifted. I do not pretend to the ability myself. I think I can see the direction the argument lies, but can only speak of it in the most general way. I should be interested if persons competent to do so, could from time to time occupy the columns of THE INDEX, presenting, within reasonable space, both sides. In this connection I will say that the discussion between Proudhon and Bastiat which obtained a remarkable European reputation, so to speak, was, a few years since, translated into English by Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker. It has not been published, and it is possible you might, if you desire, arrange with him another year, for its appearance in your journal. I feel sure it would attract marked attention.

I begin to realize the length of my letter, and know I ought to ask pardon. I will forego the rest I had to say. In lieu thereof, let me close by offering the following sentiment:—

Capital in itself is not a power. It may be made so. He who uses it makes it so. Shall he pay for the privilege of making it so? Only when he deprives its owner of the like opportunity. He shall then make good the owner's sacrifice. But unless the opportunity sacrificed be the opportunity for honest increase, the lender makes no sacrifice entitling him to name a price.

Very truly yours, S. H. MORSE.

[We are very glad to print the above, but have no time to comment on it; although we must candidly say it has not changed our opinion.—ED.]

THE ROCHESTER PLATFORM.

NEW YORK, Oct. 2, 1877.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, ESQ., PRESIDENT LIBERAL LEAGUE:

Dear Sir,—I am very glad to see the call for the First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League. I am also glad of the proposition to adopt a political platform and enter upon a course of political action. It is high time the Liberal forces were organized and resolved to make their power felt in some demonstrative, efficient way.

The three "principles and measures," as published, are all to the point and admirable. For the work that THE INDEX and the League have taken in hand to do, these principles are all sufficient. But when we come to organize a political party, I would like to suggest something more. Such an organization should be a widely extended, all-embracing affair, and we should make friends and allies of as many correlated parties as possible. A "conscience party" is good, provided we enlist about all the conscience there is going; then the party, while it is growing and not yet electing its candidates, will, at least, make itself respected. But a conscience vote of only those who convene and resolve and nominate, will be too much like descending into one's own inner consciousness and hoping thence to evolve a political party.

A little log-rolling will be but the part of strategy, diplomacy, and fairness in war, in any political action the League may take. I should say, then, add at least a Labor plank and a Woman's Rights plank, and perhaps a radical expression of some kind about money. This would inevitably multiply adherents; and, if ably advocated and judiciously managed, might capture and absorb those parties altogether. They all sadly need organization; and one might almost say that the party that is best organized is best, and would gather in all other radical movements.

At all events, vastly important as are the three planks which you propose, and politically good as they are as far as they go, yet I fear they would be generally deemed, even by Liberal voters, as touching only religious questions, and not urgent enough to detach them from the more concrete, pressing, and immediate questions of the ordinary political parties. But, with five loaves and two small fiscal planks, I think we could feed the whole Liberal multitude and have some basketsful left over for the scared and wounded of the defeated party. Men of ever so much conscience like to vote where there is a fair prospect that some time or other the vote will tell. The laws of gravitation apply to political as well as to planetary bodies. The larger they are, the more they attract aerolite meteors, free particles, and whatever is afloat; and, unless a body is large enough to properly apply the word magnitude to it, it might turn out a mere wandering comet, with not tall enough to wag anything,—certainly not the star. The ballot-box will all the more attract votes if, like Pandora's, it has hope in the bottom of it. So let us go in for a conscience party, indeed; but, whatever happens, let us go in for success. The wisdom of the serpent is never so important as when you are dealing with snakes.

Very sincerely yours, THERON C. LELAND.

[The Rochester Congress will have the whole subject of a platform in its own control, and will act according to such wisdom as it shall prove to possess. For our own part, if it aims to lay the foundation of a national party, we believe it must confine itself to strictly national issues and treat them with directness, candor, and due consideration for conflicting opinions on other issues. The second of the principles proposed in the Call guarantees the rights of all national citizens, and therefore of the freedmen and of women, as it stands; and it would not be wise in our judgment, after laying down a broad principle, to cumber it with a specification of all its particular applications. If the Congress should choose to add strong planks in favor of a sincere and thorough reform of the civil service, a gold standard and a currency convertible into gold, and honorable resumption of specie payments in 1879 according to the existing law, it would express our own convictions; but these issues, we hope, will be settled before 1880, and the platform ought to be framed with reference to the Presidential campaign of that year. As to the labor question, that cannot be settled by legislation, and we should be mortified to see the Congress adopt any plank merely for the sake of catching votes. The three principles (really one) of the Call ought to rouse the conscience of the nation; and we hope to see both conscience and true political sagacity in the action of the Congress.—ED.]

COMMON-SENSE vs. COMMUNISM.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Civilization is only the result of the labors of countless generations. It could never have been attained but for the abstinence of the many for the benefit of a few. Material prosperity is simply the direct effect of mental speculation; as any invention is but the result of the application of an idea to the production of its working reality. But the leisure essential to the better cultivation of the intellectual powers, (which must always precede any improvement in the general condition of humanity) is only to be obtained by the previous accumulation of wealth; in other words, modern civilization is based upon the inequality of the distribution of the productions of labor.

It follows that all attempts to subvert this natural law governing the process of human and social evolution are as impotent to effect their purpose, as if a man should persist in throwing a stone into the air, hoping that it would remain there in spite of the law of gravitation.

But, precisely as the currents of wind serve to keep up the healthful activity of the atmosphere, purifying the pestilential regions of this earth, and dissipating the stagnant vapors—or as the great tidal currents perform the same duty for the mighty ocean,—exactly in the same way is the equilibrium of society maintained by the perpetual infusion of "new blood" from the "proletarians" into the effete families of the wealthier classes. Especially is this the case in our modern societies, formed under the impulse of a greater or less tendency to diffusion of governmental powers in the hands of the people at large; nor does it much matter whether the established government be known as a "Republic," as in the United States, France, and Switzerland; a "Constitutional Monarchy," as in Great Britain; or an "Empire," as in Germany. In either case, opportunity is still afforded to superior minds to force their way by diligent pressure into the superior social strata. But the point to be insisted upon most strenuously, in these days of threatened civil and religious revolutions, is, that quality of mind and energy of body are always and everywhere appreciated at their proper value in the long run.

That the great mass of humanity will continue to be in the future what they have been in the past, "hewers of wood and drawers of water," is not to be denied by any candid thinker; and this need not preclude their perpetual, although inevitably gradual, improvement. But such improvement will always be based upon existing inequalities of social and material conditions, just as these last find their foundation to rest upon the intrinsic differences of minds and bodies. The shrewd and self-denying individuals will always distance the stupid and self-indulgent; the industrious will count up larger gains than the indolent; the thrifty and provident classes will leave more money to their children than the careless and extravagant. The divergence in the legitimate results of these various traits of character can no more be overcome by artificial restraints or governmental legislation than oak-trees can be made to produce cabbages by act of Congress. Therefore, unless the working-men are willing to give up all the benefits of modern civilization, and take their places upon the same plane as the Apaches of Arizona, the Zulus of South Africa, or the Australian Aborigines, the sooner they disabuse their minds of the prevalent "socialistic" delusions, the better for themselves and for their descendants, as well as for their friends and neighbors, "the educated classes,"—for future generations, and for humanity as a whole!

ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, of St. Louis.

Sept. 25, 1877.

PROFESSOR ALEXANDER LOOS.

Alexander Loos was born in 1821, in Jauer, in the province of Silesia, Prussia. After having received the usual preparatory training, he was matriculated in the University of Breslau in his twentieth year. His original intention was to enter the ministry; but, after spending between two and three years in the study of theology, and after a severe mental struggle, he became convinced that he could not conscientiously remain in the Church. During the remainder of his University course he devoted himself to the study of philology and literature. After leaving the University, he was engaged for a number of years as private tutor in a baronial family near his native place. From that time he identified himself with the reactionary movement in religion which resulted in 1850 in the organization of the "Freie Gemeinden," or Union of Free Congregations, "on the basis of absolute independence from any restraint in religious matters." In 1850 he was married, and in the same year received a call as speaker to one of the newly-formed free congregations in Jauer. The government, seeing in these congregations the germ of a freedom of thought which could not but be fatal to its own selfish ends, resorted to the most extreme means to suppress them. Their members were branded as "republicans," and their meetings broken up on the most trivial pretexts. Finding it impossible to continue the meetings in Jauer, he accepted a similar position in Striegau, but was obliged, as before, to give up his charge. He next was called to take charge of one of the largest of the new congregations in Bavaria. He had, however, been already marked by the government of that kingdom, and was not only denied a residence there, but was not even permitted to address the congregation. Finding that it would be impossible to obtain a foothold in his own country, he yielded to the advice of his friends and came to America in 1852. After teaching languages and music in a number of schools in New York, he removed to Hudson in that State, where he remained for eight years, until the close of the rebellion. During his residence in that city his first wife, by whom he had two sons, died. In 1855 he married again and moved to Petersburg, Va., where he taught for a year. He then accepted a call as professor of music in the University of Lewisburg, Pa. In 1868 he removed to Philadelphia to establish himself as a private teacher. There he remained until his death on the fifteenth of this month.

During all these years, Professor Loos' devotion to the cause of free religion never wavered. He was a constant contributor to the various liberal German newspapers of this country. He also translated a number of pamphlets and essays into English; among these were Dr. Büchner's Lecture on Materialism, and portions of Feuerbach's Essence of Religion. He also translated for the private use of a gentleman of Philadelphia a voluminous theological work of Schleiermacher's, and many scientific essays from both French and German for the American Exchange and Review, of Philadelphia. In 1872 he accepted an invitation from the Freie Gemeinden of North America to represent them at the annual meeting of the Free Religious Association in Boston. At this meeting he delivered an address, setting forth the views of the Freie Gemeinden, which was published in the Report of the Free Religious Association for that year. In 1873 he sent his two eldest sons to Cornell University, to which he was attracted by its non-sectarian character and its liberal course of study. During the whole course of his residence in Philadelphia he was a constant and active worker in the local German Free Congregation, filling the place of the speaker whenever temporarily vacant, and furthering its interests in every way. Last July he was exceedingly active in representing the Germans in the Centennial Congress of Liberals, held in Philadelphia. It was partly in consequence of over-exertion at this time that he incurred the nervous disorder which proved fatal. During the past year, in addition to the regular duties and cares which a large family necessitated, he was engaged in preparing a work on ethics for the use of the German schools of the Freie Gemeinden. He gradually grew weaker, and, notwithstanding a journey to the sea-shore for his health, was obliged to resign himself to medical treatment and the tender care of his family. In spite of everything that could be done, he rapidly sank. During the last week of his illness he was generally unconscious; but in the brief moments when he knew his surroundings he seemed perfectly hopeful and at peace.

Professor Loos has left two sons by his first wife, both of whom have been educated at Cornell University; also two sons and two daughters by his second wife. His fidelity to liberal thought and a scientific religion rendered his labors doubly severe in securing that remunerative employment which the necessities of his family required, notwithstanding his unrivalled excellence as a classical instructor.

His funeral took place in Germantown, on Monday, September 17. Addresses were delivered by Charles Borm, Esq., Damon Y. Kilgore, Esq., and Rev. Charles G. Ames. The German Society of Philadelphia attended the funeral in a body. The widow and children are weighed down with profound sorrow. Liberalism, as well as science, especially in the department of philology, has lost a faithful and earnest advocate, and humanity a noble and consistent friend.

LEGAL RECREATIONS.

In a review of Rogers' Law of the Road, or, Rights and Wrongs of a Traveller, we find the general criticism made that "it is gratifying to find good law and good humor combined in the same book."

This comes as a reminder of a telling illustration by the clergyman who, in the evening discourse at Oak Bluffs last Sunday, from Revelations, twentieth chapter, twelfth and thirteenth verses, created a startling effect upon his three thousand auditors by recital of the experience of a personal friend. Incident to the dramatic effect of this earthly transaction the parallel was drawn from the following alleged facts:—

A man died in Massachusetts, leaving a widow. By hard toil he had accumulated the purchase-price of a homestead upon a corner lot, which was retained after his decease as the family home,—a deed having been executed to the deceased, and, by inheritance, concededly vesting title free from incumbrance.

Here enters upon the scene a worldly, self-seeking, avaricious man of wealth, proprietor of the lot next adjoining that of the widow, whose covetous spirit had fixed his resolution "to lay field to field," at whatever cost. He called upon the widow, stating that he wished to complement his premises by purchase of the corner. She declines any proposition for sale, giving as a reason her strong attachment to the home. This covetous man again calls, giving the result of an appraisal, and offers the widow a sum in excess of the full value, so fixed and requesting her execution of the conveyance to him. Again reiterating her attachment to the home, she declined absolutely to convey.

After a time the man of wealth, from a hill-top views his own and the adjoining corner lot, so much desired, and the passion to possess became so impelling as to lead him (the preacher stated in substance) to commence an action to dispossess this poor widow and compel her to convey. Notwithstanding her defence, and the incidental fact given in this graphic recital, that the title had been undisturbed for "two generations," judgment was directed against her by reason of some technical flaw in the deed. Able counsel were retained at the trial-term, and upon an appeal taken to the Supreme Court; but all proved unavailing, and the judgment below was affirmed.

At this crisis in the transaction, the plaintiff again calls, reviewing his previous offers, the adjudication, its affirmance, and makes an offer to this defeated widow that she shall still convey, he paying the sum offered prior to suit brought.

Now follows the scene intended to fix the mind of the eager three thousand upon the text. The widow's reply, most calmly given, and with a step towards the posture of prayer, follows: "I have taken another appeal, where my counsel has never lost a case."

Naturally the query follows: "To what court? You certainly can take no further appeal. The Supreme Court has decided against you."

With assurance and a calm which the great faith alone of this widow could give, she points the text, and closes the minister's anecdote:—

"I have appealed to the court of heaven; Jesus Christ is my counsel; and I shall not fail. Every man is judged there according to his works."

We admit the gift of the preacher in invocation, well-timed experiences, and illustrations; but "to lead men to Christ" by adoption of false logic, based upon poor law, is not only a reflection upon the Massachusetts statutes and decisions, but leads to the inference that there has crept into this oft-recited tale some falsity of fact; as, upon the premises, any legal mind would have ingrafted three phases of construction, either of which was sufficient to sustain the widow's title:—

1st. A stranger to the grant could not avail of "a flaw in the title," nor breach of condition subsequent. Such objections could be taken advantage of only by the grantor or his heirs, no one of whom is brought into view in the case stated.

2d. Right by prescription, use, and occupation for the period of two generations in the husband and his grantors, without any element of adverse possession.

3d. An entire legal disability by an individual to appropriate private property upon the maximum of compensation, such privilege being reserved to public uses.

Not a critical listener to other personal experiences of the sermonizer on this grand closing of the "big Sunday" at the Vineyard, it seemed to create distrust thus to ingraft upon the text such false law, taking every element of faith from the other stories told.

This is a sad commentary upon the license of the popular pulpit, dealing with God's judgment-records by invoking this revelation as a text, followed by questionable statements in illustration of both fact and law.

A WORLDLY LAWYER.

A CORRECTION.

COLUMBIA, Texas, Sept. 16, 1877.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I notice in "Glimpses," under date of September 6, where you acknowledge receipt of signers to the petition of the National Liberal League, you locate M. L. Weems at "Columbus, Ohio." It should be Columbia, Texas. I should be pleased to see this corrected; for I believe there is more liberalism among our people than is to be found in any other part of the Union.

Only five, of all to whom I presented the petition, refused to sign it. And all these were adherents of the Calvinistic formula. To illustrate further that our people are not much formulated, but as free as the biting sea-breezes they breathe, I will state that, being interrogated, not a great while ago, by a Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church as to the religious and moral status of my town and vicinity, I truthfully replied: "I think, sir, our town and vicinity are improving. A few years ago we kept two churches in good repair, and three or four preachers well-fed and salaried; whereas to-day our churches are going to decay, being frequented mostly by our distant relatives, the bats. And our preachers have either deserted us for better pay, or gone to work to support their families, as honest men should."

CATTARAUGUS COUNTY, N. Y.

EDITOR INDEX:—

The Freethought and Liberal League Committee of this county met in this village to-day, October 1, and appointed a County Convention to be held at Randolph, October 13, at two o'clock, P.M., for the purpose of organizing a Liberal League for the county, and to appoint delegates to the Rochester Congress. They invited your correspondent to address the convention in the evening. In the other counties of the Freethinkers' Association of Central and Western New York where Leagues are not already organized, I recommend the same action as to organization immediately.

THE VERDICT.

I suppose, as the editor and Bishop have referred their case to the jury, they would like to know the verdict. For one I shall have to place the laurel wreath on the Bishop's brow, not because he has maintained his point, but because of his skill and tact in avoiding it.

E. L. CRANE.

TIPPECANOE CITY, Oct. 1, 1877.

THE FOLLOWING amusing story appears in the Liverpool Mercury. It is either original, or the Mercury has forgotten to quote its authority: Long ages ago, in times so remote that history does not fix the epoch, a dreadful war was waged between the King of Cornwall and the King of Scotland. Scottish valor prevailed, and the King of Cornwall was defeated. The Scottish monarch, elated by success, sent for his Prime Minister, Lord Alexander. "Weel, Sandy," said he, "is there ne'er a king we canna conquer the noo?" "An' it please your Majesty, I ken but o' ae king that your Majesty canna vanquish." "An' whaur is he, Sandy?" Lord Alexander, reverently looking up, said, "The King of Heaven." The Scottish king did not understand, but was unwilling to exhibit any ignorance. "Just gang yer ways, Sandy, and tell the King o' Heaven to gi'e up his dominions, or I'll come myself and ding him oot o' them; and mind, Sandy, ye do not come back till us ontill ye ha'e done oor bidding." Lord Alexander retired much perplexed, but met a priest, and, reassured, returned and presented himself. "Weel, Sandy," said the king, "ha'e ye seen the King o' Heaven, and what says he to oor bidding?" "An' it please your Majesty, I ha'e no seen the King himself, but I ha'e seen an o' his accredited ministers." "Weel, an' what says he?" "He says your Majesty may e'en ha'e his kingdom for the asking o' it." "Was he sae ceevil?" said the king, warmed to magnanimity. "Just gang yer ways back, Sandy, and tell the King o' Heaven that for his ceevilty the de'il a Scotchman shall e'er set foot in his kingdom."

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 26, 1872.
 To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
 Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.
 J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
 ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
 C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
 W. D. L. SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
 BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

CHRISTIANITY AND INFIDELITY!

A DISCUSSION BETWEEN

Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian, New York, and

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of the Truth Seeker.

SUBJECTS DISCUSSED:

Part I. The Relative Services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Independence.

Part II. The Relative Services of Christianity to Learning and Science.

Part III. Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that infidelity is true?

A thick 12mo volume of over 500 pages, well bound, sent post-paid by mail for One Dollar. Address D. M. BENNETT, Publisher, 141 Eighth Street, New York.

NEW ENGLAND

MUTUAL AID SOCIETY,

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

(Incorporated under the laws of Mass.)

THIS SOCIETY presents the simplest and cheapest method for making provision for the families of members in the event of disease, that has ever been offered to the public.

The membership may include nearly all persons of both sexes, who are not intemperate or of feeble condition, but will be divided into three classes, viz.:

Class No. 1.—For sound, temperate persons.

Class No. 2.—For equally healthy total abstainers.

Class No. 3.—For those who are not free from disease, but are able to attend daily to their usual avocations.

This arrangement is equitable for all, and the expense the same to enter either class. Applications are now received daily. Send for circular.

Persons who desire to become members, will please send their full address to the Secretary, or apply to nearest Agent.

Agents—both Ladies and Gentlemen are wanted as Canvassers in every Town and Village.

GEO. KEMPTON, Secretary,
New Bedford, Mass.

FROTHINGHAM'S WORKS.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY. An Essay. Third Edition—Revised. Price $1.50.

"Nobody can peruse this book without respect for the learning, mental honesty and skill in the statement of his convictions, possessed by the author, and for the essential integrity and philanthropic tendency of his spirit."—Springfield Republican.

"A profoundly sincere book, the work of one who has read largely, studied thoroughly, reflected patiently. . . . It is a model of scholarly culture and of finished and vigorous style."—Boston Globe.

THE CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION. For Sunday-schools and Homes. Price $1.00.

THE SAFEST ORDEAL, AND OTHER DISCOURSES. 12mo, Cloth, $1.50.

A POPULAR LITERARY PAPER.

THE LITERARY WORLD.

A Monthly Review of Literature.

$1.50 PER YEAR.

The low price of the LITERARY WORLD puts it within the reach of all.

The LITERARY WORLD is now in its eighth year, and has won a high position among the literary authorities of America. It is the only monthly periodical in the country devoted exclusively to books, is comprehensive in its views of current literature, and absolutely independent in its judgments. Its usefulness to all who are interested in literature is conclusively shown by the following testimonials from the most eminent literary judges.

We do not know of any publication that gives so much valuable information and honest criticism of books in so compact and cheap form as this. . . . It deserves a wide circulation, and all interested in books and literature will find its perusal of great advantage. —Manchester (N. H.) Daily Mirror.

It is now a journal which neither the rest of the literary world, nor hardly any one else who is anybody of any consequence, can very well do without. Its purpose, plan, and preparation alike entitle it to a hearty and substantial welcome. —The South.

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seat, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

CIRCULATE IT EVERYWHERE!

The new Liberal League Tract of 24 pages, entitled,

"PATRIOTIC ADDRESS,"

contains:

1. PATRIOTIC ADDRESS of the National Liberal League to the people of the United States.
2. CHIEF RESOLUTIONS of the League.
3. PROTEST of the League against Abusing the International Exhibition on Sundays.
4. CONSTITUTION and List of Officers.
5. EXTRACTS from Approving Letters by Distinguished Citizens.

This is the Liberal's best CAMPAIGN DOCUMENT in the great impending contest over amending the Constitution of the United States with reference to the school question. It should be in the hands of EVERY VOTER, and has been published expressly for gratuitous distribution by earnest friends of State Secularization.

Local Liberal Leagues

Cannot do better than to order this Tract by the quantity, as an excellent auxiliary in their local agitation.

INDIVIDUAL LIBERALS

Cannot do better than to use them privately, as opportunity offers.

CALL FOR THE FIRST ANNUAL CONGRESS OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Boston, Sept. 25, 1877.

In obedience to the Constitution of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July First to July Fourth, 1876, the Directors hereby issue a call for the FIRST ANNUAL CONGRESS of the League, to be held at Rochester, N. Y., October 26, 27, and 28, 1877. The best Hall in the city is engaged for those days. Further particulars, including list of speakers, etc., will be announced hereafter. For information respecting cheap hotel accommodation, reduced fares, etc., apply without delay to Mr. H. L. GREEN, Salamanca, N. Y.

After the hearing of reports and election of officers for the ensuing year, the most important business of the convention will be to decide whether the National Liberal League shall adopt a political platform and nominate candidates for the Presidential election of 1880; and, if so, whether this platform shall advocate the following principles and measures, to wit:—

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, etc.
2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

In order to give to this First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League the representative character befitting the gravity of the questions which will come before it for decision, the Directors suggest and earnestly recommend to the liberals of the United States that they immediately organize themselves throughout the country in Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, each of which, on receipt of a charter, will be entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other members as DELEGATES. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay. Charters are indispensable to secure the unity of organization without which efficient coöperation is impossible; but Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues remain absolutely independent, and recognize no authority in the National League to control their action in any particular. The small fee of ten dollars (which will surely be grudged by no one) is only desired in order to help defray the necessary expenses involved in the conventions and other public work of the National League, which has no salaried officers. Life-memberships of twenty-five dollars, annual memberships of one dollar, and voluntary donations, will also be gladly received for these public purposes. Time presses; and it is hoped that hundreds of new Local Leagues will be organized forthwith. Any existing Liberal society can be represented in the convention by applying for and receiving a charter in the usual way, and transmitting to the Secretary a certified copy of the following vote:—

"Voted, That this society, desiring to coöperate with the National Liberal League in the furtherance of its general and specific objects, hereby declares itself a Local Auxiliary Liberal League, according to the true intent of the Constitution of said National Liberal League, and has duly elected the following persons to represent it at the next Annual Congress of the same; to wit, —, —, —, —."

Persons desiring full information respecting the history, principles, and objects of the National Liberal League, in the shape of a closely printed book of 190 octavo pages, can obtain it by sending for Equal Rights in Religion: Report of the Centennial Congress of Liberals. Price (reduced), in advance, paper covers, 75 cents; handsomely bound in cloth, $1.00.

Address the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

By order of the Directors of the National Liberal League:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.
WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

GLIMPSES.

A NEW Local Auxiliary Liberal League was organized at New Philadelphia, Ohio, October 10, and has received its charter. President, George Riker; Secretary, C. M. Rittenhouse; Treasurer, Jacob Miller. Mr. Riker was appointed delegate to Rochester.

THE CHELSEA (Massachusetts) Liberal League held a meeting in that city, October 11, and elected D. G. Crandon (President), Professor J. H. W. Toohey (Secretary), W. H. Hamlen, Russell Marston, and Captain D. E. Mayo, as delegates to the Rochester Congress.

THE BOSTON Liberal League, at the meeting which was announced in last week's issue, voted to declare itself a Local Auxiliary Liberal League, took out a charter, and elected as delegates to the Rochester Congress the following persons: Francis E. Abbot (President), Miss J. P. Titcomb (Secretary), George H. Foster, Mrs. J. W. Smith, and Mrs. S. B. Otis.

A NEW Local Auxiliary Liberal League was organized at Titusville, Pa., Oct. 10, to which a charter has been sent. The officers are as follows: President, William Barnsdall; Secretary, O. M. Hayes; Treasurer, N. Grossmayer; Councillors, R. W. Saver, Morris Einstein, Mrs. J. Barnsdall, M. J. McDonald. The delegates elected for the Rochester Congress were Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Barnsdall, William Barnsdall, and Morris Einstein.

DELEGATES at Rochester can find board for $2.00 a day at the Brackett House, and for $1.50 a day at Ayer's Hotel and the Chapman House. Mr. Green writes: "Persons attending the Congress from the West, coming over the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad, can procure excursion tickets from Salamanca to Rochester and return for $5.00. Those coming from the east of Corning, N. Y., can procure excursion tickets from Corning to Rochester and return for $3.65. I hope to be able to announce other reduced rates soon."

GENERAL BARTLETT, of Massachusetts, was one of the bravest soldiers and noblest spirits of the great civil war. Repeated and terrible wounds so shattered his health and constitution that, with a proud magnanimity, he wrote to the lady he loved, releasing her from her engagement of marriage on the ground that he had become a mere wreck. What could be more exquisitely touching than her reply? She wrote: "I'll marry you if there's enough left of your body to hold your soul." And she did. There was not enough left of his body to hold his soul many years; it is months now since he sank to his long rest. But those words will be stored up in the treasury of the world's noblest traditions, along with the grandest utterances of Sparta, or Rome, or the America of 1776.

THE TURKS, it would seem from a story told by the London Globe, are capable of a toleration that sets a noble example to many of their self-supposed superiors: "A Roman Catholic funeral procession, followed by an immense crowd, was wending its way through the crowded streets of Pera to the Church of St. Antoine. In front were the priests and choristers, with banners, crosses, and candles. On turning a corner into the Grande Rue, the priests suddenly came face to face with a body of recruits who had just arrived from Smyrna, and were on the march to join their camp in the suburbs. Not a few among the followers dreaded that some insult was about to be offered to the cross, the hated emblem of an alien faith, which was borne in front of the procession. No idea, however, of disrespect apparently dwelt in the minds of the Mussulman redifs. With common accord they one and all reverently drew aside to let the funeral pass, and as the coffin went by them these rugged and untutored sons of Islam raised their hands in military salute."

THE LIST OF SPEAKERS at the Rochester Congress, so far as completed at present, is as follows: Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, of Peoria, Ill.; Mr. B. F. Underwood, of Thorndike, Mass.; Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, N. Y., President of the Freethinkers' Association of Central and Western New York; Mr. Horace Seaver, editor of the Boston Investigator; Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor of the New York Truth Seeker; Mr. F. E. Abbot, editor of the Boston Index; Rabbi Max Landsberg, of Rochester, N. Y.; Rev. W. S. Bell, of New Bedford, Mass.; Mr. Theron C. Leland, of New York City. There is also some reason to expect Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, of Tenafly, N. J.; Mr. William J. Potter, Secretary of the Free Religious Association; Hon. George W. Julian, of Irvington, Ind.; Hon. Ingersoll Lockwood, of New York City; E. W. Meddagh, Esq., of Detroit, Mich.; and many others. The list of subjects, so far as known, is as follows: opening address on "A New Conscience Party," by F. E. Abbot; "Total Separation of Church and State," by Mr. Underwood; "Total Separation of Church and State, as practically demonstrated in the history of the Jews," by Rabbi Landsberg; "The Ethics of Secular Education," by Dr. Brown; "The Bible in the Common Schools," by Mr. Bennett; "Organization," by Mr. Leland; a contributed paper on "Republican Taxation," by Hon. Elizur Wright, of Boston. The day sessions of Friday and Saturday, Oct. 26 and 27, will be devoted to business and free debate on the political platform submitted to the Congress in the "Call" of the Directors; the evenings of these two days, and the whole of Sunday, will be devoted to addresses, short speeches, etc. The Congress will convene at Corinthian Hall, at 10 A.M., Friday Oct. 26.

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

Christianity and Freethought.

BY REV. GEORGE S. MERRIAM.

The Christian Church is often accused of being hostile to freethought. The charge is commonly supported by a reference to the many instances in which the authority of the Church or the influence of theological teachers have been arrayed against new opinions which have been ultimately established as solid advances in human knowledge. But on behalf of the Church a spirited defence is made against the accusation. It is asserted that Christianity has been one of the chief influences in stimulating the mind of men to activity; that it has not only been the teacher of the most important truth known to man, but has in modern times harmonized with the utmost freedom of research and speculation; and that it is as unfair to load existing Christianity with the opprobrium of medieval inquisitions as it would be to hold modern science responsible for the absurdities of alchemy and osteology. It is further said that if the Christian religion fosters an intensity of conviction which is unfavorable to light or easy change of belief, and which in its exaggeration may become bigotry, this belongs to that deepening of the moral lights and shadows which marks the truth and grandeur of religion. By as much as the destiny of man is seen in its real greatness as involving transcendent issues, by so much must the gravest importance rightfully attach to the beliefs and principles by which his course is guided; and a just sense of the consequences of error must have a sobering and conservative influence on inquiry into truth. This wholesome conservatism, it will be said by the champions of the Church, is the only check which Christianity imposes on the progress of thought; and this is a beneficent influence, akin to those deep conservative instincts which in the Teutonic races restrain rash innovations in society and politics, and are a guarantee and aid to safe progress.

We are thus brought to recognize a principle which may perhaps be accepted in its general statement alike by assailants and defenders in the controversy. So far as Christianity asserts certain truths as essential to personal salvation, it practically restricts free inquiry on the part of its adherents in the direction of those assertions of truth. This consequence is inevitable. If, for example, the Church, or any branch of the Church, affixes to the metaphysical definitions of the Trinity, contained in the "Athenasian Creed," this sentence, "which faith except every one do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly," it necessarily discourages anything like a sincere and searching inquiry as to whether those definitions really express matter of human knowledge. So of any other doctrine; the voice that tells men they will be eternally lost if they do not believe it, cannot and ought not really encourage them to examine fearlessly its foundations; for any genuine inquiry implies uncertainty and the possibility of a negative decision, to which there has been affixed in advance a penalty so fearful that intellectual curiosity can supply no motive to justify the risk.

The real nature and effect of this limitation can only be appreciated by a glance at the history of Christianity. The feature in the new religion which at first took strongest hold of the woes of mankind was its confident announcement of a future life. To appreciate the power of that announcement, we must remember that Christianity gained its first successes among the poor and unfortunate, for whom the attractions of the present life were small. Paul wrote with unflattering frankness to his Corinthian converts: "Ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world, and the weak things, and base things." So rare were converts among the higher classes that for a very long time scarcely any attention was paid to the new religion by the literary men of the heathen world whose writings have come down to us. Now, it was just this class of the weak and poor, whom the haughty classic civilization made of far less account than even our own society, and whose life was extremely bare and hard, to whom the confident assurance of an eternity of bliss or woe beyond the grave would come home with the greatest force. And when Christianity was at last extending its conquests through the highest classes, the Roman Empire was encountering disasters that appalled the stoutest hearts, and made inexpressibly welcome the refuge offered beyond the reach of plague and famine, of imperial tyranny and barbarian invader. The greatest theological work of the early Church, Augustine's City of God, was written under the influence of the profound shock which went through the empire when Rome itself fell into the hands of Alaric; the book is a solemn and jubilant acceptance of the transfer of earthly hopes and affections to the invisible city whose builder and maker is God. It was this slow, long, darkening that gradually fell upon the Greek and Roman world, once so full of intense life and boundless expectation, which fixed the minds and hearts of men on the future life with an intensity that can hardly be conceived by us to whom the present is so full and vital. Christianity, which as taught by Christ had been preeminently an ideal of conduct and character, with eternity set as a background to give energy and emphasis to the present life,—speedily became, and was more and more so regarded, a prescribed and definite means of attaining a consummation which began at death. Eternity was now made the foreground of the picture; the present life had no interest or significance save as an instrumentality to something beyond. To escape hell and win heaven became the one absorbing passion in which all the energies of the new religion were concentrated. This was the end sought; what was the means employed?

At an earlier day, even under the ceremonial system of Judaism, the greatest teachers of religion had presented with wonderful clearness and force the idea that the only service required by God is that of right living and spiritual aspiration. Such was David's answer to the great question: "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? Who shall dwell in thy holy hill? He that walketh uprightly and worketh righteousness and speaketh the truth in his heart. He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbor, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbor. . . . He that sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not. . . . He that doeth these things shall never be moved." This passage is the key-note to the religion of the Psalms. The inadequacy of a ceremonial religion, and the true approach to the Deity through pure spiritual emotion, are brought out with unsurpassable distinctness. "Thou desirest not sacrifice, else would I give it; thou delightest not in burnt offering. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; and a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." The prophet Micah gives this striking summary of religion: "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" When from the older Judaism we pass to the life and teaching of Christ, we find the conception of religion as simply right-doing in the broadest and loftiest sense, set forth with a force and fulness, a familiarity and vividness of illustration, and a power of personal example, to which it is impossible to do any justice in a passing allusion. The typical instances of his doctrine are such passages as the blessings pronounced on the pure in spirit, the merciful, the peace-makers, them that hunger and thirst after righteousness; the summing up of all moral obligation in love to God and love to man; the promise that they who forgive shall be forgiven; the sublime representation of a great day of award, in which the sole test and condition of divine favor is to have fed the hungry and clothed the naked, and comforted the sick and sorrowful. But to complete the enumeration would be to summarize the greater part of the entire Gospel narrative.

When from this teaching of Jesus we turn to the sentiment and practice of the Christian Church in the second or third century, we find that in men's thought the test of man's acceptance with God and hope for the future had altered not a little from the simple and grand ideal which the Church's founder had set up. The conception of character is still a high one, and the sense of moral obligation is strong. But we find established at a very early day, and insisted on with constantly growing emphasis, the belief that membership in the visible Church, with due reception of its sacraments and firm belief in all its doctrinal teachings, constituted an indispensable condition of escape from everlasting misery and of entrance on endless bliss. To the purely moral and spiritual requirements of Jesus, there had very early been superadded a set of external conditions. And it is the sorrowful task of the candid Christian historian to show that with amazing rapidity the external requirements overshadowed and dwarfed the moral and spiritual elements of Christianity. Church membership and the sacraments and doctrinal agreement with the majority, from being subordinate and incidental accompaniments of a life of moral order and brotherly love, received more and more the first place, until they came to constitute the most prominent elements of religion, and the chief, if not the sole, conditions of present salvation.

But this great change, so amazing and incomprehensible when we look only at the first and last stages of the process, becomes intelligible as we scrutinize its successive steps. It was natural and inevitable that, for the early Christians, a formal union with the main body of believers should be the immediate consequence of a genuine adherence to their religion. Christianity, in its early purity, was in direct contrast and conflict with the ordinary practice of mankind, at innumerable points. The contrast between "the Church" and "the world" was, in the earliest centuries, such as our society has no parallel or analogy for; it is by an utter perversion of language that the terms denoting the mutual hostility of that period are sometimes applied to the thin and almost invisible distinction which church-membership implies in our modern society. The Christians differed from their neighbors not only in creed but in practices and sentiments interwoven with the whole fabric of daily life; public amusements, personal indulgences, household relations, the offices of state, presented a thousand occasions of difference or sharp collision. Not only in such details, but in the great animating purposes and hopes of his life, the Christian convert found himself at once sundered widely from his old associates, and in imperative need of the closest alliance with those who shared his new life. The Christian Church, as an external organization, with the incidents of formal though simple initiation, and observances that gave expression to its inward fellowship, was an indispensable condition of the survival of Christianity as a spiritual religion. Membership in this visible Church was at the outset no arbitrary or unnecessary requirement; it was a privilege, spontaneously and eagerly sought by whoever had an earnest purpose to follow the religion of Christ. A similar remark may be made of the "belief" which was at first inseparably connected with the Christian life; it was no arbitrary exaction, but something necessarily implied in the very idea of turning from heathenism or Judaism to Christianity. The whole appeal of the new religion lay in its presenting a new set of facts by which life was to be shaped; to "believe" those facts, to accept one living and true God, and Jesus Christ the founder and inspirer of the new society, and the future life which he had promised, as realities,—this lay of necessity in the very act and process of becoming a Christian. Here again we go on using language which has lost its meaning with the change of times. From the pulpit we constantly hear the exhortation, "Only believe!" with a metaphysical and mystical definition of belief, which too often stultifies, or bewilders, or repels the hearer. But "belief" had a very simple and profound meaning when it implied the mind's exchange of the dim, unlovely, immoral delities of Olympus for a spiritual and holy God; the view of life no longer as a transient enjoyment or endurance, beginning and ending in the unknown, but as a heroic service, superintended and rewarded by a beneficent Providence.

The primitive exhortation to believe and be baptized was thus the simple, appropriate, and necessary requirement of the earliest Christianity: belief,—such an acceptance by the soul of the great spiritual realities as should supply internal motives to the new life; baptism,—the simple initiation into that brotherhood which was to supply the indispensable social aid.

But, one by one, came additions of requirement and regulation,—some helpful, some inevitable, many injurious. The great besetting end of religion—the substitution of some externality for the arduous, unsparring demands of right living—throve and grew in the early Church with a rapidity equal to that of its external conquests. Even during its first three centuries—illustrious though they were with a new nobility of life, with the joyful spread of "good tidings" to the poor and the sorrowful, and with the heroism of martyrs,—the Church was yet a hot-bed of superstitions. Its original simple rites were already in the second century invested with a magical potency. The sacraments were channels of supernatural grace. The external elements more and more predominated over the internal. In the third century, the great Cyprian declares that "no man has God for his father who has not the Church for his mother." He banishes the heretic—the dissenter from the growingly elaborate creed of orthodoxy,—from all hope in the world to come, even though he give his body to the flames for the faith which he holds in an imperfect form. Cyprian, though in sterner language than was yet usual, spoke truly the growing sentiment of the Church. With every succeeding age the ritual assumes higher importance; baptism is the washing away of sins, and the unbaptized infant is lost; without the sacraments there can be no reception of Christ; the priest's absolution clears the soul before God; the Church's ministers hold and freely use the keys of heaven and hell. The growing minuteness of the creed, and insistence on its unqualified acceptance, keep pace with the development of ritualism. The passion for speculative theology and for enforced orthodoxy, burst into full flower at about the very moment when, under Constantine, the Church passed from subjection and occasional persecution into the religion of the State. The subtle Greek intellect—its old freshness and originality gone—plunged into abstruse metaphysics concerning the nature of the Godhead. The first universal council was called to decide a controversy—whose terms are so subtle that the mind can scarcely attach any real meaning to them, and whose subject is alike remote from human knowledge and from the conduct of human life; and the Christian world was divided for centuries by a schism that involved persecutions, wars, and unmeasured consignment to perdition of each party by its adversary—on the question whether the Son is of one substance with the Father, or only of like substance with the Father. A long series of similar controversies succeeded, and the verdict of the majority upon each was duly recorded as infallible divine truth, with an anathema upon dissenters. The controversies which, during the same period, took their rise in the western portion of Christendom related originally to more practical subjects, such as the nature of sin, man's dependence relatively on his own will and divine grace, and the like; but they resulted in the most minute and positive dogmatism on the deepest mysteries of human nature, and in the proscription as heretical and damning of views which, to some minds, unquestionably afford a moral consolation and incentive which are not found in Augustinianism. In a word, the whole Church, East and West, having first stimulated the minds of men to great speculative activity, and sincerely believing that on the apprehension of truth in these dim realms depended the attainment of eternal salvation, directed its sternest energies no longer against immorality of life, but against speculative error. The woes which the early Christian teachers had denounced against adultery, drunkenness, murder, hatred, and such like, were now proclaimed against Arianism, Pelagianism, Nestorianism. The Church still made protest and struggle, more or less successful, against the lusts of the flesh; still sought to cultivate that fruit of the Spirit which is love, joy, peace; but above and before all things she fought and conquered heresy of opinion, and, however she might succeed or fail in promoting morality, triumphantly enforced her creed and her ritual.

One can hardly avoid pausing to ask, Is this the history of Christianity? Must it not be the gross caricature of an enemy? But it is from Christian authorities that the material is drawn. It is Athanasius and Eusebius and Augustine and Jerome—names most highly venerated by the Church—that supply to modern compilers the evidence which makes the friendliest narrative of early Christianity a story of swift degeneracy. Dean Milman, eminent in the Church of England for character and attainments, not merely an impartial but a sympathetic historian, says expressly that the one sin against which the Church came to throw its whole strength was heresy; that toward all other offences it was by comparison tolerant. Moral evils eluded and baffled it; but speculative error raised its head only to be crushed. Indeed the briefest glance at what are called the Dark and the Middle Ages—which followed the time we have here especially had in view—is enough amply to confirm Milman's statement. Through these ages the Church was the dominant power in Christendom; every child received her baptism; her membership embraced the whole population. We know well how often cruelty and lust and rapine ran their dark course almost unchecked; we know how deeply at times they infected the priesthood itself; we know that while the Church often made a brave and not ineffectual struggle against these evils, it often connived at them, and continually gave parting assurance of sure salvation to men reeking with impurity and branded with cruelty, if only by rite or offering they made their peace with this hierarchy. And we know that through this same period no man ever uttered a dissent from the established theology, except at dire peril of his life and the Church's eternal curse.

This historical review is necessary to any full understanding of our subject. The present of Christianity can never be thoroughly understood without looking also at its past. Christianity is not merely a system of abstract truths, it is a vast series of facts. It is an historical religion, by no means fixed and unalterable, though including within it some changeless truths; but, as a whole, possessing an extraordinary capacity for development, both in the line of degeneracy and of reformation. Its present condition as a living religion among men is the resultant of forces of which we can partially trace the historic development; it has long and strong roots, running back for thousands of years. One of these roots we have been following in this article, and these are the facts we have reached: that at a very early period, long before the Papacy, and very soon after the New Testament period, Christians came to believe that among the essential conditions of eternal salvation were membership in the visible Church, and acceptance of its rites, and also an implicit belief of all the doctrines set forth by authority of that body; that these ideas grew until they overshadowed the ideas of moral rectitude; and that the controlling and intensely sincere belief of medieval Christianity was, that to be outside of the one Catholic Church, or to reject a single one of her many dogmas, was to incur eternal damnation. The mind of Europe was bound by the twofold and closely linked chain of ecclesiastical subjection and doctrinal orthodoxy.

The effect of the Reformation was to break one strand of this twofold cord, and to leave the other as strong as ever. It freed its adherents from subjection to the Church's government, but it enforced, by the whole weight of its authority, a dogmatic creed no less minute and strict than the old one. Luther's great work was to break down completely the rule of the Roman hierarchy over Northern Europe. The impulse that inspired him to this achievement, and enabled him to perform it, was essentially a moral impulse. He was not actuated by any abstract love of liberty or reverence for freethought; such feelings were uncongenial to the age, and wholly foreign to Luther. Nor was it a dissent from the doctrinal theology of the Catholic Church that first or chiefly moved him; his theological dissent was less the cause than the consequence of his revolt. Luther, along with many other of the best qualities of the Germanic race, had very strongly that profound regard for practical morality which seems especially to belong to it. It was the shameful traffic in indulgences, with its direct license and encouragement of all manner of vice, that drew him from his peaceful professor's chair into battle. It was in the cause of purity of life, the cause of religion, not as a shield for immorality, but as its unrelenting foe, that the great Saxon put on his armor. Only when he found that the head of the Church persistently gave protection and countenance to moral corruption, did he at last deny the rightfulness of his rule. Once engaged in that daring revolt—as full of danger and difficulty as man ever undertook,—he threw his whole strength into the fight, and took, without faltering, every step to which his denial of the Pope's sovereignty led him,—a new organization, a modified creed, a line of cleavage running from top to bottom of religious life. But, throughout, the motive that upheld him, and that rallied to his side the best forces of his time, was that desire for moral reformation which had for centuries broken defeated against the walls of Church authority, until now, at last, it broke down those walls. Even the alterations in theology on which Luther laid most stress had their real inspiration in this underlying assertion of freedom from an immoral tyranny. Luther's great theological watchword was "justification by faith." Partly, that doctrine was an outgrowth from his own religious experience, and the expression in a somewhat dogmatic form of the soul's priceless right of immediate personal access to the divine Goodness. But it took definite shape, and was put in the forefront chiefly because it was the completest denial of the dependence of the soul on sacramental grace, which had put in the hands of the priesthood its most irresistible weapon.

Luther, then, and the reformers in general, denied and overthrew the authority of the Catholic Church, having for their strongest and best motive a regard for that Christian morality which the Church had betrayed. But nothing was further from the thoughts and wishes of the reformers than to liberate men from the obligation of Orthodox belief, under the most awful penalties. That inheritance from the medieval Church they found no occasion to part with. They altered somewhat the definitions of orthodoxy, retaining, however, the larger part of the traditional creed, and they enforced it with all the greater vehemence because they dreaded the possible extent of the unsettling which they had themselves begun. They were extremely intolerant toward the differences which very soon rose among themselves. Catholicism has always reproached Protestantism with the multitude of its sects, and the Protestant defence has been that these minor differences were the legitimate fruits of the fertile human intellect working in its proper freedom. But, unfortunately, the founders of the Reformation, while they lacked the power to suppress these differences, frowned upon them as heretical, and freely affixed the old spiritual anathemas to those who went a little beyond them in their own path.

There is a scene in the early history of the Reformation, not without pathos in itself, but deeply tragic to us who understand its ominous significance. The Swiss leader, Zwingle—himself an originator in the Reformation, a man of noble character and thoroughly Christian faith,—differed from Luther in his view of the Lord's Supper, he esteeming it only a commemorative ordinance, while Luther gave it a mystical character somewhat approaching the Catholic idea. Their friends brought about a conference between them, and from the largeness of Luther's nature and Zwingle's liberality and kindness of temper, a good result might well have been hoped. On opposite sides of a table, surrounded by their friends, they argued the matter long, till Luther, taking a piece of chalk, wrote on the table, "Hoc est meum corpus," and refused to yield one iota of what he held to be the plain declaration of Scripture. Any doctrinal compromise being impossible, Zwingle, with tears in his eyes, offered to Luther the hand of brotherly fellowship, but Luther refused to take it, and so they parted. Doubtless the refusal cost a sharp pang to the great and kindly heart that yet was bound by loyalty to what seemed to it vital matter of Christian faith and human salvation. The real tragedy of the scene lies in the fact that, to so good and great a man as Luther, man's acceptance with God should seem to depend on the right construction of a metaphysical dogma, and an upright and faithful life appear exposed to endless ruin for misconstruing a text of Scripture. And Luther stood not alone in this, but as one in a long line of men who have been influential in human affairs, many of them distinguished by noble and even lovable characters, who have verily thought they were doing God service in insisting upon the acceptance of a particular creed as necessary to an escape from his eternal wrath.

We need not dwell upon the period of the Reformation. Its principal leaders—Luther, Calvin, Knox, and their associates—set up and imposed upon the Protestant churches, by the most solemn sanctions, schemes of doctrine even more minute and elaborate than the Catholic Church had enforced. The heroic age of the Reformation very speedily passed; and the conflict between the two great hostile parties, though sometimes involving moral elements, became to a great extent a warfare in part of temporal interests and in part of metaphysical systems. Protestantism, in its various branches, upon the whole insisted even more strenuously on soundness of orthodoxy than did Catholicism, for the latter made acceptance of its government and ritual the chief requirement. We have not space here, nor is it necessary to our purpose, to trace the general wave of ecclesiastical power, the growth of secular interests, the partial reconciliation with one another of most of the minor Protestant sects. We have followed, in a very general survey, the historic development of the disposition to consider the acceptance of certain beliefs as indispensable to Christian life and to salvation beyond the grave. It remains only to glance at a very few indications of the influence of this attitude of mind in our own day.

A candid comparison of the present state of religious feeling with that which existed three hundred years ago can hardly fail to disclose among its first results a very great mitigation of the severe exclusiveness of orthodoxy. Even the Catholic Church, though still in its corporate capacity adhering to its anathemas on those who deny its claims, shows in the mass of its members an unmistakable disposition to soften or evade the rigor of its sentence. Very few good Catholics in our day, it is safe to assert, look for the final damnation of their Protestant neighbors in any such confident and vivid way as once was common. Among Protestants, there is no such inextinguishable insistence on the finer minutiae of their various creeds as characterized their ecclesiastical ancestors. The modern representatives of Lutheranism would not deny the character of Christians to the followers of Zwingle. The Calvinist and the Arminian, the Baptist and his opponent, the Churchman and Quaker, however firmly each may hold to his own peculiarity, would very rarely deny that divine grace and eternal salvation were amply possible to those who rejected it.

And yet, a very little examination will show that even in our modern Protestant churches an immense influence is exerted by the idea—held either as a definite belief or a vague but powerful sentiment—that well-founded hope of future salvation is possible only to those who substantially acquiesce in the body of doctrine set forth by the Church. This statement hardly needs proof. We may take two illustrations of it, from the opposite extremes of the Protestant body. One of the most interesting religious autobiographies ever written is the Apologia pro Vita Sua of John Henry Newman. The writer's exquisite literary skill is not more noteworthy than the attractive and admirable qualities of his mind and heart. In purity of purpose, in painful and patient search for truth, and in sacrifice of the dearest earthly interests to his religious convictions, he is a man whom the Anglican Church may alike be proud to have bred, and the Roman Church to have won. Now, at the very crisis of his long struggle between the two faiths, we find him writing thus to one who was in a position resembling his own: "The simple question is, can I (it is personal, not whether another, but can

I) be saved in the English Church? am I in safety, were I to die to-night? Is it a mortal sin in me, not joining another communion?" Here we have a man of the finest culture and the most ardent aspiration toward truth, weighed down by the apparently unquestioned conviction that on the right solution of a most complicated and perplexing problem might hang his soul's eternal welfare. What idea could possibly be more prejudicial to that calm, dispassionate atmosphere in which truth is sought for its own sake solely, and with instinctive confidence that the soul's best safety lies in fearlessly following the truth? And what could throw more rational doubt on the soundness of Newman's final decision between the two alternatives, than the circumstance of the tremendous bribe to choose the safer course to which his preconceptions exposed him?

At the very antipodes from Dr. Newman's type of character is that of Mr. Moody. He is without scholarly taste or training, supremely indifferent to abstractions, intensely practical, bound by the closest ties of sympathy and mutual understanding to the common people. And Mr. Moody (in this not unlike Dr. Newman) shows not a single trace of the bitter and malign qualities by which the odium theologum is fed. The whole stress of his preaching is in the line of the cheerful, buoyant, and hopeful sentiments. Yet Mr. Moody teaches plainly and constantly that the only way to be saved is through belief in the doctrine of substitutional atonement. It is impossible to find fault with him personally for narrowness or uncharitableness. Not only is he wholly kind and helpful in his spirit, but to his mind the scheme of theology in which he has been trained represents a definite, positive, unalterable set of facts; and these "facts" have to him a literal unquestionable reality which is not only unattainable but almost inconceivable to minds of a more speculative and philosophical cast. He honestly presents his view of the moral universe, and to his mind it is as clearly impossible to escape endless ruin except by faith in the literal shedding of Christ's blood for human transgressions, as to walk across the North River dry-shod. Beyond doubt, this intensely literal and absolutely unquestioning belief—which in its fullness is simply impossible to most men who have received as much education as the average minister—is one source of Mr. Moody's power over a very large class. It is equally clear that it must be wholly unfavorable to any genuine and searching inquiry into the truth of the doctrines taught; for it is idle to tell a man he may freely examine the truth of a statement, but if he concludes it is not true he will be damned. And, while Mr. Moody undoubtedly does great good—much more good than his imitators are likely to do,—it must be recognized that along with this goes a steady, quiet repulsion of a large class of minds from the Christianity which is thus presented. Thoughtful people are not any better necessarily than unthoughtful; but in the long run it is the thoughtful class that draws into its wake the entire community. It seems worth the consideration of those clergymen who are accepting Mr. Moody's style of work not merely as good in its place, but as the sole or main work of the Church,—whether they are not endangering the future and permanent success of their cause for the sake of visible present results.

To recur from these special instances to general facts, we have apparent at this time on the one side, a strange disposition to turn the intensely active thought and the vast disclosure of new facts which characterize this age in the direction of earnest, serious scrutiny into religious truth. Such questions as these regarding the nature and authority of the Scriptural writings, the cosmogony which has heretofore been a corner-stone of theology, the traditional teaching of a literal eternity of future punishment; questions yet more fundamental than these; inquiries as to the existence and essential nature of the deity; whether there is a moral governor of the universe; whether there is possible to man any sure knowledge of his Maker, or any spiritual communion with a heavenly Father; whether there is a life beyond the grave; whether, in a word, the faiths which have been the dearest treasure of suffering humanity are outworn and mischievous delusions, or the expression of eternal truths which are to take on new glory with advancing knowledge,—these and similar questions are pressing upon thoughtful and earnest men with an irresistible demand for fearless consideration and candid answer. And over against this class of facts we have this other: the great body of professional teachers of religion are under the powerful influence of an inherited feeling that to disbelieve a certain general system of doctrine is to incur the risk of perdition; and are bound in conscience by that belief to give no countenance to any inquiry which is not pledged in advance to lead to the old conclusions. This statement by no means exhausts the grounds of theological conservatism; its force is strengthened by broader and by narrower considerations: by a natural recoil from the temporary weakening of straightforward moral energy that is inevitable when the mind is in a questioning and transitional state; and also by that less disinterested dread of change which inheres in all great "vested interests" like the Church. But under all such considerations, giving heaviest weight and sharpest edge to the Church's opposition to unlimited freedom of inquiry, lies this ancient, deep-rooted belief or feeling—seen most distinctly in a man like Mr. Moody,—that certain doctrinal statements are a divinely constructed bridge which offers the only way across a fiery gulf to a heavenly refuge.

We need not further describe the two coöperating forces; nor need we dwell on the peril which their opposition implies—the danger of a religion afraid to examine its own foundations, drifting toward insincerity, cowardice, self-seeking, and the loss of the noblest religious qualities; and, on the other side, the danger of a philosophy chilled and deadened by want of the devout and reverential spirit which the Church fosters, and becoming meagre and uninspirational by severance from the great historical embodiment and representative of Christian faith and hope and love. The danger is evident enough: where lies the prospect of escape?

It lies, apparently, in the growing development within the Church of that conception of religion in which character is central and supreme. The difficulty disappears when the Church accepts its Master's definitions of religion. Humility, purity, hunger and thirst for righteousness; love to God and love to man; absolute trust in the Power that rules the universe; the spirit of brotherhood toward all mankind,—these ideals are in perfect consonance with the spirit of the most fearless truth-seeking; they supply to it the firmest basis and the noblest motives.

Such a conception of religion will not ignore the fact that intellectual beliefs have a direct bearing on character. But it will find in that fact the incentive to earnest and fearless essays toward true belief; not thinking of the divine Ruler as watchful to smite even barest error with eternal wrath, but heartily accepting the word that they who seek shall find.

The question of how far and how fast the Church is actually coming to this conception of a religion of character is one to which it is best not to give a too sweeping or confident answer. But it is to be noted, first, that the radical renovation and purification of an historical religious system is by no means impossible. Other religions than Christianity have experienced some degree of such a regeneration; but this capacity peculiarly belongs to the genius of Christianity, and is one secret of its strength. The Protestant Reformation, with all its limitations and drawbacks, was a notable instance of the self-purifying power of Christianity; the moral and spiritual renovation of the Catholic Church, which was the counter-stroke to the Protestant revolt, supplied another instance, though with a larger infusion of unworthy elements; and both before and since that period there have been not a few cases where either the whole Church, or an important branch, has roused from corruption and lethargy to purer life and fresh conquests. It seems not over-sanguine to find in the signs of our times many indications yielding hope of another and a profound regeneration of the religious spirit. These indications point to the identification of religion with personal character, character at once in its simplest and largest sense; as right-doing,—the faithful, patient pursuit of all moral excellence; as aspiration and toll toward a perfect manhood, a manhood firmly planted in fidelity to all human and earthly relationships, and bound by conscious and vital kinship to the spiritual power of the universe. This religion, when fully developed, will recognize goodness as the one thing needful; it will find the noblest employment for all lofty and spiritual faiths in applying them to produce integrity, purity, love, joy, peace, in the lives of men; it will find in such fruit the best approval of the faiths that nurtured it; it will, let us hope, by making men morally better, and purifying their minds of the animalism, bitterness, and selfishness that dim the moral vision, enable them to discern as by intuition the great spiritual realities about which we question, thus making good the promise that the pure in heart shall see God. While a religion of character will thus be in the strongest sympathy with spiritual faith, it will not condemn any man, whatever his belief, who in his life is pure and benevolent; it will not be afraid to accept the teaching of Jesus, that the supreme test-question is whether we have ministered to the hungry, the naked, the sorrowful, and the sinning. It will affirm without reservation that the only real heresy is wrong-doing.

It may be asked on what grounds there can be based any hope that the Church at large is likely to accept such a conception of religion. We would by no means be understood as giving an altogether confident or positive expression to such a hope. The elements of ceremonialism and dogmatism are very strong; they often display a fresh vitality that might astonish us, did we not reflect, first, that these elements have for many centuries been worked deep into the blood and bone of Christendom; and, next, that they have a powerful ally in human nature, which finds great ease and attractiveness in a religion that says, "Don't try to reform yourself; don't labor painfully to be good; you have only to believe and be safe." It is not impossible that such conceptions of religion, and the kindred conception which makes ritual and sacrament; rather than belief, the substitute for character, may for a long time predominate in the Christian Church. Such a result would indicate a future that is painful to contemplate, but is not therefore impossible. But, on the other hand, there is a tendency in the Church—a tendency broader and deeper than the surface shows—more and more to give to character the first and supreme place. This tendency exists even in denominations which are in their organization most highly ecclesiastical and dogmatic. In these denominations there are a great many religious teachers who, occupying various attitudes toward the theological systems of their churches, agree in making it the grand aim of their work to promote right living in their hearers. The best and most influential of these workers are not polemic; they have seen the unfruitfulness of doctrinal controversies; they have no desire to break with the churches to which they are bound by habit not only, but by affection and usefulness. They make far less noise than the champions of tradition, to whose voices anxiety and apprehension give a kind of shrill vociferousness. They constitute no party or sect; they have no shibboleths; they differ widely among themselves on questions of theology. But they are working in an almost unrecognized fraternity, whose common object is to make Christianity a living power in the hearts and lives of men. They are open-minded to all new light; they look to science as a friend rather than a foe; they accept it as their business to use all truth old or new in making stronger, sweeter, better men and women. We can take no census of these workers, nor can we weigh and estimate the influence of their spirit among the conflicting forces of the time. But we may remember that "the kingdom of God cometh not with observation," and in the very quietness of this work we may see a hopeful omen.

Further, it is to be remembered that "Christianity" and "the Church" are no longer convertible terms. The Church, as an organization, has immense moral power; in the very principle of organization it builds on the social element which is among the strongest forces of human nature; and among its instrumentalities there are many which are most admirably adapted to move and control men. It includes measureless influences of sympathy, memory, association; no comprehensive outlook toward the future of religion can fail to take large account of the organized church. But, after all, we shall find at the present day some of the purest and most beneficent aspects of Christianity outside of the pale of any church. The imposition of a creed at the church-door seems to shut out some of the sincerest and most spiritual men and women; and though the Church loses them, they are not lost to the community. Of the great moral reforms of our day, some, like the temperance movement, have been taken under the care of the Church; but others, like the anti-slavery cause and the present effort for political reform, have had to find leaderships elsewhere. Some of the greatest achievements of the practical Christian spirit, in thought and life, have been wrought under the indifference or hostility of the Church. It must be said that toward these dangers in our commercial and political society which gives most concern to thoughtful men, the Church, as an organization, fails to display any such sensitive apprehension and energetic opposition as she shows toward church innovations in philosophy. Not unnaturally or illogically, from her traditional standpoint, she is far more enthusiastic in the work of "saving souls" than in that of purifying the government, or raising the standard of public and private morals. It would not be unjust to add that those denominations and those churchmen who are most serviceable in these directions are to a great extent—by no means exclusively—those who are under the open ban, or at least the marked suspicion of the ecclesiastical majority, as of unsound or doubtful orthodoxy. Many times before now the "heretics" have been the salt that kept life in the Church, and it may be so again.

But, after all, the Church is not Christianity. Even if the Church should fail to recognize the supremacy of character, and thus wed faith to free-thought, we may still look with hope to that large and vital Christianity which is nobly expressed in literature, and more nobly expressed in countless humble lives, to meet the emergency. As Abraham left the land of his fathers, as the children of Israel marched through the wilderness to the promised land, as the Pilgrim Fathers turned their backs on the Harlem Meer and the Zuyder Zee to build a new nation in the free West, so man still leaves behind him the old abodes that he has outgrown, to find a home larger, fairer, nearer to God.—Scribner's Monthly for October, 1877.

There was a meeting of the Board of Trustees of the Paine Memorial Building, Aug. 31, 1877. The following minutes of that meeting show what action was then taken:—

Minutes of a Meeting of the Board.

Aug. 31, 1877, met as per agreement, Mr. Seaver in the Chair. Mr. Mendum, as Secretary, read the minutes of the last meeting, which were approved.

Mr. Mendum stated that the taxes for 1876 were due, and the interest on the first mortgage, amounting to $1750, would be due on the 15th of September, and asked advice of the Board what should be done to raise the means to meet these demands.

Mr. B. F. Underwood moved that inasmuch as we have no funds to meet the taxes and interest on the first mortgage, we consider it advisable to let the first mortgagees advertise and sell the property, and that Mr. Mendum or some friend bid it in, to be retained in the cause of free-thought. That if Mr. Mendum does not choose to permit the sale of the same, and can raise the money to meet the present demands and will do so, such a course will meet the approval of the Board of Trustees, provided the other members are not held personally liable for the money thus raised.

J. P. Mendum agreed to relieve the other members of the Board of Trustees, in writing, of all liabilities in regard to the second mortgage, or costs incidental thereto.

After the meeting of the Board, of which the records are given above, Mr. Mendum paid the taxes, amounting to $1000.74, for which the building was advertised to be sold the 10th day of September, 1877; and on the 15th of September he also paid interest on the first mortgage, amounting to $1750. A few days ago a bill for taxes now due, $907.83, was received by the trustees, with the usual notification that the property would be advertised for sale if the amount were not paid within thirty days.

October 1 the Board again met, and what was done will be seen from the following record of its proceedings:—

Minutes of a Meeting of the Board, Oct. 1, 1877.

The trustees met pursuant to notice,—Horace Seaver in the Chair, B. F. Underwood, Secretary.

Minutes of the last meeting were read and approved.

After a statement of the financial condition of the building by Mr. Mendum, and consideration of the same by the trustees, it was voted: That, whereas the call upon the liberal public for contributions to save the Paine Memorial Building, of date June 18, 1877, has failed to elicit anything like a sufficient sum to meet even the immediate expenses of the building, and seeing no prospect of success in the future, and unwilling to solicit further donations for the building when there seems to be no way to hold it with the contributions we are likely to obtain, therefore we consider it advisable for the interest of all parties concerned, that the building be sold by the mortgagee. This was moved by B. F. Underwood, seconded by Thomas Robinson, and was unanimously passed by the Board.

Moved by Mr. Robinson, and seconded by Mr. Mendum, that, whereas we have recommended the sale of Paine Memorial Building under foreclosure of mortgage, we decide to revoke all calls for further contributions, and to notify the liberal public that no scrip will be issued by the trustees as a means of obtaining a loan. Passed unanimously.

Moved by B. F. Underwood, and seconded by Thomas Robinson, that if any liberal shall bid in the building, to be retained for liberal purposes, we will regard such action as deserving the thanks of the liberal public; and any effort to obtain contributions or loans by issuing scrip on his personal responsibility would, in our opinion, be worthy of encouragement. Passed unanimously.

The trustees have given much time and attention to the interest of the Paine Memorial, and made every reasonable effort to obtain money for the building. But the amount received by contributions since we have had control of the building has been small, considering the money needed to pay taxes and interest and meet the necessary expenses. We have been able to hold the property up to the present time only because Mr. Mendum has generously seen fit to advance the money for the taxes and interest, and thus has postponed the sale of the building.

The course which the trustees now advise—they can only advise, owing to the heavy indebtedness which puts the building virtually in the hands and subject to the control of the mortgagees—is simply a necessity. Further efforts to hold the property are useless, and we are unwilling to take contributions for the building when we see clearly that even if we were able to meet the present demands, there would be no prospect of preventing its sale at a later date.

RAPID ADVANCE OF EDUCATION IN ENGLAND.

The English people are working out the problem of common-school education with great vigor. If late in beginning, they are making up for their tardiness by extraordinary efficiency. In seven years the accommodations for pupils, in schools to which annual grants are made, have risen from 1,878,584 to 3,426,718 places. Of the number of children between three and thirteen years of age, and likely to require elementary schools—4,606,544,—nearly all are provided for. The cost of this rapid advance, as will be readily supposed, has been very great. Forty millions of dollars have been spent since 1870 on the "Board Schools" alone; at the same time, the supporters of "Church Schools" have taxed themselves freely to sustain their system. The Church schools have also State help, so that by voluntary subscriptions, local sales, and National grants the English are spending enormous sums for the better education of the masses of people.

The same signs of rapid development appear in the teaching supply. In seven years the number of teachers holding certificates of competency for their work has nearly doubled,—rising from 12,027 to 23,328; the number of pupil-teachers has advanced from 12,842 to 30,826. The number of new candidates for this vocation is estimated at 1,500 yearly. Already it is said that their chances of adequate remuneration are better than those of the average clergy of the State Church. The compulsory loan of 1876 is now applied to nearly half of the population. No demur is made to its operation, and it is evident that compulsion will be sustained by public opinion.

Two facts in the direction now given to English elementary education are of interest to Americans,—the triumphs of the undenominational and the Church school system, and the method of religious instruction in the schools of the former class. The Board Schools won a victory over their State Church antagonists in the London elections last fall; the report on education for 1876-77 shows the additional fact that over 600 schools, most of them denominational, were during the year transferred to School Boards. An illustration of the English idea of undenominational religious instruction appears in a recent distribution in London of 4,000 Bibles as prizes to Board School children for proficiency in biblical scholarship. Lord Sandon, who distributed the prizes, stated that they were awarded after examination, and that the number of competitors was 82,000. Of the 150,000 children of the London Board Schools only fifty had during the year been withdrawn from religious instruction. It would appear, therefore, that after their long discussion of the "religious difficulty," as they termed it, the Londoners have settled it with an approach to unanimity. Taking into consideration all the facts, it may be predicted that England will not long lag behind other nations of Europe in provision for the universal education of the people.—Tribune.

OPENING OF READING-ROOMS ON SUNDAY.—A discussion took place among the members of the Benalla Mechanics' Institute on a proposal to open the reading-room for a certain time on Sundays. The subscribers who spoke in favor of the opening, brought forward sensible articles in support of their case, while the speakers on the other side of course had no arguments whatever, and simply repeated the innate parrot-cry about "the thin end of the wedge," which seems to be the favorite watchword of the Sabbatarians. But the subscribers to the Benalla Institute saw through the hollowness and profanity of the Sabbatarians talk, and decided by an overwhelming majority of forty-two votes to eighteen, that the reading-room should be opened on Sundays during the hours proposed.—North Eastern Ensign (Australia).

A CONTRAST.

Two faces in my mind I see,
Two faces of Humanity;
One that is haggard, sad, and pale,
One that is smiling, callous, hale.

The sad face looks, with purest eye,
Up to the ever beauteous sky,
And in it finds, whate'er beneath,
A solace for all human grief.

The sad face has the power to lift—
If Fortune ne'er has given a gift,—
To soothe and keep a genius-brain,
The fruits of fair sweet Nature's reign.

The smiling face turns e'er to view
An eye of cold, repelling hue;
Lov'd golden dross has stamped this face
A curse, not blessing, to the race.

One face is saddened by the sight
Of darkened, wasted, precious light;
One face is only clouded o'er
When not so rich in dross as yore.

Which of these faces, drawn from ye,
Prefer ye, O Humanity!
The smiling one, well nursed by gold?
The saddened, though the noblest-souled?

THE BURNING SHIPS.

Heed ye the voice the fathers heard,
Bearing to them a magic word?
Ah, well it is if ye do heed,
And well if ye are all agreed
To be as true and brave as they
Who heard, nor dared to disobey.

Commanding word! one and the same
From age to age, whate'er the name
We call: "Thy bark trust to the wave,
Nor let old loves your lives enslave.
Forsake them all if need there be
To sail with Truth the open sea."

Far from the shore where ye were born,
With joy ye greet a brighter morn
Than rose to cheer your pilgrim sires.
What wait ye now? Go, light the fires
Will burn the ships that still do give
A pathway where ye once did live.

The old homes leave with the dead years,
Nor think that ye have cause for tears.
Ah! he who would remain a child,
Yet build as man on desert wild
The newer homestead, love's new dower,
Must thrive with love's creative power.

What! know ye not the earth is one,
Gets light and heat from self-same sun?
Fear not to trust the goodly globe
To weave away a royal robe!
Upward, then, rear with cheer and song
The home of love where ye belong!

Ply the new task. Come, each and all,—
For o'er your ships heaven's fire doth fall,
And they are burning to the sea:
Their duty's done, and they are free.
Let Freedom be your own! glow bright
Her rays, dispel old error's night!

The Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 18, 1877.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 38 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

MR. W. G. H. SMART is editor of a new paper in this city, called the Workingman's Ballot. It is devoted to Social Democracy and the Workingmen's party.

MR. UNDERWOOD's lecture engagements, prior to the meeting of the Rochester Congress, at which he will be present, are as follows: Toronto, Oct. 14; Cincinnati, Oct. 16 and 17; and La Rue, Ohio, Oct. 19, 20, and 21.

MR. W. HITFIELD, of West Philadelphia, has just published this communication in the New York Tribune, addressed to the editor: "Sir,—Several times in your columns have appeared the utterances of the scholarly lecturer, the Rev. Joseph Cook, touching the question of rationalism and its decline in the world, especially in Germany. Being unable in my own investigations to reach such a result, making the basis of my examination the aggregate of statements of travellers, statisticians, essayists, and reviewers, authors and historians of recognized impartiality, I beg leave to ask for conceded authorities covering the territory of this question. Let us have facts, statistics, and statements from official sources—for such there are,—and references to written documents, that the reader may verify for himself the weight of evidence one way or the other. There must be some reason why Orthodox theologians of great prominence in their several denominations are writing as they now do of the decline of what has been called Evangelical doctrines on the one side, and the increase of rationalism and Romanism on the other." The publication of such statistics would be extremely interesting, and we should be more than glad to publish them.

A RESOLUTION was introduced at the Episcopal General Convention in this city, Oct. 9, "requesting the House of Bishops to set forth a form of service to be used on the Fourth of July, as long as that day should continue to be observed as a legal holiday." In proportion as the churches grow stronger, they manifest more and more a disposition to intrude themselves into the secular life of the nation, and seek to stifle or pervert all secular observances in the interest of Christianity. New Year's Day as a festival is perishing in this manner under the Church's fostering care of Christmas as a rival festival; and now it is evident that the Fourth of July, so long sacred to strictly national traditions and honest secular jubilation, is to be quietly captured for "Christ and him crucified." Among the resolutions of the Centennial Congress of Liberals was one of protest against the proclamation by President Grant which invited the people to celebrate the Centennial Fourth of July by religious observances, as a most unwarrantable assumption of a "strictly ecclesiastical function." Now one sees a further step in this direction contemplated by the great Episcopal body, in adopting a special form of religious service for the nation's holiday. Like a true anaconda, the Church, having captured its victim, proceeds to cover it with saliva before finally swallowing it. Says the Nation, which has a happy faculty of stating truths possessing a broader application than it intends: "What we need in the commercial [and religio-political] world is not so much lecturers and preachers to tell us after we have broken our heads that it was all due to our fast driving, as somebody to tell us while driving that at that pace our heads are in danger. Somehow these people do not appear at the right time." O yes, they appear,—but only, like THE INDEX, to be ridiculed and disregarded till the mischief is done. Perhaps the Rochester Congress may succeed in making its warning heard. We hope it may.

FROM DAY TO DAY.

The world is full of men and women who secretly live on the hope of some great stroke of fortune in the time to come—some vision of love, riches, social standing, professional success, political position, or a lasting name. They set their hearts on the winning of this future prize, and endure with fortitude the pressure of present ills because they bask in the light and warmth of this imagined bliss that awaits them. Religion itself, as mankind have hitherto conceived it, pledges to him of the meanest lot, on cheap conditions, a future of dazzling and interminable delight; it kindles in his bosom a devouring and consuming expectation of happiness which shall come to him, not at all by any exertion of his own, but by the gratuitous condescension and favor of a supernatural Power.

Whether the prize that thus fascinates the soul's gaze be one of earth or of heaven, it matters little, if the attainment of this prize depends on any power outside the soul itself; the effect is all the same in eating away that strength of moral life, that formidable vigor of character, which is the crown of self-sovereignty. That man makes himself a slave to Fate who once stoops to behold in foreign hands, human or divine, the object of his own supreme ambition. The law by which he lives must be henceforth beyond himself, an arbitrary rule which enchains him with his own self-made fetters. Narrow as may be the field of man's autonomy, it is the reality of realities to him who refuses to part with it, or to sell his birthright for a mess of pottage; it is the inviolable kingdom which can never be wrested from him by any force without his own consent, and which, royally maintained, makes its master one who is "Lord of himself, though not of lands, And, having nothing, yet hath all."

Few there are, it must be owned, who vindicate their royalty in this kingdom of the soul. History tells of some of these,—Socrates, Confucius, Sakya-muni, Spinoza, Emerson,—but makes no mention of the more who lived and died unknown. The greatness of such spirits lies in one thing: they refuse to find their supreme good in anything beyond their own control. He who lives for the future can never make this refusal. The future is no man's. Causes man cannot master enter among the forces which shape it. To set your heart irrevocably on that which lies beyond your reach, whether in space or time, binds you with hooks of steel to the chariot of a Power you can neither scrutinize nor guide; it will drag you whithersoever it will, on unexpected and unwelcome paths, and you will struggle with it in vain. The price of your independence is that self-restraint in aim and wish which enables you to compel all forces to do your bidding—that wise forbearance to seek or to covet more than you hold it in your own actual and present power to possess. It is the present, not the future or the past, which will obey you; here is the limit of your empire, the boundary of the little State in which you are at once king, priest, and population. Seek your summum bonum in your own dominion, and it is yours; seek it elsewhere, and you have taken on your neck the yoke and the foot of a foreign lord.

What, then, is this summum bonum, this object of supreme ambition, which is alone compatible with either freedom or dignity of spiritual being? In one word, DUTY: that is, conformity of your whole life, outer and inner, with the moral order of the universe. No man was ever yet placed in circumstances in which he had no power to do his duty. For his duty never extends beyond his power; they are co-terminous. No matter how difficult or dark, duty is always the possible, the present, the supreme. It is everlastingly at hand; it cannot be escaped; it fits closer than the shirt of Nessus, and, if disregarded, is a deadlier poison to the soul. In a thousand relations every man stands involved—relations to family, friends, acquaintances, fellow-citizens, fellow-men, in ever-widening circles; and in each relation, at each moment, he owes somewhat, and this ought is his duty. There is no power that can abolish the soul's sovereignty in the realm of duty while life endures, for duty and life are one. He who in the largest sense surrenders himself to duty makes destiny his slave; he alone succeeds, though the world may imagine he is overwhelmed with failure; he alone can with infallible certainty command success, for all its conditions are in his own control. The prize for which he lives is not in the future, but at every instant lies like a captured bird in the fowler's hand. There are other things which he too may prize and desire—things which he may rejoice to win or grieve to lose; but it remains true, if there is any such thing as truth, that whoever makes duty his supreme aim lives simply in the present from day to day, carries in his own bosom that self-respect which is the consciousness of perpetual victory, and endures with ease the outward defeats which crush a meaner soul. It is no mere dream, this lofty life of duty that puts away with indifference or contempt all the prizes that dazzle the vulgar eye. Men and women walk the streets to-day who are content to live it in quiet obscurity, seeking nothing that the crowds pursue, but finding every day in commonest and humblest duty the fountain of immeasurable peace. They are not many who thus disarms the world's pet motives in disgrace—but they are the best. They live from day to day, satisfied with that which they can command, and spurning the slavery of ambitions that must forever obey. In the grand moral order of the universe, they behold their own little lives expand into infinite relationships with all that is pure and venerable; and, knowing that they have deserved well of the cosmos by playing well the atom's part, they ask no future favors, but float peacefully on the mighty stream of the present. Concede their future Heaven to the impoverished souls that must feed on bestowed rewards; but let the free soul create its own heaven of duty from day to day.

ORTHODOXY AND THEATRES.

With Mr. Whipple's courteous criticism of that portion of my article on the "Duty of Liberals," which refers to the Orthodox view of the theatre, I have much in sympathy. The passage which seems to him an inaccurate expression of the Orthodox idea is the following: "Here, in enlightened, cultured Boston there may be found thousands who deem it a sin to go to the theatre, there to be ennobled by the witnessing of Shakespeare's tragedies. Is it not pitiable that intelligent men and women can still be so bound hand and foot by Puritan prejudices as neither to enjoy and profit by many inspiring pieces of acting, nor to recognize the great educating and ennobling influence which the drama is capable of exerting?" The italicized phrases are those in which Mr. Whipple considers the inaccuracy to lie. Thus the fact that there are thousands who deem it a sin to go to the theatre is not disputed, but the points apparently called in question are the statements: First, that Christians regard as sinful the witnessing of even Shakespeare's plays; and second, that the drama is capable of exerting a great educating and inspiring influence.

In advocating his opinion, Mr. Whipple presents a very gloomy picture of the theatres "here in Boston and everywhere else" forty or forty-five years ago, claiming that not only were open bars regularly maintained then upon the premises, but that abandoned women were gratuitously admitted thither, as an extra inducement for the attendance of the male sex. Whether this be true or not, it is impossible for me to say; but I am so much accustomed to regard all Mr. Whipple's statements as correct, that I believe the gentleman must have the best ground for his assertion. If such indeed was the invariable management of the theatres of this country at that time, I should have highly respected any one who for this reason conscientiously abstained then from attendance.

But Mr. Whipple allows that (at least as far as Boston is concerned) these two features of the theatre have passed away. We have, then, to deal now with the stage of to-day. In regard to this, Mr. Whipple claims that "there is probably not one theatre in the world," run at a profit to its managers, a full half of whose nightly performances do not exercise on the whole a bad moral influence." (The italics are mine.) This seems to me a much stronger statement than facts would warrant; but as the mere expression of opinion amounts to but little, let us see what reason Mr. Whipple offers for this assertion. It is claimed by him that "the evening's entertainment in our theatres usually consists of three parts: a tragedy or comedy to begin with, which may be good, bad, or indifferent in moral character; a farce to end with, which usually contains some objectionable features; and dancing in the interval between, the chief feature of which is its indecency." The main evils, then, in our theatrical performances consist, according to Mr. Whipple, in the farce and the ballet. But with the exception of the Museum, the giving of a farce in our first-class theatres is a very rare occurrence in Boston; while the ballet, save in some exceptional spectacular piece or the vulgarities of a troop like that of Soldene, is almost never introduced. Moreover, in the farces given at the Museum, I believe the introduction of "objectionable features" to be very unusual. That a broad jest should occasionally intrude there is possible; but I myself have never witnessed such an intrusion, nor have I ever heard from others that such was the case.

If, then, these statements are correct (and I think statistics and the testimony of theatre-goers generally will confirm them), we have to deal chiefly with the standard plays produced here. I cordially agree with Mr. Whipple in his keen regret that it is not at present a pecuniary possibility for one of our theatres (not subsidized) to rigidly maintain upon its stage only the purest and noblest dramas. Alas, indeed, that it is so! But we have reason to lament thus in many other departments of art, as well as in regard to the drama. The masses flock to hear a Morgan or a Moody, and leave the scholar and philosopher to speak to empty benches. The immense amount of literary garbage greedily devoured by these same masses is far in excess of the world's substantial books. A negro-minstrel entertainment will in most places draw a fuller house than a classical concert; and even in Boston Madame Essipoff played to scanty audiences. Now in precisely the same way, trashy and even vulgar plays usually prove more attractive than pure and intellectual ones, save when these are rendered by extraordinary artists.

But just here, although bewailing equally with Mr. Whipple this lamentable fact, I take a different and more hopeful view. Instead of concluding (as I understand him to do) that on account of this pecuniary necessity of theatre managers to cater to the low taste of the public, it would be better for decent people to stay away from the theatre altogether, I would advocate most warmly the exerting of all our influence in elevating this general taste, especially by patronizing those dramas which are unexceptionable and well put "on the boards." I would say, let us here exercise our discrimination between use and abuse. Just as in the sphere of fiction we would reject Red-haired Dick or The Ghastly Bride, but would, nevertheless, delight in the study of Romola or The Newcomes, so let us choose between low plays and noble ones, Chilperic and Hamlet. Because our theatres have faults, why should we regard them as totally and hopelessly depraved? Theatre managers would doubtless gladly offer superior plays, if these were cordially met and supported by the best classes.

But if we stay away from the theatre altogether because at sometime during the season Soldene's troop will visit the stage, we shall in effect make it more and more impossible for those managers to represent there even that proportion of fine dramas which are at present given.

If we tarry till they're better,
We shall never get at all.

I shall never forget the audiences which gathered in the "Boston" a few years ago to witness the superb acting of the great Salvini. There were represented there our illustrious men of letters and ladies and gentlemen of the best social standing. Even many strict church-members, at other times opposed to the theatre, ventured thither, trusting perhaps to special absolution because the language used was Italian! I remember to have thought, in witnessing that assembly, what a glorious effect might be produced for the elevation of the drama, if such plays and such acting always met with the overwhelming support of our best citizens!

Now recalling the frequent engagements here of our first dramatic artists, and considering the generally very commendable course of the Museum company, I think it is not too much to claim that a fair proportion of the plays produced in our city have a decidedly good moral influence; and that a very large proportion, without being especially remarkable for this, have no immoral effect, but afford a pleasant and innocent evening's entertainment. At the same time, it is also true that a small proportion of them are more or less degrading and positively immoral. Such seems to me a fair statement of the state of the stage in the first-class theatres of Boston. The true remedy for its evils, in my opinion, lies first in the improvement, by all the means in our power, of the public taste and morals; and secondly, in the support of all good dramas by the appreciative and the art-loving. Surely there is abundant encouragement for us to do this, if in forty years, as Mr. Whipple allows, such remarkable progress has already been made.

And now a word again about the Orthodox, around whom this discussion in reality turns. I should be very sorry indeed to misrepresent them, and I feel sure that I am not doing so, when I say that there are thousands in this city who would not set foot in the Boston Theatre to see Edwin Booth impersonate Hamlet or Brutus,—or to enjoy the operas of Lohengrin or Fidello, even though there were to be nothing but Shakespeare's plays and the best operas to be given there henceforth and forever. They are afraid (I hope those unacquainted with "blue" Orthodoxy will take my word for this) that after such an entertainment they could not enjoy their nightly devotions; that, on the whole, Jesus would not like it; that they might thereby become spiritually "cold," and acquire a "taste for the theatre," which is one of that species of mysterious appetites ready to overmaster the Christian, which, as some ministers declare, lurk especially in the auditorium of a theatre, a pack of cards, the cushions of a billiard table, and a waxed floor. Because these amusements are abused, many Christians would not have them used. But the folly of such a sweeping prohibition, as opposed to a judicial selection of pleasures, guided by wise government and self-control, is becoming daily more apparent. Our theatres are not what they should be. True enough. But what sphere of art is not open to the criticism that it still nourishes a host of inferior productions? Nay, more; in what one may not the poison of impurity be found? Shall we then utterly condemn the stage because it is susceptible of abuse? I hope to see the time when the drama will be free from the grave faults which still attend it; but, in common with all things human, its advance is slow. Let us nevertheless try hopefully to aid that advance!

REV. JOSEPH COOK'S POSITIONS CRITICISED.

In one of Rev. Joseph Cook's lectures, published in the Boston Advertiser, the champion of theology endeavors to annihilate the school of experience in philosophy by the following statements, which he calls "incontrovertible propositions":—

1. The plan of the physical organism is not in the food by which the organism is sustained.
2. The mechanism by which the assimilation of food is effected exists before the food is received.
3. But, until the food is received, that mechanism does not come into operation.
4. The plan of the spiritual organism is not in the impressions received through sensation and association.
5. The fundamental laws of thought exist in the plan of the soul anterior to all sensation or association.
6. But they are brought into operation only by experience through sensation and association.
7. It is absurd to say that the plan of the body is produced by its food.
8. It is equally absurd to say that the plan or fundamental intuitive beliefs of the soul are produced by sensation and association.
9. Therefore, as the plan of the body does not have its origin in the food of the body, so the plan of the mind does not have its origin in the food of the mind.

The lecturer adds:—

You receive food, and a certain plan in your physical organism distributes it after it is received; assimilates it, and you are entirely sure that the mechanism involved in this process exists before the food. It may be that every part of my physical system is made up of food and drink which I have taken, or of air which I have breathed; and yet there is one thing in me that the food did not give me or the air, and that is the plan of my physical organism. [Much applause.] We have within us laws, fundamental, organic, and if not innate, at least connate. They came into the world with us. They are a part of the plan on which we are made. When we touch the external world with the outer senses, and the inner world with the inner senses, no doubt food is coming to our souls; but that plan is the law according to which all our experiences through sensation and association are distributed.

Think of the difference between the "physical organism" of Mr. Cook and that of a Hottentot or of an Australian savage. Think, too, of the difference between the mind of Mr. Cook and that of the savage. Yet the Orthodox view is that they both have a common origin; the difference in size, form, color, degree of intellect, etc., being the result of modifications that have taken place from the time of Adam. Mr. Cook believes, I presume, that all the modifications giving rise to the differences between the varieties of the human race have been produced by natural causes; for it is not likely that he holds to the view that God has performed a succession of miracles in order to make men "the degenerate sons of an illustrious ancestry."

Whatever, then, there is in the structure or mind of man, or the "plan" thereof, that is peculiar to any variety, has been acquired, not by the individual, but by that variety of the human species. These bodily and mental peculiarities are the condensed result of individual modifications, due to various causes, and extending back to the cradle of the race.

According to the theory of evolution, all animals, man included, are the result of modifications of pre-existing animals, these changes reaching back to time when there were only the lowest conceivable organic forms which, indeed, were but the results of modifications of matter in a still more simple, homogeneous condition. According to this view, man did not originally appear fully developed with all the faculties and aptitudes that he now possesses. There was no more a "first man" than there was a first Roman or a first Englishman, no more than there was a first Fuegian, such as is now seen in Patagonia, where the natives are supplied with a thick undergarment of non-conducting fat like the layer of blubber under the skin of the whale in the same latitude, and where women, naked and with their babes strapped to their backs, dive into a sea in which any of us would perish in a few minutes.

According to the theory of evolution, the heritage of every human being is an organized structure, with certain definite tendencies, which precede all experiences of the individual, but nevertheless represent ancestral experiences and adaptations. These constitutional tendencies of the organism determine how the individual shall think: that is, that he shall think in images and symbols according to definite relations and sequences.

An ideal representation of all the conditions of human thought constitutes what is meant by the "plan" of the human mind. The sum total of all mental phenomena is the "mind." It is by an "illusion," says Lewes, "that we come to regard the process [of thinking] apart from the product [thought], and, generalizing the process, we call it mind or intellect, which then means no longer the mental phenomena condensed into a term, but the source of the phenomena." The assumption of some other basis of thought than the physical structure I believe to be without the slightest foundation; but whether it has or not is unimportant, so far as the criticism of Mr. Cook's position is concerned.

The body is sustained and built up from day to day, by the elements, taken as food, which admit of being assimilated, or made like, and incorporated into the body. What kind of food shall be assimilated, and how it shall be assimilated, are determined by the properties of the elements in their relation to the organism, and by the properties of the tissues which assimilate the elements furnished in the food. The physical structure, having been evolved by countless modifications of pre-existing organisms, whose experiences and adaptations have been organized in their descendants, embodies conditions of eating, digestion, and assimilation which precede the action and operation of the organism; that is, thus born with these conditions and tendencies.

So also the mind is built up by registered and assimilated experiences. What these experiences shall be, and how they shall build up the mind, are determined by the nature of the external world with which we are in contact, and the conditions and tendencies of the organism that receives sensitive impressions. Now because the conditions and tendencies of the mind precede the experiences of the individual, it does not follow that they are anterior to all experience ancestral and individual alike, and imply ideas independent of experience, together with a "plan" that must have preceded the organism and in accordance with which the organism must have been made teleologically.

"The fundamental laws of thought,"—in other words, the mental tendencies which determine the form and products of our thinking,—are anterior to all sensations or associations of the individual, to whose experience they certainly cannot be reduced; and in this sense they are a priori. But, according to the theory of evolution, these "laws of thought" have, in the course of ages, been acquired in the evolution of the organism through a succession of modifications due to its adaptations to the environment, and in this sense they are a posteriori.

Mr. Cook argues as though the experientialist held that the mind at birth is like a blank sheet of paper. Directed against such an absurd position, his propositions would have great force; but when the thinkers of to-day who accept the philosophy of experience recognize the so-called "laws of thought" as connate aptitudes, and parts of human experience, transmitted from ancestors so that—

"All experience past became, Consolidate in mind and frame," the reasoning of our theological lecturer has no force whatever, nor is it even pertinent.

The views here presented are based, of course, on the theory of evolution, of the truth of which there is much proof; while the creative hypothesis, of which Mr. Cook is champion in Boston, is without proof, and is losing ground in proportion as the empire of science and knowledge is, by man's observation and experience, made larger. Said Professor Thompson, President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, in an address delivered Aug. 15, 1877:—

"I consider it impossible, therefore, for any one to be a faithful student of embryology, in the present state of science, without at the same time becoming an evolutionist."

With this statement accords the remark of Huxley in one of his New York lectures:—

"The doctrine of evolution at the present time rests upon exactly as secure a foundation as the Copernican theory of the motions of the heavenly bodies. Its basis is precisely of the same character,—the coincidence of the observed facts with theoretical requirements."

If, as Mr. Cook and other theologians maintain, the "plan of the physical organism" and "the plan of the mind" existed before any experience, individual or ancestral, whence came they? The answer is of course "from God." Then they either had an origin in the mind of God, or they had no beginning. If they had an origin, they must have been an addition to God's knowledge; for a plan, idea, or thought that did not exist until a certain time could not have been a part of God's knowledge previous to that time. If there were an addition to God's knowledge, he must have been limited in knowledge before the addition was made. But if these plans never had a beginning, but existed in the mind of God through the past eternity, they cannot be the result of design, because they were not produced; but, being eternal like God himself, must be independent of design. But the plan of a thing is as much evidence of design as the thing itself in which the plan is embodied; and since (according to our supposition) the "plan of the physical organism" and the "plan of the mind" are no evidence of design whatever, it follows that the "physical organism" and the "human mind" are no evidence of design. Thus we see that the ascribing of "plan" to God necessitates the conclusion either that God receives addition to his knowledge from time to time, or that "plans" exist which are, and organisms exist which at least may be, utterly independent of design. Mr. Cook will be slow to avow his acceptance of either of these conclusions. With his premises he cannot avoid accepting one or the other.

The "incontrovertible propositions," the weakness of which I have endeavored to point out in this article, are a sample of the intellectual food that "His Lectureship" dealt out last winter in Tremont Temple to his Orthodox audiences, and for which he received not only large pay, but "great applause"!

THE SCIENCE OF UNIVERSOLOGY.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

NO. XVII.

The last article brought us up to the verge of the consideration of the most important of practical subjects, alike for the scientist and the philosopher; namely, the classification of the sciences. The classifiers are a branch of scientists, standing apart; and when successful in furnishing any new key to the interrelations of the sciences themselves, they are entitled to take the highest rank among scientists. Specialty must always stand in a certain subordination of rank to generality, since the true generalizer must have a comprehensive understanding of numerous specialties. The classification of the sciences rests on the underlying philosophy of the sciences; and is, therefore, intimately allied with sciento-philosophy, and is, indeed, a great part of what is meant by that term. The number of men, who have attempted even to arrange the whole field of science is not large. Aristotle, and after him, Bacon, rank first in the order of time; and, of course, their efforts are inferior, viewed from the vantage of the increased intelligence of our day. In our day, Comte, a Frenchman, Spencer, an Englishman, and Haeckel, a German, are the great names. It is they who have established a valid basis upon which all future classification must in a sense rest; although universology supplies a wholly new factor which will disturb and readjust even the foundation itself.

But, apart from this last consideration, the leading classifications of Comte and Spencer are becoming already, not, indeed, antiquated or superseded, but so improved upon, enlarged, and modified by the labors of more recent investigators, that no student can be considered as up with the current of learning in this department of it, who is acquainted with their systems alone. Of these more recent classifiers the three most conspicuous, and whose work in this sphere is most elaborate, are all Americans. They are Prof. P. H. Vander Weyde, Prof. Louis Elsberg, and Thaddeus B. Wakeman. Unfortunately, Prof. Vander Weyde's work on this subject, though much advanced, has remained uncompleted, and is nowhere accessible in book form. All of these writers have been readers, and, to some extent, students, of The Basic Outline of Universology. Prof. Elsberg's classification, which for depth of insight into fundamental principles on the one hand, and for extent of detailed elaboration in a given direction on the other hand, surpasses any other, bears an impress of universal influence which he would probably not decline to avow, which, however, does not in the least detract from his own essential originality. Mr. Wakeman has, on the other hand, followed in the main the lead of Comte, greatly modified by Spencer, and, as I shall have occasion to show, by a leaning towards the distinctive feature of universology, and the new factor of classification contributed by it; namely, scientific analogy. He, however, does not avow this latter tendency, is probably not really aware of it, as affecting him, and has made a somewhat valiant warfare against it. Wakeman, also, has exhibited an exuberant wealth of originality, in this lofty realm of scientific achievement. The little pamphlet expositions—they are hardly more than that—of these men showing the relations of the sciences, place them, by my scale of relative values and method of assigning rank, among the magnates of the scientific world. They are, in other words, sciento-philosophers, and not merely scientists.

Every distinct science covers a distinct domain of the universe. To classify the sciences rightly is, therefore, rightly to distribute the universe. Every classifier of the sciences is of necessity, in a sense, a universologist. The question whether he is that technically and precisely, rests upon the question whether he has the true key to classification. Wakeman quotes John Fiske to the effect that: All knowledge is classification. A fortiori, all science is classification; and, inversely, all classification is science, and universal classification is universal science; which is, again, universology. Universology is nothing other than the science of classification in universals and particulars, whence it is both the science of the sciences, and of all the details and particulars within the sciences.

A point, indeed the point, in which I accord a deeper universological value to Elsberg's classification than to that of Comte or Spencer or Wakeman, is one already alluded to, in that he practically recognizes the existence of different planes from which the lines of classification take their departure; as when he discriminates the aspectual (or ingrediential sciences) from the departmental sciences, the comparative from the descriptive, etc. Universology demonstrates that we naturally and necessarily conceive the universe as having a definite shape or form; that that form is globular; and that then, our first natural divisions of that great globe of existence (the bases of special classes) accord with the cut-up of a globe, by the three geometrical planes, cutting each other at right angles at the centre. To add this conception, cut an apple through the centre, in three different ways, so as to produce eight equal parts. Each cut-through of the knife will represent one of these three planes; and, in a modified sense, the face presented by each hemisphere of the apple after the first cut (for example) is also a plane. (Two faces are revealed by each of the two subsequent cuts; but to realize them properly we must neglect in thought the prior cuts.) The Latin word for face is species (what one looks at, from specto, spectare, whence English spectacle). From this word species we derive special; and it is just here, from the physical act of cutting through the centre of an object (our supposed apple, for instance) and revealing planes or faces, before hidden, but now capable of being looked at or seen (compare scene and scenery in this sense), that we have, analogically, the origin of the distribution of the special sciences. Apart from the corruptions of language they would be called the face sciences, and we should be continually reminded to inquire what they are faces of, or how they came to bear that name; and we should have been forced back to the original answer, now forgotten, which is that they name hemispheres of knowledge, in the first instance, and afterwards minor cuts and facings of the great globe of general or universal conception.

Mr. Spencer has, at a single point, shown that he has arrived also at this fundamental aperçu of the origin and guide to all true scientific classification, how obscurely or how clearly we cannot know, as he has not in the least elaborated the idea. Upon the twenty-sixth page of his pamphlet entitled The Classification of the Sciences, to which are added reasons for dissenting from the Philosophy of M. Comte, by Herbert Spencer, D. Appleton & Co., New York, 1864 (I am thus particular, as but few, so far as I have observed, of the students of Spencer are acquainted with this work), the distinguished author says: "I will only further remark, that the relations of the sciences as thus represented [referring to his own tabular exhibits] are still but imperfectly represented; their relations cannot be truly shown on a plane [the level page] but ONLY IN SPACE OF THREE DIMENSIONS [that is to say, upon three planes, cutting each other at right angles.] The three groups cannot be rightly put in linear order as they have been [by Comte, and now by Wakeman and others]."

Spencer is here down at hard pan, in finding the true basis for all classification; but he is in error in the use, as yet the only use, which he makes of it. He is contesting the possibility of a correct single-line scale, ascending and descending, for the arrangement of the sciences, such as Comte and Wakeman employ. In this he is wrong, and they are right. Both methods are true, and each has its scientific justification, when all the analogies are understood; and each its special superiority, as from the theoretical and the practical point of view, respectively. The three-plane distribution gives the philosophy of the subject; bases classification scientifically; is the scientism of things, as "harmony," "thorough-base," or "counterpoint" in music are so. The one-line or cord-like distribution, like the musical scale or gamut, is the simple abstract from, or epitome of, all the resultants of the three-plane distribution. This is the secret of the musical scale which Fourier rightly says is the measure of all harmonies. The globe cut by its three planes yields eight solid parts or domains; hence the octave, as the measuring number. Let it be a cube which is cut into eight cubules, and the illustration will be clearer (the globe is naturalism, the cube is, per se, scientism). Of the eight cubules, one is occulted or hid from sight, in whatsoever way the segmented cube is inspected. The octave is therefore in a sense reduced to seven, while in a sense it remains eight. This half-seven, half-eight "octave" is the riddle of the gods; or, less poetically speaking, it is the toggle-joint of the universe. All music, all skilled performance, all operatic exertion or effort at high harmony, in the whole sphere of the labors of Nature, or of man is the continuous, ever-repeated endeavor to resolve this inherent contradiction between the merely sensible and practical view of things and the underlying analytical exactitude; between the practical and the theoretical; between naturism and scientism. The proximate solution of the inextinguishable dissidencies between Nature in its crudity and Science in its precision is Artism or Art; and it breaks into the shimmer of those millions of tones which are the répertoire of the world-full of music.

In the next following article I will show more fully why and how the one-line system of the classification of the sciences is after all practically preferable.

A PILGRIMAGE TO WEST ROXBURY.

West Roxbury is now one of the suburbs and a part of Boston. On entering it from the country, one can easily discover the vicinity of the American Athens. The multitude of carts, the proportionally large number of pedestrians, the absence of fruit-trees near the roads, the frequent houses, serve as pointers. One thing only is needed to complete the chain of evidence,—the blue coat. This product of metropolitan civilization, for reasons known only to those initiated in the mysteries of police regulations, is not to be seen. But forty years ago it was different. Then the shrill groan of the iron horse did not constantly remind the inhabitants that they live in the nineteenth century; it was a true "country" town. The inhabitants could be found in the assessor's list, in the directory, in the fields, but not on the roads. As an offset sometimes appeared a four-legged member of the horned family making his grass-studies, and announcing to the world its undeniable existence with an emphatic moo. Into this town Theodore Parker entered in the year 1837, to spend some of the happiest hours of his life. "The dear old place," he used to call it. But now it is all different. The old generation has died out and a new one grown up. The little town has been swallowed up by the big one, and with it also, it seems, the remembrance of the great preacher.

The Jews have their Jerusalem, whither they pilgrimage; the greater part of Christianity wander to Rome and Worms; the worshipper of Allah and his "true" prophet journey to Mecca; the admirer of a modern hero leads his steps to West Roxbury. Here Theodore Parker lived five years; here he preached; here he prepared himself for his large field of activity.

With the image of the "parsonage" before my spiritual eyes, I entered West Roxbury to visit the house where the great transcendentalist once meditated, wrote, lived. With difficulty I found the house. Several inquiries were unsuccessfully made, since "a man with the name of Theodore Parker has never lived in the place," as a "knowing" informant told me. At last I came to the spot where his residence is supposed to have been. It is situated a few minutes' walk from the Spring Street depot of the Boston & Providence Railroad. The neat little house which was of so much interest to me, is so disfigured by improvements, additions, and changes, that it can justly be said it does not exist for the admirer of Theodore Parker. The present homestead is a huge mixture of styles with bay-windows, and a still huger barn, which has been compelled to undertake an involuntary journey some one hundred feet from its old place. For fear the Orthodox horses may not be infected by the heretical air of this barn, it has been whitewashed from its sins. The beautiful tree, with its large, round bench, on which Parker loved to sit when on a visit to his old parish, was cut down. Not a trace was left of the old structures. The only thing remaining is the space with the air filling it, which latter even is now breathed by Orthodox lungs.

When I rang the door-bell I was informed that the present occupants knew nothing of Mr. Parker. The self-reliant daughter of the Green Isle, who opened the door, and who introduced herself by the very significant "I manages the house," asked me naively whether I was a relative of Mr. Parker.

With sadness I bade the disfigured place adieu. About a mile from the former residence of the preacher-reformer stands in the middle of a large lawn the church, where the strong, masculine voice of Theodore Parker used to be heard every Sunday. The church has undergone no alterations. A Unitarian minister reads now the text from the same two folio-volumes of the Bible, printed in 1708, from which Mr. Parker used to choose his. The building is heated now by a furnace, while in the good old time two big stoves used to guard the victims against the embraces of cold frost. Through the kindness of a friend, I obtained the key to the holy place. We entered. I made an involuntary motion towards the upper regions of my poor self, and my head was deprived of its cover. For awhile I stood overawed on the same spot where his feet once touched. So from this pulpit Mr. Parker thundered forth his eloquence! Here before me was, in the front row of pews, the seat of Mrs. Parker; a little to the left, that of Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, who sometimes walked ten miles to go and hear the great preacher. Here lay the old venerable book, which was exactly twelve years older than the one who so reverently read from it. Just opposite the pulpit, back of the pews, is a large clock, which now, amid the deepest silence, ticked its merciless "forever, never" in the same way as it did when the shining eyes of the hero rested on it. There was something mysterious in its ticking. I listened. . . . It became clearer and clearer. The tickings became sounds, the sounds were made into words:—

"Theodore Parker is dead. His remains lie far away, beyond the ocean, in the sunny South. The house is gone; this very meeting-house may soon disappear. When even I myself shall have stopped my ticking, when the palace-like memorial on Berkeley Street shall have vanished, when on the streets of proud Boston will be seen the destructive traces of time, then the spirit of Theodore Parker will yet live; his words, his works, his deeds will live, and live forever."

NATIONAL CITIZENSHIP.

NEW YORK, Sept. 30, 1877.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I have read your appeal upon the subject of the Declaration of Principles of the National Liberal League. You did well in selecting the condition of the freedmen as a salient example of citizenship. You state that the amendments do not protect them as individuals, but deny adverse legislation to the State; and you recommend that this class should be protected by the United States courts. Congress has already passed certain acts known as the enforcement laws, which attempt to punish the violation of the amendments, and more particularly to shield the right to vote on national questions. But what are the facts? Political rights have been destroyed by force in some parts of the South. The equal rights amendment existed; the law against conspiracy (which strange to say makes assassination and murder mere incidents) was on the statute book but could not be enforced for the reason that the grand and petty juries, the court, the sheriff, and the posse were all either principals or particeps in the commission of the crime. For example, witness the Ku Klux trials in South Carolina and the Chisholm affair in Mississippi. These are illustrations of the fact of the impossibility of directing a course of action by written laws. According to our system the trial has to take place in the vicinage where the alleged crime was committed; and, as in the cases referred to, a mistaken politico-moral sense precludes the administration of the law. Thus we perceive that by the failure to enforce the laws, and the tendency of the United States courts to find against the constitutionality of the same, all that has been done to establish a free national citizenship by amendment and by legislation is put in imminent peril. In my opinion the remedy lies in the method upon which you place little reliance. The Constitution provides that "The United States shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government." Let us first establish full national citizenship by constitutional declaration. Then let Congress, whenever a State as a matter of fact or of record violates this law, be punished even by seclusion from representation, or relegated to a territorial condition. The people must be educated to the idea of sending members to Congress who will do this. Probably, after all, the whole subject will have to depend upon education and enlightenment. What this country wants above all things is an assimilation of habits, customs, and thought, in order that liberty and government may not have entirely different meaning in different sections. The freedman must acquire wealth and intelligence like his neighbor; and, last not least, the ability to maintain his rights by force, if necessary, which is the strong point of his enemy.

The "Call" is a watch-fire upon the causeway of humanity, and directs how to avoid the precipice of theology, State rights, and ignorance.

Respectfully, H. C. LOCKWOOD.

THE PROBABLE FUTURE

OF THE LIBERAL LEAGUE AND OF THE NATIONAL REFORM ASSOCIATION.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I have to-day the pleasure to report to you and the Secretary of the National Liberal League, Mr. W. H. Hamlen, the effected organization of a Liberal League here last night, at which a resolution to apply for a charter was passed (names are given in my report to the Secretary). Please find enclosed P. O. order for $15,—$10 of which are to pay for a charter, and $5 to renew the subscription of Mr. William Barnardall for his two copies of THE INDEX.

The greatest obstacle to the formation of the Liberal Leagues, and the most formidable enemy we have to contend with, are by no means the National Reform Association and Orthodox Christians in general, but the blindness, indifference, and the unbelief of even liberal Christians respecting the threatening dangers to religious liberty from the projects, aims, and agitations of the "Evangelicals." In soliciting names for the petitions, or to join our League, I am frequently laughed at, and told that there exists no such danger, and that "they cannot do it." This being the prevailing opinion even among liberal, or at least not bigoted, fanatical or Orthodox Christians, I believe that the "Evangelicals" will eventually succeed in realizing their nefarious schemes. But such momentary success will, I also believe, be but the beginning of their final ruin. For when by the practical application of their "reformed Constitution" and kindred measures the American people will become aware of their workings, and of the rights and liberties of which they have been robbed, it will not take long before a reaction will take place against the National Reform Association, the Evangelicals, their "reformed Constitution," and "Christian State," which will sweep them away and bring about real and greater reforms, much greater than people in general are prepared for and willing to support now. So out of this evil great good will come.

This probable success of our opponents ought, therefore, neither to discourage liberals, nor lessen their opposition to the schemes of the "Evangelicals," nor less to cool their zeal for Liberal Leagues and their objects, but the more to unite them in an organized body. For that reason and to that end, I act in harmony with the Spiritualists here. They are very numerous here, and, I add with pleasure, are quite, some even very, liberal. Most of the thirty members of the Liberal League, excepting, perhaps, half-a-dozen, are Spiritualists. In this connection, I must, in justice to Mr. O. B. Kellogg, their regular lecturer, not omit to mention his eminent services to the liberal cause. He is not only a spiritual lecturer, but a very liberal one as well; for he is a thorough-going, bold, and outspoken liberal, and contributed very much by his frequent lectures here and throughout a considerable section of country to liberalize his Spiritualistic audiences. I have often heard him with much pleasure and profit. And though I am myself far—you know how immeasurable far—from accepting and believing in their peculiar doctrines and "spiritual philosophy," yet I am in sympathy with at least the Titusville Spiritualists. For they are generally liberal, and you know how dear liberalism and the cause of liberalism are to me.

Yours for success at Rochester,

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

FURTHER APPOINTMENTS IN NEW YORK.

SALAMANCA, N.Y., Oct. 11, 1877.

EDITOR INDEX:—

The Executive Sub-committee of the National Liberal League for the State of New York has been appointed as follows, in accordance with the Constitution: H. L. Green, Chairman; D. M. Bennett, of New York city, De Lancey Crittenden, of Rochester, John W. Truesdell, of Syracuse, and Edgar M. Sellen, of Castile. Additional "Free Thought and Liberal League County Committees," according to the Constitution of the Freethinkers Association of Central and Western New York, have also been appointed as follows:—

CHAUTAUQUA COUNTY.

E. Mitchell, Jamestown.
O. G. Chase, Jamestown.
Alex. C. Douthitt, Jamestown.

LIVINGSTON COUNTY.

H. B. McNair, Danville.
Homer Archibald, Fowlesville.
Homer McVean, Avon.

ST. LAWRENCE COUNTY.

J. B. Armstrong, Ogdensburg.
S. C. Ceane, Pottsdam.
Joseph Studholm, Ogdensburg.

SCHUYLER COUNTY.

Capt. D. P. Day, Watkins.
G. C. Hibbard, Watkins.
John Niverson, Watkins.

SENECA COUNTY.

Edmund W. Mitchell, West Junius.
Henry Bonnell, Waterloo.
Joseph Barnes, Waterloo.

Truly yours,

H. L. GREEN.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE ON "WHO ARE INFIDELS?"

After reading the discourse here referred unto, as it stands recorded in the Boston INDEX, I (who hold the honor of an Elder in the Church of Jesus Christ, the initials of whose name is J. S. C.) would respectfully make a request of those gentlemen editors of the Boston INDEX, that they grant me the privilege of speaking for myself through their organ concerning the crime, or charge of infidelity, which that "discourse" alleges to my religious belief, or faith, in connection with Moses and the prophets, together with Jesus and the holy ministry of all ages.

Now, gentlemen, I design to be as concise and comprehensive as possible, and by no means less candid or honest in what I now say in defending the citadel of truth, which you have either vilely attacked or ignorantly passed by, unnoticed, in giving your definition of the word "infidel."

I am aware of the fact that it will by no means do to credit all that those men say who have the honorable title of "Rev." affixed to their names; simply because it is common to assume divine honors.

But you know undoubtedly that there could be no honor attached to prophets and reverends if there never had been any in the world but impostors, such as this generation is now flooded with.

Please grant me the privilege of giving to you a far better definition of the word "infidel" than that by the assumed "Rev." M. J. Savage.

But, first, before giving my definition, let me say to you, "Fair play, boys." Those who have nothing to do but to make a plaything of every kind of Bible religion would do better to engage in some other gambling.

2d. Let me say I have no objection to your pulling down of all false churches and false titles of divine honors. In all this I agree with you. But when you say that Moses and the prophets denied the priesthood, and were infidel unto it, here I say unto you, "Fair play"; for you know it was Korah, and not Moses, who denied the priesthood! You make no difference between the real holy priesthood and such as Korah and his crew assumed, and for that assumption went down alive into hell! And I fear that's where you and yours soon will be.

For why do you take a text from holy inspiration and then deny the holy priesthood of God Almighty by which your text was written?

Your readers, many of them, are deceived by your false constructions.

My definition of "infidel" is not the man who denies the man-made priesthood of King Jeroboam, who made to himself priests after the manner of Gentile nations, and which priesthood the prophets of God all denied, just as I also do. But your definition makes Moses and the prophets alike infidels with Korah, and you send them all to hell together, or else how do you separate yourself from such logic?

You are an infidel to the holy priesthood of God by which the holy Scriptures were written; whereas I am not.

Your faith is the substance of the things you hope for; and that is the general prevalence of false faith and the worship of what you know nothing about. I pray you be honest!

PARMA, Mich.

INTEREST.

DEAR INDEX:—

Here are some questions, with such answers as my present light enables me to give:—

Does not a man own his own labor? Yes.

Should not a man be compensated for his labor? Yes.

May he not therefore properly hire out his labor at fair remuneration? Yes.

If he work just enough to provide equitably shelter, food, and clothes, are not these shelter, food, and clothes his to use, wear out, and eat up? Yes.

If he work enough to create values over and above shelter, food, and clothes, does he not own these values? Yes.

Are not these stored-up values so much labor stored-up? Yes.

May not a man hire out his past labor stored-up, as reasonably and rightfully as he may hire out his present labor in transitu? Yes.

Is this interest? Yes.

If equitable pay should be based exclusively on the damage or sacrifice involved in the labor, does it not seem to follow that success and skill have nothing to do with the value of work? Yes.

Is it not certain that poor work may involve as much damage to the laborer as good work? Yes.

If a man by incredible labor and sacrifice produce a book which nobody can read, or a poor machine which nobody can use, or a toy which does not strike the fancy of any children, and if he be paid according to his damage or sacrifice of himself, will he not be paid for the production of useless things? Yes.

Is not this absurd? Yes.

Is it not then plain that a man must not only work, but work usefully in order equitably to expect to receive pay? Yes.

Is not this the same as to say that not merely sacrifice to the laborer but utility to society must enter into the determination of price? Yes.

Then if the greater the sacrifice the greater the price, so the greater the utility the greater the price, in equity? Yes.

Is not stored-up labor, or value over and above necessary consumption, of very great utility? Yes.

Is it not what furnishes the means and opportunity for all the higher arts, educations, and adornments of life? Yes.

Is it not, then, possible that the steadily reproductive power accorded to stored-up labor may be the price set on its high utility? Yes.

Is this interest? Yes.

J. VILA BLAKE.

QUINCY, Ill., Sept. 27, 1877.

OBSCURE PASSAGES.—A good story, no doubt mythical, is told of Jacob Boehme, the cobbler, famous for his profound philosophical works. On his death-bed, his disciples came to him, eager to obtain explanations of obscure passages in his writings, before he was taken away. He relieved their difficulties, with a single exception. One passage puzzled him, and he said: "My children, when I wrote this, I understood the meaning, and no doubt the omniscient God did. He may still remember it, but I have forgotten." A similar incident is told of the German poet Klopstock, which has the advantage of being true. Some of his admirers made a journey from Gottenberg to Hamburg to see him in his old age, and ask him to explain a difficult passage in his works. They were young students, and running over with enthusiasm. Klopstock received them graciously, read the passage, and then said: "I cannot recollect what I meant when I wrote it; but I remember it was the finest thing I ever wrote, and you cannot do better than devote your lives to the discovery of its meaning."

SCOPTICISM is making great ravages among the non-Catholic young men of the country. In the Harvard College graduating class of the past scholastic year the number of infidels equalled the highest total of any one religious denomination. There were nineteen of them, and six others were undecided as to their religious opinions. Every man exerts some influence for good or bad upon those with whom he comes in contact, and the character of the influence of these unbelievers is easily inferred. To counteract their influence and the materialistic tendencies of our age, of which they are the sufferers, we need men strongly grounded in their faith, whose religious convictions will be solidly built; and who, besides, will be able to meet and defeat these unhappy graduates of Harvard in the realms of science. To produce such men a Catholic university is necessary. When will our prelates begin the work?—Mirror.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 Insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " "
 " 26 " 51 " 6 " "
 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

Office, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON, publish

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.
 J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
 ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
 C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
 W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
 BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 60 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. THE INDEX.

221 Washington St., Boston.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " " "
 " 26 " 51 " 6 " " "
 " 52 " " 5 " " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

Office, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON, publish

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.
 J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
 ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
 C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
 W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
 BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with 'increasing interest.'"

Send $3.20 for one year, including postage, or cents for three months on trial.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Fifth Annual Meeting, 1872. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains essays by J. W. Chadwick on "Liberty and the Church in America," by C. D. B. Mills on "Religion as the Expression of a Permanent Sentiment of the Human Mind," and by O. B. Frothingham on "The Religion of Humanity," with addresses by Rowland Connor, Celia Burleigh, Lucretia Mott, A. B. Alcott, O. A. Bartol, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loos, and others.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. B. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity, as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. 40 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. 40 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains Essays by Rev. Wm. E. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, Wm. Henry Channing, Rabbi Laaser, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

For series of important Tracts see last page of THE INDEX.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited. Orders by mail may be addressed either "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston," or to the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the ideas of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary-condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

WHOLE NO. 409.

CALL FOR THE FIRST ANNUAL CONGRESS OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Boston, Sept. 25, 1877.

In obedience to the Constitution of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July First to July Fourth, 1876, the Directors hereby issue a call for the FIRST ANNUAL CONGRESS of the League, to be held at Rochester, N. Y., October 26, 27, and 28, 1877.

After the hearing of reports and election of officers for the ensuing year, the most important business of the convention will be to decide whether the National Liberal League shall adopt a political platform and nominate candidates for the Presidential election of 1880; and, if so, whether this platform shall advocate the following principles and measures, to wit:—

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, etc.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

In order to give to this First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League the representative character befitting the gravity of the questions which will come before it for decision, the Directors suggest and earnestly recommend to the liberals of the United States that they immediately organize themselves throughout the country in Local Auxillary Liberal Leagues, each of which, on receipt of a charter, will be entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other members as DELEGATES. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay. Charters are indispensable to secure the unity of organization without which efficient coöperation is impossible; but Local Auxillary Liberal Leagues remain absolutely independent, and recognize no authority in the National League to control their action in any particular. The small fee of ten dollars (which will surely be grudged by no one) is only desired in order to help defray the necessary expenses involved in the conventions and other public work of the National League, which has no salaried officers. Life-memberships of twenty-five dollars, annual memberships of one dollar, and voluntary donations, will also be gladly received for these public purposes. Time presses; and it is hoped that hundreds of new Local Leagues will be organized forthwith. Any existing Liberal society can be represented in the convention by applying for and receiving a charter in the usual way, and transmitting to the Secretary a certified copy of the following vote:—

"Voted, That this society, desiring to coöperate with the National Liberal League in the furtherance of its general and specific objects, hereby declares itself a Local Auxillary Liberal League, according to the true intent of the Constitution of said National Liberal League, and has duly elected the following persons to represent it at the next Annual Congress of the same; to wit, —, —, —, —."

Persons desiring full information respecting the history, principles, and objects of the National Liberal League, in the shape of a closely printed book of 190 octavo pages, can obtain it by sending for Equal Rights in Religion: Report of the Centennial Congress of Liberals. Price (reduced), in advance, paper covers, 75 cents; handsomely bound in cloth, $1.00.

Address the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

By order of the Directors of the National Liberal League:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.
WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

GLIMPSES.

MR. CRITTENDEN, of Rochester, announces that the best accommodations for delegates to the Congress can be had at the Clinton Hotel for $1.50 a day.

A NEW Local Auxillary Liberal League was organized at Rochester, N. Y., on October 21. The officers are—President, Mrs. Amy Post; Secretary, Willet E. Post; Treasurer, Emily G. Beebe.

PROFESSOR A. L. RAWSON, of New York city, one of the Vice-Presidents of the Manhattan Liberal Club, is expected to attend the Rochester Congress and speak on "Compulsory Education, State and National."

A NEW Local Auxillary Liberal League was organized at New Haven, Connecticut, by members of the Free Lecture Association, on October 21. Messrs. F. A. Hermance and E. R. Whiting were appointed delegates to the Rochester Congress.

THE NEW YORK Society of Humanity voted on October 16 to declare itself auxillary to the National Liberal League, take out a charter, and send as delegates to Rochester the following gentlemen: Hugh B. Brown, G. L. Henderson, and A. L. Rawson.

SIGNATURES to the Religious Freedom Amendment petition have been received as follows since our last acknowledgment: from Rev. A. A. Roberts, Baraboo, Wis., 174; from Mr. Daniel Dutton, Dallas, Mich., 29; from Mr. Thomas Dugan, Albany, N. Y., 51. Total thus far received—8,621.

HON. R. S. MCCORMICK, of Franklin, Pa., writes that he shall probably attend the Rochester Congress and take part in the proceedings, though unable to prepare a written lecture. Judge McCormick is one of the most influential liberals in his State, and heartily sympathizes with the objects of the National Liberal League.

A NEW LIBERAL LEAGUE, auxillary to the National League, has been organized at Hudson, Michigan. President, Mr. L. R. Peirson; Secretary, Dr. F. O. Baker. Mr. James S. Bedel, to whose exertions the formation of the new League is largely due, writes that it will be represented at Rochester by delegates or by letter.

THE ST. JOSEPH (Missouri) Liberal League, at a meeting held in that city on October 14, voted to declare itself auxillary to the National Liberal League and to take out a charter. The officers are P. V. Wise, President; H. W. Kastor, Vice-President; H. Brunsing, Secretary; Wm. Kneer, Treasurer. Messrs. H. W. Kastor, Jacob Sprinkel, and P. V. Wise were elected delegates to the Rochester Congress.

A "CATARAUGUS COUNTY" Liberal League has been formed, auxillary to the National League, at Randolph, N. Y. The officers are—President, H. L. Green; Corresponding Secretary, John Hammond; Recording Secretary, A. L. Brainard; Treasurer, Dr. Frederic Larkin. The following delegates were elected to represent the new League at Rochester: Hon. J. E. Weeden, Dr. Frederic Larkin, A. L. Brainard, John Hammond, and H. L. Green.

MR. JOHN G. JENKINS writes from Denver, Colorado: "Very fortunately Mr. Charles Roth is going East on business, and he was elected to represent the Denver Liberal League at Rochester. We have organized a State League, somewhat after the plan of Central New York. Mr. Roth will represent it at the convention along with Mr. B. F. Underwood. Dr. York, of California, will deliver a course of lectures here under the auspices of the Denver Liberal League; he is on his way East, and intends visiting Rochester at the convention."

ELDER F. W. EVANS, the famous Shaker preacher and editor, writes in response to an invitation to speak at the Rochester Congress: "The points in Nos. 1, 2, and 3 [of the Call] I fully concur in. I should come as a Shaker, not as a politician. We, as a religious body, want an entire separation of Church and State. Our Order cannot exist in any other nation to-day. If the sectarians succeed in getting theology into our Constitution, Shakers would be martyred. A secular government would be good for all parties who do not seek to force their theology upon others. Of all others, Shakers are in dead earnest about this matter of a government that shall confine its functions and powers to the protection of all citizens, male and female. Let the Materialist, Deist, Atheist, non-professors of Christianity, Mohammedans, and 'Heathen Chinee' be perfectly free. Then the sects cannot injure each other."

AT THE Episcopal General Convention in this city, on October 16, Rev. Edward Livermore, of Minnesota, offered the following resolution: "Resolved, That the house of deputies, believing that union of Church and State in the present condition of the world is prejudicial to the best interests of religion, hereby expresses its sympathy with the efforts now being made for the severance of that union in England." This resolution, according to the Advertiser's report, "was received with expressions of disapproval, and was promptly laid on the table by an almost unanimous vote." Could there be a more significant indication of opinion, on the part of this supreme representative assembly of one of the largest and most influential denominations in the country, that Church and State ought to be united? Such a construction may be disavowed by some; but the public peril of such thought and feeling as led to so emphatic a rebuke of the secular theory of government is overwhelmingly evident to the clear-eyed. The whole tendency of the Christian Church is to de-Americanize America. It betrays itself conspicuously in the recent vote of the Universalists to favor the "God-in-the-Constitution" movement, and quite as plainly in this refusal of the Episcopalians to sympathize with the efforts of England to rid herself of the curse of an Established Church. It is absolute "judicial blindness" not to see the meaning of such things as these, and almost criminal negligence to slight the warning they give. The Rochester Congress will not be held a day too soon.

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns, and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

The Scepticism of Believers.

BY LESLIE STEPHEN.

Not long ago an interesting question was discussed by a respectable and presumably competent meeting. Why, it was asked, does not the spiritual warfare against the unbeliever meet with greater success? A "materialistic atheism," as a high authority assured us, is "in the air"; and the malign contagion spreads in spite of Bampton lecturers, Christian Evidence Societies, and other apologetic machinery. At all which it is hard not to exclaim, Sancta simplicitas! Can you really not guess this very open secret? Men die of many diseases; creeds of one,—the disease of being found out. Do you ever remember that David Hume died a century ago, and that the matter which absorbs the intellects of the most zealous part of the clergy at the present day is the "eastward position"? When such a spectacle as the Folkestone case is presented to gods and men, what wonder that unbelief spreads? If a more articulate reply were requested, one might perhaps say that the old belief is perishing chiefly for two reasons: first, because it has become a sham belief; secondly, because it is a negative belief. No man can make converts who does not believe what he says; nor will he, as a general rule, make them rapidly, when his creed consists chiefly in denying the strongest and most fruitful convictions of his neighbors. I shall not here inquire into the first of these explanations; but it may be worth while briefly to defend the other, which, indeed, is, at first sight, in greater need of defence.

It sounds paradoxical to declare that the Orthodox belief is essentially sceptical. The infidel is popularly identified with the Mephistopheles, whose essence it is to deny. He denies, it is said, a hereafter and a divine element in the present. That denial implies the abandonment of the most cheering hopes and highest aspirations of mankind. To bring the charge of scepticism against those who are fighting against materialism and atheism is at best to indulge in a frivolous tu quoque. A parallel phrase, however, is common on the lips of the Orthodox. It is a commonplace to taunt sceptics with credulity; nor is the taunt without foundation. So long as men of science continue to dabble in the filth of "Spiritualism" it will have a meaning. A confessor is, after all, better than a medium; and I would rather reverse the miracles of Lourdes than grovel before the trickery of a Yankee conjurer. Moreover, to leave a disgusting subject, the remark is really significant. To speak brutally (as is sometimes pleasant and healthy), one might say that faith is often used to signify belief in any nonsense; credulity, belief in somebody else's nonsense. Now, it is unfortunately true that the rejection of one kind of nonsense is not a sufficient security for the rejection of all nonsense; it follows that scepticism and credulity may mean the very same thing: the acceptance, that is, of a doctrine which is sceptical so far as it contradicts my opinion, and credulous so far as it falls in with yours. It is worth while, however, to look at the matter a little more closely.

Scepticism, in the most absolute sense of the word—a rejection of belief as belief,—is, if not a rigidly unthinkable, at least a practically impossible state of mind. Metaphysicians may play with such a doctrine; as they may urge that it is a legitimate consequence of their opponents' theories. Nobody doubts, however, that if they succeed in fastening that imputation upon any system, they have established a legitimate reductio ad absurdum. As a matter of fact, absolute scepticism does not exist. It is rather impossible than erroneous. There is a vast body of truth in regard to which the thinkers generally known as sceptical are fully as confident as their opponents. Mr. Mill, for example, was just as certain as Descartes in any given case that two and two made four, whatever doubts he may have suggested as to the ultimate ground of belief. Indeed, the same thinkers who are charged with scepticism are equally charged with an excessive belief in the invariability and certainty of the so-called "laws of Nature." They are reviled equally for being sceptical and for being dogmatic; for having too few convictions and for having too many. No man, of any school, really denies the possibility of attaining certainty in regard to all such propositions as admit of verification by experience. The real problem discussed is not,—ought we to believe, but why ought we to believe that two and two make four, or that Rome exists, or that the planets obey the laws of gravitation? The believer in necessary truths asserts by the very form of his argument that his adversaries do in fact believe, and cannot help believing, the truths which he alleges to be necessary, though they may deny the propriety of that epithet. The thorough-going empiricist may suggest that in some sense the most evident truths would cease to be valid under some other conditions; but he does not deny them to be valid within the whole sphere of possible experience. By attacking the supposed distinction between different classes of belief, he really elevates the claims of empirical knowledge as much as he depresses that of a priori knowledge. We can no more alter the absolute intensity of belief in general than we can change our centre of gravity without some external point of support. One set of thinkers holds that we must pierce to the absolute in order to provide foundation for the whole edifice of belief. Their antagonists declare that such a foundation can never be discovered, but they add that it is not needed. As the universe no longer requires the proverbial world-sustaining tortoise, so the world of belief requires no reference to anything outside of experience.

The point is obscured by the habit of speaking of "belief" absolutely, without describing its particular contents, and of proceeding to describe it as in some sense a creditable, whereas unbelief is taken to be a discreditable, state of mind. The inaccuracy of the assumption follows from the obvious simple consideration that belief is unbelief. It is the very same thing seen from the other side. It is a mere question of accidental convenience whether a belief shall be expressed positively or negatively; whether I shall say, man is mortal, or man is not immortal. The believer at Rome is, by virtue of his belief, the sceptic at Mecca, and inversely. The believer in the Ptolemaic system has neither more nor fewer beliefs than the believer in the Copernican system; he has simply a different set of beliefs. To say, therefore, that belief qua belief is better or worse than unbelief involves a contradiction in terms. In the very act of asserting we deny; and it is a transparent fallacy, though an example of a very common class of fallacy, to give an absolute and universal character to a proposition which by its very nature can be only true in a particular relation. Belief and unbelief being identical in nature, either is good just so far as it is reasonable or logical; that is to say, so far as it conforms to the rules which secure a conformity between the world of thought and the world of fact. In spite of all the slipshod rhetoric about faith and reason, no other test is admissible, or can even be put into coherent and articulate shape. If we still speak of scepticism as a mental vice, we must mean a reluctance, not to believe in general, but to believe what is reasonable; and in this sense the most sceptical man is he who prefers the least weight of evidence to the greatest.

The popular line of distinction corresponds, indeed, to a very important divergence of thought; though not, in any strict use of language, to a distinction between belief and unbelief. That man is generally called a believer (and I shall use the word in that sense) who asserts, while the unbeliever denies, the possibility of rising to a transcendental world. The sphere of the believer's creed is therefore wider, it may be said, than that of the unbeliever. His world transcends or envelops that of his opponent, and he accepts a whole category of propositions in regard to which the unbeliever maintains the neutral attitude of absolute doubt. But this statement is at least inadequate. As a so-called disbeliever is simply a belief differently stated, so a belief about the other world, so far as it can be called a belief at all, and certainly so far as it can have any influence, is of necessity a belief about this. Beliefs belonging to the transcendental sphere may be of the highest importance so far as they modify or so far as they give strength and coherence to beliefs about the ordinary world of experience. They give the adjective which modifies the meaning of the substantive. But, except as influencing our conduct, belief about heaven and hell would be of no more importance than a belief about the inhabitants of Sirius; and, so far as it influences our conduct, it is capable of translation into terms of ordinary experience. That other world upon which the believer gazes is either a superfluity or is essentially a new light cast upon this world. You may, for various reasons, talk about the light abstractedly from the thing lighted, but it might as well be darkness except as revealing some new aspect of concrete objects. The dogmas of the believer may extend farther or pierce deeper than those of the unbeliever, but their vitality is entirely within the region to which both have access. The creed about the beyond, when not a set of words, is but another mode of stating a belief about the present. The vulgar epicurean infers from the shortness of life that eating and drinking are the only pleasures worth enjoyment. The ascetic infers from the same fact that sensual pleasures are worthless. Each has as definite a creed as his rival, and as capable of expression in peremptory terms. Whether we express doubts as to the reality of future or of present pleasures, or beliefs as to the reality of their evils, we may equally have a dogmatic creed capable of serving for a rule of conduct. Every genuine belief, in short, which refers to the transcendental world, carries with it a reference to this, which may be accepted or denied by those who would in terms most narrow the sphere of belief.

This illustration, however, suggests the really important distinction. Some creeds do, in fact, supply motives for consistent and vigorous action, while others produce a paralysis of the will. This is not because one creed expresses an absolutely greater quantity of belief—if one may say so—than its rivals. Creeds which once prompted to the most energetic action have become simply obstructive, like Mohammedanism; and some of the most intense beliefs in the world, as some forms of fatalism, are more depressing than any doubts. But, as a general rule, creeds must lose their stimulating power when they tend to produce doubt in presence of the great emergencies of life. If one creed gives a definite precept when its opposite leaves the mind undecided between conflicting precepts, the first will be best adapted for energetic persons. Such a creed, moreover, can be most simply expressed in terms of affirmation when its opposite most easily takes the negative form. It is more natural, that is, to give the positive form to the rule which prescribes one out of a dozen courses of action than to the rule which asserts them to be all equally promising. And, in this sense, the positive is more likely to be stimulating than the negative form, or, if we choose so to speak, belief than scepticism. We might infer that, as a creed ceases to possess its old power, the negations which have always been latent in its affirmations will tend to assume greater prominence. They must, in fact, become more distinctly operative. The creed is depressing when it restrains more frequently than it impels. But the tendency is obscured by the habit of using the old forms; and the creed which is most sceptical in this sense—most incapable, that is, of suggesting powerful motives and efficient restraints—may still express itself in the positive language. We must decide upon its real tendency, not by simply examining the form of its utterance, nor by asking how many beliefs it expresses, but by inquiring, as well as we can, which side of the creed is most important in relation to the conditions of the sense. Such an inquiry will be facilitated by bringing into distinct light those implicit denials which are overlooked in the ordinary statements. If we thus ask what it is that the Christian faith, as now existing, actually denies, we may possibly find some explanation of its failure to meet the unbeliever.

One or two familiar arguments from the evidence-writers may give a clue to the inquiry. A man believes in the immaculate conception. He denies, then, that a certain event took place in accordance with laws exemplified in all similar cases. He impugns in this instance the validity of that inductive process upon which he counts at every step in daily life. He is a scientific sceptic in the strictest sense, for he is throwing doubt upon the trustworthiness of one of the primary ratiocinative processes. The same is true, whenever an event, admitted by all parties to have occurred, is ascribed by one party to supernatural interference. An amiable apologist expressed his surprise the other day that men of science should take into account such trifles as the existence of flint implements, and refuse to take into account the existence of the Bible and of Christianity. Surely he never heard of the men of science who denied the existence of the Bible and of Christianity. Which man really declines "to take a fact into account,"—the man who declares it to be altogether exceptional and supernatural, or the man who regards it as a result of the normal operation of recognized forces? Which implies the greatest "scepticism,"—the assertion that somebody wrote the book of Genesis by faculties similar to those which enabled another to write Homer, or the assertion—that it is utterly impossible that anybody would have written down the legends of the Garden of Eden and the Ark, without the direct assistance of God Almighty? If it is sceptical to deny one agency, it is equally sceptical to deny the other. What is given to Jehovah is taken from Moses.

In the more common case of miracles, the fact is denied as well as the explanation. The "sceptic" refuses to believe the myth of the Magi, because the story involves impossibilities and rests upon no evidence. Somebody—we know not who—wrote—we know not when—on some authority—we know not what—a story which involves a belief in doctrines shown to be false, and showed, by ignoring all difficulties, his entire innocence of critical principles. To disbelieve the story is called sceptical. Why? The disbeliever implies the assumption that evidence is fallible; and that, in particular, unfounded stories may obtain currency in a sect when they tend to honor its founder. Does any human being deny these assumptions? Nay, does not every one who asserts the truth of this particular legend implicitly assert them in regard to every other creed but his own? The so-called sceptic does not differ from the believer in regard to any general principles of evidence. He merely asserts the evidence to be non-existent in this particular case, and refuses to believe without evidence. The phenomenon, admitted on all hands, is the existence of a certain narrative. One thinker classes it with authentic history; the other classes it with a well-known variety of popular legend. Neither denies the existence of much authentic history or of much groundless legend. If we accept as the measure of the "scepticism" involved the weight of evidence resisted, he is most sceptical who is most illogical; and it is as sceptical in one man to deny the capacity of the human imagination as in the other to deny the intervention of a supernatural agent.

It is, of course, open to the believer to show that the rejection of this particular story involves the rejection of a whole narrative resting upon sufficient evidence. The argument is of the less importance, because miracles in this sense are now seldom alleged as evidence. People have become sensitive to the inconsistency involved in basing a theory of the universe upon the alleged exceptions to the general order. But another argument, now put forward with more confidence, illustrates in a more important case the scepticism of believers. The character of Christ, we are told, is absolutely perfect. The moral code which he preached is equally perfect. The spiritual force which he revealed is the only one capable of swaying human nature. The appearance of such a teacher, the promulgation of such a code, and the revelation of such truths, constitute an event in history so unique that it can be explained by nothing short of a divine intervention. Nay, the discontinuity implied is of so vast an order that nothing can explain the facts short of the stupendous miracle of the incarnation of the Ruler of the universe. If the unbeliever grants substantially the facts alleged, he has still to discuss the real problem. Grant Christ to be perfect,—is the difference between him and the best of his race such that it must correspond to the difference between man and infinity? Grant his teaching to be of flawless purity and unrivalled power,—are we to infer that nothing but the inconceivable catastrophe suggested can explain the knowledge and the power displayed by the founder of Christianity?

The question is, briefly, whether the facts thus assumed are exceptional or miraculous. Every fact that ever did or will exist is in some sense exceptional; that is to say, it exemplifies the working of certain invariable laws under conditions not elsewhere precisely realized. Given the necessary conditions, we must always obtain extreme cases, which do not contradict, but confirm, the general law. One comet has the most eccentric orbit; one man the most gigantic stature; one artist the loftiest and finest genius. But the comet obeys the laws of gravitation as rigorously as the most domestic planet; the giant is a physiological curiosity, but does not imply any exception to physiological rules; and we admit that the genius of a Phidias implies, not the incarnation of a god, but the occurrence of a special set of social and other conditions. A giant one thousand feet in height, made of ordinary flesh and blood, would be an impossibility; or, in other words, his existence would be miraculous; but giants of eight or nine feet have existed, and may therefore exist, without implying any breach of natural law. The question of their possibility must be decided by our knowledge, derived by ordinary scientific processes, of the nature of flesh and blood and the limits of the variability of the species. Similarly, to prove the divinity of Christ by such reasoning, we must prove the superiority of Christ and of Christian morality to be not simply unmistakable, but to be so great that it is beyond the reach of the most exceptional nature placed under the most exceptional circumstances; and, further, if the divinity of the teacher is to be established, this superiority must be so great as to be fairly called infinite. Briefly, then, the believer denies, while the unbeliever asserts, that under appropriate conditions human nature may produce a Christ without any breach of the ordinary laws, though it may be that we are in presence of an extreme case of those laws. The test by which the validity of either conclusion must be established is the correspondence of the rival theories with our independent knowledge of mankind. Hence it is easy to note the assumptions involved. The unbeliever, basing his judgment upon experience, has formed his estimate of human nature from the facts before him. He sees that the race has produced many great religious teachers, among whom he may (or may not) reckon Christ to be the foremost. He believes that his creed can produce a Christ, because it has produced a Christ. It might conceivably appear that the classification of Christ as a man was erroneous, and that there was an insuperable gulf between him and all who externally resembled him. The unbeliever denies the existence of this discrepancy, and holds that, though Christ may exceed the ordinary stature even more distinctly than Phidias exceeded the average sculptor, or Shakespeare the average poet, the excess does not exceed the recognized limits of variability of the race, as inferred from observation. Genius exists, and Christ was (on this hypothesis) the greatest of moral geniuses. The procedure of the believer is different. He has assumed, more or less explicitly, that all virtue is supernatural; that Christianity and Judaism represent the true light which comes from God, of which a few scattered beams alone have fallen upon other creeds. Human nature, then, is merely the residuum left, when all good impulses are assumed to come from without. Our nature, in this pure phrase, is corrupt; our heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. From ourselves comes nothing but lust, hatred, and the love of darkness. It is only consistent to infer, when this has been assumed, that human nature cannot produce a Christ. But, when this has been assumed, the question has been begged. Instead of framing our theory from instances actually observed, including Christ, it has been framed by summarily excluding all great teachers as either the direct or indirect channels of a supernatural impulse. Christ must be God, because all men are devils.

The scepticism involved in such "belief" is obvious. It implies a denial of the natural goodness of man,—a refusal to believe that purity, love, and heroism, of a certain order, can spring spontaneously in the soil of human nature. Where such growths are to be found, they must be taken to have been transplanted from a supernatural paradise. They are the sporadic plants which have strayed beyond the guarded walls of Eden, and can only struggle against the foul, indigenous products by the constant care of the Divine Gardener. Every living theology is saturated with such scepticism; for our conviction of the necessity of supernatural aid is measured by our sense of human impotence. The doctrine of the corruption of human nature is the central doctrine of all vigorous theological creeds. The belief in God is, in this sense, simply the opposite pole of disbelief in man. They are reciprocal dogmas, allied as the light and the shadow. The doctrines of redemption and the atonement are realized in proportion as this need is felt, and die away or are rationalized into sheer no-meaning wherever it becomes faint. And therefore the belief in the supernatural character of a religion is but the other side of a scepticism as to human virtue, when not reposing upon a supernatural basis, enlightened by supernatural revelation, and stimulated by hopes and fears of a supernatural world.

This brings us in sight of that ground of hostility to "unbelief" which has the greatest weight with a very large class of believers. A legitimate objection to part with the ancient creed may rest upon philosophical, or moral, or æsthetic grounds. Ultimately, it may be said, the questions are all one. The true, the good, and the beautiful are, we may admit, in some sense identical. The one final question is, therefore, "What is the truth?" The æsthetic objection to change becomes contemptible when it admits as a possibility that a belief known to be false may still be beautiful. The moral objection becomes at best a respectable prejudice when it implies a reluctance to press philosophical doubts to their ultimate issue. But, while accepting this most emphatically it may be worth while to point out what are the assumptions involved in the moral objection without examining their ultimate validity. It is asserted, in a great variety of forms, that the sense of duty is based upon some kind of belief in theology. Whether embodied in the blunt assertion that men would be murderers, liars, and adulterers, but for hell-fire, or diluted into the more abstract theory that we cannot preserve our loftiest ethical conceptions without preserving our belief in the divine order of the universe, this doctrine is not merely proclaimed by mere bullies of the pulpit, but is expounded by serious thinkers worthy of all respect, and therefore represents a force with which we clearly have to reckon. Let us endeavor to draw out in articulate shape the positions tacitly assumed by its defenders.

Perhaps the most important task for philosophers at the present day is that of placing morality upon a scientific basis. We cannot expect that any moral theory will yet deserve the name of a science. But we may hope to prepare the way. We may confirm principles already established by empirical methods, show in what direction and in what sense they are capable of modification, and save them from a dangerous association with the decaying and inconsistent theories of theological metaphysics. The first condition of success is the rejection of the main contention of the theologian. We must get rid of the whole scheme of thought which asserts, more or less explicitly, the necessity of a supernatural basis for moral beliefs. If morality is to be scientific in method, though not a completely coordinated body of scientific truths, we must find our data within Nature; that is to say, within the sphere accessible to the ordinary methods of investigation. Morality, that is, like political or sanitary sciences, must be placed upon a sound inductive basis, if we admit, as most serious thinkers virtually admit, that no other basis is trustworthy.

The constructive method follows from this primary assumption. Morality must rest upon the truths which, if fully ascertained, would form the science of "sociology." We can, it is assumed, determine with sufficient accuracy what are the laws which regulate the development of the social organism, and what are the conditions imposed upon it by its environment. We can infer what are the individual instincts which contribute to its growth and stability; and what, consequently, are the laws, a recognition and acceptance of which would be favorable to its healthy development. Laying them down we should virtually construct the moral code. Further, we should investigate the process by which the race has gradually felt out certain rules essential to its welfare. We should find that they have neither been imposed from without nor deduced from abstract speculation. The race has discovered that the practice of murder is injurious to its welfare, as it has discovered that intoxication is prejudicial to health,—by trying the experiment on a large scale. The so-called intuitions will of course be deprived of their supernatural character, and regarded simply as assumptions verified by experience, and now capable of independent proof, though not originally discovered by abstract reasoning. They will have the weight due to the experience of ages, and in their main outlines may be taken to be just as much beyond the reach of possible refutation as any of the primary data of observation. They are as certain as any of those simple rules which are confirmed by daily and hourly experience,—as certain as the laws that men are mortal, that fire burns, and water drowns; and such certainty, if it does not satisfy metaphysicians, is enough to regulate practice. We should infer, again, that the development of society is conditioned by, and tends in its turn to stimulate, the growth of those higher instincts which are unintelligible in regard to the isolated unit, but essential elements of the great binding forces of society. We should see how their growth is interwoven with the growth of the intellectual and emotional faculties, and determine the conditions favorable to their strength, and calculated to make them contribute to individual as well as to social welfare. We should then be in a position to examine the nature of the most efficient sanctions of morality. How is an observance of the rules essential to the welfare of the race to be enforced upon its individual members? The unbeliever has to admit that anti-social instincts exist, and will exist. He is not concerned with the difficulty, which has perplexed theologians since the days of Job, as to the unequal distribution of rewards and penalties in this world, nor with the solution reached by postulating a complementary world in which all the wrongs will be redressed. He may hope that the anti-social forces will finally be crushed out; but he sees that the process must be slow and stern. If, on his view, justice does not always strike the individual sinner, it falls unrelentingly on the society. If a disregard of morality is nothing but a disregard of the conditions of social welfare, the larger organism is certain to suffer in the long-run for an erroneous or degrading standard. The negative guarantee for the triumph of good principles is, in the last resort, that evil means social degeneration and ultimate destruction. But as the unbeliever holds that the social instincts are in the strictest sense natural; that they tend to strengthen and adapt themselves to the growing needs of society; and that they survive the decay of the particular dialects in which men have uttered their emotions and their speculations,—he may reasonably hope that society will develop itself and reach a higher moral standard by a direct growth and at a smaller cost of error and consequent suffering. The ceaseless struggle between good and evil implies the existence of impulses tending both ways; but it may be hoped that, as the race becomes more intelligent and more distinctly conscious of its aims, the victory of good may be won at a smaller cost of error and opposition.

If this be a brief indication of the main lines of the unbeliever's moral theory, we have to ask at what point it conflicts with the believer's tenets. It is undoubtedly possible to state the believer's theory in such a form as to minimize or entirely remove the opposition. Diminish the anthropomorphic element as much as possible; identify God with Nature,—and theology becomes little more than a guarantee for the solidity of our methods. If the belief in the uniformity of Nature implies a belief in the divine Ruler of Nature, and, conversely, the belief in the order implies merely a belief in a regular order, the question becomes one of those already noticed. We do not ask whether, but why, we believe. One party thinks it necessary to get behind experience; it is not content with knowing without also knowing that it knows, or satisfied with the certainty of a doctrine unless it can be also called necessary. The other party is content to regard belief as an ultimate fact, and, to assume, without finding an a priori deduction for the so-called uniformity of Nature. I am content to observe that so far there need be no controversy as to practice; the believer and the unbeliever are at one in their methods and results, though differing as to the cause of their validity. It is mere waste of time to bandy charges of scepticism and credulity. But, further, I must say that a theology of this neutral tint and abstract character is not one which really governs men's minds. It is only in so far as the scientific conception is modified that the difference is really important. The question of whether or not it requires a certain guarantee is little better than a scholastic puzzle, except so far as it helps the re-introduction in a disguised shape of ancient fallacies.

When we turn to that kind of theology which undoubtedly makes a relevant contention, we are at once met by a significant difficulty. A belief may fairly be called sceptical in the practical sense which confirms equally a number of conflicting theories. Morality, you say, depends upon theology. Then, is all theological morality identical? It is little better than a juggle to tell us that you alone have an absolutely certain rule if it turns out that you give an equally plausible foundation for mutually contradictory rules. Now, there is no dispute between theologians, or between anybody worth notice, as to the value of certain well-known rules. Nobody explicitly denies that chastity, truthfulness, and mercy are good qualities. Widely as systems differ, the ordinary code—kill not, steal not, lie not, and so forth—may be regarded as definitively sanctioned by the experience of the race. But go a step further: consider any of the really open questions, and you will find that theologians can take diametrically opposite positions. There is no theory of morality which may not be expressed in theological language. There are theological utilitarians and theological intuitionists. One theologian says that man could not have discovered the moral law without a revelation; another, that morality is a science of observation, and that God simply orders us to pursue the greatest happiness of the greatest number; a third holds morality to be deducible by the pure reason, and infers that revelation and experience are alike superfluous. On one system, the essence of theology is the proclamation of future rewards and penalties. On another, the utterly unselfish love of God is the only foundation of true virtue, which is destroyed so far as it is adulterated with personal interests. One theologian regards the virtues of the heathen as splendid vices; another, as proofs of the universality of the Divine influence. One argues that all natural impulses are good, because Nature is God's work; his opponent replies that all Nature is under a curse, and man's heart corrupt at the core. One makes it the foundation of his system that God rules the happiness of man here; another preposterously declares all happiness here to be an illusion. One holds asceticism to be sheer folly; another holds that it is the only road to heaven. The antinomian thinks that, as God has once for all elected or rejected him, his actions are of no importance; the sacerdotalist thinks that by accumulating meritorious observances he can establish an indefeasible claim upon his Creator. One thinks it blasphemy against God's omnipotence to claim any share in the work of salvation; another calls it an insult to God's justice to suppose that salvation will not be conceded to good works. One sees in God's mercy an assurance that all men will be ultimately happy; another infers from God's righteousness that the vast majority will be sentenced to endless torture.

RENAN'S GOSPELS.

II.

PARIS, Sept. 3, 1877.

I have shown that the Gospel of St. Matthew is not only an amplification of the Gospel of St. Mark, but that many important additions are to be found in it, which are, so to speak, the condensation and consolidation of the legend which was formed after the death of Jesus. Renan regards this Gospel as "the most important book of Christianity,—the most important book that ever was written. . . . In one sense, the composition of the Gospels is, after the personal action of Christ, the capital fact of early Christianity,—I may add, of the history of humanity. The book habitually read by all the world is a book in which the priest is always found in fault, in which the cultured men are all hypocrites, in which all the lay authorities are rascals, in which all the rich are damned. This book, the most revolutionary and dangerous that ever existed, has been prudently put aside by the Catholic Church; but this Church could not hinder its bearing its fruits. The Gospels, severe towards sacerdotalism, scornful of austerity, indulgent towards the weak man who has a good heart, have been the perpetual nightmare of the hypocrite. The evangelical Christian has been an enemy of pedantic theology, of hierarchical pride, of the ecclesiastical spirit produced by the ages. The Middle Ages burnt him. Even now the grand invective of the twenty-third chapter of Matthew against the Pharisees is still the biting satire of those who cover themselves with the name of Christ, and whom Christ, if he came back to the world, would pursue with his whips." Everything seems to show that the Gospel was written in Syria for some Jews who knew little of Greek. It was attributed to St. Matthew, but the apostle was dead when this Gospel appeared.

Nothing is more interesting than Renan's account of the progress of Christian doctrines and ideas in the Roman world. There had been a sort of tolerance under the Flavians. The Christian ideas—we ought rather to say, the Judeo-Christian ideas—found their way into the imperial family after Titus, under the cruel despotism of Domitian. Many persons of the Roman aristocracy opened their ears to the new teaching; the Gospels were to them a sort of ideal refuge against the horrible cruelty of a ruler who seemed to be the incarnation of all evil, and who understood no other duty than to give ignoble pleasures to the multitude. The Jews lived in the suburbs of Rome; they had to pay a special tax,—the fiscus judæicus. Many Romans probably felt for them the sort of morbid curiosity which draws so many Russian aristocrats of our day towards communists and socialists. They left the old town of Servius Tullius, and roamed near the Egerian fountain. The collectors soon found that there were many men in this suburb who lived Judaically, though they were not real Jews. The fiscus judæicus was extended to all those who led what was then called a Jewish life. Josephus, who was a favorite at court, wrote the life of the Jewish people.

About that time one of the Christians of Rome undertook to write a Gospel for the Roman Church. This Gospel is known under the name of the Gospel of Luke. It is admirably analyzed by Renan. Lucanus, or Lucas, had followed Paul to Macedonia; had remained in Rome after the death of Paul; and his Gospel is thoroughly imbued with Paulinian ideas. "It is surely by mere conjecture," says Renan, "that we connect Luke and his Gospel with the Christian society of Rome at the time of the Flavians; but it is certain that the general character of the work of Luke agrees very well with such an hypothesis. Luke has a sort of Roman spirit; he likes order, hierarchy; he has a great respect for the centuries, for the Roman functionaries, and loves to represent them as sympathetic towards Christianity." Luke was probably ignorant of the Gospel of Matthew, but knew the Gospel of Mark. Living in Rome, he writes for the Gentiles; he does not speak of the Old Law; his Christianity is open; he writes for the oppressed of all nations, for the poor, for the people; he is a pure Ebionite; his Gospel is the hymn, the hosannah of all sufferers.

If you look at it from this point of view, you will find how naturally it takes its place under the ferocious and wicked Domitian. From childhood the brother of Titus had hated with an intense hate whatever was good, wise, reasonable; he abhorred all philosophers; they appeared to him like mute critics of his own selfishness; he liked evil as naturally as men eat bread. As soon as his imperial eye fell on the poor Jews and Christians of the suburbs, he was inclined to persecute them as naturally as a mischievous boy torments an insect. He did not admit that there could be any other religion and piety than the adoration of himself; was he not a god, and what gods could be better than himself? The pious Roman was the man who worshipped the emperor. Could there be anything more insulting to this all-powerful brute than the impudence of men who adored other gods than the gods of whom he had constituted himself the patron and protector? If many of the good emperors sincerely believed that the new doctrine was dangerous, what could Domitian think of it?

The persecution began, and this time many victims were found in the higher classes of society. The blood of the martyrs did not flow in vain, and we soon find the Roman Church drawing more strength from it. The time was approaching when the Church must come out of what may be called the atomic state and receive an organization. A discussion began between the Church of Rome and the Church of Corinth, where the Greek spirit was uppermost,—the frivolous and undisciplined spirit which did not respect hierarchy, and was open to perpetual inspiration and illumination.

"The great problem was near: what constitutes the Church? Is it the people, the clergy, or the inspired prophets? The question had been already put in the time of Saint Paul, who had solved it in the true manner by mutual charity. Catholicism had its origin in Rome, since the Church of Rome traced its first rule. Precedence does not belong to spiritual gifts, to science, to distinction; it belongs to hierarchy, to the powers transmitted through canonical ordination, which goes back in an uninterrupted chain to the apostles. It was felt that a free church, such as was conceived by Jesus and by Saint Paul, was an anarchical utopia, which could produce nothing for the future. With evangelical liberty disorder was dreaded; it was not foreseen that with hierarchy uniformity and death would come in the end."

Renan believes that Domitilla and the family of Flavius Clemens entered into the conspiracy which put an end to the reign of Domitian; though Juvenal only says: "He could safely deprive Rome of its noblest souls, and nobody took arms to avenge them; he perished when he took it into his head to become an object of dread to cobbler. Thus was lost a man covered with the blood of the Lamias." All his statues were broken, his triumphal arches demolished; all was over with the Flavia gens. Domitilla ended her life in obscurity; her posterity can be traced till the end of the third century; her family vault became one of the first Christian catacombs.

Under Nerva the Church of Rome was quiet and prosperous. The Jews continued to be tormented with Messianic and Apocalyptic ideas. The Apocalypse of Ezra was published under this reign; the Christians read it with avidity. Ezra may be considered as the last prophet of Israel. The adoption of Trajan by Nerva was an event of great importance in the history of Christianity. As Renan says, "The age of monsters was past. The lofty race of Julius and of the families allied to him had shown to the world the strangest spectacle of folly, of greatness, and of perversity. The poison of the Roman blood seemed now exhausted. All the malice of Rome had transpired. It is the nature of an aristocracy which has led a disorderly life to become in its old days Orthodox and Puritan. The Roman nobility, the most terrible that ever existed, henceforth has extreme refinements of virtue, of delicacy, of modesty." This transformation was partly the work of Greece, of the moralists, and of the philosophers. For a hundred years it seemed as if philosophy was going to govern the world. The work of legislation was never so perfect, so exhaustive.

This epoch is very interesting, as it shows a curious mixture of democratic and of aristocratic ideas:—

"The opinion of the politicians of the time is that power belongs, by a sort of natural delegation, to the most honest, sensible, moderate men. This designation is made by fate; once facta designatus, the Emperor governs the empire as the ram his flock or the bull his herd. With all this, the most republican language; in very good faith, these excellent rulers believed that they realized a state founded on the natural equality of all citizens, a royalty which had for its basis the respect of liberty. Liberty, justice, respect of opposition were their fundamental maxims. But these words, borrowed from the history of the Greek republics, had not much sense in the real history of the time. Civil equality did not exist; the Roman or Italian aristocracy preserved all its privileges; the Senate, reinstated by Nerva in its rights and dignities, was as much shut off as ever; the cursus honorum was the exclusive privilege of the nobles."

These noble families had alone preserved some of the old virtues of the republic; they had alone resisted the Oriental, Egyptian, and Syriac favorites of Caligula, of Claudius, of Nero. Christianity had suffered from the contempt in which the Roman aristocrats held all Oriental influences. Twice, under Nero and under the Flavians, some Jews and Christians found their way into the Imperial household. From Nerva to Commodus there was a gulf between the Jewish doctrine and the throne:—

"Trajan, Adrian, Antoninus, Marcus Aurelius hold themselves with regard to Judaism and Christianity at a sort of haughty distance. They don't know them, do not care to study them. Tacitus, who writes for the world, speaks of the Jews as of an exotic curiosity, a thing quite unknown to those for whom he writes, and his mistakes are surprising. . . . History must speak with respect of the honest and courageous politicians who dragged the world out of the mire into which it had been thrown by the last Julius and the last Flavius; but they had the imperfections which naturally grow out of their qualities. They were aristocrats, men imbued with traditions, with prejudices, like the English Tories, who draw their strength from their very prejudices; they were profoundly Roman. Convinced that whoever is not wealthy or well-born cannot be an honest man, they did not feel for the foreign doctrines the indulgence which had been felt by the Flavians, who were much more bourgeois. Their society, the men who share the power with them, Tacitus, Pliny, have the same contempt for the doctrines of the barbarians. During the second century an abyss seems to separate Christianity and the official world. The four great and good emperors are directly hostile to it, and it is only under the monster Commodus, as under Claudius, Nero, and the Flavians, that we shall find again 'Christians in the house of Cæsar.'"

The persecution which began against the Christians was administrative and permanent, not bloody and temporary. The Christians were constantly acting in violation of a law on associations; they were guilty of sacrilege, of offence against the majesty of the emperor, of nocturnal meetings. There were, besides, all the flagitia nominis coherentia, all the crimes connected with the very name of a Christian, of a publicus hostis. The persecution became a sort of a low fever which lasted during the second and during the third century, till it ended in the terrible crisis of the beginning of the fourth century.

This fifth volume of Renan's great work ends with the reign of Trajan. He shows the part which was taken by the Jews during the great expeditions of Trajan in the East; how the Christian Church and the synagogue became more widely separated. While Christianity became more and more Latin and Greek, the Jews shut themselves completely up in an unintelligible Syro-Hebraic dialect. In his sixth volume, Renan will relate the history of Christianity under the reign of Adrian and Antoninus, the beginnings of gnosticism, the composition of the pseudo-Johannic writings, the first apologists; show us how the episcopate became more and more important; how Christianity became more and more Greek and less Hebraic; how, finally, a Catholic Church was formed by the union of the provincial churches, and how its central authority was fixed in Rome. The new Bible was then complete, and was called the New Testament. The divinity of Christ was recognized in all the churches except the Syrian Church. Christianity had spread in every direction, in Gaul, in Africa. Christianity, in one word, is born, perfectly born; it is a child; it will still grow; but the child has all its organs; it lives in the open air; it is no longer an embryo.—New York Nation.

A GOOD DEAL of interest has been felt in the literary world as to the fate of Heinrich Heine's Memoirs, the notion of writing which occurred to him at the time he was in treaty with Julius Campe, his grinding publisher, for the issue of a complete edition of his works. During 1837 and '38 he was hard at work upon them, giving them all the time he could spare from his other labors. Two years later, he had completed four volumes, and he considered them his best prose production. In a letter to Campe, March 1, 1837, he writes of his intentions: "I am not inclined to give a short, dry sketch of my life, but a large book, a number of volumes, which shall embrace the whole story of the age in whose greatest movements I have participated, together with the most marked persons of my time—all Europe, all modern life, German affairs up to the July Revolution, the result of my costly and painful studies,—the book, in short, that is specially looked for from me." The same month he writes again: "Day and night am I engaged on my great work, the true romance of my life; and now I feel for the first time the whole worth of what I have lost by the burning of my papers in my brother's house. This is the next thing the public shall have from me." In September, 1840, he tells Campe that he had completed four volumes, and is well satisfied with them. Alluding to the intrigues and abuse of his enemies, he adds: "My inner spirit remains peaceful and cheerful notwithstanding, for I am used to defamation, and I feel that the future belongs to me. Even if I should die to-day, I should leave behind me four volumes of autobiography which represent my thought and striving; and which, on account of its historic matter, of its true exposition of the most mysterious of transitive periods, will descend to posterity." Heine may have exaggerated the importance of his Memoirs, but they must be very interesting, and excellently done, for he was one of the wittiest and most brilliant of men. The MS. is said to have been sold to the Austrian government by one of his near relatives after his death; and the story now comes from Vienna that it is in the secret archives of the library of the Imperial Court, and that arrangements are making for its publication. The literary public will be glad to learn if the story be true; for the publication of Heinrich Heine's Memoirs is something about which it must necessarily feel more than usual concern.—N. Y. Tribune.

LAW OF THE CHURCH ON BURIALS.—In the following cases Catholic clergymen are forbidden to perform funeral services:—

1. For non-Catholics. They are not likely to require them.
2. For persons under a major excommunication et non tolerati.
3. For persons who, deliberately and in their full senses, commit suicide and give no sign of repentance before their death.
4. For those who obstinately and in the presence of witnesses spurn the sacraments offered to them at the time of death.
5. For people who live a scandalous life and end it without a sign of repentance.
6. For persons who die in a duel, even though they give signs of sorrow before expiring.

In cases of doubt, the Ordinary of the diocese is to be consulted; and whenever this is impossible, the rule is to incline towards the side of mercy.

In family sepulchres built apart, as on estates, for private families of Catholic laymen, the non-Catholic relatives of these families can be buried.

Unbaptized children are to be buried in an unblest portion of the cemetery. Adults who die suddenly while preparing for baptism are entitled to all the rights of Christian sepulture. Converts are permitted to be buried in the family lot of their non-Catholic relatives, if such be living, and have a lot in a public cemetery. If the surviving relatives are Catholics, and purchase a lot in a cemetery other than Catholic, thinking that they can lawfully do so, or if such lot was purchased before the year 1853, and bodies are already interred there, it is left to the judgment and conscience of the pastor to perform, if he thinks proper, the usual services from the Ritual at the house of the deceased. In this case the service is never allowed in the church without express permission from the Ordinary.

If there is no Catholic cemetery, and a separate portion of the public cemetery cannot be secured for Catholic burials, then the grave in which the Catholic dead lies buried can be blessed in the manner expressly prescribed in the Roman Ritual.—Providence Visitor.

"YOU CAN FORM no notion of the impudence of these rascals," says a San Francisco magnate, denouncing the Chinese. "Only the other day, in our rainy season, when the mud was fifteen inches deep on Montgomery Street, a yellow chap, in fur tippet and purple satin gown, was crossing over the road by a plank, when one of our worthy citizens, seeing how nicely he was dressed, more like a lady than a tradesman, ran on the plank to meet him, and when the fellow stopped and stared, just gave him a little jerk and whisked him with a waggish laugh, into the bed of slush. Ha! Ha! You should have seen the crowd of people mocking the impudent Chinese as he picked himself up in his soiled tippet and satin gown!" "Did any one of the crowd stand drinks all round?" "Well, no; that heathen Chinese rather turned the laugh aside." "Aye, how was that?" "No white man can conceive the impudence of these Chinese. Moonface picked himself up, shook off a little of the mire, and, looking mildly at our worthy citizen, courtesied like a girl, saying to him in a voice every one standing round could hear, 'You Christian; me heathen; good-by.'"—Hepworth Dixon.

"THE COOK CREW."

As Peter sat dozing
And taking his ease,
His chin in his hands,
And his arms on his knees,
A rough chap came up
And gave him a jostle, Saying, "I'll go in,
Please, Mr. Apostle."
But Peter, awaking,
Said, "Not quite so fast!
Your name isn't here;
You cannot be passed."
Then, with fingers outspread
And thumb on his nose,
Looking Pete in the eye,
He gave three lusty crows.
The apostle then, blushing,
And fumbling his key,
Said, "Now, my young man,
Between you and me,
"Though your name isn't here,
I shall let you go in;
But don't let me hear
Of your crowing again."

TWO SONNETS.

The Priest's Remedy.

The balm of future bliss, Sir Priest, not long
Will work o'en on the pious low-browed and dull,
Whose hard-earned pence keep Peter's treasury full,
And thee in clover, ruddy, fresh, and strong.
This life is somewhat they begin to feel;
Homes they demand, if not so proud and high
The so-called house of God towers towards the sky
At their expense, while they in penury kneel,
Is the hereafter made more bright and sure
By living here in squalor, ignorance, crime?
Hope is a diet thin, howe'er sublime.
Faith's poppy soon will cease to drug the poor
Sword, cross, and sceptre longer to obey,
While feast the few the many born to sway.

Holy Sees.

Ere Peter's dome o'er Southern Europe rose,
The shrine of Delphos was the Holy See,
The Pythia's lips heaven's will did then disclose
Foaming with a prophetic ecstasy.
The old world swarmed to bright Apollo's steep,
Climbing the Pielstus' gorge in ceaseless throngs.
Thither the pilgrims went with faith as deep
As unto current devotees belongs,
Who wearily fare to Mecca and to Rome,
As unto deity's especial home,
Where his anointed earthly agents dwell,
Whose acts be faithful not to ratify
With nod of assent from his throne on high,
Whether their sentence be to heaven or hell.

The Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 25, 1877.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unread Manuscripts not returned.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, WILLIAM J. POTTER, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), DAVID H. CLARK, MRS. ELIZABETH CARY STANTON, J. L. STODDARD, ELIZUR WRIGHT, C. D. B. MILLS, W. D. LE SUEUR, BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Editorial Contributors.

THE NEW YORK Catholic World for November, 1877, has for its leading article a long paper of sixteen pages on "The Free Religionists," which, if not wholly successful, certainly intends and tries to be fair. It is a review of the last Annual Report of the Free Religious Association, and is honorably free from the insolent, malicious untruthfulness which characterizes too many Catholic criticisms of religious liberals. The writer is, of course, a staunch Catholic, and concludes by saying that "the real issue, if free-religionists can be induced to look at it, is between Catholicity and nihilism"; but we are glad to say that he is also a gentleman.

WE HAVE RECEIVED a pamphlet copy of Col. Ingersoll's Vindication of Thomas Paine—A Reply to the New York Observer, which we shall notice on our return from Rochester. The editor of the Peoria Saturday Evening Call, in which it was first published, wrote on October 15: "A large second edition of The Call containing Ingersoll on Paine was exhausted Saturday afternoon. Not a paper is left, and orders are pouring in from all parts of the country. We are getting the letter out in pamphlet form. It will contain 36 pages, and is elegantly printed, and carefully corrected by Col. Ingersoll himself. It will be sold for 25 cents per copy, or by the dozen at $2.00." Address S. R. Henderson, Peoria, Ill.

THE DECAY of reverence for the clergy which is noticeable in the "Young America" of to-day has been seldom so bluntly manifested as in the following anecdote, for which the Springfield Republican stands sponsor: "A prominent pastor exchanged with an out-of-town brother the other Sunday, and his small boy rather took advantage of his absence at the breakfast table Monday. He had noticed the previous morning that the visitor delayed somewhat after finishing the meal before beginning the family devotions; and so, after reminding him that, if he didn't stop eating griddle-cakes, there wouldn't be any left for the hired girl, he burst out with, 'Are you going to have prayers now, or will you try to get out of it as you did yesterday?'"

THE SALEM (Massachusetts) Register states that President Clark, of the Massachusetts State Agricultural College, who has just returned from Japan, gave his impressions of that country to the people of Amherst on a recent Sunday evening. Among other things he said: "The Japanese are a people able and willing to do right. I never saw a quarrel in Japan, and never saw nor heard of a Japanese student in America or Japan accused of immorality. I selected from a thousand young men the students for the college there, and never knew one of them that would willingly offend his teachers. The Japanese will walk right up like men and become Christians. I have great faith in a people that have such aspirations. They have great capacity for usefulness in the conversion of the world, and are the men of all others to be missionaries in China. Until last year Shintoism has been the State religion since six hundred years before Christ. It is a sort of natural religion, and they worship the Sun-God, and this religion, heathenism, or whatever it is, has made Japan what it is. Since six hundred years before Christ when the first Mikado reigned, they have all been from the same family. Of all heathen religions Shintoism is the least objectionable; and, if I ever become a heathen, I shall be a Shintoist." Is it permissible to wonder what motive the Japanese can have to "walk right up like men and become Christians," when they are evidently better than Christians already?

"SCHOOL AND STATE."

The curious notion has sprung up in some quarters that the government transcends its proper function in sustaining schools at the public expense, or indeed interfering at all with popular education. It is argued that there ought to be, in a genuine republic, as total a separation of "School and State" as of "Church and State"; that the government ought to confine itself to the protection of life and property, and the general police regulation of society; that it is an invasion of private rights to tax anybody for public schools, especially those who have no children of their own, and who, therefore, are simply robbed by being compelled to help educate the children of other people. Even some liberals of repute, notably Herbert Spencer, have been swept away by this species of sophistry, which, with all deference to those who use it, we are constrained to consider the crudest and most one-sided theory that ever found respectable supporters. It is liberalism gone to seed, and that, too, as bare of seeds as a dandelion stalk which has been subjected to the three puffs of a frolicsome school-girl who wants to discover whether her mother wants her at home.

But let us, if possible, keep hold of this wild and fantastic philosophy long enough to expose its amazingly thin texture.

The principle of the separation of "Church and State" rests upon solid reasons; while that of the separation of "School and State" rests upon nothing but a mere play upon words—a fleeting and cheating echo of sound without sense. Why is it a fundamental condition of republican freedom that the State must be absolutely independent of and separate from the Church? Because the free State exists solely for the protection and furtherance of the purely secular interests of mankind; while history proves that the Church, existing primarily for the protection and furtherance of interests which concern what is termed "the other world," and only secondarily for those of this world, has never meddled with political affairs except to destroy freedom, block progress, and crush out all intellect which would not bow before her tyrannous creeds as the absolute truth. A long, bitter, and biting experience has taught the human race not to delegate the control of civil affairs to priestly hands or influences, if they desire to enjoy the blessings of civilization, science, and personal liberty.

Now what analogy is there between the relations of the free State to the Church and to the School? None, absolutely none. The Church fits for another world,—the School for this. The one is the great enemy of secular independence in the State,—the other is not only its friend, but its very creator, preserver, and constant benefactor. The free republican State cannot exist either united to the Church or separated from the School. The cry of "no union of School and State" is as sapient as would be the cry for "no union of Police and State—Court and State—Post-office and State—Custom-house and State," etc. The State is nothing but a community of individuals, men, women, and children, associated for mutual protection and help; and its very first duty is to perpetuate itself by educating its new-born members into an intelligent comprehension of and fidelity to their own duties and right relations as citizens. Most certainly it cannot long sustain itself under popular institutions if it neglects this duty; and it therefore has the best right in the world to claim and exercise supervision over popular education—the right of self-preservation for the good of all. Any theory is blindness itself which refuses to see these great staring facts of life.

For this reason the school-tax is not at all to be considered as each man's separate bill for the education of his own children; and it is a piece of dismal stupidity to regard it in any such false light as that. The cost of sustaining the police and the courts is paid by the whole community, not by the few alone who are compelled to resort to them for personal protection; the man who never gets his head broken or his house robbed has, all the more on this account, an equivalent value for his taxes in this very fact of his security, which he assuredly would not enjoy if nobody paid to support the courts except the few who actually need their interference. So the cost of sustaining a good public school system, which is also paid justly by the whole community, is the total price paid by all for the privilege of living in an intelligent community with free institutions; every man, childless or not, shares this benefit and should pay his share. That is why it is just to tax Catholics for the school system like all the rest of the community, whether they choose to use it or not; for they receive the same general benefit from the school system which others do, whether they do or do not avail themselves of its privileges for their own children. The Catholic who grumbles over his school-tax on the ground that his conscience won't let him send his own children to the public schools is just as unreasonable as the man who grumbles over his police-tax on the ground that he has never had his pocket picked. It may be his misfortune to possess a conscience which demands privilege and is not satisfied with even and exact justice in the schools to all religious beliefs; but none the less he gets a full equivalent for the money he pays, because he enjoys thereby the advantage of living in a community sufficiently educated to permit him to be the citizen of a free republic rather than the subject of an "effete monarchy" or despotism. All the miserable sophistry and demagoguery of the bishops and priests will not avail forever to keep the Catholic laity in ignorance of this self-evident state of facts.

Every day the perils of ignorant suffrage in a republic are forcing themselves more and more upon the attention of thoughtful minds; and every day the necessity of devising some efficient mode for securing universal education is becoming equally evident. It is a question of national magnitude and importance, since the whole nation is vitally affected by it; and sooner or later it must receive a national solution. We believe the time has come already for attempting this; and the first step must be to affirm the right and duty of the national government to require a system of "compulsory education" (we dislike that non-descriptive and misleading phrase) to be established by every State. There is an urgent practical need of this, and the Rochester Congress will do a great public service if it succeeds in bringing this great practical issue fairly before the people. The nation is in danger of positive disintegration from the effects of wide-spread ignorance; and the law of self-preservation demands that this fountain-head of peril, riot, and factional disturbance shall be effectually choked; not by a new policy of disfranchisement which will only sow the seeds of political revolution, but by an extensive and more thorough development of the policy of popular education. The right to knowledge should be recognized as on a level with the right to property or life, and every citizen should be protected by the nation in those tender years when he too often finds no other protector—when the ignorance or selfishness of parents and guardians too often deprives him forever of all opportunity to acquire knowledge.

That there is insecurity in the foundations of the public school system is proved to a melancholy degree by the hostility manifested towards it in certain quarters. General T. M. Logan, of Richmond, Virginia, in a paper read at the last meeting of the American Social Science Association on "the opposition in the South to the free school system," frankly admitted the existence of a formidable degree of such opposition in the Southern States; and he attributed it chiefly to the unwillingness of the whites to sustain schools for the colored children at all. But he declares explicitly that "every consideration of the subject leads to the conclusion that the future welfare and prosperity of the South demand the education of the freedmen by public school instruction." General Logan is a Southern man himself, and his facts and arguments go to confirm the conclusion that the national government would not only consult its own imperative interests, but just as much the imperative interests of the South itself, by requiring every State to sustain a free-school system, and to permit no child to grow up in ignorance within its borders. There is need of statesmanship in this matter which shall be bold as well as wise.

But a still more formidable danger threatens the public school system from the Catholic Church, not so much by its direct as by its indirect effects. There is a deliberate and apparently concerted effort now making by the Catholic clergy to sophisticate the minds of the Catholic laity on this subject, for the purpose of keeping a firmer grip on their allegiance, and consolidating, strengthening, and increasing the power of the Church. Our attention has been only recently called to the American Catholic Quarterly Review for January, 1877,—a large, new quarterly of nearly two hundred pages, now in its second year, and published by Hardy & Mahony at 505 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. The leading article of this number is on "The Liberalistic View of the Public School Question," and devotes twenty-nine pages to a review of our lecture on "The Public School Question" in reply to Bishop McQuaid. There is no argument in all these pages worthy of the slightest consideration; the impregnable central position of our lecture,—that the theory of "Parental Prerogative" is a re-vamping of the obsolete "Patria Potestas" of ancient Roman law, and that it rests on the absolutely exploded social theory that the family, not the individual, is the true social unit,—is very prudently and very carefully ignored. But page after page of vulgar impudence, sophistry, and misrepresentation is made to wear the semblance of argument, and to give the impression to the reader that the really irrefutable has been successfully refuted. As a signal instance of the wilful untruthfulness of this article, we point out one astonishingly brazen, persistent, and cunning misrepresentation:—

"Mr. Francis E. Abbot is the editor of THE INDEX, a weekly (Masonic) paper devoted to free and rational religion," as we read in an advertisement printed at the end of his lecture. . . . He is anxious "to hasten the day when free religion," that is, Freemasonry, "shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world." [p. 2.]

"Who is it that seeks the interests of a party and of a sect" (though not of a church), but Mr. Abbot, who labors so earnestly in his INDEX for the triumph of Freemasonry? . . . Free-religionists, too, and the members of all Masonic societies, whatever their name, are sectaries, as they are cut off from the universal Church." [p. 5.]

"... the universal supremacy of Freemasonry . . . this is what every thoughtful man understands to be the aim of the secularistic sect." [p. 6.]

"This is what Mr. Abbot with truly Masonic cheek calls 'equal justice to all.'" [p. 7.]

"Is not Mr. Abbot known as the editor of THE INDEX, a weekly paper devoted to free and rational religion," that is, to Freemasonry?" [p. 12.]

"The American Encyclopædia tells us that 'the attention of philanthropic men (Freemasons) in all parts of the country was directed to the subject, and in 1817 (which was the first centennial of Freemasonry) commenced what has been not improperly termed a revival (secularization) of education, which is still exerting its influence for good (and for evil too) throughout the country.'" [p. 13.]

And so on, ad nauseam, the writer labors to confound the theory of secular education with Freemasonry, and to represent all its friends as Freemasons, in order to make the well-known hatred and prejudice of Catholics against Freemasonry set them excitedly and angrily in opposition to every one who favors equal justice to all in schools sustained by the tax-money of all! Of course, it is superfluous to say in these columns that we never wrote or uttered a word in favor of Freemasonry. We are not a Freemason, know little on that subject, and have strong objections (which we have freely expressed in THE INDEX) against all secret organization. But the falsehood was useful, and therefore it was unblushingly told over and over again—why? Simply to make all Catholics hate and oppose the public school system. For the closing sentence of this long article is as follows, printed in italics: "The Catholic conscience and the consciences of all other citizens have an equal, natural, and Constitutional right not to be outraged. Therefore, a school system which is an outrage to millions of American consciences is a violation of right and a disgrace to the country."

That is the pith of the whole article, which does but utter the remorseless resolve of the Roman Catholic hierarchy to break down our public school system if possible, no matter at what expense of truthfulness or the public weal, simply to set their own feet on the prostrate necks of this mighty people.

The question is: Will the United States, as a nation, have the wisdom and justice to defend its own existence and the equal rights of its own citizens by making the universal education of the people a recognized national duty, calmly and resistlessly performed in disregard of all plots and treacherous machinations?

COOK AND CAUSATION.

Rev. Joseph Cook, in one of his Boston lectures published in the Advertiser, attempts to show that the mind has ideas not acquired by experience. He says:—

"The truth is, experience goes altogether too short a distance to account for the wide range of such a certainty as that every effect, not only here but everywhere, must have a cause."

"Experience does not teach what must be, but only what is; but we know that every change not only has, but must have, a cause. We cannot explain by experience a certainty that goes beyond experience."

"This I know, that everywhere and in all times, every change must have a cause. You are certain of the universality of every necessary truth. How are you to account for that certainty by any known experience?"

Following Kant, Mr. Cook argues that, since such certainty could not have come from our limited experience, it must have arisen independently of experience; that it is inherent and intuitive; something necessitated by the very constitution of the human mind. Many who are not in sympathy with his theology will accept his conclusions on this subject. I cannot accept them.

I believe every change must have a cause,—because I am unable to transcend human experience,—because experience has never acquainted us with events that were not determined by preceding events. "An event is a manifestation of force." We have never known a manifestation of force that was not preceded and followed by some equivalent manifestation of force; and the belief that "every change must have a cause," is, as Fluke well says, "the belief that force as manifested to our consciousness can neither rise out of nothing, nor lapse into nothing,—can neither be created nor annihilated; and the negation of this belief is unthinkable, since to think it would be to perform the impossible task of establishing in thought an equation between something and nothing. . . . We must therefore, to a certain extent, accept the Hamiltonian doctrine that our belief in the necessity and universality of causation is due to an original impotence of the conceptive faculty; save that an ultimate psychological analysis obliges us to regard this original impotence as simply the obverse of our inability to transcend our experience."

Here is another quotation, from Lewes' Problems of Life and Mind: "The very fact of our being compelled to judge of the unknown by the known,—of our irresistibly anticipating that the future course of events will resemble the past,—of our incapacity to believe that the same effect should not follow from the same causes,—this very fact is a triumphant proof of our having no ideas not acquired through experience. If we had a priori ideas, these, as independent of and superior to all experience, would enable us to judge the unknown according to some other standard than that of the known. But no other standard is possible for us."

The belief that any particular change must have a cause is without doubt universal, for the reasons given in the admirable statements quoted from Fluke and Lewes. But there is no reason for the notion that the belief in the universality of causation is everywhere found among men. Savages have no such belief; neither have children. Indeed it is confined to the comparatively few who are accustomed to thinking and reasoning on scientific and philosophic subjects. That it is an inherent belief or certainty is an assumption which Mr. Cook cannot sustain, even though it has the support (as every error has) of some great names of the past.

But the dogmatic assertions of "His Lectureship" on the subject—a mere repetition of the beliefs, and, in some instances, of the phraseology of metaphysicians of past centuries, characterized by him as "incontrovertible truths"—are greeted by a Boston audience as though these statements were not only profoundly true and of vast importance, but brilliant discoveries of the Rev. Joseph Cook, destined to revolutionize all existing systems of philosophy! It is possible, however, that the clear-headed thinkers of Boston do not join in applauding the "incontrovertible truths" of the reverend gentleman. It is barely possible; indeed, that some of the cultured men and women whose presence in the city help to entitle Boston to its distinction for thought and learning, and to its proud appellation of "Athens of America," do not even honor the champion of a decaying theology with their attendance!

AN EXCELLENT WAY TO ORGANIZE.

The following printed circular was issued by friends of the National Liberal League at Ithaca:—

ITHACA, N. Y., Oct. 13, 1877.

Dear Sir,—It is proposed to organize in Tompkins County an Auxiliary Liberal League, to coöperate with the National Liberal League in its effort "to accomplish the total separation of Church and State," and secure this by Constitutional amendment. Prompt action is desirable that the local organization may be represented in the convention of the National League, to be held in Rochester on the 26th, 27th, and 28th inst.

If the above object meets your approval, you are invited to attend a meeting at the office of M. E. Bishop, Wilgus Block, on Friday, the 19th inst., at 7½ P. M. Please extend this invitation to any others who, in your judgment, would sympathize with the movement.

Respectfully,
* WM. A. ANTHONY, MERRITT KING,
JOHN E. BEERS (Danby), WM. KINNE,
M. E. BISHOP, B. P. MACKOON,
D. W. BURDICK, J. O. MARSH,
O. S. ENSIGN, D. B. MORTON (Groton),
* WILLARD FISKE, J. E. OLIVER,
* ISAAC FLAGG, C. C. SHACKFORD,
JOHN WINSLOW.

The six names marked with asterisks are those of Professors in Cornell University. Our informant wrote on October 16 that "the prospect now is that we shall have a large meeting that will overflow the private office and adjourn to a hall in the same building."

This is a most admirable way to organize a local auxiliary Liberal League, and furnishes an excellent example for imitation elsewhere. Local agitation alone can bring the great principles at stake home to the minds and consciences of the people; and it will be all the more timely and beneficial, if (as we hope) the Rochester Congress shall prove to be successful in its noble aim. Let the next Annual Congress find the liberals of the county widely and thoroughly organized. This year there has hardly been time to secure this important result, and we can hardly hope for more than a prosperous initiation of the great movement contemplated; but next year a larger harvest may be fairly expected, if those who comprehend and appreciate the vital ideas of the Liberal League movement are alive to their manifest duty. Who will not help in a cause so pure, unselfish, and inspiring?

P. S.—We are informed, though not yet officially, that the meeting above called resulted in the formation of a new Liberal League and election of delegates to Rochester.

MISS MARTINEAU'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I have a word to say, with reference to a notice of Harriet Martineau's Autobiography which appeared in the second number of the Radical Review, and, as usual, turn to THE INDEX when I wish to speak with freedom.

I am compelled to confess a disappointment that this notice should have been published in a magazine professedly liberal, and am convinced that its tendency will be to confirm the already existing prejudices entertained toward Miss Martineau, on account of her conclusions on theology. The reviewers of the Autobiography, who have condemned, qualified, or lamented the atheistic and materialistic views held by this eminent woman, have been quite excusable, in that they spoke their own biases through organs which are decidedly biased. One, however, expected better things out of our new Radical Review.

"J. W. C." begins the notice by saying that he "has been compelled to choose to write principally for those who have not read the book, warning away those who have"; and also "that his opinion of the book would avail the reader very little, whereas a brief compendium might be of real service, and lead to the purchase and perusal of one of the most interesting autobiographies that was ever written."

The reviewer then proceeds to present a compendium, in a very succinct and interesting manner, but from first to last colors it with his own "opinion."

Although a great admirer of Miss Martineau, I still endeavor to avoid that intensity of friendship which characterizes the lady who has prepared the memorials attached to the Autobiography, and who receives from "J. W. C." a severe rebuke for "hating them who hate her friend." I can bear to hear the truth, however unpleasant it may be, concerning my idols in literature, provided there is a certainty that it is told without prejudice or bias.

I make no issue with "J. W. C." in regard to his desire that the portion of the Autobiography containing the censorious treatment of notable people "had been burned before it ever saw the light." If there be truth in the treatment, as he admits there "doubtless is," I see no reason why Miss Martineau should not speak her thought. She gained many great qualities by heroic endeavors, and could excuse nothing slipshod in great people. She was so transparent that she could forgive no sham, so uncompromising she could have no sympathy with political timidity. I fancy each individual has the right to admire or condemn this portion of the book.

I also quite agree with the reviewer in the remark pertaining to the high opinion in which she held her friend Mr. Atkinson. I discover nothing in his letters which could cause such a mind as Harriet Martineau's to turn to him for instruction. This is as puzzling to me, as is her faith in the power of mesmerism.

My first issue with "J. W. C." arises when, after calling in question the reliability of Miss Martineau's memory of certain transactions, he says: "But they are generally such as she was quite willing to forget"; and "truth and poetry would describe her Autobiography almost as well as Goethe's." That an old woman's memory is often untrustworthy is true; that Miss Martineau's was so, is very likely true; but in the light of her life-long reputation for conscientious truth-speaking, it sounds very unjust to accuse her of forgetting wilfully. It is a super-polite way of saying that which ordinarily polite people call a convenient memory when they mean lying.

Next, I cannot read "J. W. C.'s" remarks upon the part of the Autobiography relating to the connection of Harriet Martineau with the anti-slavery movement in America quite patiently. He says, after having expressed the opinion that she was in no such danger of physical violence as she imagined for her sympathy with the principles of the abolitionists, that "some of her friends deserved better of her than they got"; that "even Dr. Channing is damned with faint praise; that he was a Unitarian, and therefore Miss Martineau was unconsciously obliged to take him down"; that she assumes almost solely for herself the credit of his action in the Abner Kneeland matter; and concludes that "for Harriet Martineau to teach Dr. Channing anything about religious liberty is an unqualified absurdity."

Miss Martineau certainly does "take down" Unitarianism in a manner that is really enjoyable to a thorough-going radical, showing up its inconsistencies in such a clear light, it is no wonder that a thorough-going Unitarian is a little stung. But I cannot believe that she would take a man down because he was a Unitarian. She would, as nearly as I can judge of her, be as severe upon an atheist if he fell short of her ideal reformer; and I claim that Harriet Martineau could teach even so great a man as Dr. Channing something about religious liberty, for she had attained to a freedom of thought almost without parallel in the world, and was untrammelled by any sort of creed or sect.

Now comes the part of the notice which tallies with all the religionist's reviews of the Autobiography, and which is offensive to those who are in sympathy with Miss Martineau's views, and which serves to deepen the shadow cast upon an illustrious woman's name, reflected from the religious prejudices of the mass of mankind. "J. W. C." says: "Almost every reviewer of Miss Martineau calls her an atheist. But she denies that she is 'atheistic.' She affirms her belief in a first cause." This is misleading, and much like the religionist's trick of making the Bible support the revelations of science. "J. W. C." knows that Harriet Martineau was an atheist in the common acceptance of the term, for she distinctly says, in the "Atkinson letters": "There is no theory of a God, of an author of Nature, of an origin of the universe, which is not utterly repugnant to my faculties; which is not to my feelings so irreverent as to make me blush; so misleading as to make me mourn."

To deny, then, that Miss Martineau is an atheist is to show a white feather of timidity on the part of a liberal Christian. It is as if the reviewer said to himself: "It won't do to allow the world to consider this woman a disbeliever in a God; this woman whose conduct was irreproachable, whose life was one long, loving effort to benefit the world."

"Atheist, was she?" asks this reviewer; "I think not, seeing that she conceived the world to be advancing under a law of progress, and so, believed not in a first cause only, but in a final cause; in 'one far-off, divine,' not event nor consummation, but society still gradually unfolding."

What does she say? In a letter to her friend, Mr. Atkinson, she writes: "As to what my present views are, when clearly brought to the focus of expression, they are just these: I feel a most reverential sense of something wholly beyond our apprehension. Here we are in the universe! This is all we know; and while we feel ourselves in this isolated position, with obscurity before and behind, we must feel that there is something above and beyond us. If that something were God (as people mean by that word and I am confident it is not), he would consider those of us the noblest who must have evidence in order to believe; who can wait and learn rather than rush into supposition."

Why cannot the reviewers allow Miss Martineau to speak a word for herself on this matter? Pietists are dissatisfied with her disbelief in their idea of a God, and call her atheist; and other pietists, no better satisfied, deny that she is one. No one seems quite content to let the religious beliefs and unbeliefs of this woman be secondary to her great literary and philanthropic work. Atheist! Infidel! these terms are tauntingly alluded to, or treated as things that must be regretted in connection with an otherwise illustrious career; or must be tortured into meanings that shall better please the multitude. This is the clinging taint of an intolerance begotten of our crude religious notions, and partakes but little of that broad, comprehensive, scientific religion of which you, Mr. Abbot, are the prophet.

One thing more. "J. W. C." says that he "for one cannot reconcile the self-mastery of Miss Martineau with her necessarian ethics"; that "she won her peace largely through her industry." I have read very carefully the portion of the book which relates to her study of the necessarian doctrine, and by her own words I for one can reconcile the "peace that passes my understanding" to these ethics. I can do no other in the light of such language as this: "I can truly say that, if I have had the blessing of any available strength under sorrow, perplexity, sickness, and toil, during a life which has been anything but easy, it is owing to my repose upon eternal and irreversible laws, working in every department of the universe, without any interference from any random will, human or divine." "My life has been (whatever else) a very busy one; and this conviction of the invariable action of fixed laws has been the main-spring of my activity. When it is considered that, according to the necessarian doctrine, no action fails to produce effects and no effort can be lost, there seems every reason for the conclusion, which I have no doubt is the fact, that true necessarians must be the most diligent and confident of all workers."

Harriet Martineau was a great woman, not without human weaknesses and faults. Her heroic independence, however, in promulgating the results of a free, broad, far-reaching investigation of the vexed problems concerning God, duty, immortality, are so exceptional and praiseworthy, that I for one feel it an insult to her memory when others attempt to do what she never would do for herself; that is, to "trouble her spirit to vindicate itself or be understood."

THE MORAL OUTLOOK.

The question of moral influence among the class of Liberalists in our land is a matter of such moment as should claim the sober consideration of all. Confident that the freedom-loving of all orders can but appreciate for good the motives by which these lines are penned, they will undoubtedly accept in kindness the offering we bring.

On the part of the church-inclined there exists a sort of random impression that liberalism and immorality are, as a Churchman remarked the other day, "Sin twisters," and that "where you find the one you find the other, and by no means can they be easily divorced, since their affinities are so intimately blended."

With all such the opinion seems quite prevalent that moral worth is only found in its relation with the Church and in its connection with its creed.

Now is this necessarily the case? Is it an axiomatic truth even in a limited degree? The question is worthy of investigation. Can it be a sensible conclusion in the judgment of fair-minded men of average integrity for truth? Because a man holds, as honestly he may, to sentiments of a most enlightened and liberal character in matters of religion, deviating from the old Orthodox ruts, is it to become a fact that for this his character shall be tainted in all coming time? Will it be found by the test of common-sense and ordinary experience that freedom of thought and immorality are in any real sense necessarily blended, or hold any affinity for evil with each other? Impossible. The proposition is certainly most untenable and wide of the mark. On the average scale of morals in humanity, facts will not sustain the charge, as moral conduct in man is not a special attribute to be claimed by clan isolation.

And yet in this opinion they are sustained by their own authorities. Let us see.

Morality, viewed from an Orthodox stand-point, holds a vitally contrasted outline, if seen through rational perceptions. To a trained conscience morality becomes a fatal failure unless tinged in the blood of the crucified,—it has no value in the errands of life to any poor soul unless linked to an atoning sacrifice of a blood offering. Trained to believe a sentiment so august and fearful, they tremble in terror before the throne of the mysterious, and learn to belittle even the semblance of morality short of an immaculate origin in the blood of a God.

This brief synopsis covers the ground of divinity so far as the views of morality are concerned. Hence the doctrine taught by our wise divines, that "a strictly moral man, if not a believer in the atonement, is, of all others living, the most fearfully dangerous being in his influence, that can mingle in the society of sinful men."

These are gravely serious considerations addressed to rational minds in a world so full of manly possibilities. If true essentially, what a fearful foreclosure portends to all the aspirations and glories illuminating this active world of ours,—"the garden of the gods" to become the abode of woe, the activities of moral genius and greatness, to be doomed to the fiery agonies of the eternally damned! And this is but the faintest dream of the terrible reality! A foreclosure "mild in its claims as compared with the dignity of Deity." And this is the foundation of Christian morality, only too feebly stated. This, the august tribunal that impeaches, indicts, and condemns a morality on the other side, innocent only of blood. Human reason, as the offspring of experience and truthful cogitations, and morality, as the conscience-rule of life's sober duties, are by this terrible arbiter to be branded as "traitorous machinations" in the universe of a personal God.

To all this, an enlightened and free religious sentiment enters her sober and fearless protest,—since in this free land no one class of mortals have special rights to assume dictatorial prerogatives for themselves, and hurl the firebrand of desolation among the rest of humanity. A more humane instructor tells us of a morality that is more genial in its character and better suited to the universal yearnings of man's nature. Pure morality as a rule of right is the natural religion of social beings, and is endowed with an inspiration that is impressed on all things excellent; so that no sensible being can question the power and influence of real worth in human character. That portion of man's conduct which is not based on moral good has but little to insure for it substantial award in the fair judgment of mankind, while true moral worth is a quality universally beloved, and under no circumstances, whether in or out of Church relations, will ever pass at a discount. No matter to what depths of degradation a poor mortal may consign himself, he will ever look up with imploring sensibilities into the eye of pitying humanity for relief, to come through moral renovation if it comes at all; and as a fallen outcast even, he never fails to approve the morally good, while involved in the basest evil.

Indeed morality has its foundation laid deep in the heart of the social fabric, and instinctively formulates for human society the only code of organic order consistent with the harmony of the race, or adapted to the regulation of individual character. And this condition of things originated not in supernatural revelations and Bibles, but in that original, conscious moral rectitude man sustains to man, and this before Bibles or revelations began.

Goodness and morality, then, must have always been necessarily inseparable in the transactions of human society. Hence the really good man, under a sense of the morally true, asks not what his God will do or demand, but, rather, what is right? and, guided by truth-inspiring reason, "dares the right to do." This is all. A God of reason will ask no more, can ask no less.

But the history of the Church has signally failed to produce an unquestionable standard of correct morality suited to an intelligent public mind. Carnage, blood, usurped authority, blind zeal and superstitions, leading to the practically immoral, have blurred the finer perceptions of man, yielding in return only doubt and derision of her vain pretensions. It is hard to understand how a morality having its foundation in blood could work out other results.

And yet charity would forbid us to doubt the presumptive moral goodness of individuals as such in the Church, or querulously arraign the motives for good of the general mass of her otherwise intelligent religious teachers. But the calm and rational instincts of humanity, in its canvass for the just, the pure, the good, and holy, must and ever will revolt against the pagan conception of a God dying for man, or that innocent blood could alone rescue from sin. With what humility thoughtful man bows his head in sadness over such a picture of gloom as the past has painted for us! Yet nothing less could be expected, from the childhood of our race, and the necessarily slow unfoldings of a higher order. In no age can man be better than the religion he has imbibed, and no higher in morals than are his best perceptions of the loving, noble, just, and pure.

In this age of intellectual culture and unrestricted inquiry for truth, what is the moral outlook for a free religion and the liberal cause in our land? Would it not be unworthy to ignore the questions here involved, or shrink from the scrutiny of interests which concern every one? Never before in the history of man has the world witnessed such cheering indications for the triumph of truth over error, of light over darkness, of science over superstition, or of good over evil. An all-pervading sentiment of moral excellence in character is the essential demand of our times, in order to insure a full and final triumph for liberal efforts as now being made. Will it do then to indulge in unmanly indifference as to true moral worth in life and character? Is a really noble manhood of no moment in our estimates of life's varied duties? Will it do even to submit to the indignity and too common taint of moral indifference, and want of noble enthusiasm in a cause so self-sustaining and full of hopeful promise? Liberals are seldom charged, I believe, with a want of intelligence, and will not suffer in comparison with any other class of men. But is this the limit of our ambition, or this the summit of glory to which we aspire? Really, we have just reached the threshold of the grand temple that is to be. Paganized Christianity has built her temples in the past, but now it gives signs of decay. She has long been boastful of her conquests in civil rule, and no less so of her power over conscience and the moral domain; but the limits of that power are nearly reached and must soon yield to a milder sway. In her bewildering Christ adorations there has existed but little of pitying commiseration for the poor questioning barbarian who asks for evidence to guide a rational faith. Investigation and reason have but very limited quarters in the house of the holy; hence her boasted morality must languish and die in the house of its friends. "Come, now, let us reason together, saith the Lord," we grant is the most sensible and hopeful utterance that ever fell from the lips of Israel's God. But will "believers" admit reason to be a practical rule, if applied to their religion? If confiding mortals may approach a reasonable and reasoning God with argument, what may not be expected in the evolutions of human events? Permit the liberal judgment of the age under the power of reason to ripen into a persistent purpose for a higher standard of moral excellence and a nobler manhood, and nothing can limit the range for triumph over the waning fabric of religious superstition now prevailing.

Absolutely a great work is to be done. It has been crowded upon the times in which we live, and should be done without hesitation or delay. Life is short. The work is a labor of love, and demands the toil of the fleeting present. Each, all, must cultivate the honest conviction that they have something of life's work to do for the bettering of the lives of ourselves and those we shall soon leave behind. Thinking, reasoning, loving, with every kindly deed, with persistent energy, is the duty of all. Disseminating books, pamphlets, and papers of the best and highest order, full of force, reason, and research, tending to the noble, good, and true, is a work that all may do with an unsparing hand. The eye and ear of all are turned inquisitively to know what is to be the outcome of this effort in the diffusion of a larger religious liberty for man. Our Christian friends of all orders are becoming disturbed and confused. Many of them are exceedingly inquisitive and desire a wider range of liberty for religious thought and action. Early education has been the bane of life in their religion to involve them in the superstitions, from which they find themselves powerless to rescue except by a higher intelligence. They feel the grasp of the insidious, for that binds them and they long for relief. Honest, conscientious, and kind, they nevertheless feel the falsities of the past in a religion that has come down to them only to give unrest. The light of scientific convictions gains ground every day, and the love of higher truth and freedom of opinion pervades the soul of society everywhere. Religious men are neither few nor slow to perceive and cherish new moral truths when they are reasonably approached, and are the very class to prize advanced ideas all the more when once obtained. Good men and true from all the churches of our land are found in greater numbers by far than generally supposed, who are inclined to pursue the ways of reason. With myriads of such, the rubicon of error will soon be passed, and in the near future it will cease to be a crime to doubt the bloody cross and creeds and grasping authority of the "Church militant." Indeed, the progress of moral truth and right reason in this our day is surprisingly grand and cheering to those interested in the triumph of liberal ideas. All then must readily admit that a higher standard must exist in living deeds, not in prayers and blind faith, and that the worshippers at such a shrine will have reason for their guide, not the Christs and creeds of the past. The light of all sober thought, then, leads to the golden opinion that the morality for which we plead must and will in due time plant her foot on the solid rock of all reasonable truth, doubting nothing in the final sway of right over wrong, of living truth over decaying error, and that the sky will settle serene and clear over a better order of things.

If these hints possess any value, let them find an echo in the life and good deeds of all; then we shall feel that life has not been a failure,—that in our endeavor to bless others we have made ourselves the more happy.

AROUSING THE NATIONAL CONSCIENCE.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Your "appeal to all patriots and liberals," headed "Wanted, a New Conscience Party," and your editorial entitled "National Protection for National Citizens," which subsequently appeared in THE INDEX, are brave and true to the liberal line. Like yourself, I endeavor to appreciate duly the trying position and the unavoidable policy of President Hayes, but I fear the attendant dangers through the opiate-influence on the national conscience.

It is useless to boast of the liberty and glory of the American Union in the presence of individuals who are denied the freedom of speech or political action, according as any mob may choose to pervert the forms of local law, or fail to respect the spirit or letter of national law. This is the precise condition of Republicans and opponents of confederate democracy in the Southern States. It is in vain to offer as an apology to them for national desertion the restricted powers of the government; a government which fails to protect its defenders deservedly falls into contempt. The ties of allegiance are loosened; loyalty loses its virtue, and men of opposite principles become political bed-fellows because the obligations of conscience are performed at the risk of social intercourse, residence, or life in a community.

The workingmen's party is everywhere denounced as "radicalism in disguise"; the independents are anathematized as "traitors"; the reorganization of a Republican party would cause a reenactment of the deeds of violence which for so long a period disgraced the land; the one-party minority rule is the order of the day, and within the minority the "property-holders" are the dictators. Is this the republican form of government Congress should guarantee to the several States? Or is it conducive to the highest order of individual citizenship? Thoughtful men will answer. In my opinion a political peonage of millions of voters forbodes no good to the country, and will form the corner-stone of new and embarrassing complications, threatening all national life.

It is an important factor of the power of Romanism which is heartily in accord with democracy in name without the substance. It is the foe of liberalism, and all wholesome political or commercial movement. It barters conscience for office and power, on the broad platform of "the end justifies the means." The national conscience cannot be too thoroughly aroused, and THE INDEX is not one hour too soon in beginning the work. There will be scoffers and corners,—the worldly-wise men who will murmur, just as they did when the anti-slavery force was put in motion, but who will gradually awaken to the wisdom of your course as events crowd upon them of startling significance. Let us hope that you may be crowned with success in proportion to your zeal, and the Rochester Convention bear good fruit.

Very respectfully,
EMERSON BENTLEY.

NO SIDE ISSUES.

FLORENCE, Iowa, Oct. 13, 1877.

MR. ABBOT:—

Regarding the suggestions of Mr. Leland concerning the platform to be adopted at Rochester, I think that you are right. The woman question is covered by the second principle; and to introduce the currency controversy would be simply suicide. The financial question must be kept out, or it will be the ruin of the secular party. Mr. Leland speaks of the great necessity of going in for "success." In this connection he calls for "a radical expression of some kind concerning money." Is it possible that the gentleman is not aware that "success" would be the last thing obtainable with a platform containing such a "radical expression," especially if many of our friends in the East hold the views which you seem to entertain about an "honorable resumption of specie payments in 1879"? Put a bullionist plank in the platform at Rochester, and, unless I much mistake the temper of the West, the secular party cannot command any considerable vote here until this money question has been "settled" for the right.

With you, I trust that that question will be settled before 1880; but I fear not. With you, I hold that the three principles so ably advocated by yourself, are of pressing importance, and cannot too soon have the careful, earnest attention of all thoughtful men and women; and I shall do all in my power to help on the eminently just cause of secularism.

But, while realizing all this, I cannot but think that the currency problem also demands equally careful and earnest attention. And that we must either leave that question to be settled by the existing parties, or we must adopt at Rochester a "radical expression" in favor of a currency adapted to the needs of our present civilization. Such a currency, I need not pause to say, is not exclusively gold. But such a plank would estrange many of our friends in the East, and some at the West. So that I see no way but to ignore the question entirely, leaving the problem to be settled in other ways.

A "circulating medium" of iron, or lead, or diamonds, would be only a trifle more absurd than one of gold. There is no more reason why we should follow the example of the robber-founded and robber-governed nations of Europe in this matter than in questions pertaining to religion or politics. Upon this, as upon all other questions, we must do our own thinking. Authority is of no more weight in political economy than in religion. Science and reason must guide us here as elsewhere. We look back and laugh at those nations which used iron for currency. What shall the future say of our blind infatuation for gold? How many more "crises," "panics," and "Black Fridays" do we need to wake us from our sleep? Are we forever to cling to the old traditions of the barbaric past? I lay no claims to far-seeing wisdom, but I confidently predict that this question will not be "settled" before 1880, or 2880, unless it is settled in favor of paper currency backed by the credit of the whole nation.

I trust that in your broad catholicity of spirit, you will pardon my freedom of expression. Hoping that the Rochester Congress will be a complete success, I remain, most cordially and respectfully yours,

E. C. WALKER.

[The above is a striking proof of the necessity of sticking to the point at Rochester, and not attempting to drag in side-issues. If the money question is not settled by 1880, or if other questions then up for discussion demand a frank utterance, no national party ought to keep silence. But there is virtue as well as wisdom in waiting, and refusing to be tempted into profitless and endless disputes. The three great principles of the "Call" will be as much needed three years hence as now, while the money question at least may, and we hope will, be then a thing of the past. Mr. Walker's views on this question are doubtless as honestly and as tenaciously held as our own; and we as little seek to commit him to ours as we should consent to be committed to his. Since the new party proposed cannot possibly enter actively into politics till 1880, the only sensible course is not to raise questions prematurely which would inevitably defeat the whole movement. The liberals will test their own wisdom pretty effectually by their action in this respect at Rochester; and we anticipate noble things of them.—ED.]

A LETTER FROM PARKER PILLSBURY.

BATTLE CREEK, Mich., Oct. 11, 1877.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Your favor of the 3d instant pursued me here. I left Concord a month since for a Western tour, longer or shorter, as circumstances or "the logic of events" may seem to determine; but, probably, to remain most of the autumn and winter.

Work such as yours was never more needed in the nation than now, and never less desired; and, peculiarly, would never be, or have been, more poorly paid. The millennium of Moodyism is shutting down upon us, like another night closing in on a starless, moonless midnight, and must have its period, under laws beyond all human control.

Do you observe how all sects are uniting, and, as far as possible, cooperating in the new revival tactics? Not only Quakers, but, last week in my town of Concord, New Hampshire, even Shakers are welcomed to the platform performances.

My father's nearest neighbors on both sides were Quakers, and excellent neighbors too; but as we were strict Calvinistic Congregationalists, we were taught to regard them as dangerous infidels; and all the more dangerous for their strict morality and virtue. And as to the Shakers, we held them as only fallen angels from Quakerism.

There is meaning to all this. There are some Liberal Congregational preachers now, as well as Unitarian, deceiving almost the very elect. Many Spiritualists and Free Religionists run after them, leaving their own meetings to languish and die.

Not long since, I heard a devout Congregationalist describing his new and Liberal minister. "At first," he said, "we were almost afraid of him, his sermons were so much like the Unitarian ministers, and even some of the Spiritualist lectures. But in his prayers," he said, with a glad some satisfaction, "he sets our hearts all at rest." I heard one of those prayers myself,—closed with solemn ascription to "God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost!" And it was splashed with blood of atonement all the way through.

Before me is Rev. Dr. Swing's last Sunday sermon,—verbatim reported. And ninety-nine hundredths of it are excellent,—superexcellent. But in its very last lines he says: "Let us cast aside science, and throw ourselves anew on the assumptions of religion!" Since Dr. Swing was tried for heresy, he has become the most popular Congregational or Presbyterian preacher not only in Chicago, but perhaps in all the West, and many Liberals of all schools crowd his sanctuary. But in this same discourse he speaks also of his "risen Christ," as well as exhorts us to cast aside science, and cling to the assumptions, the guessworks of religion. If those "assumptions" be true, then is Dr. Swing the most dangerous preacher and most-to-be-dreaded religious teacher in the Western hemisphere.

I am glad you are still able to keep the field. Never was THE INDEX more needed than in the thick darkness of the present hour. The Free Religious societies are drooping and dying almost everywhere, and some, as you know, are already no more; and I hope the Convention at Rochester will take deep cognizance of these things.

The activities of the Church exceed anything I ever witnessed before, and the success in many directions is grand harvest of seed sown. Were I in and of the Congregational Church and pulpit, as once, the present prospect would be to my hope, sight; to my faith, full fruition; and, doubtless, I should live and die in that faith and hope.

The zeal and devotion of the denominational churches are worthy the divinest of causes. And, better still, and to us more important, they are worthy our most profound observance and imitation.

It will not be practicable for me to attend your Rochester Convention; but, thanking you none the less sincerely for the invitation, I am ever yours for all good word and work,

PARKER PILLSBURY.

THE CHELSEA LIBERAL LEAGUE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

With the return of cooler weather and longer evenings the members of the League came together, with a renewed desire for united effort and secular reform. The warm months and summer vacations had reduced associative effort; but the personal desire of the members to popularize a "conscience party," in and outside of politics, furnished the motive for more individualistic but none the less needed propaganda. A new pleasure appeared to animate the members as the season for renewed effort returned, and they promised themselves a larger satisfaction in the more concentrated labors of the League.

They met accordingly at the home of J. S. Dodge, 74 Bellingham Street, Thursday evening, October 11. President Crandon congratulated the meeting on the appearance of so many members, notwithstanding the relaxing influence of the summer and the inclement character of the evening. It promised well for the future of the League, and the union of effort so much needed against the growing tyrannies in Church and State. He supposed it was familiar knowledge to those present that a Congress of the National Liberal League was to be held at Rochester, N.Y., during the month, and read in support of the same Mr. Abbot's editorial on the want of "a conscience party," in THE INDEX of September 27,—all of which was conceded to embody the essential truths of liberalism of to-day. Mr. E. Turk was especially pleased with the proposed "national protection to the national citizen," and thought such a policy, if carried out in practical life, would command the confidence of the "national citizen" of the United States.

The logical and political merits of such a party were discussed in a friendly conference, after which Mr. Wilcox moved that the League proceed to appoint delegates to attend the Liberal Congress at Rochester, N.Y. The following gentlemen were elected accordingly: D. G. Crandon, Russell Marston, W. H. Hamlen, D. E. Mayo, J. H. W. Toohy.

Adjourned to Nov. 13.

J. H. W. TOOHEY, Sec'y.

THE HONESTY OF ATHEISTS vs. THE HONESTY OF THE CLERGY.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Rev. J. H. Allen, a Baptist minister of Milledgeville, Ga., lately delivered a sermon in this place (Madison, Ga.) in which he expressed his doubts as to the possibility of an atheist being an honest man. In conversation with a brother clergyman of his, I find it is the uniform opinion of this class of men that, if a man is an atheist, he is without integrity. They contend that if a man is honest, he cannot be an atheist; and if he professes to be one, he is destitute of that probity which ennobles humanity.

Is there any psychological reason why the human mind cannot honestly embrace atheism? John Wesley taught, contrary to the common opinion of the clergy, that mankind by nature were atheist, until educated out of it. "After all that has been so plausibly written concerning 'the innate idea of God'; after all that has been said of its being common to all men, in all ages and nations, it does not appear that man has naturally any more idea of God than any of the beasts of the field; he has no knowledge of God at all. Whatever change may afterwards be wrought by his own reflection, or education, he is, by nature, a mere atheist."—John Wesley, Vol. II., sermon C.

Is it historically true that atheists as a class are proverbially dishonest, and less true to the obligations of society, than Christians?

An article from your pen on this subject will doubtless be interesting to many of your readers.

Respectfully,
A. A. B.

[We assure our good friend Dr. B. that an "article" of length on this subject is scarcely possible. The question is simply one of experience. We happen to know many atheists, and their honesty is the most evident fact about them. All we can do is to bear honest testimony to this fact, and advise everybody to turn a deaf ear to the a priori dogmatism which denies the fact in the broad blaze of truth.—ED.]

MISTRESS.—"Yes, it is above the average. By-the-way [to first boy], what is the meaning of average?"

First Boy—"Please, 'm, don't know."

Second Boy—"A thing hens lay on."

Mistress—"Nonsense! What do you mean?"

Second Boy—"Why, father says our hens lay four eggs a day—on an average."

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well-informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later—"I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity, as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keesh Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. 40 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"); with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wilson and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Dqs, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. 40 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains Essays by Rev. Wm. E. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, Wm. Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

For series of Important Tracts see last page of THE INDEX.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited. Orders by mail may be addressed either "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston," or to the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interest. Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of these several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. CHRISTIANITY AND INFIDELITY!

A DISCUSSION BETWEEN

Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian, New York, and

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of the Truth Seeker.

SUBJECTS DISCUSSED:

Part I. The Relative Services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Independence.

Part II. The Relative Services of Christianity to Learning and Science.

Part III. Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

A thick 12mo volume of over 500 pages, well bound, sent post-paid by mail for One Dollar. Address D. M. BENNETT, Publisher, 141 Eighth Street, New York.

NEW ENGLAND*MUTUAL AID SOCIETY,
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

(Incorporated under the laws of Mass.)

THIS SOCIETY presents the simplest and cheapest method for making provision for the families of members in the event of disease, that has ever been offered to the public.

The membership may include nearly all persons of both sexes, who are not intemperate or of feeble condition, but will be divided into three classes, viz.:

Class No. 1.—For sound, temperate persons.

Class No. 2.—For equally healthy total abstainers.

Class No. 3.—For those who are not free from disease, but are able to attend daily to their usual avocations.

This arrangement is equitable for all, and the expense the same to enter either class. Applications are now received daily. Send for circular.

Persons who desire to become members, will please send their full address to the Secretary, or apply to nearest Agent.

Agents—both Ladies and Gentlemen are wanted as Canvassers in every Town and Village.

A Monthly Review of Literature.

$1.50 PER YEAR.

The low price of the LITERARY WORLD puts it within the reach of all.

The LITERARY WORLD is now in its eighth year, and has won a high position among the literary authorities of America. It is the only monthly periodical in the country devoted exclusively to books, is comprehensive in its views of current literature, and absolutely independent in its judgments. Its usefulness to all who are interested in literature is conclusively shown by the following testimonials from the most eminent literary judges.

We do not know of any publication that gives so much valuable information and honest criticism of books in so compact and cheap form as this. . . . It deserves a wide circulation, and all interested in books and literature will find its perusal of great advantage.—Manchester (N. H.) Daily Mirror.It is now a journal which neither the rest of the literary world, nor hardly any one else who is anybody of any consequence, can very well do without. Its purpose, plan, and preparation alike entitle it to a hearty and substantial welcome.—The South.E. H. HAMES & CO., Publishers,

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
231 Washington Street, Boston.ORGANIZE!*CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
