The Association is explicitly devoted to "religion," both by its name and by its avowal of objects. But what it means by "religion," which it does not define in express terms, must be gathered from the Constitution as a whole. The three objects it enumerates are its own definition, however, of "Free Religion,"—the only definition which any one, friend or foe, has a moral right to apply to that now famous phrase. These three objects are, 1: The "practical interests of pure religion" (i. e., Righteousness); 2: "Fellowship in the spirit" (i. e., Love); 3: The "scientific study of man's religious nature and destiny" (i. e., religious Truth sought by the scientific method alone). Righteousness, Love, Truth,—these, in brief, are the objects of this Association; they are also the professed objects of every church and every religion on earth. What, then, gives to this Association its distinguishing and unmistakable characteristic—its specific reason for being? Simply that little word "scientific"—"the scientific study of man's religious nature and destiny,"—as explained and interpreted by Article II., which proclaims "absolute freedom of thought and expression" as the "natural right of every rational being." In this emphatic affirmation of the scientific method in religion, and of the unqualified freedom of thought which the scientific method alone gives or even permits, lies compressed the entire historical significance of Free Religion and the Free Religious Association. Suppress their bold affirmation of the scientific method as the sole legitimate method of religious thought, and there will remain nothing, absolutely nothing, to justify the movement which called them into existence. That is the one affirmative word which they have to utter to the world; and it is an unflinching, uncompromising denial of the method of authority, whether vested in the Pope, the Church, the Bible, the Christ, or the Transcendentalist. It is a sweeping protest against the oppressive claims of Christianity in all its forms,—a frank abandonment of the old method of authority and a complete advance to the new method of liberty, of reason, of science. Purely by the inherent force and meaning of its one great affirmation, Free Religion, as interpreted by the Constitution of the Association which gave it name, is anti-Christian because it is pro-liberty, pro-science, pro-truth. That fact is more or less dimly perceived by the churches to-day, and will be very clearly recognized when the future comes to write the religious history of the nineteenth century. But it is not perceived or admitted to be a fact by some of our own number; and I must support the interpretation I have put on our common Constitution by a few facts of vital importance to a correct understanding of the origin of this Association and the "development of religious thought in our country during the past century,"—nay, more, to a correct understanding of our own position, work, and function in this process of development.

THE PICTURE OF AN IDEAL.

In March, 1866, about seven months before the meeting of the Unitarian Conference at Syracuse, an article entitled "Positivism in Theology" was published in the now discontinued periodical called the Christian Examiner. This article was in substance a plea for the scientific method in religion, and its essential positions were as definite, as clearly made, and as unqualified as anything I have said to-day. To that article must be referred all those who are curious to trace the origin of that which is alone distinctive in the Free Religious movement—its adoption of the scientific method of perfect intellectual freedom as the recognized basis of religious organization, and its consequent rejection of all dogmatic finalities, names, and limits of fellowship. Not to the influence of Transcendentalism, but to the direct influence of modern science and philosophy on the older Unitarianism, must this origin be traced; for the new movement was only a maturing of the old Unitarian demand for "free inquiry" minus the old Unitarian confession of the authority of Jesus. Transcendentalism and Free Religion were two co-ordinate and independent, though successive, outgrowths from a common historical root—Unitarianism; and it would be an error to consider the second as an outgrowth from the first.

In order, then, to understand the ancestry and true place of Free Religion, in the history of the development of recent religious thought, it is necessary to bear in mind these three facts:—

1. The supremacy and sole legitimacy of the scientific method in religion were explicitly, unqualifiedly, and strenuously affirmed in an article in the Christian Examiner several months before the meeting of the Unitarian Conference at Syracuse in October, 1866.

2. The reform-preamble which was proposed at that Conference, declaring that "the object of Christianity is the universal diffusion of Love, Righteousness, and Truth," and that "perfect freedom of thought is at once the right and the duty of every human being," was simply an attempt to reconcile Christianity with modern science by placing it unequivocally on the scientific method; and this is made still more clear by the fact that the writer of the Christian Examiner article wrote and proposed this reform-preamble.

3. This attempt having failed because Christianity is logically and historically pledged to the method of authority, and therefore logically and historically pledged against the method of science—"whose service is perfect freedom," an attempt was made the next year to maintain the self-same principles in the name of Religion, and succeeded in the formation of the Free Religious Association. The very name of the Association is a sufficient proof of this statement; but its Constitution proves it even to superfluity. For the objects of Free Religion are there set forth as "the practical interests of pure religion"—a mere periphrasis for "Righteousness"; "Fellowship in the spirit"—a mere periphrasis for "Love"; and "the scientific study of man's religious nature and destiny"—a mere periphrasis for the pursuit of religious "Truth" by the scientific method. Thus the "universal diffusion of Love, Righteousness, and Truth" was declared in 1867 the essence of Free Religion, as it had failed to be declared in 1866 the essence of Christianity. Moreover (and this tells the innermost soul of the new movement), the Constitution planted the Association still more unequivocally on the scientific method, when it, like the rejected reform-preamble, explicitly proclaimed that "absolute freedom of thought and expression is the natural right of every rational being."

These three facts reveal the origin and justify the existence of our Association. No religious body, so far as I know, has ever before even tried to organize itself on the platform of "perfect freedom,"—of the scientific method. You have both tried and succeeded; and, if you are only true to the spirit of the principles you have adopted, you have a most glorious mission to accomplish. The creed of Christianity is a dream, a myth, a falsity; and the world has found it out. The creed of the future is science alone; but science is still in its infancy. To you belongs the first splendid affirmation that the method of science is the way to all truth, the secret of all brotherhood, the hope of all religion. You first have recorded it in the great book of human experience that the noblest religious fellowship can be built on absolute loyalty to truth and perfect freedom of the human mind. Stand firm on the height you have attained, and the whole world shall climb slowly to your side. Comprehend fully the greatness and loftiness of your own position, maintain it sacredly for the countless millions yet to inherit its immeasurable blessings, and, long ages after you and I have slept peacefully in our unremembered graves, the nobler and juster and purer life of posterity shall be the proof that we have not lived in vain. The acorn you have planted; its first tiny shoots you have watered and tended; let others rest their tired limbs in the shade of the mighty oak. What matters it if the vast torrent of the world's life bears down to the future on its bosom no memory of our petty lives? Enough be it,—enough it is,—that the grand, eternal beauty of the idea that has visited us has not been selfishly secluded from mankind in the privacy of our own "chambers of imagery," but has been painted for all eyes on the canvas of an outward, living fact. That is the meaning and mission of our Association—it is only the visible picture of a glorious ideal. Let it stand in all the power of its mute appeal before the world, until the soul of humanity shall have seized the great thought of PERFECT FREEDOM that stands invisibly behind it. Then shall come the universal Kingdom of Truth; and then let our poor little picture, with all recollection of its painters, be consigned to the garret of oblivion. It is enough for us that we have not been "disobedient to the heavenly vision."

THE POPULATION OF THE EARTH.

The annual compilation known as "Behm & Wagner's" estimates the population of the globe at 1,423,917,000, being an increase of about 27,000,000 over that reported by the same authorities in 1875. So far as Europe and America are concerned it is not difficult to make a proximate estimate of their populations. Most of the countries on the two continents take censuses at regular intervals. But the number of inhabitants in Asia and Africa can only be the subject of enlightened guesswork. What purports to be the official census of China has always been open to the most serious doubts. Good authorities have insisted that the population of that country is reported, for government purposes, at far above—even twice—its real strength. Behm & Wagner give it at 405,000,000, with 25,500,000 of outlying people. This estimate, if correct, would show a marked decrease from the census reported to have been taken as far back as 1852, which put the population of China at 450,000,000. The gain in population in Asia alone is set down at 25,000,000. The advance is not attributable to the increase of births over deaths during the year, but to the simple means of information which the compilers of the work claim to have. The statistics about Africa—excepting on its semi-civilized borders—are necessarily almost worthless. European powers afraid of Russia will be concerned to know that she counts as her own 88,598,000 human beings, both in Europe and Asia, which is an increase of 900,000 over the estimate of 1875. Some of this is explained by the annexation of territory in Asia during the year. The whole Turkish Empire, including tributary States in Europe, Asia, and Africa, is said to have a population of 47,660,000; but that of Turkey proper numbers only 8,500,000. There is a computed increase of 1,200,000 over the area of North and South America within the year. This can be only conjecture. To illustrate how little reliance can be placed on statistics which aim to make a clean sweep of the habitable area and population of this planet, it may be said that, according to the work under notice, the land surface of the globe seems to have decreased within a year by no less than 83,340 square miles. This fact is not explained by the encroachment of the sea upon the land, but simply by the rectification of surveys lately made. The density of population to the square mile for three continents is given as follows: Europe, 82; Asia, 48, and America, 54. The spare room is here, and it should be the policy of the United States in every way to encourage foreigners to come in and possess it.

A PRIEST was hearing confession, and a boy came to him and said he had a bad sin in his mind. "Well, me good boy, come on wid it," said his reverence. "Augh, thin, your reverence, I do be always sayin' 'Be the Holy Father.'" "You do?—that's very bad, me boy. Now, how often do you be sayin' that?" "Begor, more than forty times a day, your reverence." "Go home now," said the priest, "and get your suster to make you a bag and hang it round your neck, and every time you say 'Be the Holy Father' drop a little stone in it, and come to me this day week." That day week his reverence was as usual in his box, and he heard an awful noise in the church, so he looked out and saw his penitent dragging a sack. "Tady Mulloy," says he, "what do you mane by such conduct as that in the church?" "Shure, yer reverence," says the fellow, "those is all, 'Be the Holy Father,' an' the rest of um's outside on the dray."

Poetry.

TO THE VENUS OF MELOS.

O Goddess of that Grecian isle
Whose shores the blue Egean laves,
Whose cliffs repeat with answering smile
Their features in its sun-kissed waves,—
An exile from thy native place,
We view thee in a Northern clime,
Yet mark on thy majestic face
A glory still undimmed by Time.
Through those calm lips, proud Goddess, speak!
Portray to us thy gorgeous fane,
Where Mellan suitors thronged to seek Thine aid, Love's Paradise to gain;
Where, oft as in the saffron East
Day's jewelled gates were open flung,
With stately pomp th' attendant priest
Drew back the veil before thee hung;
And as the daring kiss of morn,
Empurpled, made thy charms more fair,
Sweet strains, from unseen minstrels born,
Awoke from dreams the perfumed air.
Vouchsafe at least our minds to free
From doubts pertaining to thy charms;
The meaning of thy bended knee,
The secret of thy vanished arms!
Wast thou in truth conjoined with Mars?
Did thy fair hands his shield embrace,
The surface of whose golden bars
Grew lovely from thy mirrored face?
Or was it some bright scroll of Fame
Thou poised on thine extended knee,
Upon which thou didst trace the name
Of that fierce god so dear to thee?
Whate'er thou hadst, no mere delight
Was thine, the glittering prize to hold;
Not thine the form which met thy sight
Replying from the burnished gold!
Unmindful what thy hands retained,
Thy gaze was fixed beyond, above;
Some dearer object held enchained
The goddess of immortal love!
We mark the motion of thine eyes
And smile,—for heldest thou shield or scroll,
A tender love-glance we surprise
Which tells the secret of thy soul!

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on Boston or New York. Checks on interior banks are liable to discount, and the terms of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or single numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

The Index.

BOSTON, MARCH 22, 1877.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 36 Monroe Street: J. T. FINEY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

CENTENNIAL CONGRESS OF LIBERALS.

EQUAL RIGHTS IN RELIGION: Report of the Centennial Congress of Liberals, and Organization of the National Liberal League, at Philadelphia, on the Fourth of July, 1876. With an Introduction and Appendix. Boston: Published by the National Liberal League. 1876. Pages 190. Price, in paper covers, $1.00; in cloth, $1.25.

The above Report contains a complete history of the Liberal League movement, a full report of the eight sessions of the Congress, lists of the contributors to the Congress fund and of the charter members of the National Liberal League, the Constitution and list of officers of the latter, extracts from letters by distinguished supporters of the movement, etc., etc. It also contains essays by F. E. ABBOT on "The Liberal League movement; its Principles, Objects, and Scope"; by Mrs. C. B. KILGORE on "Democracy"; by James Parton on "Cathedrals and Beer; or, The Immorality of Religious Capitals"; by B. F. UNDERWOOD on "The Practical Separation of Church and State"; by C. F. FAIGER on the question, "Is Christianity Part of the Common Law?" by D. Y. KILGORE on "Ecclesiasticism in American Politics and Institutions"; and by C. D. B. MILLS on "The Sufficiency of Morality as the Basis of Civil Society." Also, the "Address of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists to the Centennial Congress of Liberals," and the "Patriotic Address of the National Liberal League to the People of the United States." This book is the Centennial monument of American Liberalism, and must acquire new interest and importance every year as the record of the first organized demand by American freemen for the TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

All those who received the "Certificate of Membership of the Centennial Congress of Liberals," which was sent to the eight hundred persons who signed and returned the "application for membership," will receive this Report on forwarding ten cents to defray expenses. Others can receive it at the above-mentioned price by addressing the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

THE "RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT" PETITION.

At a public meeting held in Cambridge, Ohio, November 14, 1876, by the advocates of the Christian Amendment, Rev. J. P. LYTLE, President of the Ohio State branch of the "National Reform Association," used this argument in favor of recognizing Christianity in the United States Constitution: "Mr. Lytle in his address pointed out the fact that the religious [Christian] amendment of the Constitution, so far from being a measure contemptible for the feebleness and weakness of its advocates, has been in principle indorsed and adopted by the Senate of the United States. In the school Amendment, as passed in the Senate last summer by a vote of nearly two to one, the necessity for some such Constitutional provision as we seek was confessed, and an attempt made to supply it which, if successful, would have been a long step toward the end we seek."

What Mr. Lytle said is only too true. The passage of some Constitutional amendment involving the whole question of State Christianization or State Secularization is certain in the not distant future. All friends of such an amendment as shall guarantee and protect Equal Rights in Religion by securing the Total Separation of Church and State are earnestly urged to circulate the petition of the National Liberal League to that effect. Printed petitions, all ready for circulation, will be sent to any one on receipt of a stamp for return postage. Address the National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

W. S. BELL and Horace Seaver will speak next Sunday evening at Paine Memorial Building on this question: "Liberalism or Moodyism—which?"

THIS HISTORICAL incident is solemnly commended to the attention of all subscribers in arrears, in the hope that they may be warned in season of the fate awaiting them: "An editor once applied at the door of Hades for admission. 'Well, sir,' replied his sable majesty, 'we let one of your profession in here many years ago, and he kept up a continual row with his former delinquent subscribers, and, as we have more of that class of persons here than any other, we have passed a law prohibiting the admission of editors.'"

PROFESSOR HUNT ON THE CHEMICAL HISTORY OF THE EARTH.

INASMUCH as we have taken so much space in this issue of THE INDEX for our recent lecture at Horticultural Hall, it seems no more than fair to make room here for the appended report of Professor Hunt's very instructive and interesting address to the Chestnut Street Club—for which THE INDEX is indebted to the kindness of Mrs. Sargent. There is especial significance, in connection with our own plea for "The Scientific Method in Religion," in this statement by so eminent a student of science as Professor Hunt: "Of late the notion of a general unity, and an interdependence of the various parts of the universe, has been asserted and reasserted, and has finally taken the shape of a law of adaptation of means to ends, and a recognition of efficient and final causes. The entire plan of the universe was designed by one great efficient cause, and is subordinate to one great purpose." This position is essentially that of the scientific theism which we have so often advocated; and it is one which the most rigorous use of the scientific method will, we believe, strengthen and confirm as time goes on. But here is the report of the meeting:—

The February meeting was held on the third Monday of the month, in the parlors of Rev. J. T. Sargent, as usual; and the knowledge that Professor T. Sterry Hunt, the eminent geologist and chemist, would read a paper filled the parlors with an intelligent and appreciative audience.

The essayist in his usual happy manner, after remarking that he should depart somewhat from the traditional topics of the club, philosophy, metaphysics, etc., gave in an easy conversational manner, without notes, a sketch of the chemical history of the earth, dwelling more particularly upon the harmonies and balancing of the forces in cosmical chemistry with the indications of a general unity of Nature even to its remotest portions.

The old philosophers and alchemists were greatly interested in these subjects, and entertained many curious ideas which modern science has banished. Of late the notion of a general unity and an interdependence of the various parts of the universe has been asserted and reasserted, and has finally taken the shape of a law of adaptation of means to ends, and a recognition of efficient and final causes. The entire plan of the universe was designed by one great efficient cause, and is subordinate to one great purpose.

It had long been recognized that the vegetable depended upon the mineral kingdom, while the animal kingdom in its turn was dependent upon the vegetable; and certain philosophers and theologians had come to the conclusion that all had been created expressly for man's use, while others, like Linnaeus, interpreted the facts in an entirely different way, finding that vegetables existed entirely for themselves; that animals, by holding destructive vegetation in check, seemed rather created for the benefit of the vegetables than the reverse; and that man, being a hunter and slayer of animals, maintained a balance between them and the vegetable kingdom.

Writers like Pope had seen the weakness of either of these teleological modes of reasoning, which he illustrates in the couplet:—

"While man exclaims, 'See all things for my use'
'See man for mine!' replies a pampered goose."

Disclaiming any intention to discuss the philosophical aspects of the questions presented in these prefatory remarks, Dr. Hunt said he wanted to present a few thoughts in regard to the chemical, physical, and vital forces which presided over the whole earth, or, he would rather say, the universe. It would at first glance seem that there was no field for the investigation of such subjects outside of our earth, and that there must come a time when, having exhausted this field, we must, like Alexander, weep for other worlds to conquer. But modern science has given us these new worlds to conquer, and we are able by means of the telescope and spectroscopy to learn something of their physics and chemistry, and to see that the same great laws prevail there as here.

In the far-off regions of space we discern great masses of nebulous matter from which, in their turns, suns and planets are slowly formed; while from the latter, satellites are developed, as was our moon from the original great earth-mass. Curious revelations are afforded by the light which comes from these bodies, showing that the same laws obtain there as here. Those far-distant nebulae contain the same elements that form our own atmosphere, and these elements are found without exception in all the stars and other worlds which are visible to us. We are thus led to admit the continuity of our atmosphere to the farthest bounds of space, so that, if there are animals upon distant worlds, they have atmospheres similar to our own.

Farther, when we trace the evolution of suns, we find in them the same chemical elements as in our own earth. Later researches have led some to conclude that the so-called chemical elements are themselves the product of growth or evolution; that is, they are not really elementary, but compound. In that cosmical chemistry by which glowing suns are slowly generated and planets afterwards elaborated, combinations are effected by mycetic processes which cannot be imitated in our laboratories. Suns in their earlier conditions are intensely white in color, and their spectra indicate a more dissociated condition of the components of what are considered by us to be chemical elements. As they become more and more red in color, the spectra indicate fewer differences from the spectra of elements found upon the earth.

Let us see what nebulae are. First, we have the ether of space extending to its utmost limits. Sir William Thomson supposes the nebulae to be developed from the ether by some process of cosmical chemistry. In this way the formation of a nebula might be as simple as that of rain-drops,—a process of condensation. We look up into the clear blue sky, and see, first a haze, then a cloud, and at last the minute particles of water gather in drops and fall as rain. Just such a thing is a nebula—a cloud produced by some cause in the far-off ether. Farther condensation succeeds, until at last we have a sun with its planets and satellites.

You will, perhaps, say that we are getting far away from our subject in considering these distant bodies. But the fact is, we cannot understand our own present condition without some consideration of the stages through which we have passed. The planet Mars has attained a condition very similar to our own. Her polar regions, like ours, are enveloped with snow in winter, and doubtless other physical and chemical phenomena are the same there as here. Aërolites (or uranolites, as they are sometimes called) appear to be messengers from other worlds. They are all made up of the same chemical elements, and are subject to the same physical and chemical laws which we have upon the earth. They also frequently contain evidences of life, indirect, but not less certain.

What was our earth in its early history? At one time it was a huge mass of intensely heated rock. The atmosphere then contained not only all the waters of the ocean but much of the present solid mass of the earth which had not then been condensed. The remaining rock-mass was composed of granite, but the temperature was so great that much of the material of the present earth was maintained in the form of vapor. There was no ocean and no atmosphere such as we now have. Then it was that chemical and physical laws began to differentiate the materials now found upon our planet, many of which man now thinks were stored away for his own use and behoof.

The condensations of this hot vapor formed the first rains, which came down charged with corrosive acids. These, forming channels of descent, united into an ocean which, with the remaining dry land, was totally unfit for life. But after a time gentler forces began to work, resulting in a partially purified atmosphere, and on conditions a little nearer those which are now found. In those past conditions carbonic acid was far more abundant than now, and was capable of rapidly corroding hard rocks like granite.

Then it was that there began one of the most striking examples that we know of chemical harmony. This atmospheric decay of the granite rock gave rise to clays and alkalies. It is a property of these alkalies to absorb carbonic acid. In the laboratory, if we wish to remove carbonic acid, we introduce some caustic potash or soda, and the thing is speedily accomplished. We find soda abundantly in rocks in the form of carbonate of soda. In fact, the process of absorption of carbonic acid from the atmosphere is still going on in many parts of the earth. But in those earlier times the forces were far more active. The carbonate of soda thus formed came down into the sea. Here it became again changed into salt in the sea, and into carbonate of lime in sea-shells and corals. The old granite rocks, so decayed, became beds of slate, and thus gave us a soil for vegetation. The first forms of animal life appeared in the sea as mollusks, etc. No animal life could yet exist upon the land. These processes did not take place in years or centuries, but in the long process of ages and it took ages after the first appearance of life in the sea before the land was prepared for vegetation. The records of many dynasties of animal life are written upon the stony pages of the rocky strata. Here we see that higher and higher forms of life came into existence as the purification went on, rendering the earth more fit for vegetable life, until at last lower forms of animal life appeared on land. Great monsters, "dragons tearing each other in the slime,"—then, in more favorable conditions, higher and higher forms of animals and planets, till finally man appears upon the scene.

These operations have important relations with the climate. When great heat and moisture prevail, gigantic ferns and other lower plants appear; the higher forms come when the climate has become cooler. Whence came this cooler climate? Some geologists believe that there were many glacial periods; but this seems quite problematical. It seems more probable that refrigeration took place at a very late period of geological history. The cause of the cooling was not simply the cooling of the earth's materials going on through the long ages.

There is a curious relation between the composition of the atmosphere and the temperature of the earth. Carbonic acid, which, as we have seen, gradually became removed from the atmosphere by combination with the granite, has the singular property of arresting the loss of heat from the earth's surface. As in a greenhouse the sun's rays come in through the glass, and then are detained by the glass from passing out, so an atmosphere charged with carbonic acid entraps the sun's heat; and if a greenhouse could be built with double sashes and carbonic acid imprisoned between, the heat would be retained much more effectively than now. In the earlier times a warm and moist climate was thus kept up till the air lost much of its carbonic acid. The prevalence of this warm, steaming atmosphere will probably account for the remains of tropical plants and animals found in the polar regions, Greenland, Spitzbergen, and Nova Zembla, where in early geological periods existed a most luxuriant vegetation, and such animals as lions, tigers, hyenas, etc. But the gradual extraction of the carbonic acid gave rise to a cooling down of the temperature, until much of the polar area is covered permanently with ice and snow, in spite of the warm currents which prevent a still greater refrigeration.

Thus we have traced the chemical agencies till we find the atmosphere in its purified condition of to-day. It would seem that the balance is now very nearly established. A small proportion of carbonic acid still remains in the atmosphere to protect us from the bitter cold of the interstellar spaces. Vegetable life could not exist without carbonic acid in the atmosphere, so that its extinction would be the death of every plant and animal.

While a salutary balance seems to be preserved by the absorption of carbonic acid into plants and its restoration to the atmosphere by animals, man is at the same time adding large amounts to the carbonic acid of the air by burning the coal stored in the earth in past ages. Human agency seems to be exhausting the store of carbonic acid which has been absorbed by the rocks and carried to the sea and locked up in the lime stones at its bottom.

It is very difficult to say what is to be the fate of our earth. Man is slowly but surely burning the coal and ores of iron, and year by year they are disappearing, so that, unless new processes of restoration can be invented, the limit of human development must soon be reached, and we cannot escape the conclusion that the present order of things in a temporary one, to be succeeded by another entirely different.

But here it seems difficult to consider man as a final cause or object of creation. The great saurians of earlier periods, and the monkeys, later, could they have reasoned, might have said the same with regard to themselves, not knowing what was coming after. Only he who sees the end from the beginning can know the real objects of creation.

When we reflect upon this subject, we see the impotence of one who would attempt to sound the vast abysses of the infinite with his short plummet, and are admonished to avoid so hopeless a task.

In the discussion which followed, Rev. John Weiss asked if the cycle of ten thousand five hundred years, or thereabouts, of variation in the eccentricity of the earth's orbit, and those due to the precession of the equinoxes, etc., might not account for some of the changes of temperature. Dr. Hunt thought the effect due to this cause, while it was a vera causa, be strictly inadequate to account for the great changes in temperature.

Rev. Samuel Longfellow asked if there was any doubt of the existence of a great glacial period such as Agassiz had supposed, and Dr. Hunt replied that there were serious doubts in the minds of eminent geologists, for example, Phillips and Dr. Dawson, as to so great an extent of the glaciation as Agassiz had supposed,—whether it was indeed any greater than might be expected even at the present time, if the polar ocean avenues were closed so that warm equatorial currents were shut off. In that case, the ice would creep down far below our latitude. Geographical changes and changes of ocean currents would produce important changes of temperature.

Dr. Bartol and Mr. Wesson inquired as to the existence of any criterion in regard to the elementary nature of things, and if there was any established order in regard to it; to which the reply was that all which science tells us is that only nitrogen, hydrogen, and oxygen are found in the undifferentiated nebula, while in more developed suns the number of chemical elements increases. Where the temperature is very great, more are found than we know here. In the chromosphere of the sun is a green line not representing any known element, and it is supposed to be caused by a substance called the X, or unknown element, also called "helium."

Mr. Walling suggested that the principle demonstrated by Sir William Thomson of the dissipation of energy led to the same conclusion of a final catastrophe that had been intimated by the essayist; also that the dynamic phenomena accompanying chemical reactions afforded the criterion asked for by some of the questioners as to the elementary or compound nature of substances,—force being always evolved in combinations and being required to effect separation.

In reply to a question by Rev. Mr. Dole as to the evidences of organic life in meteorites, Dr. Hunt gave an interesting account of the amber-like and unmistakably organic substances found in some of these bodies.

"OPPOSING" WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

I am very glad that THE INDEX has spoken frankly, and so made clear the source of the lukewarmness towards the woman suffrage movement which has always pained those who are alike friends of both. But its position seems to me as untenable as inconsistent.

To make the question of the extension of suffrage dependent upon the way in which the enfranchised people will vote seems to me false to the whole idea of suffrage, which implies a power of choice. If you are an intelligent, moral being fit to be trusted with self-government, you have a right to a voice in the choice of rulers, and in the decision of methods and laws as much as I; and to withhold your right because I think you would vote for unwise measures is tyranny. We did not ask the foreigner how he would vote before we naturalized him, nor the negro before we conferred suffrage upon him. We knew that he would often vote ignorantly and unwisely. Probably, on the very points which THE INDEX considers more important than the question of woman suffrage, both the negro and the Irishman would take, as a rule, what it considers the wrong side far more generally than women would. The same is true in regard to many other questions. But we have no more right to postpone their enfranchisement until they have enlightened opinions on all questions or any questions of politics, than to delay emancipation till the slave was rich and educated.

The opposition to woman suffrage seems to me as impolitic in this respect as it is unjust. Why is woman so much attached to the Church? Largely because she has been more fully recognized in it than in any other of the great departments of society. She does not understand the questions of the rights of the State as against the Church, because the State shuts her out from all participation in its affairs. The strongest influence to make her advocate the true relations of Church and State is to give her an equal interest—an equal right in and an equal duty towards both. Whether she votes or not, she is not wholly without influence on these questions, as the Church very well knows.

I consider the cause of Free Religion and of woman suffrage to be one, because both advocate the right of the individual human being to full equality and to freedom of judgment; and I believe that each movement will help on the other. Every person has a right to lift that end of the beam which seems to him to be most important; but no one has a right to sacrifice one true cause to another. I should work for religious freedom, though I knew that it would postpone the success of woman suffrage till the grave hid its triumph from me; I should labor for woman suffrage, though I foresaw that its first result would be to keep the Bible in the schools and strengthen the hold of sectarianism.

In conclusion I must say that I do not agree with THE INDEX that women are so largely opposed to liberal movements. The most entirely liberal person in regard to the secularization of schools I ever knew was a woman, a zealous, conscientious member of an Orthodox Church, with whom I had the great pleasure of serving on a school committee. I shall beg if the feeling of the Church party in England helps forward woman suffrage there; and while I do not believe with them that it will put back the cause of religious progress for a great while, I do believe that it will make its results broader and truer. I shall be sorry if any triumph of woman hinders the success of liberal religion here; but I do not believe it will be for any long time. If the principles we hold dear are true, they need only to be studied and tested, and women will be far more likely to accept them when a broader sphere of life and duty liberalizes her whole thought.

E. D. C.

[If we had been really either "lukewarm" or "opposed" to the woman suffrage movement, we should instantly acknowledge the justice of our friend's rebuke. As the fact is exactly the contrary, we can only receive it in silent wonder.—ED.]

THE MOODY AND SANKEY REVIVAL.

The following letter will be read with interest, as the testimony of a Radical eye-witness:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I accompanied some friends last evening to the meetings of the famous Revivalists, Moody and Sankey. I heard the noon lecture of the now not less renowned Joseph Cook, to an audience that crowded Tremont Temple in every part, many standing to the end, myself one of them. The lecture was a critique on some views of Theodore Parker, specially as to the Trinity, which doctrines the lecturer seemed to comprehend much as the Court Committee of the Lilliputs did the contents of Gulliver's pockets. Still he was several times loudly cheered, proving that he had an appreciative as well as approving audience.

But it was the Inquiry Meeting of the Revivalists which was most interesting, instructing, and humiliating. I never before felt how human nature can be degraded, debased, by darkness and superstition in the name of religion and for the sake of what was there called salvation. I have seen much revival of religion before, but never on that fashion. Some of the scenes outraged all decency, as well as reason and common-sense. A poor pale-faced little boy was weeping between two rather pretty girls (none of them more than sixteen) who were laboring for his conversion. They read to him in low tone, argued, exhorted, expostulated; and twice they all knelt in an inaudible prayer.

On the other side was a little girl, plainly dressed, of about the same age, who had fallen into the hands of a not very prepossessing middle-aged saint who was seeking her salvation by precisely the same means, only in louder voice. They knelt three or four times to pray; the man absolutely feeding her with prayer, putting the words in her mouth, as mothers sometimes chew the food for their toothless babes. We were in the gallery of the church, and these two groups were quite near on either side of us. The church above and below was scattered with such persons, of all ages down to very little girls, and the meeting continued till eleven o'clock, when not only the children, but all of us should have been in bed. Of our interview with Mr. Moody and his aids more might be said than would suit your space. A bright little woman asked one of my friends at the outset: "Are you a Christian?" to which he answered: "I would rather refer that question to those who best know me." A long but pleasant talk ensued, in which my friend was evidently getting the best of the argument. Finally, the husband of the woman appeared, and, comprehending the situation, sent her away and entered the lists himself. But he soon lost ground by losing his sweetness and serenity. At last, he said: "Come with me and be introduced to Mr. Moody." So we all three went; but Mr. Moody, though admirable in temper and manner, declined "to reason"; and, after pelting us with a few Scripture texts and saying that Boston was the greatest place for arguments he had ever found, called up a clean, smooth-shaved, silver-haired man named (as I understood) Durant, and then business began in earnest, to continue till eleven o'clock. My other friend was a lady, sister of him who was first assailed, and Mr. Moody summoned a Mrs. Gordon to undertake in behalf of her soul.

Mr. Durant was amiable in manner, but assumed with fearful assurance that we were all three sinners, having no rights which he and other saints were bound to respect,—the ground of the Church and clergy from time immemorial.

My course was to put him on the defensive. I told him there was nothing about that meeting nor him which could make my two friends better; that I had known them thirty years and their parents before them; that they showed far better temper and spirit than did he; that their lives were all beautiful and true; that I would far rather take my chance with them in the last judgment than with him; and, turning to Mr. Moody, I quoted Burns, pointing to Mr. W., my friend:—

"With such as he, where'er it be,
May I be saved or damned."

And there was a great deal more of the same; but I spare your columns.

Moody, as a man, I liked. He seems earnest, sincere, and is always amiable. But without Sankey's songs, and a surrounding of seedy, threadbare, but crafty, cunning clergymen to manage the whole machinery, he would be as powerless as they have long ago proved themselves to be, without him or some other equally absurd and preposterous appliances.

Boston will yet be ashamed of the whole of them, or of herself on account of them; until it will hardly be creditable to any one to have been born within her borders.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

EDITOR INDEX:—

In your friendly comments on my article, headed "Woman Suffrage and Free Religion," published in THE INDEX of March 1, you say that I strangely "misread" the article that I criticised. That part of your editorial to which my remarks had reference is in these words:—

[We take the liberty of prefixing to Mr. Hunt's quotation the words which immediately preceded it:

"In presenting the foregoing propositions for serious consideration, we wish to be understood. We do not, as some have done under the stress of these thoughts, take new ground and oppose woman suffrage; on the contrary, we believe in it and advocate it as heartily as ever. But we prefer to work for it so that, when it comes, it may come to stay and do good, not mischief, to humanity."]

"Just as soon as this Republic can be induced to plant itself on the principle of State Secularization, it will be safe to establish woman suffrage on that principle; but to establish woman suffrage in the present half-secularized condition of the Republic would be to imperil, nay, to destroy, the very principles which all men and all women alike ought to hold most precious. It is through State Secularization, therefore, that we hope yet to see woman suffrage established; without that guarantee of general security for free thought, we can take no part in the establishment of woman suffrage."

It is this limitation of suffrage to those who think as we do on the question of State Secularization, that I was criticizing. And now you uphold this limitation more emphatically in your reply to my criticism. These are your words: "If it is true that women would use the suffrage to Christianize the State and destroy its secularism, they have no right to the suffrage whatever." You may be correct in your views, but I am not, with my present light, prepared to admit it. I find the woman suffrage movement is proving to be a great test-question, going down to the bed-rock on which universal suffrage, or republican government, rests. While circulating petitions to give women the ballot I have found some of the opponents driven to take the ground that suffrage ought to be restricted, thus virtually denying the old doctrine that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. Now the point has got to be settled, what restrictions, if any, should be put on the ballot? Your doctrine quoted above, if carried out, would not only deny the suffrage, as now, to a large number of women, but would also close the ballot-box against a great many men who are already voters.

Instead of restricting, my impressions are now in favor of enlarging the range of the elective franchise. I believe the wisest course for the friends of civil and religious liberty is to go for putting the ballot into the hands of every member of the community; and, particularly, those of the poor and friendless, the despised and outcast. Certainly no distinction should be made on account of sex or color. Is it not wise and just that every adult of sound mind should have a vote, whether he be pharisee or publican, saint or sinner, believer or infidel? For if we disfranchise sinners, who will cast the first vote?

But the first great reform which our government must at once bring about is to enable every voter to go to the polls in safety, with none to molest or make afraid. Otherwise, our Republic is a bloody conspiracy,—a gigantic fraud and sham.

SETH HUNT.

[Mr. Hunt would refuse, if we may judge by his last paragraph, to give the suffrage to men who meant to use the power thus acquired in driving away others from the polls. That would be simply the destruction of all republican liberty; and, to save this, Mr. Hunt would, if we understand him, restrict the suffrage himself. Of course, no government can live which puts traitors in supreme command. Very well—State Christianization is nothing but revolution and treason to republicanism. Women have the right to vote under this government, if they will accept this government. But no one has a right to vote under it to work its overthrow. If Mr. Hunt approves the disfranchisement of criminals, must he not approve this position?—Ed.]

THE CONVENTION OF THE DONORS OF THE PAINE MEMORIAL BUILDING FUND.

In accordance with the call for this Convention issued by a Committee appointed at a previous meeting of the donors, a number of the donors assembled in Paine Memorial Building, Saturday, March 3. Judge Thomas Robinson was called to the chair, and Mr. W. S. Bell appointed Secretary.

The result of this meeting was the organization of an association, the Constitution of which explains sufficiently its object:—

"Resolved, That we, the donors assembled in a legally called meeting, do hereby organize ourselves under the name of the PAINE MEMORIAL BUILDING ASSOCIATION.

"Resolved, That we adopt the following Constitution:—

ARTICLES OF ASSOCIATION.

"ART. I. The name of this organization shall be the Paine Memorial Building Association, and all donors to the Paine Memorial Building Fund shall be considered members of the same.

"ART. II. The objects of this Association shall be to effect a permanent legal organization of the donors of the Paine Memorial Building Fund, and to elect a permanent Board of Trustees, in order to preserve and perpetuate the Paine Memorial Building for the purposes for which the original donations were made.

"ART. III. This Board shall consist of seven members, including four of the five original Trustees; namely, Messrs. J. P. Mendum, Horace Seaver, T. L. Savage, D. R. Burt, B. F. Underwood (to fill vacancy of Morris Altman, deceased), together with Osmore Jenkins, and Thomas Robinson. This Board of Trustees shall constitute the officers of the Association and shall have power to transact all business connected therewith. They shall also have power to fill all vacancies that may occur in their own number. They are hereby instructed to take the necessary steps for incorporating the Association, under the General Statutes of Massachusetts. They are furthermore instructed to raise, if possible, by public appeal or by other appropriate means, such funds as they may find necessary to render it safe for them to release the three joint tenants who now hold the fee simple of the Paine Memorial Building from all personal liabilities on its account, and to assume the same as Trustees. They are hereby empowered to hold real or personal property in trust for this Association.

"Voted, That J. P. Mendum, Horace Seaver, T. L. Savage, D. R. Burt, B. F. Underwood, Osmore Jenkins, and Thomas Robinson are hereby elected and declared the Board of Trustees of this Association.

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that Mr. Mendum should confer with Mr. Savage for the immediate transfer of the property from the Joint Tenants to the Trustees named above; and if he fails in this negotiation, that he then should adopt such legal measures as may ultimately result in placing the Building in the hands of the Trustees, provided the latter can succeed in raising the necessary funds."

Among those present who participated in the discussions were Messrs. Horace Seaver, J. P. Mendum, Thomas Robinson, Francis E. Abbot, W. S. Bell, A. B. Brown, Osmore Jenkins, J. S. Verity, S. R. Urbino, and H. Marston.

CHICAGO LETTER.

CHICAGO, March 8, 1877.

Last Sunday Prof. Wm. D. Gunning finished a course of six Sunday afternoon lectures on "Man and Science." The last three were given to a consideration of what science will do for man, physically, socially, and religiously. We all know what science has done for man physically. It has helped him to better ways of living; constructed from the rude hut of the savage the present system of modern inconvenience which we call the household; and turned the gods of rain-cloud and lightning-flash into the playthings of his will, as the idols of ancient worship have become ornaments for the mantel. But science has by no means completed her work of physical regeneration. If she had, Chicago would not have been so shameless a retreat before the advancing hosts of disease as she did this past winter. Scarlet-fever, that out-Herods Herod, in the destruction of innocents, has been spending the winter with us, and a thousand homes have felt the desolation of the presence of Death. A council of physicians met, and discussed learnedly about bacteria, vibrios, and sulpho-carbols of soda; but the children went on dying just the same.

The revelations which science is making with regard to disease will, it is to be hoped, have this wholesome effect: to raise in us a feeling of unequivocal disgust towards sickness of all kinds. If, as Tyndall says in his article on "Fermentation," "reproductive parasitic life is at the root of epidemic diseases," let us hope that all the little aches and ills of life may be proved to be no more romantic in their character and origin. As fast as we come to know that disease is something more than slow pining away, and learn that it is nothing more poetical than the surrender of the body to a horde of minute microscopic monsters, who prey and feed upon it with the most vulture-like avidity, we shall not yield so readily to the thralldom of the sick-room. Let the scientists go on showing the repulsiveness of disease, until we come to be ashamed of poor health as of moral delinquency. We hold men responsible for a waste of mental energy, but not for a too lavish expenditure of physical powers. The doctrine of moral accountability few think of disputing; but who was ever wise enough to plan a system of rewards and punishments for the observance of the laws of health?

We look upon the man who has overtaken his strength at desk or in counting-room as something of a hero, and half-envy him the prestige he has gained through "overwork." We can all count one or more acquaintances among the graceful sisterhood of "confirmed invalids." Professional invalidism is, with a certain class of women, the pleasing occupation to which they devote themselves with an assiduity worthy a better cause. Congratulate a blooming matron, with stout frame and ruddy countenance, on her excellent health, and she immediately collapses into a series of sighs, and informs you, reproachfully, that she is by no means as well as she looks. Delicacy of constitution has come to be an accomplishment necessary to one's standing in good society. But we'll be quickly cured of these airs and follies when science has done her perfect work. The scientist may not be able to find the cause of Belinda's headache and general debility in an overplus of bacteria in the brain tissue; but he may inspire us with such a thorough aversion to all the grosser forms of disease, that we shall never think of cultivating its milder forms, under the mistaken notion that we are thereby adding to our attractiveness.

According to Prof. Gunning, science will do for man religiously about what it has done and is doing for him physically and socially. As it has made life better worth the living, so it will make religion more religious. It is science which has stripped anthropomorphic delusions from the notion of deity, and is so rapidly reducing the sensationalisms of religion to the dust of superstition whence they sprang. We talk about science destroying religion, when it is science which keeps religion alive. This it does in two-fold fashion, by continually goading it on to renewed struggles for existence, and by lifting it from age to age, to a higher level of thought. "Science is a mighty slayer of gods," said Prof. Gunning. True; but science is revelator as well as destroyer. With one hand she overthrows the hydra-headed monster of polytheism, and with the other traces the God-idea in the universe.

Rev. E. P. Powell of the Third Unitarian Church lately took as the subject of his sermon, "Who is the genuine Unitarian?" The position of the Third Church is distinctive among the Unitarian denominations of the city,—Mr. Powell being the recognized radical among the liberal clergy. His pulpit is an absolutely free one, he entering it only on the condition that he might say therein what seemed to him fit. Mr. Powell's definitions are as broad as his theology, and I doubt if a few Unitarians would not be lost in the roomy enclosure they afford.

Unitarianism, says Mr. Powell, is simply belief in the unity of God. So far, so good. The unity of God is a general proposition to which we can all give assent. It is in the implied truths arising out of this fundamental that all differences of opinion are found. "In Him we live and move and have our being; not in Abraham, nor Moses, nor Isaiah,—nor Jesus." Would all Unitarians have added that last clause, and have passed to give it emphasis?

Christ is rejected by the liberals in as various ways as there are differences of belief among them. With some he is not divinely-inspired but only divinely-illuminated. Many who do not believe in his miraculous birth believe in his divine attributes; others think him the Master, by force of the wonderful example of his life; still others look upon him as a disproportioned character, where a mild infusion of the fanatic is blended with the saint and teacher. Another of the implied doctrines of Unitarianism is the "utter rejection of the whole paraphernalia of heaven and hell." Mr. Powell has no great opinion of the judgment-day, and calls it the "great gossip-day." Again, Unitarians cannot consistently lend their aid to Orthodox measures and movements. Belief in the unity of God, rejecting as it must the doctrine of Christ's divinity can only be practically maintained by refusing to cooperate with those who make this doctrine the prime factor in their system. As Mr. Powell said, the history of Unitarianism shows no Westminster Catechism, no Augsburg Confession, and every conviction must adjust itself to the fundamental belief in the unchangeability of God and his laws.

At first it would seem as if Mr. Powell had but entered on the thankless task of imposing a new and more liberal interpretation on an old and somewhat restricted word. The majority of people receive and use words according to their common acceptance; and while the Unitarianism which Mr. Powell represents may be the only consistent exposition of the doctrine, the fact still remains that between the average Unitarian and the "radical" of our day there stretches a narrow but impassable gulf. The vast penumbra of partial belief which separates the darkest superstitions from true spiritual enlightenment is made up of those varying but scarcely discernible shades of opinion which are found in the liberalism of to-day. There is the liberal Christian, the conservative and radical Unitarian, and the radical proper,—a qualifying term no longer, but an independent substantive whose excuse for being does not lie in its relation to something else. The nearer men approach each other in matters of belief, the more tenacious are they of the differences which still keep them apart. And why not? It's not so easy giving up opinions as some people seem to think. Especially when they stand for certain definite duties in life, and represent honor and courage and freedom, may we be pardoned for clinging to them as to our good angel.

CELIA P. WOOLLEY.

A CODE OF ETHICS.

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Some weeks ago one of your thoughtful readers asked, in your columns, if we did not need a code of ethics and morals. Doubtless he saw the absolute authority of the Bible passing away, and felt that some substitute was needed; but can such code be written, and could the effort meet the wants of our time, or of any time? I think we can go back to Jesus for a fit answer. Standing in the green fields, amidst a multitude of "the common people who heard him gladly," he asked them a simple yet vital question: "Why judge ye not, even of yourselves, what is right?" He went back to no command of the Levitical law, to no word of prophet or apostle, asked no final allegiance to his own teachings, but pointed to the within, to the spiritual faculties and mental powers of man; recognizing that use of intuition, conscience, and reason, that exercise of judgment, that test and comparison by experience, which make up the best process of free religious thought to-day.

Christianity, so-called, does not follow its Master, for he lifted the truths of the soul above all outward authority, and made no vain effort to limit them by any code or creed. Ethical principles reach all time and space. Ideas are universal and transcendent. Justice, purity, fraternity, immortality, and their like, are of the infinite soul, and are in and of the soul of man as well, microcosmic in spirit and body as he is. No words can more than tell a small part of their beauty and power; no statement can more than cover a little segment of their infinite sweep; and their application to the duties and needs of life varies with every hour, and with each new occasion. Fidelity to these interior truths is the aim of the religious man; spiritual culture and the use of reason his means for growth in grace.

No vague and shadowy ideals or theories, without confirmation in outward life, are these truths of the soul; but all history is the record of their grand results, the test of their reality and strength, the evidence of their growth from within. That wise and noble Israelite, Philo Judæus, well said: "As battresses support great houses, so does justice support great nations." And we find that where there is finest allegiance to justice, and its kindred ideas, there is safety, peace, culture, and abundance. That is a great word of the Hebrew Bible, "Righteousness alone exalteth a nation," and history verifies this inspiration of the seer.

Let us have the best thoughts on the conduct of life, but no code or creed. We want simple fidelity to our own souls, a wise outlook toward a larger life, a finer insight and a broader vision to-morrow. Shakespeare gives us the eloquent utterance of his deep intuition:—

"Unto thyself be true,
And it shall follow, as the day the night;
Thou canst not then be false to any man."

Truly yours, G. B. STEVENS.

VARYING VIEWS OF UNIVERSOLOGY.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

John H. Noyes has said: "On the whole, Stephen Pearl Andrews may be regarded as the American rival of Comte." The New York Tribune once said: "He (Andrews) may be the Fichte, the Hegel of America." The Modern Thinker, a review issued by some New York positivists, says: "If this claim (Andrews') can be established, America has at length produced a philosopher of the very highest type—a greater than Aristotle, Bacon, Descartes, Spinoza, or Comte." I have been a patient student of Universalism for six years, and have no hesitation in affirming as my inmost conviction that the "claim" is established and the philosopher produced. Among the noble uses the most noble INDEX has served, none will render it more illustrious than its mediumship of "The Method of Methods, the Science of Sciences." "There is no royal road to knowledge," it is said; but an educational method has been discovered, which shall be to instruction what the steam-engine is to locomotion and the telegraph to communication. Mr. Andrews once wrote: "I mean that every school-master at a country cross-road shall be able by the aid of the newspaper and his own exertions to gain a more thorough education than he could by graduating at all the colleges in the country." A science of organization has been discovered, and is ready for elaboration and application, by which every kind of human society, from the family, primary school, and other primary assemblies up to those of the nation and the world, can be scientifically organized, disciplined, and governed;—an integral system of medicine, in which there is such an extension of our knowledge of the laws of health, hygiene, and remedy as shall make disease, unless congenital, as disgraceful as drunkenness, and shall bring about an indefinite prolongation of life. Lastly, the scientific, universal, and absolute religion, reconciliative and aggressive, at once, in which faith shall no more be seeing as through a glass darkly, but shall be as sight, face to face with the eternal Truth. Mr. J. G. Whyte, whose attack upon Universalism in THE INDEX of March 1st has induced me to write the above, will doubtless regard all this as extravagant. If he will purchase the Basic Outline of Universalism, and carefully study it, using his eyes and not his prejudices, he will find that the discoverer has grappled all the difficult problems he mentions, and many more. The editor of THE INDEX well says: "The one test of a philosophical system is the question—is it true?" Universalism demonstrates itself to me with the positiveness and absolute certainty of mathematics. The audacious logic of Hegel, the coordinative grasp of Comte, the generalizing magnificence of Spencer, are all exceeded by its far-reaching, wide-sweeping, and all-embracing scope. I have no reluctance in making the statement that the Basic Outline is the broadest, deepest, and highest, the most rigorous and most vigorous book I have ever read. I unhesitatingly affirm that to me, in comparison with its author, Charles Fourier was a dreamer, Auguste Comte an experimenter, and Herbert Spencer a merely exceptional thinker. Such is my estimate of Stephen Pearl Andrews and Universalism.

E. B. HAZZEN.

NORTHFIELD, Mass., March 7, 1877.

DEAR MR. ARBOT:—

I was somewhat surprised to find by J. G. Whyte's letter that one of so much penetration could read Mr. Andrews' articles on "Universalism," and be unable to make anything out of them "except a mass of more or less incoherent words without meaning." To me they were luminous with meaning; the ideas were definite and the language clear-cut. There is nothing vague or cloudy about "Universalism." It is the product of a deep and sharp thinker; it shows study, insight, and comprehension. On the whole, it strikes me as the most inclusive system of philosophy the world has yet seen. It is manifold in its aspects and explanations. It fronts all ways with kindly appreciation; it gives one plenty of room to think and act. It is much better adapted to the many-sided tendencies of the time than Mr. Spencer's.

But the question arises, Is "Universalism" true? wholly true? It is partially true, no doubt, like all other systems. But does it really settle the problem of the universe, or is it simply a glimpse, and so only a temporary explanation of things? I incline to the latter way of accepting it. The trouble with Mr. Andrews is that he undertakes to explain the whole universe; to give an all-comprehensive theory. In this he is like Plato, Calvin, Swedenborg, Hegel, and others. His explanation is new, interesting, and valuable, and is, perhaps, the best thing the human mind has yet done. But it seems to me a radical mistake to endeavor to explain all things; to find a law or method that shall include the sweep and meaning of universal life. I think that philosophy and science can only explain some things, and these only in a few aspects and relations. There must ever be mystery, unexplainableness, an immeasurable being that transcends human thought altogether, of which we can only have glimpses, flashes. We can know something of it deeply and truly; but we cannot methodize it. It is a transcendent quantity, too illimitable even for the most many-sided thought.

So I think Mr. Andrews will fall just where others have failed. He simply gives us a new outlook, broad and deep and high, but only an outlook. The mystery haunts us still, over all and in all. There are many things that we know nothing about. We do not even know that we don't know them. We can't have a creed for our ignorance any more than for our knowledge. We don't know the extent of either in regard to Ultimate Being.

Mr. Andrews' "Universalism" is a "nutshell" with much more meat in it than in Calvin's or other bygone "nutshells"; but it is a "nutshell" still, and outside of it the interminable universe moves on. The nutshell is measurably true, but is it the symbol of all?

It seems to me that we can only get at partial explanation even of the least thing. Mr. Andrews' "Universalism" is an illumination, brilliant and fine; but the secret of nature is not these. He helps us to understand some things better, but the Ultimate Fact is a mystery still. We cannot explain it; we can only trust it.

S. P. PUTNAM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

When I lately subscribed to your good little paper, I little thought what an intellectual banquet was in store for me in the perusal of those wonderful articles on the "Science of Universalism." There was always to me something in human knowledge remaining to be cleared up, some incompleteness, some void. But all is clear now; I am a changed man.

The Betweenness of the Psalm no longer separates the Dummheit of Hegel from the Spundtümlichkeit of Oken, because the Kantian-Mentology, hitherto veiled in the dim twilight of the Betwixt, has dawned clearly in my mind since I began the study of those papers. I read Universalism constantly to my wife; and when friends come in to enjoy an evening, I read it to them, and flatter myself the seed will bring forth precious fruit. If, perhaps, my friends do not come around so frequently as they did before, it is probable they are staying at home to ponder over the philosophy of Mr. Andrews. As Shakespeare says: "There's a Withinly shapes our ends"; and we may add, What is a Withinly without a Withoutity? With a Withoutity or without a Withinly, life would be a burden.

We have no children, but when we have some, which may perhaps now be possible, I shall make study pleasant to them by letting them read all about this Science. I shall bring them up strict Universalists.

As the bony jointings of the human corporeity are the Becoming of Aggregation, so is the unsolidated Thinkality (Guesaphography)—the outlook-taking or teleo-apology of philosophic abstraction.

Sociology, or æsthetic-doology in its more concrete form, falls utterly when brought face to face with this problem. Unless the Soft Solids are clearly distinguished from the Hard Liquids in contemplating the bony tissues of the mind (mento or mentologically speaking), there will be set up an empirical, untenable and utterly inevitable—

But I must pause. I know you do not hold yourself responsible for the views of your contributors; but although these are doubtless very advanced, they may, perhaps, through your courtesy, find publicity in THE INDEX. Some heart may be touched.

THE NAIL HIT ON THE HEAD.

EDITOR INDEX:—

What the liberal cause needs at this time is a body of able, thoughtful, brave, self-sacrificing men and women, like unto those who, for thirty years, prosecuted the anti-slavery conflict; men and women who are willing to give everything to the cause,—to go from town to town without money and without price, holding conventions and arousing and educating the people. Such men and women could draw large audiences anywhere, for the people are prepared for such a movement. In Scripture language, "the fields are ripe for the harvest, but the laborers are few." I know that here and there we find such persons as C. D. B. Mills, B. F. Underwood, W. S. Bell, and a few others, giving their time and energies to this work,—for which we should all feel thankful; but we need more such and more united and concentrated action.

We need, in fact, such a perfect organization of our liberal forces as the anti-slavery cause had, and workers who will go forth with the same eagerness and spirit that characterized Garrison, Phillips, Stephen Foster, Parker Pillsbury, Samuel J. May, Gerrit Smith, Lucretia Mott, Lucy Stone, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Lucy N. Coleman, and their co-laborers. Then Liberal Leagues would spring up in every town, and liberals and liberalism would command respect.

But so long as we work in the halting manner we do at present, we are entitled to no respect and will be sure to get none. We are unworthy of the principles we profess.

We need a few Moodys and Sankeys on our side who shall arouse the thoughtless, liberally-inclined minds to the danger we are in from the encroachments of the Church power. I wish Col. Ingervoll could be prevailed upon to visit every large town in this country, and in his fearless, bold, and eloquent manner, show up the machinations of the Christian Church, doing it in a way that would draw the fire from the clergy.

We want speakers who will proclaim from the liberal platform, as Garrison did in the Liberator: "I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice. I am in earnest; I will not equivocate; I will not excuse; I will not retreat a single inch; AND I WILL BE HEARD." We want speakers who will announce boldly of the Church, as he did of slavery, that it is "a covenant with death and a league with hell." Then the second irrepressible conflict would commence in earnest, and the vital questions which need at this hour to be considered would get a hearing.

The people are to-day bound hand and foot by the ecclesiastical powers, but do not realize their condition. They are as dead to this great wrong as they were to the wrongs of American slavery forty years ago. The priests rule everywhere in the social and political world. Freethinkers are shut out of "respectable society," and denied the immunities of life, and have not the courage to resent it. When are the friends of political and religious liberty in this country going to awake from their lethargy, organize and commence the battle for equal religious rights that must, sooner or later, be fought out in this country?

THE CO-OPERATIVE STATE COLONY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

A letter from Mr. Ivan Panin, headed "War of Capital and Labor," in THE INDEX of March 1, seems to demand a few words from me by way of reply.

As he has made some mistakes of fact in regard to the particular meeting to which he refers (with which, also, the names of gentlemen held in general respect are associated by my act as chairman of the meeting), I feel it incumbent on me to correct his misapprehensions so far as that meeting was concerned.

In the first place, then, the meeting was not called simply "to discuss a plan for obtaining State aid towards establishing a Co-operative Industrial Colony," but was called to consider the causes of the stagnation of business, the disemployment of labor, and a plan for relieving both of these calamities by the establishment of an Industrial Co-operative State Colony. (I put the last two words in italics because our friend, towards the latter part of his letter, gives the impression that a "Co-operative Colonization Society," with the voluntary aid of capitalists, is the project proposed; which is an entire mistake, and about the last thing I should propose.)

The Committee appointed at a meeting, furthermore, was not "a Committee of Arrangements," but was a committee to "consider the general subject," to prepare a plan for such State action as I had suggested, and to call a future public meeting at its discretion. As our friend has not stated the personnel of that committee correctly, to avoid confusion of persons (which may well happen in one, if not in two cases), I will give the names correctly: Rev. M. J. Savage, Charles Wyllys Elliott, Rev. Frederick Frothingham, W. G. H. Smart and Preston Warren.

It is proper for me to add that, although the first three named gentlemen were not present, they had all expressed to me their interest in the movement, and, in one instance at least, considerable sympathy of opinion. They had also signified their desire to be present at the meeting, and subsequent correspondence has shown to me that their absence was accidental or unavoidable, and that I took no unwarrantable liberty in making the appointments. This, I have reason to expect, will be made more evident by future events.

In the matter of "resolutions," in which Mr. Panin seems to think the meeting was prolific, I will only say that there was a single series of brief resolutions just sufficient to embrace all the subjects of the inquiry for which the three meetings were held, and no other resolutions were offered; and these were unanimously adopted.

W. G. H. SMART.

THE DISCUSSION over the "success" of Moody is without consideration that, so far as numerical results are concerned, the same work is repeated by Mormons, Indian "White Clouds," and Hindoo Fakirs. The simple question is, Can anything be relied upon to develop any legitimate power of man except education? Is there a cross-road to scholarship or to sainthood? We know very well that figures will not lie in the long run; but they may be made to tell some strange stories before the problem is worked out. So when Unitarians groan over the wonderful success of Mr. Moody, let them remember to wait till the problem is worked out. For one, two, or possibly six months a religious excitement may grow in fervor and accumulate strength; but no power of flaming placards, illuminated street-cars, vast tabernacles, and all the minutiae of preparation and organization can keep up the appearance of success when the novelty is gone. Then comes the time for testing the work. If Mr. Moody and his co-laborers will make out a list of one thousand converts in Chicago by name, and will tell in what church they are finally reaped, I will volunteer to furnish a table of those men one year from date, and we will learn how many recede and how many proceed. A list has been published of so many atheists, so many infidels, etc., who have been brought to Jesus. Let us see if they will stay there. I say this in no spirit of carping or disrespect for honest endeavors. I have the figures for several revival movements, and would like more. Of one great uprising in Central New York, six held to the churches at the end of two years out of nearly two hundred. The testimony of St. Louis is emphatic that the work of Mr. Hammond three years ago ended in a collapse.—N. Y. Inquirer, Jan. 18th.

THE FRIENDS of the Papacy are a little troubled just now to account for Antonelli's large fortune, which is said to amount to about $10,000,000, besides his great collection of gems and other works of art. Sir George Bowyer writes to the London Times that he probably inherited it from an uncle in very moderate circumstances, which makes people smile. His enemies say, campaign style, that it was the product of unmitigated bribery, while the judicious and moderate say it was made up by long-established perquisites received from persons having business with the Papal court. But, somehow, it does not look well, whatever way one takes it; and we should not be surprised to see the Cardinal figure in American stump-speeches, vice Sir Robert Walpole, as a corruptionist whose career may console us when we contemplate the vices of our own public men.—Nation.

Advertisements.

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 30, 1872.
TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEWART.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tarrytown, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

B. Frothingham; essay by James Fenton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wilson and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Reason and Revelation, by William J. Potter. 10 cents: ten for 80 cents; one hundred, $3.00.

For series of Important Tracts see last page of THE INDEX.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited. Orders by mail may be addressed either "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston," or to the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyses the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

A NEW QUARTERLY.

PROSPECTUS.

The want has been long felt in this country, by a large and growing class of thinking people, of a periodical publication serving the same purpose here that the Fortnightly and Contemporary Reviews serve so well in England. The progressive portion of our population demands some adequate literary vehicle for the carriage and diffusion of the most radical thought of our time. To meet this want, and in the hope that such demand may prove competent to maintain its object when once provided with it, it is proposed to issue, on May 1, 1877, or as soon thereafter as circumstances shall warrant, the first number of a quarterly periodical, to be called

"THE RADICAL REVIEW."

The success or failure of this project will depend upon the more or less encouraging reception which its announcement shall meet with from the public previous to the date mentioned. Believing that involving, as it does, the basis of property, the principles of finance, and the organization of industry, and determining, in its settlement, directly the material, and indirectly the mental and spiritual condition of the people, demands immediate consideration by the best minds, it is the intention of the management of the proposed Review, in selecting its contents, to give the preference largely to articles aimed at the solution of this disputed problem. While so doing, however, it will not exclude, but welcome rather, the proper presentation of all sides of all subjects pertaining to human welfare, whether social, economic, scientific, literary, aesthetic, or religious; prompted to this course by a firm faith in the omnipotence of Truth. It is hoped that the size of the Review, and the infrequency of its issue, will furnish opportunity for thoroughness of treatment, not afforded hitherto to the majority of competent exponents of radical ideas; but, while most of its articles will be of the weighty character peculiar to the best review literature, poetry and the lighter features of the monthly magazine will not be disregarded. To book reviews, large space will be devoted.

The editor and publisher avails himself with pleasure of the permission granted him by the following persons, to announce them as probable contributors; to which list he hopes to make important additions hereafter:—

John Weiss, John Fiske, Edmund C. Stedman, Sidney H. Morse, Octavius B. Frothingham, J. N. Larned, Lyander Spooner, Ezra H. Heywood, B. F. Underwood, Samuel Johnson, J. Stahl Patterson, Prof. E. S. Morse, John W. Chadwick, B. W. Ball, Joel A. Allen, Mrs. E. M. F. Denton, Dyer D. Lum, Stephen Pearl Andrews, Wm. J. Potter, Chas. D. B. Mills, John Orvis, Chas. W. Buck, Francis E. Abbot, Wm. Hanson, Howard N. Brown, Samuel Longfellow, Abram W. Stevens, Cyrus A. Bartol, Joseph H. Allen, John H. Clifford, J. K. Ingalls.

Each number will contain two hundred or more octavo pages, well printed on good paper. A limited number of book and other literary advertisements will be received at low rates.

Any person wishing to encourage this enterprise by subscription may notify the publisher to that effect, whereupon he will receive a printed blank, which, when signed and returned to the publisher, will bind the signer to forward the price of subscription as soon as informed that the success of the venture is assured.

Terms per annum, post-paid, $5.00.

Address the Publisher, BENJ. R. TUCKER, Lock Box 589, New Bedford, Mass.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

ANNUAL MEMBER

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

ATTRACTIVE ORNAMENT

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.

2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.

3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.

4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.

5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.

6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.

7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."

8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.

9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.

10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.

11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.

12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practicing the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.

13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental ideas on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

NEW HAMPSHIRE cannot yet make up her mind to throw the word "Protestant" out of her Constitution.

THE FOLLOWING additional lists of signatures to the Liberal League petition have been received since our last acknowledgment: from Mr. J. M. Kerr, Troy, O., 36 names; from Mr. E. C. Miles, Santa Monica, Cal., 83; from Dr. C. H. Horsch and Mr. Joseph Hayes, Dover, N. H., 150. Total number of signatures thus far received—2,804.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL lectured in this city at Tremont Temple, on the evening of March 30. Although he is an "awful unbeliever," he succeeded in doing what Moody and Sankey have so far struggled in vain to do: as the distinguished people on the platform and in the audience showed, Boston at last "bowed her haughty intellectual head!"

PIETY has a peculiar rhetoric of its own, as illustrated by these remarks of a young man at a recent Wall Street prayer-meeting: "When I belonged to the devil, I was like an old steamboat tied to a wharf, and bump against it as I might I could not get away; but Jesus came and broke me loose from the pier, and now I'm sailing on the sea straight to glory. Glory to Jesus."

WITH UNUSUAL candor and fairness, ex-President Woolsey, of Yale College, says: "I question very much whether the formal reading by rote of the Bible in schools as a school-book does so much good as to be justly regarded as essential. The children are not generally in a state of mind to receive instruction from it. Its meaning cannot be explained where its style is archaic or the sense obscure beyond the comprehension of children. Still something valuable may be gained by the children through familiarity with the gospels, and some influences even from a perfunctory formal treatment of this school exercise may pass over into the child's future life. If any of the inhabitants of a school district should object to this for conscience' sake, I would grant every indulgence consistent with school order; for instance, would allow a lesson from some other books to be substituted in its place. To cling tenaciously to the reading of the Bible against a considerable minority in the school district, or the State, could be insisted on, I should think, only on the ground that this exercise is of vast importance for the moral and spiritual welfare of the children, which I am not prepared to admit."

GOLDWIN SMITH writes thus about the Jesuits: "Jesuitism is dominant in the councils of Rome. Jesuitism dictated the Syllabus and the Encyclical.

Jesuitism called the Ecumenical Council, and framed the dogma of infallibility, which is the dogma of Jesuit supremacy. But Jesuitism is not religion; Jesuitism is, and always was, conspiracy. It conspired of old with Catholic despots for the overthrow of Protestant governments, and of the liberty in which Protestantism has its being. It conspires with factions for the same purpose now. Jesuitism is at work in every country, organizing a movement the object of which is the extinction of Protestantism and modern civilization. This movement has made great progress in some European countries, especially in Belgium, where it is getting hold of education, of the polls, of the judiciary, of all the organs of national life. It is advancing in Italy; it is advancing in Lower Canada. The Jesuit comes in time to the polls, the legislature, the judiciary, the executive, but first lays his hand on education."

THE BOSTON Herald shrewdly points out that the Presbyterian administration is too lax for the interests of ecclesiasticism and too stringent for those of civilization: "An infallible church has some important advantages in administration. Here is Rev. Mr. See, a Presbyterian, charged with violating the Scriptures by admitting a woman to his pulpit, and in the judgment upon his case sixteen ministers voted that the charge was sustained and eleven voted that it was not. The majority rules, but the audacity of the minority raises an annoying doubt. The Presbyterians believe in the infallibility of the Scriptures, but what good does that do if they cannot agree upon what the Scriptures teach? The Catholic Church is more logical. It has found it necessary to supplement an infallible Bible with an infallible interpreter, and by doing this it avoids idle disputes. If you want to build up a powerful organization to control the minds of men, the Catholic way is the true one; but if the object of the Church is human progress, a more liberal course than the Presbyterians allow is wiser, even if it lead to the belief that Paul was a trifle behind the nineteenth century."

THE ANNUAL REPORT of Mr. Neil Gilmour, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, gives 1,583,000 as the total number of children in the State of New York between the ages of 5 and 21, of whom 1,067,000, or about two-thirds only, attend school. In view of this fact, Mr. Gilmour's remarks on "compulsory education" are of interest: "In September last I addressed to School Commissioners and the Presidents of Boards of Education in cities a circular embracing a copy of the compulsory education act, as amended at the last session of the legislature, and urging those officers to exert themselves to give effect to the provisions of the law. A copy of this circular will be found among the documents submitted herewith. Later I called for special reports from city Superintendents of Schools in regard to the workings of the act, and have received several, which are also printed in the appendix, and to which I respectfully invite your attention. These reports show that, except in the city of New York, no practical steps have been taken to enforce the law. It seems to be conceded, however, that the moral effect of the law has been good, and I believe that attendance at school has been somewhat increased in consequence of its existence. The effort to obtain statistics showing the workings of the act in the rural districts was much more successful than that of last year. The reports of trustees are not, however, especially encouraging, and beyond the adoption of rules and regulations as required by the eighth section of the act, but little has been done under the law in the rural districts. The reports show that in most of the rural districts, in the villages, and in the smaller cities, a very large proportion of children between the ages of eight and fourteen years attend school the prescribed length of time and did so attend before the compulsory education act was passed."

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, undilutingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

What Liberalism offers in the Place of Christianity.

A LECTURE AT DENVER, COLO., DEC. 20, 1876.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—

After an absence of some two years I have returned to this "City of the Plains," to give another course of lectures in exposition and defence of liberal thought. I have been requested by the committee that has made arrangements for these lectures to speak this evening on this subject: "What has Liberalism to offer in the Place of Christianity?" This question is very often asked, and it is supposed by many to be one of the questions which admits of no satisfactory answer, from the fact of the inherent weakness, inefficiency, and entirely negative character of liberal thought.

The question as usually propounded involves some fallacies which I deem it proper to indicate before proceeding to answer the inquiry. The first is the implication that liberalism aims to destroy, arbitrarily and suddenly, the whole Christian system, and to substitute, as arbitrarily and suddenly, some vagaries in its place, when, in fact, any such change were utterly impossible, the facts of history attesting that no religion has ever been destroyed at once and immediately replaced by another.

All religions are gradual formations, which in their growth have necessarily assimilated much that is of value, and which, were it suddenly swept away, the effects upon society would be disastrous. And no rational man desires the sudden destruction of all that is interwoven with the habits, the thoughts, the literature of a people, and the sudden replacement of it by something else. The change that we want and work for is, rather, the gradual disappearance of that which has lost or is losing its hold upon the people and the gradual incorporation of our liberal principles into so much of the old system as must be retained. No doubt the sudden destruction of any religion—Christianity, Mohammedanism, Buddhism,—any old faith that has become intimately associated in the minds of the people with the principles of morality, with social order, with the foundation of the fabric of society and government, that the sudden destruction of any religion, supposing it possible, would be injurious in its consequences, because the people, deprived of the old motives by which they had been actuated to a considerable extent, and unable to adjust themselves to the new order of things, would for a time be in a state of intellectual and moral anarchy. Even the Protestant Reformation, which was by no means a sudden religious revolution, but one, the beginning of which dated centuries back of Luther, was attended in some places by a temporary loosening of social and moral restraints; and it was one of the complaints of the Roman Catholic writers, when they commented on that great movement, that in France, especially, it led to a vast amount of immorality, vice, and crime. There are few, if any, here, I presume, who would maintain that there was anything in the doctrines taught by the reformers more inimical to virtue and morality than the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church. It was the destruction or partial destruction of old beliefs and authorities to which the people had been accustomed and which had been connected with their ideas of right and duty, and their inability to harmonize their thoughts and feelings of right and duty with the absence of the old familiar beliefs and authorities, that were the cause of the social and moral disorders which were appealed to in proof of the wickedness of Protestant teachings.

It is very unjust to represent that the liberals of to-day aim at the entire destruction of the Christian system, when, in fact, no intelligent liberal desires anything more, in this connection, than the destruction of the false, the absurd, and the injurious which are connected with, or a part of, the old system. There is a great deal of the system, especially as defined and interpreted by the more advanced and enlightened Christians, that is true and good, and that the liberal not only has no desire to destroy, but would use all his efforts to maintain and perpetuate, strengthen and intensify. All the old religions have in them a general element that no reasonable iconoclast wishes to see destroyed. I speak now particularly of the ethical element which, although not dependent upon any religious faith, is claimed by their advocates as an essential part of all these systems.

The advocates of Orthodox Christianity must not define their system as one which includes all the principles and precepts of virtue, and then expect to reason with us on the assumption that we desire and aim to sweep the whole thing out of existence.

But right here I am led to inquire what is really to be understood by Christianity. If you ask what I will give in its place, I have a right to a definition of the system which shall be marked by clearness and definiteness of statement. There is great confusion of ideas and looseness of language on this point. One says that the essence of Christianity is love; another will quote a list of beautiful precepts that the enlightened minds of all ages have taught, and he will tell you that they constitute the essential principles of Christianity. A Christian who is more theologically inclined will tell you that Christianity consists in certain great doctrines and facts, chief among which is that Jesus Christ is the savior of the world. Another will declare that "the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man" are the essence and spirit of Christianity. Thus we can hardly get the same definition from two persons who call themselves Christians.

How shall we ascertain what is meant by Christianity? We may be directed to the New Testament wherein, it may be thought, we can find for ourselves what Christianity really is. But I reply that hundreds and thousands, distinguished for their learning, have studied this subject not only with great care, but with all the assistance which is supposed to come from prayer; and these hundreds and thousands have failed to arrive at anything like unanimity of belief as to the meaning of the New Testament; nay, in many cases, and on important points, they have come to conclusions diametrically opposite. So we see the Roman Catholic consigning to everlasting punishment the different Protestant denominations; the Protestants almost a unit in denouncing the Roman Catholic Church as the harlot of the world; while all the evangelical denominations are more or less hostile to one another.—Yet I doubt not all are equally sincere, and all have for representative men equally learned and pious, and desirous of teaching the true faith. Thus is illustrated the utter inability of the human mind, accepting the Bible as the word of God, to come to any unanimity of belief as to what Christianity really is. We find denominations founded upon different contradictory doctrines all claimed to form an important part of Christianity by their respective adherents.

If you insist that I go to the New Testament and get my idea of Christianity from its pages, I must say that I find there doctrines and teachings which are not taught and which are not recognized as a part of Christianity by the great influential denominations of Christendom, and which would not be acknowledged as a part of their system by those who ask us what we will give in its place. I find taught in the New Testament "a thorough cult of poverty and mendicancy," as Strauss observed is the case. I find passive obedience and unresisting submission enjoined. I find poverty extolled as a virtue, and wealth denounced as a crime and a curse. I find celibacy recommended as a virtue, and marriage regarded with aversion. I find woman represented as man's subordinate, and required to submit to him in all things. I find slavery endorsed, and the slaves required to "count their masters worthy of all honor." I find submission to "the powers that be" commanded, and damnation threatened to such opposers of tyranny as Washington, Adams, and Jefferson. If, then, I should go to the New Testament and judge as to what Christianity is by its teachings, considered as a whole, every Orthodox Christian who hears me would dissent from me and claim I had no right to take my individual interpretations of the New Testament as the system for which I was attempting to offer a substitute, that I should go to the leading denominations which represent the belief of the masses, the belief that has become established in the minds of the people, and exert an influence on their lives, and show what liberalism offers in the place of that. And indeed that is the only thing to do.

Now what are the doctrines which the Orthodox denominations teach in common? If may be said that they all accept the Bible, and since liberalism rejects that book, what can it give in its place? Let me say in reply that liberals recognize the worth and value of the Bible, I trust, considered as a collection of books that have come to us a legacy from antiquity. It contains words of imperishable worth, and lessons of priceless value. It contains also a great deal of error, many mistakes, numerous childish ideas which had their origin in ages of ignorance; it often conflicts with common sense; written when men did not to the extent they now do depend upon observation and reason, and when there were fewer and poorer opportunities than the nineteenth century with all its culture and experience affords, it is not strange that it contains many errors, and fails to stand the severe tests of modern criticism. Yet while we accept the Bible—as we accept the Koran—and while we would have it take its proper place in the literature of the race, the theologian wants to know what we have to offer in the place of it. Have we ever asked to have the Bible destroyed? Have we ever suggested that the Bible ought to be expelled from the literature of mankind? Nothing of the sort. Then the Christian has no right to inquire what we have to give in the place of this book. Let it be preserved, the good, bad, and indifferent, the true and the erroneous alike, even the immoral and obscene parts, which ought to be retained as similar passages are, for instance, in the Odes of Anacreon, for they help to show us what were the intellectual and moral conditions of the times in which they were written.

But the Christian may reply: "Liberalism does not accept the Bible as a divinely-inspired book and cannot, therefore, appeal to it as an authoritative standard. What will it give us in the place of the Bible as a standard of truth and right?" Let the question be this, and we will endeavor to meet it fairly. The only standard we know of worthy of the name is the enlightened reason of man. It is the standard to which all persons of intelligence ultimately turn for the settlement of questions of whatever kind. Even the best, the most enlightened human reason is not infallible; but it is certainly the highest and the most reliable standard that we have, and to which all others, in the final appeal, must be subordinate.

The Bible is valueless to the theologian as a rule of faith and practice until he has made use of this subjective standard, that man, in all ages and climes, possesses human reason, subject to such revisions in its judgments as observation and experience in every generation enable it to make. Taking the Bible, how can the theologian accept it, or how can he interpret its teachings, or make an application of them to daily life until he has at least made a pretence of subjecting them to that common standard and criterion, the highest and best that man has, or ever can have,—human reason. It is useless to object that reason is fallible; so are all books, including real or pretended objective revelations, which indeed have furnished sanction and authority for almost every crime and iniquity that can be mentioned.

The Christian may say his religion teaches the existence of a God of infinite power, wisdom, and love, who created the universe and governs it by his will, who made man in his own intellectual and moral image, and gave him an immortal destiny. He may say these are the leading cardinal ideas of his theology, and ask us what we have to offer in their place. But these are fundamental teachings of other religions than the Christian, and religions, too, that preceded, by many centuries, the advent of Christianity. Why did God make a revelation and take on flesh and dwell among men to teach what was already believed by men? Why are these doctrines appealed to as the central principles of Christianity, when the very object of this faith, its advocates say, was to supplement these truths with the great principle of Atonement through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ? Perhaps, the majority of those who reject Christianity still hold to the belief in an intelligent Deity and the conscious existence of man after death. Such might reply to the Christian after he had presented his "central principles of Christianity," by reminding him that they are equally the central principles of his own religious system. But my reply shall be from the stand-point of one who is commonly regarded as an atheist. God! what does the word signify. Evidently just what the condition, the intellectual and moral culture of a person or people determine. The savage has a God, who is like himself, physically and mentally, to a considerable extent. The enlightened believer, accustomed to reflection on this subject, has a God, stripped of the grosser anthropomorphisms, who appears to the mind as possessing only the best qualities of human nature. Suppose I should go to the savage and criticise his conception of God, and he, unable to grasp a higher and grander thought, should turn on me, and charge me with trying to deprive him of his God without being able to offer anything in its place. He would be no more unreasonable than is the Christian theologian to-day, when, because we will not, cannot, accept his anthropomorphic conception of the Absolute, would have it appear we deny that absolute existence, of which we affirm that all our thoughts and ideas of it are relative, and which we decline to invest with merely human qualities. The theologian who talks about a God, a being, a person, who thinks and reasons, who is pleased and displeased, who contrives plans and designs, who approves and disapproves, who existed through a beginningless past, doing nothing (since if he is the cause of all things, there was time without beginning back of his first creative effort), and at some time aroused from this "masterly inactivity," and for the first time experienced the feelings and assumed the relations of a maker of worlds and sentient beings,—I say the theologian who talks thus reasons just like the savage who is satisfied that he knows God, since he is so lacking in philosophical grasp of thought that he fails to see that his God is his own nature and thought projected ideally into the objective world. Each is unable to see that in his conception of God he only reflects his own nature, and is all the time speaking of himself.

Whether theism or atheism be true, there is something that may be called the absolute,—that which existed before us; that which will exist after our bodily organization is destroyed; that of which we can have no knowledge except as it is related to our organism. We know it only as it is related to us; as it impresses our senses; as it appears to our consciousness. We exist. This is a fact of consciousness. Descartes' famous demonstration, "I think, therefore I am," does not add to the proof or the certainty of our existence. We know that there is an external world, that there is something external to ourselves; but when we come to question what that outside world is, we have no means of knowing, and the wisdom of mankind has never been able to show. Our knowledge, I repeat, is relative. We see that stove and feel the heat. But what we consider as a state of the stove-heat is dependent upon an organism, for it is something felt,—a sensation. This is the subjective aspect of the subject. Viewed objectively heat is a mode of motion dependent upon an externality. How, then, can we decide what it is absolutely considered? Surely it belongs to the "unknowable." We smell the rose, but the fragrance depends upon two factors—the emanations of particles from the object, and the sense of smell,—the absence of either of which renders the fragrance of the rose impossible. What the rose is in itself, unmodified by the organism, we have no possible means of ascertaining. Sound is commonly thought to be something outside of us,—an objective reality which would exist even though the organism were absent.

But what is sound? Waves of air coming in contact with the auditory nerve produce a sensation, and we call it sound. The sensation is in the organism, and can have no existence outside of it; but if you tell an unreflecting man that there is no sound where there is no ear, he will look at you in astonishment, and ask, perhaps, in imagined refutation of your statement, whether there is no sound in the heavens when the lightnings flash and the thunders roar, even though no person is present to hear it! What is true of sound is true of light. Etherial undulations coming in contact with the sensitive retina produce the phenomenon or sensation of luminousness. The vibrations of the ether would be the same whether there were eye or not; but what we call luminousness is a sensation, and it depends as much upon the retina as it does upon the etherial undulations. Thus we see that all phenomena as observed by us depends upon two factors,—the organism and the externality, the subject and the object. What things are in themselves, what they are, considered out of all relation to our consciousness, we have no means of knowing, for the reason that the limits of our organism restrict us to the relations between it and the objective world. Were we differently organized, phenomena might appear to us quite different from what they now do.

I am not an advocate of idealism—that system which tells us that there is nothing but the ego; that everything which appears objectively is simply representations or modifications of the ego. That is not what I am trying to present to you this evening. We are in contact, through our senses, with a real outer world; but as it appears to us, it is colored or modified; in other words, its appearance is determined by our own mental constitution. What the external world is absolutely considered, I repeat, we have no means of learning, since we cannot take cognizance of it except as it is related to and colored by our consciousness. But we must all admit the absolute, whether we believe in an intelligent Deity or not. The difference between the liberal of the school to which I belong—scientific materialism—and the theologian is this: the theologian invests the absolute with anthropomorphic qualities which are a projection of his own mind, while the liberal accepts the principle of the relativity of human knowledge and declines to give predicates to that which he sees must forever remain inscrutable to the mind of man. The savage, as I have remarked, gives it color, form, hate, and fear, and all the worst qualities as well as the good ones of his own nature. As man becomes more intelligent he begins to take away or modify the grosser qualities with which his ancestors invested God. He divests him of color, afterwards of form; then begins to question whether God is really capable of anger and hate. He calls God father; but after a while he uses the term only in the sense of a protector, a being who produces and governs his creatures; and at length the advanced theologian to-day asks only that we admit that God is intelligent and possesses the amiable qualities of benevolence and love. But it seems to me that there is just as much logical propriety in saying that God has form and color as in saying that God possesses the quality of intelligence; for intelligence can be shown to depend upon organism and environment, and closely analyzed is shown to be made up of faculties, every one of which is finite, and implies restriction and infirmity.

Take reason and inquire what it is, as far as we can speak of it—the perception of relations, the comparison of ideas, and deducing conclusions therefrom. But when ideas are compared and conclusions are arrived at, there is a condition of partial knowledge; hence, where there is reason there must be finiteness. So we might go through with the list of faculties and qualities that constitute intelligence, and show that they all imply finiteness, ignorance, lack of power, etc. This theologians are beginning to see—I mean the more profound among them,—and they say, "Very well, we admit the force of this reasoning; but when we ascribe these anthropomorphic qualities to God, it is because they express the highest conceptions we have, while in fact we believe that God is something of which we can give no description, or have even a representative thought." But when they say this, they virtually confess the correctness of the position of those liberals with whom the word God is like the letter x in an indeterminate algebraic problem.

When we come to examine this subject closely, and with philosophical exactitude, we see that there is not one intellectual or moral quality that can be ascribed to the absolute without making it anthropomorphic and subjecting it to limitations. To qualify is to limit. The unconditional is the absolute.

Instead, then, of a personal, man-like God, we recognize the reality of an absolute existence, outside of us, of which we can have no knowledge except as related to our consciousness, and which may therefore be properly termed the unknowable.

But what theology presents in God we offer in humanity. We have seen that every conceptional God is simply a man. God is man, projected ideally into the outer world. Man becomes God long before God became man. As Feuerbach observes very finely: "God is the mirror in which man sees himself as he is." Religion is a dream in which man contemplates his own nature.

Subject to analysis the God of any system of worship, and you will discover nothing in it that is not in man. God has intelligence and love and hate because man has; he reasons, plans, and designs because man does; he approves and disapproves because man does; indeed, all the predicates of his being are the predicates of human nature. The mysteries of the Christian theology, as Feuerbach has shown, are simply mysteries of the subjective nature of man, and the relations of God are simply human relations. Man loves company, and his own nature projected into the outer world has the same needs; hence all systems of worship involve the idea of plurality, community, and companionship. The triune God of the Christian theology is three gods; in fact, even though by a kind of intellectual slight-of-hand, in order to silence the reason, he is made to appear as one. In the conception the desire for community is satisfied. In the Christian God we have the relations of father and son, because these are essential relations of the human race. Man is a father, and man's nature viewed objectively would be incomplete without the same capacity and relation. Hence God is a father; he is also—in the second person—a son; and the third person of the trinity concerning which there has been and is so much dispute, so much indefiniteness, which Henry Ward Beecher once said appeared to him as a kind of aroma that proceeds from the father and son, is the sense and sentiment of community between the two. But father and son imply a mother, and consequently the maternal element must have some representation in the projected nature of man, which appears before him as an objective being under the name of God. With the progress of infidelity and rationalistic criticism, God loses one after another his human qualities; and even Protestantism has subordinated the position and character of the maternal element in the divine character. The Roman Catholic Church in its theology, which has been less modified by scepticism, attaches as much importance to the mother of God as to the son of God. In the incarnation we have simply the realized wish of man viewing himself as an object of thought to see himself as an object of sense. Man's own nature "projected into objectivity" had long been an object of contemplation and reverence. There was a longing of the heart to feel, to see, to hear this being who loved man and sympathized with him in his sorrows. The incarnation is the satisfaction of that longing.

In the doctrine of the Atonement human nature is still further revealed. It signifies what every father and mother have felt, what every person among us has experienced. Man's moral nature condemns many of his acts, as none of us live up to our highest ideal of duty; but love is always devising some means by which to excuse the offender or to mitigate his punishment. The mother tries to spare her child the punishment threatened for disobedience, in some way that will not involve the violation of her word or the lessening of her authority. A king of Iran, so the story runs, ordained that any subject convicted of treason should have his eyes put out. His own son incurred the terrible penalty. The law must be enforced and justice vindicated; but his paternal heart felt for his guilty son, and he devised a "scheme" to "satisfy justice" and to "show his love." He caused one of his own eyes to be put out, and mercifully allowed his son to go with the loss of one of his eyes only. In the Atonement we have this same principle. God has employed man's methods because God is no other being than man himself.

We would then have all those qualities which are admired and praised in God, made the direct object of consideration in man. Since it is evident that all we reverence in God exists in man, and since man is the substance and God is but the shadow, or the face seen in the mirror, we would make man the direct object of all our respect and gratitude and love and devotion. We would build temples and dedicate them to man, not to God. We would chant the triumphs and sing the praises of man, not of God. We would encourage the elevation of man, not the glorifying of God. In short, for theology we would substitute anthropology; for the shadow we would give the substance; for the worship of God the advancement and happiness of man. Profound consideration of our race, and the cultivation of the nobler side of our nature will, we fondly hope, gradually replace blind reverence for and adoration of an imaginary anthropomorphic God. Then all the time and money, all the effort and moral enthusiasm which are now directed to the advancement of the glory of God, will be devoted to the improvement of our race. As much will be done to make men good as is now done to make men religious; and the world will be better, mankind will be happier.

For the notion of creation we submit the proposition that the universe in its entirety is eternal. We thus get rid of the necessity of a "beginning," and, of course, of a Beginner, a great Being who was once the sole denizen of illimitable space; who was, although possessed of the most splendid powers, during a past eternity doing nothing; who was able to make a perfect universe; yet made a world which has been a scene of distress, torture, and death from the first appearance of life up to the present time.

The theory of evolution naturally takes the place of the making of worlds and the origination of life by supernatural power. We explain the growth of worlds from a fire-mist by natural laws and natural forces, without having recourse to a world-maker. The arguments of Laplace have more weight in our mind than the mere word of an old Hebrew cosmologist. For the doctrine of special Providence and Divine Interference, we offer the conception of the universality and invariableness of natural law, a conception the truth of which has been demonstrated by a wide induction, based upon the observed order of Nature.

For the idea of design in Nature we substitute the principle of "natural selection," which in the struggle for life gives us what Spencer has fitly termed "the survival of the fittest"; i.e., the organisms which have been able in a changing environment to adjust themselves to their medium, while a far greater number for the contrary reason have perished. We thus account for the white bears in the Polar regions, the black bear in Hindostan; for the dark color of nocturnal animals, the brilliant color of fish among the coral reefs, the unobtrusive color of female birds that sit on open nests, and even the vertical markings on the body of the Bengal tiger; also the peculiarities of form and disposition of other animals which teleology represents were created for a specific purpose, in contradiction to all the facts with which we are acquainted.

For the notion that evil is the result of some accident in the universe; that once perfection reigned, but through the mistake or ambition of an angel evil appeared; and that all wrong and suffering are attributable to that source, we substitute the rational conception that what we call evil is non-adjustment to our conditions. The words good and evil are relative terms that stand for events or actions that are advantageous or disadvantageous to us, but which in the order of nature are equally natural and equally necessary. In the school of experience, in which an incalculable amount of suffering has been inevitable, man has learned during the existence of the race that there are certain courses of conduct and certain processes of Nature which contribute to his well-being, and that there are others which are injurious to him. The former he calls good, the latter evil. Actions which a long and wide experience have demonstrated to be beneficial to him we call right; actions which he has learned are pernicious in their tendency we call wrong. How conscience, which gives so much significance to the word "ought," has been evolved from a moral condition hardly above that of the brute, has been shown by Mr. Darwin in a manner so lucid and so admirable that no more a priori theological notion deserves any consideration in comparison, or rather in contrast with it.

Some doubt whether man knows more about moral principles than he did thousands of years ago. Even Mr. Buckle took the ground that morality is not a progressive science. Yet it seems clear to me that the experience of every age gives us clearer conceptions of our rights, relations, and duties. It is true that for ages have been taught certain general precepts that cover all the duties of man, such, for instance, as "Be just"; but it must be remembered that progress in ethical science consists in learning what is involved in these precepts.

For the doctrine of original sin we substitute the scientific fact that ancestral experiences have been organized in the race as inherited tendencies, aptitudes, or predispositions. The brain at birth is not like a blank sheet of paper. It is written all over with invisible ink, which needs but the influence of circumstances to reveal it to our sight. Human beings come into existence with good tendencies and with bad tendencies. We are what we are intellectually and morally, as well as physically, largely because of our ancestors. Two beings of depraved appetites and debased moral nature, and lacking in intellectual qualities, can never be parents of children distinguished for great intellectual power and strong moral disposition. Undeveloped savages were our ancestors, and we have received their characteristics, except so far as they have been modified by many generations of civilized life. Our bad impulses, dispositions, and tendencies, or many of them, are due to ages of savage life, they having been transmitted by the law of heredity. We thus account for whatever bad there is in our nature without having recourse to the childish fable of the fall of man. We are no "degenerate sons of an illustrious ancestry," but rather the improved and improving descendants of savage ancestors.

We think the bad tendencies may be gradually weakened and the good tendencies strengthened. If as much time and effort had been expended in trying to make man good as have been in trying to make him religious, the tendency of his nature in the direction of right would be vastly greater than it is now. Good tendencies, love of truth, benevolence, virtue, temperance must be encouraged, increased, and intensified, and by the law of heredity transmitted and organized in the race, so that man's love of the good and the true, and his disposition to pursue them, will become almost a passion as well as a principle of his moral being.

For the doctrine of "salvation" through Jesus Christ we substitute the more rational principle of observance of the conditions and laws of our being, the cultivation and improvement of our physical, intellectual, and moral nature. We do not look back through the mists and the darkness of centuries to the gentle Nazarene for elevation and advancement, although glad to recognize his efforts in the cause of humanity; we look rather to ourselves, to the aid of our fellow-men—those among whom we live,—to the powerful aids of science, to the experience of the world and in the evolution of the race, to the principle of "the survival of the fittest."

For prayer we substitute self-reliance and an intelligent use of natural forces and agencies in accomplishing our ends. We look to our own efforts for success. In danger we must rely on our own resources, and not look to an anthropomorphic Deity who never calms the ocean for the perishing mariner, nor extinguishes the fire when men, women, and children are perishing amidst flames in railroad cars, theatres, or even churches.

Instead of speculating in regard to another life, the reality of which, to say the least, is doubtful, we hold that this life should occupy all our attention here, where there is so much to do, and where our efforts are so greatly needed. If beyond the portals of death there is another state of being, doubtless he will be the best adapted to enjoy its blessings who discharges all the active duties of this life. Instead of teaching men to "prepare to die," we would rather have them taught how to live. In place of the clergy we would have teachers with the ability and disposition to impart to the people useful knowledge, such as expands the mind, refines its taste, and improves the condition of man. We need more science and less theology; more intellectual culture and less piety; more knowledge and less faith; more regard for man and less reverence for God.

Before I close I wish to add that liberalism aims, among other things, to secularize this government; to separate Church and State so effectually that there will be no vestige of a union between the two, so that the Liberal, the Jew, the Mohammedan, and "the heathen Chinese" shall have their rights as fully and completely recognized as are those of the Christian. We are working to have all churches taxed; to have all religious exercises excluded from our public schools; to have all religious services expelled from our halls of legislation; to have the judicial oath abolished; to have Sunday laws harmonize with the principles of secular government. These are some of the reforms we have pledged ourselves to advance with a view to securing equal rights and impartial religious liberty to all. They involve principles of more importance than any on which the two great political parties of the country are divided to-day, and they appeal to every man who loves justice and respects the rights of all mankind. This is a part of our constructive work.

DETERIORATION IN HEAVEN.

BY CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

Among the many self-contradictions of Orthodoxy is one which I have rarely seen remarked on.

Heaven, whether a place (as Mr. Moody energetically maintains) or a state, is assumed to be sinless, and to be not only without sin, but without temptation. Its inhabitants are all to be "holy"; and though "holiness," as far as one can judge of it by the character and life of its principal representatives in our own community, omits and ignores some of the qualities most prized among human beings in their "natural" state, it seems to be assumed among the pious that in heaven all sorts of excellence, moral and spiritual, will not only exist, in a degree far exceeding their earthly rate, but go on perpetually refining and increasing. This is the assumption, in a general way; yet, looking at the matter in detail, certain essential features of the Orthodox system are found to be strongly in contrast with that assumption.

Benevolence and beneficence, a desire to benefit others, pushed to the extent of actually doing them service at one's own cost,—this is esteemed, both by saints and sinners, one of the best traits of human character. Among the saints, what is called missionary labor is considered to be its highest manifestation. When a man voluntarily relinquishes those occupations in life which combine justifiable self-indulgence with an average amount of usefulness to others, and adopts instead a career full of hardship and privation, with the sole object of doing good to those who are most in need, we inevitably admire and honor him, even when our judgment differs from his in regard to the necessity or advantage of the particular work in question. Whether the necessities of the people called heathen are, in kind and degree, such as the Christian missionary assumes; whether the probabilities of persuading them show the field in question to be the best investment for such labor and self-sacrifice; whether the theological ideas and customs proposed by missionaries are really a great advance upon those which their heathen hearers now accept; and whether reason, fact, and truth uphold one of these sets of doctrines and observances much more than the other,—upon all these points, opinions may be and are divided; nevertheless, everybody respects and honors the sincere missionary, and pays this tribute in proportion to the thoroughness of his disinterestedness and self-sacrifice.

On the other hand, the few men and women who are so penetrated with the missionary spirit as to feel constrained to devote their lives to missionary labors, sacrificing to that impulse all that is commonly considered comfort, as well as prosperity and success in this world's life, are filled with wonder and sadness at the indifference to that work displayed by ordinary Christians. The rescue of a single soul counterbalances, the missionaries think, all the suffering and privation which they have undergone; yet the knowledge that millions are perishing for want of more laborers in the vineyard makes little impression upon the members of Christian churches generally. If they feebly pray that the glad tidings of salvation may (somehow) be carried into all lands, and if they back their petitions by a small sum dropped annually into the missionary-box, these Christians seem to think their share of that work accomplished sufficiently for their standing as Christians, even if not quite satisfactorily for their credit as Christians.

In heaven, however, according to the Orthodox assumption, this state of things is to be reversed. The heathen will be, and will be known by the saints to be, in a condition unpeppably worse than that unregenerate earthly condition which aroused such intense compassion in the missionary mind. Yet not only will the great majority of the saints continue in that indifference to heathen sin and suffering which was imputed to them as a fault by the missionaries on earth, but the missionaries themselves will have relapsed from that benevolent and self-sacrificing spirit which distinguished them in their mortal life, and will have permanently fallen back into that average or low grade of Christian character which astonished and shocked them when, from their posts of duty in China, India, or Turkey, they saw its manifestation in lands called Christian. Knowing that the heathen are in a worse condition than ever, the missionaries, on reaching heaven, will have ceased to care for it; knowing that the heathen are suffering far more than on earth, they will have ceased to regard that; knowing that the corruption and depravity of the heathen are increasing, and continuing to increase, they will have ceased to trouble themselves about even that. According to the Orthodox theory, they will have lost their most characteristic Christian grace by the change from earth to heaven.

Two young men in the Theological Seminary at Andover, took great delight in the study and practice of music. After their graduation as Orthodox ministers, one continued to cultivate and enjoy that art, in such leisure as his pastoral duties afforded; the other, feeling that duty called him to labor among the heathen, relinquished music with other indulgences of civilization, spent his life in self-sacrificing toil for the love of souls, and was thought a better Christian for doing so. When they get to heaven, according to the Orthodox theory, they will renew their pleasant intimacy, and will play duets upon the harp together, the missionary caring no more than the other for either the sin or the suffering which they know to be going on among the "spirits in prison."

Does the heavenly state involve and produce deterioration in the better class of Christians? And do they recognize that they are less Christ-like than they were on earth, without caring for the lamentable fact?

Less Christlike! That phrase suggests the inquiry, Is there a yet sadder case of deterioration in heaven than the one we have just glanced at?

The great characteristic distinction of Jesus during his earthly ministry was love to the needy and suffering, and self-sacrificing labor in their behalf. His love for sinners was not prevented nor neutralized by their sins. He did not despair, even in the case of such depravity as the respectable Pharisees accounted hopeless. He came to seek and to save that which was lost.

Now, "the lost," according to the Orthodox theory, are to be found in the future world even more emphatically than in the present. Their dreadful situation is known in heaven, and the place of their confinement is known there. Harriet Newell and Henry Martyn, Wesley and Whitefield and Harlan Page all know these things, but they have ceased to care about them. They are comfortably enjoying their harps and crowns, and if they hear any wailing and gnashing of teeth, it will seem to chord well enough with the heavenly strains. But has Jesus also changed to that extent? Is he, too, content to leave sufferers in suffering, and sinners in sin? Will he sit, forever, calmly observing "the smoke of their torment"? A Savior, and having "all power" committed to him, will he not save, nor even try to save them? "The great Intercessor," will he not even ask that another chance be given them?

Alas, the Orthodox system pitilessly demands the deterioration, not only of the saints, but of the Savior, to the extent above described. Strange to say, the change from the imperfection of earth to the holiness of heaven will remove or diminish such natural affection and human sympathy as the saints formerly possessed, and will substitute for it utter regardlessness of the sins and sufferings of others, even of their nearest relatives and most cherished friends. The unchangeable Intercessor will no longer intercede; the unchangeable Savior will cease to save; the unchangeable Heavenly Father will laugh at the calamity of a portion of his human creatures, and mock when their fear cometh! But these are only a small portion of the self-contradictions of orthodoxy.

FELIX ADLER.

The new exponent of radical ideas, Prof. Felix Adler, is attracting a good deal of attention, especially among the more liberal Jews. He lectures on Sunday at Standard Hall, corner of Forty-second Street and Broadway. It is a snug little place, that will hold three or four hundred people, and on Sunday morning last was crowded with as many as it could comfortably seat. We looked about for Daniel Deronda and Mirah, for we feel sure that by this time they have learned that the promise of their race is in the West instead of the East. There were plenty of Hebrew physiognomies, some of them cultured and refined, some of them belonging to the good-natured, rather oily, pawn-broking type of Jacob Cohen. There were bright-faced young girls, and occasionally an old man who looked like the prophet Jeremiah. These sons and daughters of Israel came in with a brisk, week-day air, some of them with books and newspapers. There was also a considerable sprinkling of Gentiles, and the whole assembly was curious and nondescript, such as no other American city can call together.

The service is purely secular, without prayer or hymn, text or benediction. A choir up in a little gallery sings a few selections from Mendelssohn and Rossini to an organ accompaniment, and then Prof. Adler takes his place at the reading-desk. Some of our readers may know that he is the son of a rabbi, and was brought up, figuratively speaking, in the courts of the temple. His radicalism must have developed at an early period, for he is still a young man, and during the three years he served at Cornell it is said to have been quite pronounced. He is slightly built and scholarly-looking, with a well-formed head and massive brain. The Jewish type is marked in him, but it is toned down and refined by his strong intellectual bias. The slight pallor of the student is contrasted with black hair and eyes, and a close-cut beard of the same hue.

He speaks entirely without notes, and from the first sentences it is apparent that his intellect is of a keen, relentless, and incisive order, and his scholarship ripe and rare. Absolute fearlessness seems to be one of his leading characteristics, and some of the things we heard him say on Sunday must have been peculiarly startling to his Jewish auditors; but he said them as if he deserved thanks for his almost pitiless sincerity. He stood easily by the side of his desk with the air of pondering and weighing his thoughts, as he gave them forth. His sentences seem to drop out of a great profound, and his whole manner so singularly unstudied, instead of suggesting glibness, shows hardly a sign of preparation. What he says is the natural overflow of a full mind thoroughly convinced, in dead earnest. This manner, so unusual among our pulpit and platform-speakers, who generally come well-primed with the directions, "laugh here," "cry here," if not written upon the MS., jotted down mentally, has a charm of its own.

A profound interest is developed in the audience as soon as the speaker begins his lecture. He is now delivering a course on the "History of Religion," and on Sunday his subject was the "God of Force." Though his manner is quiet, at moments, through the warmth of a fervid nature, it rises to an intense but ungesticulatory kind of eloquence.

He partially refuted the common opinion that religion had its origin fear. It sprang equally from the instinctive reverence for power. The old gods were men deified,—vast human images cast upon the screen of the unknown. God made man in his image, man has made God in his own likeness. He traced the sun-myth to its place in the centre of every mythology. The myth-makers were the Kephers and Newtons of the antique world. They strove to account for the movements of the heavenly bodies by fanciful stories drawn from human experience. Some of these were given with very good effect. Samson he told us was a sun-god. The shearing of the hair does not deprive man of strength, but in many religions there is a fable of the sun-god which likens his rays to hair. In the summer this flourishes and becomes luxuriant. His force is then great. In the winter he falls into the power of an enchantress who shears his locks, and he becomes bald and weak. The blinded Samson, struggling against his enemies, the Philistines, is an allegory of the sun contending with clouds and darkness.

He related the fable of Adonis, god of spring, slain in the forest by a wild boar, and described the festival of the Adonia, when the Syrian women mourned and wept and beat their breasts over the figure of the god laid out for burial. Suddenly the people raised a great shout, "Adonis lives! Adonis is risen again!" Every mythology has a myth of the death and resurrection of a beautiful young god, celebrated about the time of Easter.

He dwelt at some length on the dark and fearful side of the religion of force, especially human sacrifice, and described the rites of the sun-god among the ancient Mexicans, in whose temples twenty-five hundred human victims were annually slain. Flagellation and the mutilation of the body were described as survivals from the worship of an ogre-god who thirsted for human gore. He dwelt earnestly upon the necessity of expelling from modern religion every trace of these dark and baleful superstitions. The whole discourse evinced a profound acquaintance with his subject, and an earnest desire to instruct his hearers in essential truths. He announced that the organization of his society would take place this week, and judging from the lively interest of the something more than handful he has already drawn, it is safe to predict that Prof. Adler will soon have no inconsiderable following.—Christian Register, Feb. 24.

MOHAMMEDANS AND CHRISTIANS.

A meeting of Christians was held last Tuesday evening, at Association Hall, to denounce the recent Mohammedan outrages in Bulgaria. Speeches were made by several Christian clergymen, in which not merely the conduct of the Mohammedans in Bulgaria, but also their religion in general was violently attacked. One reverend gentleman even went so far as to thank God that the Turkish Empire, the great bulwark of the Mohammedan faith, would soon be blotted out in Europe by Christian gunpowder, swords, and bayonets. The Mohammedans hate Christians, he said, fiercely and bitterly; and this, he appeared to think, requires Christians to be equally fierce and bitter in hating them.

No one pretends, we believe, to defend the Mohammedan treatment of the Bulgarians. It was, according to all accounts, cruel and inhuman to the last degree. Nor is it to be denied that religious fanaticism inflamed the ferocity which the Mohammedans displayed. It is also true that Christians in Mohammedan countries labor under civil and political disabilities, and are the objects of social dislike by their Mohammedan fellow-citizens. But to infer from these facts that Mohammedanism ought to be suppressed by the strong hand is to argue in a manner peculiar only to men deficient in practical common-sense, such as clergymen often are.

Like Christianity, Mohammedanism is at once a reforming and a proselyting faith. The object of its founder was to destroy idolatry and replace it with the worship of the one invisible God. Its first successes were gained in regions where Christianity had failed to make converts at all, or at least failed to keep them when they were made. At this moment it is advancing rapidly in regions, both of Asia and of Africa, in which Christian missionaries have been unable to gain a foothold. African tribes, which are insensible to the subtleties of Christian theology, welcome the simpler doctrines of the Koran, and willingly accept the comparative civilization which they produce. In India, sixty millions of Mohammedans, living side by side with less than two millions of Christians, attest the comparative superiority, in the estimation of the population, of Islam over Christianity. And, while the total Christian population of the world does not greatly exceed three hundred millions, the Mohammedans number over one hundred and fifty millions. The history of religious persecutions proves that far less numerous sects have resisted violent efforts for their suppression; and the means which have failed with them are not likely to succeed with a system whose adherents comprise one-tenth the inhabitants of the globe, and who, less than two centuries ago, were powerful enough to imperil the integrity of Europe.

Nor is it easy for an impartial judge to discover grounds upon which Christians may rightfully reproach Mohammedans for their intolerance and fanaticism. Deeds such as those which their Tuesday evening meeting was called to condemn, spring not from Mohammedanism, but from those evil passions which all religions endeavor to subdue; and they disfigure the annals of Christendom no less than those of the empire of the Turks. Catholics have burned heretics at the stake, Protestants have persecuted Catholics and Quakers. It is only a few years since Jews were not permitted to sit in the British Parliament, and, within the recollection of readers of the Sun, a mob professing one kind of Christian faith burned, in Philadelphia, the church-edifices of Christians of another. Not long ago a man was convicted and punished in Massachusetts for not keeping the Christian Sabbath, and the testimony of a disbeliever in a God such as Christians believe in is not received in our courts of justice. If our intolerance does not result in atrocities like those practised on the Bulgarians, it is because of our superior refinement, and not of our greater goodness.

The worst of it is, that exhibitions of ill-temper, such as the Christians at Association Hall made on Tuesday evening, tend to bring their religion into disrepute, and impair its real usefulness. When, half a century ago, the Christian population of the country was called on to sympathize with the Greeks against the Turks, as they are now called on to sympathize with the Bulgarians, the caustic John Randolph protested that the real Greeks were at our own doors. The clergymen who spoke at Association Hall might profitably turn their eyes away from the Mohammedan ruffians in Bulgaria to the Christian husbands among us who murder their wives, and the Christian fathers who burn their children on red-hot stoves and scald them with boiling water; to the Christian statesmen who sell their votes and the Christian merchants who buy them; to the Christian bank-presidents and cashiers who rob their stockholders, the Christian trustees who embezzle the money of widows and orphans, and the Christian swindlers of every kind who swarm about the country. And if this is not enough to occupy their time, they will find multitudes of Christian sick and poor and suffering all over the land who need the aid of Christian philanthropy. A denunciation of Mohammedans for their cruelty, while there is so much misery all about us unrelieved, shows that Christianity as well as Mohammedanism has its weak points, and dwells in a fragile house which cannot safely provoke stone-throwing.—*N. ## Poetry.

MY FREEDOM.

Oh joy! at last my soul is free!
In ruins lie its prison-bars!
My bark hath gained the open sea
And sails beneath the eternal stars!

I languish in the clutch no more
Of Superstition's palsied hands;
Behind me fades the narrow shore;
Beyond, the sea of Truth expands!

Henceforth no fettering, Church-wrought creed
The freedom of my thought shall chain!
The Truth alone my steps shall lead
Through Reason's limitless domain.

The awful nightmare of despair
Which first the trembling soul appals,
That sees old faiths dissolve in air,
And marks Tradition's crumbling walls,

Hath long since passed away with time;
Their wonted stroke my pulses keep,
While nearer on their course sublime
The coming waves of Freedom sweep.

Reproachful voices now are hushed;
The conflict's angry murmurs cease:
With dawning hope my sky is flushed,
And o'er me blow the airs of peace.

Not long can Dogma's gloomy night
In darkness hold its captive souls:
For ever into broadening light
The earth with sun-born impulse rolls.

ONLY A TRAMP.

"Only a tramp!" said the "star," as he found
At dim, early dawn, a man lying dead,
His face pinched and wan, eyes set with a stare,
"Died of starvation," the corner said.
Somebody's darling and somebody's son;
Somebody rocked him, a baby, to sleep;
Childhood and manhood forever are done;
Now there is no one who careth to weep.

Once he was young and ambitious, perchance;
Sought, like the rest, for both riches and place,
Perchance might the world have honored his name;
Now there is no one who knoweth his face.
But what careth Dives, pausing to gaze—
"A wretched, dead vagrant under the lamp."
Honors are his, wealth and fame are secure;
Besides, that dead body is—only a tramp!

Somewhere there may be a woman who waits;
She once was a bride—now wretched, alone,
Somewhere are children, too old for their years;
"We're cold and we're hungry," runneth their moan.
Is it their fault if their young foreheads wear
Blighting of hunger and poverty's stamp?
White were their souls as your darling's can be;
Are they to blame if their father's a tramp?

Perchance to your door last evening he came,
Asked for a crumb and to warm him a breath.
Coldly you shut all the comfort within—
Without there was naught but hunger and death.
And so laid him down; the chill, creeping on,
Stiffened his limbs, in his half left a damp.
Life's warfare is done, all chances are gone,
Whether used or abused—he was only a tramp!

No mourners for him, nor children nor wife;
On lips pale and cold no kisses are pressed;
A pine coffin only, no flower nor wreath
Tells of our love as we lay him to rest.
Lay him down softly, and make him a bed
In earth's kindly bosom, under the sod;
Life's been a failure, and we can but trust
His body to earth—his soul unto God.

Meanwhile, I bethink me, if Jesus were here,
To wander, as oft in Galilee old,
No roof for his head, though foxes have holes,
Who sometimes was hungry, sometimes was cold—
Should come to our door and ask for his bread,
Foot-sore and shabby with poverty's stamp,
Would we bid welcome to warmth and to cheer,
Or, shutting the door, say—"Only a tramp?"

CENTENNIAL CONGRESS OF LIBERALS.

EQUAL RIGHTS IN RELIGION: Report of the Centennial Congress of Liberals, and Organization of the National Liberal League, at Philadelphia, on the Fourth of July, 1876. With an Introduction and Appendix. Boston: Published by the National Liberal League. 1876. Pages 190. Price, in paper covers, $1.00; in cloth, $1.25.

The above Report contains a complete history of the Liberal League movement, a full report of the eight sessions of the Congress, lists of the contributors to the Congress fund and of the charter members of the National Liberal League, the Constitution and list of officers of the latter, extracts from letters by distinguished supporters of the movement, etc., etc. It also contains essays by F. E. Abbot on "The Liberal League movement; its Principles, Objects, and Scope"; by Mrs. C. B. Kilgore on "Democracy"; by James Parton on "Cathedrals and Beer; or, The Immorality of Religious Capitals"; by B. F. Underwood on "The Practical Separation of Church and State"; by C. F. Paige on the question, "Is Christianity Part of the Common Law?" by D. Y. Kilgore on "Ecclesiasticism in American Politics and Institutions"; and by C. D. B. Mills on "The Sufficiency of Morality as the Basis of Civil Society." Also, the "Address of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists to the Centennial Congress of Liberals," and the "Patriotic Address of the National Liberal League to the People of the United States." This book is the Centennial monument of American Liberalism, and must acquire new interest and importance every year as the record of the first organized demand by American freemen for the TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

All those who received the "Certificate of Membership of the Centennial Congress of Liberals," which was sent to the eight hundred persons who signed and returned the "application for membership," will receive this Report on forwarding ten cents to defray expenses. Others can receive it at the above-mentioned price by addressing the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

THE "RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT" PETITION.

At a public meeting held in Cambridge, Ohio, November 14, 1876, by the advocates of the Christian Amendment, Rev. J. P. Lytle, President of the Ohio State branch of the "National Reform Association," used this argument in favor of recognizing Christianity in the United States Constitution: "Mr. Lytle in his address pointed out the fact that the religious [Christian] amendment of the Constitution, so far from being a measure contemptible for the feebleness and weakness of its advocates, has been in principle indorsed and adopted by the Senate of the United States. In the School Amendment, as passed in the Senate last summer by a vote of nearly two to one, the necessity for some such Constitutional provision as we seek was confessed, and an attempt made to supply it which, if successful, would have been a long step toward the end we seek."

What Mr. Lytle said is only too true. The passage of some Constitutional amendment involving the whole question of State Christianization or State Secularization is certain in the not distant future. All friends of such an amendment as shall guarantee and protect Equal Rights in Religion by securing the Total Separation of Church and State are earnestly urged to circulate the petition of the National Liberal League to that effect. Printed petitions, all ready for circulation, will be sent to any one on receipt of a stamp for return postage. Address the National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

THE New Century for Woman had this among its paragraphs: "Society profits by every consideration that puts the sacred institution of marriage into clearer light and more deliberate acceptance. If it be, after all, as political economists tell us, very much a matter of statistics, dependent upon the price of a barrel of flour; if it be that the extravagant gauge of modern households forces more of prudent foresight of his responsibilities upon the modern man, by so much the more is it matter for congratulation that the modern woman takes her place intelligently as a contracting party; and though the old formula, 'Who giveth this woman in marriage unto this man?'—a relic of patriarchal days—still holds its place in the ritual, none the less is it certain that she, and none other, gives herself away. She has a higher standard than heretofore, not in vague fantasies of champion and hero, but in comprehension of her own requirements in a companionship for life."

SHALL THERE BE AN ARISTOCRACY OF ABCEDARIANS?

Mr. Wasson addresses to us a rhetorical question (to which he will please accept a negative answer) as follows:—

ARE WE YAHOOES?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Your correspondent, "C. M.," whose penetrating questions are printed and replied to in your number for March 15, is a man I would like to know. His questions are exceedingly well-put. It is not at all my purpose to come to his assistance; he is quite able to speak for himself. But upon one statement of yours I beg leave to remark. In answer to his third question you speak as follows: "If the law disfranchises a man simply because he cannot read and write, it does a very arbitrary and unjust act. The ignorant man has his equal rights, which will not be in the least regarded if he is stripped of political power."

Will not be in the least regarded! Are you, then, so firm a believer in total depravity? Do you assume that Hobbes' "state of nature," described as a "war of all upon all," is the permanent moral condition of mankind to be provided against by political arrangements? Is universal suffrage the necessary bridle upon the universal beast? I can understand you no otherwise. You seem to say that the rights of every man are protected, not by any honest respect for them on the part of the community generally, but solely by a political weapon in his own hands. Can any other construction be put upon your words? And what is this but to say that we are all Yahooes together? Do you, then, discover in your own breast the depraved egotism which you attribute to the American people at large? I should call it a vile calumny, were it said of you by another. But no man would have the hardihood to say it of you. You are very capable of a generous concern for others. Were there a class of men excluded from the polls by want of personal qualification, I am sure you would be particularly careful that they should suffer no wrong in consequence. But are you alone capable of this unselfish interest? You would be the last to pretend it. In short, I cannot accept your estimate of human nature, nor can believe that you will be able, upon a deliberate review, to accept it yourself.

Do you really believe that those people of Boston who can read wish to injure those who cannot do so, and would avail themselves of their opportunity accordingly? Do you indeed believe that, if the latter were not voters, the others would at once combine to oppress and prey upon them? Or can you name a single measure designed, and wisely designed, for the good of the most ignorant, which has ever originated with them and been resisted by the more educated? Where is the evidence in the history of Boston or of Massachusetts to support your assertion? What good has ignorant suffrage yet done? What are the rights it has saved from destruction? What the beneficial measures that owe to it their paternity? You are a professor of the scientific method, and so confident in your opinion that you venture to say, "All else is inhumanity and folly." I necessarily presume that you have a broad ground of observed fact, from which your induction has been made with the severe care and conscience of science. What are these facts, or some of them? If they exist, they have wholly escaped my observation. I was early interested in politics, and for the last ten years have given more study to political science, especially to its underlying ethical principles, than to any other subject, or than to all others together, perhaps. The matter is never far from my mind, and instances that bear upon it do not have to solicit my attention. I have met with many facts to show what evil ignorant suffrage does to the community; never with one to indicate that it is of benefit to the possessor. Absolutely, I know not of any one fact to render it in the remotest degree probable that the man who votes without being able to read his own ballot, and therefore without knowing for whom he votes, is, as a rule, made better, and not rather made worse, by his part in politics. Now, it would be easy for a writer with your pen to deliver himself of many effective paragraphs concerning the elevating influence which the franchise of such a man might, could, would, or should have upon its possessor. You will not, however, be tempted to escape into such declamation; for you know the difference between declamation and scientific induction. I desire to know from what facts, scientifically observed and verified, you have learned that, were a very moderate educational qualification for the franchise established, the rights of such as should prove too ignorant to stand the small test, would "not be in the least regarded" by the voting community? I desire to know from what determinate facts you have become assured that the ignorant voter is in any way whatever benefited by casting a vote, he knows not for whom nor to what effect. Of course, you practice the method you profess; and I beg you, be so good as to give me at least some clew to your induction. D. A. WASSON.

We regret the unnecessary heat and vehemence which Mr. Wasson brings to the discussion of a subject demanding the soberest, most dispassionate, and most unprejudiced consideration of the American people. Having said nothing which could justly provoke it, we are at a loss to understand the reason of his impetuosity. Although we make no scientific pretensions whatever, we shall endeavor to "practise the scientific method" at least so far as to avoid rhetorical extravagance and pointless reflections.

1. Because we said that "the ignorant man has his equal rights, which will not be in the least regarded if he is stripped of political power," Mr. Wasson indignantly accuses us of believing in "total depravity," of regarding mankind as "the universal beast," and teaching that "we are all Yahooes together." This is too wild for serious consideration. Let him be pacified: we bring no railing accusations, and repudiate those which he ventures to bring in our name. The sentence which inflames his ire means that whoever would disfranchise the ignorant man, and thereby strip him of all political power, in that very act disregards his equal rights as a citizen; but it does not mean that whoever would thus disfranchise him would forthwith proceed to murder, rob, or consciously "prey" upon him. Nevertheless, any community which begins by disfranchising a particular class is very apt, not through "total depravity," but through forgetfulness or ignorance or even mere lack of imagination, to neglect the interests of those who have no power to protect them. The worst wrongs of women, of children, of lunatics, of prisoners, grow out of the tendency of legislators not to do full justice to unrepresented and non-voting classes, and not to provide adequate protection for those who are politically powerless. Yet we are not therefore "all Yahooes together"; and to foist any such absurd inference upon us is as irrational as it would be for us, when Mr. Wasson expresses an opinion different from our own, to roar out in a rage: "Sir, do you call me a liar?" The world is at least old enough to have outgrown such an argument as that. It does Mr. Wasson great injustice.

2. But Mr. Wasson clearly implies that "the rights of every man are protected" by "honest respect for them on the part of the community." We agree with him to this extent, that no man's rights can be efficiently protected until the community do indeed honestly respect them. But that it is safe for any class of the community to trust its own interests and rights to a mere general sense of justice in a ruling power of which it is not itself a part,—that it is safe for the poor to let themselves be governed without political representation by the rich, or the many by the few, or the black by the white, or the weak by the strong, or the female by the male, or the taxpayer by the tax-spender, or the ignorant by the learned,—these are propositions which it is the glory of republicanism and of all modern civilization to deny.

All political power—that is, all right to make and enforce laws—belongs to the people as a whole, and must be exercised by the suffrage of the whole; adequate cause must be shown for excluding any part of the people from its exercise; and the burden of proof in establishing the justice of such exclusion must rest on him who would exclude. In this sense, suffrage is a natural right of the individual citizen,—that is, a political right resulting from the very nature of civil society as a political organism composed of individuals with equal personal rights. Republicanism or democracy, as a political theory, rests on the foundation of these ideas. But we doubt much whether Mr. Wasson accepts them as true. He at least thinks that there is adequate cause for excluding the ignorant from the polls; we do not, but we decline to assume the onus probandi in his stead. Let him show good and positive cause for disfranchising those who cannot read and write, and let him begin, not by asking us for fresh facts or fresh arguments, but by paying attention to those we have already presented. We are prepared to defend the ground we have taken, until convinced that it is mistaken. But we decline to be called upon for further arguments or facts until those already presented shall have been, first, understood, and, secondly, overthrown.

3. We discover no "depraved egotism" in our own "breast" (though sundry lynx-eyed critics discovered it there long ago); and we certainly discover none in Mr. Wasson. He would assuredly be solicitous to mete out justice to the ignorant man, even while withholding the ballot that is his right. We have repeatedly listened to him with great admiration, even if sometimes with dissent as great. We are no more than he in favor of "ignorant suffrage"—no more anxious to commit the destinies of this great nation to the control of unintelligence. But there are at least two methods of getting rid of "ignorant suffrage." "We claim to be a bitterer foe to illiteracy than he himself; for he is apparently willing to tolerate it, provided it be not enfranchised,—while we would not suffer it to survive, either enfranchised or disfranchised, within the limits of the republic, but would exterminate the pest by a "compulsory education" system that shall be something better than a sham. There is call for a close comparison of the respective merits of these different remedies for the evils of ignorant suffrage; but one must first take the trouble to understand them both. So far, in fact, are we from "depraved egotism" in this matter that we are not even egotistic enough to suppose ourselves capable of governing the community, or any part of it, half so wisely or justly as the classes concerned could govern themselves, however ignorant they may be. We are not egotistic enough to imagine that, because we can read and write, we have become thereby endowed with a divine right to cast the illiterate man's ballot in his stead. We are not egotistic enough to fancy that he is unable to see some very important things which may be hidden from our own eyes. On the contrary, we are sufficiently humble to distrust our own capacity to take any man's rights out of his own hands and do better by him than he can do by himself; and we do not admire the officiousness of any class of the people who are anxious to relieve everybody else of the responsibilities of freemen. The best use to which we have been able to put the alphabet has been to learn that no aristocracy, not even an aristocracy of abecedarians, is as competent to govern the whole people as the whole people is to govern itself.

4. "What good has ignorant suffrage yet done?" That is not the question. We have not pleaded for ignorant suffrage,—no, not by a word. But we have said that the country will not get rid of ignorant suffrage by establishing an abecedarian test. Does Mr. Wasson imagine that it will? The object of our articles has been to expose this quack nostrum of an abecedarian test altogether, and to point out a real and honest remedy in a wisely-planned and well-administered system of compulsory education. We pointedly decline to be put, in defiance of our explicit statements, into the attitude of defending ignorant suffrage. We insist on being understood as aiming to explode this delusive educational test, and as advocating a radical, efficient remedy for illiterate suffrage by the abolition of illiteracy itself.

5. "You are a professor of the scientific method, and so confident in your opinion that you venture to say, 'All else is inhumanity and folly.'" Mr. Wasson is so careless as seemingly to apply these quoted words to the "scientific method." What we applied them to will appear by giving the quotation in full: "Do nothing to foster the increase of the 'dangerous classes'; seek rather to absorb them in the community by raising them to self-respect, to knowledge, to industry, to happiness. That is statesmanship; everything else is inhumanity and folly." Will Mr. Wasson "venture to say" anything contrary to that?

6. The "clew" to our "induction" which Mr. Wasson asks for is not far to seek; it is before him in the articles already printed. We shall be encouraged to say more when what we have already said has been understood and digested. The above letter shows that he has read these articles in the most superficial and inattentive manner; we will not do him the injustice of taking him at his word, when he declares that he "can understand" us "no otherwise" than by uttering nonsense about "Yahoos" and the "universal beast." He can certainly understand us, if he tries, to be saying something worthy of his most strict attention. Let him grapple with the subject in good earnest, and he will find that the position we take cannot be shaken by mere rhetorical flippancies, or satirical allusions to the scientific method, or the reckless confounding of an argument for the abolition of all illiteracy with an argument on behalf of ignorant suffrage. Mr. Wasson's "understanding" is not so feeble as he represents; he is a highly-intellectual, finely-cultivated, and rarely-gifted man, and we shall be glad to publish his keenest criticism of our position, if he will but first take the little pains necessary to understand it.

RELIGION IN THE PINE WOODS.

One Sunday morning in February, as fair a morning as ever comes in New England in May, I set out from my inn in pursuit of a church in the North Carolina woods. In our drives through the country I had seen one—a plain, unpainted, wooden structure, standing at the meeting of four roads in a native grove of magnificent oaks,—that seemed to have special attractions on such a morning. The air was just crisp enough to make a walk inviting, yet so warm as to make even a thin overcoat burdensome. What was the theology of the meeting-house or whether its congregation was white or black, I was ignorant. I only knew that it was fair for situation. Two or three miles over hills and valleys and through cathedral forests brought me to the spot. To my surprise it was as solitary as I had seen it on any week-day. Evidently there was to be no service; at least, not in the morning. One door, however, had but a slight fastening and I ventured in. The unpainted seats and pulpit of pine, the whitewashed walls, the perfect simplicity of the whole, told me that it was a Baptist or Methodist conventicle, after the primitive fashion of those sects. There was not the slightest attempt at decoration, and its only glory was in the blue heavens that arched over its solitude and the old oaks that stretched their arms around it.

But I was not to be cheated of the service which I had come out to seek. On my way, a half-mile or more back, I had noticed, a little off the main road, in a pine woods, a humbler house of logs, around which a few colored folks were gathering. This, I said, is probably their church, and I will go back to the service there. And right glad was I of this change of fortune, for as soon as I approached I saw there was promise of unusual interest. The building itself was unique in its fascinations for a New Englander. It was of pine logs, the interstices being filled with the reddish clay of the neighborhood. Portions of the bark still remained on the logs, and the structure, having been put up within a year, was still redolent of the pleasant pine odor. This was its natural incense. The benches were pine slabs with the bark side down, and mostly without backs, and the pulpit almost as rude in its structure. The windows were innocent of glass, and were only orifices about two feet square, covered with wooden shutters, two or three of which, as well as the door, were left open to let in the necessary light. The roof was also of pine slabs, and not so tight but that some spots of sky could be seen through it, and some rays of sunshine streamed down upon the congregation. No paint nor plaster covered the log walls within more than without. Nor did stove or fire of any kind infect the natural atmosphere of the place. Just in front of the house, on a low pile of stones, a fire was burning in the open air, at which the early comers who rode might warm their feet or fingers and enjoy a social conference before the service. It was a good symbol of an altar. An awning of pine boughs covered the space between this and the front door, under which rude seats were also arranged to receive the overflow of the congregation. The building itself would hold, packed as it was this day, at least one hundred and fifty people—perhaps two hundred.

The minister, a wide-awake-looking colored man of about forty years, soon discovered the stranger in his fold, and soon too, got out of him the secret that he also sometimes tried to preach. I found it quite useless to attempt to make him understand the theological differences between us, for he seemed guiltless of any theology except his own; appeared to have heard of no one more liberal than Henry Ward Beecher. I courteously declined, however, his courteous invitation to preach then and there, for to have been compelled to hear my own voice would have been a worse disappointment than the silence of the other church. So the minister himself preached and performed most of the service, I only assenting to take a seat by his side. He had evidently little knowledge of books; stumbled a good deal over some of the long words in his reading of the Bible, and sometimes, it was apparent, did not take in the meaning of the sentences. But when he came to the sermon he showed considerable power of language and no little natural eloquence. As one of his flock said to me before the service, "He was a right smart preacher." He was earnest and held the close attention of his hearers, who clearly had a great liking for him. At times he became quite excited and boisterous, and then the people readily responded with "Amen," and some of the women came very near going into trances. The discourse, however, had few of the characteristic features of the best negro preaching. It savored too much of imitation of white folks' preaching, as did also the singing, thoroughly to satisfy me, though it was enjoyable. The preacher was Methodist, I discovered, and his sermon, the subject of which was courage and strength in the heart to serve God, was run in the mould of the ordinary Evangelical theology. The only application of the subject was to the one step of "getting religion" and keeping it to the end,—namely, death. Not a word did the preacher have to say about these great qualities of trust, courage, and the strong heart in the daily habits and doings of life.

Yet he quickly took the hint of such an application from some words that I dropped, when I could not refrain from accepting his renewed invitation to speak, just for the sake of pointing the way to an application of the doctrine of the discourse to the common affairs of life,—to education, industry, struggle with poverty, bad habits, etc. For then he took up the subject again in just that line, and made some most excellent remarks on what was required in the matter of education. He became both pertinent and personal; told them that there were men among them who, if they would save the money they spent for whiskey, could send their children to school with it four months every year, and that there were women there who could do the same with the money they might save by leaving off dipping snuff. And he proved it to them by a plain example in arithmetic.

After the service the minister and his daughters brought out their lunch-basket and offered its hospitality to me. The people mostly appeared to have brought somewhat of refreshments with them, for they would linger an hour or two yet in the beautiful grove. I could not decline this simple form of communion,—which was not a tradition, but had the heart of a living fellowship.

The two thoughts that especially remained with me as I walked homeward towards the westering sun, were, first, what a mighty power the colored preachers have over their people; and, secondly, what a misfortune that this power is not more enlightened, and turned in this civil exigency into the practical directions where the colored people of the South now so greatly need wise assistance. Here, in this simple, hearty congregation of worshippers in the woods, were excellent emotions, pure aspirations, true instincts. What was needed was light, knowledge. These people can be best reached through their own ministers at present. But cannot philanthropy devise some agencies more efficient than any now in operation for reaching and enlightening the colored ministers in the South?

THE INCENTIVES TO MORALITY IN LIBERALISM.

I was particularly out of sorts that day; and yet I ought not to have been, for it was one of those bright invigorating days, with cloudless skies and crisp, bracing air, of which we had so many in February, and which were so expressive of joy in Nature that one felt almost a churl to refuse to be in sympathy with it. But there had been an unfortunate combination of news coming to me from different sources for a day or two previously, which had caused me to feel as if the world was more than usually awry. Several people, of whom I expected better things, had gone astray and disappointed me. The more I tried to reconcile the things that were with the things I had hoped for, the more my brain became confused and the harder my head and heart ached. I took a sudden resolution; I would escape from these distressing thoughts by immediate contact with Nature. I would take a walk.

My walk led me by the abode of my friend Gloriana. I was too deeply absorbed in thought to look up as I was passing, until a tap at the window arrested my attention. I looked up then to see Gloriana's bright face framed in one of the squares of glass. She beckoned me impatiently to come in, and opened the door for me herself as I ascended the steps.

"Come in, and defend your faith, Amie," was her greeting; "the new faith—Isn't that what you call it?"

"From what or from whom shall I defend it?" I asked.

"From Christine and myself—and a letter, or the writer of a letter," was the reply. Christine was there, then! She had evidently just arrived and was reading a letter; and her expressive face showed that she was in full sympathy and accord with the spirit of the writer; but it was a pained sympathy, a sad accord, I felt, as she raised her tear-moistened eyes to me in greeting.

"Whose is the letter, yours, or Christine's, or mine?" I asked; "and who is the writer?"

"The letter is addressed to me," replied Gloriana, "and is from my friend Olive B—, who visited me last summer, you remember, and who so strongly disapproved of my investigating tendencies. She is a more belligerent Christian than our friend Christine, here, and in her correspondence with me never fails to attack whatever weak point she finds, or thinks she finds, in 'so-called liberalism' (that is her expression, not mine, remember, Amie), a mode of procedure which I, of course, approve of and encourage, since I am still 'halting between two opinions,' yours and Christine's. In this letter her arraignment of the new religion is more than usually grave and severe. I had just referred the case to Christine, and was wishing for your aid in the discussion of the pros and cons of the question which is raised by it, when, fortunately, I caught sight of you going past. Now let me read to you that part of the letter relating the case."

And taking the letter from Christine she read as follows:—

"I have just had an illustration of the dangerous tendencies of your 'new faith' brought home to me in a bitter way by a visit to the home of a dear brother whom I have not seen for years, and who, it seems, in the meantime has become a convert to liberalism. You never knew my brother Harold, Gloriana, but he was a noble, brave, intellectual, and manly fellow, of whom we were all proud, and of whom we anticipated great things. He was brought up, as we all were, very religiously, and he was himself a consistent member of our church until he grew to manhood and entered the army, serving his country well and faithfully until her time of need was passed. Then he resumed the law practice which he had given up at the call of patriotism, married a lovely, lovable, and intellectual woman, and moved West. Since then I have known very little about him until I made up my mind to visit him this winter. Ah me! what a disappointment has this visit been to me. I find my once strictly moral and conscientious brother a frequenter of liquor-sal ones, a devotee of the billiard-table, an attendant of theatres and balls, often out till very late, leaving his wife a prey to gloomy fears and forebodings; and he is slowly breaking her heart and spirit, not by positive unkindness (he is incapable of anything like cruelty or unkindness), but because she sees so plainly whereto these lax habits are tending. He is not in anything really wicked, but is a victim to the invidious growth of bad morals, needing reformation sadly, but resenting any intimation that he is in need of reform. His wife sees and feels this keenly, but loves him too well to venture to take any decided action to bring him 'about face' to right doing again, for fear of losing his love or hurting his feelings. Worst of all, he has four fine boys on whose characters his example must have an evil influence. I, as in sisterly duty bound, have several times ventured to speak to him of the danger and folly of his course, but the result has been only a cold avoidance of me on his part, and I see plainly that I can do no good in that way. I pray for him daily, but with a knowledge of his peculiar views I am afraid I do not pray in faith. Now you are wondering what all this has to do with liberalism. Well, this once pious brother of mine has made what he calls a scholarly investigation of theology, and, being convinced of its errors, loves to proclaim himself a liberal; and you cannot blame me if I connect my brother's fall from a strictly conscientious course of life to his present dissipated habits to his loss of faith in the religion of his childhood. At least, is there anything in liberalism or free religion to reach and reform these cases? That this is often done by the churches which the freethinker so decries, you must admit. They are caught up, as it were, in a whirlwind of repentance, and quit at once and forever their evil habits and lax mode of life. They are made over into attentive husbands, faithful fathers, and good citizens. Oh, my friend, abide by the Church which has power to reform,—which all your boasted freedom of thought fails to do."

"That is one of the strongest props of my faith in the Christian religion," assented Christine, as Gloriana finished reading,—"this great power of moral reform."

"And I must confess that the lack of strong moral incentive in liberalism has been one of the greatest hindrances to my full faith in its intellectual conclusions," added Gloriana.

"And my confession is," said I with a sigh, "that the great moral weakness and imperfection of human nature, the constant necessity for strong moral incentives to reform, has been one of the greatest drawbacks to my belief in any overruling or interfering Providence such as Christianity professes to believe in. The Church gets credit for a great deal of reformatory work which it is not entitled to. It has had eighteen centuries in which to perfect the morality of the world, and how much has it accomplished toward that result? If it were so strong a reformatory engine as it professes to be, it ought, at the very least, to have made all the believers in its doctrines men and women of the highest moral character."

"Well, and does it not do that Amie?" gently urged Christine; "are not all church-members persons at least expected to be of the best moral character? Is not every one who is known to be of questionable repute at once turned out of the church, and their names stricken off its records?"

"Yes, that is true," I went on; "but the church membership is no true standard by which to judge the number of believers in Christianity, for the church-members do not form a tithe of the believers on whom so reformatory a belief should do its pure and perfect work. It is just by this careful winnowing and sifting process that the Church is able to build itself up upon so magnificent a sophism. Only the best disposed Christians, only those persons who have inherited or achieved by self-culture a desire for the good and true, are accepted out of the great mass of Christian believers to be called to the 'inner sanctuary' of church membership. But the multitude of outside Christians who countenance and aid Christianity by money, work, and undoubting assent to its teachings and dogmas, who are just as truly Christians as such men as the one referred to in this letter is a freethinker,—does the Church hold itself responsible for the vast amount of immorality and crime which may be and is among them? If not, why then should liberalism be chargeable with the weaknesses or immoralities of its mere professing believers? What we have to discuss is the relative power of these two intellectual forces to mould and train rightly the human race into habits of the highest importance to the welfare of the coming man and woman."

"But really, Amie," said Christine in a tone of surprise, "do you not think that Christianity will have by far the strongest argument to put forward in such a discussion,—Christianity with its assured immortality; its heaven of reprisal and reward to put hope into the hearts of the tired and discouraged ones of earth; its threat of punishment to the cowardly wicked; its promise of present love, sym-thy, and help from the ever watchful Father, to the despairing and disconsolate; its assurance of the companionship of our loved and lost in the beyond?"

"In all these things which you hold up as the glory of your religion, Christine, do you not see that the central idea of all is a constant appeal to a coarse selfishness? Its heaven is one where you are to be supremely happy because you personally are safe and provided for, where you are to sing and shout hosannas to the Lord who, with power to save, lets your weaker brother or sister slip down to the gates of hell, and slip into hell itself; who punishes weakness and inability to see things in an Orthodox light with a cruel torture which has revenge and not reform for its end. The promise held up to the faithful of 'present help in time of need,' is a promise never fulfilled save in imagination. The hope of meeting again with our beloved is not asserted, nor is it denied by those who build their hopes only on the sure foundation of what they know. It is a selfish ideal throughout; that is, it teaches us to be selfish. In all the highest idealisms of mankind, self-abnegation, a pure unselfishness of action, wins our highest praise and touches nearest our ideal of true glory. It is the story of Christ's unselfish sacrifice that throws the greatest halo around Christianity, and it is unselfish morality which is the highest lesson being taught to-day by liberalism. To deny one's self present pleasures, to overcome inherited weakness of character and will by force of moral courage, not for present or personal gratification, but that our children and our children's children may inherit from us only the best humanity, the highest perfected manhood and womanhood,—that is the lesson the new faith teaches; that is liberalism's incentive to morality."

"Ah, that is glorious!" exclaimed Gloriana, her dark eyes kindling; "if that was what liberalism really meant, I could at once accept it. But so many pervert freethought into immorality and a right to seek only their own selfish good! Now in this case of my friend's brother—be, it seems, takes the coarse materialistic view that this life is all the life we are to have; therefore he has a right to enjoy that life in any way that is most easy and agreeable to himself; that he must 'eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die'; and what incentive has he to act otherwise?"

"I am afraid that he and such as he have only looked at one aspect of the new philosophy. He has become convinced of the inconsistencies of Christianity without caring to understand clearly the new duties laid upon him by acceptance of the religion of evolution. If he fully understood those duties, he would not dare encourage in himself ways of life which will not only work harm to himself in debilitated his physical system and weakening his brain-force, by making his home-life, which should be sweet and harmonious, discordant and jarring. But the sadness and depression which his actions have brought upon the mind of his wife, as well as the weakness of body and brain he has brought upon himself, will be sure to be repeated by the unyielding laws of heredity, not only in the minds, characters, and bodies of those four fine boys of which he is the father, and as many more children as shall be born to him, but those evils will be renewed perpetually in all their descendants. To the real thinker such knowledge as this must brace him to self-reform or sink him to self-contempt."

Christine shook her head with a smile of tenderest pity for my delusions, as she said:—

"Ah, my friend, you hope too much from poor, frail humanity. Not in his own strength is it possible for man to overcome his corrupt nature."

"That may be, Christine," observed Gloriana, whose beautiful eyes were just now lustrous with wistful longing; "but the idea is nevertheless a grand one. I wish we could so perfect ourselves as to work unselfishly for humanity at large. It is a work, too, in which the humblest of us could take part."

And I, catching a little her enthusiasm, repeat from Winwood Reade:—

"All men indeed cannot be poets, inventors, or philanthropists; but all men can join in that gigantic and god-like work, the progress of creation. Whoever improves his own nature improves the universe of which he is a part. He who strives to subdue his evil passions—vile remnants of the old four-footed life—and who cultivates the social affections,—he who endeavors to better his condition, and to make his children wiser and happier than himself,—whatever may have been his motives, will not have lived in vain."

With that our discussion rested; and I took my departure—and my deferred walk—from which I returned home in a more cheerful frame of mind; but whether that was a result of my walk or our talk I am not sure. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

It may seem only a trifle which now and then I am able to send you concerning the progress of liberalism in Milwaukee; but every indication, however slight, that betokens progress at all, I send speeding across the country, sure of its generous welcome to the hospitable columns of THE INDEX.

There have been no Moody and Sankey shows in our city this season, which, I take it, is a good sign, although the Orthodox churches are, I believe, flourishing after their usual fashion. The usual number of fairs, festivals, church concerts, and the like, have been in order to promote their financial affairs; so I fancy they are not altogether paying institutions.

We have had regular lectures in the Popular Sunday Course, which have been well attended whenever the programme presented enough attraction to draw. The society made the mistake of engaging lecturers through a Bureau, and the consequence has been that third-rate talent, or less, has been foisted upon the community, advertised as first-rate, and the financial matters of the society do not stand as well as at the same date last season. There is little doubt, however, that the Sunday Lecture will become a permanent institution. Experience will give wisdom to the directors, and eventually the public may hope to receive a higher order of platform instruction than is just now offered in a course which aims solely at popularity. Literary treats have been furnished by the society at the low price of twenty cents admission, which compare more than favorably with long-established lecture courses with prices at fifty cents and one dollar.

The Liberal League is not dead, as might be assumed from the long period which has passed since last heard from. Its members were active in a very quiet way in getting a bill before the legislature for the taxation of church property. This bill, all glory to Wisconsin legislators, was ably advocated, and lost by only a very small majority.

A noticeable feature in the legislature this winter has been the absence of any appointed chaplain. In the reporters' column of legislative matter we have seen such notes as these: "The session was opened without prayer"; "No praying done to-day"; "Rev. ——— assailed the Lord for the benefit of the members"; etc., etc. This is quite a significant straw, to be blown from the stack of superstitions, and shows which way the breath of public opinion is veering.

At the celebration of Thomas Paine's birthday anniversary, held in the German Turner Hall, Rev. G. E. Gordon, of the Unitarian society, read an admirable paper on the "Political and Religious Character of Thomas Paine." It was a fine effort, temperate in tone, placing this much-abused man in a just and pleasing light. The courage of Mr. Gordon, who in the teeth of lingering prejudices endeavored to remove from the public mind the stigma which prejudice branded upon the name of a man and a patriot whom a nation should remember with honor, can scarcely be mentioned in terms too commendatory. A minister presenting the virtues of Thomas Paine, at a public festival in a public hall, is an innovation that seems almost miraculous, in the thought of one who well remembers that thirty years ago a "Tom Paine supper," as it was styled, was looked upon in a community as the culmination of vulgar wickedness. Men who participated in the festivities were hardly considered good citizens, and were the subjects of prayers from the pulpits. Were a lady to have attended such a place, she would have been tabooed from all respectable society. In fact, although I was very young, I well remember a lady, who must have been as brave as she was in advance of all her peers, who did attend such a supper. Her lover discarded her, and the village women all gave her a cold shoulder. At the risk of a somewhat uncalculated episode, I will relate further of this lady that she afterward married an ordinary but upright young man, and emigrated to the then far West. The record of her life ran henceforth to the same measure as did that of Maud Muller. This glorious woman, rusted under the drudgery of farm-life, without books or papers, who had given such promise in her early womanhood as is seldom seen, shunned as that most awful of anomalies, an "infidel woman,"—this accomplished lady, who had read exhaustively and thought broadly, coming to conclusions that are too common nowadays to be noticeable, after the struggle for existence on an Illinois prairie, lapsed into a careless, almost crude woman without incentive to improvement; too worn and hopeless for intellectual effort.

This little story tells in stronger language than I could otherwise speak of the strides which freethought has taken in the last quarter of a century. It is possible to-day for the name of a noted infidel to be remembered and honored in a mixed assemblage of ladies and gentlemen. To-day a lady of refinement, and greatly respected, writes a popular book entitled the Heroines of Freethought. In those other days the reputation of a lady was sacrificed because she dared be a "heroine of freethought."

Science has had a fair showing in our city this season. Among our own citizens we have men capable of giving first-class lectures on scientific subjects, who are broad and liberal in their views and are thus in various ways educating the public thought.

Then we have been furnished with courses of scientific lectures by two eminent teachers, Prof. Edward S. Morse and Prof. Gunning. Prof. Gunning is throwing bomb-shells of new thought throughout the West, making sad havoc with old religious and social opinions.

Prof. Morse paid a high compliment to his Milwaukee audience, and it deserved it. It was an audience of attentive, thoughtful people, so much in sympathy with the scientist that he could not help answering to it by his finest effort, and by a freer expression of his evolution theories than is possible with an ordinary assemblage.

To conclude: our newspapers are gradually becoming freed from the policy which fancies it can only please by being "cheerful toward prejudices." Their columns are opened to discussion on subjects hitherto denied it, and fair reports are given of all meetings and lectures of a secular as well as of a religious character. In large cities where this course has become common the value of this forward step can hardly be appreciated. A timorous press is one of the serious drawbacks to progress which every provincial town must endure; and "it is easy to understand," as John Morley says in his book on Compromise, "the reaction of this intellectual timorousness upon the minds of ordinary readers, who have too little natural force and too little cultivation to be able to resist the narrowing and deadly effect of the daily iteration of poor, short-sighted common-places."

To note a straw in connection with the press is a pleasant task. There is less to be feared from craven priests than a cowardly press.

While writing these concluding words, the intelligence comes of the appointment of Carl Schurz to the Cabinet of the new President. As Mr. Schurz is indisputably a Wisconsin man and a representative radical, a bit of exultation will, I trust, be excusable. One of our morning journals raises the objection to this appointment that Carl Schurz is an "open and avowed infidel, and that there will be no God injected into the Constitution by his leave." Very good! I am almost ready to forgive President Hayes for consenting to the country's cooperative praying on Sunday last in consideration of his appointment of Carl Schurz.

THE "SHAKER" DOCTRINE OF THE SABBATH.

A LETTER FROM ELDER EVANS.

What is it? "God did rest, the Sabbath day, from all his works. He rested and was refreshed." How did he rest? Was he tired? He that is entered, into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his. How did God cease from working? Had Jesus given them rest, he would not afterwards have spoken of another day—another Sabbath. "There remaineth, therefore, a rest, or Sabbath, for the people of God," yet to come. Jesus gave to his followers no Sabbath day. When himself and disciples broke the Jewish Sabbath, Jesus justified it. We do good on the Sabbath, and so will ye also, when it suits your selfish convenience. "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath." Jesus was Lord of the true Sabbath.

The Centennial Commissioners admitted thousands each Sabbath day. They excluded the masses, to whom the Exposition belonged, and who had as good a right as the Commissioners to be their own judges of what comported with their own welfare. It was a national affair—a World's Fair. As this nation is composed of all theological sectarians on earth, each day is a Sabbath, held sacred by some of its people. The American government is no more Christian than Hindu, and has no constitutional right to teach or enforce any form of theology, nor to appoint a theological Sabbath. It was insulting the people of the whole world to invite them to a World's Exhibition, and then compel them, at great expense, to lose one day in seven, observing a Sabbath, not their own—and then have to keep their own Sabbath, or be irreligious.

As a people, an order, our existence is assured only so long as the government remains unsectarian, separate from all theology, just as Jefferson and Paine created and left it,—a civil government.

The Shaker Church, or dispensation, is "the Sabbath of the Lord—the Sabbath of Jesus." It includes the short-time Sabbaths of the Jews, one day in seven, one month in seven, and one year in seven, and then the Jubilee, typical of the dispensation wherein there should be no poverty, the land and labor being in common. At the Jubilee of Jubilees, or Sabbath of Sabbaths, the land returned to its proper owners—the people,—men, women, and children. A general bankrupt law released all debtors, and slaves were made land-owners. The radical principle revealed by Jehovah, that land was no more property than sea, air, or sunshine, was operative in the short-time Sabbaths. Shakerism is Lord of the short-time Sabbaths,—swallows them up. It is a long-time perpetual Sabbath, a day of rest from selfish property and its concomitant curses. The truth, the good, this blessing of Gospel brotherhood and sisterhood, ultimatum in Pentecostal love, the law of life, the Pentecostal Church. This was the man-child which the dragon, Rome, the first beast, coming up out of the sea, destroyed from earth. The murderous Emperor Constantine set up in its stead an anti-Christian kingdom, likened to a bear, lion, and leopard. It was a Church-and-State system of rights, ceremonies, dogmas, creeds, and a Sunday, with other days of saints and martyrs innumerable, as now observed by Catholics; marriage, war, land monopoly, religious persecution, the inquisition, and the misery to the poor, consequent upon the abrogation of even the short-time Sabbaths that, under the law did provide for a day, a month, a year, and then during the Jubilee, all the substantial necessities and comforts of life, by universal possession and enjoyments of the earth, for a time leaving the all things common of the Pentecostal Church entirely out of sight of the poor, as being utterly impracticable on earth.

The second beast—Protestantism—came up out of the earth, copying all the evils of the first, and omitting nearly all the good of the short-time Sabbaths of the Jews, and many of the doctrines and practices of the Primitive Christian Church. Then we have the Protestant Puritan Sabbath, Thanksgiving, and Christmas, stuffing those who have and starving those who have not,—a purely ceremonial day, no Sabbath at all, nay, not even the shadow of one. Anti-Christ has reigned and made desolate. All is Babylon, a permanent religious panic. "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and receive not of her plagues, her seven plagues," was the call of God to Mother Ann and her followers, no less than to the rationalists, infidels to Babylon theology, sceptics of all kinds, those who had "wondered after the beast or his image." Through the more spiritual elements, these latter were first called by the Gospel to found the first cycle of the new heavens. The former class were called by the same spirit, at the same time, to found the first cycle of the new earthly governments—the government of the United States. The earth had to be redeemed, as a basis for the new heavens to rest upon, and as a source of supply of members, by which alone a celibate order could be supported. Is it consistent, or would it be right, for followers of the first and second beast—Sectarians—to bring into Zion the prejudices and persecuting spirit of religious bigots against the infidels to false theology and its damnable effects upon mankind? It is an error to be eradicated. Each of these parties has some truths the other needs, and each has some errors to be shaken off.

Hume, Voltaire, Humboldt, Tyndall, Paine, Jefferson, Franklin, and their fellows, search for God in Nature, in man. Their religion was, and is, to do good to all men; to kill no human being, nor even to torture them. Voltaire caused the abolition of torture in France as applied to witnesses. Paine sought to abolish capital punishment and war, and voted in the French Assembly to kill the King, but to spare the man, Louis.

The infidel class in America have effected the abolition of imprisonment for debt, caused homestead bills to be passed, and secured the freedom of the public lands to actual settlers, given women protection in property to some extent,—have done good, and nothing but good. Lincoln, an infidel, signed the Emancipation Act. What have the religious, Orthodox party of America to show of practical, national good done on earth? Have they not opposed every good measure for redeeming the earth, from that of land limitation to the abolition of slavery? Is not their selfish, cruel oppression enough to make men mad? The Orthodox party did make men mad by their crusades and St. Bartholomew massacres, their inquisition, religious wars, and persecutions. Is not all the blood shed upon earth of Babylon—Church and State—religion? And God gave her blood to drink in the American and French Revolutions,—a reaction of humanity against the ecclesiastical, theological tyranny and oppression of past ages. Paul said to the Galatians: "I stand in doubt of you—ye observe days, and months, and times, and seasons. The son of man is Lord of all these." Having been called into the Gospel with its increasing cross, they preferred the shadow to the substance. They would rather pay a tenth than sacrifice all their property,—preferred being circumcised to living a virgin life. It was easier to give eye for eye, tooth for tooth, than be non-resistant, or return good for evil. The anti-Christian world would much sooner keep a Puritanical, artificial Sabbath-day than abolish slavery, forgive debts, or undo heavy burdens and let the oppressed poor go free. Even the New England Sabbath-day keeping, with the non-observance of dietetic and preceptive laws, enjoined by Moses, is likely to end in the extinction of the Yankee race. Two children to three families indicates a lack of blessing somewhere. This New England Gospel is not equal to the law of types and shadows of the true Gospel.

In short, there is no objection to the civil government's appointing a non-theological day of rest; neither is there any objection to peoples observing any day as a theological Sabbath, as do the Jews. And believers, like Friends, may regard as sacred any time set apart for spiritual and religious observance. But they should never lose sight of the fact that the Gospel is full salvation from the multifarious sins of the world—is the great jubilee of jubilees—the Sabbath of Sabbaths—the Sabbath of Jesus.

THE WOMAN QUESTION.

EDITOR INDEX:—

I am pleased to see the woman question discussed by editor and correspondents in THE INDEX. I can see but one course for liberal people to take, and that is to favor the equal rights of women with men. As to the elective franchise, the only question is: "Is it just that women should vote?" If it is, then they should vote without regard to consequences.

The denial of the ballot has always been put on the ground that those deserving it are incapable of using it. That is the argument of despots. I feel sure that, if the women could vote to-day just as they are they would vote God into the Constitution; but they cannot vote to-day, and if liberals are true to their principles, the women will learn, or the most intelligent ones will learn by the time they get the franchise, who their friends are politically.

As I heard Wendell Phillips say once: "Do justice though the heavens fall, and you will find that the heavens will not fall." So I would say: "Do justice to the women though they vote God into the Constitution, and they will not vote God into that instrument."

One thing is evident: the Christian Church will never allow women equal rights with men. Recently a number of the Christian denominations have had the question under discussion, and have all so far decided against women. The best proceedings of the kind that I have seen I cut from the Sun of to-day which is as follows:—

NOW THE BAPTISTS TAKING UP A SUBJECT THAT HAS DISTURBED THE METHODISTS.

The Rev. William Hayne Leavell, pastor of the Stanton Street Baptist Church, read an essay in the Baptist ministers' meeting yesterday, entitled, "Shall women participate in the public exercises of the church?" He said that in order to appreciate the prohibition by Paul, the manner of primitive worship should be considered. Worship was spontaneous; persons took part according to their ability to edify and entertain. Two rules were of binding force,—non-interference with the services, and the edification of the whole church and not of single individuals. In such meetings about which Paul gives special directions, women are plainly prohibited from a public exercise of their gifts. The Apostle says first that there shall be no insubordination of the established order and usages. Then he says particularly, "Let your women keep silence in the churches." He says, also, that it is not permitted unto them to speak, "inasmuch as it manifests a spirit of independence at war with the social position to which God has assigned them." Women are here required to occupy a position secondary to that of man, "for it is innum-bent on them to be under obedience," according to the plain teachings of the law. "And if they will learn anything," says Paul, "let them ask their husbands at home." The Apostle goes further and makes an appeal to the public sense of propriety, saying, "For it is a shame for women to speak in the church." As the peculiar power and influence of women depend on their being the objects of admiration and affection, anything that tends to lower women in the estimation of men should be avoided. In the first epistle to Timothy, Paul says:—

"Let women learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. For Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression."

These interdictions are upheld by four of the ablest of modern critics,—Alford, Angus, Hodge, and Lange. Women are, however, not enjoined from laboring in and for the church. There are many ways in which women may exercise their gifts and influence for Christ without putting themselves in a position in which they will be subject to unfavorable criticism.

The ministers, after listening attentively to the essay, made no comment.

STATE SECULARIZATION AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The cause of woman's suffrage has long lain very near my heart. I believed that, granted this right pertaining to her as an individual, she would have larger incentive and wider opportunity to develop the mind which she has inherited equally with her brother man. Until within a few years, save in rare instances, women have been servants and drudges, or pets and playthings. With the power to vote, I thought she would necessarily be led to inform herself upon the vital questions which lie at the foundation of true liberty.

I heard an ordinarily intelligent woman, not long since, express herself with surprise that "any intelligent man can take an interest in politics. I do not read the papers; I am tired of the very name of politics; and as for enthusiasm it is positively childish!"

It is only too true that the present state of political trickery and "wire-pulling" presents to all upright people a disgusting appearance. Yet I have faith to believe that the right is slowly evolving from the mass of corruption; that in God's good time not only a green shoot but a stately and vigorous tree will rear its head in the pure air, whose fruit shall bless the nations. It has been hard for me to give up the hope of seeing woman suffrage established soon. A few years ago it seemed as if it were near at hand. But when I witness the apathy of women themselves, their utter indifference as a class, and, worse than all, their illogical devotion to their Church, I not only begin to think the time far-off, but I conscientiously question the expediency of giving to women their just right until State Secularization be effected.

A Democrat informed me, a few days since, that the reason Republicans oppose woman suffrage is because nearly all women are Democrats! I for one do not believe this. But I am personally acquainted with but two women who would work for State Secularization as a preliminary to woman suffrage.

It is, of course, a matter of small moment whether I record my individual convictions or not. But I could not resist the wish to express my hearty assent to the truths which Mr. Abbot has so admirably presented in "Woman Suffrage and State Secularization" published in THE INDEX of February 15,—and I wish to ask how many women can and will join with me in the following resolutions; namely:—

Whereas, Woman should enjoy the right of suffrage equally as an individual with man; but, since the Christian Church has ever opposed and will continue to oppose equal individual rights,—and since the Secularization of the State affords the only sure means of establishing such rights on a just and permanent basis,—therefore,

Resolved, That we will uphold and work for, by every means in our power, State Secularization, believing that thereby woman suffrage will not only result, but equal rights for all without regard to race, creed, or sex, and that thus will come the greatest good to humanity.

MRS. MAGGIE STUART SISLEY.

DR. FIELD writes in the Evangelist: "You know that, in crossing the Pacific, it becomes necessary to alter the reckoning of the days to conform to that of the Eastern or Western Hemisphere, according as a ship is sailing in one direction or the other. In going to Japan, when the 180th degree of longitude is reached (which is just half-way around the world from the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, England, from which longitude is reckoned), a day is dropped, and in returning one is added. We crossed that meridian on the 18th inst., and so two days were put down in the ship's calendar as the 18th of June. Now as it happened that this was Sunday, we had two Sabbaths succeeding each other, one of which was the Sabbath in Japan and in all Asia, and the other was the Sabbath in America and in Europe. Some of our ship's company were puzzled to know which to keep; but I did not think it would do me any harm to keep both, and shall always remember with pleasure this double Sabbath on the sea."

ONE OF THE Democratic journals which has been conspicuously shocked at Col. Ingersoll's infidelity is the Chicago Times, a journal of such deep and humble piety, that it heads an account of a hanging, "Jerked to Jesus," and alludes to the new Moody Tabernacle in Chicago as "That Salvation Shop," adding: "The devil will catch it when they get that Moody machine in good working order, and the revivalist and his musical attachment begin to grind out Gospel. It will probably prove the biggest investment God has made for many years. After which a select assortment of patent-right souls will be thrown on the market."—Tribune.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to the patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:-

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 30, 1872.
To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEPHENS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:-

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenafly, N.J.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyses the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

A NEW QUARTERLY.

PROSPECTUS.

The want has been long felt in this country, by a large and growing class of thinking people, of a periodical publication serving the same purpose here that the Fortnightly and Contemporary Reviews serve so well in England. The progressive portion of our population demands some adequate literary vehicle for the carriage and diffusion of the most radical thought of our time. To meet this want, and in the hope that such demand may prove competent to maintain its object when once provided with it, it is proposed to issue, on May 1, 1877—or as soon thereafter as circumstances shall warrant—the first number of a quarterly periodical, to be called

"THE RADICAL REVIEW."

The success or failure of this project will depend upon the more or less encouraging reception which its announcement shall meet with from the public previous to the date mentioned. Believing that involving, as it does, the basis of property, the principles of finance, and the organization of industry, and determining, in its settlement, directly the material, and indirectly the mental and spiritual condition of the people,—demands immediate consideration by the best minds, it is the intention of the management of the proposed Review, in selecting its contents, to give the preference largely to articles aimed at the solution of this disputed problem. While so doing, however, it will not exclude, but welcome rather, the proper presentation of all sides of all subjects pertaining to human welfare, whether social, economic, scientific, literary, æsthetic, or religious; prompted to this course by a firm faith in the omnipotence of Truth. It is hoped that the size of the Review, and the infrequency of its issue, will furnish opportunity for thoroughness of treatment, not afforded hitherto to the majority of competent exponents of radical ideas; but, while most of its articles will be of the weighty character peculiar to the best review literature, poetry and the lighter features of the monthly magazine will not be disregarded. To book reviews, large space will be devoted.

The editor and publisher avails himself with pleasure of the permission granted him by the following persons, to announce them as probable contributors; to which list he hopes to make important additions hereafter:—

John Weiss, John Fiske, Edmund C. Stedman, Sidney H. Morse, Octavius B. Frothingham, J. N. Larned, Lyander Spooner, Ezra H. Heywood, B. F. Underwood, Samuel Johnson, J. Stahl Patterson, Prof. E. S. Morse, John W. Chadwick, B. W. Ball, Joel A. Allen, Mrs. E. M. F. Denton, Dyer D. Lum, Stephen Pearl Andrews, Wm. J. Potter, Chas. D. B. Mills, John Orvis, Chas. W. Buck, Francis E. Abbot, Wm. Hanson, Howard N. Brown, Samuel Longfellow, Abram N. Stevens, Cyrus A. Bartol, Joseph H. Allen, John H. Clifford, J. K. Ingalls.

Each number will contain two hundred or more octavo pages, well printed on good paper. A limited number of book and other literary advertisements will be received at low rates.

Any person wishing to encourage this enterprise by subscription may notify the publisher to that effect, whereupon he will receive a printed blank, which, when signed and returned to the publisher, will bind the signer to forward the price of subscription as soon as informed that the success of the venture is assured.

Terms per annum, post-paid, $5.00.

Address the Publisher,

BENJ. R. TUCKER,
Lock Box 569, New Bedford, Mass.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clench of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and vote in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to vote, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE
FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

THE CHICAGO woman who claimed to be miraculously cured of paralysis by prayer is pronounced a humbug by several physicians of that city.

THE MASSACHUSETTS House of Representatives, on March 30, rejected the woman suffrage bill by a vote of 122 to 88. It was the Bible that did it.

MRS. ADAMS, the singer, recently advertised a performance in New York on Sunday evening, but the police prevented it, on the ground that only "sacred concerts" were allowed on that day.

REV. DR. BELLOW, of New York, is witty. At the recent dinner of the Harvard Alumni in New York, he is said to have alluded to Boston as "the Hub"; to Philadelphia, the City of Brotherly Love, as "the Bub"; and to New York, a somewhat noisy place between the two, as "the Hub-bub."

THE EXPERIMENT of Catholic services by Father Byrne at the Massachusetts State Prison has aroused the open opposition of the Protestant Chaplain, Rev. Mr. Spears. The quarrel has got into the State House, and the Committee on Prisons has given public hearings on the subject. The chaplaincy system will be shaken by these outbreaks of sectarian jealousy, and it is to be hoped that the public will do a little hard thinking on the question—what right has the State to tax anybody for the preaching of Church dogmas?

ADDITIONAL SIGNATURES have been received as follows to the Liberal League petition for the Religious Freedom Amendment since our last issue: from Messrs. F. O. Dorr and Joseph Knight, Troy, N. Y., 143 names; from Dr. J. E. Wallace, New Orleans, La., 27; from Mr. Benj. F. Smith, Dedham, Mass., 140. Mr. Dorr had previously sent a list of 235 names from the same place, and the chirography shows plainly enough that most of them belong to professional and business men. Total number of signatures thus far received—8,114.

CONFUCIUS, it seems, was the founder of a peculiar aristocracy. "The recent death of his oldest male descendant calls attention to the curious fact that this family is the only one which has retained a grand position owing to a pedigree derived from a peaceful thinker. This family holds the highest place in the kingdom except the throne itself, and has retained it for two hundred and two years longer than the Christian Era. The governorship of the district surrounding the tomb of the sage and an estate of one hundred and sixty-five thousand acres are still held by the representative of the family, which now numbers over eleven thousand persons, and all this multitude are subject to him, while he receives royal honors even from the highest officials."

THERE is a very candid article on "Thomas Paine" in Potter's American Monthly for February. Philadelphia's indescribable meanness in rejecting officially a tribute of general gratitude to Paine for his national services, and refusing to allow his bust in her public places, seems to be creating shame and chagrin in Philadelphia itself, if this magazine represents the city fairly. The writer of this article writes as a Christian, but nevertheless in a very just and appreciative spirit, of Paine's character and services, closing with these words: "Whatever may have been his private errors and infirmities, they ought not to be conspicuously obtruded. His political integrity and great public services were acknowledged by our forefathers of the Revolution, and we, their descendants, may not indeed deny the existence of such faults, but we ought to put them in the shaded background of a Centennial picture radiant with the glory of his patriotic deeds."

GOVERNOR HUBBARD, of Connecticut, appointed Good Friday, March 30, as "a day of humiliation and prayer." The Jewish Messenger protests indignantly against this new encroachment of the Christian Church. Says our good neighbor, the Christian Register: "The Messenger's indignation may seem rather excessive, unless we put ourselves in the place of our Jewish fellow-citizens, and remember that there is no established religion in the United States. The Jews cast so few votes that men in public life can afford to displease them by pleasing the far more numerous Christians; and yet what is just is not to be determined by the census or poll-list. Minorities have some rights that majorities are bound to respect, and religious rights are among them. The rights of a hundred good citizens are as sacred as the rights of a million, and are so regarded by fair-minded and magnanimous rulers." We wish the Register could speak half as respectfully of the protest of those who are neither Christians nor Jews against all such violations of secular government—even those which the Register itself approves.

REV. JOHN T. SARGENT, of this city, whose hospitable residence has so often harbored the Radical Club and the later Chestnut Street Club, died of pneumonia on March 26, aged sixty-eight years. The funeral took place on the afternoon of the 30th. James Freeman Clarke, Wendell Phillips, and John Weiss made addresses; Dr. Bartol prayed and Samuel Longfellow gave the benediction. The tribute of Mr. Phillips to the worth of his dead friend and comrade in the anti-slavery warfare of so many years—"true friend, loyal gentleman, brave reformer, devout Christian man," as he called him, in a farewell apostrophe of great pathos—was very impressive by reason of its exquisite simplicity and deep feeling. Mr. Sargent was dismissed from the Ministry-at-Large by the Unitarians of Boston about 1840, merely because he opened his pulpit to the heretic Theodore Parker—an event which, painful as it was at the time, he used to mention frequently afterwards with honorable pride. All through the dark and bitter years when freedom was a word of mockery in the United States, John T. Sargent stood forth boldly for the rights of the slave, and identified his life with the cause of the most hated agitators. Not especially conspicuous for intellectual ability, he was true and good to the core, and fought the good fight, and proved himself a moral hero, when so many men of mighty powers sold themselves to the enemy and slowly sank to shame. As we looked upon the motionless features for the last time, with their patient, gentle, relieved expression, we thought that here lay one who had grandly earned his repose. Peace to his ashes and long honor to his name!

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston Index to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

Alcestis in England.

A DISCOURSE DELIVERED AT SOUTH PLACE CHAPEL, FIMBURY, JANUARY 21, 1877.

BY MONCURE'D. CONWAY.

Not long ago the Alcestis of Euripides was produced at the Crystal Palace, with accompaniment of beautiful music by an English composer, Mr. Henry Gadsby. The large audience was profoundly interested, and evinced genuine sympathy with all that was noble, and abhorrence of what was base, in the characters and action brought before them. The event has appeared to me significant. Alcestis is one of the few ancient Greek melodramas. The majority of dramas left us by the poets of Greece turn upon religious themes, and usually they are tragedies. It is evident that to them the popular religion around them was itself a tragedy. Their heroes and heroines—such as Prometheus and Macaria—were generally victims of the jealousy or caprice of the gods; and though the poets display in their dramas the irresistible power of the gods, they do so without reverence for that power, and generally show the human victims to be more honorable than the gods. But the Alcestis of Euripides is not a tragedy; it ends happily, and in the rescue of one of those victims of the gods. It stands as about the first notice served on the gods that the human heart had got tired of their high-handed proceedings, and they might prepare to quit the thrones of the universe unless they could exhibit more humanity.

The story of Alcestis opens with the decree of the Fates that a certain man, Admetus, shall die. But Apollo, who had been befriended by Admetus, asks the Fates to spare him: The Fates say they are willing, provided any one can be found to die in his place; for the powers below have been promised their victim and must not be cheated, though it does not matter whether their victim be Admetus or somebody else. Upon this, Alcestis, the wife of Admetus, steps forward and offers to die in his stead. Admetus accepts this vicarious arrangement, but Apollo feels that it is a rather mean affair; so when Death comes to claim Alcestis, Apollo tries to argue the case with him. But Death plants himself upon the principle of divine justice. The notion of justice among the gods is, that either the sentenced culprit shall die or else some innocent person for him. Apollo is too well read in heavenly law to dispute this code, but he is rather ashamed of it, and then follows something peculiar. Knowing that neither he nor any other deity can legally resist the decree of another deity, Apollo is reduced to hope for help from man. Human justice may save where divine justice sacrifices. He prophesies to Death that although he may seize Alcestis, a man will come who will conquer him, and deliver that woman from the infernal realm. There is then a pathetic scene in which Alcestis dies, making her last request to her husband to devote himself to her children, and reminding him of the happiness she had left in her father's palace to share his destiny, and at last die for him. But, now, when she is dead, Admetus' father, Pheres, bitterly reproaches his son for accepting life on such base terms as the death of another. The people generally reproach him in the same way, and at length Admetus feels that he has acted a disgraceful part, and his life so unworthily saved becomes worthless and miserable.

Then Hercules comes on the scene. He has been slaying lion and dragon, and he now resolves to conquer Death and deliver Alcestis. This he does; he descends into Hades, and delivers her from prison. He brings her to her husband amid the general joy.

There are several points in the story which present a significant parallelism to the very letter of the legend, that arose some centuries later, of Christ's descent into hell. For instance, when the rescued and risen Alcestis is brought into the presence of Admetus he cannot recognize her: she has yet too much that is ghostly about her. Hercules tells Admetus it is not lawful for her to speak to him "until she is unbound from her consecration to the gods beneath, and the third day come." So we see whence this idea of rising on the third day is derived, and what notions surrounded him who reported Jesus as at first not recognized by Mary, and then as saying to her, "Touch me not, for I have not yet ascended to my Father." The consecration of Hades was still upon him.

However, it is not to such details as these that I wish to call your attention. It is more important to consider that the entire drama turns upon the same principles as the popular religion of England. It only requires a change of names to make Alcestis a Christian passion-play. We have in it the unappealable law of fate corresponding to the divine decree, by which Jehovah himself was so fettered that there could be no remission of sentence without the shedding of blood. We have the barbaric notion that justice is satisfied by the vicarious suffering of any one at all, willing to sacrifice himself for the person involved—punishment by proxy. And then, we have a being who is a god in power, but man in heart: the god-man Hercules, whose father was Jupiter, but whose mother was a woman, Alceme; and this incarnate son of God vanquishes the infernal powers, where a mere deity was powerless to do so on account of the merely etiquette, and the gods' peculiar notion of justice.

The god-man Hercules went through the earth destroying earthly evils in twelve great Labors. The legend was one of the most wide-spread and impressive throughout the Greek and Roman world at the time of the establishment of Christianity. From the old pictures of Christ's triumphal pilgrimage on earth, parallels to the chief labors of Hercules may be found. Christ is shown treading on the lion, the asp, the dragon, and Satan; and all the myths converge in his conquest of death and hell. In the old pictures of Christ delivering souls from Hades, Eve is generally shown coming out first in suggestive similarity to Eurydice following Orpheus, and Alcestis Hercules.

Such Greek myths mark an ascent of the human mind above the idea of their early theology, which had become a sort of pagan Calvinism. The advanced minds had plainly grown ashamed of gods who reigned with such an unjust idea as that of vicarious suffering; and Euripides dealt with the notion just as a freethinker now deals with the same. The audience at the Crystal Palace applauded Pheres when he denounced his own son for the meanness of accepting salvation through the suffering of another. What they applauded was an attack on the Christian schemes of redemption. Pheres only anticipated James Martineau, who once similarly rebuked the baseness of those who would not rather go to hell than be saved by the death and suffering of an innocent being. What would the audience have said to Pheres' sentiment, if it had been told them that they themselves were so many Admetuses, accepting safety at the cost of the innocent Alcestis of Calvary? What, if they had been reminded that the principle represented by death, that justice is satisfied by so much suffering without respect to who is the sufferer, is precisely the same as that by which Christianity declares that the divine law required a victim, but was quite satisfied if the innocent suffer for the guilty? The audience would, perhaps, have regarded such suggestions with horror, and yet they applauded the principle by which Christianity is now assailed. We need not complain of this. It is much to congratulate ourselves upon that in art, at least, we may have high and noble principles brought before the people, and responded to by them. It is much that a miserable superstition, though it may have enfeebled the moral sentiment of the people, has not yet eaten into their heart and instinct so far as to make them really put darkness for light, and honor disease as health.

In the ancient Greek religion, Jupiter stood just where Jehovah stood in the Jewish religion. They were both stern, jealous, vindictive deities—personifications of thunder and lightning,—with no humanity about them. Gradually, the Greeks became ashamed of Jupiter, and they began to worship heroes who had human hearts,—such as Hercules. In the same way, in another line of development, men became ashamed of Jehovah, and had to set up the human-hearted Christ instead of him. In the early days, when the worship of Christ meant an appeal against deified despotism, it was a healthy and noble worship. But that was before there was anything in the world called Christianity. Christianity was the overthrow of Christ. It was the invention of a priesthood who found that this novel idea of Christ, that God is love, sending sunshine alike on good and evil, would prove fatal to their power. For their purpose men must be terrified. So they contrived and intrigued until they unseated Christ with his gospel of love, by tacking on to him the discredited Jove and Jehovah, and setting their lightnings to work again. They were but too successful. He who came "not to condemn but to save" was made into an awful Judge of the quick and dead. They have transmitted to us precisely those ideas of death and hell, vicarious suffering and remorseless, divine decrees, which the Heracleian apotheosis in Greece at one period and Christ-worship at another, overthrew for a time; and they have compelled us to do the whole Protestant work over again, and recover Christ by a rebellion against Christianity.

To-day, again, we see rising a certain shame of theologic dogmas. Though the Church declares the Bible to be the word of God, it excludes much of it from its Lectionary, as unfit to be read in public. The preachers are so ashamed of their dogmas that they are angry at hearing them quoted, and say they are caricatures even when taken literally from their creeds and confessions. Lately, the honor has been conferred upon us of having our heresies made the subject of special treatment by the Christian Evidence Society, over which the Archbishop of Canterbury presides, assisted by many other prelates. Some recent controversies which we have had in Holloway led that Society to delegate four eminent clergymen to demolish our principles during the Sundays of Advent. Now, those sermons have been published; I have read them carefully; and in not one of them is there any defence of Christianity at all. Not one of them deals with the fall of man, human depravity, the atonement, or hell-fire. Not one of them has touched on anything distinctive in Christianity. They eulogize Christ's character, applaud his charity, praise the Sermon on the Mount, and discourse of everything but the real points at issue. No Hindu, reading those Advent sermons, could gather from any word in them that English religion believed in the devil at all, much less as the natural father of the human family; or in eternal hell-fire, or vicarious atonement to an unrelenting God. And yet these men were especially appointed to defend Christianity!

Why did they not defend it? Why, they are scholars, and scholars are ashamed of such dogmas. They are ashamed of a God who says he will laugh at the calamity of men and mock when their fear cometh; they blush for a dogma which says there was a bargain struck between the Divine Sovereign and Christ,—so much sin ransomed with so much blood; they feel the scandal of such guilty calumnies on men and God as human depravity and future tortures: they dare not defend such things. So they surround themselves with a cloud of verbal incense to Christ and Christianity, and hope people will understand that at the heart of the rhetorical cloud there is sound Orthodoxy. But I have never seen so startling a manifestation of the irresistible rationalism of this age as that four clergymen—among them a Professor of History and a Bampton lecturer—delegated by a Society of Bishops and Clergy to defend Christianity, should pass over its every distinctive dogma to praise virtues common to all religions of the world.

As Balaam in the legend was sent for by Balak to curse Israel but proceeded to bless them, these defenders of the faith have left at the end of their labors an impressive testimony that their so-called faith is indefensible, and that the most superstitious can hope for is a golden bridge for its retreat before the reason and sentiment of our time.

I say the "sentiment" of our time, for the Orthodox theology is not only repudiated by disciplined reasoners, but the whole population have become so ashamed of it that it cannot be taught in the public schools. The religion now taught in the national schools is nearly the religion of Dr. Channing. It mainly depends now upon the advance of a higher order of teachers, such as is sure to appear, that those schools shall diffuse a rational religion. Such a phenomenon would be impossible were it not that the people have become ashamed of the traditional dogmas. It has become possible for our daily papers to write of "the unpardonable sin" as a curious survival of antiquity, as if it were not in both Bible and theology. An inquest was recently held on a poor lady who died of the belief that she had committed that Scriptural sin, and a leading newspaper* recommends the sea-side for such diseases. It also says such persons should be surrounded by friendship and love. Exactly so. Like Alcestis they are under the dark, deadly shadow of some heartless, though happily imaginary, deity or demon—some phantom of the terrors in Nature,—and like Alcestis they are to be brought from that region of shadows by such love as dwells in human hearts.

All this means a new religion subtly penetrating, widely transmuting, the whole heart and brain of society. Mankind are saved by a divine humanity. This is what our ancestors tried to express, as they fled from gods of the storm to deities of love, incarnate in human hearts,—born of human mothers that they may bear a maternal tenderness to meet the needs of a humanity born of woman. "Had men been angels," says the Koran, "we had sent them an angel out of heaven; but we have sent them a man like themselves." All the incarnations believed in—Vishnu, Krishna, Christ—meant the universal love recognized in human love, as the sun might sign its course on a dial. Omar Khayyam said, "Diversity of worship has divided the human race into seventy-two nations; from among all their doctrines I have selected one—divine love." And now, seven centuries after him, the civilized world is making the same selection. It is quietly hiding out of sight, secretly burying, the dismal dogmas of divine wrath.

But we must take warning by the fact that this process has been gone through before our time; it has been gone through again and again, but in every case has been followed by relapse. Every bright incarnation marks a period when the human heart rebelled against some heavenly tyrant; but invariably has the new form been coerced into the vesture of the old, and the fallen thunderbolts pressed back into his hand. And this has always been done by one and the same power—that of self-interested priesthood. No priesthood can be strong except through fear. Many ages have proved that. To cultivate religious fear has always been their life in the past; and now, when the community has outgrown infra-natural fears—at least in civilized centres—they must invent some new kind of terror, or else abdicate. The investment in Christianity is too great for such abdication in this country, and so the priestly interest is busily conjuring up phantoms of another—a social—kind. It is declared that all morality depends upon churches and sects. There is still enough superstition to influence women and children, and this, we are told, must be carefully retained and fostered, or else men will break all restraints and carry society to rack and ruin. We are warned that our institutions are all built up together like an arch, Christianity among them; and if one stone gives way all the rest will tumble.

The only dark feature of our age is the spread of this guilty notion, that falsehood is essential to the welfare of human society. It is just that hypocrisy which really endangers society. If ever the loyalty of the people to law fails, it will be because the law insists on maintaining proven error, and on turning the means of education and happiness to the repression of science under superstition.

That the social edifice needs pious fraud to support it is the last superstition surviving among the educated, and it is that we have mainly to combat.

And neither Hercules nor Christ ever had a more monstrous thing to encounter. To identify the interests of superstition with those of social morality is not mere atheism; it is antitheism; it is not mere belief that there is no God; it is going against God; it is pitting falsehood against truth, upholding darkness against light, ascribing to ignorance more potency than right knowledge; it is to declare a universe whose every corner-stone is a lie!

The only saving faith of to-day is a faith that right can never do wrong, that truth can never misguide those who trust in it. The absence of this faith is the only scepticism of our time worth a moment's concern. The downfall of Jehovah, or the Trinity, is no more than the vanishing away of Jupiter and Diana who preceded them. Our posterity will witness the performance of "Paradise Lost" as calmly as we now do the same plot in the play of Alcestis. These things will pass away. But human society will not pass away; the habit of mind—whether it be truthful or untruthful; the human character—whether it be faithful or faithless;—these will not pass away. We are to-day weaving the destinies of the future, and every false, rotten thread we weave in will tell in the web. We are weaving not for our own race alone, but for humanity. As the priestly frauds of seventeen centuries ago are fettering millions to-day—among them many of our own friends, and ourselves more than we know,—so will every lie sustained to-day bequeath a chain to those who come after us. Is humanity nothing to us? Then may we creep through our little conventional life, enjoy its petty rewards; but it will still be true that he who has not known the love of humanity, nor felt its inspiration, has missed and lost the great gospel of his time.

We must learn to read these ever new, though most ancient, revelations of the life in Nature to be unfolded through man. Long ago has Alcestis been set to the still, and music of humanity, for those who can listen deep. All around us there is a Hades, and many there be that go in thereat. Even while we claim the triumphs of reason, and mark the skulking retreat of dogmatic phantoms wailed by the morn, the shadow falls again upon us from the misma of mortal infidelity. Out of it darts the double-tongue, striking at the heart of all manly character. This is the Inferno of those who see the truth, and applaud when it confronts the wrongs of distant ages, but before the errors of to-day cringe and crawl, and have one tongue for the conventional, another for the secret audience. Even honest ritualism is better than this unfaithful rationalism.

Each manly heart has an Alcestis to deliver. Each must combat with death,—whether it be the skeleton arms of a dead creed holding the mind in deadly grip of fear; or be it the moral death which has cheated our brother of his soul, and left him the social simulacrum of a man.

It does not require of us the might of Hercules, nor cost the blood of Christ, to make some rescues at least from the dark abodes of faithlessness and fear; but it does require still that we shall be filled with divine love, that we shall be animated by that alone, till in our human hearts there flame a passion for saving men, women, and children from the bondage of fear and the degradation of falsehood.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE SCIENCE OF UNIVERSOLOGY.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

We are by no means treading upon entirely new ground, when we divide, as we have done, the entire domain of the mind (the mentismus) into a Without, a Within, and a Between. We have for so doing the illustrious authority of Emanuel Swedenborg, than whom, as yet, no mental scientist can take higher rank. As is appropriate to the mere mentalist, which Swedenborg was subsequent to his illumination, he uses the word Man as synonymous with Mind, or as if man were mind (mentismus) and nothing else. His terms for this threefold division, accordingly, are 1, The External Man, 2, The Internal Man, and 3, The Interior Man.

"In every person there is," says this wonderful author, "an internal and an external man; the internal man is called the Spiritual man, because it dwells in the light of heaven; the external man is what is called the natural man, because it dwells in the light of this world only."—New Jerusalem and its Heavenly Doctrine, 38, 179. Again, "The interior man is the middle between the internal and the external man; by means of the interior man, the internal communicates with the external, and without such medium no communication could possibly exist. The interior man is called the rational man, and is a mediatory communication between the celestial, spiritual, and corporeal principles."—Arcana Cælestia, 1702. Again, "The internal man is formed of things celestial and spiritual; the interior or middle man of things rational; the external man of things sensual, not such as belong to the body, but such as are derived from bodily things; and this is the case, not only with men, but also with spirits."—Arcana Cælestia, 978.

These technicalities of Swedenborg we may take as substantially synonymous with the Soul, the Spirit, and the Mind, as previously defined upon other grounds; and when thought more convenient, I shall not hesitate to substitute the Swedenborgian expressions. There are in other respects, also, exceedingly important correlations to establish between Swedenborg's thought, and the similar universological discriminations; and the universological method will enable us to interpret his writings throughout, into simple and ordinary modes of expression; or into the new technicalities when these are indispensable.

Swedenborg's mode of exhibiting the closer relation of the soul or of the external man to mundane things, and the greater remove of the spirit or internal man from such things—using his weird Biblical symbolism—is this: "The internal man is called the firmament; the knowledges in the internal man, the waters above the firmament; and the scientifics appertaining to the external man are called the waters beneath the firmament" (Gen. i., 8).—Arc. Cæl. 24. All this must seem sufficiently mystical to the unaccustomed reader. A few words of explanation will render it clearer. Water is an emblem, as it is indeed, and will be shown to be, a true scientific analogue of mental lucidity, and hence of "knowledges" and "scientifics." By the firmament is meant the aerial world over our heads, with the seemingly fixed or immovable sky, which by the ancients was supposed to be really such. Under this ancient conception, the waters that came down in rain were supposed to be from a reservoir above the fixed sky. We now know these waters to be vaporous or diffused into absolute transparency, within the aerial firmament, not above it, but still above the earth's level, that is to say within the atmosphere or breath-sphere of the planet. This breath-sphere is, then, the analogue of spirit or breath generally. It is, therefore, by the analogy, both firmament and internal man; putting the planetary structure for the human structure. The twofold lodgement of the hydrosphere still holds good notwithstanding our scientific advancement in knowledge, one part and kind of it being in the atmosphere (or firmament), and the other (oceanic) beneath the atmosphere (or firmament). The waters diffused in the atmosphere hence come (with our author) to mean the kind of mental lucidity or of knowledges which inhere in the Spirit, or in the Internal Man, and the waters beneath the firmament to mean, ordinary scientifics, such as belong to the soul, or to the External Man.

The atmosphere or firmament means, with Swedenborg, always the Superior and Spiritual Condition; which he also always identifies with the internal world or man. That "up" or "on high" or "the highest" means with him the same as the Within is shown by the following passages: "Highest denotes the inmost, because interior things with man, who is in space, appear as superior things [higher up], and exterior things as inferior [lower down]; but when the idea of space is put off, as is the case in heaven, and also in the interior [or spiritual] thought of man, then is put off the idea of what is high and deep, for height and depth come from the idea of space; yea, in the interior heaven, neither is there the idea of things interior and exterior [a Within and a Without] because to this idea there also adheres somewhat of space; but there is the idea of more perfect or imperfect state [the analogous spiritual ideas], for interior things are in a more perfect state than exterior things, because interior things are nearer to what is divine, and exterior things are more remote thence; this is the reason why what is highest signifies what is inmost."—Arcana Cælestia, 5146; Divine Love and Wisdom, 103.

I have quoted these passages not merely to explain the previous quotations from Swedenborg, but for a more serious purpose. Swedenborg's whole method and system of thought is well illustrated here. He brings into comparison two different worlds of mental operation, one of which—"the scientifics of the external man"—involves the conditions of external space and time; and the other of which—"the knowledges of the internal or spiritual man"—transcends the conditions of space and time. He then affirms, however, that these two systems of thought, while wholly different in substance, are so correlated with each other, by an identical schemata of distribution, that they are as it were copies of each other, the resemblance of the copies being what he calls Correspondence. Correspondence, he says, "is between those things which appertain to the light of heaven, and those things which appertain to the light of the world; that is between those things which appertain to the internal or spiritual man, and those which appertain to the external and natural man."—Arcana Cælestia, 3225. "There is a correspondence between all things in heaven [the superior spiritual state and world] and all things in man [the inferior natural state and world]."—Heaven and Hell, 87—102. "There is not given the least thing with man, with which there is no correspondence."—Arcana Cælestia, 4791. We are thus brought to the seeming entrance to a broad highway which is to conduct us unerringly from the field of ordinary, external scientific knowledge, to the complete understanding, in every detail and particular, of the whole body of spiritual knowledge. The case is like that in which the word uprightness means, originally, a fact of position in space, perpendicularity to the earth's surface, but has come to mean also, by a spiritual transfer, honesty of individual character, from a perceived analogy between the two ideas, although in wholly different spheres; so of inclination in space, and in the mind, etc.; and we are told by our author, that all spiritual and ideal things are related to natural and material things in a similar way; and, so definitely, that we have only to discover and adhere to this law of metaphor, what he calls correspondence, and what I have called analogy, to be able to translate, with perfect accuracy, all the facts and phenomena of the natural world into their corresponding facts and phenomena in the spiritual world of thought; and inversely.

Having brought us to this immense expectation, Swedenborg does indeed, exhibit, in the aggregate, numerous and remarkable instances of striking coincidences between the overt facts of nature and the inner facts of consciousness; and so between the facts of this outer mundane world, and what we may readily conceive to be the facts of a subjective and spiritual world, somewhere extant in the universe; but, in the main, he fails to feed the appetite he has excited. He comes wholly short of maintaining, in any logical or scientific sense, his fundamental proposition. He establishes no systematic and exhaustive correlation between natural and spiritual phenomena. Called by the nature of his own basis to make good this universal relationship, he gives the go-by to the outer sphere, that of "Scientifics," and glides up and away, like a balloon, into the spiritual-aerial firmament, which, by his own analogies, alternates between the extraordinary lucidity of the clear sky, and the cloudiness, foggy, and mistiness of the lower atmosphere; and thence he dogmatizes the doctrines he draws from such inspiration as he finds there without substantiation, or any method of test. He has hitherto almost wholly escaped criticism, for the reason that his mode of conception and exposition is so peculiar, and his writings so voluminous, that nobody but ardent disciples, who are rarely critical, has had the persistent hardihood to read and master his works and their contents; and perhaps I may add, that, that difficulty being overcome, few would be competent to the task of a just appreciation of such an immense and extraordinary body of doctrine.

I have, however, no criticism to make upon Swedenborg, in any unfriendly spirit. I have the pleasure of knowing that some of the most advanced acceptors of the "doctrines of the New Church" have long felt an interest in the confirmations of Swedenborg's teachings, which they think they foresee will result from my labors. The confirmations will surely come, in an almost unlimited abundance; but the strictures and rectifications will come also; addressed far more distinctly than Swedenborg's own utterances to the rational faculty in man—which characteristic is the boast of New Churchmen. It is very usually the case that Swedenborg is right, even when his proofs are left utterly wanting; and in such cases, his disciples should feel grateful for distinctive verifications; but let us keep to the truth, lead where it may; and should any system of doctrines be partially recast by the advent of a universal science, its materials will all be saved, and any readjustment of them, and things complementary of the system, from new sources, can only serve still better the purposes already attained. Neither Swedenborg, at all events, nor his friends for him, can decline any criticism which his own fundamental principle justly entails upon him.

Universology is, at bottom, nothing else but a vigorous intellectual grasp of this fundamental principle of Swedenborg, (which is also that of Fichte, Schelling, Hegel, Oken, and Fourier); but which he failed to carry out on the scientific plane, a work which we shall see, in the end, has to be accomplished, before a complete delivery can be made of the truths of the spiritual plane; and especially before the responsive identity of the two planes, by correspondence, analogy, or the true law of metaphor, can be demonstrated. This last is the main point at issue, and its achievement the only thing which can elevate "the doctrine of correspondences" into the dignity of a universal science. Universology accepts this crucial test, and will claim for itself scientific rank, only in so far as it is able to bring all mental, moral, and spiritual phenomena into a definite correlation with natural and objective phenomena.

Swedenborg definitively abandons science when he informs us that in the spirit-world scientific laws cease to be valued; and virtually, as a consequence, that spiritual knowledges, must be delivered, from that world, as self-evident; that is to say, dogmatically, and not, therefore, in correlation with their objective counterparts in the natural world. We are thus baffled and disappointed in the expectation he has raised. We, at least, are of this world; and a revelation to us, as a rational and scientific revelation (as is claimed) must stand by Swedenborg's fundamental principle, and not by any defective and unsatisfactory application of the principle; and still less by its absolute abandonment.

To foreshadow the criticism which must come to dogmatic Swedenborgianism, by an appeal from it to Swedenborg's own fundamental theoretical basis, let us recur to one of the preceding quotations (Arcana Coelestia, 5146; Divine Love and Wisdom, 103). Having posited the principle of an absolute correspondence, out to the minutest detail, between all things of the spiritual world and all things of the natural world, and as between all the parts of each, giving the basis of a universal science, not merely for spiritual matters, but for the comparology of all the special sciences (Heaven and Hell, 87—102)—having laid down this magnificent platform, and subjected himself to its test, he says, dogmatically, that "highest denotes inmost [the within]," and "because interior things, with man who is in space, appear as superior [upper or higher], and exterior things [the without] as inferior [lower down]." In other words, he affirms, as the entire truth of the matter, that In and Above always coincide in our human thought, and inversely, Out and Below; "for," he adds, "interior things are in a more perfect state than exterior things, and exterior things are more remote thence."

It may not be obvious at first how much of a whole system of doctrine depends upon the truth or erroneousness of these utterances. That is not now important; but let us confine our attention to their literal exactitude, or want of it. Undoubtedly, in a very great measure, and from a very important point of view, they are justified by the facts of Nature; but are they universally true? or only from a certain point of view? And, from other points of view, perhaps equally important, are they not diametrically opposed to the truth; and the opposite statements, in that case, alone true? If, for example, we were ascending the steps in the vestibule of a church or temple, as we advanced upward we should also advance inward; and we should be going towards the altar or high place, the supposed seat of goodness; and the opposite of all this would be true, if we were to recede. So, indeed, if we conceive the dome of the sky with its floor on the earth, as such a temple, ascension from the mineral to the aerial spheres would accord with the previous analogies; and this conception of universal nature as a temple has an important place in the whole scope of analogy, or illustrative symbolism. But it is deficient in the fact that it is only an aspect and not the whole of nature.

Is it true, for instance, if instead of the temple idea, as erected on the earth, we take the earth-ball itself; either, that as we go within the earth we go up, and as we go out from the earth's centre we go down (or just the contrary); or that the deep interior things of the earth are superior in quality, and things on the surface, including the whole human family, inferior in quality to the "stocks and stones" which lie beneath and more within? The test proves at once the inadequacy of the dogmatic rule; and, nevertheless, it has a large sweep of truth, and its own true rank of importance. But, when a whole series of moral consequences is made to rest upon an analogy, it behooves us to be sure that we have rightly understood and limited the analogy itself. So when such immense seeming contradictions occur in nature, as that there are two ups and two downs, one set from the earth, and another set from the sun—geocentric and heliocentric, it behooves us to know very definitely which up and which down we are talking about.

BENEDICT DE SPINOZA.

A PANEGYRIC BY PROFESSOR FELIX ADLER.

A LARGE AUDIENCE PRESENT IN STANDARD HALL—SPINOZA'S LIFE AND CHARACTER EULOGIZED—HIS EXCOMMUNICATION AT THE AMSTERDAM SYNAGOGUE—HIS TEACHINGS AND PHILOSOPHY—THE HIGH ESTEEM IN WHICH HE IS NOW HELD.

Standard Hall was well filled yesterday morning with a fashionably-dressed audience, composed almost exclusively of Hebrews, to listen to Prof. Felix Adler's panegyric on Spinoza, it being the two hundredth anniversary of the latter's death. In front of the platform hung an old engraving of the philosopher framed in smilax and white pinks, and bearing the inscription:—

BENEDICT DE SPINOZA.

Cui natura Deus rerum, cui cognitum ordo,
Hoc Spinoza statu conspiciendus erat.
Expressere viri faciem, sed plague mentem
Zeuxidis artifices non valuerunt manus.
Illa viget scriptis, ubi sublimis tractat,
Hanc quicunque cupit noscere scripta lege. [etc.]

A double-wicker basket stood above, filled with cut lilies, carnation pinks, roses, wheat sprays, and other exotics. On either side was drooping ivy. Festoons of evergreens draped the outer edges. A potted lily occupied the right of the platform and a dwarf rubber-tree the left.

During a voluntary from the choir, which was an invocation to Memory, the Professor mounted the platform. He is a small, light-complexioned man, with short hair, and a small, full beard. He wore evening costume of black, with unpolished boots. He spoke slowly and very distinctly, without notes, and at times was very eloquent. After the singing, he stepped forward and said that as the years roll by the great men whom the past has wronged are receiving their recompense. Two centuries ago, Spinoza was hounded down, and to-day he once more walks the earth, and men open wide their hearts to receive his memory and his name. "If thou canst turn thine eyes, dilated with infinity," continued the speaker, reverently lifting his eyes, "oh, mighty shade, upon this mundane sphere, thou wilt behold men nearer the truth, the obliquity dispelled from thy fame, and a new generation arisen who are thy work." Then resuming: On the day that Columbus set sail for America the Jews left Spain for exile. Many who could not reconcile themselves to parting from their home and country became devout Catholics outwardly, while in their hearts they remained faithful to the religion of their ancestors. Some of them were raised to high dignities in the Church, were made monks and prelates; but soon their fidelity was suspected, and the Inquisition began to hunt them down. Some perished miserably at the stake, and others spent years in loathsome dungeons. Those who had means made their escape and found security in distant lands. A great number of these fugitives received asylum in the free States of Holland. They enriched the country by their thrift, frugality, and enterprise. About the opening of the seventeenth century a considerable colony had collected in Amsterdam, and there, in 1632, the son of Spanish Jews, Benedict de Spinoza, was born. In his early youth he was educated in the new school that the Jews had erected. He learned the mysteries of Hebrew law and the doctrines of the Old Testament. The subtle discussions of the Talmud gave edge to his mind. Lastly he studied philosophy under Maimonides and Obenezera, the first of whom sought to harmonize the teachings of Aristotle with the Bible, and signally failed, and the other was a confirmed sceptic, whose notes on the Bible have anticipated modern criticism, though he did not dare to present his meaning in a shape for the understanding of the vulgar. In all these studies young Spinoza showed astonishing proficiency, and so delighted his teachers that they destined him for the Jewish ministry. Subsequently he sought out Dr. Van Ende, a teacher of liberal learning, and under his tutelage became a good classical Latin scholar, and acquired a knowledge of geometry, physics, and the art of sketching. Then he took up the works of Descartes, whose metaphysical philosophy exerted a decided influence on his future. Descartes was then the leader of a new school. Weary with the discussions of scholastics, he took as his motto De omnibus dubitandum est (it is necessary to doubt all things), though he, too, did not venture to push his convictions to the utmost. Jordan Bruno also determined the bias of Spinoza's mind. Bruno it was who first proclaimed the teachings of Copernicus. He inculcated a species of pantheism. He was burned in 1600. By these influences Spinoza's mind was widened. From the broad plane on which he stood he looked with derision upon the rites and practices of external religion. He absented himself from public worship, he neglected the synagogue, and there were even dark rumors that he had been seen to partake of forbidden food. At first the rabbis treated his case with great leniency, and it is even said that he was offered one thousand florins a year if he would remain faithful. He hesitated at the suspicion of ingratitude in deserting a religion which had done so much for him, and he well knew that he would be cut off from friends and kinsmen, and wealth and honorable position. But he tells us in the introduction to a work that was long lost, and has been only recently reclaimed, that, contemplating all that was offered him on one hand and a serene life on the other, the shams and evils were nothing to him compared with the great good. He felt as one sick unto death having one sufficient balm toward which he must strive. A great commotion was raised against him in Amsterdam. One evening an assassin was put upon his track,—a fanatic Jew. The stroke of the stiletto was skilfully parried, and Spinoza suffered only a rent in his cloak. But the city was no longer safe for him. He fled, and was obliged to change his residence frequently, until at last he found a resting-place at The Hague, where he remained until his death. In the meantime, the leniency of the rabbis had changed to anger and rigor. It had been the pride of Judaism from the most ancient times, that the widest tolerance was granted in matters of religion. They believed that the practice of religion was more essential than its theory. But persecution begets persecution. These Jews, fresh from the horrors of the Inquisition, themselves had imbibed from it cruelty.

THE EXCOMMUNICATION OF SPINOZA.

On the 27th of July, 1656, in the synagogue of Amsterdam, while the sacred ark was kept open, an edict of excommunication was solemnly pronounced against Spinoza, and Mortari, one of his former masters, read the decree. Prof. Adler here read a translation of the original document. It is in substance: "By decree of the angels and saints, and by consent of the holy God, Benedict de Spinoza is hereby cursed and excommunicated. May he be banned with the ban with which Joshua banned Jericho. May he be cursed as Elijah cursed the Jews. May he be accursed by day, and may he be accursed by night. May he be accursed when he lies down, and may he be accursed when he rises up. May he be accursed on his going forth, and may he be accursed on his coming in. May the Lord God refuse to pardon him. May His wrath and anger be kindled against him, and on him rest all the curses of the book and the law. May the Lord wipe out his name, and separate him from his kindred. May all the curses under the firmament light upon his writings. No one of the faithful shall communicate with him by word of mouth or by letter; nor shall any one show him favor; nor shall any one rest under the same roof with him; nor approach his person within four yards, nor read any writing written by him." When this was read to Spinoza, he replied: "They compel me to do nothing that I was not resolved of my own accord to fulfil." He retired into his silent chamber and lived in a world of his own. There by twenty years' toil he built up the mighty edifice of his system, whose simplicity, unity, and grandeur are the wonder of men. It is man's questioning spirit seeking to penetrate into the heart of Nature, and to grasp the origin of things. The riddle remains unsolved despite many attempts; but who will solve it? Spinoza was the great philosopher of pantheism. He taught that there is a unity in Nature, and that under her thousand-formed changes there is somewhat unchangeable. In all her myriad hues and forms there is an undefinable substance, which is the uncreated, undivided, absolute, infinite God. Thought and extension are its attributes. It is one in all, and all in one. God is not matter, and cannot be ruined. He is that deeper unity in which mind and matter are one. God is Nature. God is in the tree, the stone, the stars, in man. He does not love or labor for any specific purpose, but produces from the necessities of His being endless variety with ceaseless activity. His end is to cause all things, and all are as in Nature; they partake of Him. Man also is of God. The essence of man is mind. He is a logical being. God alone has truth, and so far as man sees things clearly and truthfully he is of God. Logic is the basis of ethics. Spinoza ignores sentiment. He teaches that intellect alone is useful to follow the universal laws. Virtue is the pursuit of knowledge. There are three kinds of virtue,—blurred perception, the light of reason, and the perception of the intellect. The last is the best. Virtue being whatever heightens enjoyment, the gratification of the appetites is good. The wise man delights in good food and comforts, but the true being is only in the intellect. That which is moral helps, and that which is immoral hinders, thought. Man is also a social being. The individual mind is exalted by congregated minds. He should hate evil at all times, for evil is a weakness of the powers of reason. He should reward hatred with love. Love is a sense of kinship in the common search for reason's goal, which is wisdom. All men should act as though they were possessed of one body and one mind. This, Spinoza says, is ideal life. He looks upon friendship as the dearest of earth's possessions, and he esteems wedlock as the holy union of two souls in the common search for truth. Man should be serene. He should fear, because it is the child of passion, and hope, because it is the child of desire. He should avoid humbleness, haughtiness, remorse, and pity. He should court stillness and be collected for reason's sake. When we come to know the passions that bind us to passing phenomena our nature is enabled to conquer our outward nature, and we become masters, free. Thus the emotional nature is extinguished, and the man is freed from the restraints of the passions. He dwells in the intellect and grows into converse with God. Against the blows of misfortune reason steels us. When we know that all things are by necessity we will find tranquillity in yielding to the inevitable. When the body passes away the mind does not wholly perish, but something remains that is infinite. Whether the mind be immortal or not, it is best to live by reason, for a man would be foolish to eat only deadly poison, because at times he cannot get healthy food. Religion and piety consist in living so as to conform to the necessities arising in the outward world, and that is intellectual love of God.

SPINOZA A TYPE OF THE INFINITE.

Such, said Prof. Adler, is a brief summary of Spinoza's system. Thus is seen this giant wrestling with Nature for her secret, and the riddle remains unread. He errs, also, in turning aside from the world's manifold emotions. Emotions are not in themselves evil; nay, they are the seminal principle of all virtues. Spinoza's system towers on lofty pillars of rock, but it is devoid of color. It is impressive in its simple grandeur; but whatever momentary glow it has passes away quickly like the reflection of the setting sun on the evening sky. His name marks a lofty peak in human history. He was a true man. No man more fully lived up to his teachings. He was an adept in natural sciences, understood the microscope, and was a good optician. Miller has incorporated his book on Ethics into his Philosophy of Man, and Morrison, the English philosopher, at a later date, paid him an equally high compliment. His religion, however, was opposed to every sort of superstition. He wrote against the false claims of the Bible. Miracles, he said, are past belief. He thought the beauty of cosmos much more admirable. He demanded that the principles of natural sciences be applied to the Bible,—each scientist to be separated from the rest, and the surrounding circumstances of the investigators to be considered. He wanted, in fact, a natural history of the Bible to be written. He asserted that the priests falsified the Bible, and he denied that Moses wrote the Pentateuch, which he claimed was written many centuries later. He pointed out the many discrepancies with which the Scriptures abound, and he included in it a magnificent plea for liberty of conscience and speech. Religion and piety, he said, the State must demand, but nothing hereafter should be known by that name but the practice of equity and healthful love. The theologians were fierce, and Christian curses were added to Jewish anathemas. His book was confiscated. Few men have so suffered; few so triumphed. For days he did not leave his student's room. Those that knew him well revered him. His soul was pure; his character crystal. He was frugal, living on a few pence a day; yet he was not averse to others taking comfort. His sense of honor was scrupulously nice. Again and again he rejected pensions. He made his living by grinding lenses. In intercourse with the family of his landlord, a painter, he found the relief he needed. When an Electoral Palatine offered him the Professorship of Metaphysics at Heidelberg he declined it, because there was a condition attached that he should so teach philosophy as not to interfere with the established religion. He answered that he could only teach the truth as he saw it. Yet he was fearless; and when his life was again threatened he calmed his friends by his confidence. He had now reached his forty-fourth year. For twenty years he had been fighting a treacherous disease. This giant in intellect was a pallid consumptive. Yet no complaint ever crossed his lips. In the early part of 1677, in February, while the family of the painter was at church, only a single friend being present, the end came. He passed away as calmly as he had lived in the stillness of a Sunday afternoon. He has left a name in history that will not pass away. The Christians and the Jews have cast him out, but he has won a nobler title than theirs,—he belongs to all mankind. [Applause.] He was the helper of mankind. He taught men to calm their passions. It is a sacred hour when we read his Ethics and feel the calm of his soul come over our own. We enter into them as into a dark, ancient temple; but there is no idol there,—only the spirit of truth that sanctifies him and us. A great man, he was a type of the Infinite. So, more and more, as the light increases among men, he will be esteemed, and as the centuries elapse posterity will name him Benedictus, Benedictus.

Another voluntary by the choir followed. Prof. Adler, possibly by way of benediction, then announced that the subject for next Sunday would be "The Office of Priests," and the congregation dispersed.—N. Y. Times, Feb. 26th.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S NEW BOOK.

THE CHADLE OF THE CHRIST. A Study in Primitive Christianity. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. 12mo. pp. 233. G. P. Putnam's Sons. The design of this essay is to discuss the origin of the New Testament, especially of the Four Gospels, from a purely literary point of view; that is, considered as the productions of the intellectual activity of the age. In the accomplishment of this purpose, Mr. Frothingham disclaims all controversial intent. His book has been written, not in the interests of theology, but of history and criticism. It is far from his wish to weaken the moral supports of any form of religion. In his opinion, religion is independent of history, and therefore cannot be compromised by scientific or literary studies. His conclusions, if accepted, he believes, would not affect the institution of the Church, or the habits of society. "The lily's perfect charm," he suggests, "suffers no abatement from the chemist's analysis of the slime into which it strikes its slender root; the grape of the Johannisberg vineyard is no less luscious from the fact that the soil has been subjected to the microscope; the fine qualities of the human being, man or woman, are the same on any theory,—the Bible theory of the perfect Adam, or Darwin's of the anthropoid ape. The hero is hero still, and the saint saint, whatever his ancestry." Hence, the author contends the basis of Christianity is not involved in the history of the Four Gospels. It does not follow that because their genuineness is called in question, Christianity is doomed. The early records of the religion, however curious as literary remains, are not essential to the constitution or the work of the Church. In the author's view, the New Testament is to be received as the natural fruit of the Hebrew mind. Its different books are the last expression of ideas that have exerted a vital influence on the development of that branch of the human family. This conception of the New Testament, Mr. Frothingham maintains, would probably explain even its most obscure and difficult passages. The literary method of treatment which grows out of it is neither dogmatic nor controversial, but consults only the laws of literary expression in which human thought is embodied. In the application of these principles to the contents of the Four Gospels, Mr. Frothingham starts with the expectation of the Messiah, which at the commencement of the Christian era had long been the cardinal idea of the Jewish mind. The earliest writings of the New Testament—the genuine letters of Paul,—the author affirms, take up and continue the line of Hebrew tradition. The earliest Gospels, which must probably be placed at a later date of from twenty to thirty years, bear the impress of ideas which owe their currency to Paul. Their authors had respect for his school, and regarded its claims. Though concerned with a period prior to his conversion, and with events of which he had no knowledge, the Gospels are written not so much in the style of memoirs or chronicles, as of disquisitions. "They are meditative biographies in which the biographical material is selected and qualified by speculative motives." This sentence may be taken as the key-stone to Mr. Frothingham's theory of their construction. Still, he remarks, they are the only fragments presumably of historical character that we possess. In the absence of any such documents on the subject, the utter want of early memoranda, the advanced age of the Evangelists at the time they wrote, the effect of age in weakening recollection and in suggesting fancies, theories, and marvels, and the influence on the disciples of a man so powerful as Paul, the author concludes, that the laws of literary composition compel us to read the Gospel narratives as reflective disquisitions rather than as authentic histories. Mr. Frothingham then proceeds to analyze the character of the Messianic hope as it existed in the time of the disciples, and the effect which it produced on the contents of the Gospels. The essence of the volume may be found in the chapter devoted to this topic, and in the general summary in the conclusion of the work. His purpose, the author remarks, has been to give the history of an idea, not the history of a person; to trace the development of a thought, not the influence of a life; and hence he has avoided all expression of opinion concerning the character and works of Jesus. "Jesus is the name of a man; Christ, or rather the Christ, is the name of an idea. The history of Jesus is the history of an individual; the history of the Christ is the history of a doctrine." With regard to the person of Jesus, Mr. Frothingham acknowledges the difficulty—which he states with great strength of language—of forming a consistent and harmonious conception from the narratives of the Evangelists. He is content with the confession that the image of Jesus is lost, and that no materials exist for the true construction of his personal history. The results of Mr. Frothingham's inquiries, however vehemently they may be called in question, will not surprise the student of speculative criticism since the commencement of the nineteenth century. Its essential features have been anticipated by the ingenious European scholars, to whom the author acknowledges his obligations, although the method of treatment and the course of illustration in the present volume bear the stamp of originality, as well as of acuteness and vigor.—N. Y. Tribune.

AT THE SUPPER in Bayreuth, given to the patrons of the performance, just after the first cycle of the "Ring of the Nibelungs," Count Apponyi, a distinguished Hungarian nobleman and a well-known musical amateur, proposed Wagner's health. The toast was a beautiful and poetic one, and as its text is drawn from the great opera itself it may not prove uninteresting. It was as follows:—

Ladies and Gentlemen,—A distinguished German's eloquent words having done homage to the creator of the beautiful work that has held us all entranced, I trust that it may not seem too presumptuous in a foreign attendant on this grand festival if he endeavor to give utterance to our common feelings.

You yourself, revered and honored master, based on a quotation the words in which you disclosed to us the very soul of your ideal. With your permission I shall follow the example you have set. Allow me to quote the author of the drama which has delighted us all these beautiful days. Yet not his words alone am I desirous of borrowing, but rather the inspiration of an entire scene.

On a lonely peak, wrapped in death-like slumber, lay Brünnhilde, the virgin Muse of Tragedy. A sea of fire surged at the base of this mountain; even-omned hatred in every form, scathing tongues of envy, slander, and mocking insolence shot up in flames and sparks, striking terror into the hearts of all who had come to deliver the maid. Round about lay heaped the sooty ashes of mediocrity, hot and scorching. That hero alone who knew no fear might pass through them to awaken the sleeping beauty.

And he has come, the fearless one. You heard of the spell-bound maiden. Without hesitation you plunged into the blaze, brandishing Nothing, the mighty sword which your own hand had forged again out of the fragments of classic art. In heroic disregard of the consequences, you cleft your way through those ash-heaps of mediocrity, the hot dust whirling hither and thither. Your eyes were fixed upon that lofty ideal. You strode through the vengeful element that was impotent to slinge a single hair of your head, for you knew no fear! At last you climbed the final crag, and before the eyes of your enthusiastic followers you woke the spell-bound goddess with the kiss of your genius.

Let us then join in the exultant cry of the divine muse, as, born again into a new and ideal life, she sinks into her hero's arms—"All hail, thou conquering light!"

A CORRESPONDENT sends us the story of a certain clergyman, who in one of his sermons discussed at some length the "farmers' war," and among other things said, "Beware of middlemen! Have nothing to do with them; but always buy direct from headquarters." The next morning our pastor started for the market, basket upon arm, for the butcher's shop, where he ordered a steak. "No, sir," said the butcher, "you can have no steak from my shop." "Why not?" exclaimed the astonished preacher; "haven't I always paid for my meat?" "Oh, yes; but I heard you preach yesterday, and you pledged yourself to buy nothing more of middlemen. Now, I am a middleman, and if you want any more beef you can just go to the steer for it." A very pretty story, though it may not prove much, upon fair consideration, either for or against the Grangers.—New York Tribune.

DREAMS.

"We're dreamin' all the time, ain't we?"

Said a wee boy, as he Stood by the window, drawing
His tiny bird and tree.

In a long silence buried,
He busily had wrought,
Till suddenly he queried
If true had been his thought.

Well, we are often dreaming;
In daytime's earnest hours,
When night is far, in seeming,
And sunny are the bowers;

And, did we never waken
To know the real, I ween
Our joy were more unshaken,
Our sorrow far less keen.

We dream of homes unbroken;
We wake to feel the pain,—
The agony unspoken
Comes back again—again.

In dreams we're nearing ever
Some verdant isle of peace,
Where care's corroding fever
And vexing tumult cease.

We wake to the caressing
Of burden and of band,
Each day more closely pressing
The strife on every hand.

We dream the wave our pebbles
Have made along the shore
May wait some shining jewel
Upon the Evermore.

We wake as o'er it yonder
Opposing waters beat;
Our precious little billow
Lies foaming at our feet.

We dream a gory fountain
Will make us whole and clean;
What wonder, if we hasten
To bathe in its sheen?

We wake to find the garment
Our souls had worn of yore,
In tattered, soiled adornment,
Tight-clinging as before.

Our dreams divine relying,
We break the "living bread";
We wake still famished, crying,
Unsatisfied, unfed.

We dream of perfect goodness;
We dream of perfect love,—
That all we wish and wait for
Is waiting us above.

Be patient, darling Winny!
For long the years will seem,
If you find out too early
That "life is but a dream." H. M.

CENTENNIAL CONGRESS OF LIBERALS.

EQUAL RIGHTS IN RELIGION: Report of the Centennial Congress of Liberals, and Organization of the National Liberal League, at Philadelphia, on the Fourth of July, 1876. With an Introduction and Appendix. Boston: Published by the National Liberal League. 1876. Pages 190. Price, in paper covers, $1.00; in cloth, $1.25.

The above Report contains a complete history of the Liberal League movement, a full report of the eight sessions of the Congress, lists of the contributors to the Congress fund and of the charter members of the National Liberal League, the Constitution and list of officers of the latter, extracts from letters by distinguished supporters of the movement, etc., etc. It also contains essays by F. E. Arbot on "The Liberal League movement; its Principles, Objects, and Scope"; by Mrs. C. B. Kilgore on "Democracy"; by James Parton on "Cathedrals and Beer; or, The Immorality of Religious Capitals"; by B. F. Underwood on "The Practical Separation of Church and State"; by C. F. Paige on the question, "Is Christianity Part of the Common Law?" by D. Y. Kilgore on "Ecclesiasticism in American Politics and Institutions"; and by C. D. B. Mills on "The Sufficiency of Morality as the Basis of Civil Society." Also, the "Address of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists to the Centennial Congress of Liberals," and the "Patriotic Address of the National Liberal League to the People of the United States." This book is the Centennial monument of American Liberalism, and must acquire new interest and importance every year as the record of the first organized demand by American freemen for the TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

All those who received the "Certificate of Membership of the Centennial Congress of Liberals," which was sent to the eight hundred persons who signed and returned the "application for membership," will receive this Report on forwarding ten cents to defray expenses. Others can receive it at the above-mentioned price by addressing the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 221 Washington Street, Boston.

THE "RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT" PETITION.

At a public meeting held in Cambridge, Ohio, November 14, 1876, by the advocates of the Christian Amendment, Rev. J. P. Lytle, President of the Ohio State branch of the "National Reform Association," used this argument in favor of recognizing Christianity in the United States Constitution: "Mr. Lytle in his address pointed out the fact that the religious [Christian] amendment of the Constitution, so far from being a measure contemptible for the fewness and weakness of its advocates, has been in principle indorsed and adopted by the Senate of the United States. In the School Amendment, as passed in the Senate last summer by a vote of nearly two to one, the necessity for some such Constitutional provision as we seek was confessed, and an attempt made to supply it which, if successful, would have been a long step toward the end we seek."

What Mr. Lytle said is only too true. The passage of some Constitutional amendment involving the whole question of State Christianization or State Secularization is certain in the not distant future. All friends of such an amendment as shall guarantee and protect Equal Rights in Religion by securing the Total Separation of Church and State are earnestly urged to circulate the petition of the National Liberal League to that effect. Printed petitions, all ready for circulation, will be sent to any one on receipt of a stamp for return postage. Address the National Liberal League, 221 Washington Street, Boston.

THE NEW YORK Independent of March 15 remarked: "How many people are there in the United States, we wonder, who ever heard of Chauncey Wright? Very few, we presume; yet the London Academy says that 'one of the finest philosophical minds which America or any country has produced was Mr. Chauncey Wright, of Cambridge, Mass., who died some two years ago, in the prime of life.'" This "wonder" is delicious. Is the "wonderer" aware that Henry Holt & Co., of New York, have published a most valuable volume entitled Philosophical Discussions by Chauncey Wright, and edited by one of the first scholars of Harvard, Professor Charles Eliot Norton? It is evident that the Independent writes for "the unlettered sceptics of the West." Its own graphic phrase has come home to roost at last.

WOMEN AND CHRISTIANITY.

Several weeks ago, being struck with the great disparity in the number of requests for prayer made by men as compared with the number of those made by women, at the Moody and Sankey meetings, we began to clip from the daily issues of the Boston Journal the successive lists of these requests. Such lists were not published every day, and latterly seem to be almost discontinued; nevertheless, collating all that came under our notice in the morning Journal day after day, we now subjoin a statistical table of no little interest, following the classification of the revivalists themselves and presenting in convenient form the condensed results of our comparison. We give the number only of those by whom, not of those for whom, the requests were made, and pass over all cases in which the sex is not indicated:—

There are many points of interest in these figures.

1. No other equally trustworthy criterion probably be found of the relative degrees of faith in the Orthodox gospel really cherished by the two sexes. All sects and denominations of Protestantism have combined and cooperated in support of the Moody and Sankey revival, from the Episcopalian even to the Unitarian; and the general proportion of men to women above exemplified may be fairly considered as representative of the present status of Protestant Evangelical believers as a whole. No analysis of the same kind with respect to the lists of church-members or the constitution of Sunday congregations could furnish so satisfactory conclusions; for a great many men attend church services, and even join the church itself, merely from social, family, or business considerations. But these requests for prayer can be supposed to spring only from genuine faith in the Orthodox religion (except in the very few ludicrous instances in which the petitioners may be reasonably suspected of a design to quiz the revivalists), since no motive of fashionable or selfish conformity can be imagined for making these private requests. Here, if anywhere, earnestness and sincerity must be taken for granted. The above comparison throws more light than any other that can be instituted upon the relative numbers of men and women who cherish a deep, vital, controlling faith in the gospel which the Evangelical churches all nominally profess and teach.

2. The greater solicitude of parents for the salvation of their children than of children for that of their parents, which it is one of the incidental results of our comparison to show, may have various reasons; but it is a striking fact that 87 fathers request prayers, and only 7 sons,—515 mothers, and only 25 daughters. This noticeable discrepancy may be due to the giddiness of childhood and youth, to the greater intensity of parental love, or possibly, in part at least, to the fact that the rising generation are less devout, and cherish far less earnest faith in the truth of Orthodoxy, than the generations which preceded. So many influences of a heterodox kind increasingly surround the young to-day, that it is difficult not to recognize in them at least one of the causes for the remarkable difference thus brought out.

3. But it is not the difference in the intensity of faith in parents and in children which is the chief lesson of these instructive statistics. A far more significant fact is the difference with regard to men and to women. Here are requests for prayer from 87 fathers and 515 mothers, 7 sons and 25 daughters, 24 husbands and 364 wives, 45 brothers and 371 sisters,— in all 187 men and 1284 women! What does this mean? That women are better than men, more spiritually-minded, more devoted to ideals of divine purity and goodness? Or that women on the average are less educated than men, less emancipated from superstition, less protected from the narrowing and stunting influence of the clergy? Or that Christianity itself, by its overstrained emotionalism and its excessive emphasis on love at the expense of truth, is essentially a woman's religion, and ill-adapted to the intellectual, moral, and practical demands of manly men? Probably there is some degree of truth in all these suppositions. But when (judging by the above table) we see that, out of the whole number of earnest believers who have faith in the prayers of the Church sufficiently strong to ask for them, 87 and three-tenths per cent. are women, and only 12 and seven-tenths per cent. are men, is it not quite clear that women are the chief dependence and support of Christianity in the United States, and that, without this support, Christianity could not long sustain itself as a social power at all? Nothing is more evident to our own mind than that the Christian religion has already lost its real, if not its nominal, hold on the cultivated masculine mind of the nineteenth century, and only retains its hold on modern society because, comparatively speaking, the feminine mind is seldom sufficiently cultivated to have outgrown its influence.

4. When the education of women is made thorough and comprehensive,—when all artificial obstacles to her free development and activity have been removed,—when her participation in public affairs has given scope and career to her long-repressed intellectual powers, and matters of universal concern, no longer regarded as dry and tedious, assume their due importance in her eyes,—then we believe that, without losing a particle of the loveliness and sweet domesticity which must always remain her especial and peculiar power, woman will realize her own destiny far less haltingly than now, and at the same time unite it more truly, intelligently, and nobly with that of man. The spectacle exhibited in the above table is to us a most sad and humiliating one. It tells of woman's degradation and man's danger. It proves that she is at once the tool and the victim of ecclesiasticism, and that, if she possessed to-day a decisive voice in the determination of our national destinies, it is too probable that she would remand the Republic to the ecclesiastical despotisms and miseries of a thousand years ago. The enlightened minority of her sex, the Somervilles, the Martineaus, the George Eliots, the Lucretia Motts, prove to the world what sublime possibilities of universal import lie in woman's nature, and prophesy what the future has yet in store for the world when woman has shaken off the superstitions by which she has been so long and so cruelly bound. But she must shake them off, or she will sink herself and man in one common ruin.

We will close this article by the following letter, which we find published in the Toledo Ballot Box for March—whether it was read at the Convention referred to, or not, we do not know:—

BOSTON, Mass., Jan. 10, 1877.

DEAR MRS. STANTON:—

It is with some little pain, I confess, that I accept your very courteous invitation to write a letter for your Washington Convention on the 19th instant; for what I must say, if I say anything at all, is what I know will be very unacceptable—I fear very displeasing—to the majority of those to whom you will read it. If you conclude that my letter will obstruct, and not facilitate, the advancement of the cause you have so faithfully labored for these many years, you have my most cheerful consent to deliver it over to that general asylum of profitless productions—the waste-basket.

Running this risk, however, I have this brief message to send to those who now meet on behalf of woman's full recognition as politically the equal of man: namely, that every woman suffragist who upholds Christianity tears down with one hand what she seeks to build up with the other—that the Bible sanctions the slavery-principle itself, and applies it to woman as the divinely ordained subordinate of man,—and that, by making herself the great support and mainstay of instituted Christianity, woman rivets the chain of superstition on her own soul and on man's soul alike, and justifies him in obeying this religion by keeping her in subjection to himself. If Christianity and the Bible are true, woman is man's servant, and ought to be. The Bible gave to negro slavery its most terrible power—that of summoning the consciences of the Christians to its defence; and the Bible gives to woman slavery the same terrible power. So plain is this to me that I take it as a mere matter of course, when all the eloquence of the woman suffrage platform fails to rouse the Christian women of this country to a proper assertion of their rights. What else could one expect? Women will remain contented subjects and subordinates just so long as they remain devoted believers in Christianity; and no amount of argument, or appeal, or agitation can change this fact. If you cannot educate women as a whole out of Christianity, you cannot educate them as a whole into the demand for equal rights.

The reason of this is short: Christianity teaches the rights of God, not the rights of man or woman. You may search the Bible from Genesis to Revelations, and not find one clear, strong, bold affirmation of human rights as such; yet it is on human rights as such,—on the equality of all individuals, man or woman, with respect to natural rights,—that the demand for woman suffrage must ultimately rest. I know I stand nearly alone in this, but I believe from my soul that the woman movement is fundamentally anti-Christian, and can find no deep justification but in the ideas, the spirit, and the faith of Free Religion. Until woman come to see this too, and to give their united influence to this latter faith, political power in their hands would destroy even that measure of liberty which freethinkers of both sexes have painfully established by the sacrifices of many generations. Yet I should vote for woman suffrage all the same, because it is woman's right.

Yours very cordially,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIANS.

The significance of the communion service at "Trinity," in which representative Unitarians joined, is not exhausted. The discussion has thus far turned on the propriety of participating in a rite without regard to the meaning attached to it by the officiating priest. As Mr. Brooks was the first to disregard the distinctive purport of the rite in giving the invitation, the Unitarians who accepted it are to this extent relieved from the responsibility. The more important matter is the admission by an Episcopal priest that a Unitarian may be a Christian, for it cannot be presumed that he would offer the sacrament to any others. The denial of the Christian name to Unitarians has been almost universal. All the great Christian bodies, Eastern and Western, Southern and Northern Roman and Lutheran, Anglican and Dissenting, agree in declaring Unitarianism to be no legitimate form of Christianity. Dr. Arnold deliberately put on paper his persuasion that the tenets of the Unitarians alone, among all the dissenters in the kingdom, were irreconcilable with the "essentials of Christianity." The grounds for such an opinion are obvious and reasonable. The Christ of the Unitarians has none of the attributes and performs none of the functions of the Christian Savior. He is not God; he is neither omnipotent nor omniscient; at the highest, he is a derivative and subordinate being, superhuman, preëxistent perhaps, but not the absolute Lord of the spiritual world; not the final arbiter of the spiritual destinies of man. The rationale of his mission is thus taken away; the doctrine of the fall of man in Adam being rejected, the depravity of human nature being denied, the impossibility of salvation outside of the Christian Church being called in question, the everlasting reprobation of unbelievers being repudiated, the Christ has no longer a raison d'être. A reformer, teacher, inspirer, saint he may be, but no Savior. The entire discrediting of his divine claims, and the adoption of him into the order of humanity, followed speedily and unavoidably. The stand made on the position that he revealed by special commission the doctrines of God and Immortality, was abandoned almost as soon as taken, and there remained only the assumed perfection of his manhood, which, even if admitted, offered no substitute for the quality of a divine Redeemer. The Unitarians, therefore, were logically driven out of Christendom and forced to take refuge among the friends of social culture and reform. Their place was with men of letters, teachers, philanthropists, believers in progress. The Christian name they still claimed and bore, partly from habit, partly from association, partly from reverent affection, partly from conviction that the New Testament justified them in so doing. For a good while it seemed clear that the Christianity of Christ had been corrupted, that the doctrines entertained by Christendom were falsifications of the original faith, and they felt more than justified,—they felt called to recover and recommend the best religion. Recent investigations into the origin of Christianity have disclosed the fact that "Christianity," the professed faith of Christendom, is a natural development from the original germ, not a corruption, and the last logical foothold of Unitarianism is removed. Its position outside of Christendom is now distinctly assigned. It is seen to have been, at its brightest, what M. D. Conway well names the "after-glow" of Christianity; an after-glow that seemed rapidly fading into the gray.

And now is it, or is it not, an encouraging sign that "Christianity" is beginning to acknowledge what it had so persistently discarded? Is it a good sign that W. E. Gladstone speaks of James Martineau as one of the eminent Christian teachers of this generation; that Phillips Brooks invites Unitarian ministers to receive the holy sacrament at his hands? It may signify one of two things: either that Christianity is losing its distinctive character and falling into a state of decline, or that Unitarianism is reconsidering its positions, and is returning to the Christendom it had left. They who are not prepared to accept either inference, must at all events allow that definitions and interpretations are losing their sharpness, and this is an indication that the intellectual boundaries of faith are giving way. When this occurs, the faith is in process of decomposition,—a fact that may as well be admitted. O. B. F.

PROFESSOR HYATT ON THE RISE AND DECAY OF THE RACES.

A NEW VIEW IN EVOLUTION.

This interesting paper, followed by a discussion no less interesting, was read at the December meeting of the Chestnut Street Club, at the house of Rev. J. T. Sargent. Prof. Alpheus Hyatt, a pupil of Agassiz, has become widely known in the world of biological science by the interesting additions to human knowledge which have resulted from his original investigations in zoology and paleontology. He commenced by saying that his subject was "A new view in, rather than of, Evolution"; and then gave a brief sketch of the Darwinian hypothesis. This hypothesis found science in possession of the knowledge that there was in the animal kingdom a certain progress in structure. Vertebrate animals possess backbones; arthropods are characterized by their rings; radiata by their star-like forms, etc. Long before Darwin's time, a progression was seen from the lower or more general types to the higher or more specific. As the subject was investigated, it became apparent that the differences between those kinds of animals most nearly related became smaller and smaller, and that the hypothesis which would account for these differences would account for all the varieties of the animal kingdom. Darwin proposed the doctrine of Natural Selection, according to which contentions arising between animals resulted in favor of the strongest or most skilful, so that, if more were crowded into one spot than could survive with their rapidly-increasing progeny, the survivors were naturally those most able to conquer in the contention, and thus their peculiar advantages were perpetuated by inheritance.

This hypothesis seems so simple and almost self-evident that we may call it mere plain common-sense. The little hypothesis which I shall now try to present, while in general subordinate to this main hypothesis, seems in one point to come into collision with it, as we shall see.

When we trace back all the different kinds of animal life to its simplest conditions, we find almost perfect similarity; and the very differences arise out of the similarities. An amoeba was then sketched upon the black-board, a mere irregular-shaped mass enclosing a simple cell. This is the type of the most simple of animals. As we advance to the higher groups, small differences occur, the general similarity remaining, and new races arise from these slight differences.

The supposition, therefore, becomes very strong, not perhaps amounting to absolute demonstration, as claimed by Huxley and others, that these small elementary differences and gradual changes produced by outward circumstances are sufficient to account for all the varieties of the animal kingdom.

Specimens of nautiloids and ammonites, both of fossil and living species, were then exhibited and their structure described. It is hardly possible to do this part of the essay justice without drawings, but the general results may be stated as follows: the animal, as it increases in size, leaves one partition of its shell to occupy a new and larger one, thus forming a coiled shell with many compartments, the smallest being in the centre. In some the egg-bag of the original ovum is retained; in others only the scar is left.

In higher groups the shell becomes more and more uncoiled, until at last a nearly straight cone-shaped animal appears. In these changes the progress of the animal from lower to higher is indicated by the gradual uncoiling of the coils.

Agassiz' great law that the young of existing races resemble the adults of former races finds application here. We have followed backward and downward the steps thus indicated. If we now look forward and upward again, somewhat as we might look up a flight of stairs, we shall see the connecting links, the vertical parts, of these steps.

Attention was then directed to facts illustrated by numerous drawings upon the black-board. These facts indicated that certain characteristics of adult life in former animals of allied families appeared earlier and earlier in the youth of later representatives, until some of them disappeared entirely. The fact of this disappearance, though strongly controverted by an eminent German paleontologist, had been demonstrated by the finding of actual examples in collections of fossils by Prof. Hyatt and himself.

But now a significant fact appears; namely, that the characteristics of old age do not disappear, or even diminish, in the later families. But there is also a resemblance in these characteristics to those of the early youth of the race, and this was the particular research to which the essayist had given much attention.

It seemed to indicate that not only did individuals have their youth, prime, old age, decay, and death, but that the same is the fate of different races of animals, probably including man himself.

A spirited discussion followed the reading of the essay, calling out Rev. Dr. Bartol, Dr. T. Sterry Hunt, the eminent geologist and chemist, Mr. F. E. Abbot, Rev. M. J. Savage, Rev. Dr. Warren, the President of Boston University, D. A. Wasson, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and others.

In answer to questions by Dr. Bartol as to whether any of the higher qualities of the adult age seemed to disappear in the older ages of races, Prof. Hyatt remarked that, while this was a matter of some doubt, it seemed to be so indicated. The life of races seems to be epitomized by that of individuals. If you know the individual, you know the whole race. Evolution does not seem to indicate perpetuity. There may be a law of evolution, the reverse of evolution,—a law of decay and death. This he had tried to illustrate in the groups of ammonites and nautiloids. Races develop as individuals; groups branch off, grow old, and finally the race becomes worn out, the vitality diminishes, as in individuals, and the race dies.

Dr. Bartol asked if the essayist had noticed, when extraordinary powers were inherited by individuals in the human race, whether they had appeared earlier than in the parents, and that vitality had become sooner exhausted in their descendants. While ignorant on this subject, he had the impression that this tendency is indicated in history and biography.

Prof. Hyatt could not answer this question, having only investigated animals; but its discussion was extremely interesting to him. If the facts were as Dr. Bartol supposed, it was a very strong point. Darwin had only accounted for the inheritance of favorable qualities, not of unfavorable ones. As strongly favorable characteristics disappear, miscellaneous ones come in, so that in the old age of groups there is a complete hodge-podge of characteristics, a refuse lot of odds and ends; and thus the study of these groups becomes very perplexing.

DR. BARTOL.—Have you been able to see any other mode of development aside from that proposed by Darwin?

PROF. HYATT.—No other, excepting perhaps cataclysms and old age.

DR. BARTOL.—Then are the so-called "missing links" a necessary consequence of the facts of the case in the disappearance mentioned by you?

PROF. HYATT.—There is no possibility of ever tracing all the links; for the distinction of species really means nothing. No two persons would decide alike in marking out species; it is only an idea. Mediterranean and West Indian sponges are examples. Even dealers could see great differences; yet when you try to draw the lines defining the differences, you find it very difficult. Species run together as you get more facts. Darwin's hypothesis does not explain all the facts, as for instance those of old age. He does not treat of growth, at least in his published writings.

DR. WARREN.—At what point in the history of races do new races originate? Do they always spring from the adult growth of races and never from their old age?

PROF. HYATT.—This is a very important question. The investigations so far made seem to point in this direction. Some races are much longer-lived than others. In fact, the hypothesis I have stated seems to agree with the fact almost too well. It would seem that there should be some exceptions to prove the rule.

In reply to questions by Mr. Wasson, Prof. Hyatt said that the whole discussion lies in the fact that successive small variations may be traced, showing that wide differences like those between man and animals are only differences of degree, not of kind.

MRS. CHENEY.—Mr. Wasson seems to point towards reproduction as an important element. Animals are born, live, and die; so with new races. Does not the fact that new races arise from the adult condition of parent races find a representation in individual reproduction?

PROF. HYATT.—Reproduction is eminently concerned in the whole principle of acceleration, evolution, etc.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE.—If the evolution and Darwinian theories be discarded, is there anything else which can take their place?

PROF. HYATT.—I will not go so far as to say that there is no other possible hypothesis. Agassiz believed in special creations.

REV. MR. SAVAGE.—Is the Creator then a performer of miracles?

PROF. HYATT.—Not to me. I do not take account of miracles in scientific investigations.

Mr. Abbot was glad that discussions like this were introduced into the Club, and was confident that in the future the scientific method would be introduced with great advantage in the investigations of religious questions. He believed that no solutions arrived at by other methods would ever again command general credence.

Here Prof. Hyatt had a sketch upon the board, showing a trunk line with many branches, but all originating in a single point at the bottom. Mr. Wasson, stepping to the board, and pointing to this origin, asked: "Have you any theory of the production of this point?" (General laughter.) Prof. Hyatt here referred to his sketches of the primary egg of the simple ammonite, and described it as a prototype of animal life.

DR. HUNT.—It seems to be the question in the minds of the people here, what is the nature of life itself? We are shown how animals differ from each other,—how they change from lower to higher. If man has sprung from a lower type of animal, what is the vis or force within which is creating these new forms? That power, call it what you will, has something of the nature of creative force. The fact that its action is gradual does not change its nature.

PROF. HYATT.—Dr. Hunt, as usual with him, has gone directly to the root of the whole matter. I do not now propose to treat this part of the subject. (Laughter.) If I did, however, I should put myself on the other side of the question. Two years ago I took the same side, but my subsequent investigations have led me to my present views. As has been said by Prof. Huxley, I see no more reason for naming the force of water aqueosity than for calling the force of life vitality.

LABOR AND CAPITAL.

II.

We have seen that where capital controls the means to production, labor is in a condition of absolute dependence. Great as this power already is, it is increasing as the increased productive power of machinery supersedes the employment of manual labor. The more machinery enters into production, the greater will be the amount of capital required; the larger the amount of capital required in any business, the less competition there will be; and the less competition there is, the better opportunity for combination. Now competition, where a large amount of capital is necessary to establish the business, and especially where the rate of profit is increased by an increase of capital (as is almost always the case), is sure to end in combination as soon as the smaller capitalists are driven from the field. Having now become masters of the situation, it will be found much more profitable to combine than to compete with each other. Prices are accordingly raised until some luckless individual or corporation is tempted to start in opposition. Those in combination immediately reduce their prices until the unwelcome intruder is forced to sell, or driven into bankruptcy, when the monopolists buy in the concern, and no one cares to repeat the experiment.

When this stage has been reached, the price may be fixed by those in combination through their ability to control the amount of production, and the amount produced will be just that quantity which will insure the largest aggregate amount (not the largest percentage) of profit for the amount of capital employed. A certain amount of goods can be sold at a certain percentage of profit; an increased amount can only be sold at a reduced rate of profit. This reduction in the percentage of profit, together with the increased cost of capital, will reduce (after a certain limit has been passed) the aggregate amount of profit below what would accrue from a more limited production. It is manifest, therefore, that, if the same amount of profit can be secured by the production of one thousand articles, which can be secured by the production of two, only one thousand will be produced, as the production of more would involve the risk of an increased amount of capital, and increased labor in superintendence.

Besides the advantage which results from limiting the quantity of goods produced, there is another which results from limiting the time in which they are produced. Although this applies more or less to almost all kinds of manufactured articles, it is especially true of goods the value of which are affected by a frequent change of style. In the production of this class of goods, the interest of the capitalist is best promoted by securing such facilities as will enable him to supply the market for a season or a year in a few weeks or months.

The result is enforced idleness on the part of the laborer for so large a portion of his time as to keep him in a chronic condition of poverty. These causes mainly produce that periodical stagnation in business which some attribute to over-production, others to under-consumption. If there is over-production it is because the interest of the capitalist is best served by limiting the supply to secure a larger profit, thus keeping the cost above the means of those who would gladly become consumers. In proportion as the profit of capital diminished, the reward of labor would increase. A lower price would bring the article within the means of a larger number of consumers, employing more laborers, who in turn would become larger consumers.

Why is it, then, with this desire to consume more and this willingness to labor in production, that all those who are willing to work are not supplied with the necessities and even the comforts of life? It is because capital, as it is now held, not only limits production, but claims, and is in a condition to enforce its claim to so large a share of what is produced, that labor is left without the means to consume. Why is it, when the improvements in machinery enable one man on an average to produce as much as six could one hundred years ago, that the condition of the laborer is so little improved? That it is improved to some extent is true, but not at all in proportion to the increased power of production. This furnishes an illustration, if one were needed, to prove that the power of capital increases in proportion as it secures control of the means of production. No one can fail to recognize the fact that the inevitable tendency of our modern civilization is to increase this control, because it leaves no work, or will soon leave none, to be performed which is not dependent upon the use of capital in such large masses as to limit and finally destroy competition. This process can have but one result,—that of forcing the small manufacturer and dealer, the small capitalist, into the ranks of the already over-crowded wage-laborers, thus producing two distinct classes in society: a large and constantly-increasing class of dependent laborers on one side, a small and controlling class of capitalists on the other, whose control in the end would only be maintained by the establishment of a more despotic form of government.

Great as the injustice which capital inflicts upon labor is, and dangerous as its power threatens to become in the domain of productive industry, it is in the department of distribution that its power has been the most rapidly developed; and it is here that the evils resulting from its irresponsible control will first have to be met. The steam-engine has effected a greater revolution in our system of commercial exchange than in our manufacturing industries, rendering possible a further division of labor and so facilitating and cheapening transportation as to add greatly to the productive capacity of the country. It has also replaced the muscular power of millions of animals, enabling men to become consumers of the food which must otherwise have been devoted to their sustenance. Yet the producers and consumers have been but little benefited, because here even more than elsewhere the capitalist has had the power to secure the lion's share. The cost of railroads is so great as practically to exclude competition where the system has been sufficiently developed to be capable of effecting the necessary transfer of goods. Where competition does not materially affect prices, or where a combination can be made, the reward which the owners of the means of effecting the transfer may secure does not necessarily bear any relation to the cost of the labor or capital in making the exchange, but will be determined by the increased value of the goods resulting from the change of location. How great this reward is under favorable conditions we may judge by the fact that one man, by the exercise of this controlling power, has been able to accumulate a hundred million dollars in a few years. Railroads are to our social system what the veins and arteries are to the human system; it is through these avenues that our social system is nourished and its waste repaired. The control of this system in irresponsible hands renders the public subject to the interest and caprices of those who possess it, to an extent which is far from pleasant to contemplate. Already there is invested in the railroads of the country a capital of over four thousand millions of dollars.

Prejudicial as this power is, when applied to the promotion of its interest by what are regarded as legitimate methods, it becomes doubly so from its ability to secure special privileges through political control. Already it defies or creates State governments as its interest requires. Says Jay Gould, when under oath: "I needed the Legislatures of four States, and in order to acquire them I created them with my money. I found that the cheapest way."

"When we consider the colossal strides of the New York Central and Pennsylvania Central, the latter now owning or operating more than four thousand miles of road, making thousand-year leases and guaranteeing dividends for thirty generations, and reflect that the owners of trunk lines control their feeders as absolutely as though they owned them, it will not seem improbable that the whole system may ultimately pass under one general management." (Gov. Booth of California). D. J. K.

THE WESTBORO REFORM SCHOOL.

"In an institution where a boy is flogged three times on the bare back for one offence, and until he faints, and then sent to the house of correction for the same, as was Fitzgibbons, is it strange if a spirit of revenge should be generated in that boy sufficient to lead him to violent conduct, and to escape from the institution as he did, after serving out his sentence in the house of correction? When boys are confined in the lodge on bread and water for nine weeks without their clothing for attempting to escape, as were Turner, Quinn, and Goss, is it strange that they should have a hand in the riot of January 12th? And is it strange that many another boy who had been flogged upon the bare back, until his skin was welted and marked from shoulders to heels in a manner that would have disgraced a Southern plantation in the palmiest days of slavery, should have been ready to join in the riot? Miller was flogged in this way by the superintendent for swearing. Sullivan and Flynn and Hector by officer Rawson, for whispering when at work in the shop, were stripped naked, and flogged with an old trace until their backs were a horrid sight. Kelley and Sullivan were flogged by Assistant Superintendent Wood for a supposed attempt to take a piece of meat from a table which they were passing—flogged on the bare back in an inhuman manner,—leaving cruel marks which were noticeable for more than a week. These are but a few of hundreds of cases which have occurred and are constantly occurring at the institution. I know the difficulties of getting facts of this kind, but the committee knew of the above cases, and examined several of the boys' backs, adding the evidence of their own sight to the statements made. Boys fear to tell of their treatment in many cases, and the officers intend to have no other witnesses of their inhuman beatings present. Any officer who reveals the facts is in peril of losing his position, because it would bring odium on the institution, and of course he will not criminate himself. Thomas Gartland committed suicide at the institution in January, 1876, after being unmercifully flogged on the bare back, and put in the lodge with the promise of more flogging by the superintendent, which he escaped by hanging himself. Boys have been kept under the torture of the sweat-box in many instances until they have fainted and fallen on being taken out. In summing up the causes of the riot, I should agree with the committee so far as to say that they are three-fold: First, revenge for cruel treatment; second, a desperate state of mind from long confinement; third, a determination to get out of it, even at the risk of getting into the house of correction, where they say they are treated much better."—From the statement of F. Hinckley, Master of the Farm House, published in the Springfield Republican of March 27th.

Please publish this account. Spread the knowledge of the manner of treatment in the State Reform School all that is possible. Let it be understood that it is managed strictly according to Scripture; namely, "by beating the child till his folly depart from him." When it is found that such process has not killed every particle of spirit in him, and that he has sufficient remaining to resent his abuses, he is sent, without any hearing, to the house of correction. Shall his tormentors go unpunished? Let us hope they will receive something more than a reprimand with request to resign. If our public institutions are to prevent crime they must be managed otherwise than most of them now are. Who cares for these poor unfortunates who by no actual fault of their own have found a home (?) in the Reform School? Attempt to excuse them in the least, and what do we hear? "O, they are a bad set of boys!" What has made them bad but circumstances and conditions over which they had no control? The spirit which prompted them to rebel at such outrageous treatment would, under proper guidance and control, make useful members of society of them. Let us hope that the affairs of the school will have a thorough investigation, and that the members thereof may be made to understand that society intends to see to it that justice is rendered them, while at the same time the officials thereof, and of all similar institutions, learn that they cannot tamper with the best interests of society in such a manner, without meeting the righteous indignation of the people, in the form of imprisonment or something equally suggestive. I have been thinking that if the man who prayed to the Lord in the Tabernacle, telling him that Hartford was the capital of Connecticut, would make another prayer informing the Lord that there is a school in Westboro called a "Reform School," he might be induced to become interested in it; and possibly, when Moody and Sankey have done with the Savior in Boston, he too may go to these poor boys, for in no other way will they be likely to find him. Moody's people find the Savior, but these poor boys must be found by him, or some other power that will break the galling yoke of oppression which is binding them to a life worse than death. God speed the day when the Savior of such as these shall come! M. S. W.

CHURCH EXEMPTION IN THE MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATURE.

I was present at the second hearing before the legislative committee, March 15th. After Mr. George W. Park had made his argument for church taxation, the chairman remarked that the committee were determined to close the hearing that day; whereupon, addressing the audience present, he requested all who intended to speak upon the subject to rise in their seats. On counting heads, the chairman remarked that the parties on both sides must confine their arguments to fifteen minutes each. Withdrawing from the number, I remained long enough to hear the arguments of President Eliot, of Harvard College, President Warren, of Boston University (Methodist), and Mr. Crowley, a young Catholic lawyer. Hon. P. A. Collins, being of the same faith and practice, relinquished his fifteen minutes of time to his brother Crowley. The arguments of those in favor of church taxation having been concluded, with all the dignity of a refined scholar and gentleman, President Eliot, addressing the committee, remarked that he had but little to offer, more than what he said on a former occasion, against the taxation of institutions of learning. It did not appear to me, that the whole time occupied by President Eliot, was more than five or eight minutes. Toward the close he paused for a moment or two, and then proceeded to recite, with an impressiveness which hushed the audience to stillness, the following passage: "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Much as I admired the delivery of the quotation, I confess I did not comprehend its application. Perhaps the young Irish lawyers present did, presuming that he referred to the Mother Church.

I remained to hear Crowley's argument. He commenced by reading the nine "Demands of Liberalism," which are printed in every issue of THE INDEX; but the note at the bottom, signed by Mr. Francis E. Abbot, he did not read, which is as follows: "The above is the platform of THE INDEX so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval." What Mr. Crowley read from tracts, and what he said, made it evident to my mind that his purpose was to excite odium against the petitioners as a whole, in the mind of the committee and members of the Legislature in general. At the moment when Mr. Crowley was reading extracts from the "Demands," it did not occur to me that he had purposely left out the lines above quoted.

In the days of the American Revolution, was it sufficient cause of defamation and misrepresentation for George Washington, James Otis, Benjamin Franklin, and John Hancock to "demand" equal taxation? No man with Yankee blood in his veins would be guilty of such injustice. I would, if possible, have all unsectarian institutions of learning freed from taxation; but on no consideration would I consent that a sectarian religious association should be exempt.

After Mr. Crowley had concluded his remarks, I obtained permission of the Committee to put to him the following question: "Supposing that you, myself, or any man in the State, were worth as much as the great millionaire, Vanderbilt, who died a few weeks ago in the city of New York, leaving $75,000,000. This man accumulated this vast property from the productive industries of other men,—never earning it as the farmer does his extra bushel of wheat or corn more than he requires for his family support. Now I ask, would it be right, would it be just in the sight of God, for this man of millions to alienate, by will or otherwise, a part or the whole of his vast estate to sectarian institutions of learning, or to any sectarian religious denomination, to remain forever exempt from taxation?"

Meeting an ex-Judge a few days after the hearing, he remarked to me that my questions "were more than an argument." N. C. NASH.

A WOMAN ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

DEAR INDEX:—

Are you too tired of this question of woman suffrage to listen to a few words from a strong-minded woman (free from superstition) who dwells among Vermont hills, reads her Bible in the light of conscience, and settles her theological questions in the clear radiance of science and common sense? For my part I am tired of much of the talk. I like to have people reasonable, like to be reasonable myself, even though it may debar me from dwelling in beautiful "châteaux en Espagne." Because woman has been from time immemorial the humored pet of man and she has accepted the position, it does not follow that he shall give her gunpowder and matches to play with because she demands them. Better for him if he wait and ascertain if she understands their nature and the natural result of their careless combination. Suffrage seems to be the aim of the "woman's movement." Certainly we have a right somewhere in the dim future to demand it. But would it not be better for some of us women to look at this matter a little more calmly and philosophically?

In all Nature every element occupies its allotted place. We may make combinations and raise elements to a higher sphere of usefulness. But until the combination be made, the elements remain in their proper sphere. "Certain causes always produce certain effects." If the foundation is solid, your structure will be likely to stand, if put together firmly, piece by piece. Let us consider in the first place some qualifications needful for a legislator in the high sense of the term. It does not follow, because men gain the position who are devoid of them, that there are not certain things that should be required. Ought we not to demand strict honesty, thorough unselfishness combined with firmness to stand for the right at all hazards,—these, joined with a philosophic cast of mind, enabling the possessor carefully to weigh and determine the effect from the cause? The first do we find in woman? Is she honest in her purpose, strictly speaking? Is it honest to demand as a right what one has not shown himself worthy of possessing? Unselfishness, yes—plenty of it; but unfortunately not joined with firmness for the right. Woman's philosophy (understand me, I mean woman as a sex) is, alas, that I must say it! all outside of herself. If she undertakes to settle a question for herself, she falls back upon—"What will they say?" And if "THEY SAY" it isn't right and proper and according to the latest style, she has not moral courage enough to act according to her honest conviction. Woman has ample opportunity for illustrating her fitness for making and executing law. She has a kingdom where she rules supreme; all acknowledge her as the supreme ruler and governor of the home. Let us for a moment consider how she has shown her power. We judge of laws by their effect upon the community. Look upon the young women and men as they come forth from woman's kingdom, home. Do we see a result that indicates in the ruler a mind that makes its laws wisely, administers them justly, and leaves its impress on all who came under its sway? We do see some such. Alas, how few! When you show me the nation whose mothers send forth into the world men and women honest, unselfish, self-poised, living up to the highest call of their nature, then I will show you a nation whose women can make laws to govern the public welfare, if they wish to; and they will wish to, because it would belong to them.

But how is all this to be brought about? Certainly not by teasing to vote. Woman has every avenue open to her for self-culture. If she takes a low seat, it is her own fault. Here is the privilege to study and to think for herself. But one woman says: "I have no time; I have children; I have to do my own work." Ah, my dear woman, it seems to me we are getting to the foundation-stones. When woman becomes content to eat, to live, to dress for freedom of action and comfort,—when she can be persuaded to let the demands of the body be used merely as a means to prolong the life of that body,—I think she will find plenty of time to attend to the cultivation of the divine part of her being. No more overworked muscles, when that time comes,—no more weary days and sleepless nights. She will have time to commune with God in the sunlight, in the sweet, pure air, to wander in flower-strewn fields with her little flock, and, recognizing the purity in which God dwells, teach them all to imitate this purity, that God may dwell in them. It seems to me that you cannot force this matter of woman's voting. It is not in accordance with divine law to put matter where it does not belong. I know very well we have plenty of voters and legislators who do not possess the qualifications they should. But will it better the matter by conferring the much-abused privilege on more? When was one wrong ever righted by committing another?

When woman stands morally and intellectually where she has the privilege of standing to-day, she will not have to ask for suffrage; her right will be recognized. W.

THE STRONGEST ARGUMENT FOR THE IMMEDIATE ENFRANCHISEMENT OF WOMEN.

EDITOR INDEX:—

There need be little fear of woman long remaining subject to priests after her enfranchisement. It is the law of self-government to beget secularism. As men have gradually learned to accomplish ends of government through human means,—as their sense of entity and volition has strengthened,—as they have become more and more conscious that themselves were factors, they have lost respect for the supernatural, and have withdrawn their allegiance from religions that, like the Christian religion, are in their nature despotic. Habits of civil self-government soon beget habits of religious self-government. A pure republic is a deadly foe to despotism in religion.

Women to-day are the bulwark of Christianity in this country. They furnish three-fourths of its membership, money, and power. They are not to be changed by an able argument, nor by the contemptuous sneers that I have heard from a certain class of liberals, especially Germans, who seem to have inherited notions of the inferiority of one-half of humanity which makes sad work of the logic with which they demand freedom for the other half.

Make women, like men, self-governors, and, like men, they will soon begin to find authority in themselves instead of in the supernatural. Nothing would so quickly put government on human foundations as equal participation in government.

If a man holds and teaches a particular class to look upon another as having superior and exclusive authority in civil government, I don't see that his demand that women should not be subject to Christian priests ought to excite anything but contempt for his logic and selfishness.

The calling of meetings, discussion of methods, appointment of committees, raising money, and other purely human means to accomplish human ends incident to the famous temperance crusade, did more to make women think about society and the means of affecting it, and therefore more to promote woman suffrage, than all the suffrage work preceding, in the crusade States. The moment people meet on an equality in conventions, committees, and so forth, to discuss and decide upon human methods of affecting human results, that moment they begin to work themselves into secularism. It may be unconscious and slow, but it is inevitable. The first State to adopt woman suffrage will be the first in which women will withdraw their support from the Church as it is now. Nobody knows this better than the intelligent Catholic priests. J. E. L.

LAWRENCEBURG, Ind.

[The above is the best argument for immediately establishing woman suffrage that we have yet seen; and it is this very argument which would make us vote affirmatively for that measure. It is not an absolutely conclusive argument, but it is entitled to very great weight. There would be a very great risk of overthrowing secular government altogether, if women as they are were to vote at once; but it is a risk we are, and have been all along, in favor of running, because we too hope that women would be taught political wisdom by experience, as men are taught. Every friend of humanity, however, and especially every friend of woman, should appreciate the vast importance of opening woman's eyes to the degradations and dangers of Christian superstitions.—Ed.]

AN OLD QUOTATION.

BEAVER, Pa., March 26, 1877.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I am glad to notice that the question of "woman suffrage" is still so ably, so vigorously discussed in the columns of THE INDEX, and I take herewith the liberty of giving you a quotation from one of your own articles on this subject which I first read in your paper a few years since. I do this, not only on account of the noble position you then took in regard to this problem, but also in order to convince Mrs. E. D. C. (if that be possible) that the just cause of "woman suffrage" finds in you, not a lukewarm supporter, but an enthusiastic advocate. The language in the following extract cannot be mistaken; it has the true ring of progress; it shows that, to the emancipated thinker at least, there is and can only be one side of this much agitated question.

"In candor"—you wrote then,—"we must confess that the majority of women would probably favor the Christian Amendment; but that is no more reason for disfranchising them than for disfranchising the male advocates of that pernicious measure. Liberty must perish in this country, unless the majority of the people, men and women together, love it enough to preserve it. If they want to be slaves, slaves let them be! We aim solely to show them what liberty is and requires, and to arouse a deeper love of it; but we would not crush the Christian Amendment movement itself by disfranchising its advocates. They would certainly disfranchise and disqualify us, but not so would we do to them. Our trust is in truth and justice alone; if it proves a broken reed, it shall not be because we have been false to it, or because we dare not grant the liberty we demand. Women have a right to vote, and that is enough, whether they use or abuse the right. It seems strange that so clear and simple a principle should not be better understood."

If there is one word in the English language a true radical abhors, it is that word "expediency"! It deadens all noble impulse; it incapacitates for all prompt action; it is a narcotic for true heroism. The only way to make the people, i. e., men and women, virtuous, strong, intelligent, is to throw them upon themselves. If they commit blunders, let them smart for them, and they will act wiser in the future. This is the broad democratic principle on which our entire social structure rests; you cannot deny the same rights to woman which you have faith enough to grant to man!

Very sincerely yours, HUGO ANDRIESEN.

MR. MILLS' LECTURES.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., March 27, 1877.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Mr. C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, N. Y., delivered two lectures in this village last week. The first was entitled "Humanity as it is and as it is to be," and the subject of the second one was "Emerson." These lectures were full of food for thought, and they made a profound impression on the minds of the listeners. A number of the young men here were so much interested with them that they have been stimulated to organize a literary and free conversational society. Mr. Mills was on his way home from a three months' lecturing tour through the North-West. He has lectured publicly or given conversational lectures in parlors in nearly every city and large town in that vicinity. The subjects of his lectures have been those above mentioned and also "The Signs of the Times," "Max Müller," and "Huxley." These lectures have everywhere been well received by the intelligent and thoughtful, and have doubtless done much for the advancement of humanity. The friends of freethought should not allow Mr. Mills to rest long from his labors. He should be kept in the lecture-field a portion of the time during the summer as well as during the winter months. The press of the West has spoken in very high terms of his lectures. The following notices are taken from the Western city papers: "The best representatives of the intelligence and culture of Chicago society are listening to Prof. Mills' second course of lectures. These lectures are among the most rare and attractive ever offered to our people." "The lecture was one of rare culture and ability. Every thought was a gem." "He is in truth enamored of the spiritual nature in man, holding it as his crowning dignity to be, in the highest sense of the word, a son of God." "The lecture of Prof. Mills last evening was a remarkable fine and learned effort, and was much enjoyed by his audience."

To those who may desire the services of Mr. Mills I would say that his postoffice address is Syracuse, New York. H. L. GREEN.

P. S.—May I be permitted to say in this postscript that nothing I have read for many a year has so gratified me as your lecture on "The Scientific Method in Religion"? That lecture should be published on the finest print paper and bound in the most beautiful and attractive manner with a portrait of the author, and purchased as a keepsake by all those who indorse and appreciate its clear and unanswerable exposition of the basis of free religion. H. L. G.

EVANS' ANNIVERSARY.

The third anniversary meeting in commemoration of George H. Evans was held at the residence of Dr. C. S. Weeks, New York, on March 25. The audience was mainly made up of the surviving associates of Evans in the Land Reform movement in this country. Nearly all the participants in the exercises were aged agitators and co-laborers with Evans in the cause connected with his name. J. K. Ingalls was called to the chair, and S. H. Preston was appointed secretary. Able and appropriate addresses were made by J. K. Ingalls, John Cummerford, Lewis Masquerier, A. H. Rowe, Thomas Davis, Dr. Shepard, Dr. Weeks, Mrs. R. W. S. Briggs, after which a eulogy on Evans and a brief review of the Land Reform was read by S. H. Preston. Propositions for effecting a practical and permanent working organization were discussed, and a committee was chosen to select a proper place for regular meetings. It was unanimously resolved to carry on the movement by means of tracts and missionary work. All the proceedings were pre-empted by an earnestness and spirit of self-sacrifice such as characterize real reformers. Most of the speakers gave interesting incidents and reminiscences of their intimate association with the man to whose memory they had met to pay their tribute of respect.

THE BOSTON Globe relates an amusing incident which recently occurred on the New York and Boston express while the train was stopping at Springfield. A small and almost voiceless newsboy entered one of the cars, and, walking back and forth, murmured something about the Springfield Union, a single copy of which he carried under one arm. The boy's apathy and consequent ill-success in trade attracted the attention of a nervous-looking passenger, who presently jumped from his seat, and cried out: "See here, boy! let me show you how to sell newspapers!" Snatching the paper from under theurchin's arm and placing it beneath his own, he commenced slowly pacing the car, shouting loudly, "Spr-r-Ing-g-g-field Union! Double sheet! Terrible fire in Philadelphia-a-a-a! Suicide of Bam Sowles and Arles Chancie Fradams! The Centennial Building in ashes! Dom Pedro and President Grant reduced to cinders! Four lengths of linen hose busted! Spr-r-r-r-r!" And his further exclamations were lost amid the uproarious merriment of the other passengers and the yells of the little news-peddler, who had found his voice, and was tugging at the gentleman's coat-tails in vain endeavor to recover his paper, as the train had begun to move from the station. That boy has probably learned how to sell newspapers by that one lesson.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tena-ly, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $2.50 for one year, including postage, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 16 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to every one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Wisdom of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyses the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of these several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. ## A NEW QUARTERLY.

PROSPECTUS.

The want has been long felt in this country, by a large and growing class of thinking people, of a periodical publication serving the same purpose here that the Fortnightly and Contemporary Reviews serve so well in England. The progressive portion of our population demands some adequate literary vehicle for the carriage and diffusion of the most radical thought of our time. To meet this want, and in the hope that such demand may prove competent to maintain its object when once provided with it, it is proposed to issue, on May 1, 1877—or as soon thereafter as circumstances shall warrant—the first number of a quarterly periodical, to be called

"THE RADICAL REVIEW."

The success or failure of this project will depend upon the more or less encouraging reception which its announcement shall meet with from the public previous to the date mentioned. Believing that

THE LABOR QUESTION—

Involving, as it does, the basis of property, the principles of finance, and the organization of industry, and determining, in its settlement, directly the material, and indirectly the mental and spiritual condition of the people,—demands immediate consideration by the best minds, it is the intention of the management of the proposed Review, in selecting its contents, to give the preference largely to articles aimed at the solution of this disputed problem. While so doing, however, it will not exclude, but welcome rather, the proper presentation of all sides of all subjects pertaining to human welfare, whether social, economic, scientific, literary, æsthetic, or religious; prompted to this course by a firm faith in the omnipotence of Truth. It is hoped that the size of the Review, and the infrequency of its issue, will furnish opportunity for thoroughness of treatment, not afforded hitherto to the majority of competent exponents of radical ideas; but, while most of its articles will be of the weighty character peculiar to the best review literature, poetry and the lighter features of the monthly magazines will not be disregarded. To book reviews, large space will be devoted.

The editor and publisher avails himself with pleasure of the permission granted him by the following persons, to announce them as probable contributors; to which list he hopes to make important additions hereafter:—

John Weiss, John Fluke, Edmund C. Steadman, Sidney H. Morse, Octavius B. Frothingham, J. N. Larned, Lysander Spooner, Ezra H. Heywood, B. F. Underwood, Samuel Johnson, J. Stahl Patterson, Prof. E. S. Morse, John W. Chadwick, B. W. Ball, Joel A. Allen, Mrs. E. M. F. Denton, Dyer D. Lum, Stephen Pearl Andrews, Wm. J. Potter, Chas. D. B. Mills, John Orris, Chas. W. Buck, Francis E. Abbot, Wm. Hanson, Howard N. Brown, Samuel Longfellow, Abram W. Stevens, Cyrus A. Bartol, Joseph H. Allen, John H. Clifford, J. K. Ingalls.

Each number will contain two hundred or more octavo pages, well printed on good paper. A limited number of book and other literary advertisements will be received at low rates.

Any person wishing to encourage this enterprise by subscription may notify the publisher to that effect, whereupon he will receive a printed blank, which, when signed and returned to the publisher, will bind the signer to forward the price of subscription as soon as informed that the success of the venture is assured.

Terms per annum, post-paid, $5.00.

Address the Publisher, BENJ. R. TUCKER, Look Box 589, New Bedford, Mass.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

ATTRACTIVE ORNAMENT

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.

2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.

3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.

4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.

5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.

6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.

7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."

8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.

9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.

10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.

11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.

12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.

13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influence or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental ideas on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

MR. MOODY has been preaching about "The Precious Blood" lately, with a delight in his sanguinary subject worthy only of an Aztec. And this is the religion that all the Christians of the United States are crowding to uphold and propagate!

THE FOLLOWING additional signatures to the Religious Freedom Amendment Petition have been received since last week: from Mr. L. A. Le Mieux, Seymour, Wis., 128; from Mr. William Dudgeon, New Hartford, N. Y., 33; from Mr. Charles Nash, Worcester, Mass., 30; from Mr. G. E. Frothingham, Professor of Materia Medica at Ann Arbor, Mich., 128. Professor Frothingham writes: "The above names are those of students in the Medical Department of the University of Michigan, except two Professors in the same Department, and two others who are Probate Judges, living in Ann Arbor. Many more names can be obtained in this town. There has been no attempt to canvass among the citizens." Total number of signatures thus far received—3,368.

THIS MOMENTOUS PIECE of information, which is calculated to impress the public mind of Europe, Asia, Africa, and Oceania with unutterable awe and hopeless envy in view of the blessings bestowed upon America by a partial Providence in the person of His Elephantine Lectureship, may be found recorded in the eleventh verse of the ninth chapter of the Lewiston (Maine) Journal of March 31: "Mr. Joseph Cook, at 8 o'clock this morning, took a seat on a rock near West Pitch, opened Evangeline, and began to read, every once in a while lifting his eyes to admire the cataract. He expresses himself as delighted with this region, its people and its natural scenery, and hopes that he may be able next winter to accept the invitation already tendered him to give another course of lectures in Auburn." But our right-minded readers will be shocked to learn that the clipping which described this tender incident at West Pitch was communicated to us by an irreverent being who did not scruple to write beneath it, in ink as black as his own depraved heart: "With his head-diddle, ho-diddle, pop tweedle-dee!"

TO WHAT ruinous lengths the "gospel of gush" may be carried, and what infatuated connivance it may foster in all sorts of wrong, provided only Christians commit it! This extract is from Zion's Herald of November 30, 1876: "To find blemishes and defects in the Church and in your brethren is an almost infallible sign that your love has declined, and that you have entered on the first stages of backsliding. Love is blind, so covers a multitude of sins. A soul filled with love finds it difficult to detect faults in either the gospel or in Christian people. Charity wears an ample mantle, and can never be persuaded to turn critic. There is so much that is good, it will not believe any evil. But charity is a fruit of the spirit, and a decline of the influences of the spirit is indicated by the appearance in us of this critical mood. Your feet have begun to slide. The decline of grace in the heart is beginning to appear without. Arrest yourself in this downward course before your feet take hold on hell. Here is the beginning of ruin. Dare you stand here another moment? If you have found something ill in your brethren, the finding of it indicates a still greater wrong in you. It is apt to be the evil eye that sees evil in our brethren, or that detects irregularities in the household of our Lord."

THE JOINT COMMITTEE on "Just and Equal Taxation," in the Massachusetts Legislature, reported in the Senate on April 8, by Mr. Coffin of Middlesex, a bill providing that every literary, educational, benevolent, charitable, scientific, and religious society shall make an annual return, before May 15, to the Assessors of the city or town in which it is located, of the fair cash value of all real and personal estate owned by it on the 1st of said May, the amount of encumbrances on its untaxed property, the amount of trust funds held by it or for its benefit, and also the amount of money raised or received from all sources during its next preceding financial year, and the disposition made of such income. Any society not making such report of property exempt from taxation shall not enjoy further exemption. These statements thus obtained may be made the basis of any change in the laws, if it is thought advisable to make such change after obtaining these statistics. It is to be hoped that this bill will become a law, for it is a long step towards success in the abolition of tax-exemptions. We predict that, if these returns are ever honestly made, the public will be astounded at the magnitude of the amount of property which pays nothing whatever for the protection it receives.

THAT THE REVIVAL has for its real object the increase of membership in the coöperating churches, and that the real reason why the ministers so solidly back Moody and Sankey is to avail themselves of the services of such efficient recruiting sergeants, is a not very remote inference from this naïve confession of Rev. A. E. Kittredge, writing from Chicago to the Independent of January 18: "The following are the additions to some of the other churches yesterday: Union Park Congregational, 26 by letter and 28 on profession; Second Baptist, 22 by letter and 14 by baptism; Fourth Baptist, 16 by letter and 10 by baptism; Leavitt Street Congregational, 16 by letter and 41 by profession; Reunion Presbyterian, 11 by letter and 7 by profession; Fourth Presbyterian, 8 by letter and 15 by profession; Fifth Presbyterian, 12 by letter and 48 by profession; Sixth Presbyterian, 32 by letter and 50 by profession; Christ Reformed Episcopal, 26 by letter and 9 by profession; First Presbyterian, 26 by profession; Park Avenue Methodist, 40 by letter and 67 on probation; Centenary Methodist, 35 by letter and 35 on profession. This will give you some idea of the work in the different churches during these precious months. And I only wish I might add to this list some, at least, of our Episcopal churches; but they have all stood aloof from the revival movement, and, if report be true, have received no drops of the shower of grace. About 140 will unite with the First Congregational Church next Sabbath, 90 of whom will come on profession; and 40 new converts will be added to the Second Presbyterian and about the same number to the New England Congregational."

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

The Two Law-Givers:

MOSES AND JESUS AS TEACHERS COMPARED.

A LECTURE DELIVERED AT ARMORY HALL, ST. LOUIS,
 FEB. 3, 1877.

BY RABBI S. H. SONNESCHEIN.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—At the time when I undertook to address, for the first time in my public career in this country, an audience of this kind, upon a subject of so dangerous and slippery a nature, I was at a loss how to introduce myself and my subject. But I believe a little in my luck, or my good fortune, and so my faith in my good fortune has borne me out even now. The announcement made by my honorable friend, that the lady who will address this audience next week intended first to speak on "The Great West, the New Continent," and changed her mind to speak about the superabundance of our daughters, and answer the question, "What Shall we do with Our Daughters?" has given me the best possible cue to introduce myself and my subject. There are two great law-givers in history, Moses and Jesus. Imagine for a moment that these, the two greatest of all the immortals, are looking upon the events, the accidents, the doings, and goings on of our day. How embarrassed they must feel! The one who, about three thousand four hundred years ago, gave the basis of human progress as seen in the light of the eternal God—the other who, about one thousand five hundred years later, thoroughly dissatisfied with the standing the race had achieved in his time, gave them, as it were, a new dispensation.

The one has given life to a daughter called the Synagogue, the other to a daughter called the Church,—each thinking that his single child would remain true to him; yet look what a superabundance of daughters we have now. The Synagogue is divided against itself, with a hundred rabbis disputing and quarrelling the whole year round, while the daughters of the Church are numberless, countless, in more than myriads. "What shall we do with our daughters?" would be the question asked by each of the other. And the older master would say to his younger brother, "Go West—there is a new country, the land of which my prophets, my scholars, and disciples have prophesied. In that grand Western continent has God created his new world, and there the daughters shall cease from quarrelling, and by-and-by learn to suffer each other's faults, and only try to soften, to level, to equalize, and to harmonize that which was the groundwork of all their dissensions and fanatical persecutions." Thus, ladies and gentlemen, have I been enabled by my good fortune, thank God, to introduce my subject and myself.

Moses and Jesus,—the two greatest law-givers under the sun. The one a prophet of whom it can well be said and forever will be said—father of all the prophets as he was,—that before him was none like him, and none like him after him; the other, a young man, dying in the early prime of life, snatched away from his dearest friends by the cruel hands of fanatics and politicians. The one a venerable figure, standing out boldly before the whole world; the other, a pure, sympathetic soul, challenging our sympathy and our profound admiration,—a martyr of the grandest kind and in the noblest sense of the word. In how much alike are these two men, and yet how far and high and wide and deep the distance between them! Both born at a time when the children of their race were persecuted and condemned to death; both dying at a time when they thought "we have won"; the one at the threshold of the promised land, the other on his cross in terrible agony, crying, "My Father, why hast thou forsaken me?" both misunderstood by their contemporaries, both entirely misconceived by some of their best disciples and nearest friends; both being fully convinced of the truth, the vigor, the eternal progress and infinite capability for development of the germ they have laid down as the foundation of history. Such are their resemblances. And still how different from each other. They both try to cure, to bring balm to Gilead; both are the physicians of the human race; but while the one has in view a single patient and caring for him only, the other beholds the whole world sick, as if the world were one grand hospital, and tries to cure them all. The one is the physician of preventive measures, thinking the human race healthy, but given to debauchery, and tries to prevent it, saying: "That and this you shall not do. You are forbidden to do so and so. I place before you life and death. You are healthy, possessed of a vigorous constitution. Beware! Don't commit the wrong deed and you shall remain healthy forever." The other is differently situated. To him goes a man who is already sick to the core, feeling death before him, yet clinging to life and saying: "Good doctor, heal me, cure me if you can." "Yes, I can," says the doctor; "but you must do so and so, and take this and that medicine." Hence the difference between the "Thou shalt not" of Moses, and the "Thou shalt" of Jesus. The one, the older one, a man of action, a leader who tries to elevate his followers, who have already God's promise of old. They have heard that they never can remain in as low a situation as that in which he found them. They were slaves in Egypt, they were outcasts, they were in the last ditch of bondage, and through all, dim and gleaming yet, is the promise to their ancestors that there shall come the time when Heaven will strike—and lo! Moses comes, the redeemer is here. "Here I am. I shall lead you. I shall bring you out of bondage."

He is their leader, and goes onward, and pulls and pulls with all the strength of his divine enthusiasm, till he succeeds in bringing them out of the pit of deep damnation and foul superstition to the clear mountain-heights of truth and liberty. That is the one. The other is entirely differently situated. He is living in an age where almost everybody is at peace. The Roman Empire has nearly reached that tranquil, calm, serene, and peaceful aspect where every wheel of empire and society seems to revolve smoothly and without jar. But the clear and acute observer sees from afar a great, deep gulf of perdition, a terrible abyss of misery, yawning and opening before that mighty colossus of Rome. They think the wheels of their progress are going on level ground; but slowly their descendancy is commencing,—more rapidly and rapid the wheels go on; society is pent up by corruption; religion obliterated by scoffing; manhood is deadened by debauching lords on one side, and slaves and beggars on the other. The human race is not going forward at all; it is going slowly down, surely backward. And a man arises who says: "I shall check that perdition, I shall redeem the world, I shall save the world from being ruined." What a task for one man! It is no wonder that the wheels went over him and crushed him. The one, Moses, is a teacher, with a very young and ignorant class of scholars. He only needed to teach his pupils the A B C of religion. They don't ask much. They accept everything he says as the truth, and nothing else. They look up to him as the greatest mind of their age,—as to a man full of knowledge and wisdom, and science and power, who has drunk in learning at the very fountains of philosophy and art, and for all this and more they believe in him.

Still, like children who rush to play when the lesson is over, they forthwith seek their pleasure, doing, perhaps, exactly that which their teacher has forbidden, and that immediately after receiving the warning admonition. They are children. The other is a teacher who has to keep evening-school. His pupils are grown-up men and women, experienced in life, earning their daily bread, perchance with bitter disappointment. Their passion is tired out. Still they know they must learn something, and they go to evening-school. They listen not with such rapt attention as the teacher would expect. Rather would they inquire after the character of their own teacher, perchance would embarrass him by some impertinent question, and while but a few have the patience and industry and perseverance to hold out to the end of the scholastic season, the majority of the class go away, and, it may be, despise knowledge more than ever before.

But why should I go on depicting to you these two men? We are living in an age where doubting and scoffing and ridicule are laid alike at the door of the church and of the synagogue. There are empty churches and as empty synagogues all over the civilized world, and if a foreigner, who never knew anything of the Jewish or of the Christian religion, should nowadays pass the synagogue on the Sabbath or the church on Sunday, and peep into the inner room, finding it empty, he would ask, "Why, what is going on there? Why don't they give up the whole concern in despair? Why are they still believing, while, one of these days, church and synagogue will go by forever and ever? What a queer, self-deluding faith is this!" Ladies and gentlemen, suppose some one who is totally unacquainted with the location of the streets of your city, and the pursuits of her citizens, should happen to stand to-morrow morning between eight o'clock and nine, say on the corner of Chestnut and Sixteenth, and see all the cars coming from down town empty, and being very rash in his judgment, as foreigners generally are, he should ask, "What is that which every five or ten minutes is plodding its way up town?" and you say, "That is a car, my dear friend, a street-car." "But it must cost a great deal of money to keep up such an institution as that?" "Oh, yes." "But it must be a very losing concern, all the time empty?" "My dear friend, you are mistaken. Go you to Market Street, one block from here, and there you will see the cars crowded brimful of passengers. They are just now, in the morning, going down town to business. If you will call at my house in the evening you will find the whole thing reversed." Such, my friends, is the condition of Church and Synagogue to-day. People are rushing down town to business. People are, nowadays, not given much to prayer, but to work, and their work may be as holy and as pure, nay, holier and purer than going to Church or Synagogue with a holy, sanctimonious look. The two great law-givers, if they were to-day in our midst to undertake once more that great and still thankless task of teaching the race, would tell us in their own language the same thing I have indicated just now.

Remember, at the time of Moses, offering sacrifices upon the altars of the gods, and giving the best piece of the offering to the priest, was considered the highest grade of piety and religion. Moses, in giving his people a law entirely at variance with the habits of heathendom—knowing that he cannot cut off entirely their customs of bringing sacrifices,—does not forbid sacrifice. Not at all. You listen to the peculiar language of the first chapter of Leviticus, that part of the law of Moses which treats and dwells upon offerings, in which is couched that commandment, "If," he says, "if any one of you want to bring an offering to the altar of the Eternal God, you must do it of your own free account." Mark you the "if" and "your own free account." Moses knew that burning sacrifices, in the mere empty, hollow, shallow sense of the word, is not only not pleasing to the Eternal Father, but an abomination to him, and he tells them what we have just read, "If... on your own free account." In the same way, fifteen hundred years later, when a more liberal culture and more progressive civilization has instructed the race to a little better understanding of the relation between them and the Eternal Master, when offering of sacrifice was almost done away with, and in its stead prayers were initiated, the prayers held the same position as the sacrifices fifteen hundred years before. People were praying, but there was no sense in it. They were going to their synagogues from mere custom, the son-in-law being afraid of his father-in-law, who has given his daughter to a pious young man, a member of some pious association, and that young man must keep up the appearance of his going to the synagogue. His heart is not with him. Praying has become to him a mere stammering of syllables of no account to him. He was accustomed to look at Nature and at himself in the light of Greek philosophy. He was, to a certain degree, an infidel, but he is afraid of the pious old man, or of his mother-in-law. And so, says Jesus, "I tell you what to do. If you want to pray, go into your closet. Shut the door, and don't shout. Speak with your Father in heaven in a still and meek way, and it will be sufficient if he hears you, notwithstanding you are one of the most abominable infidels in town. For men must not only pray, but must also work. Work is the main duty of the human race." So says the younger and the elder law-giver. If anybody thinks that there is a deep and irreconcilable gulf between the two, he or she is mistaken. There are three cardinal principles of religion standing forth in both books. "What is the main doctrine of your faith?" Jesus was asked by the Scribes, who were doubting his integrity and sincerity, and he answered, as you know: "The Eternal, thy God, is only one. Thou shalt love the Eternal, thy God, with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy strength, and thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." These are the teachings of both. All else is liable to change, alteration, misconception, and abuse.

I remember once I met with a so-called doubter, a gay young business man, not given much to meditating about religion, and still he had a good nature and a clear head. He was not an infidel from frivolity; he was an infidel by imitation. Just at that time it was fashionable to be an infidel, and you know that fashions are clung to with more devotion, for the short time they are adopted, than any deep-laid principle in society. That is a fashion, too. And I and my young friend had a little dispute about some matters of religion. I wanted to show him by his own insight into both the books of the Old and the New Testament that he was mistaken, that he was betrayed into maintaining a thing that was entirely false and baseless. I asked him, "Do you want to take the New or the Old Testament?" My gay young friend thought, "Now I shall strike a heavy blow at that preacher," and he said, "Give me the New Testament." I asked, "Why?" "Oh," said he, "of two evils I take the less." Instead of feeling rebuked, and knowing my man, knowing that it was only a fashion with him, and that at evening he would go among his young friends and tell, "How nicely I have served this minister; I have got the best of him," I said, "You are right, really following the right, my friend. It is an evil. Both books are evils. Do you know why? Because the books are written. The books are printed, and for over eighteen hundred years the letter has been stronger than the spirit, and over the dead letters, priestcraft, demagoguery, and the frivolity of all the ages have quarrelled, as vultures fight over dead carcasses on a battle-field. The letters, the printed letters, the written laws, they are the evil in religion. But let the spirit be life, let the sentences be interpreted with an eternal truth and life-giving meaning, and you will repent, my friend, your frivolous remarks." What Moses of old warned his people against, was the adoration of the dead letters of idolatry. Even the name of God was altered. It is said: "To Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob I have appeared as God Almighty. Now, I shall be known henceforth as Jehovah—the Eternal." You see even the name of God is entirely new. And so he did away with all the useless traditions and customs of his tribe. He forbade, with the most severe and stringent admonitions, the repetition of those abominable customs which prevailed beyond the river Euphrates in former times. He is breaking away from old customs; he is killing the letter and reviving the spirit. And so Jesus did. The human race will always undergo such changes from age to age. What is new and fresh now will be dull and stale and obsolete in a thousand years. The shrine before which we kneel down now with uplifted hands will be cast aside into some nook and corner, where the cobwebs of superstition shall alone embrace it. But there are some living truths, some living principles, which forever will, from age to age, be held before a wondering and doubting race, as the great banners leading mankind to triumph and victory, and in such a time we are living now.

If Moses and Jesus would come down now, and survey the field of human progress, they would not change a single jot in their teaching,—in those teachings which are not adulterated and mutilated and distorted by priestcraft and demagoguery. They would still say, as Moses, to the rich: "If a fallen and poverty-stricken brother comes to you, lend him your helping hand." And Jesus would admonish the debauched and corrupt bondholder: "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter Paradise. This may not be applicable to all rich men and all poor men; the rich are sometimes very poor. They may be as unhappy as the poorest among the poor. Who can tell? And the same, in another sense of the word, with the poor. The poor millionaire is the man who only serves one master,—mammon; the rich beggar who only serves the Eternal Father in heaven. Jesus would teach still that a man cannot serve both the Eternal Father and mammon.

And if ever there was an opportunity to reconcile the great opposing parties and questions and issues of the age, it is here in this great new continent. Here poverty is not established poverty. The poor men, coming from the other world, seeking new homes and new fields of action here, if they are industrious and temperate, sincere and able in their pursuits, become rich very soon; that is, contented, and having more than they need. And the rich who would come from the other country, scions of the large-estate nobility of England or Germany, accustomed to do nothing but to go from pleasure to pleasure, who would like to pursue the same course here, soon find themselves cast upon the charity of American citizens. This is a new world, where opposing questions and issues are blending and changing and shifting from year to year. Here is that continent where the new faith in the time to come shall spring up, bloom and ripen, and mature, a blessing to the citizens of America. Why? Because the disciples of Moses, the disciples of Jesus, and the disciples of every good and noble teacher of former ages and nations will be received with candor and appreciation. The American is a learning people; does not abhor the truth because it is foreign truth. The true American has no detestation for foreign advice because it comes from Germany or elsewhere. He is cosmopolitan, a member of what we call the broadest church in the world, that takes in everybody. And, therefore, the two greatest law-givers will be able to teach here a new dispensation by blending and mingling their dispensations into one. Is it not partly done already? Do I preach a hollow hallucination? Look at the most advanced school of the Synagogue, look at the most advanced school of the Church, look at the reformed Jew and at the reformed Christian, at the Unitarian; they are no more very far from each other. The time is near when the younger dispensation will shake hands with the old over the bloody chasm of the past. The time is near when the boy in the little story which I am going to tell in conclusion, will appear as a type, as a prototype of the American destiny in regard to religion.

I had once an opportunity, nine years ago, when I was in this country only a few months, to go over to the old home once more; and on the steamer by which I went was a German family, a family who were introduced to me by a friend; very well educated, the lady a perfect lady in every sense of the word, the gentleman a nobleman every inch. I only missed one thing: they were like a great many well-educated and well-to-do Germans in this country, they were rather more than indifferent towards any Church or Synagogue. They cultivated the arts and sciences and good society; they educated their little ones according to the standard of nobility and purity and charity, and still no religion. Their children—and the oldest one was a boy of about eleven years—didn't even know what the Old or New Testament was. And when we came to Hamburg the parents, wishing to go abroad and see the Continent, tried to leave the oldest boy behind, so that he could frequent school. They asked me, knowing I was a little acquainted in Hamburg, to what school they should send the boy. I recommended—a day-school for young gentlemen, which was, according to my recollection at that time, just besitting a boy like him. He went there with his father. They were introduced to the director of the school, and received with the utmost politeness. One of the first questions put to the boy by the director was, "What religion do you belong to?" That was a question he was unable to answer, and the boy was embarrassed. Knowing that his father knew more than he, he looked up to him for advice. The father was embarrassed too. He took the boy in hand and tried to explain the difficulty as a well-educated father would. He told him that there were formerly a great many religions, which had all gone astray; that they had persecuted each other, and instead of being peace-makers they were fanning and kindling hatred and malice and persecution, and that there is only one religion, and that the one which the German poet Schiller describes in saying: "What faith I do confess? None of such as you name to me,—and why? For faith's sake!" Here the boy brightened up, and, with American frankness, goes right up to the principal, and says: "Now I know what religion I have; I have the American religion." That boy was a prophet. There will come a time when American religion will be the watchword, as American liberty is. And liberty and religion will go hand in hand; the conscience of the human race will be free from all the superstition of the dark ages, and the poor in spirit and in pocket will have their Redeemer, who will bring down the kingdom of heaven upon earth; and those insolent men, who are wanting to thrust upon their needs a superabundance, they will become softened and meek, and charitable and lenient. There will be one great link of brotherhood among all, that which Moses, the older, and Jesus, the younger, have considered and known, for which they have died willingly, submitting to the will of the Eternal Father. And the future of the Church and of the Synagogue, of the different churches and the different synagogues, will be the completest and most satisfactory answer to that embarrassing question of Moses and Jesus: "What shall we do with our daughters?"

"If I PLACE my money in the savings bank," inquired one of the newly-arrived, "when can I draw it out?" "Oh!" responded his Hibernian friend, "sure, an' if you put it in to-day you can get it out again to-morrow, by giving a fortnight's notice."

"Is THERE much water in the cistern, Biddy?" inquired a Providence gentleman a few days ago of his servant-girl as she came up from the kitchen. "It is full on the bottom, sir, but there's none at all on the top," was the reply.—N. Y. Post.

MR. ABBOT'S NEW DEPARTURE.

EDITOR COMMONWEALTH:—

I do not see THE INDEX regularly, but I saw in a late Commonwealth an abstract of Mr. F. E. Abbot's address on the "Scientific Method in Religion." It contained statements which seemed to me so unlikely to have been made that I turned to the columns of THE INDEX and found that your abstract did him no injustice. The fact that his lecture was the closing word of a special course arranged by the Free Religious Association gives a semi-official character to it; and, as it contains assumptions and interpretations which seem to me to strike at the very principles on which that organization was founded, I wish to enter a modest protest against what seems to me a wholly new departure.

Six years ago Mr. Abbot gave a lecture, which may be found in THE INDEX for April 15, 1871. It was first announced by the rather startling title, "The Civil War in Free Religion"—afterwards softened to "The Intitutional and Scientific Schools of Free Religion." The very title of this lecture recognizes both of these so-called schools as legitimate component parts of the free religious movement; nor is there anything in the lecture to revoke this admission. On the contrary, it is distinctly stated that "both classes are equally strong and pronounced in their adherence to free religion—whether by that name or not is of little consequence."

With this in my memory I confess to having been somewhat surprised—though perhaps I ought not to have been surprised—in reading Mr. Abbot's new lecture, in which he claims for "the scientific method" the monopoly of the free religious movement. He reads out of that movement, almost in express words, Max Müller with his "faculty of faith," and William Gannett with his "faith that asks no reason for itself." He sacrifices, at a blow, that noble comprehensiveness which has been the glory of the Free Religious Association, and which has won for it the reluctant respect of bigots and dogmatists. And this he does by bringing to bear his microscope upon the Constitution of the Association and extracting from it, with as much verbal ingenuity as Catholic or Protestant ever used, a meaning which, six years ago, he apparently had not even suspected.

The objects of the Free Religious Association are stated in the Constitution to be "to promote the practical interests of pure religion, to increase fellowship in the spirit, and to encourage the scientific study of man's religious nature and history." It would seem hard to frame a more liberal statement. But Mr. Abbot, by setting aside the first two objects as comparatively trivial, and then omitting (INDEX, p. 137) the guarded and significant word "encourage," converts the whole clause into a "bold affirmation of the scientific method as the sole legitimate method of religious thought." (The italics are my own.)

The significance of the word "encourage" is this: As compared with the words "promote" and "increase," it is a very guarded phrase. A liberal man may "encourage" a hundred things in which he takes but little personal part, and which, so far from seeming to him the "sole" method in any direction, may not seem even the best method. I encourage measures every day with money, or even with time, from which I really expect very little. It will not at all do, therefore, to drop so important a word out of the argument.

Again, how extraordinary an assumption is that of the word "sole," above inserted. The most extreme intuitionist may be very ready to "encourage the scientific study of religious thought," but no one has a right to say that he therefore believes it the sole legitimate method. Because an agricultural society maintains as one of its aims to encourage the experimental study of agriculture, does it imply that there is no such thing as theoretic investigation? Because I direct a man from Tremont Street to Boston State House across the Common, do I assert that it is the sole way, and that he could not possibly get there through Park Street?

Among those who framed the Free Religious Constitution there were, fortunately, people of various temperaments and modes of thought. There were those who, like Mr. Abbot, believed in "the scientific method" as the essential thing. But there were those also who believed that another path to religious truth lay in religious life itself, on the principle, "Whoso doeth the will of God, he shall know of the doctrine." There were those who believed that another path lay in the spirit of love, on the principle, "God known through love." The Constitution of the Association was intended to provide, and does provide, for all of these methods, or fancied methods; and all their representatives have hitherto met on equal terms upon its platform. Those whom Mr. Abbot called intuitionists have never so much as suggested the expediency of reading him out of the Association; it is he who now claims that they have no logical place there. Against an interpretation so suicidal I, for one, must respectfully protest.

NEWPORT, R. I.

HUXLEY AND DARWIN.

BY M. D. CONWAY.

LONDON, March 3, 1877.

Professor Huxley's reception at the Royal Institution last night, on the occasion of his first appearance there since his return from America, partook of the character of an ovation. The capacity of the theatre, which can contain eleven hundred people, was more strained than ever before in its long history, one or two hundred more than the above number having found standing-room, and many more, finding their cards of invitation of no avail, being compelled to leave after vain efforts to get near enough to the doors to hear the Professor's voice. The ladies were in their most brilliant costumes, and passed an hour before the lecture in chatting. Many distinguished folk, even Lords and Ladies, came too late to get good seats, and some were glad of the humblest position on the steps. After the entire space in front of the lecture-desk was occupied with chairs there were a dozen gentlemen who could only make up their minds to stand; and among these Lord Arthur Russell, Professor Tyndall, and the President of the Institution, Mr. W. Spottiswoode. Mrs. Tyndall, her mother, Lady Claude Hamilton, Mrs. Spottiswoode, and other ladies of their set, from the comfortable seats cast anxious glances at this unhappy situation of the two eminent gentlemen, but were ultimately relieved by seeing Tyndall provided with a chair which, however, brought him into near relation with Huxley's skirts. Among the audience were Tennyson, Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone, the Duke of Argyll, and sundry other noblemen. Dr. Hooker presided, and brought in Mrs. Huxley, who sat at his left. Among the most honored of those present was the venerable widow of Faraday. As the old lady entered the hall below she gazed for a time on the marble statue of her famous husband set up this week. In one hand he held an electric coil, the other being extended in that slight gesture which he rarely exceeded, while his benevolent face, even in marble, seemed to beam the old welcome on the audience he so well knew and loved. To the widow in her becoming cap the face no doubt had power to recall that happy day when, as Miss Barnard, she received the note that said, "for this world I am yours"—now more than fifty years in the past,—and when that love began of which Tennyson said, "Like a burning diamond it continued to shed for six and forty years its white and smokeless glow."

At length the clock struck nine, and the Professor, looking rather more thick-set than when we last saw him in the same place, but with whiskers grown more gray, was seen fairly elbowing his way in at the crowded door. He looked just a little bored as he glanced around at the throng. The applause burst out; he closed his eyes for an instant, and the next moment began with a quotation from Cuvier to the effect that the geologist is a new kind of antiquary. This statement he justified. The geologist joined hands with the archaeologist on one side and the historian on the other, and travelled with them a long distance. He introduced no new method, but only extended an old one. They parted, however, at the surface of the earth, beneath which the geologist had to journey. Professor Huxley's subject as announced was "The Geological History of Birds." Really, the lecture was upon Professor Marsh's wonderful discoveries in the West, and the object to weave these discoveries into the authentic science of Europe. But before these forms were introduced and set in their right place, Professor Huxley, with that simple art which is characteristic of him, outlined the whole natural area to which they belong, as one might lay out an ornamental space, and set a central pedestal where a statue was presently to be set and unveiled. He again affirmed his faith in the general constancy of inorganic nature, and the steadfastness of the forces which have so long been shaping it. If, he said, we could now transport ourselves back in time to the bottom of the Silurian rocks and epoch, we have no reason to believe that we should be impressed by any very remarkable difference between the scene and that which now surrounds us. We should see the same wash of the sea upon similar shores, the same denudation by rivers going on, and the like outlines of mountain and valley. The temperature of the earth would be but little different from now. But when we pass from inorganic nature to the forms of life the changes are very striking. If we penetrate the most superficial of layers in the crust of the earth, the gravel, we find forms seemingly unlike any that now exist; if we dig down into that London clay, of which this metropolis is chiefly built, we find many animals—crocodiles and others—which are more related to far Southern regions than to England. And yet, notwithstanding these outward differences between the earlier and later animals, the divergence is not so very great to the eye of the anatomist who looks beneath the form to the structure. It is a very noteworthy fact that of all the extinct animals whose remains have been discovered, not one has yet been brought to light which may not be easily classified by their relation to families now living.

Are these groups of animals, first and latest, variations of one theme,—each group on its several theme? This question, said the Professor, is to be answered by evidence; and he proposed to show what answer came to it from one group,—birds. He then pointed out, in some of the score of diagrams on the wall, the great variations of birds—the ostrich, unable to fly but a great walker; the emu; the aerial humming-bird; the duck, adapted for water and fishing; the penguin, walking upright; the vulture and falcon; the puffin, which digs holes in the ground,—showing that the bird runs through many contrarious variations in adaptation to diversities of environment. But through all these there runs the bird-principle, certain constant characteristics found in all birds, and in birds alone. Their first distinction is the feather. It has an analogy in hair, but it is not hair, nor a variation of it. Professor Huxley here turned to the black-board to describe by chalk-drawing the difference between a hair and a feather, but he found it would have to be done through the faces of Tyndall, Spottiswoode, and others; so he gave it up, and tried to do it with his hand,—whose finger might represent the mere solid hair, while the handkerchief wrapped around it with an edge floating out, and that edge broken up into a fringe, would indicate the structure of a feather. The bones of the haunch were shown by a diagram to possess an invariable pecularity in large or small birds, in contrast with all other animals; and hitherto there have been included in their definition toothlessness (though this was not an exclusive characteristic of birds), and the distinctive blending of the toes in one leg-bone and the wrapping up of their fingers in one integument. Hitherto; but the characteristic of toothlessness and the distinctions of the leg and hand had now been obliterated; the former by the wonderful discoveries of Professor Marsh, to whose devotion, generous expenditure, "wonderful energy and sagacity," Professor Huxley paid due homage. He spoke of the Yale Professor as his friend, and declared that his achievements had largely extended the frontiers of knowledge. At the first step below the tertiary the reptilian signs began to appear; namely, in the "Odonopterix," which showed something like teeth, though they are spurious teeth. But in that wonderful stretch of land between the Colorado and the Rocky Mountains—once a shallow sea,—where Professor Marsh had found millions of fossils preserved to perfection, each in a matrix fine as plaster of Paris, there had been discovered two fossil birds with unmistakable teeth. The diagrams made for Professor Huxley by Professor Marsh were exhibited—the "Ichthyornis Dispar," which was about the size of a pigeon, and the more wonderful "Hesperornis Regalis," six feet high, standing upright—as complete a skeleton as if the flesh had been removed yesterday. One of its teeth, an inch and a half long and two-thirds of an inch thick, was separately shown. "There can be no doubt about it," said Huxley.

But there is another bird older than these, of which only one feather was known for a long time. Nine years ago I heard Professor Huxley deliver a lecture at the Royal Institution upon that feather of an extinct bird. Upon that slender basis he then predicted that if the bird that owned that feather were ever discovered it would be found to possess reptilian characters of a kind not known then in any bird, living or fossil. Since then this fossil bird has been found, and is now in the British Museum. It is the "Archaeopterix," and at the end of its wing the three digits are free from the usual integument, and curved into claws. It combines wing and reptilian claw. This verification of Professor Huxley's scientific induction from a feather, which many present as well as myself no doubt remembered, was recalled when last night he presented the figure itself, which showed the boundaries of the bird and reptile kingdoms overlapping each other.

Mr. Tennyson, who listened last night with absorbed attention to the clear, calm story of the savant, might make those dry fossil bones live and soar in as good a poem as any he ever wrote. His eye followed the pointing of his friend to the strange climax,—the bird emerging step by step from the reptile! He who once sung his sad vision of Nature "red in tooth and claw" might well have had a poem born in him last night, and sing a new song of one upward pathway at least, where, the claw laid aside at one stage and the fang at another, that form which crept lowest in the mud, and hissed and darted its venom amid earthly slime, was the very first to put forth wings and soar heavenward.

It is felt by all to be a distressing thing that we can not greet Darwin at the Royal Institution. Although his health is better now than it was a few years back, he is still unequal to participation in the scientific gatherings of London. But he is an ever-present power, and his great generalization has so taken its place along with the great principles associated with such men as Newton and Copernicus, that a young visitor to these institutions might regard Darwin as some ancient worthy and founder of science. His name cannot be mentioned in any London assembly without a round of applause following. On the occasion of his sixty-ninth birthday Mr. Darwin received many proofs of the esteem in which he is held not only in his own country, but on the Continent. As many as one hundred and fifty-four men of science in Germany united to send him their portraits—large photographs—mounted in a folio album, which is splendidly bound in velvet and silver. From Holland came a similar gift, with the portraits of two hundred and seventeen eminent Dutch savants. The German present bears the inscription: "Dem Reformator der Naturgeschichte, Charles Darwin." It is the almost unique experience of Darwin, who has been so bitterly denounced by pulpits, never to have had an enemy among his scientific contemporaries in any country, a result perhaps of the law that it is only when self-satisfaction begins that the satisfaction of others departs. Darwin may almost be described like Moses, as the meekest of men.—Cincinnati Commercial.

BRADLAUGH'S CAREER.

BY M. D. CONWAY.

However, there is a little cloud on the horizon which may bring on a change in the situation. Mr. Bradlaugh, with characteristic incaution, seems resolved to fight against the law that battle from which Mr. Charles Watts shrank. I lately wrote of the trouble which had befallen the secularist ranks through the arrest of their bookseller and publisher, Mr. Charles Watts, on the charge of selling the medical work, Fruits of Philosophy, written in the last generation by the American, Dr. Knowles. Mr. Watts, against the vehement protest of Mr. Bradlaugh and other Malthusian reformers, determined that the book was not legally defensible; pleaded that it lately came into his hands along with the other publications of the secularists and freethinkers, and he sold it without sufficient scrutiny, but had now destroyed the plates. This plea and previous good character led to the Recorder sparing him imprisonment. Yet the result is uncomfortable. Mr. Watts, a poor man, is saddled with at least £200 costs, and he is under recognizance to come up for judgment whenever called upon by the Court. The evil of this is that, if the Court were to dislike any of Mr. Watts' other publications, however moral, or his theology, they need be at no pains to try him for such offence against their (it might be) mere creed, but would only have to sentence him for the old admitted offence. Mr. Bradlaugh is indignant at Mr. Watts' course, regarding it as a stigma upon the honor of the freethinkers who for a generation have been circulating the work in question, and as a surrender of the freedom of the press. He at once dismissed Watts from the position of sub-editor of the National Reformer, withdrew from his book-establishment all the publications over which he (Bradlaugh) had any control, and the result is a very serious quarrel which may result in an extensive split in the secular ranks. Mr. Watts has purchased from Mr. Holyoake the Secular Review, and last Sunday's number contained his introductory, and also a statement that £135 had been contributed to his relief. But the end is not yet. Mr. Bradlaugh, Mrs. Besant, and others, have formed a new "Freethought Publishing Company" in Stonecutter Street, and they have determined that freedom of the press has suffered a blow which can only be healed by their fighting the battle which Charles Watts declined. I am informed by Mrs. Besant that they will publish Dr. Knowles' Fruits of Philosophy at the close of March, verbatim; they will defend their right to discuss honestly the question of population, and to publish popular medical works or social works not issued for an immoral purpose; and will go to prison rather than concede that right. I understand that Dr. Drysdale and other eminent medical authorities are prepared to testify to the utility and bona fide character of the book, and that very eminent authorities will be cited to show that over-population is a vast evil in England. Mr. Bradlaugh, being an able lawyer, will plead the case himself, and will justify his publication on the ground that in Mr. Watts' case the book was not tried nor decided upon; and also, that other works now widely sold are involved. There is one book, entitled Elements of Social Philosophy, whose author still preserves his anonymity, which has a very wide circulation, having been translated into several European languages. This work, among others, will pretty certainly be indicted, unless Bradlaugh can win his case. But the stake is heavy. Failure, which is only too probable since Watts' surrender and Holyoake's sanction of the surrender, is likely to be followed by the imprisonment of both Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant for a term ranging between three months and two years. What effect this might have upon the now fair political prospects of Bradlaugh at Northampton, it is impossible to say. Malthusians will regard him as a martyr, but they are mostly cultivated persons residing in London. The anti-Bradlaughites will denounce him as a man imprisoned for selling obscene literature. Mr. Bradlaugh honestly regards himself as bearing up faithfully the old flag of freethought, and one cannot fail to admire the pluck with which he prepares, Curtius-like, to leap into the legal chasm which has suddenly yawned in the path of his party.

It has been a life of strange vicissitudes this radical has lived. He is now in his forty-fourth year only, but has been a prominent figure from boyhood. The son of a solicitor's clerk, poor and industrious, he still managed to get considerable schooling, until at twelve he became an errand-boy in the law office where his father was clerk. It was then he got most of his real education, reading law by snatches, and attending open-air chartist meetings in Ronner's Fields. But he only attended these on week-day evenings, for being a member of the Church of England he occupied his Sundays in teaching in Sunday-schools. When preparing for confirmation by the Bishop of London, he came to the conclusion that there was a difference between the Four Gospels and the Thirty-nine Articles; he wrote to his pastor about his doubts, and the clergyman (Rev. M. Packer) pronounced his letter atheistical, and suspended him from his place as Sunday-school teacher. Thenceforth the Sundays, too, were passed at Ronner's Fields, where he learned how to make speeches. To this day his voice and style suggest the open air. Bradlaugh became an unorthodox speaker at the age of sixteen, and was given three days by his employers (after consultation with his father) to change his opinions or leave his situation. On the third day he left home and situation, and never returned to either. He then went about giving delictal lectures, and speaking at all political gatherings, especially those held in sympathy with Kossuth and Mazzini. During this time he was sheltered in her home by Mrs. Sharples Carille; studied hard, but became very poor; tried to become a coal merchant, but got poorer; at last, his pride stung by the offer of pecuniary aid by some freethinkers, he vanished, and enlisted as a soldier (aged seventeen) in the Seventh Dragoon Guards. With this regiment he was quartered three years in Ireland, and employed his reforming energies in trying to make his comrades teetotalers. An aunt's death left him a small sum with which he bought his discharge, and articulated himself to a solicitor (a Mr. Rogers). Some workmen consulted him one day about a hall they had been entrapped into building on a freehold property, the freeholder claiming the building; he settled it in personal chancery fashion, by joining a hundred stout men in carrying every brick away and dividing the material among the men. He became a natural leader. In 1855 he successfully defended the right of public meeting in Hyde Park, before a Royal Commission, against Sir Richard Mayne, Chief of Police. In 1858 he was chosen President of the National Secular Society, and began editing the Investigator, which failed. He tells many amusing stories of his poverty, such as being attacked in a speech for his easy money-making life when he had exactly four and one-half pence in his pocket, and no outlook promising a penny more. In 1859 Louis Napoleon induced the government to prevent his lecturing about him. He had innumerable controversies, now with a rabbi, then a Baptist, next a clergyman, and so on,—a score at least. In 1860 he started the National Reformer with Joseph Barker, who afterward became a Christian and a proslavery lecturer. In 1861 he went to Guernsey to defend one Bendall, charged with blasphemy. He was mobbed, but managed to get off a lecture while the building was damaged. He has been several times mobbed, but never hurt, though he was never known to flinch or stir before an attack. Some fourteen years ago the Young Men's Christian Association of Plymouth resolved to prosecute him. He began a lecture, but before one sentence was uttered was arrested and locked up. At the trial next day the testimony of his few friends was refused because they did not believe in hell, as was then required, but some non-conformists, indignant at the prosecution, came forward and attested his innocence of any blasphemy. He then declared he would deliver the lecture which had been stopped. The whole region being military ground, the authorities forbade his lecturing in the open air, and all halls were closed; but he found out a limit to the jurisdiction of the authorities, and told his friends where to assemble. When the hour came, Bradlaugh found the whole place swarming with officers waiting to arrest him so soon as he began lecturing. He passed through them to an unnoticed boat, glided a few feet out (nine feet beyond the borough line), and from this primitive Galilean pulpit gave his lecture to the large crowd on shore. The police who alone could have arrested him there were at Saltash, several miles away. The Mayor stood on the shore, with the riot act in his hand which he meant to read had the arrest been resisted, and both he, twenty-eight policemen, and many soldiers remained among the astonished audience. The proceedings instituted by the Young Men's Christian Association began a movement which long ago built a magnificent secularist hall in that region; and, indeed, many of Bradlaugh's most flourishing congregations have been planted by attempts to suppress him by violence.

I have written this sketch of Mr. Bradlaugh because I believe him to be an able, earnest, true, and even tender-hearted man, while at the same time I by no means agree with him either on religious or political subjects. While I like his passionate love of freedom and justice, he does not seem to me sufficiently to recognize the poetic and spiritual side of human nature, and his republicanism appears to me rather of the old conventional type,—rather too conservative. He is a significant feature in the England of to-day, and as such cannot be overlooked in any faithful record of these times,—not any more than the Rev. Mr. Tooth, his predecessor, perhaps, in prison-martyrdom, which, however, is now made too brief and easy to secure a very glorious crown. No doubt it is well and necessary that the wide-sundered poles of the religious world shall each be steadfast to its axis; but society is getting too philosophical to feel frightened at extremes which do not become disorderly excesses.—Cincinnati Commercial.

THE REVEREND ARTHUR TOOTH.

The part of the Christian martyr has often been strangely filled, but rarely never so strangely as by this quiet, amiable, unaggressive priest. In his early life there was nothing to indicate that he would ever be known for resistance to anybody, still less that he would attain, as he now is certainly destined to do, an ambiguous immortality as the scapegoat of a principle. Born in Kent eight-and-thirty years ago, and first instructed at Tunbridge School, he was sent to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he remained quite unknown, predestined, as his contemporaries supposed, to become a prey to dumb forgetfulness. But he had a brother in Australia given over to meat-preserving and sugar-baking, and, on becoming a Bachelor of Arts, went a journey to see him, and came back to be ordained a deacon and made a curate in Lambeth. From Lambeth he went to Folkestone, and from Folkestone to Chislewick, until, nine years ago, his brother bought the advowson of St. James', Hatcham, and presented the Rev. Arthur for induction into the living. Once installed, the latter became at once known as one of those who affirm by the ritual and ceremonies they use the continuity of the Catholic succession in the Anglican Church. Being himself no mean artist, and having much taste in ecclesiastical decoration, he painted the chancel and lower walls of his church with his own hand, established a second altar, turned to the east, elevated the chalice, organized processions, and generally revived, as had been done elsewhere, the ceremonial and ornaments of the Church as it was before Luther had preached a split upon other grounds. He abolished pew-rents, and fees for baptism and for the churching of women, only retaining them for the marriage of men. His parishioners, as represented by the church-wardens, stood by him, but others saw in his proceedings a revival of Popish practices, whereupon much howling and adverse pressure, physical as well as moral, became habitual at Hatcham. At length Lord Penance fulminated a judgment which Mr. Tooth disobeyed, and was thereupon sent to prison, where he remains a glory to his friends and a gigantic difficulty to his foes.

His birthday was on the Feast of St. Alban, the protomartyr of England; his church is dedicated to St. James the Great, the protomartyr of the Apostles; and to himself has been reserved the distinction of becoming the protomartyr of Ritual. He is an ascetic, devoted, earnest, honest man, incapable of seeing two sides to any question, a favorite with all who know him, and endowed less with a great power of will than with an enormous power of won't. He is a student and a scholar; he preaches fairly but mildly; and though he would never shake the State by his thunders, he will revive the High Church by his devotion to the inconveniences and glory of martyrdom.—Vanity Fair (London), Feb. 10, 1877.

WHITEFIELD AND MOODY AS REVIVALISTS.

It is safe to say that Mr. Moody's work in Great Britain and in America will make no such figure in history as does that of George Whitefield. The reasons for this fact are not far to seek, for they are obvious on reflection to any one who should institute a comparison between the men themselves and the social and religious circumstances of their respective times. There are scores of musty old pamphlets gathered in some of our libraries which tell the story of the excitement that raged, chiefly in Massachusetts and Connecticut, in connection with the visit here, in 1740 and 1741, of the famous but erratic English Episcopal divine who was the prime agent in what is called "The Great Awakening." Singularly enough, the historical impression which one would derive from perusing or glancing over some of those pamphlets would be that the main influence of excitement went rather to causing variance, estrangement, and bitterness between the ministers of the Congregational churches of those times, than to promoting any marked results upon the masses of the people. The great Jonathan Edwards, of Northampton, on the side of the revivalist, and the able and vigorous Dr. Chauncy, of Boston, on the side of calm and temperate methods in religion, led off about equally-divided ranks of the ministry in an ardent advocacy of, and an equally-ardent opposition to, Mr. Whitefield. He himself, being then a young man of twenty-six years, exhibited a conceit and assurance which his opponents thought needed frequent and sharp censure. Dr. Franklin gives, in his autobiography, a pretty fair, general estimate of the man and of his work. Whitefield did not scruple to pronounce grave and aged ministers, who had long enjoyed the respect and confidence of their people, to be unconverted, as faithless in their ministrations, and unblest in the results of their influence.

He even ventured to assail with censoriousness and contempt the administrators and the administration of Harvard College, which was then in the main a clerical institution. The reverend president of the college, Dr. Holyoke, with some of the fellows, professors, and tutors united in a published "testimony" against Whitefield and his conduct. They pronounced him "an enthusiast, a censorious, uncharitable person, and a deluder of the people," and a "slandereous man." Such of the ministers as opened their own pulpits to him caused angry contentions among their own people. Those who refused to countenance his peculiar measures drove off portions of their flock who were determined to hear him. So when he could not obtain a regular meeting-house he had recourse to a conventicle. There was no such general sympathy with him and his purposes as has been manifested towards Mr. Moody by the Orthodox of the varied denominations to the effect of providing a Tabernacle and a body of trained co-workers. Whitefield says he preached on our Common to an audience of thirty thousand people, which is probably an over-statement. He was also constantly calling for "contributions," as he was an importunate beggar. His chief appeals were on behalf of his "orphan-house" in Georgia. In the "testimony" borne against him by the college authorities it is charged that Whitefield did not make satisfactory returns of the amount and uses of these sums of money collected by him; that he lumped under the title of "sundries" the disposal of considerable amounts, even of a thousand pounds; and that while he was wandering about as "an itinerant nuisance" he had left his pet institution neglected, in the charge of one whom "we ourselves have reason to believe is little better than a Quaker." It is fair to say that as Whitefield became older he became wiser, and expressed regret for some of his censoriousness.

The old New England towns retain traditions of the effects wrought by Whitefield's preaching. The sum of the whole, however, seems to attest that any really good permanent results secured by him were small compared with the divisions, the rancor, and the unhealthful excesses of fanaticism which attended his course, dividing parishes, neighborhoods, and families, and exciting heats of zeal and morbid manifestations in large numbers of his converts, while he set in motion a crowd of strolling revivalists who did a great deal of mischief.

So unlike are the circumstances, the conditions, and the methods under which Mr. Moody pursues his present work, that they are all in his favor, or, at least, not at all opposed to his accomplishing the ends he aims at. If his preaching is so far consistent with truth and with a good influence as to deserve success. He has general and hearty cooperation among those who represent the religion of the community. Very little opposition has been made, and very few hostile criticisms have been uttered against him. There seems to be a general desire, even among those not in sympathy with his creed or measures, that he should have full and free opportunity to prove the value and power of his zealous ministry. Those who challenge or find fault with him are held to the not unreasonable obligation of proving that they can and do effect more for the religious and moral benefit of the community by their own doctrines and methods, which they prefer as more wise or true than his. Certainly some considerable results should be looked for from the assembling daily of fifteen or twenty thousand men and women, for three months, most of them really seeking to be benefited by the preacher and by the helping advisers and teachers whom he provides for them. Mr. Moody will be responsible for much waste of time and effort if he fails to accomplish some good.—Boston Transcript.

EURIPIDES.

Europa.

Asia, thou wert my handmaiden
Ever, from the days of old;
Kissed the dust for me thy forehead,
Though 'twas bound with gems and gold.

Vainly 'gainst my iron legions
Dashed thy desert horsemen frill,
Back recolling from the onset,
Beaten, shattered, panic-pale.

But with mystic dreams and visions
Hast thou been avenged on me,
For long centuries abasing
To thy gods my brow and knees.

Asia.

With my poppy, yes, I lulled thee,
Made thy haughty spirit yield;
While my desert-dreamers swayed thee,
Laughed I at thy spear and shield.

TO AN EDITOR.

"Thou art weighed in the balance, and art found wanting."

I've read your paper for three years,
And do not know a better;
And, in the spirit that adheres
To truth, write you this letter.

I've not a single fault to find
With any one position
Concerning matter or the mind
To which you give your sanction.

And I believe in equal rights,
And for them love to battle,
And hope mankind may reach Truth's heights,
And wear her shining mantle.

I recognize your own high aim
To make the world well righted,
And think that yours will be the fame
Of having been far-sighted.

But I have many things at heart
Of which you make no mention;
They seem to me a mighty part
Of this complex creation.

For weeks and months I've looked in vain
To find the least expression
That might enforce, or help explain,
The Law of Gravitation.

And not a single word from you
(I'm not at all dogmatic)
As whether you hold false or true
The system Ptolemaic.

And not one clear or bold idea
Concerning that old puzzle,
"The bird and egg,—which pioneer?"
You surely wear no muzzle!

And there are other themes, and vast,
Which here I will not mention,
That fill my soul, and should hold fast
The whole wide world's attention.

And, as these things to me so dear
To you seem but as tapers,
I write you now—(don't think I'm queer)—
To send me no more papers!

"MR. ABBOT'S NEW DEPARTURE."

Col. T. W. Higginson published in the Boston Commonwealth of March 31, with the above caption, an article which will be found on a preceding page. It contains an attack too serious to be ignored; and we must answer it at some length.

1. "The fact that his [our] lecture was the closing word of a special course arranged by the Free Religious Association gives a semi-official character to it."

The fact that Mr. Higginson can publicly make a statement like this, in utter contrariety of the Constitution of the Free Religious Association, shows how little he understands that Constitution and the whole spirit of the Free Religious movement. The Constitution, jealously protecting the members from responsibility for each other's utterances, expressly provides that "membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone." It is made impossible, by this express provision, for any individual officer or member to represent, either officially or "semi-officially," the views of the Association; he can only express his own private convictions, without involving a single fellow-member in the slightest responsibility for them. This is the most vital principle of the whole Constitution, for without it the Association could not hold together a single day. But Mr. Higginson has never fully understood or accepted it. He is the only officer of the Association who has ever undertaken to rebuke and repudiate, in the Association's name, the sentiments of another speaker on its platform; and his action on this occasion, though promptly disavowed by the President and Secretary, has been repeatedly made the ground of undeserved and unjust reproach against the Association itself. We refer to Rev. Dr. Bartol, who said to his congregation in his fortieth anniversary sermon, delivered in West Church on March 4, 1877, and just published in pamphlet form: "What I could not speak without rebuke and official scoring on a Free Religious platform, you patiently heard." That is an allusion to the remarks of Mr. Higginson at the Free Religious Convention in Providence, October 29, 1874; though to omit the further statement that this "official" violation of individual liberty was officially and publicly rebuked on the spot and privately apologized for by several members of the Association, and that the freedom of the platform was thereby fully vindicated, was to be a great deal less than fair or kind. When Mr. Higginson then undertook officially to reprove Dr. Bartol on behalf of the Association, and when he now professes to discern a "semi-official character" in our late lecture, he shows that he fails to comprehend, and in consequence very mischievously misrepresents, the most fundamental principle of the Free Religious Association and its Constitution. We have always taken even superfluous precautions to prevent our individual utterances from being considered as committing the Association to our own opinions; it is Mr. Higginson only who has assumed to administer official rebukes in the Association's name, and to ascribe a "semi-official character" to individual utterances on its platform.

So far, therefore, as we are concerned, we reply: (1) That the Constitution makes it impossible for any individual member of the Association, whether officer or private, to represent its views either officially or semi-officially; and (2) that we have always taken extraordinary pains, and did so particularly in this very lecture, to prevent the public from holding the Association responsible for our own individual position. We said in this lecture explicitly: "No individual member can do more than declare his own individual views, which commit nobody but himself; but the Constitution commits him, for it is his own voice, his own individual declaration, so long as he remains a member. With this point clearly understood, let me point out what the Constitution teaches —NO ONE ELSE, OF COURSE, BEING RESPONSIBLE FOR MY INTERPRETATION OF IT." If Mr. Higginson is unable to understand these familiar and very simple distinctions, he may be excused for attributing to our lecture a "semi-official character"; but if not, we do not know on what ground to rest the excuse.

3. "A wholly new departure."

This astonishing discovery that we have made a "wholly new departure" is an utter hallucination. The only difference in the positions taken in our two lectures of 1871 and 1877 is that the latter is a fuller and more emphatic presentation of the same essential thought. Neither in 1871 nor in 1877 have we sought to exclude anybody from the Free Religious Association or movement, as will appear below.

4. "He reads out of [the Free Religious] movement, almost in express words, Max Müller with his 'faculty of faith,' and William Gannett with his 'faith that asks no reason for itself.'"

Mr. Higginson's inaccuracy or carelessness in representing our position appears incidentally in this reference to Mr. Gannett. We merely quoted what Mr. Gannett said about Jesus, as having a "faith that asks no reason for itself"; we said nothing whatever about Mr. Gannett's own position. If we "read out" anybody at all, it was not Mr. Gannett, but Jesus himself; and Mr. Higginson is reprehensibly careless about facts in applying to the former statements of ours which had not the remotest application or reference to him.

But we deny most emphatically, and with a certain measure of indignation, Mr. Higginson's assertion that we have "read out of the Free Religious movement" a certain class of thinkers. What right has he to misrepresent our position so carelessly and so unjustly? He commits a moral offence by indulging his rashness of inference to an extent which amounts to positive detraction. It would be an utterly unpardonable piece of insolence and usurpation, were we to arrogate authority to "read out" anybody whatever; and it is not an innocent thing to charge such an act recklessly and falsely upon us. What are the facts? Simply that we have given one interpretation to the Constitution of the Free Religious Association, while Mr. Higginson gives another; and that we no more read him out than he reads us out! The Constitution speaks, of course, in the name of all the members of the Association, and can be repudiated by none; but differences of opinion among these members as to its meaning ought to be settled by calm discussion in the light of reason, not by heated and absurd accusations. Verily it is a new doctrine of Free Religion that every member is bound to accept Mr. Higginson's interpretation of the Constitution, on penalty of being charged with reading him or somebody else out of the movement! We argued in our lecture that the Constitution commits the whole Association to the scientific method, and we gave strong reasons for this interpretation of it; but we did not intimate that our construction of it was binding on anybody else. On the contrary, we took especial pains, as a foregoing quotation shows, to say that nobody else was responsible for our construction of it; and we no more dreamed of reading the Intuitionists out of the Free Religious Association than we did of scalping them. Differences of opinion as to the meaning of the United States Constitution are no cause of outlawry or banishment; and any lawyer who, instead of attending to the case in hand, and meeting the legal arguments advanced, should wildly accuse the opposing counsel of a plot to drive him into exile, would be simply laughed out of court.

As a matter of fact the ground we have always taken, and still take, is that any person who wishes to join the Free Religious Association should be welcomed into it, without the least inspection of his religious opinions or ecclesiastical connections; that the right of every speaker on its platform to the fullest liberty of speech, so long as he is decorous and courteous, should be sacredly respected; that no member or speaker can possibly commit the Association or any of its members to any opinions he may express, or be committed by the Association to any opinions not expressed by the Constitution itself, which is also his own individual voice while he remains a member; and that no individual officer or officers can without intolerable usurpation undertake to speak for the Association, either in repudiating or indorsing the sentiments of other speakers or in uttering their own. If a Christian or a Jew, an atheist or an intuitionist or any other person, finds the Constitution to his mind, it is nobody's business but his own how he interprets it; he is welcome as a member if he wishes to be one. At the same time, this does not in the least degree cut off discussion as to the true meaning of the Constitution, nor bind anybody to silence respecting it; each member is at perfect liberty to advocate as earnestly as he pleases his own views of its meaning, and nobody has any business to try to intimidate him by accusations, insinuations, or clamorous outcries of any sort. We should not, therefore, wish to "read out" a member who claimed that the Constitution pledged the Association to Catholicism, or Spiritualism, or Atheism, or Intuitionism; we should only wish to discuss the point till it was settled to universal satisfaction. If the member should prove his interpretation correct, and persuade the Association to vote it into the Constitution, then we should quietly retire, thinking we had got into the wrong assembly. We submit that this is what Mr. Higginson should do; he should refer the question of interpretation to the Association in the form of an amendment to the Constitution, if he thinks the Constitution wrong, or our construction of it wrong, and abide by the result. But it is a very grave offence meanwhile to accuse us falsely of "reading out" anybody from the movement, merely because we think and say that the Constitution pledges the Association to the scientific method as the sole legitimate method of religious thinking. That is a species of attempted intimidation to which we shall not submit in silence.

5. "He sacrifices, at a blow, that noble comprehensiveness which has been the glory of the Free Religious Association, and which has won for it the reluctant respect of bigots and dogmatists."

We deny emphatically that we have sacrificed or wish to sacrifice the comprehensiveness of the Association. It is just as comprehensive to-day as ever it was; and that is—as comprehensive as loyalty to spiritual freedom. If Mr. Higginson thinks that "comprehensiveness" requires neutrality in the conflict between Liberty and Authority, then the Association never has been, and is not now, comprehensive; for it was born out of the love of liberty, and has been pledged to liberty ever since. It stands unequivocally to-day, just as it has always stood and just as we rejoice to see it stand, for "Freedom and Fellowship in Religion"; but the "freedom" is just as essential, just as indispensable, as the "fellowship," and the Association seeks no fellowship which is not based on freedom. That is the true comprehensiveness—the comprehensiveness of universal ideas, and the abundant sympathies which fealty to universal ideas begets. It is not "comprehensiveness" to be perpetually sending invitations to Rev. Joseph Cook and his like to speak on the Association's platform; and the contemptuous snubs with which these persons are in the habit of acknowledging the worse than wasted courtesy are by no means that "reluctant respect of bigots and dogmatists" which self-respecting men wish to invite. It may be a mistaken opinion, but nevertheless it is our own opinion, that "bigots and dogmatists" will respect us just in proportion as we cease to fawn upon them for notice, and in proportion as we exhibit inflexible determination, earnestness, courage, and consistency in defending the essential principles of our own liberal movement. Mr. Higginson's favorite policy of conciliating those who refuse to be conciliated promotes no "comprehensiveness" which does not involve humiliation, and renders impossible that "reluctant respect of bigots and dogmatists" which must be won by first respecting ourselves.

6. Mr. Higginson intimates that we find only in the first Article of the Constitution the "bold affirmation of the scientific method as the sole legitimate method of religious thought." What did we say? We said: "What, then, gives to this Association its distinguishing and unmistakable characteristic—its specific reason for being? Simply that little word 'scientific'—the scientific study of man's religious nature and history—as explained and interpreted by Article II., which proclaims 'absolute freedom of thought and expression' as the 'natural right of every rational being.'" Would any fair critic suppress one half of the premises from which we derived the "bold affirmation" of which he complains, and give only the other half? It is the first Article as interpreted and explained by the second Article that contains the "bold affirmation" in question. Those two Articles taken together, not separately, were the basis of our statement; and we wait still for the proof that it is in the least degree incorrect.

7. But Mr. Higginson complains that, in considering the first Article, we "set aside the first two objects" there specified, and then "omitted the guarded and significant word 'encourage.'" Why does he himself omit to state that we began by quoting the first Article entire, and "set aside" no part of it? He was addressing the readers of the Boston Commonwealth, who had had no opportunity of seeing our lecture in full; and he took advantage of their ignorance to insinuate that we had been guilty of garbling the text of the Constitution to prove our point! Mr. Higginson knows this to be impossible; and so do our readers.

8. "The significance of the word 'encourage' is this: As compared with the words 'promote' and 'increase,' it is a very guarded phrase."

We deny that the phrase is "guarded," or was meant to be such. There was no other than a merely literary reason for not repeating the word "promote" or "increase" before each of the three objects specified in the first Article; namely, natural appropriateness and a wish to vary the phrase for the sake of euphony. The timidity and wish to be "guarded" in this matter, which Mr. Higginson takes for granted without a shadow of reason, had no existence in the minds of those who framed the Constitution. As a proof of this, it is enough to state that the original circular, dated "Boston, Jan. 1, 1867," and signed by "O. B. Frothingham, John Weiss, Edward C. Towne, Francis E. Abbot, Wm. J. Potter,"—the circular which was issued to call the preliminary meeting of February 5, 1867, at the house of Dr. Bartol,—overwhelmingly corroborates our statement. This circular was the first public step in the formation of the Free Religious Association, and was signed by all those who afterwards framed its Constitution. It thus stated in their own words the purpose entertained by those who originally initiated the Association: "The desire is to make a fellowship, not a party; to promote the scientific study of religious truth, not to defend the legacy of the theological tradition; to keep open the lines of spiritual freedom, not to close the lines of speculative belief." [The italics are ours.] Here is this very word "promote," which Mr. Higginson fancies so strong in comparison, used in connection with the other phrase, "scientific study." Instead of being intended to soften or "guard" this avowal of the scientific method, the word "encourage" was subsequently used for no reason that can be assigned save a purely literary one; and it possesses no sort of "importance" in "the argument."

9. "Among those who framed the Free Religious Constitution there were, fortunately, people of various temperaments and modes of thought. There were those who," etc., etc.

This is a perfectly wild and random assertion, made in utter ignorance of the facts. Mr. Higginson himself was not one of "those who framed the Free Religious Constitution," and knows nothing about the framing of it. It is evident that he has quite forgotten the article of Mr. Potter in THE INDEX of Jan. 1, 1870—the very first issue of this journal. Mr. Potter, giving an account of the origin of the Association, says: "At this conference of February 5th, a plan of organization, which had been carefully digested and prepared by Messrs. Abbot, Towne, and Potter, was presented and made the subject of deliberation." This plan was adopted by the Free Religious Association as its Constitution, May 30, 1867. Mr. Higginson's enumeration of the various and numerous classes of persons who "framed" this Constitution, as if he knew them all and was well-informed on the subject, is very funny in the light of the facts.

But, while the Constitution is (according to our individual interpretation, which is binding on nobody at all but ourselves) pledged to that absolute freedom of thought which only the scientific method justifies or gives, and while those who framed it meant to pledge it to mental liberty in the most absolute sense, they did not mean to make it any less inclusive than Mr. Higginson desires. Neither have we for an instant been guilty of the "narrowness" which he has repeatedly tried during the past two or three years to fasten upon us. His efforts are not successful. He has failed, fails now, and will fail to the end, in the unworthy attempt to prove that we desire to "read out" somebody or other from the Free Religious movement. We hold that this movement includes all who, no matter where they are now, are moving towards a greater religious freedom and nobler religious life; and for all such we cherish a warm, hearty, and most sincere sympathy. It is those who hang back, and move in the opposite direction, and try to make others do the same,—those who put stumbling-blocks in the path of advance, and confuse the issues which ought to be cleared up, and carp and cavil and doggedly refuse to understand,—it is these who deserve no sympathy from liberty-loving souls. Instead of wishing to make the fellowship of Free Religion less comprehensive or broad than it is, we are striving with all our might (alas, how small it is!) to make it include the whole human race. But we hold that the way to do this is not to suppress the discussion of differences, but to discuss them till agreement is reached,—to encourage every man to seek the truth fearlessly and loyally, and to stand bravely by his own insights, and to listen respectfully, thoughtfully, and eagerly to the utterances of other men. We see no root of universal fellowship but in the universal love of truth; we hope for no human brotherhood which is built on any suppression of thought or any compromise which involves it; we believe only in that "comprehensiveness" which comprehends perfect fidelity to our whole human nature, intellectual as well as emotional, and builds up the union of all souls on the full and free development of each. That is why we believe in and advocate the scientific method in religion. The Free Religious Association has planted itself boldly and earnestly on this great principle, if we understand its Constitution aright; and we do not believe that the mental confusion or reactionary influence of any man will ever persuade it to abandon its present position in the van of human progress.

THE F. R. A. CONSTITUTION.

The editor of THE INDEX, in his recent very interesting lecture in the Boston Horticultural Hall course, printed in THE INDEX of March 22d, invites a consideration of the proper interpreting of the Constitution of the Free Religious Association. And such a consideration may be useful,—it being premised, as Mr. Abbot clearly says, that no one, whatever his relation to the Association, officially speaks for it.

For one, I have no doubt that Mr. Abbot is right, when he says that the central point of the Constitution of the Association is "the substitution of the scientific method for the method of authority in religion." Nor does it seem to me that there can be any difference of opinion on this statement among those who were chiefly interested in the formation of the Association, or have been most familiar with its history. Some persons, before assenting to it, might like to know definitely what the phrase "scientific method" is intended to mean. But when this phrase is defined as a method of arriving at truth through the observation and generalization of phenomena, and the phenomena are expressly defined as including "spiritual no less than physical phenomena," and the "method" is further paraphrased as "absolute loyalty to truth and perfect freedom of the human mind," I think there can be little hesitation among the Association's members at accepting thus far this interpretation of its Constitution. That it was the intent to found a religious organization on the method of absolute freedom of inquiry and thought as opposed to the old ecclesiastical methods of authority, and thereby to adopt the modern method of science, is further substantiated by the fact that, among the names proposed as appropriate for the new society, was "Religious Science Association." It was agreed, I think, by the committee who framed the Constitution, that this name expressed and emphasized the special point of distinction between the new organization and its predecessors in the field of religion, but it was rejected because, in emphasizing this point so exclusively, it might appear to exclude the practical and humanitarian interests of religion, to which it was intended the Association should also be devoted. Therefore the more general and colorless name was chosen, "Free Religious Association," and the threefold objects, in a general way signified by the three words in the name, were very distinctly defined in the Constitution. The word "scientific," in the statement of the third object, was expressly chosen to indicate that in all matters pertaining to religious belief and speculation, or to theology, the Association planted itself on the ground of science, and meant to make a square issue between that foundation and the old one of "revealed authority."

But while this, the main point in Mr. Abbot's interpretation of the Constitution, may be readily assented to by the members of the Association generally, I apprehend that there may be among them considerable difference of opinion with regard to the correctness of certain inferences which he draws from this main proposition; and particularly with regard to intuition and the intuitionist. There are those, for instance, who will say: "We accept the scientific method, but we cannot accept Mr. Abbot's inference that the scientific method necessarily opposes and excludes intuition or the intuitionist; we claim that the facts of intuition are among the phenomena with which the scientific method has to deal." And these persons seem to me to be right. The weak point, to my view, in Mr. Abbot's statement, as in previous statements of his on intuition, is that he does not draw any line, in his statements, between intuition philosophically considered (in which, if I understand his philosophy, he believes) and intuition as an applied method in religious speculation; and so he appears to be denying more than he actually does deny. Darwin and Spencer believe in intuition, but scientifically account for it. The only question is, Does the intuitionist attempt to impose his intuition upon others as his "say-so," or is he willing to submit it to the test of scientific verification?

Practically, too, the intuitionist, or transcendentalist, is free and allies himself naturally with those who meet in the name of freethought rather than with those who meet on the ground of dogmatic authority. The poet, the seer, the prophet, speak from a pressure of inward thought and heed not the demands of creeds and churches. They speak in the name of individual liberty,—liberty to think, to feel, to speak for one's self. They may not be able to give any logical or scientific reason for that which they utter; if asked for a reason, they may only be able to say as Emerson once did, "I cannot give the why, but can only say—so I see." Nevertheless, other men, with more of the logical and investigating faculty, though not so much of the imaginative and poetic, might be able scientifically to account by facts of hereditary transmission and accumulation, or in some other way, for these gifts of intuitionists.

The "intuitionist," therefore, is not ruled off of the platform of Free Religion. Historically he has been one of the chief promoters of the movement which has now organized itself in that name. He has been one of the chief foes of the power of external religious authority in the past, and so long as he does not impose his insights as a necessary medicine through which others are to see, he still has a most important work in advancing religious liberty and truth; and a work which science will recognize.

NOTES OF THE "LECTURESHIP."

BY S. H. M.

BOSTON is having a run of "sensations." Joseph Cook is one. The one report which he revises is, as none of the others are, very carefully illuminated with "sensation," "profound sensation," "applause," "great applause," "loud and long continued applause." As you read, you catch the spirit and the breeze of the Lectureship. 'Tis by no means unpleasant. One can enjoy it, and also you can enjoy the thought that it is a thoroughly good thing Mr. Cook is doing, considering whence he hails, and for whom he is laboring.

INTELLECTUAL life will bear its own fruit, and no one need fear the power of any sect to force the harvest into granaries of its own. So much real vim as Mr. Cook is putting into the old creeds can do the world only good. But let the average Orthodox mind get the notion that it need no longer simply believe, but may enter on a thorough-going rational defence of all it believes, and there is no telling what transformations of faith will occur. Mr. Cook is doing just this: he is putting Orthodoxy up to think it has a right to reason and find a solid basis for its hitherto sacred mysteries in "the nature of things."

WELL, let us be thankful, nor crow in unbecomingly liberal pride. With good-natured patience we will listen, nor deem it absolutely incredible that Orthodoxy can prove itself rational. We hardly believe it,—of course not; and yet, we may be in error. If we are,—thanks be to any strong hand bending the bow that can send home to our intelligence some arrow of conviction. Mr. Cook assays this task with courage enough, and he is in no lack of courageous, enthusiastic men and women to cheer him on. Cheer him, everybody, if he have "the truth of things" in his grasp!

BUT a most discouraging—disheartening, I had almost said—declaration of his lies at the threshold, as I read his lecture treating the "permanence of voluntary remoteness from God." I have noticed not infrequently that Mr. Cook, in order, as he says, to save time, withholds scientific elucidation, and begs his hearers to be content with "personal conviction." Now the following, though given in the name of much-worshipped science, must be regarded, I am sure, as none other than "personal conviction"; and of a sort, too, I feel to add, no truly sympathetic soul can desire to entertain. Judge, good reader, if I speak not the truth: "It is scientifically incontrovertible that the past cannot be changed; and, therefore, it is sure that, if regret for what ought not to have been is pain, there will be pain in the universe forever; and part of it will be God's own." There you have it,—God himself, by Adam's fall, doomed to an endless pang! Nor is that the worst of it. The eternities lie both sides of Adam. There was the Omniscent, knowing all before as well as after! Hence, regret and pain before, as after. Past, present, and future—the eternal Now of God—pain beginningless and endless! Truly, one may marvel why this portion of his creative work—our little planet—was not somehow left out in the cold, or omitted altogether!

IS THERE no confusion here,—“scientifically incontrovertible that the past cannot be changed?” Sure of this? Is it not more “scientific” to say the past depends entirely upon the eyes that see it,—that it will take on the form and the pattern we transfer to it? So far as our present or future peace is affected, we escape the past by changing the meaning of it to our minds. Dark enough it looked; there was regret and pain. But must regret and pain continue forever? Foolish to say he who sees all from the beginning, and is the Author of all, can fall into pain. This overruling, Inruling Providence,—does it sorrow over its own perfect manifestations? And when our eyes open to the Providence that runs through all our lives, how will not all things be justified? “Ought not to have been.” Yes, we say so; but it is because we forget through what tribulation and shortcoming we go up to behold forever the heavenly vision. Was there a time when we were as the tiger? Has our human evolution carried us beyond that period, so our choice is no longer the tiger's choice? Shall we feel eternal regret and pain if we remember we once were tigers? Andrew Johnson took positive delight in remembering he was alderman before he was President.

BUT WHY did not God take us up the marble staircase, and not over the red-hot iron one? In other words, why must we first be tigers? Because, as New Orthodoxy is beginning to explain, there are some things not possible with God. In “the nature of things” the tiger antedates the man. Growth is a law of finite manifestation not to be dispensed with. That which must “in the nature of things” grow cannot be carried over marble or other staircase. Man is first tiger, then more than tiger, because of the heavenly vision that comes to his eyes. As tiger, his satisfactions were of a lower order; contentment easy, with no remorse. As man, he is tiger plus immortal ambition to shed the tiger.

“The fiend that man carries
Is love of the Best;
Yawns the pit of the Dragon
Lit from days of the Best.”

Escape out of his tiger-prison—Is that not salvation?

“YOU ARE at war with the nature of things; which shall change,—you or it?” This is the pertinent inquiry of the Lectureship. Yet the drift of the Lectureship is to establish the Atonement. Is that in the nature of things? If so, then was also the Fall to render Atonement possible. But according to the Lectureship “the nature of things” proclaims, “He that is unholly, let him be unholly still.” Character becomes fixed. When? At death. Any time before that it may be utterly unfixed in its unholiness, and be transformed into permanent “love of what God loves.” This by miraculous conversion, and instantaneous. If before death, what is there in the “nature of things” to deny this beneficent chance to the soul after death? Is it not as safe to die “Iscariot” or “kidnapper,” as so to live? Why up to his last breath may Iscariot break that permanence of character, and never in eternity? I fail to see the whence from which is drawn this picture of the “nature of things”; one thing one side the grave, another the other side.

THE LECTURESHIP in the interests of “clear thought” has reduced the famous old trinity of “three persons and one God” to “three substences.” It teaches that “each substence, with the others, is God, and that neither, without the others, is God.” “If Socrates had never existed, God would yet be God”; but “if Christ had never existed, God would not be God.” Again, “Socrates, with the Father and Son, or with the Son and Holy Spirit, or with the Father and Holy Spirit, is not God”; but “Christ, with the other two substences, is God.” Christ “displayed a degree of being that was divine”; but to hold that “Socrates and Isaiah and Plato are to be named in the same list with our Lord,” is “unspeakably shocking, merely to the historic sense, to say nothing of the religious sense of man.” Once I heard two little girls discussing the nature of God,—one born Catholic, the other Unitarian. “How big is God?” asked Unitarian Maggie. “I don't know,” replied Catholic Mary. “Well, he's just as big as our house, and as your house, and everybody's house, just the same.” Little Mary was not to be beaten so easily; so after a pause, she asked, “How many Gods is they?” “One,” was the prompt response. “Oh, yes; but how many persons?” Maggie hesitated, but finally, with a touch of disgust in her tone, she gave the finishing stroke to the great battle: “They's lots of persons, for all I know.” Had not Maggie set up a “Lectureship” in that far Western town? Little she knew of the “scientific method”; but intuitively she could crack a nut equally well with Polycarp or St. Clement.

“THIS LECTURESHIP” turns its attention to the effort, as it phrases it, to rule Massachusetts from the Tiber. The Romish convicts in Charlestown prison desire a chaplain of their own choice. Is that Romish or American? Massachusetts is not denominational, not sectarian; but she will insist on her right to keep the Protestant Bible in schools and prisons, and have Protestant chaplains. Strange delusion, which cannot see that all the Protestant sects make one sect as against the Romish; and that if Romish and Protestant could unite, still they would form one Christian sect as against Jew, antichristian, liberal, and infidel. American law professes to be unsectarian; to have no Church establishment. Let the tables turn; let Romish influence once predominate, and Protestant convicts be forced to take Catholic instruction. Would we not hear a howl from all Protestantism that religious liberty had disappeared in America? An impartial observer looking on this fight between Protestant and Catholic, sees this difference: the former professes absolute religious freedom, the latter does not. The former says,—I quote the “Lectureship,”—“America demands that all religious sects, Romanists included, shall pay their own bills. To demand that a sectarian chaplain or school-master be paid by the State is to act against the whole spirit of American law”; it says this, and forthwith demands Protestant chaplains, and will have no other. As to the Romanist he will propagate his religion whenever and wherever he can get a chance.

It is reported that Romish priests have been circulating on Deer Island books full of abuse of Protestantism, and saying some especially bad things of Martin Luther. The authorities have banished the scandalous publication from the island. I know nothing of it, save the few extracts read by Mr. Cook, but I feel sure the book can contain nothing more remote from the truth than has been disseminated now these hundred years by Protestant clergymen to “inflame uneducated readers” against the memory of the author of Common Sense and The Age of Reason. Protestant and Catholic will always estimate Luther differently, the latter seeing in his heresy full evidence of his depraved moral character. But while Mr. Cook complains of this, let him take care to set his newest Orthodoxy like flint against similar misconduct in dealing with the characters it proscribes as heretical. “Boldest violations of historical veracity” have long been afloat concerning the life of Thomas Paine. “The saddest sight Bismarck saw in France,” says Mr. Cook, “was a set of school-books filled with lies.” The lesson is plain. It is fair to expect much of Mr. Cook, for he has declared, “I will be thoroughgoing if I am orthodox.”

IS IT EXPEDIENT?

MR. EDITOR:—

As the question of woman suffrage has occupied of late much of your space, and as I have never trespassed upon the time or patience of your readers, permit me to add a word or two to those of some of your correspondents who doubt the expediency of extending the franchise beyond its present limits. It has already been extended too far, as it seems to me, and it is simply a question whether it would be well for the nation at large to extend it as far as some desire. A few years ago no one believed more firmly in woman suffrage than the writer. But thought and observation have led me to doubt, like many others, whether more evil than good would not be the result. We all know that abstract principles of right cannot be applied in all conditions of society, especially in human governments. What is best in one stage of social evolution is not best in another. Circumstances seem to determine the right or wrong of forms of government and social institutions. Some of our political principles are generalizations, fitted for an ideal state of society, but not adapted either to the apprehension or practice of men and women in a semi-savage condition.

We say, for instance, that the majority should rule. This is our American principle. But suppose that majority in any part of the country should be Indians; then we make an exception to the principle without any hesitation. But why? Simply because it is expedient. Look at the dilemma in which the administration and the country are placed with this Southern question. It is not a question between Packard and Nichols, Chamberlain and Hampton, but simply of race supremacy. The majority in some of those Southern States are unquestionably of the inferior race, just out of a semi-barbarous condition, utterly unfitted to rule; and yet under the principle referred to, they have an undoubted right to rule. Just what might have been expected, therefore, has come to pass; constituted as human nature is, it could not have been otherwise. No white race in the world, saints or sinners, Northerners or Southerners, would willingly submit to it. In some way, therefore, constitutionally or unconstitutionally, the common principle which we have adopted, that the majority shall rule, must and will be modified in those Southern States. Bayonets may enforce that principle for awhile. But, as sure as fate, they will kill the political party which uses them; for the prejudice, or perversity, or blood of the Saxon race, or whatever you please to call it, will ultimately prevail.

Conditions of society can be easily imagined by every one in which the majority rule would be not only a blunder, but a curse. What, then, would lead us to modify this rule? Simply regard for expediency. We answer we have no infallible rule, or infallible application of principles, in politics any more than in religion or daily life. Dogmatism, here as elsewhere, is out of the question. Woman suffrage, therefore, it seems to us, is a subject which must be considered entirely from the stand-point of expediency. To assert that it is right, irrespective of consequences, is simply begging the question, as it would be to assert that it was right for minors or criminals or Indians to vote.

The expediency of woman suffrage we have been led seriously to doubt within the last few years, and mainly for the reasons indicated by some of your correspondents. With the ardor of her feelings and the depth and earnestness of her religious nature, woman is the slave of the Church. We say the slave—not the free, self-reliant, and independent helper, sitting in calm judgment both on creed and priest and sacrament,—simply devoted to the Church because “she has been more fully recognized in it than in any other great department of society.” We wish we could take this view of the matter, as does “E. D. C.” But we cannot. We know that the majority of men in our churches are poor, pliant tools enough in the hands of an ambitious and power-loving priesthood. But everyone knows that women are a great deal more so. Only let this Christian Amendment question, then, be agitated throughout the country, as we think it will be, and let the women of our churches be convinced (as they can be) that scepticism in every shape is threatening the very safety of the Christian religion itself, and there is scarcely an Evangelical woman in the whole country who would not vote for that amendment. For one, therefore, I do not feel like advocating freedom in one direction to bring slavery in another, as I fear it would. We should be glad to be convinced that such fears are groundless.

QUESTIONS.

1. Is the belief in a Savior, or Lord and Master, in harmony with the faith in an omniscient and omnipresent Creator and Ruler?
2. Are we not a part of God, and must not every action of ours be known to him?
3. Can God lose or damn a soul without losing or damning a part of himself?
4. Is it possible for a sincere believer in an omnipresent deity to accept another man as the only begotten son of God, and as his Savior one who said: “My God, why hast thou forsaken me?”
5. Can reason and common sense pronounce the transactions in the Tabernacle sane?
6. Should we not condemn physicians, if they tried for the sake of gain to spread an epidemic, or if their ignorance was the cause of an increase of such diseases?
7. Must we not condemn or pity all who assist in spreading so-called religious doctrines which cause insanity?

I attend now two women, one in Lee, N. H., who is a sincere believer in the brimstone doctrine of Orthodoxy,—the other in Dover, N. H., who belongs to the Baptist persuasion. Both suffer intensely from the idea that their souls are lost forever. Will not our friends who speak about saving souls, and others who know (?) that there is no immortality, come here and help these poor women?

8. Is it not the only excuse we can offer for those noisy self-styled religious teachers to say that they are either insane on the subject, or not further developed than just to the level of the “missing link”?
9. Will not the intellectual people of New Athens and other places very soon cooperate, and make it impossible that Church and Tabernacle folly can exist?

10. Is it not necessary for liberals, whether they are atheists, materialists, theists, or what not, to avoid dogmatizing?

11. The questions, “Is there a God?” “Is there no God?” “Has man a soul?” have not been answered satisfactorily to all. Each human being has an answer for himself or herself; but is it not just as dogmatic as the Pope's bulls if men speak about the “unknowable,” or assert that those questions “never” will be answered?

12. Can our individual “desires, longings, and aspirations” be realized as well by others as by ourselves, and can their “talk to the contrary” have as much weight with us as our own convictions?

13. There are now on the earth 1,350,200,000 souls; are there not just as many beliefs and theories?

14. Christians claim 417,912,700 souls; but have they not to allow a considerable deduction, if they count all those out who are called by them “infidels”?

15. There are over two hundred Christian sects. In each sect we find much similarity of speculation; but can we find two persons among them who believe perfectly alike, and is not the development of reason which caused the formation of those sects the first step of their transformation into reasoning beings?

CHINESE SUFFRAGE.

DEAR INDEX:—

The recent slaughter of Chinese laborers at Chico, California, suggests some pertinent inquiries, which even Mr. Wasson may ponder with profit. There are at present in California something over a hundred thousand Chinese, mostly adult males. Probably not more than a dozen of that number have availed themselves of the opportunity to become citizens by naturalization, either through ignorance of their rights, or an aversion to the Christian method of doing things. One cannot take up a California daily paper without seeing an account of some brutal outrage or murder perpetrated upon one or more of these harmless, helpless, industrious, and unoffending people. Will any sensible man affirm that these fiendish atrocities would be committed were the Chinese a voting, instead of a non-voting, class? Why are not the United States troops removed from those States where their presence is merely a political necessity, to California, where not only twenty stipulations, but the voices of humanity, would seem to demand their presence?

Why did we see incorporated in the recent plat-forms of the respective political parties an anti-Chinese plank? Does any one suppose that Blaine and Sargent would keep silence in regard to the daily and almost hourly Christian brutalities that are practised upon the "heathen Chinese," if the latter were a voter or likely to become such? There is no use in trying to blink the fact that the persecutions to which this unfortunate people are, and have been, subjected are mainly attributable to their ineligibility, whether voluntary or otherwise, to become voters. The detestable wretches, known as "hoodlums," who do the shooting, and cutting, and beating, and stoning of these poor creatures, are voters, and therefore a desirable element in politics; hence, we see the party press and the politicians of California, though not directly advocating brutal treatment of the Chinese, yet indirectly giving encouragement to those who do, by pandering to their depraved sentiments, and fanning the flames of prejudice against a race whose great crime is that they are willing to work, and for the best wages they can obtain. These "hoodlums" are a class of loafers, thieves, and ruffians, whom no rate of wages would tempt to perform an honest day's work; and yet they are the class whose hue and cry against Chinese cheap labor has attracted the "earnest attention" of the politicians of both parties, and we see them vying with each other in subservience to the senseless clamor of this dangerous class.

In the year 1867, the writer of this note spent a harvest season with an old friend in Contra Costa County, Cal., who found it difficult to procure hands, other than Chinamen, to garner his crops. Notices had been posted that any farmer employing Chinamen might expect to have his grain fields set on fire. In this exigency, my friend started for San Francisco to procure white laborers at the different labor exchanges. He met hundreds of men pretending to seek employment; but, after two days' effort, he found it impossible to induce one of the number to go out of the city for a job, and was finally compelled to go down to the wharves, and hire sailors who could speak scarcely a word of English, and who knew nothing of farming, to go with him into the country, and assist in gathering his crops.

The history of the atrocities which have been perpetrated by Christian America against Heathen China is and will remain unwritten, except in the general record of "man's inhumanity to man." If those politicians who are even zealous in aid of the voting philanthropies, will allow President Hayes for a moment to withdraw his attention from the fancied wrongs of the enfranchised negro to the real sufferings of the unenfranchised Mongolian whose personal safety he is bound by treaty with man as well as by obligations to God to secure, they will be doing an acceptable service to the cause of humanity. A residence of nearly twenty years in California, under favorable conditions for studying the Chinese puzzle, gives me the right, I think, to speak a friendly word for this helpless and abominably outraged race. #### THE "FRIENDS" PHILOSOPHY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Some months since, my friend Loretta Mott sent me a number of THE INDEX containing thy address entitled "Jesus and Socrates." Since then I have read M. Schlesinger's book and also O. B. Frothingham's late work upon the life and mission of "the Christ." And in each of your productions you have strangely overlooked the pivotal thought of Jesus as is clearly denoted by the New Testament literature, which for more than two centuries has been illustrated in the history and doctrine of the Society of Friends. Bancroft caught the key-note when he said (vol. II, p. 337): "The Quaker has but one word—THE INDEX LIGHT, the voice of God in the soul." This, he says, "is kindred (correlate) with the spirit of God," etc., etc. The doctrine of Jesus was, "The kingdom of God is within you." Or, as Paul expresses the same thought, "Christ within the hope (promise) of glory (light)." Now I find that such writers as Frothingham and Furness don't even quote the "Lord's Prayer" correctly,—they render it "on earth" instead of "in earth"; that is, in man, as was evidently meant by Jesus, who spoke after the manner of the age in which he lived; as it is written, "Without a parable he spake not." And in respect to the true Messianic idea concerning which so much has been written, it can only be found as we find the key to the thought.

One of our ancient worthies, who lived during the time of the schism of George Keith, said in the meeting that "he knew no man Christ Jesus in heaven without him, but by the grace of God within him." Now this is the true "scientific method," concerning which thou spoke in the last number of THE INDEX. And I will quote herein, not a despised Quaker, but a free religionist who has never been accused of believing too much. John Stuart Mill says (Theism, p. 202): "Feeling and thought are much more real than anything else; they are the only things which we know directly to be real." Now biogenesis (no life without antecedent life) has become one of the axioms of science, and in order to estimate the thought of Jesus (true Christianity) let us turn to the Messianic ideal of Zechariah: "Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion; for lo, I come and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the Eternal. Be silent, O all flesh, before Him; for He is raised out of His holy habitation."

Friend Frothingham, in the work to which I have alluded, says that "the person of Jesus, though it may have been immense, is indistinct. That a great character was therein may be conceded; but precisely wherein the character was great is left to conjecture." Now I feel to invite "O. B. F." and his fellow free-religionists to the true "scientific method" of the "Friend" (philosopher). Or, in other words, I would recommend the "Pythagorean silence" of "all flesh" as a mode of philosophy (worship),—meeting thus together in order that the great problem of the age may find its solution. In a word, that we may find the truth (God), for herein is not only the science of reasoning, but REASON itself, Revelation and Reason being correlate. When we find the true Ego, we find God. And we are "lost" (not saved) till we find the I AM principle of the soul. This is the Rock upon which Jesus founded his Church, i. e., his individualism. This, as Bancroft says, merits "dominion as the guide to virtue." And now, if thee and thy friends will allow just a little preaching from a "Friend," permit me to say that I have watched your movement with much interest, and I most sincerely hope that it will not degenerate into the rantism of negation, but that it may arise into the force, the persistent energy, of the Affirmation of REASON itself, and not sink into the philosophy of despair (unreason). I call you to no narrow dogmas (Orthodoxy), but to the kingdom (dominion) of God within you. And it is eminently "expedient" herein that all authority shall pass away, because that did interfere, as Socrates and Jesus both taught, with "the scientific method of religion."

"CONCERNING IMMORTALITY."

DEAR INDEX:—

That was a clear, well-reasoned statement of Mr. Stoddard's on this subject, published last week. But it made me feel small and mean. My ideal shrank to very meagre proportions. I rose from its perusal feeling ugly and as if I could maliciously pinch a baby and make it cry. If the conclusions of that article are true, my machinery has been running at a loss all this time, and it would have been money in my pocket if I had been untimely nipped when I was a very little bud. I thought I should have something left over at the final passing in of checks; but now, it seems, I am destined to a hopeless "bust-up," with no assets. Mr. Editor, I am a Bull in philosophy, and cherish high hopes,—not a Bear rushing around and depressing the Ideal Market. I wouldn't go short on human souls for all the profits that bonds on time and consols bought and sold have ever made.

I cannot but think there is more in the human soul than is dreamed of in Mr. Stoddard's philosophy. It hath not entered into his imagination to conceive the subtle, persistent core of something that cannot die with death.

There is present in this article, as always on this question, the one inextinguishable difficulty,—the author writes about a matter relating wholly to the future; and so, of course, argue, reason, and deduce as he may, he cannot know, nor prove to others, what is or is not going to be. It is very easy to claim "no proof" of what is or is not to take place. The great Architect of the present Scheme of Things has let down a deep, dark curtain between all living beings and their hereafter, and seems to have sworn by the Eternal that he won't tell what is going on behind it. The whole plan and idea of the future has been arranged on purpose so that no soul can peep one second beyond his one instantal now. Of course there is no proof of anything beyond. The last transit of Venus could not have been proved to the first Chimpanzees. Franklin's kite could not have been proved to Jesus Christ himself. Plenty of happenings and conclusions cannot be proved in mid career of any evolution; but when the career is complete, when the charm's wound up, then many things appear in clear light and can be proved. There is even no proof of much that is so extremely probable in cotemporary time that no intelligent mind can doubt concerning it; for instance, that life, intelligence, and beings, corresponding to the human race on earth, exist in other worlds than ours. The future may hold in it means of verifying that probability; but at present it is not proved.

I should like to see what Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews can say to a statement like this, especially on the point—"There is absolutely no proof of the existence of mind distinct from body." There ought to be resources in an Ology that rightly calls itself universal, either to confirm or refute conclusions like these of Mr. Stoddard's. All that his article really amounts to is a verdict of not proven; so the soul is turned out of court, not exactly guilty of existence after death, or not proved to exist in a continued individualized way. I hope Mr. Andrews can reopen the case, make good some affirmative propositions, and, if not reverse the decision, at least throw some light on the errors of the court below. I have been greatly interested in his keen and far-reaching analysis of the human soul itself. When we can know what the soul is, that alone will go far towards solving the question of immortality.

"THE SOUL."

No. 273 PEARL ST., N. Y., March 19, 1877.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

The very able argument which appeared in THE INDEX of March 8, under the title of "The Soul" seems to me to need a reply. The plan of argument pursued is to prove the nonentity of the soul as a means of disproving the immortality of man. The writer justly admits that there are great differences of opinion with regard to the meaning of the word "soul," and yet disposes of the great question of immortality by arguing that this "intellectual phenomenon," having no independent existence, cannot be immortal. The question which interests everybody is not the nature of the soul, but the fate of man; and although I would take great pleasure in discussing the nature of the soul as a psychological exercise, when an argument concludes by denying immortality I think I am justified in making that great question the subject and centre of the reply.

For the sake of argument, therefore, let us define the soul in such a way that its entity will depend upon its immortality, which will remove the necessity of discussing its nature, as nothing is assumed by reason of that nature.

Let us call the soul that part of man, if any, which survives the body. The question then presents itself: Is man immortal?

I do not presume to offer a complete solution of this problem. The facts of our nature will have to be better understood than they are at present to enable us to form accurate conclusions concerning our destiny. But I am convinced that there are unmistakable evidences of immortality in the nature of man; and I submit that the fact that we are as yet unable to offer a full or even partial solution of the whole question by no means proves that such a fate is either impossible or improbable. My purpose, therefore, is simply to offer a picture, however imperfect, of one of the evidences of immortality within us. It is evident that the destiny of a being depends upon its nature; if we understood our nature, we could understand our destiny; but as we can do neither one nor the other yet, let us draw a comparison between them, so as to ascertain if what we do know of our destiny is an adequate sequence of that which we know of our nature. We find in our nature, on the one hand, the "instinctive or natural desires"; on the other, the faculties to satisfy them. An exception to this rule, it is clear, would be a contradiction of Nature. As we develop from childhood, our desires seem to elevate themselves; the sympathetic and benevolent passions come to life, and still we find the ready faculties, which need but the action of the will to turn them to their destined use. At last the flower of intellect explains and crowns the plant of life; it unfolds itself and drinks in the truth of pure knowledge with which those who have gone before us have filled our atmosphere. To dismiss the simile, we have the man of science. His past is a life of prodigious effort, of consecration to truth. His chief desire is to penetrate the darkness which hems him in; he craves more light. His mind has attained a brilliancy which enables it to reflect a faint gleam of infinite truth; and he dies. Where is the faculty to satisfy this desire? Is it the mind? It has been taxed to its uttermost, and has done nobly; and yet has his desire been satisfied? Has a reasonable approach been made to the satisfaction of his desire? Ask the pioneers of human knowledge; they will tell you—"We do not know even what we are." Has Nature then given us a desire so lofty that few ever do her the justice to develop it fully, only to be wasted and never fulfilled? Is this natural prayer born within us to be so absolutely unanswared?

If we would raise our minds to the conception of a "cause and its eternity" we should try and appreciate the silent evidences of Nature which lead us toward such convictions. R. S. P.

MRS. PARRY.

CLARINDA, Iowa, March 25, 1877.

EDITOR INDEX:—

While we are, to a great extent, out in the regions of darkness and a good way removed from some of the main sources of light, there is occasionally a ray thrown out that lights up even this far-away region. Such a one we have enjoyed recently in a course of six lectures by Mrs. Mattie Hulet Parry, one of the freest thinkers and bravest women that has ever visited this section and that are now in the lecturing field. Her course of lectures closed on Tuesday of last week. The Court House, after the first lecture, was on every evening filled to overflowing with an appreciative audience and increase of interest in the subjects discussed to the close. It was, in fact, like hungry men and women sitting down to a well-filled table, and refusing to arise till they were satisfied or the supplies withdrawn. It was the first effort made here to exhibit the claims of true religion as opposed to doctrinal theology, and the effect produced has been remarkable. Doctrinal restrictions and limitations have received a most severe blow, and the mind has been invited to take a view of the great feast which God in his goodness and wisdom has spread out before man in the great world of Nature. And the invitation did not stop at the simple facts, but the mind of every hearer was directed to that undercurrent or stream of causation which is the power of God in the world.

The creed-worshippers united, as they usually do, in circulating damaging reports, prompted by ill-will and founded on guesses, and nothing more, to defeat a hearing. But, as in nearly all cases of this kind, evil was overruled for good, as the only effect of the opposition was to increase the number of hearers each successive night.

Liberal societies cannot do better than to engage the services of Mrs. Parry. You will find in her all the pluck, spirit, and talents that are needed.

Her address is Beloit, Wisconsin. J. L. B.

SCENE IN THE CARS: A candy boy passing through a car meets a cross old gentleman, and says: "Pop corn! pop corn!" "Hain't got any teeth," angrily replies the man. "Gum drops! gum drops!" calls the boy.

"WHAT DO THEY always put D. C. after Washington for?" asked Mrs. Quilp of Mr. Q. "Why, my dear, don't you know Washington was the Daddy of his Country?" said Quilp, with a snicker.—Boston Post.

"LOOK HERE, Pete," said a knowing dorky, "don't stand dar on de railroad." "Why, Joe?" "Kase, if de cars see dat mouf ob yours, dey tink it am de depo', an' run rite in."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 to 25 " " 8 " "
 " 26 to 51 " " 6 " "
 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 GENTLEMEN,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory results—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
 Yours truly,

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public substance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or reading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.20 for one year, including postage, or 4 cents for three months on trial.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Fifth Annual Meeting, 1872. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains essays by J. W. Chadwick on "Liberty and the Church in America," by C. D. B. Mills on "Religion as the Expression of a Permanent Sentiment of the Human Mind," and by O. B. Frothingham on "The Religion of Humanity," with addresses by Rowland Connor, Celia Burleigh, Lucretia Mott, A. B. Alcott, C. A. Bartol, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loos, and others.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. B. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Bonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keesh Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. 40 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan E. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "the Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Reason and Revelation, by William J. Potter. 10 cents: ten for 60 cents; one hundred, $3.00.

For series of important Tracts see last page of THE INDEX.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1873 is quite limited. Orders by mail may be addressed either "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston," or to the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. ## THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practicing the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE
FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

- SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.
- SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.
- SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.
- SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

WRITES a New York correspondent: "An acquaintance lately told me of his visiting the English Mission, when he was in Zanzibar. While there, he noticed a missionary reclining on a couch, and loudly calling for a servant to pick up and hand to him a book which had fallen on the floor."

EUROPE'S standing armies cost her about $500,000,000 annually. M. de Girardin says that the danger of universal insolvency will never be removed, until rulers shall cease to prosecute their search for an armament which no projectile can pierce and a projectile which no armament can withstand.

REV. O. L. ASHENFELTER, of Carlisle, Pa., who has contributed in times past several noble contributions to THE INDEX, has been attacked for heresy by the Philadelphia Reformed Messenger; but a committee appointed by the Consistory of the Reformed Church of Carlisle fully exonerate him from this fearful charge. This seems to indicate that the Consistory itself is slightly heretical, and that Mr. Ashenfelter's labors have been crowned with success.

SIGNATURES to the Religious Freedom Amendment petition of the National Liberal League have been received as follows since our last issue: from Mr. E. R. Wicks, Meriden, Ill., 104 names; from Mr. Joseph York, Meadville, Pa., 87; from Mr. J. N. Steimle, Gardner, Ill., 103. In last week's paper, the number of signatures sent by Prof. Frothingham, of Ann Arbor, was misprinted 125,—it should have been 68. The total given was correct, however. Total number of signatures thus far received—8,612.

A WRITER in the Boston Transcript of April 5 thus exposes one of His Lectureship's gross misstatements of fact: "Rev. Joseph Cook asserted in his last Monday's lecture that Theodore Parker's works never reached a second edition. I thought at the time that this might have been an accidental error of speech, but the Advertiser's report this morning repeats the error. I supposed that in Mr. Cook's revised reports he would be careful to verify his statements. Now I hold in my hand Theodore Parker's Discourses of Religion, printed in 1856, and the preface calls it the fifth edition. This is the only purely theological work which Parker wrote, and the one he would rather be known and measured by. Here our friend will discover that in ten years or less five editions of this theological work have been called for—an honor, I venture to assert, that was never paid to any other theological author. Again, since our lecturer began his course of lectures, another edition of this work has been called for, and I found on inquiry at my booksellers' that their supply was entirely exhausted, and they were expecting some more this week. This good demand comes of the gratuitous advertisement this evangelical lecturer is giving Theodore Parker and his works.—C."

IN HIS LAST Friday evening talk, Henry Ward Beecher is reported as saying: "Dr. Bartol in Boston is an amusing Unitarian preacher; he criticised some remarks I made in my course of lectures to the Yale theological students, in which I advised those who did not feel as they wished, to put themselves as nearly in that state as they could, and act as if they really felt, for then the feeling would come. He said that this was hypocrisy. I don't suppose that anything I say here will come under his notice, but I wish it could, for I reaffirm what I said then: if you put yourself in the channels of conduct which have been the result of a state of mind, that state of mind will come again." Mr. Beecher may find "amusement" in such criticisms, but it is only in virtue of a melancholy degree of moral callousness. His advice to young preachers is to put on the semblance of deep feeling in the pulpit, even if they do not have it, in order to create the feeling itself in their own minds. But how about the audience? Whenever a minister seems to be profoundly earnest and solemn in his exhortations and appeals, Mr. Beecher's advice obliges the hearers to ask themselves: "Is the man really in earnest, or is he trying to pump up belief in his own mind by pretending to believe and feel what he says?" Dr. Bartol was right; such advice is the inculcation of hypocrisy as a clerical duty. Alas for the Christian ministry if it has come to this!

THE LONDON Examiner of March 10 has this very interesting paragraph on the Sunday question: "The Revue Historique publishes a minute, by the Emperor Napoleon I., concerning the observance of Sunday. It is so curiously characteristic of the man, and also has so direct a bearing on the Sabbatarian question, as to be worth reproducing: 'It is contrary to the divine law,' writes the Emperor, 'to prevent a man, who has wants on Sundays as much as on other days of the week, from working on Sunday to gain his bread. Government could not impose such a law unless it gave bread gratis to those who have none. God has imposed on men an obligation to labor, since without labor he has not allowed them to gather any of the fruits of the earth. He has willed that they should work every day, since he has given them wants which every day make themselves felt afresh. We must distinguish, in what the clergy prescribe, between laws which are truly religious laws, and obligations which have been imagined only with the view of extending the authority of ministers of religion. The observance of fasting on Friday and of resting on Sunday are only secondary and insignificant rules. What essentially concerns the commandments of the Church is, not to injure social order, not to do evil to one's neighbor, not to abuse liberty. . . . I am the authority, and I grant to my people, once for all, permission not to interrupt their work. The more they work the less vice there will be. . . . If I had to meddle with these matters, I would be rather disposed to order that, on Sundays, except during the hours of divine service, the shops should be open and the workmen at their work. When one casts a glance over the various classes which compose society, one feels that Sunday's rest is harmful rather than useful; one sees in how many arts and how many trades this interruption of labor produces troublesome results. Society does not make up a contemplative order. Some legislators have wished to make it a convent of monks, and apply to it rules which only suit a cloister. Since men eat every day, they ought to be allowed to work every day.'"

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

Free Religion versus Transcendentalism.

DEAR FRIEND ABBOT:—

The address given by yourself in the Horticultural Hall Course of Lectures, reported in THE INDEX of March 22, I have read with deep interest and profit. The themes it treats are of profoundest, most vital import. Too much pains cannot be taken to apprehend them justly, and to state the well-matured conclusion of thought upon them clearly. They are very fundamental.

You do not lay too much emphasis, in my opinion, upon the importance of utmost freedom and thoroughness of inquiry in regard to all that may be put forward in the name of religious faith or philosophy. Here is the one vital and indispensable condition of all healthful life and growth, either in religion or any thing else.

I. But I write to call attention to one or two points upon which you are, as I think, under misapprehension. Transcendentalism you regard as one of the old forms of dogmatism, to be dismissed by Free Religion, and relegated to essentially the same domain as Romanism, Lutheran Protestantism, etc. This in consequence of the fact that Transcendentalism affirms the authority of Intuition,—the truths it reads, or supposes itself to read, in the inner consciousness of the soul. This you deem to be a piece of dogmatism, and involving an invasion and denial of the rights of intellectual liberty.

Now I admit that in the name of Transcendentalism there may have been limitary conceptions and dogmatic declarations; that some of those who have spoken as its representatives may have laid themselves open to the charge you bring against the doctrine itself. I have deemed that Theodore Parker, notwithstanding his great care to avoid all causes of aberration, did sometimes imagine and dogmatize, reading, when dealing with the great questions of God, of Immortality, etc., other and more in the consciousness than was given in the inner content. And the same thing, I remember, seemed to me to befall Mr. Martineau, a year or two since, in his very ingenious and able replies to Tyndall.

It is difficult, very difficult, to keep the mind free here in the realm of pure thought from all limitary and dogmatic determination,—the nature of the human spirit is such, so related indissolubly to the world of the seen, all the conceptions being cast instinctively and of necessity in the mould of form, very difficult to take the idea of God, without investing it instantly in a somewhat determinate, as personality, etc. Hence the mixture we see of objective and subjective, of the creations of imagination or fancy with the realities of pure thought, that we find more or less in the representations of Transcendentalists. Indeed this is the infirmity the world over, and it gives rise to whatever is limitary, dogmatic, false in religious philosophy, and in art, letters, etc., as well. "As it has proved one of the most difficult problems of the practical astronomer to obtain an achromatic telescope, so an achromatic eye, one of the most needed, is also one of the rarest instruments of criticism." Mr. Parker recognized this ever-besetting danger, I judge, for he says, as I recall in his letter to his congregation, speaking of this self-same theme, the interpretation of the facts of consciousness: "I know now better than it was possible then . . . how often the inquirer mistakes his own subjective imagination for a fact of the universe. It is for others to decide whether I have sometimes mistaken a little grain of brilliant dust in my telescope for a fixed star in Heaven."

2. But, whatever the mistakes or shortcomings of some of its representatives and expositors (not all have been thus guilty), Transcendentalism itself should not be condemned unless it be itself essentially false and vicious as a doctrine, a method. This last, I suppose, from the tenor of your address, you believe. What is Transcendentalism in its essential position? It is, as I understand it, that the spiritual, the realm of substance, the invisible, the idea of the infinite, is revealed immediately in the soul, or is present primarily there in the thought; that it cannot be imparted or communicated from without, since it transcends all the outer; that it is its own authentication, and that the final appeal must always be laid to that standard within. Now if this be not true, I see not how anything in the world of religion, or indeed of philosophy, can be established.

3. "Science," you say, "knows nothing of finalities or authorities that may not be doubted." But how can she become science at all, except by arriving at something which as a foundation is final, some absolute upon which may be planted as upon firm ground the conviction? The protest of Free Religion, you declare, "affirmed the great fact of religion." How should it be entitled to affirm anything except by authority of those great fundamental truths that dwell in the soul, that shine by their own light with a resplendent lustre greater than "aught ever seen upon sea or land"? If these be denied in their sovereign, authoritative power, denied in the name of Free Religion, then I cannot for the life of me see how Free Religion does not by that very act cut off the bough upon which itself reposes, and consign itself to annihilation.

4. If the idea of God—and by that I mean the idea of a somewhat supersensuous, ethereal, eternal, however you may name or attempt to describe it—is "not at all a fact given in consciousness," then how shall it be imparted or put into the consciousness? How shall spiritual phenomena have verification by any other standard than that within the soul, within and not without, since the world with which we have to deal here transcends all that belongs to the without?

5. I see you intimate that the realm of experience may and will be found to cover a wider domain than has been accorded to it generally by scientific men, and I think you may add metaphysical philosophers also; at least Kant, so far as I remember, is very specific in his employment of the term in the sense you mention. It will be seen to mean not simply the experiences of or through the senses, but will cover the fact of "the immediate contact of the intellect with the outer universe as well." If in the term "outer universe" you include, as I suppose you do, whatever belongs to the realm of the spiritual, the world of substance, the everlasting, then I submit we are brought back to the same grounds as that essentially of Transcendentalism, the inner beholding the intuitional consciousness. The old witness has come back again; he has been withdrawn from the court for a little, changed his coat and returned, with a new alias; but it is the self-same man.

6. I do not think you have much the advantage, in the final appeal, of the man who in the last resort falls back upon the strength of his private intuition. He also can retort upon you, "How do you know?" And what at last can you say to him farther than that, in your own deepest and most closely interrogated consciousness, you feel that you do see, you do know? Ever ultimately there must be a reason "that cannot be reasoned." The charge "you do not know—you dream," is one in all ages easy to make; but it establishes nothing, and is besides a sword that cuts both ways. The danger in thought ever, I suppose, is in confounding a fancy with truth, taking appearance for or as the measure of reality. But the ultimate affirmation, if anywhere, must be within, and the correction of all error is to be applied in this world within.

I know well that science, physical science, has an important office to perform in its relations to the problems of religious culture, and I am glad to see that such strong emphasis is being laid upon it at the present time. Great value there is withal in history, in the conclusions, the thoughts, and judgments of others. Here we have safeguard, a check and corrective in a measure to the individual mind, but they are secondary and subordinate, aids, not source; auxiliary, not primal.

7. Of two things, incontestably, I think, one: either the validity of the truths resident and luminous in the consciousness must be maintained and held as good against all beside,—and this will carry us to the main postulate of Transcendentalism, the intuitional vision, the authority of the ideal; or, these denied, we hew away from under our feet all ground upon which it is possible to base an affirmation in religious thought, and this brings to the destruction of all religion, free, as well as every other.

Judging from what you say of the breadth of significance you deem fairly covered in the word "experience," I sometimes incline to think that the difference that seems to lie between us may be more in name than in substance, and that by careful comparison and explanation it might much diminish, if not fade away. But whether this be so or not, surely a free and thorough examination of the ground will not fail to bring the facts in the case to a clearer light, and set the truth itself in more distinct outline, and under easier, juster apprehension.

More deeply, I believe, can no one sympathize with you in the brave protest you are uttering for religious freedom than do I. There is precious and also costly testimony to be borne by us all in this behalf.

CHARLES D. B. MILLS.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., April 5, 1877.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM MR. GANNETT.

DEAR ABBOT:—

Your criticism of my Moody-sermon treated me most kindly, and my argument as kindly as you could. You asked me to tell you how what you said impressed me; and I should have done so before now, had I not been on the constant move till I reached St. Paul three or four days ago.

You think I misconceive the process of "evolution" in religious thought (1) in that I treat this process as the developmental changes in a single organism, ignoring the facts of a succession of forms, a struggle for existence, a survival of the fittest; and (2) in that the change which I describe from concrete to abstract conceptions in the popular religion is not a process of "evolution" at all, but of its precise opposition, "dissolution." You think also (3) that Mr. Moody's essential meanings and ours won't translate into each other, as I claimed,—the difference being substantial, not merely formal.

Let me quote one or two sentences from you with which I heartily agree. "Breadth in religious culture,"—does it mean a philosophy less broad than the facts? Never. "We plead for a philosophy of religion that shall take in the whole fact of evolution, not merely a part of it,—that shall distinguish things that differ." Amen! But to indicate what the "whole fact" of evolution is, I should add—"that shall distinguish things that differ and recognize similarities where things agree." For, as I understand evolution, it names the process of the One becoming Many, and two facts are constant in the process; (1) a fact of continuous identity, (2) a fact of continual change,—a certain unity at essence and in substance, with ceaselessly progressive variation in the form. I have supposed that no emphasis which ignored either one of these facts took in "the whole" evolution; and, further, that the union of these simultaneous facts was no more characteristic of the evolution occurring in a single organism than of that occurring in a succession of specific forms. Throughout the differentiated series the identity still runs. The appearance of a "new type," so-called, indicates no disconnection, but simply a sufficient increment of variation to win a new name. On the other hand, within the developmental changes of the single organism, I have supposed that the evolutionist recognized very plainly the "succession of forms, the struggle for existence, and survival of the fittest," in the way in which parts were progressively built up at the expense of other parts. I did not know there were two kinds of "evolution," one for the single organism, another for the series. Are there? If not, is not the first point of your criticism, on which much of the rest depends, quite beside the mark?

Further: you know our Free Religious motto is "Freedom and Fellowship in Religion." One of the two facts of evolution—that of the continuous identity in thought—has seemed to me the scientific basis for the latter half of that motto, the "Fellowship in Religion." Our fellowship with those from whom we differ in faith is something more than what you speak of as a hand of friendship and admiration stretched across profound chasms of variance: it exists not merely in spite of the formal variance, which is very real, but in virtue of the underlying agreement, equally real. Doctrines do translate into each other to me. I see analogues. I believe in comparative anatomy applied to religious faiths. And it is on the ground of underlying unities that I own and claim kinship with alien thinkers, however little the good cousins who knew nothing about comparative anatomy will allow the claim. In this am I in error, or are they? Is this philosophy of religion less broad than the facts, or does it only become as broad as the facts by making such recognitions?

Now in my sermon I was not writing on evolution in religion save as it concerned my subject, which was—the continuity of thought as the basis of religious fellowship. I dwell on that fact of evolution which is the basis of such fellowship. It is the side of evolution habitually ignored by most of the Orthodox as against the Radicals, and by many of the Radicals as against the Orthodox; both find it easier than winking to see the other side. Therefore I wrote, thinking that we at least who claim to be rationalists ought to have a philosophy of religion as broad as the facts, and stand by our philosophy, instead of joining the party who, unable to trace similarities as well as difference, deem the difference from themselves the measure of absurdity. Because Mr. Moody is unreasonable and cannot help it, are you and I to be unreasonable who can?

But to dwell on that side of the matter which belonged to the subject then in hand when I wrote is not to ignore the other side in one's thought or utterance. That other side—the difference between faiths, the struggle and survival of the fittest,—would come out fully, were the subject treated any one of the many subjects turning on Freedom in Religion; for in this other side, the second of the two great facts of evolution, we have, I think, the scientific basis for the other part of our motto,—“Freedom in Religion.” On purpose to prevent the thought that I ignored that side, I threw in a few sentences about other duties existing than the one I was engaged in urging. You will find the sentences in the middle of the fifth column of the sermon. But in all that was said about “forms” or “symbols” you would see the same recognition implied, if you and I proportioned “substance” and “form” of doctrines in the same way. Part of the difference between us must be only apparent, you probably classing as “substance” what I should class under “form,” and expect as such to suffer change. I cannot think that you as evolutionist wholly deny the fact of a continuous identity. Still, there is practically much difference between us, as you know. In matters of religion my order of emphasis is—Life before Thought; and, in thought, the Unities before the Differences, as having an actual scientific value greater than the differences; the latter to be treated with absolute honesty, which implies perfectly plain-speaking on the one side and non-exaggeration on the other side. I half-suspect you would as frankly rank the Differences before the Unities as scientifically the more important. At least, your constant emphasis indicates as much, and I do not think of you as one of the reformers who would consciously do intellectual wrong that intellectual good might come.

What I have said covers in great measure the ground of your third criticism,—your denial that Mr. Moody's doctrinal symbols can be translated into ours. To analyze your objection here would be but to restate details of my vision as against details of yours. I see, and said I saw, what you see,—Mr. Moody's insistence on much besides the moral contents of his doctrine; but as I listen to him (or listened rather; four times I heard him, besides reading sermons) his conscious, and still more notably his unconscious, emphasis seems to lie upon its moral contents; that makes his “substance,” the rest is his “form,” his “symbol” for it. And I claim power, and, having power, feel bound to read down to the substance; and, reading, find myself largely at one with him there. That Mr. Moody himself confounds his form and substance and probably would not assent to the theory of translation, was also said; but one of my differences from him (from you, too?) is that I should not look on him as good authority in regard to the analogies of faith.

The remaining point of your criticism, the second, is that the broadening of the popular Christian doctrines, from concrete to abstract conceptions, is a process of dissolution,—not, as I called it, of evolution. You certainly seem right according to the accepted formula of evolution; and I am puzzled. But I do not see that the error, if it be one, affects my main position in the sermon, which is, you know, that an underlying continuity exists in religious ideas which is the basis of religious fellowship. That continuity with its consequence remains fact, does it not, whether the tendency of change is called “decay” or “growth”? Again it is but to restate my vision as against yours to say, for instance, that the Unity which science reveals in Nature, the Power that makes for righteousness and benefaction, looks to me like an expansion of the Christian's idea of “God”; that the immanence of this One in each and every individual seems to me expansion of the Christian doctrine of Incarnation; and so of other dogmas, even those more especially Mr. Moody's.

But I wish on this point you would some time enlarge. This I see, that the religious conceptions of any given day are but the aspect which the scientific conceptions of that day assume when man's imagination tries to unify them and adjust them, past the finite, to the scale of the infinite and ultimate and absolute. And this I also see, that in regard to “evolution” the conceptions of science and those of religion reverse each other's law of growth. Of old all science tended to become at once religious in its form, and these religious forms were concrete and complex just because the science proper was so slight and formless. Now all religious conceptions tend to take the scientific form, and are simple and formless just because the science has become the opposite. Is this the fact, then, that, strictly speaking, in ages of advance science alone undergoes “evolution,” passing as it does from the vague to the heterogeneous and determinate in its “laws” of the outer and the inner universe; while in religion the simultaneous process of thought is “dissolution”? And this in general,—not merely, as you suggest, “dissolution” with reference to Christianity? With science what it is to-day, the rising religion, “the faith of science,” must needs contain few symbols, and those few simple, vast, transcending formula. But I see not why they are not continuous with the symbols of the popular religion.

Perhaps this is not thought clearly out, and you can give me light. Print it or not, as you choose. If not, please send it back to me. If you print it, after your 1. 2. 3. of rejoinder, we will let our differences drop again for the present. Meanwhile, across our chasm, here is my hand—for our agreement's sake!

Yours truly,

W. C. GANNETT.

St. PAUL, Minn., March 28, 1877.

[And here is our hand in all heartiness and sincerity—both “for the agreement's sake” and for the sake of that honest “difference” which even our friend feels it (and justly too) a part of duty not to forget! The agreement is just as necessary as the difference, and the difference just as necessary as the agreement; each is absolutely indispensable in the eyes of science. If we radicals could indeed “translate” the whole of Moody's religion into our own,—if it were not impossible to make the translation without sacrificing totally certain profound differences of the two which Moody himself protests are fundamental (and we must “agree” with him here!),—there would have been no discussion between Mr. Gannett and us; in which case we should have lost the fresh and beautiful proof he has given that the frank discussion of differences need involve no injustice, no unkindness, no perversity, no misconstruction of motives. For this we thank him gratefully, and drop the subject, with a hope that our readers will have more from his pen by-and-by.—ED.]

“UNBELIEF AS A SIN.”

The Congregationalist undertakes to defend Mr. Moody's statement that unbelief is the worst of sins; and in order to clear the way for a convincing argument, it begins by denying that Jesus used the word “believe” in a merely intellectual sense, “though we admit that, in past ages, not a few of his professed disciples have understood him to that effect, and have dealt out a liberal damnation to all who, for any reason, failed to hold a Christian creed.” Christ had reference to “the real moral element of the problem.” “The belief of men, on all but mathematical subjects, is largely governed by their selfish interests and plans.” “Christ, then, simply says to every man to whom the gospel is presented in its true doctrine and clear evidence that if he allows himself to be blinded to it by his self-will, prejudice, passion, pride, or love of sinful ways, he thereby manifests a spirit of disloyalty to truth, and of disobedience to God, and cannot have part in the kingdom of God. Surely this is just.” “Another phase of unbelief is where the will does not so much mislead the reason as resist it; that is, where the man, while admitting ‘the truth as it is in Jesus,’ refuses to allow it to control his heart and life, and thus treats it as if he did not intellectually believe it. This is the sin known as unbelief in the New Testament.”

This is quite plausible. Self-will, prejudice, passion, love of sinful ways, and a spirit of disloyalty to truth are certainly to be condemned, and the Register is always ready to denounce them as heartily as the Congregationalist. A man who resists what he knows and admits to be the truth need not expect to be defended by us. We hardly think he can find a champion in THE INDEX or even the Investigator. Let him be blamed severely, for he richly deserves it. Let him be warned solemnly, for he deeply needs admonitions and entreaties. If this is all that is meant by calling unbelief criminal, “unbelievers” will join as loudly in the chorus of disapproval as any of the faithful.

And yet we hesitate a little before accepting the Congregationalist's triumphant conclusion: “Thus Mr. Moody only imitates the Savior himself, and all faithful preachers of the gospel, when he warns men of the wrath of God against the unbelief which rejects Christ and his salvation.” Does the Congregationalist really mean that Mr. Moody has no condemnation for fair-minded and honest men who reject his leading doctrines, not on account of any disloyalty to truth or love of sinful ways, but because, after candid and dispassionate examination, they believe those doctrines to be false? Is it taught at the Tabernacle that there is no sin or peril in denying the Trinity, the Deity of Christ, the Vicarious Atonement, Total Depravity, and Eternal Punishment, unless the denier is blinded by self-will, or denies what he knows to be true? Does Mr. Moody wish it to be distinctly understood that it is unjust and unchristian to “sentence men to damnation for holding opinions which simply conform to the evidence before their minds”? This is just what the Congregationalist seems to affirm. If its assurance is warranted, and an authorized statement can be obtained from the great revivalist endorsing the argument of our neighbor, “much needless mystification” will indeed be avoided. It is to be regretted, however, that, “working our way through the fog of misapplied words and cloudy ideas” has been deferred so long. Whatever Mr. Moody may be about to preach, we have seen nothing in his published discourses which resembles the Congregationalist's theory that only immoral “unbelief” is to be justly condemned.

We confess that we should place more reliance upon the Congregationalist's main statement, if we were not troubled by some of its introductory remarks. What does it mean by its admission that “in past ages” not a few professed disciples of Jesus have dealt out a liberal damnation to all who, for any reason, failed to hold what the anathematizers held to be the Christian faith? Why does it say “in past ages”? Would it have its readers think that it believes that nobody entertains such absurd views at present? Does it doubt that Roman Catholics may be found in this year of our Lord who teach that, for their damnable heresies, the editors of the Congregationalist and Messrs. Moody and Sankey will certainly go to perdition? By taking great pains, and recalling all the narrowest-minded ministers and deacons of its acquaintance, can it not find a few who do not expect to meet in heaven all candid and conscientious heretics, whether Unitarians, Universalists, Romanists, or Heathen?

It was not in the Dark Ages, but within twenty years, that a prominent Boston “Evangelical” house reprinted a book edited and endorsed by Mr. Spurgeon, which contained, in capital letters, on its last page: “HE THAT BELIEVETH SHALL BE SAVED, LET HIS SINS BE EVER SO MANY; HE THAT BELIEVETH NOT SHALL BE DAMNED, LET HIS SINS BE EVER SO FEW.” It was not before the invention of the printing-press, but recently, in a liberal “Orthodox” religious journal, here in the United States, that these words of a famous American preacher were published: “This is our danger: not that we shall be sinful, not that we shall be imperfect, not that we shall be vain, not that we shall be foolish, not that we shall be corrupt in our imaginations, but that we shall not believe in Christ. Our salvation is not half so much imperilled by wickedness as by unbelief.”—Christian Register, March 24.

A CATALANIAN EXORCIST.

I will briefly describe what has just happened in this wealthy city. About the 14th or 15th of October it was privately announced, chiefly to the faithful women of the congregation which regularly throngs the Church of the Holy Spirit, in the street of San Francisco, that a young woman of seventeen or eighteen years of age, of the lower class, having long been afflicted with “a hatred of holy things”—the poor girl probably was subject to epileptic fits, and cried out and became convulsed when she heard the notes of the organ in church,—the senior priest of the church above mentioned would cure her of her disease, or, to use that gentleman's own language, “Avaunt, physicians and mountebanks; see how the church will cure this poor girl, who is at present possessed with four hundred devils.”

Those who are acquainted with Barcelona know well the Calle San Francisco, one of the well-to-do streets of the city, and its church, Espiritu Santo, not a poor man's, but a fashionable church. For eight days, the last day being the 17th instant, a little stream of persons of all ranks and of either sex might have been seen at the unusual hour (for church-going) of 12 A.M., threading its way towards the church. The principal door was kept closely shut, but the faithful or credulous, the open scoffers, and the lover of signs and wonders found admittance by a side-door to the exhibition which I am about to describe. The church was dark, but a sickly light was shed by wax lights on the sable forms of some eighty or one hundred persons who clustered round the presbiterio, or sanctuary, in front of the altar. Within the little enclosure, or sanctuary, separated from the crowd by a light railing, lay on a common bench, with a little pillow for her head to recline upon, a poorly-clad girl, probably of the peasant or artisan class; her brother or husband stood at her feet to restrain her (at times) frantic kicking by holding her legs. The door of the vestry opened; the exhibitor—I mean the priest—came in. The poor girl, not without just reason, “had an aversion to holy things,” or, at least, the four hundred devils within her distorted body had such an aversion; and in the confusion of the moment, thinking that the father was a “holy thing,” she doubled up her legs, screamed out with twitching nostrils, her breast heaving, her whole body writhing, and threw herself nearly off the bench. The male attendant seized her legs, the women supported her head and swept out her dishevelled hair. The priest advanced and, mingling familiarly with the shuddering and horror-struck crowd, said, pointing at the suffering child, now sobbing and twitching on the bench, “Promise me, my children, that you will be prudent (prudentes), and of a truth, sons and daughters mine, you shall see marvels." The promise was given. The exhibitor went to procure stole and short supplies (estola y roquete), and returned in a moment, taking his stand at the side of the "possessed with the devil," with his face toward the group of students. The order of the day's proceedings was (1) a lecture to the bystanders, and (2) the operation of exorcising the devils. The priest commenced his running commentary on, or explanation of, the strange phenomenon lying panting, foaming at the mouth, to the gaze of the stupid and shuddering crowd of her fellow-men and women. The priest began by lamenting with tears that "it is, unhappily, the fashion of people in this day and age to seek the aid of doctors, sleep-walkers or spiritualists, and quacks of all description"—the words he used were medicos, somnambulas, y curanderos—"when they have had at hand the aid of religion, and an aid and remedy secure and all-sufficient." He continued his address by saying that the means of which he should make use in the present case were not the strongest in his power, for to use the strongest was not now allowed. He then said: "This jovent—i.e., young girl—enjoys a most perfect tranquillity and calmness so long as she does not catch a sight of holy things, such as the holy water, the priest's dress, the altar, the church, or hear the sound of a bell, the roll of an organ's notes resounding through the aisle. You know," continued the priest, "that so great is this girl's aversion to holy things, myself included, that she goes into convulsions, kicks, screams, and distorts her body the moment she arrives at the corner of this street, and her convulsive struggles reach their climax when she enters the sacred house of the Most High." He ended with the following words: "This girl has often had the same infirmity in bygone years, and the devils have been constantly expelled; but, owing to the laxity of religion in those latter days, they return again to possess her body." Act the first finished. Act the second, the exorcism, commenced. Turning to the prostrate, shuddering, most unhappy object of his attack, the priest commenced: "In the name of God, of the saints, of the Blessed Host, of every holy sacrament of our Church, I adjure thee, Rusbel, come out of her." [N. B.—"Rusbel" is the name of a devil, the devil having two hundred and fifty-seven names in Catalonia.] Thus adjured, the girl threw herself in an agony of convulsion, till her distorted face, foam-be-spattered lips, and writhing limbs grew well-nigh stiff, at full length upon the floor, and, in language semi-obscene, semi-violent, screamed out, "I don't choose to come out, you thieves, scamps, robbers." "Fulfil your promise, Rusbel," said the priest. "You said yesterday you would cast one hundred more of your cursed spirits out of this most hapless girl's body. Can't you speak?" "Yes, I can," came from the poor girl's foaming lips, "I can." "Yes," said the cura, "you are a devil of honor; you are a man of your word." Out of the crowd stepped a plainly-attired Spanish gentleman, and said, "But, father, how can you pray to and praise the devil? I have read somewhere he is a liar and the father of lies. Does he keep his word?" "Yes," said the priest, "he is muy formal!"—i.e., a man of his word. "Fulfil your promise, Rusbel." "Never," shouted the devil, or the girl, now lashed into an agony of frenzy. "You shall," said the holy father; and the suffering girl, like a bruised and wounded snake, her dress all disarranged, her bosom heaving, wormed and twisted into the arms of the silly woman who knelt and cried by her bench of torture. At last from the quivering lips of the girl came the words, "I will"; but the devil added, with traditional perversity, "I will cast the one hundred out, but by the mouth of the girl." The priest objected. The exit, he said, of one hundred devils out of the small Spanish mouth of the woman would "leave her suffocated." Then the maddened girl said she must undress herself for the devils to escape. This petition the holy father refused. "Then I will come out through the right foot, but first"—the girl had on a hamper sandal, she was obviously of the poorest class—"you must take off her sandal." The sandal was untied; the foot gave a convulsive plunge; the devil and his myrmidons (so the cura said, looking around triumphantly) had gone to their own place. And, assured of this, the wretched dupe of a girl lay quite still. The exhibition was announced for eleven A. M. on the succeeding day, and it commenced again. Up came a band of blue-bloused artisans and claimed admittance to the church. The priest stoutly refused entrance to any but women. The men beat the church door; the police came; a scrimmage arose, and the priest retreated in haste; the sick girl was dragged to her lowly home; two mechanics now lie in Barcelona jail for their share in a called-for-if illegal demonstration; the street was cleared by the police, and the affair was over. Next day, the civil authorities of the town, men of high feeling and great enlightenment, shocked at what they had heard and read (for the whole affair is now in print, and can be bought in Barcelona for a half-penny), stopped, by civil decree, the whole affair. In conclusion, a few remarks are due in justice to the authorities: first of all the bishop, a man of enlightenment and erudition, was not cognizant, I believe, of this freak on the part of the clergy of the church in question. Secondly, the moment it came to the ears of the civil authorities, the sharpest and promptest means were taken to prevent a repetition of a scandal which had shamed and sickened the whole city of Barcelona.

The whole of the details I have given were taken down by me from the mouth of an honorable and most truthful Spanish gentleman, who was witness to the whole thing, and are strictly worthy of credit to the remotest detail. I have purposely suppressed much that was painful and indecent.—London Times.

DR. JOHN HENRY NEWMAN.

No two sets of ideas could be more dissimilar than those respectively suggested by the man John Henry Newman and the place Birmingham. And yet in Birmingham is Dr. Newman's home. There the late Cardinal Wiseman placed him in 1848, and there he still remains. An ugly red-brick building, shaped in the most modern of modern styles, in a suburb full of other ugly red-brick buildings, with a narrow strip of ground before it planted with dingy shrubs, standing back a little from the street as if overshadowed by the grandeur of the neighboring bank and inn,—such is the place where Dr. Newman's dwelling is fixed. For this he has exchanged those "spires of Oxford, domes and towers, gardens and groves," once, and indeed still, so dear to him, which he has never seen again, except, as a passing traveller from the railway, since he left them, at the bidding of conscience, nearly thirty-one years ago.

For many years after Dr. Newman came to live in Birmingham he was almost forgotten by the world, once much occupied with him and his doings. At first, after his secession to Rome, "the religious newspapers"—to use certain words of Mr. Carlyle—"were very lively, and promptly seizing their cue, prosecuted it to all lengths and breadths in their sad way." The deliberate submission to the Papal yoke of one of the foremost Englishmen of the day, the most conspicuous figure in the greatest national seat of learning, was an exercise of the right of private judgment not dreamed of in the philosophy of the chief champions of that great principle; and for some time "the traitor Newman" was solemnly paraded "in inquisitorial sandento" before an enlightened public. Dr. Newman has himself sketched for us in his inimitable way, the fate which overtook "Papal perverts," as they were called at that period, the incredible motives which were imputed to them, the bold misstatements, the rash prophecies, which were confidently hazarded regarding them. And then, he adds, "When every resource has failed, and in spite of all that can be said and surmised and expressed and hoped about the persons in question, Catholics they are and Catholics they remain, the prejudiced man has a last resource. He forgets that he ever heard of them; he has no duties to their names; they die to him." The picture is drawn from the life, and represents accurately what happened in Dr. Newman's own case. After asserting that he was mad, that he had quarrelled with the ecclesiastical authorities at Rome and had been suspended, nay, that he had given up revealed religion altogether, the world ceased to trouble itself further about him, and, pronouncing through the mouth of Lord John Russell that his "conversion" was an "inexplicable event," went its way, and left him at rest with the little band of friends who had followed him into his new home. And with the exception of the few years he spent in Dublin, essaying, at the bidding of authority, a great task under impossible conditions, there he has since remained,—in port, as he has told us, after a rough sea; willingly taking, as he elsewhere says, that humble place of service which his superiors chose for him, the desire of his heart and his duty going together; determined not to have the praise or the popularity which the world can give, but, according to St. Philip Neri's precept, to love to be unknown.

This aspiration, however, was not to be gratified. Thirteen years ago a popular writer, among whose many merits accuracy of thought or statement cannot be reckoned, thought fit to accuse Dr. Newman by name of teaching that truth for its own sake was not, and, on the whole, ought not to be, a virtue with the Roman clergy. This accusation, going so far beyond the popular prejudice entertained against him, appeared to Dr. Newman to call solemnly for an answer. An answer was given in the Apologia pro Vita Sua, where, at the cost of no small suffering to a nature eminently sensitive and shrinking from publicity, the veil was lifted from forty-five years of his inner life in a narrative whose simple candor carried conviction even to theological opponents. Few books have so triumphantly accomplished their purpose as that remarkable work. It is not too much to say that a revolution in the popular estimate of the author was caused by it. Since its publication he has, in one way or another, been brought frequently before his countrymen; and widely as the vast majority of them differ from his religious opinions, there is probably no living man in whose unswerving rectitude they more entirely believe, or for whom they entertain a deeper reverence and respect.

Certainly that reverence and respect would not be diminished in the case of any one by a familiar knowledge of Dr. Newman's daily life. His warmest and most devoted friends are those with whom he lives, his dearest brothers, as he calls them in the Apologia, the priests of the Birmingham Oratory; and it is curious and significant how each of them in his way reflects something of the tone and character of their illustrious superior,—the "Father," as they commonly term him. Throughout the house well-nigh everything speaks of him. In the "parlor" into which the visitor is shown hangs a print of Oxford, with the touching inscription underneath, "Fili hominis putamus vivere ossa ista? Et dixit, Domine Deus, tu nosti." The library is half furnished with his books; many of them once stood in his rooms at Oriel. In the church he has realized in some sort a type of architecture which he has himself described; not the scientific and masterly conception of a great whole with many parts, but something plain and inartificial, "an addition of chapel to chapel, and a wayward growth of cloister according to the occasion, with half-concealed shrines and unexpected recesses, with paintings upon the walls, as if by a second thought, with an absence of display and a wild irregular beauty." Then there is the Oratory School, his own creation, in which, under his fostering care, the youths of some of the greatest Catholic families are trained in traditions of scholarship and conduct transplanted from the old national seats of education, but modified or transformed by his judgment, and impressed, if we may so speak, with his personality. And if we are privileged to penetrate to the room whence all this influence radiates, and where, fenced in by double windows from the noise and biting winds of the outer world, "the Father" lives—his bed in one corner of it, behind a little screen,—we shall find him, as of old, busy among his books and papers, constant to "his work and to his labor until the evening," whose shades are now gathering around him. Who can guess at the literary treasures that chamber contains? It is significant of the simplicity of this great nature that when the "Dream of Gerontius"—the most vivid sketch of things beyond the veil that has been given to the world since Dante—was drawn from him by the death of a dear friend, it was so lightly valued by him that its rescue from the waste-paper basket to which he was about to consign it was due to an accident.

As Dr. Newman's days grow fewer, they grow longer. He has ever been an early riser, and now from five in the morning until an unknown hour at night he is busily engaged in redeeming the time. His first two hours are given to devotion. Shortly after seven he says his mass—usually for some years past in the chapel of the Bona Mors,—in which the souls of the founders and Catholic benefactors of his old colleges at Oxford are always remembered. At about eight o'clock he appears in the refectory, where he breakfasts in silence, after the custom of religious houses, attacking meanwhile the pile of correspondence which awaits him on the table. Then his own room receives him, and until half-past two or three in the afternoon correspondence, study, and the duties involved in the government of the house and school engross him. An hour or two in the afternoon is given to exercise, for he is still a great pedestrian; the community dinner is at six o'clock, and on days when his turn comes round "the Father" girds on the apron of service, and waits upon his brethren, not himself sitting down until they are served. All eat in silence, only broken by the voice of the lector, who from the pulpit in the corner reads first a chapter from the Vulgate, then a chapter of the life of a saint, and lastly, a portion from some modern work of general interest. When dinner is over, questions in some department of theological science are proposed by him whose turn it is. Each in succession gives his opinion, ending with the usual formula, "But I speak under correction." Then the proposer sums up, and the fathers adjourn to a neighboring parlor, where coffee is served and the pent-up flood of conversation bursts forth,—the play of wit and fancy, the wealth of anecdotes and reminiscence, the tender glances at the past, the keen remarks on the public events of the day, the shrewd practical observations on their own domestic and personal concerns. In all which the Superior fully bears his part, as much at home here as among his graver pursuits, his clear, musical voice interposing frequently to add the contribution of his mitis sapientia to the genial hour, which recalls to one the description given of the first Oratory ever which St. Philip Neri himself presided, "the school of Christian mirth." Perhaps the two things which most strike the visitor among these ecclesiastics are their thoroughly English tone, and the liberality, in the highest sense, of their views. Dr. Newman once remarked, "When I became a Catholic, I did not cease to be an Englishman"; and it may be truly said of him, as Ampere said of Ozanam, that "he has a largeness of conception which teaches him to recognize sympathies outside the camp in which he is fighting"; or in the words of another regarding that great man, "He is passionately enamored of the legitimate conquests of the modern mind; he loves liberty, and he has served it; he is intolerant of intolerance and just towards error."

So passes Dr. Newman's life in his Birmingham home, its tranquil course broken at rare intervals by visits to old and cherished friends, chiefly of his Oxford days, or by retirement to a tiny country house of the Oratorians, a few miles distant, at Rednal, round which is the little church-yard where they are buried. It is a pretty little spot, well away from the smoke and din of Birmingham; and here Dr. Newman will sometimes spend days in absolute seclusion, whether seeking rest from prolonged labor or unbroken time for more assiduous toil. It was here that the most closely reasoned of his works, the Grammar of Assent, was composed; but the books with which the walls are lined bear evidence that lighter literature is not disregarded. Miss Austen, Thackeray, Anthony Trollope, Sir Walter Scott, Mrs. Gaskell, are favorite authors with the great theologian. Of modern English poets, Wordsworth, Southey, and Crabbe are highly valued by him, and are constantly read. Music, again, has ever been a solace to him, and has been lovingly cultivated. Most educated men know the passage in the Oxford University Sermons in which "the mysterious stirrings of heart, and keen emotions and strange yearnings after we know not what, and awful impressions we know not whence," produced in us by the great masters of musical sound, are described in words of majestic eloquence which it would be hard to parallel. As might have been expected, the man who could write thus of music is himself no mean musician. A story is told—we know not with what truth—that on one occasion a Protestant Boanerges visiting Birmingham sent a pompous invitation to the great convert to dispute publicly with him in the town hall, to which Dr. Newman replied that he had small skill in controversy, and must decline to enter the lists with so redoubtable a champion; but that his friends credited him with some power of playing the violin, and that he would be happy to meet his challenger at a trial of strength on that instrument.

Our sketch of Dr. Newman at home ought not to conclude without some mention of his gala-day.—St. Philip Ned's feast. Nothing is more striking about him than the sense of personal attachment which he bears to the Saint whose habit he wears and under whose shadow he lives. At first this devotion to a man whom he has never known; who has been dead, indeed, these three hundred years; who has left no image of himself in books, for he wrote none; whose life was spent in Rome, in a private station, and in the discharge of the ordinary duties of the sacerdotal calling,—seems to the Protestant visitor fantastic and sentimental. But a little observation soon shows that it is one of the soberest realities of Dr. Newman's life. St. Philip is no stranger to him. The "old man of sweet aspect," "whose bright and beautiful character won him before he was a Catholic," is ever before a mind which dwells more among the unseen than the visible. And when St. Philip's day comes round there is joy in Dr. Newman's home. A grand function in the church, at which the Saint's great disciple reads, not without pauses from strong emotion, Bacc's touching narrative of his patron's last days on earth; a Latin play in the school, in which the youthful actors have been personally trained by their great head; a modest and bright banquet in the refectory, in which "the Father" gathers around him the friends who have come, some of them from afar, to offer to him their annual greeting,—these are the leading incidents of a day deeply enshrined in the memories of many:—

"All these have been, and thee mine eyes
Have look'd on; if they look'd in vain,
My shame is greater than remains,
Nor let thy wisdom make me wise."

A SPECIMEN OF JOSEPH COOK.

HIS LECTURESHIP TAKES A WALK AT EASTER—ENCOUNTERS A SOLAR LOOK, LOAFERISH LIBERALISM, AND OTHER ANIMALS—EFFLUATES HIS BALLOON FROM HIS PRIVATE RESOURCES—JUMPS INTO THE BASKET—CUTS THE ROPE—THROWS OVERBOARD ALL HIS BALLAST OF FACT—AND IS LOST IN THE EMPTHEAN.

If you please, the times are serious, and light sneers will do no good now, and ought not to be noticed by me except in play. It was my fortune, professionally, to walk down to a church near the Tabernacle, yesterday morning, to give an Easter discourse. As I passed up the street, I met a deluge, not of rain, such as has diminished the audiences in the Tabernacle occasionally—the month of March is a great enemy to large assemblies,—but a crowd of people emerging from I did not at first think where, until I remembered that the Tabernacle service had just closed. They covered acres and came on in thousands, like the crowds of a gala-day. I noticed their faces, for the best test of what has been done in a religious address in any assembly is to study the countenances of the audience as it disperses. If you see a softened, an ennobled, a "solar look," to use one of the phrases of Bronson Alcott (turning to Mr. Alcott who sat at the speaker's right), one may be sure that religious truth has done good. I saw the solar look yesterday on the street in hundreds and thousands of faces; I saw it sometimes in the gaze of shop-girls, perhaps.

Yes, but high culture in Boston does not care much for shop-girls. Well, it is time it should. There is a low-bred, loaferish liberalism uttering itself occasionally in sneers because the poor have the gospel preached to them. That sneer has been heard ever since the days of Celsus and the games in the old Coliseum, and it has a peculiarly reptilian ring. There are many kinds of liberalism.—Christian liberalism I honor; literary and æsthetic liberalism is to be spoken of with respect, in most cases; but below what I have called a limp and lavender and unscientific liberalism, there is a low-bred and loaferish liberalism. This, in Boston, has impudence, but no scholarship; rattle, but no fangs. In the great multitude the solar look is the best prophecy that can be had for the American future. It is a radiance that is like the rising of the sun to any man who is anxious about what is to come in America.

After noticing that look and thanking God for it, I walked on, and happened to pass a lonely Boston corner where the Paine Hall and the Parker Memorial Hall stand near each other: par nobile fratrum. On a bulletin on the Paine Hall, the street in front of which looked deserted, I read: "Children's Progressive Lyceum Entertainment this evening." "The Origin and Amusements of the Orthodox Hell." "Twenty-ninth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, APRIL 1." Passing by the Parker Memorial Hall, where no doubt words of good sense have been uttered occasionally, I found in the window this statement: "To-night, a lecture on the 'Arctic Regions,' with a stereopticon and seventy views."

Gentlemen, all over the world the equivalent of the scene I saw on that Easter morn may be looked upon almost everywhere within the whole domain of Christendom. Infidelity in Germany is no stronger than it is in Boston. Out of the thirty universities of that most learned land of the globe, only one is called rationalistic to-day.

When the sun stands above Bunker Hill at noon it has just set on the Parthenon and is rising on the volcanoes of the Sandwich Isles. As Easter Day passed about the globe, the contrasted scenes which the sun saw here—a multitude fed with God's Word and a few erratics striving to solace themselves without God,—were not unlike the scenes which the resplendent orb looked down upon in the whole range of civilization. In two hundred languages of the world the Scriptures were read yesterday; in two hundred languages of the world hymns were lifted to the Triune Name yesterday; in two hundred languages of the world the Gospel was preached to the poor yesterday.

What is our impecunious scepticism doing here? Has it ever printed a book that has gone into a second edition? Theodore Parker's works never went into a second edition. I do not know of a single infidel book over a hundred years old that has not been put on the upper neglected shelf by scholars. Boston must compare her achievements with those of cities outside of America and take her chances under the buffalings of time. Where is there in Boston anything in the shape of scepticism that will bear the microscope? For one, I solemnly aver that I do not know where, and I have nothing else to do but search. Theodore Parker is the best sceptic you ever had; but to me he is honey-combed through and through with disloyalty to the very nature of things,—his supreme authority. It was asserted, not long ago, in an obscure sceptical newspaper here, that Parker's works ought to be forced into a second edition by his friends. It was admitted there was no demand for a second edition, but it was thought that if now there was an effort made strategically, one be put upon the market. You have no better books than these, and there has been no marked demand in Boston for these, and the attentive portion of the world knows the facts. Why am I proclaiming this? Because, outside of Boston, it is often carelessly supposed that the facts are the reverse, and that this city is represented only by a few people, who, deficient in religious activity, and forgetting the law of the survival of the fittest, are distinguished far more by audacity than by scholarship, and are members of a long line in history, of which Galileo stood at the head.—Boston Weekly Advertiser, April 5.

POLITICS IN THE SCHOOL.

There are complaints that the public school course is overloaded with studies which, useful enough elsewhere, are hardly of practical value therein. We have no sympathy for the blatant enthusiasm manifested over mere rote knowledge of natural sciences and the arts in our schools. The course is a short one; it gives the only education received by thousands, and it is not wise to impede it with branches not absolutely necessary to practical life. The "system" has countless faults, and in bettering it, it may be that educators should sometimes study subtraction instead of addition. As for natural sciences and industrial arts, the places in which to study these are special technical schools, thoroughly fitted, splendidly manned by working teachers, and, above all, free. Too many of these we cannot have so long as they are efficient. There is one addition, however, which might be made without detriment to the school course,—the study in various forms of political science. There is a great deal of sentimental nonsense talked concerning the typical, large-minded, and patriotic American youth; the truth is, that there lives no such being. American boys read newspapers, but not the politics in them, which may be judicious. They are attracted by the drum and rife of political meetings, but to them it is all delightful noise and no ideas. In country villages they lounge sometimes with their elders in "the store," but the wisdom they acquire there is chiefly remarkable for poverty and shallowness. They are ignorant of the formation of their government, the most effective motors in its history, the provisions and action of the Constitution. They have no training whatever for their political duties, duties certainly not the least important of their lives. The average teacher takes no interest in practical politics, and from one year's end to another never opens his or her lips on the subject. We do not advise plunging the pupil into dry essay and diffuse dissertation, but surely time can be found for a little study which shall be thorough, and a reasonable amount of apt, simple, and interesting explanation. There is no lack of texts, and a teacher who has brains and energy will see that the study is not perfunctory. Future Congresses would not be the worse for such instruction.—N. Y. Tribune.

MR. RICHARD A. PROCTOR has been giving in the English Mechanic some interesting notes on his American journeyings. He says that a generous estimate of the value of a lecturer's time and labor and of the extent of his probable travelling expenses seems always to be made. He adds: "It is rather remarkable that in America, where, as already mentioned, lectures are often arranged by persons not literary or scientific at all in their tastes, and regarding the whole matter as one of dollars and cents, one so seldom hears of any difficulty or even delay about pecuniary matters. I have given two hundred and forty-four lectures in all in America, and there is but one of those (a lecture given at the Public Library Hall of Des Moines, Iowa) for which payment was not well and duly made." Mr. Proctor does not entirely approve of the American custom of giving "receptions" to "eminent guests." He says that though the kindness of the motive is manifest, he never yet knew an Englishman who was not made supremely uncomfortable by them. He adds: "I am told that the proper thing at a reception is not (as Englishmen would be apt to do) to simply bow to each person introduced, and shake hands (after once learning that pleasant American custom), but to look as though you long had known 'from afar' Mr. Titus Ulysses Boaker, were basking to hear his views about negro suffrage, serial navigation, or the waistcoat button of the future, and were only prevented from hearkening to him for hours by the outstretched hand of Mr. Washington Lee Scrubbins, which must be grasped with enthusiasm, the Boaker side of your face wearing a look of heart-felt anguish, while the Scrubbins side is lit up with the glow of fervent delight. But, after all, every nation has its own form of hugging, and I am not sure that the quiet student of science suffers more during a reception in one country than he does in another, when formally introduced to an audience (as in former years might happen even in England), with 'Ah—the-ah—hope and—ah—trust—ah—that—ah—the lecturer will prove—ah—the-ah—forerunner—the precursor of—ah—those other lecturers—those—yes—those other—ah—lecturers—ah—who are to follow—to—ah—to—in fact—to succeed him—in—ah—in this course of lectures,' and compelled by custom to be similarly impressive in returning thanks."

IN THE Greeley days the cry was, "Go West—Go West." The following story, told by the Rev. Robert Collyer at a Bristow meeting, gives advice to the reformers which has the true ring. A great many years ago, on one of our Southwestern rivers, there was an old skipper who had a steamboat which was sailing in shoaly water, and got stuck in the mud. She swung around in the water and there was no chance to get her afloat, do what they would. He was a terribly profane old fellow, and everybody knew it through the country. Suddenly an idea struck him. He said to one of his deck-hands: "You go up to the town and tell them I have got religion, and I want them to come and hold a prayer-meeting on board." The deck-hands went to the town and spread the news around, and every one, being interested in the old skipper's conversion, went down to hold the prayer-meeting. The old man was standing ready to receive them, and, as they came down, he said to every man, "Go aft," and they all went aft until the great load was at that end. They all went aft until there was a great weight and the end which was in the mud got loose, and the ship floated off. As soon as the ship got afloat, the skipper said: "The meeting is over. Jump ashore!" [Loud laughter.] In our Republican party—I mean those leaders—there are men who get religion every time there is going to be an election. [Cheers.] They say, "Gentlemen, go aft; go aft." And we go aft. We are a good-natured crowd in this country. The best-natured fellows anywhere on this planet is a crowd of Americans, such as I see before me tonight. We are good fellows, and we go aft, and the old ship floats again, and then we jump ashore. Now I don't mean to go into that prayer-meeting any more. [Cheers and laughter.] I don't mean to have anything more to do with that old skipper. I mean to find, if I can, some man who doesn't get religion once in every four years.

AN APRIL PROPHECY.

Rainbow-colors in the air,
Over mist-clouds coming, going,
Rainbow-colors o'er the river,
Velling waters swiftly flowing—
These I saw, one gray spring-day,
Thinking: "Nature always sings me
Some new song in joyous April,
Something new she always brings me.

"Flower I ne'er before have seen,
Song of bird unknown, above me,
Thoughts that come so swift, unbidden,
They to sudden rapture move me.

"Now she bids me wondering see
Rainbow-bloom o'er cloud and river,
Ere unfolding leaf or blossom
On Earth's chilly breast doth quiver.

"She is mingling colors here
For her pannies and petunias:
Rainbow-bloom o'er cloud and river
April's prophecy of June is."

O'er the sombre, unnamed tide
Of my thoughts in alliance flowing,
Brightening clouded realms of fancy,
Hope's own iris hovered glowing.

Nameless hope of nobler good
Than the baffling years had given,
Thrilled through all my quickening pulses,
'Neath the changeful April heaven.

Rainbow-colors in the air,
Over mist-clouds coming, going,
Rainbow-colors o'er the river,
Velling waters swiftly flowing.

"FREE RELIGION VERSUS TRANSCENDENTALISM."

When, at the invitation of the sub-committee of the Free Religious Association, we discarded the subject originally chosen for our annual Horticultural Hall lecture (namely, "Morality and Religion"), and acceded to the suggestion that "The Scientific Method in Religion" should be substituted for it in order to carry out the idea of a special series of four lectures, we did not for an instant imagine that we had been invited to express, either officially or semi-officially, the views of the Association. On the contrary, we knew that this was rendered impossible by the Constitution of the Association itself; and we perfectly understood that this particular subject had been assigned to us simply because we were known to have a special interest in it. That the Association included among its members many who embraced the method and philosophy of Transcendentalism, was a fact equally well understood; and it would be to us a source of profound and inconsolable regret, if they imagined that, because we frankly criticised this method and philosophy, we therefore desired them to retire from the Association's fellowship. Nothing could have been farther from our wish than a result so melancholy and disappointing. Our object was merely to point out that the "absolute freedom of thought and expression," to which we are all alike and with equal heartiness pledged by our common Constitution, involves the universal and intelligent adoption of that scientific method which alone, as we conceive it, bestows or permits such freedom,—to initiate a candid and wide-spread discussion of this fundamental point, to the end that the cause of truth might be promoted and the power of the Association for good proportionally enhanced. Our desire and purpose were to point out what noble and magnificent principles were laid down in the Constitution, and to secure a fuller comprehension of them in their largest relations among the members of the Association; and we did not dream that anybody would take the trouble to twist this manifest intent into a wish to drive him away. Whether we are or are not correct in supposing that an unsuspected dogmatism lurks in the Transcendental method, and in supposing that the genuine interests of religious truth require the sacrifice of this dogmatic residuum and a general advance of liberalism to the unrestricted liberty of science and the scientific method, we are confident that every unprejudiced Transcendentalist in the Association will take for granted the kindness and unfeigned fraternity of our motives, waste no time in irrelevant discussion of them, and concentrate his attention and thought on the real question at issue: namely, Does the method of Transcendentalism really conflict with the method of Science, or really refuse the intellectual freedom which the latter requires? That is a question of paramount importance; and it is the only question which will occupy the minds of those who are aware of the existing state of religious thought.

It is with the greatest pleasure, therefore, that we publish this week the powerful defence of Transcendentalism by Mr. Charles D. B. Mills. This gentleman, one of the best of thinkers and the best of men, commands the esteem of a wide circle of liberals by his writings and lectures, and is everywhere more highly esteemed in proportion as he is better known. The paper with which he favors us this week is worthy of great admiration by its ability and by the beautiful tone and spirit which pervade it. Mr. Mills writes without a particle of resentment for the criticisms to which he replies; it does not seem to have occurred to him that we were guilty of a nefarious plot to "read him out of the Free Religious movement"; his whole attention is absorbed in the consideration of the main question. There is something delightful in this absence of all pettiness of mind, and we receive his counter-criticisms with sincere gratitude for his frank, searching, and yet most courteous examination of the thoughts we advanced. He furnishes another noble demonstration that a trenchant discussion of differences in the pure love of truth cements, and does not weaken, the ties of "fellowship in the spirit."

For the sake of convenient reference, we have numbered the paragraphs of Mr. Mills' article, and shall touch upon them in their order.

1. Mr. Mills writes: "Transcendentalism you regard as one of the old forms of dogmatism, to be dismissed by Free Religion and relegated to essentially the same domain as Romanism, Lutheran Protestantism, etc. This in consequence of the fact that Transcendentalism affirms the authority of Intuition,—the truths it reads, or supposes itself to read, in the inner consciousness of the soul."

Perhaps we ought to have explained more at length in our lecture why it is that we consider Transcendentalism as retaining in its method a certain real but hitherto unrecognized dogmatism. Our excuse for not doing so must be the evident necessity of omitting much, when we were obliged to overrun our limit of time as it was. But the essence of the dogmatism which we find in Transcendentalism lies in its refusal to allow the scientific intellect, or what it calls the "understanding," to submit the alleged deliverances of Intuition, or what it calls the "higher reason," to the ordinary tests of science. Nothing is more noticeable in the writings of most Transcendentalists than a politely expressed or implied contempt for the "understanding," as a means of attaining the highest religious truth,—an assertion of the exclusive jurisdiction, in such matters, of the intuitional or "higher reason." It is held by them that "logic" has no proper place or claim in the discussion,—that argument, inference, hypothesis, conclusion, positive or negative demonstration, etc., belong only to a lower range of problems, and must be confined strictly to that lower range. Scientific verification is unanimously banished as inapplicable to "Transcendental truths," and applicable only in the region of subordinate inquiries. Here is the real point of collision between the two methods of Transcendentalism and of Science.

With his usual admirable precision, Mr. Potter stated the issue in last week's INDEX as follows: "The only question is, Does the Intuitionist attempt to impose his intuition upon others as his 'say-so,' or is he willing to submit it to the test of scientific verification?" If the Intuitionist is indeed willing to submit his "intuition" to the "test of scientific verification," he is not an Intuitionist or a Transcendentalist in the sense in which alone we have used the words; but if he is not willing to submit it to this test, then he makes the refusal of complete intellectual liberty which necessitates the protest of Free Religion against Transcendentalism. We do not indeed see how any thorough Transcendentalist can ever accept the "test of scientific verification" without explicitly surrendering and denying the final authority of private "intuition"; he would thereby accept, as the final appeal, the test of logic, the test of the scientific intellect or "understanding," and subordinate to this test the "higher reason" whose final authority he has always hitherto affirmed. The peculiar position of Transcendentalism has always been that the special truths of God, Immortality, and Duty are absolutely certain independently of all scientific verification,—that the scientific intellect or "understanding" is utterly incompetent either to verify or disprove them,—and that the simple asseveration or affirmation of the "higher reason" is itself, regardless of all scientific verification, the sole and sufficient ground of their absolute certainty. This attitude is a practical imposition of the Transcendentalist's "intuition" on all other thinkers, not on penalty of being burned at the stake, of course, yet nevertheless on penalty of being set down as spiritually "crippled" or "one-legged." We see in this attitude a refusal to concede the equal mental rights of non-Transcendentalists, a denial of spiritual equality to those who disclaim the possession of intuitional certitude touching God, Immortality, and Duty, and therefore a restriction of spiritual liberty against which Free Religion must protest. The freedom of Science is the freedom of the scientific intellect to question and test all things whatsoever; but Transcendentalism denies the right of the scientific intellect to question or test the deliverances of its "intuition." Have we not here a dogmatic limitation of the liberty of thought which must be done away with?

2. "What is Transcendentalism," asks Mr. Mills, "in its essential position? It is, as I understand it, that the spiritual, the realm of substance, the invisible, the idea of the infinite, is revealed immediately in the soul, or is present primarily there in the thought; that it cannot be imparted or communicated from without, since it transcends all the outer; that it is its own authentication, and that the final appeal must always be laid to that standard within."

Undoubtedly Mr. Mills here describes with perfect accuracy the chief characteristic of Transcendentalism, which teaches that the intuition of Infinite Spirit is a purely subjective and self-authenticated revelation of God in the soul,—not a truth learned by experience or derived in any way from the outer universe, but an inward self-revelation of God to man in the depths of his own spiritual consciousness. That profoundly religious natures pass through internal experiences which they interpret to themselves in this manner, is a simple matter of record; but the question remains whether the educated intelligence of the race will set the seal of its approval on such a philosophy. We think it cannot. Is it not evident that Transcendentalism itself, in this very procedure, takes for granted the objective existence of Infinite Spirit? For the question must be asked—It is asked: "How can Infinite Spirit be contained in a finite consciousness?" If it is not so contained, yet is in truth intuitually known, then it is an objective and encompassing reality, the knowledge of whose existence is "imparted or communicated from without"; but if it is so contained, it cannot be infinite at all. If it is infinite, it must necessarily be objective to a finite consciousness, which cannot contain the infinite; but if it is indeed merely subjective to a finite consciousness, then it cannot be infinite at all. According to our best reasoning, Transcendentalism thus loses its Infinite Spirit altogether in the attempt to make it a subjective fact alone; it can only vindicate the existence of Infinite Spirit by conceding it to be an objective fact, and treating it accordingly. In other words, Transcendentalism is sowing the seeds of inevitable atheism by its rejection of the scientific method; it can only vindicate theism by adopting this method frankly and fearlessly.

There is no utility, therefore, because no truth, in the attempt to make the knowledge of God an a priori datum of consciousness, a part of the original outfit of the soul, an element of its very constitution. Granting this claim, it defeats its own object; for such a knowledge would be hopelessly subjective, could never make the transition to the objective, and would resolve God into a mere thought or dream, devoid of all reality external to the mind of the dreamer. If the existence of God is worthy to be called a fact, as distinguished from a mere dream or hallucination, it must be an objective truth of the universe, not a subjective truth of the soul. As such, it is a truth which must be tested and verified, like all other objective truths, by the scientific method; it must be found to have its indestructible basis in human experience,—in the contact of the inner with the outer. The method of Transcendentalism, relying on intuition as an interior phenomenon of the consciousness which has no relation to "the outer," is hopelessly subjective; it can make no headway whatever against the scientific materialism of to-day, but drifts helplessly to atheism. The method of science, however, is thoroughly objective, treating even subjective phenomena in an objective manner, and will, in our own opinion, lead the crude materialism of hyperphysical speculation up to the sober, broad, inclusive philosophy of scientific theism. The scientific method in religion will turn men from burrowing in the darkness and obscurity of their own interior consciousness, and set them to studying the deep and vast relations, the luminous unities, of the universe as a whole. Science declares that no specific knowledge originates absolutely in the consciousness of man, but that all knowledge is the product of the constant action and reaction between the environment and the soul. Transcendentalism, with its purely subjective method of intuition, is powerless to defend even its own most dearly prized ideas; Science, with a method which combines subjectivity and objectivity in constant relations, gives the only hope we see of saving them from extinction.

3. But Mr. Mills holds that Science herself can only become such by arriving at "something which as a foundation is final, some absolute upon which may be planted as upon firm ground the conviction." He says: "The protest of Free Religion, you declare, 'affirmed the great fact of religion.' How should it be entitled to affirm anything except by authority of those great fundamental truths that dwell in the soul," etc.

In reply to this we should say that Free Religion affirms religion simply as a great verifiable fact of experience, not as an abstract or "absolute" truth at all. Religion, as an historical and still existent phenomenon, rests for its authentication on precisely the same basis as any other fact which science deals with; namely, on observation. It is an objective fact which forces itself upon the observer's mind in the history of every nation, as a fountain of innumerable institutions, laws, customs, of language, literature, arts, religions,—in the lives of countless dead and living individuals, as a fountain of character, words, actions, careers. Science studies all such things objectively, and seeks their cause; it accepts religion as a fact on the testimony of the observing faculties, not on the warrant of Transcendental assumptions or subjective theories of any kind; it compares the results of this examination with the results of investigations into the physical constitution of things, and cannot in the end avoid conforming its general philosophy of Nature as a whole to the totality of the facts. There is no need of assuming any "fundamental truths of the soul" which have a purely subjective or a priori origin; Science accepts thought and the laws of thought as ultimate verifiable facts, and studies them objectively in their actual manifestations. The outcome of her processes, beginning with the investigation of all known and verified facts in their mutual relationship, and proceeding to an ultimate theory of things which shall harmonize them all in a vast, comprehensive philosophy of the universe as a whole, will be to establish a new unity of belief on the ground of discovered truth, instead of perpetuating the present discord of opinions on the ground of irreconcilable and arbitrary assumptions.

4. The "idea of God," as the religious history of the race conclusively proves, has been very slowly built up by a process of constant change and modification; it is the result of thought, more or less directed by knowledge of the universe; it has grown up within the consciousness under the constant modifying influence of the environment, and is essentially an attempt of the intellect to conceive self and the environment in an all-embracing unity. If the "idea of God" were indeed the revelation in consciousness of an unchangeable fact of the universe, given outright as a revealed whole, it ought to be identical in all consciousnesses; whereas it differs in different minds precisely in the ratio of their culture and development. It is really a product of thought, not an original datum of consciousness; and it can only be verified at last by being shown to be the only rational explanation of the infinite unity in infinite diversity which is the highest possible generalization of science. Consciousness can testify only to its own subjective modifications, in connection with their causes; it cannot be constituted into a "standard" for anything else. If it be held that God belongs only to the "world within," and not equally to the "world without," we see not how to regard him otherwise than as a subjective dream baseless in reality. Again science seems to us to be the only possible rescuer of the idea of God from the fatal unreality into which Transcendentalism plunges it.

5. In the term "outer universe," it is true, as Mr. Mills supposes, that we include the "realm of the spiritual"—that is, so far as the spiritual is not self. He himself is to us part of the outer universe; we know nothing of his spiritual consciousness except as it is made known to us by its manifestations through media external to our own selfhood. But he is known to us objectively, not subjectively; we do not claim him as "a fact given in our own consciousness." Hence we are puzzled to understand how our recognition of the spiritual as part of the outer universe involves us in any admission of the Transcendental intuition. Our "intuition" of Mr. Mills is subject to the test of scientific verification—and very possibly to considerable correction! But the Transcendental intuition, if we understand it, is not subject to such verification. How does the "old witness come back"? We are in the dark here.

6. The point of "advantage in the final appeal" which the advocate of the scientific method has over the advocate of the Transcendental method lies in the substitution of objective scientific verification for subjective interrogation of consciousness. When questioned how he knows, he appeals to this test of facts. The Transcendentalist says, with Mr. Mills, that "the correction of all error is to be applied in this world within"; but the scientific investigator makes the correction of error in the world without. Of course, the processes of reasoning on ascertained facts are mental, and so far "within"; but the results of reasoning must again be verified objectively, and the appeal thus again lies to the world without. Is there no "advantage" in this possibility of making Nature herself bear testimony in the case?

7. That certain truths, such as "the authority of the ideal," are only known in and through the spiritual consciousness of man, we are the very last to deny; we bow reverently before the sanctity of the moral ideal, and will join Mr. Mills in making its authority good against all comers. But this is a very different thing from affirming the finality of the Transcendental intuition in solving the problems of God and Immortality. "Does God exist?" "Does man live after death?" These are questions not answerable to the world's satisfaction by any appeal to the Transcendental intuition. They are great questions of fact, not to be disposed of by any man's unsubstantiated assertion, or by any philosophy of religion which denies the necessity of scientific verification. In what sense we believe in "intuition," any one may easily discover by referring to our lecture on "Darwin's Theory of Conscience; its Relation to Scientific Ethics," published in THE INDEX of March 12, 1874. But this sense of the word has no analogy to the Transcendental use of it, as a final appeal in religious problems. All such problems, we believe, will remain unsettled until Science settles them by her own well-established method; and while, by employing this method to the best of our ability, we have attained provisional solutions of some of them to our own satisfaction, we hold them subject to correction or even reversal by the progress of science.

In conclusion, we cannot resist the temptation to thank Mr. Mills once more for his noble letter, which we admire none the less because we do not entirely agree with its positions. It is a model of fair, generous, high-minded, thoughtful criticism, and will command the delighted attention of all who are competent to appreciate its rare merits. We trust that Mr. Mills will not hesitate to maintain further his own side of this great argument, and to expose any errors into which we may have inadvertently fallen in our comments on what he has already written.

CHRISTIAN ARCHITECTURE.

The standard objection to rationalism from the Orthodox side is that it is merely destructive; that it pulls down but never builds. We have till lately regarded this criticism as one of the thoughtless matter-of-course cavils that are repeated and passed along without reflection or consideration. Its falsity as a statement, and its absurdity as a criticism were irreconcilable with the supposition of intelligence in the speakers and writers that ventilated the sentiment. But its incessant repetition in the face of correction, and by writers of unquestioned honesty and soberness—like the literary reviewers of the New York Herald, for instance, one of whom is understood to be the Rev. George Hepworth,—compels us to think that we have been unjust to the adversaries of rationalism, in failing to give them credit for the idea that burned in their minds. The stupidity, we begin to suspect, is ours, not theirs. We were misled by the vulgar prejudice in favor of building on unoccupied ground,—a prejudice so universal and so respectable that its baselessness was concealed from view. Seeing that it was, always has been, and still is the custom with architects who propose erecting structures on given sites, to remove the structures already there, and to lay new foundations, with stronger masonry perhaps, it had not occurred to us that any other method was practicable. We were staggered, too, by the apparent awkwardness of a style of building that superimposed one edifice on the top of another. Whatever facilities might be furnished by ladders and elevators, the practical difficulties to be overcome in making such altitudinous structures convenient seemed very formidable to unprofessional eyes; and whatever privileges of light and air the upper residents might enjoy, must, we surmised, be quite counterbalanced by the fatigues of the ascent, and by the uneasy apprehension that the underpinning might give way. Of course this style of building could not be carried out indefinitely, though in the case of castles in the air, as theological structures are, from the nature of things, the limitations need not be strict.

"On wings of faith our souls can fly."

A closer meditation on this problem satisfies us that our ingenious surmises may be dispensed with. The Christian critics of rationalism are serious. They but recommend the adoption of the architectural principles on which Christendom has worked for fifteen hundred years and more. We remember that Christendom has been very careful not to remove the buildings that covered the spots it wished to occupy. It has never pulled down or pulled up. So sacred has been its respect for preëxisting edifices, that it has allowed them to stand in disregard of the Apostle's injunction implied in the words: "Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid,—namely, Christ Jesus." Disregarding this earnest, emphatic, solemn warning, the Christian edifiers have taken such foundations as existed, and proceeded to erect their cathedrals, shrines, religious houses, altars, rites, systems of worship and dogma without giving themselves the trouble to move a stone. No matter who the original builder may have been—Buddha, Zoroaster, Moses, Plato, Aristotle, Descartes, Hegel,—so long as the excavations were deep enough, and the masonry tolerably good, the superstructure ascended. The churches rose on the basis of fanes of unknown antiquity. The altars rest on piles of rock that were begun by pagan hands before Moses was heard of. Priests of Baal and Astarte have their share in the decorations and symbols. Even the vestments and utensils were fashioned after venerable patterns which refer back to designers that were forgotten when the Israelites came out of Egypt.

Nay, we must not wrong Christendom by suggesting that it has builded new structures on the foundations of the old. It is not enough to say that nothing has been pulled down; the policy has been, when a visible edifice remained, to adopt it, with a few slight alterations; and when no visible structure remained, it was as nearly as possible reproduced. It was called by another name, but its form was unchanged. Thus Christianity practised an economy which it would fain see imitated by others. It is grieved at the extravagance of the radicals who are so reckless of good material. It would rejoice to have them remain as it did, in the venerable homestead, add a story perhaps, or an L, if they found it necessary,—but better still, crowd in with the rest, retain the family name, and make no account of nominal distinctions which centuries of custom have enabled it so quietly to pass by. The advice is generous, even magnanimous in spirit, but it is doubtful if the radicals will accept it. There is, in their opinion, a limit to the serviceableness of foundations. After a few thousand of years, mortar will crumble, and even stone disintegrate. There is rot and mildew and foul odor. Besides, there is a convenience in distinctions. The confusion of names leads to confusion of ideas and things. The perpetual transformation of buildings, from basilicas to cathedrals, from cathedrals to meeting-houses, from meeting-houses to theatres, is not favorable to accurate recollection or clear associations. The rites and dogmas lose, after a time, all intelligible meaning, and stand for whatever fancy suggests,—be it one notion or another, or no notion of any kind. The period arrives at length when it becomes expedient to clear the ground, and make a new beginning.

Therefore, with all respect for the Christian principle, and with due gratitude for the counsel—some-what ferociously given,—to follow in the old paths, the radical must adhere to his judgment in favor of pulling down before he builds, that he may not be under the necessity of pulling down afterwards.

DR. BARTOL'S LETTER.

The following letter from Rev. Dr. Bartol, referring to the Providence Convention of October, 1874, will receive the close attention of all our readers who are interested in the Free Religious Association:—

Boston, April 12, 1877.

MR. EDITOR:—

You are quite correct in saying that free speech was vindicated by several voices; as I have been told, after I withdrew, by those of myself, Mr. Potter, and Mr. Frothingham with much noble and generous emphasis, on the occasion to which, in your last issue, you refer. I have long since, in my own desk, in commenting on the subject, gladly declared this fact with explicit correctness as great as your own. But, as you feel aggrieved, I am sorry I did not explain the matter more largely also in my Antisecular Discourse. I could, however, scarce more than allude to many things in my crowded space, and I meant to do the same justice to this subject as to any other, having no reason or disposition to misstate the unquestionable fact of official rebuke to me on the platform. If I did not mention the replies, which came of course, as all might understand they would, I understated greatly the severity of that rebuke. Nor was I informed that the answers aforesaid were in terms as official as the assault; only so far as this,—that they questioned and denied the assailant's right to speak for the Association himself. Certainly no communication to me on the subject was more than a purely private and friendly, although warm, expression of regret. The historic truth remains, that free discussion has been brought less into doubt, for example, in the West Church and the Essex Conference than in the Free Religious Association. You honestly and reverently and grandly have maintained its principle in THE INDEX. Yet has that brave sheet any advantage, in the temper of its blade, over the steel of the Christian Register or of the New York Inquirer? But your truthfulness I honor nevertheless. As I had left the meeting in Providence for an appointment of duty in Boston, my friend, Rowland Connor, who remained, will verify for me, if necessary, my account of what was said in the former place. C. A. BARTOL.

Since Dr. Bartol in his present letter does not withdraw his charge against the Free Religious Association as such, it is necessary, for the sake of simple justice, to remind our readers more particularly of the facts.

A five-column report of the Providence Convention, written by Mr. S. H. Morse (editor of the now discontinued Radical, which is so gratefully remembered by all who knew it and its merits), was published in THE INDEX of November 5, 1874. After a condensed report of Dr. Bartol's essay and Col. Higginson's rebuke of it, Mr. Morse wrote:—

"At the conclusion of Col. Higginson's remarks, the President stated that it was generally understood that no one speaking on the Free Religious platform spoke otherwise than for himself.

"Mr. Potter made the further statement that Col. Higginson, in the excitement of the occasion, had overstepped the line of his privilege. The Association had invited Dr. Bartol to speak, and it expected him to express his own views upon the subject he had chosen, and to stand for them. The Association did neither indorse nor repudiate them, and neither Col. Higginson nor any other member of the Association could undertake, in behalf of the Association, to indorse or repudiate them. He might speak for himself, but not as one having authority. This announcement was received with hearty and long-continued applause, and the rebuke was generally felt to be well merited."

In the next issue of THE INDEX (November 12, 1874), Mr. Morse, in consequence of a note from Col. Higginson, published a note of his own in further explanation of these proceedings. The first part of it, which alone need be quoted in this connection, was as follows:—

"My attention is called to the 'one-sidedness' of a portion of my report of the Free Religious Association Convention at Providence. I am told that I therein did injustice to one party by making it appear that the only demonstration given by the audience was of sympathy with Mr. Potter in his criticism of Col. Higginson, ignoring completely the strong applause which often greeted the remarks of Col. Higginson. It did not occur to me that I was wrongly reporting the matter. The unmentioned applause, which at times was generous, came in, not at the point where Col. Higginson so emphatically repudiated Dr. Bartol in behalf of the Association, but when he expressed strongly his disapprobation of Dr. Bartol's seeming haste in judging Mr. Beecher, when the latter was so soon to have his character appraised by a legal tribunal. In omitting to mention this, I simply put it aside as I did many things said by Col. Higginson and others which received applause. Comparatively, it was of little consequence. But the fact that an officer of the Free Religious Association should assume to speak in its behalf, and so speaking to repudiate the opinions of Dr. Bartol, or of any one else, was so shocking to my sense of propriety, considering all the professions of that Association, that I deemed it proper to note that point in particular. And it seemed to me that Col. Higginson stood there, certainly after Mr. Potter's remarks, in a minority of one. My report, hastily prepared, was undoubtedly faulty, and needed just this statement to explain it.

"Though not a member of the Free Religious Association, I was particularly pleased, let me say, that it should in this instance disprove some of my early predictions," etc., etc.

Considering that, as the facts above recounted clearly show, Col. Higginson's assumption of official authority to rebuke Dr. Bartol in behalf of the Association was promptly denied on the spot by the Association itself, as represented by the President and Secretary, and that in consequence his would-be official rebuke was at once reduced to the mere utterance of an individual who represented himself alone,—considering also that, in making this assumption, he stood, as Mr. Morse explicitly declares, "in a minority of one,"—the following paragraph, published among our editorial "Glimpses" in THE INDEX of January 18, 1876, will be readily understood:—

"The Boston Globe says that on the Sunday after Christmas Dr. Bartol gave an instance of his personal experience with the Free Religionists, showing that sometimes they are intolerant of freedom of thought, their conduct herein comparing unfavorably with the courtesy and candor of the Unitarian Conference of Essex, the members of which listened to the same sentiments without objection. We are constrained to believe that the reporter is responsible for a gross and grave misrepresentation of Dr. Bartol's language; it is incredible to us that he should ever have said anything so unjust and untrue as that."

We waited in vain for a note from Dr. Bartol, disclaiming this charge against "the Free Religionists," and confining it to the only one of their number against whom he could justly bring it. But, meeting him on the street two or three weeks later, and inquiring in a friendly way whether he had not been grossly misrepresented, we certainly understood him to affirm this emphatically; and therefore, inferring that so groundless an imputation against the innocent would never be made again, we dropped the subject.

Our surprise, therefore, may be imagined, when Dr. Bartol substantially reiterated this very imputation in the discourse he so recently preached at West Church on the occasion of the fortieth anniversary of his settlement, March 4, 1877. As reported verbatim in the Boston Journal of March 5, he said:—

"My mouth has never been shut here. What I could not speak unrebuked on a Free Religious platform, you patiently heard."

But this causeless arraignment of "the Free Religious platform" was further intensified as follows in the pamphlet edition of the Discourse, presumably corrected by Dr. Bartol himself on mature deliberation:—

"What I could not speak without rebuke and official scoring on a Free Religious platform, you patiently heard."

These have been the facts of the case. We must now make a few brief comments on the above letter.

1. At the Providence Convention, we said nothing personally about Col. Higginson's remarks. Mr. Potter's short speech was so manly, full, and explicit, and so completely covered the ground, that we were very glad not to feel called upon to say anything in public at the time.

2. Just as often as Dr. Bartol feels obliged to refer at all to the rebuke administered to him at Providence, just so often ought he to represent it explicitly as the act of an individual alone, and to exonerate the Free Religious Association and its "platform" from all responsibility for it. If he has not time to tell the whole truth, ought he to have time to tell the half-truth which is virtually slander by suppression?

3. The "unquestionable fact" is that this "official rebuke" was absolutely deprived of all "official" character by the prompt disclaimer of the President and Secretary, and their declaration at the time that no officer of the Association possesses the slightest authority under its Constitution to administer any "official rebuke" whatever.

4. Full information that the vindication of his right to speak on that platform unrebuked was exactly as "official" as was the rebuke itself, if not communicated to him by letter, was communicated in the public report of the Convention in THE INDEX. Unless our memory is utterly at fault, Mr. Potter wrote immediately on the subject to Dr. Bartol, to the special gratification of the latter.

5. No subsequent communication on the subject could possibly have been other than "private," since to have represented it as "official" would have been to commit the same violation of the Constitution of the Association as that committed by Col. Higginson himself. The only possible "official" vindication of Dr. Bartol's rights on that platform was made publicly on the spot, and it consisted simply in the statement by the principal officers of the Association that nobody is authorized to administer rebukes in its behalf or in its name,—i.e., that Col. Higginson's "official rebuke" was null and void. If Dr. Bartol was unable to remain and witness this vindication, that was his own misfortune; but his voluntary retirement certainly does not entitle him to treat it as if it had not been made.

6. The "historic truth remains" that never and nowhere were the rights of "free discussion" more splendidly vindicated, or more conspicuously freed from just and honorable "doubts," than on the Association's platform by its own officers on this otherwise unfortunate occasion. In "West Church," free discussion may indeed never have been brought into doubt, since there is no "discussion" there at all, free or otherwise; the pastor alone has the floor, and anybody who should undertake to "discuss" his discourses there would probably be ejected summarily from the building as a disturber of public worship.

7. We have made no comparison of THE INDEX with any other journal, and none is necessary. The question is not about THE INDEX at all.

It is with extreme regret that we find ourselves unable as yet to thank Dr. Bartol for a frank and explicit retraction of his unjust charge against the Free Religious Association, brought simply on account of the unauthorized and irresponsible act of an individual member. The reputation and moral influence of the Association, as a body honest in its professions and faithful to its own principles, are altogether too precious not to be defended; and that is the reason why we have felt it a duty, however painful, to defend them. Personally we have no feelings towards Dr. Bartol which are not the kindest and most friendly; he has never injured us in any way, but always treated us with perfect kindness, and we feel "aggrieved" in this matter in no other sense than that we consider him to have wronged both the Association and himself by his persistent accusations. These must be—it is impossible to doubt it—the effect of a serious misapprehension of the facts; and, now that the facts are set forth plainly, we believe that his own honorable instincts will prompt him to make the fullest reparation for unintended injustices. He himself will be the last man on earth to resent or blame our blunt truth-telling, when he remembers those manly words of his own in his fortieth anniversary Discourse:—

"I received from New York, in return for public words, vague, vindictive, anonymous insinuations, to which I made no answer at the time. My only reply now is to adjure any man, woman, or child, in the body or out, whom I ever in any way have wronged or hurt, by their voice or letter, by telegraph or telephone, through any medium from earth, or heaven, or hell, to speak."

Accepting this brave challenge, we say that we have never known Cyrus A. Bartol, if he hesitates now to undo fully, by an unequivocal retraction of his charge, the wrong he has done to the Free Religious Association.

SOME ANSWERS TO MR. WASSON.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., March 30, 1877.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I have read with the deepest interest a letter from Mr. D. A. Wasson in THE INDEX of March 29, and your reply thereto.

As an humble member of the vast obscure majority, the plebeian shoals presumably chained to the car of ignorance by the always-begun, never-ended task of earning their own living, and in addition supporting the non-productive classes in conservative luxury, I would like to attempt to answer two questions which Mr. Wasson puts. He inquires, in effect, whether there is any evidence that the educated desire to injure the ignorant, and whether the true interests of the ignorant (the many) are ever known to have been counteracted by the educated (the few). To these queries, which in substance are one, I am compelled to oppose a qualified but decided affirmative. The notion that intelligence gives the right to rule, or that the educated few understand better the needs, interests, and policy of the unilluminated many than the latter do themselves, is not to be entertained without due counterpoise. The evident aversion which Mr. Wasson, in common with all true men, feels for anything like oppression should lead him and all true men to be very wary in justifying class rule, even the most undeniable aristocracy or rule by the best. The world does not yet seem to be ruled by its supreme intelligences or angelic virtues. Between the two extremes—the few best minds of the country, and on the other hand the many men and women yet rooted in undeveloped simplicity—lies the middle zone of practical political power, the sphere of mediocrity, of mind trained to efficient activity but by no means divested by ethical sublimation of its original selfish animal instincts. The first impulse of the neophyte admitted to the shrine of science or thought is to avail himself of the secrets he learns there to subdue his less favored brethren to his personal use or abuse; but no one can be said to have received the Holy Ghost of culture till his thought has become, not how to use his personal superiority against the many, but for them. To this stage it is evident the ruling classes of this country—who are educated persons compared with the bulk of manual laborers—have not yet arrived. Knowledge is power; and the presumption of the wisar to lead the more foolish (even if devoid of conscious malevolence or predatory intent) is always possible to result merely in a more refined and hypocritical working of the wild beast ethics of Right measured solely by Might.

Culture carried to its legitimate goal ends in some sort where it began; there are in every civilized community a few minds who have "swung around the circle" and arrived at the humanitarianism which is latent in the formless bonhomie of the masses. I feel quite certain that Mr. Wasson (for example) does not regard the ignorant toiling millions as a mine of natural resources from which his superior intellectual armament may exploit a righteous advantage. But the large majority of educated or semi-educated people, professional men, priests, politicians, soldiers, and traders, do in practice make tolerably full use of all the preponderance which their (often not very towering) learning, skill, or drilled craftiness give them over the shapeless, unlicked multitude. The people, those whose lot is labor and a pinched subsistence, are vaguely yet profoundly aware of this fact; their instincts rightly lead them to distrust the soft-handed man; nevertheless, 'tis a most credulous monster, perpetually swallowing to its harm, some promising hoax; 'tis an irascible monster, and a little rubbing of its ears sets it beside itself and makes its members fight each other to the profit and delectation of those who rise them on; 'tis a suffering monster, and gladly lends

"A POLITICAL EXPLANATION."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—You have stated your hope that the communication of "A." in THE INDEX of March 16, under the above title, may not be the beginning of a controversy. Yet, while I consider your wish very commendable, I am not willing to accept that statement of the case as a reasonable position for the defeated party to take, and ask the privilege of making this brief reply. As your columns have often been used by the supporters of Mr. Tilden, and rarely, if ever, by the other party, while probably about three-fourths of your readers are Republicans, my request may not be unreasonable. Let both sides be heard.

As the Louisiana Returning Board was the only body established for the purpose and claiming to be the lawful Board, and as the actual members thereof were admitted to have been duly chosen, the seven propositions stated by "A." are wholly irrelevant to any question that could properly arise before the Electoral Commission.

The choice of electors is by the Constitution placed within the exclusive jurisdiction of the State, except as to the one limitation hereinafter mentioned, and cannot be controlled by the national government. The nation has never undertaken to enforce the laws of the States, and has no power to do so. The Electoral Commission representing the national government could not exercise powers not given to that government or any department thereof. It could not therefore investigate anything belonging to the jurisdiction of the State, even if the matter—as that of the original returns in this case—could practically be searched into by one tribunal. That such investigation was clearly beyond the authority of the Commission in law, and clearly beyond the limit of its time and attention in fact, are to my mind rather "cogent reasons" why it was not undertaken.

The tribunal received evidence touching the eligibility of an elector in Florida because the alleged objection arose under the national Constitution, and it would have done the same in any other case.

The Commission went to the Returning Board in all cases, and rejected the Governor's certificate only when it was in conflict with the return, but did not go behind the Returning Board unless the question was of a national character as above stated.

I think it is quite apparent to any one who has examined the practice of the Commission, that it followed a few certain principles of law throughout, and these covered all the questions submitted to it; and that it did not make "a special rule for each case."

If the Tilden party are dissatisfied with the work of the Commission, they should not complain, for it was their own child and was intended to do their party work. A man who chooses his own tribunal ought not afterwards to impeach the judgment.

If the Democratic officials of Oregon made a mistake in not fraudulently manipulating the original returns, as "A." suggests, he may lay the soothing question to his soul that the Democratic party has not often been guilty of such mistakes, and that in this case their candidate and his friends did all they could to retrieve it.

Your correspondent says he does not write to open a controversy; if so, why does he stir the subject, and yet give us nothing new, unless it be further to illustrate the consistency of leaving the Republican party on account of its corruptions and going over to the party of Pierce and Buchanan and the majority in the last Congress?

MR. GANNETT ON MR. MOODY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—I was much impressed with what Mr. Gannett says of Mr. Moody, and was led by it to reconsider my own previously unfavorable views. But the result is to confirm my original opinion. I speak diffidently, never having had an opportunity to hear Mr. Moody; but I think we are justified in regarding him as a part of a system, and the system, I am convinced, is bad.

The question is not as to Mr. Moody's earnestness and sincerity; these we recognize and sympathize with in our opponent. Neither is it to question whether his preaching does good; of course it does good in this case and in that case. Of those who need moral stimulus, no doubt Mr. Moody reaches his share, although I question very much whether the amount of permanent good done by him is anything commensurate with the force expended, anything to be compared, for instance, with that accomplished by the steady, devoted labor of a parish minister. We have a full right to thank Mr. Moody for the good that he does, and at the same time to believe that he has chosen the wrong method of employing his great powers, and even to arrive at the conclusion that the good is more than balanced by the mischief done by him.

Whatever originality and independence there may be in Mr. Moody's methods, he is nevertheless identified with the revival system, a system which I think demoralizing, both intellectually and morally; and I have never seen any evidence that he departs from it in any material point. Mr. Gannett speaks of appeals to conscience as the most striking feature of his address. Very well,—so far as it goes; but what do these appeals to conscience mean? A sensitive but unrighteous conscience is a frequent source of mischief; what does Mr. Moody do to educate the conscience? His interpretations of Scripture are intellectually belittling; his rule of conduct is to follow blindly the precepts that his ignorant exegesis has derived from this infallible authority. "Believe what I tell you, and you will be saved; reject it and you will go to hell"; this seems to be the substance of his exhortation. I do not believe any large and permanent good can come from even the most earnest and eloquent persuasions to virtue, when the standard of virtue is fixed so low as this.

Neither do I believe that any genuine quickening of spiritual life any more than of intellect and morality can result from the spasmodic method of the revivalists. It is essentially materialistic,—materialistic religion is something that is "got"; it consists primarily in dogmas and forms; it is worked up by the most cunningly-devised system of machinery; its fruits are shown in counting the number of church-members. After the Moody and Sankey movement had swept over England, the people of that thrifty nation began to reckon up the results, and found a great expenditure of money and labor with very little to show for it in the way of righteousness. I believe that in a few years the main result of this great revival will be found to be a lower stage of ignorance as to the real meaning of Scripture, greater mechanism in piety, and a more artificial standard of conduct.

THE CENTENNIAL CONGRESS REPORT.

YANNTON, D. T., April 1, 1877.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:

I received the Report of the Centennial Congress of Liberals, and have read it with great satisfaction. It is truly a "feast of fat things." I was not a little mortified, however, to see upon its perusal how I had overlooked the great work THE INDEX is doing as an organizer of the scattered forces of liberalism. I humbly beg pardon for having once thought that I could better support the cause through another medium. Please do not stop my paper as I suggested a month ago, for, though your thought may not be as radical as my own, it is evidently far more effective for good. Whatever has been accomplished thus far in the way of organization and effective work is mainly due to THE INDEX; and here I would like to say a word or two through its columns to its readers of like precious faith with myself (namely, Freedom and Fellowship).

We are in the habit quite generally of keeping a file of THE INDEX, and of regarding the papers as too precious to lend except to those who will return them uninjured.

Now I would respectfully suggest that, instead of hoarding them and thus defrauding our fellow-men of knowledge which so vitally concerns both us and them, we scatter them broadcast; not with our eyes shut, of course, but with judgment and discrimination.

I am satisfied that, if we do this a single year, THE INDEX would double its list of subscribers, and hence proportionally its influence. And do we not owe as much as this to humanity? If we must keep a file of them, then take two copies, one to keep and one to bestow upon the hungry; taking care, however, to bestow only just sufficient to sharpen the appetite. I have four complete volumes, and am certain that I prize them very highly; but I am also satisfied that such selfishness is a poor way to increase its circulation or assist the cause we love. For myself, I shall take a new departure, and I do most urgently hope that the brethren will consider this matter, and, after having enjoyed the good things THE INDEX contains, be generous and wise enough to dispense its bounties upon others. If there is a better way, will some kind brother please indicate what it is?

Enclosed find post-office order for balance of year's subscription and postage.

I remain most respectfully and truly, yours,
D. P. WILCOX.

BLOOD ATONEMENT.

"It is curious that in almost every savage country the people shed the blood of their fellow-creatures as an offering to their idols; believing that it will cause their sins to be forgiven. Now it seems strange that in nearly all nations this should be the case, and perhaps you may like to know the reason. God once revealed to the whole world that the death of one man—Jesus Christ our Lord—was to be the only way by which our sins could be pardoned; and though many nations have forgotten exactly how it was to be, yet there is still a sort of remembrance among them that without shedding of blood there is no forgiveness of sins; so that, as they do not know of the death of our Savior, they still continue to kill men on their altars, and even to sacrifice their own little children, in hopes of obtaining pardon and eternal happiness."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Now we know how it is ourselves! Is not the above gem worthy of a place in your "Sanctuary of Superstition"? It is copied literally from a Sunday-school book entitled The Lives of the Caesars (page 34), published by the Sunday School Union, New York, and reprinted from the second London edition. The author is Mrs. Sinclair. The book was recommended to me as an historical work (!) by the wife of a Methodist minister. When the sanguinary side of the Moody and Sankey religion is presented to my gaze, it is with difficulty that I can rid my mind of the impression that the original Jehovah was the ample shade of a deceased Butcher. Is it not a disheartening fact that such absurd rubbish is taught weekly to many thousands of children, for literal truth?

EX-REFORMER.

EVERY GREAT and important revolution involves a period of anarchy; this is what the conservative dreads. Few have the courage to look across it to the era of better things that is to follow.—Prof. W. D. Whitney.

THE LATE Rev. Daniel Isaac was a great smoker. "Hal there you are," cried a lady, who surprised him one day with a pipe in his mouth, "at your idol again?" "Yes, ma'am," replied he, coolly, "burning it."

an ear to many a tale of Utopia. And after all, 'tis not such a monster at all as those who view it from afar do conceit; its genial depths hold the heart-warmth and the new blood, lacking which a world of pundits, martinetts, literary and artistic upholsterers, political and commercial pirates, would speedily lapse to blessed extinction. To drop metaphor, the people are some of them adult, and know, or feel, their own interests. There are a number of points upon which they are irreconcilably antagonistic to the ruling quasi-educated class. The people desire freedom, the right to enjoy undisturbed the fruits of their labor,—no more, no less; the ruling classes assume (alas, with too much reason!) their incompetency for self-government, and saddle them with a killing burden of governmental and other machinery, beneficial mainly to the engineers thereof. The wage-serf is none too fully emancipated even with the right of suffrage; the ballot is yet too much a farce masking a tragedy; call it yet little more than a symbolism, the mere brandishing of the wand that is slowly to awaken the drowsy genie of manhood and intelligence. To be precise, the people, the real people, the nameless myriad toilers who have no speech but that inarticulate, easy-misinterpreted voice, the ballot (and the larger share of them not even that), are in square opposition to the general opinion of the governing, non-productive classes, who, in effect, repudiate and deride Mr. Wesson as decidedly as they do the struggling renter or forty-acre man in Texas or Nebraska, the factory-hand of the Northeast, the toll-consumed, bony farm-laborer of anywhere,—the ignorant people, I say, are at war with the classes educated up just to the height of rule and plunder, on the following and other points:—

Shall we, the creators of life and the means of its support, forever carry so heavy a burden of over-government as is indicated by the fact that every dollar of currency in the country is required to pay the annual taxes of all sorts? Shall the government which exists mainly for the protection and furtherance of property interests be maintained, not by property (direct taxation), but by labor and want (indirect taxation)? Shall the most valuable property (churches, government-bonds, and money for instance) be exempt from taxation? Shall the State longer demoralize commerce and generate a breed of people-hating, people-despising harpies, by continuing a system which robs even the humblest household in the land to enrich manufacturing and freighting money-kings? Such is the net result of the so-called Protective Tariff. Shall the labor, the life-blood of the unborn peasant—for to this has it come, that the American laborer deserves this name,—be mortgaged in advance by that devil's chef d'œuvre, a national debt? Shall or should the government connive at the wholesale theft of the only public property of any value,—the public lands? Shall the public finances, the governmental control of the currency, be manipulated in the interest of the labor-buyers and be made in effect a slave with which to strain out of the life of the man with the two hands everything but a bare subsistence? Shall competitive trade, that system which erects a wall between the producer and the consumer, and slaughters both through their mutual need of communication, last forever?

Now I assert that the ignorant, the men and women who have little time or nerve-force left from daily drudgery for books or thought, differ very radically, and must and ought to eternally differ, from the non-laboring, unproductive people (whose striving is much less toward the creation of value than toward the acquisition of value ready-made) concerning the intrinsicities adumbrated in these queries. If the many could pull together, if they could rise above local, sectarian, and race jealousies and divisions, we should see a social and governmental reorganization which would be mostly abolition. But the people are dumb; when they find their voice, they will also find their united will and the day of skilled plunderers will be past. The largest part of the busy-ness gone through with by professional, trading, and government people is something that the people do not want done at all, and the rest they want done a great deal more cheaply.

It is said that supply and demand regulate all this. Very true; I am only trying to show the direction that the popular demands are taking, and the fact that they find their chief resistance from a comparatively better educated class, who do not work with their hands, and who do not know or realize how much hard work it takes to actually create a dollar of value. The question of money, or the mere material support of life, is one which the possessor of a competency or fortune thinks little about; but to the people this is the question never satisfactorily answered. On the whole, we must put up for some time with a marked difference of opinion between the ignorant people and their pseudo-educated taskmasters. Between the theory that the existing socialism is all right, and the equally reasonable theory that it is all wrong, there is room for many shades of opinion, and the room is all filled. The people incline to the latter view, for they see that in practice it is not those who undergo the larger share of the toll and hardship necessary to keep the world a-going who enjoy the larger share of the comforts, leisure, and luxury that labor purchases. If there were to be any righteous and reasonable suffrage qualification, it would be capacity and willingness to perform useful labor to at least that amount necessary to self-support. But I would see no tests; he or she who is fit to live is fit to vote. Let all vote who wish to, irrespective of age, sex, or color; perhaps the ballot-box is something of a humbug as yet, but it will not always be so; or it will be supplanted by something better effecting the desired end. Woe unto those who would drive back from the banquet of life the humblest human being! "G. E. TUTTS.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLMEO, Ohio, Sept. 26, 1872.

To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEINBERG.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to supply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.

Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenafly, N.J.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1872, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wilson and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Welas,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Reason and Revelation, by William J. Potter. 10 cents; ten for 80 cents; one hundred, $3.00.

For series of important Tracts see last page of THE INDEX.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited. Orders by mail may be addressed either "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston," or to the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Assertions" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

A NEW QUARTERLY.

PROSPECTUS.

The want has been long felt in this country, by a large and growing class of thinking people, of a periodical publication serving the same purpose here that the Fortnightly and Contemporary Reviews serve so well in England. The progressive portion of our population demands some adequate literary vehicle for the carriage and diffusion of the most radical thought of our time. To meet this want, and in the hope that such demand may prove competent to maintain its object when once provided with it, it is proposed to issue, on May 1, 1877—or as soon thereafter as circumstances shall warrant,—the first number of a quarterly periodical, to be called

"THE RADICAL REVIEW."

The success or failure of this project will depend upon the more or less encouraging reception which its announcement shall meet with from the public previous to the date mentioned. Believing that involving, as it does, the basis of property, the principles of finance, and the organization of industry, and determining, in its settlement, directly the material, and indirectly the mental and spiritual condition of the people,—demands immediate consideration by the best minds, it is the intention of the management of the proposed Review, in selecting its contents, to give the preference largely to articles aimed at the solution of this disputed problem. While so doing, however, it will not exclude, but welcome rather, the proper presentation of all sides of all subjects pertaining to human welfare, whether social, economic, scientific, literary, æsthetic, or religious; prompted to this course by a firm faith in the omnipotence of Truth. It is hoped that the size of the Review, and the infrequency of its issue, will furnish opportunity for thoroughness of treatment, not afforded hitherto to the majority of competent exponents of radical ideas; but, while most of its articles will be of the weighty character peculiar to the best review literature, poetry and the lighter features of the monthly magazine will not be disregarded. To book reviews, large space will be devoted.

The editor and publisher avails himself with pleasure of the permission granted him by the following persons, to announce them as probable contributors; to which list he hopes to make important additions hereafter:—

John Weiss, John Fiske, Edmund C. Stedman, Sidney H. Morse, Octavius B. Frothingham, J. N. Larned, Lyander Spooner, Ezra H. Heywood, B. F. Underwood, Samuel Johnson, J. Stahl Patterson, Prof. E. S. Morse, John W. Chadwick, B. W. Ball, Joel A. Allen, Mrs. E. M. F. Denton, Dyer D. Lum, Stephen Pearl Andrews, Wm. J. Potter, Chas. D. B. Mills, John Orris, Chas. W. Buck, Francis E. Abbot, Wm. Hanson, Howard N. Brown, Samuel Longfellow, Abram W. Stevens, Cyrus A. Bartol, Joseph H. Allen, John H. Clifford, J. K. Ingalls.

Each number will contain two hundred or more octavo pages, well printed on good paper. A limited number of book and other literary advertisements will be received at low rates.

Any person wishing to encourage this enterprise by subscription may notify the publisher to that effect, whereupon he will receive a printed blank, which, when signed and returned to the publisher, will bind the signer to forward the price of subscription as soon as informed that the success of the venture is assured.

Terms per annum, post-paid, $5.00.

Address the Publisher,

BENJ. R. TUCKER.

Lock Box 509, New Bedford, Mass.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

ANNUAL MEMBER

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

ATTRACTIVE ORNAMENT

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient co-operation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.

2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.

3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.

4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.

5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.

6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.

7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."

8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.

9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.

10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.

11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.

12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practicing the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.

13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE
FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSSES.

THE NEW tax-law of Maine exempts from taxation church property to the amount of $5,000 only.

THE EXCISE RETURNS show that, during the year 1876, liquor, wine, and beer were drunk in Great Britain to the value of £147,288,769, or £4 9s. for each man, woman, and child. This is a terrible showing.

THE CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT party have just held a convention at Chicago, on the tenth and eleventh of April. The Inter-Ocean gives a long list of prominent ministers and others who fill high educational and ecclesiastical positions, who were present at the meetings.

THE Christian Register reminds one of the saying that it is not safe to fool with the business end of a wasp. It remarks: "Rev. Joseph Cook says: 'I am not aware that the newspaper press of Boston run this platform.' We have not heard that the expenses of the Monday lectureship have been entirely paid by anybody."

THE POPE, in his Allocution to the Cardinals assembled in secret Consistory on February 12, reasserted his temporal sovereignty. On Easter Sunday Cardinal Manning defended the Pope's position, and pointed out that the "Eastern Question" and the "Roman Question" are not yet settled. He looked on the approaching strife as likely to result in the reinstatement of the Papacy in its ancient temporal authority; and no man can say what results the great war now threatening Europe may finally bring.

HON. GEORGE F. TALBOT, of Portland, Maine, who succeeded Hon. Bluford Wilson as Solicitor of the Treasury at Washington, and who is one of the most upright and accomplished gentlemen in the country, has been "rotated" out of office to make way for Mr. G. Wiley Wells, a Mississippi "carpet-bagger" of very questionable reputation. This change makes the talk of "civil service reform" sound very hollow. Mr. Talbot published a very able essay on "Inspiration" in THE INDEX of July 6, 1876, and had several times before favored these columns with contributions. His dismissal from office is a great discredit to the Administration.

SIGNATURES to the Religious Freedom Amendment petition have been received as follows since last week: from Mr. F. A. Angell, Passaic, N. J., with the aid of Messrs. G. B. Waterhouse, C. A. Stelling, W. Fels, and others, 201 names; from Mr.

Julius Weissenborn, Sauk City, Wis., 83; from Rev. O. K. Crosby, Syracuse, N. Y., 121. In addition to these, Mr. B. F. Underwood sends 340 signatures, collected after lectures delivered by him in various places at the West: at La Rue, O., 25—at Hanna, Ind., 41—at Bourbon, Ind., 40—at Mt. Moriah, Mo., 85—at Bethany, Mo., 29—at Toledo, Iowa, 28—at Florence, Iowa, 22—at West Liberty, Iowa, 120. Total number thus far received—4,307.

A WISCONSIN gentleman writes: "I have in circulation a couple of petitions which I hope to hear from soon, and will forward to you as soon as received. I hear on the authority of Robert Ingersoll that the Christian Amendment has 4,000,000 names engrossed on its petition. Is it so?" We do not know, but think it by no means unlikely. The Christian Amendment party are and have been very industrious in this matter for a long time, and are very skillful in working out of sight. Col. Ingersoll would scarcely have made such a statement at a venture, surprising as it is. On the side of ecclesiastical ambition are energy, persistence, respectability, organization, and almost every element of practical success; on the side of liberty are listlessness, indifference, disunion, contempt of history, blindness to existing facts and tendencies, and almost every other element of failure. It looks very much as if the liberals would continue to smile serenely at all danger until the secularity of the Constitution is suddenly lost; and then they will have abundant cause to regret their own supineness.

THE CATHOLIC warfare on the public school system of the United States is not going to cease. The Pope's Encyclical against this system (see THE INDEX of Feb. 22) is obediently followed up by the subordinate authorities of the Church. The Boston Journal of April 20 says: "The 'Society for the Propagation of the Faith' has recently issued an address on the public schools of the United States and the relations of the Church of Rome to them. Among many other important declarations, the address alleges that 'most serious loss threatens the Catholic youth of the United States from the so-called public schools.' This subject, the address continues, was considered by the 'Supreme Congregation of the Universal Inquisition,' about two years ago, on the presentation of the testimony of the Bishops. The chief objections to the public school system, made by the above named association, are the exclusion of religious teaching from the schools, the indiscriminate employment of teachers of every sect, and the attendance of both sexes in the same class rooms. The evils of the public school are further enforced, and wealthy Catholics and members of legislative bodies are specially urged to use their money and influence to establish Catholic schools. The address, after warning the Catholics of America of the pernicious character of the public schools, and generally setting forth the reasons why such schools should be avoided and discountenanced, remarks that there may be cases when Catholics in good conscience can send their children to the public schools; but the matter of determining such a case is not to be exercised by the parent without consulting the clergy. It is further intimated that the public schools may be used with caution when there is no Catholic school at hand or such school is not adapted to the condition of those requiring instruction. No comment on this latest assault upon the public school system of the country is needed. It only goes to show that the enemies of popular education are active and in earnest. The system may never be put in jeopardy, but if it is, the hostility of the Catholic clergy and so much of the laity as they can control may be counted on. If the clergy can array the entire Catholic Church, they can place one-seventh of the entire population of the country against popular instruction."

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

Faith and Freedom.

A SERMON AT THE INSTALLATION OF REV. IVORY F. WATERHOUSE OVER THE UNITARIAN SOCIETY OF BELMONT, MASSACHUSETTS.

BY FRANCIS G. PEABODY.

Am I not an Apostle? Am I not free?

I. CORINTHIANS, IX., 1.

Paul was the scholar among the first Christians. When he was converted, he must have tried hard to understand his new position, and his opinion about it must command some respect. Now, beyond all else, there were two things of which, in that new position, he felt sure. One was that he was an Apostle, a true follower of Christ and representative of his Gospel. The other was that he was free,—intellectually and spiritually free. He said much of both these things. He dwelt in his letters on the conviction which filled him that he really understood the purpose of Jesus, and was called to carry it on and out to the Gentile world, so that he opposed with vigor those who thought they knew better than he because they had seen the Lord. He had just as much to say about the great new freedom he had found, and which made him live and speak like a new man. And these two things, his apostleship and his freedom, were to him one. His Christian faith was of itself just that freedom without which, as a thoughtful and sincere man, he could not live; and his freedom was got in and through his apostleship. It was the liberty with which Christ had set him free. It was, as John had said, the Son who had made him free, so that he was free indeed. You can hardly read any letter of Paul's without seeing how strong was this double conviction which found perfect harmony between Christian faith and complete liberty, and which made him say, in the same breath and as though it were the same thing: "Am I not an Apostle?" and—"Am I not free?"

But was he right? Was he, after all, scholar enough to understand himself? Many a time in the history of Christendom these two ideas, of apostleship and of freedom, which were to Paul but one, have seemed to stand opposed to one another, and the pendulum of opinion has swung from the one to the other, struck by each in turn. With Paul, we may say, the two blows struck at the same instant, and the pendulum stands still, hot with the shock of great ideas, but peaceful and steady. But soon it begins to swing, and each blow carries it farther in each direction. Antagonisms grow more marked, and representatives of the two ideas more violent. "Am I not an Apostle?" says Cyprian, and jogs the pendulum toward the Catholic, the ecclesiastical idea. "Am I not free?" returns Tertullian, and proclaims the laity the true Church. "Am I not an Apostle?" says Augustine, and swings the thought of Christians still farther towards severe and exclusive faith. "Am I not free?" returns Luther, and grapples with questions long left as too holy to be touched.

And so it comes to pass, not as a new thing, but only as the swinging of the pendulum farther each way, until it gets fairly caught, first at one extreme and then at the other,—so it comes to pass that in our day these two ideas which seemed to Paul so harmonious and in whose harmony he found his peace and joy, are presented to us, on both sides, as real and irreconcilable opposites. "Am I not an Apostle?" cry the priest of Rome and his Anglican brother, and offer the world refuge from its thought in a Church; and the same cry and the same claim is set up by a rigid Orthodoxy, offering the same refuge from thought in a Book. The defenders of an infallible Church and the defenders of an infallible Book stand shoulder to shoulder at least in this,—that freedom of thought and investigation is the common enemy of both. That is very far for thought to swing from the pole and peace of Paul, and of course it must swing back and seem caught on the other side as well. "Am I not free?" is therefore the watchword of those who in revolt from the bondage of form or of opinion have swung clear of Christianity or of religion altogether. I mean not only the few thoughtful and honest men who make a clean issue between Christianity and "Free Religion," such as would have rather surprised Paul, but also—and still more—the large number of young and growing minds who find it hard to reconcile the liberty of thought which is the first condition of their mental development with such faith or conviction as any form of religion seems to demand. "Am I not free? And is not the committing of oneself to any kind of religious faith a sort of yielding of that freedom?" Such, I believe, is the attitude of many whose very boldness and sincerity make their thought most valuable, and whose difficulty is not theoretical and prospective, but practical and immediate.

Now when the pendulum of opinion is swinging thus wildly to and fro, the question recurs with increased importance: "Was Paul right?" Can there be that equilibrium of the two forces, Christian faith and mental freedom, which he believed he found? This is certainly a very important question; and it is, we should notice, a question concerning two things, looking, as it were, two ways, and needing for a true answer the clear understanding of both the elements involved.

Now, in what has been said about it of late, great attention has been paid to defining the one element, of Christian faith, and it has been assumed that the other element of spiritual freedom was a clear and well-understood idea; but I believe that something further may be done toward answering the full question by turning this method round,—by giving some attention to the idea of freedom and assuming the nature of Christian faith. Christian faith appears to me not so difficult a thing to define. It is, what it always has been, the conviction that the straightest way to God lies through the spirit and influence of the life of Jesus Christ. But what is it to be free,—spiritually, mentally free? Is that beyond the need of definition? Here is an idea which, more than any other inward force except religious zeal, has moulded history, and has won the Marathons and the Gettysburgs both of the outward and the inward world; and yet about this idea hangs a vagueness of meaning, a mistiness of superstitious devotion, unsurpassed even by the atmosphere of theological thought. Look at Germany. Nowhere will you hear more talk about freedom, or more boasts about liberty of conscience, of thought, of the press, which the nation has inherited and increased. But ask a Roman Catholic about it, or look at the system from an American stand-point, and I think you will believe that a more absolute military despotism Rome herself never saw. Or look at home. With all our talk about political freedom, do we agree what we mean? Many persons are sure that we have by no means reached it; many are equally sure that we have overreached it. Very few define to themselves what the unknown God is which they so devoutly worship. I ask you, therefore, to look this idea of freedom in the face. It must be much the same thing in religion as in politics, so that the two spheres of conduct may be mutual helps in the search for truth.

In the first place, then, it appears to me plain that freedom, whether in State or in religion, is no end in itself, but the means, tool, weapon, with which to do something. This does not lessen the eternal worth of freedom, but it does very much affect any blind zeal for it. It is with it as with money. Money is the indispensable means of getting the best of food, shelter, and luxuries. Without it we lose many real enjoyments. It is worth giving an immense deal of time to getting, and for the pulpit to ask indifference about it is not only useless but wrong. But it is worth getting, we all see, as a means, for what it will do; and when any one does not see this, and gets to value money for its own sake, then the whole worth and virtue of it vanishes, and the work of a life-time only makes a miser. Freedom, in a precisely parallel way, is the indispensable means of getting the best thought and life. Without it, bound to think in any prescribed way by unnatural authority, one is but a pauper in his results; with it, he has the first condition of success. None the less it is to use; it is not for itself. There is no blessing in being free any more than in being rich, unless something comes of it. And it follows from this that in the pursuit of freedom one should take pains to know just what the freedom is that he wants, and that he can thus use; so that he shall not in the end find himself with some paper currency or watered stock, nominally money indeed, but by no means serving the same purpose as the hard gold of a true freedom. All that is called money is by no means real money; all that is called freedom is by no means a profitable freedom.

There are, therefore, in the second place, some limits to put on the general idea. We do not mean, for instance, when we speak of freedom—we cannot mean,—absolute freedom, liberty to think without any influence or check from without. This is impossible for two reasons: first, because of the enormous extent to which the tendencies of every mind are determined by its inheritances; and, secondly, because of the equally inevitable power of association and environment. With every year social science is verifying the awful law of heredity, in mind as well as body; with every year civilization increases the interdependence of all thought and life; and therefore, with every year it grows plainer that no one can be, in this sense, absolutely free; that all thought grows from past influences, and is crossed by present ones; that no man liveth to himself or dieth to himself. To get beyond these influences of inspiration and of warning would be like getting outside the atmosphere. One would not have to breathe any air from without, but one would find it hard to live. It is as if a bird should find fault with the friction of the air about him, and should feel hampered till the air were exhausted. Then he would lie free indeed under the air-pump, without a thing to check his flight, but with just that lacking which gave resistance to his wings.

Again, if we do not mean this absolute freedom as the true idea either in Church or State, neither do we mean the freedom to do or think as we please. For instance, we should not call that State most free where any one might do his worst. If we did, our ideal would be realized among lawless savages or in a cave of wild beasts, and would fade in proportion as civilization grew. Nor should we call that the ideal free State where one was at liberty to think or do nothing, or even little. The very power to be idle oneself implies that some one else, priest or king, shall think or act for you, and there is your freedom yielded on the spot.

What, then, is the freedom we want, alike in a government and in a religion? It is not an unattainable, absolute freedom; it is not freedom to do one's worst, or to do nothing or little. It is, then, so far as I can see, simply the freedom to do one's best. A State is free to you, when it offers no obstacle to the best of your life and thought. In so far as it discourages that, it binds and hampers your freedom; in so far as it encourages that, it increases your freedom. When you disregard the relation of your rights to the rights of others and try to be absolutely free—when you want to do your worst, or when you want to do nothing,—the State has a right to interfere, to check, to punish; and it is none the less a free State thereby. But when you are thinking or doing your best, that State is free to you whose principles and influences welcome and encourage you; and that State is most free which most encourages and develops your best. Just in the same way, a form of religion is free to any person when the influence it brings to him meets, recognizes, welcomes the best of him, and draws that best of him out and up. When a form of religion checks full aspiration, hampers the search for truth, presents an ideal lower than the individual can reach without it, then it is no freedom, but rather bondage, and should either be reformed or rejected. But if, when most sincere, most pure in heart, most soaring in aspiration and self-abnegation, most true to truth, one finds an influence from without that stands still higher, and, instead of hampering, helps, and, instead of checking, guides and inspires, then he will welcome that influence as making him more a man, making his best better than before, increasing his true freedom. The freedom to do one's best—or, still more abstractly, such a relation of the inward life to outward influences that the outward influences shall be as good as or better than the inward life,—such appears to me to approach the definition of a true and profitable spiritual liberty.

Now I said, when we were watching the pendulum of thought swinging to such different extremes, that to define what a true freedom was would be to test both these extremes. Let us therefore apply the test which by so dull and dry a process we have found. We turn, on the one hand, to the faith in an infallible Church and to the kindred faith in an infallible Book, and we ask: "When one takes a position deliberately opposed to scientific investigation and private right of judgment, as the Church of Rome emphatically does, or when one takes a position where that investigation must submit to or tally with a higher authority, and that right of judgment must be limited, as the creed of a rigid Evangelicalism demands,—can he think and do his best?" In so far as he can, in so far as these positions meet and help one's best judgment, as in many instances they do,—in so far as we see blessed elements like Sisters of Charity in the Church of Rome, or devoted Protestant missionaries,—freedom has nothing to urge against such faith. Such lives as these have found an undreamt-of and holy liberty. But until we can see how a man can think his best when he is told what to think, or bound to think one way,—until we can satisfy our highest impulses in such an attitude,—we must be Protestants in the name of freedom against this extreme.

On the other hand, we turn to the opposite point to which our pendulum had swung, and apply the test of freedom there. First, there is the problem of a "Free Religion," as contrasted with Christianity,—the question whether one can be free, and yet the disciple of some one else; and this, from the present point of view, is no matter of theory but simply a question of fact. Does the influence of Christianity, which is the influence of the life and teachings of Jesus taken up into the life of the world,—does this check your noblest impulses, contradict your highest aspirations, fall short of your own ideal, hamper your best self? Then it is no free religion to you. Either reform it or leave it, as you value your conscience and your reason. Or does it, again, as a matter of fact, bring an outward influence to bear on your inward life better than that life could get without it, so that the best of you is met, helped, and developed beyond all hope before, catching fire from the glowing spirit of a divine life? Then it is the fullest, most perfect freedom to you, and the living in its atmosphere enlarges your sense of liberty as mountain air expands your lungs. It may well be that God, in his own time, may send among men a life nearer his own, an influence more above our own, than the life and the influence of Jesus; but it is very plain to me that he has not done so yet. Knowing well how largely every life is shaped by some such personal influence, the best I can find is the one I freely choose, and under that I, therefore, find myself most free.

Last of all, we turn with the definition we have reached to the many minds who, in the interest of freedom, shun conviction altogether. The many minds, I say,—so many, so fresh, and so sincere, that the problem of a "Free Religion" dwindles before this problem of a freedom which drops religion altogether. His must have been a narrow experience, and a stunted mental growth, who does not know how this state of mind comes about, or what this revolt from inherited opinions, this scorn of superstition, this passion for truth, and this willingness to wait for it—and, if need be, to wait forever—is. When the field of the visible and the methods of science are first spread before a student's eyes, who does not cry: "This is enough!" And when the spirit of free inquiry is shown to be the first condition of success, who will not thrust away every conviction, and at the risk of martyrdom dare to be free? Lower motives indeed may conspire with this determination. There are such things as pride in unbelief, pleasure in being different from the crowd, indifference to spiritual truth, and luxury in martyrdom. These act with varying force in various people; but, above them all, every honest student must have felt a just and worthy ambition which seems to make him fling all conviction away, so that the truth may find a blank page for its grand autograph.

But is one indeed then free,—free to do his best? Slowly, perhaps, through a period of doubt and discontent—it may be even of anguish,—we come to learn that such freedom is but fruitless, and such poise of mind but unstable equilibrium. Slowly, perhaps, by the examples of history, by the growth of our own experience, we become aware that the best work is done, the enduring structures built, only when beneath the method of science there is a foundation of genuine and spiritual faith. No man, I think we can say, ever thought or did the best that was in him except he had great faith. The nature and power of what he studies becomes revealed as the faith in it grows; the nature and power of himself as he has faith in himself, of Nature as he has faith in Nature, of the moral and spiritual life as he has faith in it. And so I say that, so long as all things of heaven and earth are flickering uncertainties, one is not free,—that the best of him is hampered and stunted and held down. You will think and do your best in the study of Nature only when by some inspiration or influence some things about it become to you safe, sure land from which you launch out and explore, and to which you return with confidence; and you will think and do your best in the moral and spiritual life only when by some inspiration or influence some things about that become eternal foundation for your experiments of building. It is in the interest of freedom that I present the power of faith, just as in the name of an enduring faith I should present the necessity of freedom. A very easy thing it is to see the need of one of these inward forces,—to go whooping about the land in the praise of liberty or to surrender all energy and reason in the name of faith. But it is not one of these alone that the world needs. I ask you to believe that the law of true and steady progress, in the world without and in the world within, is never through the yielding to one force but through the reconciling of seeming opposites and their harmony in a higher unity. Every strong nation keeps its equilibrium, not through the power of one party, but through the balanced action of two; every atom of matter in the universe is held in its place through the pull and push of two opposing forces; every calmly moving planet finds its peace through the reconciliation of powers either of which alone would work its ruin; and so to harmonize the centrifugal force of freedom and the centripetal force of faith that they shall both work and work in poise and peace,—that makes the kindred problem of the spiritual life. Such peace and reconciliation between conflicting forces may be, in theory, a dreary work to bring about, as my words to-day abundantly have proved. But practically it is not so hard,—and that is a comforting thought with which to end. The opposite workings of friction and of force seem in theory severely antagonistic; but practically, every bird that flies finds in this conflict the condition of his steady flight. And when Paul, the scholar, the metaphysician, once fully turned from his theorizing and threw himself into the midst of life, the problem of harmony within him solved itself beyond his hope. Faith and freedom, seemingly hostile, clasped hands for him and kissed each other, and it was one and the same thing whether he cried: "Am I not an Apostle?" or—"Am I not free?"

THE SCIENTIFIC METHOD IN RELIGION.

There is something fascinating in the idea of applying the exact methods of science to religion, in the hope of making discoveries which shall match some of the great achievements of modern research in other departments of thought. The enthusiasm with which the audience gathered by the "Boston Lectureship" greets any affirmation of doctrine when it is made in the name of "science" shows that there is a wide-spread persuasion that science is to have something to say concerning religion to which it will be worth while to listen.

The recent lecture at Horticultural Hall in Boston, bearing the title which we put at the head of this article, shows Mr. Abbot to be the most extreme and uncompromising advocate of the new method. But before we commit ourselves unreservedly to this stream of tendency, we desire to ask a few questions and state a few impressions.

What is the scientific method? Mr. Abbot replies, "It is simply ordinary thinking corrected by the canons of a more cautious and exact procedure." Its chief characteristics are: 1st. It "begins with experience alone, with realities, with facts." 2d. It "proceeds by comparison, inference, and hypothesis; by analysis and synthesis; by induction, and deduction; by classification and generalization; by observation and experiment,—in short, by all the mental processes exemplified in any text-book on the subject." 3d. It will "generate a calm and lofty spiritual state unspeakably nobler than the 'faith' which Christianity enjoins."

The first and second of these propositions seem to us to be well established, and from the use of such methods we expect none but the best results. But in the third and what follows, we see nothing but the wildest disregard of the scientific method. For after discarding "faith," instead of accepting it as a fact to be accounted for, and after asserting that "the knowledge of God is not a present possession, but simply the grandest aspiration of the human reason, the deepest, holiest, and most passionate longing of the human heart," we submit that unless the aspiration and the longing have a meaning and a message to man, such a thinker has no logical right to profess any belief in God, Duty, and Immortality. And yet there is no one who is more earnest and devout in his expressions of "faith" than is Mr. Abbot.

If we have no knowledge of God, we do not know and cannot imagine what science will reveal concerning him. In that case it is useless to attempt to predict what will be known, unless one has some secret sources of knowledge shut out from the rest of the scientific world. In such a case it is folly to heed the irresistible aspiration of the soul when it attempts to forestall the scientific method.

One may properly hope great things from the scientific method if he believes that the fundamental facts of religion have already been discovered "in ordinary thinking" and living, and that these facts are to be cleared, interpreted, illustrated, and made more glorious by being manifested. But if he begin by saying that all the "faith" of the past was only a "wonderful GUESS," he has no right to hope, predict, or affirm anything concerning the probable results of a course of investigation upon which has now entered perhaps one man in a million of all the human race.

It seems to us that the root of such inconsistency is the result of confounding the distinction between the form of knowledge and the substance of it. Without further criticism of the lecture in question, let us briefly set forth our own conception of the scientific method as applied to religion.

The total experience of the human race has been such as to leave two results. First, a tendency to believe in God, in Duty, and in Immortality. This tendency seems to have the force of an innate predisposition. So strong is the impulse to faith in these doctrines of religion, that under the most diverse creeds and in widely different circumstances there arises the conviction that the soul knows something, and that it recognizes spiritual facts. Secondly, an external tradition has preserved countless expressions of beliefs which have been at various times announced as discoveries. Now, following the analogy of Nature, we affirm that it is the most natural and scientific method to take it for granted that these instincts, aspirations, affirmations, and traditions mean something, and that they contain at least the crude elements of exact knowledge,—the substance of knowledge. That being given, science may properly work out the form of it, explain its relations and laws, and exhibit the proofs.

This is the ordinary method of science. We venture to say that in regard to the fundamental forces of the physical universe modern science has not made a single discovery. Light, heat, electricity, gravitation, chemical forces, all the principal forces and all the important phenomena, had been observed long before modern science set itself to the important task of sifting, classifying, and correcting the various elements of the popular experience.

Aristotle could have learned nothing from Agassiz which would have added any certainty to his belief in the fundamental facts of natural science; but Agassiz could have suggested to Aristotle many new interpretations, and classifications which would have delighted him exceedingly. Agassiz and Darwin would never dream of saying that all that the ancient philosophers believed was a magnificent guess.

By analogy we affirm that if there is no element of knowledge in the religion which has come down to us from the past, there never will be. Science cannot now discover what no man ever knew. It can tell us much about a great many things which have been imperfectly known. Man has not lived so many generations without learning something about every important factor of his life. At least that is the suggestion of physical science.

Now let us reverse the statement. If God, duty, and the immortal life be facts, they must have been potent forces in the constitution of the universe and in the organization of man. They must have tended constantly to force themselves upon his attention and secure his belief. If science should ever verify them it would be most natural and scientific to say that they had always in some form and to some degree had recognition, and that the confident assertions of knowledge were proofs that knowledge existed. There would be no other way to account for the assertions.

Another fact is significant. There has been no modern declaration of knowledge concerning religion which has been stated or could be stated in other terms than those which have before been used with similar meaning. New combinations are made, new classifications are published, new inferences are drawn, new reasons are adduced, new proofs are offered; but always the main affirmation, stripped of modern interpretation, is some old statement of faith.

We look for help, then, in a direction parallel to that taken by the physical sciences. We expect to have glorious light thrown upon the ancient beliefs, which will bring them out in their simplicity and their grandeur. We expect to see great masses of rubbish swept away, the useless winnowed out, and the primitive faiths of mankind brought into harmony with all natural law. To us it is no small comfort to hold that the new method will not rob us of all we had, but will take us to the point where we can see the secret of all the facts which we had dimly perceived and imperfectly known.—Christian Register, April 14.

CLERICAL CRUSADES.

A form of Moody and Sankey excitement is just now being popularized by a certain party in the Church under the name of "Missions." A number of days, known as an octave, are set apart for the work, the sanction of the bishop of the diocese is obtained, certain outside clergymen, styled "missioners," are engaged, and then handbills and placards are freely circulated to set the undertaking afloat. It might naturally be supposed that these missions would be instituted in notoriously godless towns, or in densely-populated districts lacking proper church accommodation and spiritual advisers. This, however, is not generally the case, and the scene of the clerical carnival is as often as not a spot replete with sacred edifices of every description, and where parsons constitute about one-tenth of the inhabitants. For, in truth, the promoters of these religious saturnalia are wise in their generation, and their object is not so much to conquer as to confirm their ascendancy over an already subject people; to crush out any symptoms of revolt, and to excite the fanaticism of the weaker members of their flocks. From time immemorial there has been a constant battle between sacerdotalism and freedom of opinion, and as yet in all countries liberty of conscience has gained the day. In England the refusal of the majority to be ruled by a priestly minority has been even more marked than elsewhere, and it remains to be seen whether the encroachments of certain parties will, even in these degenerate days, be submitted to with tameness by the mass of people, who never show their teeth—till roused.

Let us suppose that a "mission" has been instituted at the rising town of Chapelborough, which, as every one knows, is renowned throughout the length and breadth of the land for its innate piety, for the austerity of its vicars, for the elegance of its curates, and for its free-handed generosity in erecting tabernacles of all sizes and sects. For some days before the opening ceremony the eyes of the inhabitants are greeted with more or less tasteful inscriptions on dead walls and hoardings, such as "Come to the Mission," "The Mission every Night," "Special Services for Women Only," and other notices in the big type, theatrical, attractive style. But this is not all. The local postmen find their labors doubled by the enormous amount of circulars which they are compelled to distribute. These documents are of various sizes and purport. Some are mere time-tables or programmes of the coming entertainments; others contain exhortations to be present from the clergy; and others again are anonymously signed "A Friend," "A Worker in the Mission," or "A Lay Helper," and are couched in more forcible terms, with an invariable postscript, "Bring a friend." Nor is the voice of the preacher silent in inviting both saved and sinners to the spiritual feast, while it is pretty clearly intimated that any one rash enough to indulge in mundane amusements during the sacred season will be considered a heretic, and liable to excommunication by the faithful. At last the day arrives, and with it the bishop, who has been prevailed upon to deliver an address, and to inaugurate the proceedings. This the worthy man does with many commonplace remarks, an admonition to the clergy against over-excitement, and a copious lunch at the vicarage or rectory. The only incident worthy of remark during the prelate's visit is that sundry illegal practices and forbidden articles of wearing apparel are temporarily disconnected from the service of the parish church. His departure is the signal for the breaking of the storm of sacerdotal zeal. The town hall, usually devoted to conjurers or dancing, is plastered with new and more gorgeous placards, announcing daily services and addresses; the bells of the churches seem to be ceaselessly ringing from morning till night, and the booksellers do a roaring trade in mission hymn-books, while all other trade is at a stand-still. Occasionally the missionaries, uncanny individuals in cassocks, and at some distance liable to be mistaken for aged members of the weaker sex, may be seen flitting about as the hours of refreshment approach, and a general air of mourning pervades the highways and byways of Chapelborough.

In domestic circles there is great weeping and gnashing of teeth, for the ladies make much lamentation over their own offences, and those of mothers and fathers, husbands and brothers at the unconstitutional hours set apart for luncheon and dinner. The servants, too, under plea of anxiety for their salvation, become thorough republicans, and neglect or abandon their duties at most unlooked-for times; the butler is seized with a fanatical thirst for Biblical knowledge, the footman practises psalmody on an accordion, and the maids spend their time in reading tracts of peculiarly searching nature, or in joining expeditions of their fellows to the various public gatherings. But the ardor of the male extends neither higher nor lower. The workmen are thoroughly indifferent to the whole movement, while the upper class males, as a rule, stand aloof, curiously watching the demeanor of their female friends and relations, who are not slow to profit by the opportunity for grace afforded them. Much Christian charity is displayed at the services. Prayers are offered for "a girl who is a source of anxiety to her uncle," "a young man who has grievously offended his grandfather," "an old worker of wickedness," "a boy who has a conviction of his moral guilt," "an aged sister with a recollection of youthful depravity," "a publican and a sinner," and other afflicted people. Hymns of an exciting nature are continuously sung, and speeches, rather than sermons, of the most harrowing nature are delivered.

The exceeding self-denial of the clergy is pointed out, and the exceeding sinfulness of the audience condemned, with an accompaniment of much rhetorical thunder and lightning, of many minute descriptions of death and hell, and of sundry direct appeals to the confidence of the laity. Slips of paper are distributed, during the invariable collection, inviting the guilty to commit their misdeeds to writing and the friendly care of the mission priest. Naturally at the conclusion there are numerous applicants, mostly women, desirous of unburdening themselves to the messengers of peace, and if there are not, personal intimidation is often used to bring about the desired object. For this purpose a consulting-room for the ghostly physicians is provided in an adjacent school-room, and here the fair patients confess their iniquities, and are inducted into the right path by the fervent and untiring missionaries, often till a late hour into the night.

There are also services set apart for "mothers," for "young women," for "maid-servants," for "young men," and for "children"; but it is a curious fact that the special conferences for women are in a majority of five to one, thus entirely disposing of the popular belief that men are the more prone to the wickedness of the world, the flesh, and the devil. No stranger visiting Chapelborough during the mission week could fail to be struck by the devotion of its inhabitants, or by the apparent want of hospitality displayed by those who are anticipating Lent by mourning in sackcloth and ashes. For eight days these religious devotees are more devout than ever, and on the ninth, therefore, it may well be supposed that there are many hearts swept and garnished, plentifully stocked with good intentions, and considerably under the influence of unnatural religious intoxication. But, strange to say, when the good missionaries have packed up their trunks and departed, there are also a good many people who ask, What can be the lasting effect of these clerical crusades? But these are probably scoffers who do not say their prayers or go to church.—Vanity Fair, Feb. 10, 1877.

GEORGE ODGER.

It must be upwards of three and twenty years since I first met Mr. George Odger. There was a political conference held in a large provincial town which we both attended as representatives. I remember well the cold, somewhat dirty, and dismal room in which we met. While the delegates were exchanging congratulations, and the secretary was verifying their credentials, I got into conversation with my neighbor, a pleasant-spoken, intelligent man. We discussed the objects of the meeting and the prospects of the Radical party. I had not met my brother delegate before, but as soon as the meeting was called to order by the chairman, I learned that his name was Odger. We were appointed members of the business committee for the conference; and, after the day's speech-making was over, the two of us retired to our hotel. Dinner over, we went to a theatre, where poor Mr. Gustave Brook, whose melancholy death on board the London will be in the recollection of some of your readers, was playing Othello. I found my new acquaintance passionately fond of theatricals, and a warm admirer of Brook, who was at that time one of the most popular of our tragedians. The friendship then commenced lasted undimmed and unbroken until Mr. Odger's death. I have met him since on many public occasions. We have been members together of numberless committees, and delegates of many political and social congresses. The attachment and respect I felt for him at first has only been strengthened and deepened by closer intimacy.

The point that always struck me most in Mr. Odger's character was his simplicity and political enthusiasm. He was not a trading politician. The last thing in his thoughts was to obtain popular distinction, or to earn by his public labors the means of living luxuriously. He had certain clearly-defined political principles, and enforced them with all the earnestness and devotion of an apostle. His type of politician was common in this country during the old Chartist agitation, and it is still to be found amongst French and German Republicans. The class has, however, nearly become extinct with us. The materialistic tendencies of our age, and the selfish, if not the self-seeking doctrines common to trades union leaders, and politicians generally, have destroyed the chivalrous character that distinguished our earlier democratic teachers. Mr. Odger was about the last of the type that I know of. He was infinitely superior to the men with whom he was usually associated. He never aspired to play the part of the well-dressed bourgeois or to ape the political dandy. He was not ashamed of his trade, while never boasting of the fact that he was a working shoemaker. He was too proud and too manly to conceal his connection with the members of his own craft. There was nothing, to his mind more contemptible than a working-man agitator who set out to be "Brummagen gentleman."

Mr. Odger had little literary capacity, and although fairly read, especially in English history and, strange to say, in the works of the early English dramatists, his chief knowledge was gleaned from observation. He was a student of men more than of books. I never saw a more adroit and competent chairman in a stormy meeting. He had the capacity of softening irritations and of allaying ebullitions of popular feeling in fuller degree than almost any man I ever knew. In the ordinary acceptation of the term he was not an orator, but he could speak with singular clearness and point. I went with him to a meeting in St. James' Hall, several years ago, to express sympathy with the Northern cause in the American war. Mr. John Bright was in the chair, and some of the most prominent Radical politicians took part in the proceedings; but by many degrees the best speech made on the occasion was that by Mr. Odger. The late Mr. John Stuart Mill, walking from the meeting with a friend after the proceedings, and commenting on what had been said, expressed his gratification and surprise at the powerful address of Mr. Odger. Mr. Mill said that he had written and thought as much about the American struggle as most men, and he had an idea that he had said everything that could be said in favor of the North. But he declared he had learned from the speech of Mr. Odger that there were stronger arguments and a better case to be made for the North than he had dreamt of.

I saw much of Mr. Odger during the Reform League agitation in 1866 and 1867, and one phase of his character at that time came prominently under my observation. Funds were placed at the disposal of the council of that body to send speakers to public meetings in different parts of the country. Not a few of the professed reforming patriots, who were never more eloquent than when denouncing the extravagances of the government, demonstrated their practical disregard of economy by managing to run up large accounts for personal expenses. Mr. Odger, on the other hand, strove to practise what he preached. He invariably travelled third class; put up at the humblest hostels; and always rendered full details of his expenditure, even to sixpence. He did ten times the work of some of his more pretentious colleagues at a twentieth of the cost. Instead of trying to extract money out of the funds of the League, the chief object Mr. Odger seemed to have was to take as little as possible.

He was one of the most genial of companions, full of anecdote, could tell a good story, never had an unkind word for a political opponent, and always strove to put the best interpretation upon even the doubtful actions of those with whom he was associated. The only exception I know to this all but universal rule was the manner in which he spoke of the treatment he received at the hands of the Whigs, and especially the late whip to the party, Mr. Glyn, who "arbitrated" him, as he called it, out of the representation of Chelsea and Stafford, and prevented his election for Southwark. To the last, Mr. Odger spoke of the conduct of Mr. Glyn and the Whigs generally with unusual bitterness. He was singularly indifferent to popular criticism, and laughed as heartily as any one at the unjust and grotesque estimates of his character that some of the newspapers, especially the comic journals, indulged in. The unfortunate legal proceedings that were taken in his name against a satirical paper a few years ago were never heartily sanctioned by Mr. Odger. In that, as in other matters, he allowed himself to be guided by the opinions of his friends. He acquiesced in these proceedings more than he approved of them. As illustrating the striking injustice of the charges made against him, I may state that when the journal in question was charging him with living in revelry on the forced contributions of the working-men, the only salary he was getting was the munificent one of half a crown a week for acting as Secretary to the Trades' Council. This was the only regular remuneration he ever received for his life-long services to political and trade associations. His words were few, his mode of life simple, and his worldly aspirations not high. He died, as he lived, a poor but honest man. It is customary to say harsh things in this materialistic age when money is too often made the only measurement of a man's worth. It is the practice too often to speak slightly of any one that has lived to nearly sixty, and was dependent to the last on simply weekly wages. Mr. Odger's poverty, however, was not the least honorable trait of his character. If he had made money the object of his life, he could have lived and died in comparative affluence.

ONE WHO KNEW HIM.

THE POPULAR UNDERTAKER.

WHAT BRET HARTE HEARD IN A SLEEPING-CAR.

We had stopped at a station. Two men had got into the car and had taken seats in the one vacant section, yawning occasionally, and conversing in a languid, perfunctory sort of way. They sat opposite each other, occasionally looking out of the window, but always giving the stray impression that they were tired of each other's company. As I looked out of my curtains at them, the One Man said, with a feebly-concealed yawn:—

"Yes, well, I reckon he was at one time as popler an undertaker ez I knew."

The Other Man (inventing a question rather than giving an answer, out of some languid social impulse)—"But was he—this yer undertaker—a Christian? had he jined the Church?"

The One Man (reflectively)—"Well, I don't know ez you might call him a perfessin' Christian; but he hed, yes, he hed conviction. I think Dr. Wiley hed him under conviction. Et least, that was the way I got it from him."

A long, dreary pause. The Other Man (feeling it was incumbent on him to say something)—"But why was he popler ez an undertaker?"

The One Man (lazily)—"Well, he was kinder popler with widders and widders—sorter soother'n 'em a kinder keeler way; slung 'em suthin' here and there, sometimes outer the Book, sometimes outer himself, ez a man of experience as hed hed sorer. Hed, they say" (very cautiously), "lost three wives hisself and five children, by this yer new disease—diphthery,—out in Wisconsin. I don't know the facts, but that's what got round."

The Other Man—"But how did he lose his popularity?"

The One Man—"Well, that's the question. You see, he introduced some things into undertaking that waz new. He hed, for instance, a way, as he called it, of manipulating the features of the deceased."

The Other Man (quietly)—"How manipulating?"

The One Man (struck with a bright and aggressive thought)—"Look yer; did yer ever notice how, generally speakin', onhandsome a corpse is?"

The Other Man had noticed this fact.

The One Man (returning to his fact)—"Why, there was Mary Peebles ez waz daughter of my wife's bossom-friend—a mighty pooty girl and a perfessin' Christian—died of scarlet-fever. Well, that gal—I was one of the mourners, being my wife's friend—well, that gal, though I hedn't perhaps oughter say—lying in that casket, fetched all the way from some Al establishment in Chicago, filled with flowere and furbelows—didn't really seem to be of much account. Well, although my wife's friend, and me a mourner—well, now, I was—disappointed and discouraged."

The Other Man (in palpably affected sympathy)—"Sho, now!"

"Yes, sir! Well, you see, this yer undertaker—this Wilkins—hed a way of correcting all thet. And just by manipulation. He worked over the face of the deceased until he perduced what the survivin' relatives called a look of resignation—you know, a sort of smile like. When he wanted to put in any extres he produced what he called—hev'in' reglar charges for this kind of work—a Christian's hope."

The Other Man—"I want to know!"

"Yes. Well, I admit, at times it was a little start-lin'. And I've allers said" (a little confidentially) "that I hed my doubts of its being Scriptooral or sacred, being, ez you know, worms of the yearth; and I relieved my mind to our pastor, but he didn't feel like interferin' ez long ez it was confined to church membership. But the other day, when Cy Dunham died--you disremember Cy Dunham?"

A long interval of silence. The Other Man was looking out of the window, and had apparently forgotten his companion completely. But as I stretched my head out of the curtain I saw four other heads as eagerly reached out from other berths to hear the conclusion of the story. One head, a female one, instantly disappeared on my looking around, but a certain tremulousness of her window-curtain showed an unabated interest. The only two utterly disinterested men were the One Man and the Other Man.

The One Man (detaching himself languidly from the window)--"Cy Dunham?"

"Yes, Cy never hed hed either con-victions or perfections. Uster get drunk and go round with permissious women. Sorter like the prodigal son, only a little more so, ez fur ez I kin judge from the facts ez stated to me. Well, Cy one day petered out down at Little Rock and was sent up yer for interment. The fammery, being proud-like, of course didn't spare any money on that funeral, and it waz--now between you and me--about ez shapely and first-class and prime-mess affair ez I ever saw. Wilkins hed put in his extry. He hed put on to that prodigal's face the Al touch--hed him fixed up with a Christian's hope. Well, it waz about the turning point, for thar waz some of the members and the pastor himself thought that the line ought to be drawn somewhere, and thar waz some talk at Deacon Tibbets' about a reg'lar conference meetin' regardin' it. But it wazn't that which made him onpopler."

Another silence. No expression or reflection from the face of the Other Man of the least desire to know what ultimately settled the unpopularity of the undertaker. But from the curtains of the various berths several eager and one or two even wrathful faces, anxious for the result.

The Other Man (lazily recurring to the lost topic)--"Well, what made him onpopler?"

The One Man (quietly)--"Extry, I think--that is, I suppose, not knowin'" (cautiously) "all the facts. When Mrs. Widdcombe lost her husband, 'bout two months ago, though she'd been through the valley of the shadder of death twice--this bein' her third marriage, hev'n' been John Barker's widder--"

The Other Man (with an intense expression of interest)--"No, you're foolin' me?"

The One Man (solemnly)--"Ef I waz to appear before my Maker to-morrow, yes! she waz the widder of Barker."

The Other Man--"Well, I swow!"

The One Man--"Well, this widder Widdcombe she put up a big funeral for the deceased. She hed Wilkins, and thet undertaker just laid hisself out. Just spread hisself. Onfort'nately--perhaps fort'nately in the ways of Providence--one of Widdcombe's old friends, a doctor up thar in Chicago, comes down to the funeral. He goes up with the friends to look at the deceased, smilin' a peaceful sort of heavenly smile, and everybody sayin' he's gone to meet his reward, and this yer friend turns round, short and sudden on the widder settin' in her pew, and kinder enjoyin', as wimen will, all the compliments paid the corpse, and he says, says he:--

"What did you say your husband died of, marm?"

"Consumption," she says, wiping her eyes, poor critter. "Consumption, gallopin' consumption."

"Consumption be d--d," sez he, bein' a profane kind of Chicago doctor, and not bein' ever under conviction. "Thet man died of strychnine. Look at thet face. Look at that contortion of them facial muscles. Thet's strychnine. Thet's risers Sardonicus" (thet's what he said; he waz always sorter profane).

"Why, doctor," says the widder, "thet--thet is his last smile. It's a Christian's resignation."

"Thet be blowed; don't tell me," sez he. "Hell is full of that kind of resignation. It's pizon. And I'll--" Why, dern my skin, yes we are; yes, it's Joliet. Wall, now, who'd hev thought we'd been nigh on to an hour?"

Two or three anxious passengers from their berths: "Say, look yer, stranger! Old man! What became of--"

But the One Man and the Other Man had vanished.

MR. EMERSON AT THE OLD SOUTH.

Mr. Ralph Waldo Emerson might well have added to the glories of Boston the cultured audience which assembled at the Old South Meeting-house yesterday afternoon for the purpose of hearing him read his lecture on Boston, which was read in this city some sixteen years ago. Among those present were the Hon. Henry L. Pierce, A. Bronson Alcott, Col. Theodore Lyman, Dr. George B. Emerson, Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Hon. Richard Frothingham, Hon. Samuel E. Sewall, Rev. Charles G. Ames, and the Rev. Joseph Cook. It has been several years since Mr. Emerson has delivered a public address in Boston, and hence there was a large attendance of his friends and admirers. His lecture was mainly devoted to a portrayal of the educational advantages of Boston, and the high character and culture of its citizens, with frequent reference to the sterling character of its founders.

Commencing with a general reference to the influence of climate and air upon a people, and the belief that to certain spots special powers attach, he said that one who lives one year in Boston ranges through all the climate of the globe, and the influence of this upon the character of the people was to give them greater versatility. With its snows, its east winds, and changing skies, it was not a luxurious climate.

Wisdom was not found with those who dwell at their ease. New England, he said, was a sort of Scotland. Those who drink the waters of the Charles River get up earlier than those who drink from the Potomac. Boston was an exceptional city and an exceptional community, in the extraordinary and abundant means it furnished to enable every poor man to secure his child good culture and a finished education by its libraries, its schools, and the sympathy of the community with every manifestation of talent. Citizenship in Boston he regarded as a sort of nobility, and it commands attention as the town appointed in the history of nations to lead the destiny of New England.

He then referred to the founding of the early colonies at Plymouth, Salem, Weymouth, and Medford, and finally to the foundation of Boston, giving a beautiful description of its harbor and bay. He narrated some of the curious stories which were current in those times about the country, such as the burning over of Monadnock Mountain to destroy the lions, the sweet fern which caused the people to faint, etc.; and referring to the religious character of these early settlers he said a good woman who knew some of them said they had to hold on to the huckleberry-bushes hard to prevent being translated. The deep religious element which pervaded the early settlers was the basis of many of the most prominent traits of the New England character, and the foundation of the school and the village lyceum side by side with the church had tended to promote the culture of the intellect until New England supplied a large quota of ministers and teachers to the South and West. It had produced a refinement that makes the elegance of wealth look stupid. While its founders were united by personal affection, they stood in awe of each other as religious men, and for the first time an ideal social compact was realized. He spoke of the Old State House as the seat of the Revolutionary counsels, which, like the Old South, knew the voice of Adams and Otis and Hancock and the early patriots, and Mr. Emerson in this connection expressed the hope that the modern rage for improvement would long spare both of these modest monuments of our ancestors.

In speaking of the foundation of the State he said that the phrase often heard among boys on the street, "I'm as good as you," was the essence of the Massachusetts bill of rights. It soon demonstrated that moral values would become money values, as a house in Boston came to be worth as much again as a similar house in a town of timorous people. There was nothing like a stirring town, instead of a talking town where nothing was doing. Boston had never been wanting in some theme of discussion to prick the sides of conservatism, from the days of the persecution of the Quakers to the time of Abner Kneeland and Garrison and Andrew. In all great parties it was the ceaseless agitators, the men that were never contented, who did the work, and not the men who wore the badges of office and spent the salaries.

Boston never wanted a good principle of rebellion in it. It always had a respectable minority, as in the times of the defenders of the slave against the politicians and the merchants. He referred to the early literary eminence of Boston, and noting that it produced no finished writer between 1790 and 1820, he said it had well sustained its early reputation in this direction in these later days. Another peculiarity of Boston was that it had given good sons to good aires, like the younger Adams, Otis, and Quincy; the high character of its State papers had been maintained by the character of its executives from Winthrop to Andrew; and the decisions of its Courts were respected as good law, both in America and England. If it had not produced a Milton or a Shakespeare, it must be remembered that Nature was a frugal mother, who never gives without measure, and that in its early years Massachusetts wanted strong-hearted and strong-willed working-men instead of epic poems and dramas. The distinctive features of this new Atlantis were its civil and religious freedom, education, social order, and loyalty to law. Our little city among the rocks owed its existence and its virtue to the principles which were deeper than the rocks, and so long as it cleaves to these principles of liberty, education, and truth, it would teach the teachers and rule the rulers of America, its geniuses could write the laws, and its historians the fate of the nations.--Boston Journal, April 17.

NATIONAL WOMAN SUFFRAGE CONVENTION.

MAY, 1877.

The Tenth Annual Convention of the National Woman Suffrage Association will be held in Masonic Hall, corner 6th Avenue and 23d Street, New York, May 24, 1877.

The nation has entered upon its second century of existence, leaving one-half its citizens political slaves. While the form of our government declares woman's demands to be righteous and just, man's legislation still holds her unenfranchised. As in law is found the security of rights, and as woman has been denied the constructive rights of the Declaration and Constitution, she must seek recognition in specific law, by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The great effort of the National Woman Suffrage Association this year will be for a sixteenth amendment which shall specifically declare woman's right to the ballot. The right of petition is woman's only recognized method of influencing legislation; a million names to the Forty-fifth Congress would have great moral influence upon Congress and the nation. The United States already has three classes of voters, the black men, naturalized male citizens, and amnestied rebels; each of these has right to the ballot under

United States authority. Though by decision of the Supreme Court in case of Virginia L. Minor, of Missouri, all women were remanded to the States, yet as the national government had power to invest with the ballot in the above instances, it has like power to enfranchise woman.

Let us therefore meet and discuss the best methods of attaining this great object.

MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE, Ch. Ex. Com.

All contributions to this convention should be sent to Ellen C. Sargent, 1733 De Sales Street, Washington, D. C. Letters should be addressed to Mrs. Gage, Fayetteville, N. Y.

LONGINGS.

BY C. APLIN.

Of the prophet's eye has seen it,
Of the poet's tongue has told,
How the future in its bosom
Bears the happy Age of Gold!

Age when all things dark and evil,
In truth's sunlight broad and free
Like the noisome mists shall vanish,
And the good alone shall be:

When all men shall be as brothers,
War's harsh dissonance shall cease;
Love fulfil her angel mission,
And the peoples dwell in peace.

Still the prophet looks and listens;
Still the poet hopes and dreams;
While sometimes earth's cloudy verges
Seem to catch the golden gleams.

Of upon his field of triumph
Has the hero died content;
With the martyr's groans of anguish
Of the songs of victory blent.

Yet through all the lapsing ages,
Still unconquered, bold and strong,
Changing ever, dying never,
Strides the Protean form of Wrong--

Scorns the prophet's word of wisdom;
Scorns the hero's battle blade;
Hardly for all human yearning
Does its shadow fall or fade.

Still unsolved the mighty problem,
If it be in Heaven's design,
Man by virtue of his manhood
May attain to the divine.

Yet to faith's ecstatic vision
Shines afar the herald-ray,
And the poet's song of gladness,
Wistful, hails the coming day.

With her presages of beauty
Nature all her being fills;
And the spirit depths within us
Stir and leap with answering thrills.

Like the low mysterious music
Ocean murmurs to the shore,
Come the sweet and solemn voices,
Calling, calling evermore.

And the poet's faith-song echoes
To the wisdom of the sage;
Strength and trust and high endeavor
Yet shall bring the Golden Age.

Be not idle, then, nor faithless,
Soul of mine, for it may be,
With the longing and the striving,
Heaven at last shall come to thee.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

The Index.

BOSTON, APRIL 26, 1877.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, WILLIAM J. POTTER, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHERRY, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), DAVID H. CLARK, MRS. ELIZABETH GADY STANTON, Editorial Contributors.

WE ARE requested to state that Mr. Charles Ellis proposes to give a course of free lectures in this city at Amory Hall, beginning Sunday afternoon, April 29, at 3 P. M. The subjects of the course are to be: I. Authority. II. The Infinite Impersonal. III. Prayer to God an Absurdity. IV. Reconstruction. All interested are invited to attend.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD is holding a public debate with Professor Braden at Denver, Colorado, beginning April 23 and lasting twelve nights. The rules of discussion are published at length in the Daily Tribune of that city, and great interest in the debate has been excited. Mr. Underwood is a skilful debater, and has won a very wide reputation at the West by his ability and success in such encounters.

AN ENGLISH gentleman, ordering ten copies of THE INDEX containing "The Scientific Method in Religion" to be sent to his address in London, writes: "Allow me further to ask you respectfully either to print this paper separately for sale in the usual way, or to grant me permission to make the request of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in London that they will do so." A few copies of this lecture had been already printed privately in the form of a handsome pamphlet, on thick tinted paper and with broad margins; and these will be mailed to order at twenty-five cents each. But any one is at liberty to reprint the lecture who may desire to do so. Our wish is to disseminate the thoughts it contains as widely as possible.

THIS LETTER, published in the New York Tribune of January 16, with reference to the Sunday closing of the "Permanent Exhibition" at Philadelphia, is full of instruction, and shows afresh what an outrage on the rights of the people was committed by the Centennial Commission last summer in shutting on Sundays to the general public, but opening secretly to the privileged few, a great Exhibition for which the whole people had been taxed. The letter is headed—"The Permanent Exhibition: Plea of a Poor Man to have it Open on Sunday," and is addressed to the editor of the Tribune:—

Sir,—The Tribune being the workingman's paper, and mine particularly, will you allow me to say a few words on the letter of "J. C." in Saturday's paper? He says the whole Christian community rejoiced that the Centennial Exhibition was closed on Sundays, and he hopes, if any part is opened hereafter, it will be kept closed on Sunday. Now he must know this is not true. Thousands of Christians, including ministers, petitioned for the Exhibition to be opened on the Sabbath, to say nothing of other thousands, not Christians, but who have equal rights with them. I spent a fragment of one Saturday there, and never felt so much enjoyment in anything before. Of course I could not see much in the short time I had, and I had to return to work on Monday, or lose my place. Some one told me that a few persons would be admitted on Sunday, and I went, thinking it might be such as me, but I found it was not. Some dozens of people were let in—great people I was told,—and spent what time they liked looking at things at their leisure, while I and some thousands more spent most of the day looking through the fences and knot-holes, and thinking what a grand thing it was to be great and rich. If "J. C." had heard the rebukes that I did showered on the Centennial Commissioners, and churches, too, he would have changed his opinion, I think. I am a poor man, but would have given all the money I possess to have spent that Sunday in there with the big men.

RESOLUTIONS ON THE DEATH OF REV. JOHN T. SARGENT.

At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association, held in this city on April 23, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

"With tender appreciation of the graces of his character and the righteousness of his life, this Committee recognizes the loss it sustains by the death of a beloved member, John Turner Sargent.

"Carrying the generous dream of his youth into the practice of his latest hours, courteous and sincere, gentle and inflexible, having the wisdom which springs from purity of heart and the dignity which attends perfect uprightness, he has crowned his early protest for Freedom in Religion by a constant adherence to its principles.

"This recognition of his faithful services is presented with deep sympathy to Mrs. Sargent by his fellow-workers."

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Tenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston as follows:—

Thursday evening, May 31st, at 7.45 P. M., business session in Horticultural Hall, for the election of officers, reading of reports, and consideration of the practical work of the Association. A special discussion is also invited on the proper interpretation of the word "scientific" in the first article of the Constitution of the Association.

Friday, June 1st, at 10 A. M. and 3 P. M., sessions in Beethoven Hall for Essays and Addresses. Morning subject: "External Dangers of Religious Freedom." Afternoon subject: "Internal Dangers of Free Thought." Speakers and essayists will be announced hereafter.

A Social Festival is to be held Friday evening at Horticultural Hall.

Secretary.

FREEDOM AND FAITH.

In kind compliance with our request, Rev. Francis G. Peabody, of Cambridge, has furnished for publication this week a recent discourse of his on "Faith and Freedom," a brief abstract of which in a daily paper had attracted our interested attention. It is an exposition of the Liberal Christian or Unitarian view of a very important subject, made with exquisite simplicity, sincerity, and frankness, and sure to command the respect of every discerning reader. From beginning to end, one feels himself in contact with a mind which presents no second-hand common-places, no mere echoes of a traditional system, but rather the fresh thoughts of a singularly guileless and truth-loving nature. Such qualities are too rare not to be charming wherever they reveal themselves, especially in the pulpit, which so often exhibits their exact opposite; and it would be difficult to find a more winning illustration of them than is offered in this discourse.

There is little, if anything, in Mr. Peabody's main thought, from which we differ; at the most, we should simply ask some questions. The answers to these questions would in all probability develop points of more or less difference; but his statements scarcely suggest them. It is certainly true, for example, that real freedom is a means rather than an end; that it cannot be absolute, or independent of an environment; that it does not confer a right to "do or think as we please," regardless of others; in short, that it is "freedom to do one's best." Perhaps it is not so certainly true that "Christian faith" is simply "the conviction that the straightest way to God lies through the spirit and influence of the life of Jesus Christ." More than this, by the testimony of the Christian Church itself, is involved in those comprehensive words, "Christian faith"; but there is no need of inquiring here what that more is. It is enough to say that the "faith in an infallible Church and the kindred faith in an infallible Book," which Mr. Peabody recognizes as unfavorable to freedom in his own sense of the word, cannot be dropped out of Christianity except under the strenuous protest of almost united Christendom; and that the issue between "faith and freedom" has been historically waged without any such omission.

It is especially when Mr. Peabody says that "we become aware that the best work is done, the enduring structures built, only when beneath the method of science there is a foundation of genuine and spiritual faith," that we should like to ask—"faith in what?" The vagueness of the word faith, when evacuated of all reference to an infallible Church or Book, perplexes us a little, and leaves us in doubt as to the extent of his meaning. There is a perfectly intelligible and very common use of the word which is applicable to science; "faith" in the universality of law, in the constancy of Nature, in the validity of the scientific method, etc., is no restriction of freedom, but rather a sign of it, and science would be impossible without such faith as this. But Mr. Peabody undoubtedly means more than this,—how much more, we do not know. Without resorting to conjecture as to his meaning, however, we will pass to some general considerations of faith, in its theological and scientific senses respectively.

The essential difference between faith theological and faith scientific, we conceive, lies in the difference of their underlying grounds. In itself, considered merely as a state of mind, faith is a complex union or consolidation of the intellectual, the emotional, and the active—a psychological compound of thought, feeling, and will. It is a condition of complete confidence in an idea or a person, based on belief and culminating in act. Belief seems to lie at the bottom of it, no matter how it manifests itself. A Christian has faith in God or in Christ primarily because he cherishes certain beliefs about him. A business man has faith in a particular investment because he believes it will prove profitable, or in a particular bank because he believes it well managed. A scientific man has faith in the laws of Nature because he believes that they are constant—that like causes will always produce like effects. And so on; belief seems to be the substratum or foundation of faith, no matter what may be the form of its manifestation. But the difference between theological faith and scientific faith (or faith in any of its other than theological senses) lies, if we mistake not, in the fact that the former always requires for its belief an authority, and the latter a reason. The one appeals to the authority of a Pope, a Church, a Book, as its own ultimate ground; the other appeals to evidence, to reasoning, to experience. Scientific faith is rational because it always asks, and can always render, a reason for its belief; theological faith is irrational because it asks no reason, but relies wholly on authority.

It is in the light of this simple distinction that we would answer an inquiry made in a private note from Rev. Mr. Chadwick, of Brooklyn, which we suppose he intended to be answered in these columns. He writes: "I have been reading your lecture in THE INDEX. . . I write to ask you about this passion for the truth, this certainty that it must be best to know the truth. Does this passion, this certainty, rest upon a scientific basis which you have yourself discovered—which anybody has discovered? If not, does it involve a Transcendental element, or is it only an intuition in the new sense (Lewes') of an inherited experience? You of course are bound to deny the former, but, if not the latter, what is the nature of the experience that is the ground of the conviction?"

This question is a very proper one to be put, and we thank Mr. Chadwick for putting it.

1. The "passion for the truth" is the natural hunger and thirst of the intellect—its natural appetite or craving for the only food which can keep it alive. Before knowledge (science is only clarified and verified knowledge) can be acquired, the desire for knowledge must be excited; and this desire is the "passion for the truth." The intellect seeks, by the very law of its nature, to know what is true; it cannot seek to know what is false, for that is not knowledge at all. Its whole function is to seize the true relations of things in the confused impressions that come to the mind from all sources, and to correct its own mistakes by reflection; and, like every other faculty, it grows by what it feeds on. The "passion for truth," therefore, is the natural appetite, the necessary characteristic of every intellect which has attained a healthy, vigorous development; and it is strong in proportion to the degree of this development.

2. The "certainty that it must be best to know the truth" is simply an induction from the totality of human experience, collective and individual alike. Experience teaches each of us afresh, as it taught the race before we were born, that the worst evils of life are traceable directly or indirectly to ignorance; and the certainty that it is always for the best to know the truth is exactly as strong as our own experience of the miseries that result from not knowing it. No Transcendental or a priori intuition is necessary to convince us of the superlative importance to our own welfare of getting all the light we possibly can, with reference to the nature of our own environments; the experience of mankind, if it has taught us anything, has taught us that ignorance is weakness, that "to be weak is to be miserable," and therefore that it is always best to know the truth. It is really a question only of the relative benefits to be derived from ignorance and from knowledge; and, although ignorance may possibly be, as has been asserted, the "mother of devotion," knowledge is certainly the mother of civilization, of culture, of all that is high and ennobling in human society or in the individual soul. Above all, knowledge of moral and spiritual truth is the prime requisite of lofty religious character; and the experience of all ages is our warrant for the conviction that it is "always best to know the truth."

3. How much is contributed to the formation of this conviction in a particular instance by the general experience of the race, and how much by the experience of the individual himself, it may be difficult to determine. Strictly speaking, no specific experience can possibly be inherited; nothing is inheritable but the capacity for experience. That this capacity is increased by cultivation or use, and that, thus increased, it may be transmitted by inheritance, is indubitable; but it is an abuse of words leading to confusion of ideas to call such an inherited capacity of experience an "intuition." The original sense of the word intuition, as used by Kant, was an "objective perception" of "a singular and individual object"; and this is its only proper philosophical usage. Lewes and Spencer have done a disservice to philosophy by confounding the inheritable capacity of experience with the non-inheritable specific experience; and this very unfortunate confusion has only introduced darkness into the discussion of "intuition." Visual power increased by constant use,—that is, an improved visual faculty and organ,—may be transmitted, and in the course of generations may become extraordinarily developed, as in the case of Indians or of eagles; but no particular act of vision can be transmitted at all. The intellectual perception of a special truth (e. g., the existence of God), however unquestioned it may be, is not transmissible as such; all that is transmissible is the faculty of perception itself, heightened and improved by cultivation. This distinction is of the utmost importance to exact thinking on this subject; and we therefore attribute the conviction that it is "always best to know the truth" neither to the Transcendental intuition nor to intuition in the "new sense" of Spencer, but to a fresh induction from experience by the individual intellect, whose powers are, of course, an inheritance from ancestral sources. But it should not be forgotten that this conviction is not a universal one. The world has not yet generally attained to it. Too many people believe that falsehood is more useful than truth, and it is only the best intellects that love and serve the truth with deep faith in its paramount utility and sanctity.

We now are in a position to understand the kind of "faith" which science recognizes; namely, a faith which demands and can give a "reason" for itself, and which, therefore, is alone entitled to the praise of being "rational." Faith in truth, as we have seen, rests on reason, not on authority, and is only strengthened by the growth of science. But it demands absolute freedom for the intellect, so far as all the ancient "authorities" of the Church are concerned. The intellect has faith in its own perceptions and conclusions, in proportion to the strength of the evidence and its consciousness of its own strength. A feeble mind never has strong convictions, though it may have tremendously strong prejudices; a strong mind may have strong convictions which are erroneous, but it never rejects the offer of fresh evidence or clings to its error in the face of it. To fear investigation or to flinch from the exposure of error is always the proof of an intellect relatively weak in comparison with feeling or selfish purpose. A powerful mind always has faith in itself, faith in the beneficence of truth, faith in the laws of thought and the capacity of thought to compass the discovery of truth; and it is in virtue of this faith for which it can render a reason that it insists on absolute freedom from all forms of faith which have no reason to render.

The issue between freedom and faith, therefore, more exactly stated, is the issue between FAITH RATIONAL OR SCIENTIFIC and FAITH IRRATIONAL OR THEOLOGICAL. And we believe that no form of religious faith, however disguised or gilded, however vigorously battled or craftily plotted or tenderly pleaded for, can permanently maintain itself in human society or the human mind, unless it can satisfy completely the demands of the scientific intellect by giving a full and adequate "reason for itself."

HOW TO MEET THE CONFLAGRATION.

Mr. Gannett is right that the points of sympathy with other faiths or forms of faith are as real and as important as the differences, and much of the best work of the Free Religious Association has been in finding the sympathy of religions, the union in great essentials of the most alien faiths. But my practical question would be, which side needs emphasis in regard to such a movement as Moody and Sankey's?

When a fire is sweeping over the city, would you strive to show the beneficent uses of well-regulated fire, which is always the same in substance, or would you stay its ravages by its great neutralizer, water? The trouble with the revival movement is not that it utters no truths, but that it emphasizes and energizes its half-truths or falsities with such destructive agencies as are extremely harmful. We would not fan the flame with a wind of opposition, but we certainly would try to bring up all those reserved powers which would keep the people cool and calm and interested by its power.

Let me tell a little story. A revival was going on in a pleasant village, sweeping in the young people by its fierce excitement. A wise lady who had some young people under her care took occasion to make pleasant parties for them, and invited their young friends to her beautiful garden, and gave them that natural, healthful enjoyment proper to their age. One of the revival ministers felt the counter-current, and called to remonstrate with her. He found her sweeping a room. She sat down, broom in hand, and talked freely and pleasantly with him. "Do you not feel the importance of religion?" said the minister. "Oh, yes!" said she; "we must have religion in everything. When I sweep my room, I feel that I am not religious, if I do not go thoroughly into the corners and remove every particle of dust. I always teach my young people so."

The revivalist retired, feeling the difference of their religions, and not sure that his would win the victory.

When we find a people persecuted and oppressed on account of their religion, then let us emphasize the side of common unity, and help ourselves and others to charity and justice towards them. We will not "break the broken reed, nor quench the smoking flax," but will bring our buckets to help put out a conflagration.

"WOMEN AND CHRISTIANITY."

CHICAGO, April 13, 1877.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I have just read your editorial in THE INDEX of April 5, containing a statistical report of the relative number of men and women requesting prayers at the Moody and Sankey meetings. The result showed, as you expressed it, that "women are the chief dependence and support of Christianity in the United States, and that without this support Christianity could not long sustain itself as a social power at all." There are many, however, who will dissent from your consequent conclusion that woman's enfranchisement will be likely not to have an immediate beneficial effect on our free institutions. For myself, in this connection, I desire only to repeat what has been often said by yourself and several of your correspondents, that the poorest way to teach woman how to use the ballot is to continue to withhold it from her. It would be like refusing to teach a child to walk until it had first learned the use of its feet. I have no doubt that, when we get the ballot, we shall handle it rather awkwardly at first, not knowing just exactly what it is for or how we are to use it, and it is quite possible that many of us will treat it as the women of old did their jewels, and consign it to the Church for safe-keeping, and as a symbol of our devotion. But such over-zeal as this always punishes and in time corrects itself, and perhaps in consideration of how man's misuse of the ballot has invariably tended in the direction of immorality, we can afford to be a little patient over woman's misuse of it in favor of religion.

But the point I wished to call attention to was the inference you drew with regard to the superior culture of the non-praying man over the praying woman. Such a conclusion does not seem positively demonstrated as yet. It may be fairly doubted if the widespread masculine scepticism of the present day is a more healthful moral influence than the prevailing feminine credulity. If the sceptic were always an honest doubter, and never a mental shrink, then the figures you have given us might tell woefully against woman's intelligence as compared to man's. As it is, the worst, and that is enough, that can be said of them, so far as she is concerned, is that they militate largely against her common sense. They do not in consequence prove man's superior wisdom, for his unbelief may rest on quite as shaky a foundation as her belief. It is true, as you say, that "the Christian religion has already lost its real, if not its nominal, hold on the cultivated masculine mind of the nineteenth century"; but does it necessarily follow that all "masculine minds" upon whom this religion has lost its hold are therefore "cultivated"? So far from thinking that the attitude of the average business man towards Orthodoxy is one of careful and conscientious doubt, I am more inclined to believe it to be that of supreme indifference. He does not so much reject the creed of the Church as ignore it. He has an abundance of shrewd common sense, and suspects it is a fraud, but is too much engrossed in stocks and dividends to care to verify his impression. In the meantime he encourages his family in their credulity, hires an expensive pew, and does not disdain to occupy one corner of it, wherein he presents a pleasing picture of somnolent respectability. And, what is more significant, it not seldom happens, when the lamp of life flickers and dies out, that he manifests the uneasiness of an unstable mind, and gives assent to doctrines he has formerly ridiculed and affected to despise. At heart such liberals are cowards, and are always to be found on the safe side.

Because the majority of thinking men are men of advanced and liberal views, it does not therefore follow that all liberals are thinkers; and so it may happen that a woman of devout religious feeling is superior in thought and culture to the professed atheist whose atheism is mere conceit and flippancy. I would have women pay less attention to the fables and superstition of religion, and men pay more attention to its spirit. When men are as able to explain and justify their unbelief as women are unable to account for their belief, then I will believe that her religion proves his wisdom, and his irreligion her stupidity. Until then, I hesitate at concluding that, because more than twelve hundred and eighty-four men can be found who did not request prayers, therefore they are the intellectual superiors of twelve hundred and eighty-four women who did. The quality of a man's mind is not determined by its outcome, but by its method.

CELIA P. WOOLLEY.

FIRST-HAND TESTIMONY ABOUT CHINESE MISSIONS.

Lately, when in a Western city, while attending service at a Congregational Church, I listened to an eloquent sermon on the efficacy, the necessity, and the success of foreign missions. The minister was very earnest, without doubt very sincere in the belief he expressed; and I could not help thinking what a great amount of matter was asserted from the pulpit as fact, though the same might be the purest fiction. It is not for a moment to be imagined that a preacher does not himself believe thoroughly in all his assertions; but I do think he often takes as fact the assertions of others without direct inquiry into the subject to assure its truth.

During a residence of four years in China, I associated considerably with missionaries, saw the result of their workings, and inquired into their experiences. In China, all the different religious sects have missionary representatives. But the most successful workers are the Roman Catholics. Their success is due to two obvious reasons. First, their forms of religious worship are so similar to the Chinese form, that no great change is demanded of the convert. Secondly, the Catholic missionaries adopt the Chinese costume, and go among the people just as do the native priests. Within twenty miles of Shanghai there exists a cluster of hills, known as the "Feng Wang Shan" Hills. On the summit of one, the height of which would not exceed five hundred feet, a chapel has been erected by the Jesuits. It was computed at the consecration (at which I was present) that within three days over one hundred thousand Chinamen visited the chapel. During the two days I remained in the neighborhood, endless seemed the stream of arrivals; the creeks were crowded with sampans, some of which came over one hundred miles to witness the ceremonies. Many of the boats floated from the stern a flag decorated with a red cross. The pilgrims on their way to church knelt at the many shrines, told their beads, and said their "paters." All this would have been more surprising had I not already visited one of the largest and most celebrated monasteries in all China, the monastery of "Ku Shan," near Foochow. The similarity between this institution and a Catholic one of the kind is most marked; the following are noticeable points of resemblance: the Chinese priests wear long, gray cloth garments, with rosary, beads, etc.; their heads are shaved, and they are celibates; and there is a chief priest corresponding to a Catholic abbot. In Chinese temples the idols but take the place of the idols of the Virgin and various saints common to the Catholic Church, and are as symbolical in the one case as in the other. No seats are to be found in the heathen temple; there are mats for devotees to kneel upon; and incense burns before the altars upon which stand lighted candles, while a bell summons to worship as regularly as at St. Peter's in Rome. The Chinese priest goes among his people, attending to their interests, and extracting money from them just as the Catholic priest does. Has not enough been written to prove the similarity existing between the outward forms of Roman Catholicism and Buddhism? To these similarities may be ascribed the more general success of Catholic missionaries; and it is to be inferred from the preceding that numerous converts are made.

Now let it be observed that the fundamental principles of Christianity and Buddhism agree on the two most salient points, and these are so salient that Jesus said they embodied all of Christianity. Both Christ and Confucius taught, "Honor to the supreme power, and to do unto your neighbor as to yourself." Now it may be asked reasonably, When two religions are so alike in their essentials, why should one declare the other all wrong? During a voyage of six hundred miles into the interior of China I met a Wesleyan minister, who was on a tour of inspection, and quite delighted with what he was pleased to call the success of the work. Our arguments on the necessity of missionary labor induced me to look more closely into the subject, and the following result will stand for a fit memorial of the whole success:—

From an American missionary in Hankow who had had ample experience from fifteen years' work, who stood high among the missionaries, and had large opportunity for judging, as Hankow and Wuchu, the latter one of the most important and wealthiest cities in China, were within his district, I learned that the mission in five years spent $45,000, and at the end of that time, when the roll was called, but three responded as converts, and these three were known to be scamps. The schools of the mission were well attended; the number of apparent Christians was very large; but his experience assured him that in the fifteen years he had worked, he had never made a convert in the true sense of the word, and from the clear comprehension of the subject. This is easily explained, for it is the fact that all so-called converts are made from the commonest element in the country,—among beings compared to whom the stupidest negro might be deemed a Machiavelli. To convert a man of respectability is so rare as to be hardly ever done; and to give an idea of the effect, the enlightening effect that Christianity has upon the assumed converts, be it known that as a rule a missionary will not employ in his service any convert, for such lie and steal. No wonder; for in professing Christianity they lose caste with their own people, and with it respect for themselves.

A great deal is said and written about the hard life missionaries lead, of their trials and privations, and on this account a great deal of money is drawn from charitable pockets. My actual experience from visiting eight or ten towns is that they live in the greatest luxury,—that they live in better style than most of our successful merchants, keep a better table and more servants, and enjoy quite as much of the good things of this life. They become rich, buy land, lend money at extortionate interest, and many retire from the scene of their labor with a competency. If any one could be certain of living as well all his life as the poorest missionaries I have seen in either Foochow, Ningpo, Shanghai, Ching-kiang, Ku-kiang, Hankow, and Wuchu, he need not complain.

In conclusion I would ask, what is the use of sending abroad year after year such large sums of money to effect an end which is an impossibility, and, even if it were not, would do no good as a success? Of what use is it to give a nation another name merely for its religion? That thing becomes a success which has some utility. But must there not be an immense amount of utility about a religion whose converts are not employable even by their converts? What can be the use of spending millions yearly to make a certain number of beings say, "I believe in the doctrines of Jesus," rather than in those of Confucius, when the sayer has not enough comprehension to understand the principles of either? I have still to add that, if the opinion of the mercantile communities of China be asked as to the utility of missionary work, it will be found to be the almost universal opinion, that the whole undertaking is a great mistake, and a great waste of money that might be better employed; and I submit that on this topic a fairer opinion can be had from such a source than from the workers themselves, who will not willingly publish their own uselessness, and who naturally enough do not want to relinquish their livelihood. Further, I would ask, in the name of common humanity and charity, is it right to send year after year such vast sums as are sent, to continue such a useless piece of work, when here at home our own poor are a much more worthy object of our charity and care? #### THE INWARD SPIRITUAL LIGHT.

The doctrine of the early Quakers seems to have been that there was an inward light "that lighteth every man that cometh into the world"; that this light, as a rule of faith and practice, was above all Scripture; and that every one who was fully obedient to this inward teacher would finally be sanctified and saved, no matter what his religious faith might be, or whether he was found in the highest walks of civilization or in the hut of the Hottentot. Whether this doctrine was entirely true or not, there perhaps was never a braver company of men and women than that devoted band of Quakers who went up and down in the land preaching the inward light.

The tendency of these times, however, even with Friends themselves, appears to be to leave the subject of an inward light almost entirely in the background, and to hold up the Scriptures as the highest guide in religious matters. Hence it becomes a proper subject for inquiry, whether or not man has any Spiritual guide to direct him in the right way or the way of salvation. In regard to this way, however, there seems to be considerable difference of opinion among men.

One class of persons think that man is in the way of salvation when he does right. Another class urge the necessity of believing right, or of accepting the true faith. Perhaps more or less controversy has always existed between the advocates of faith and the advocates of works. One class, no doubt, can testify that they are made happy when they exercise full faith in some doctrine. The other class can testify that they are made happy when they do right. Besides this difference of opinion with Christians as to the relative value of faith and works, there are various notions amongst the inhabitants of the world as to what is the true religion.

The Buddhist thinks that his religion is the inspiration of youth and the comfort of age; that it has increased for more than twenty-five centuries and now numbers nearly four hundred millions of the human race as its subjects, and that it is the true religion. The Mohammedan thinks that his is the true religion; that it is now making its thousands of converts in India, and that it has nearly two hundred millions of followers. The Catholic says that his Church is by far the largest branch of the Christian Church; that it has a regular succession from the Apostle Peter down; that it has gathered to its fold two hundred millions of souls; and that those who obtain salvation must do so through this Church and faith. The Protestant Church is composed of Methodists, Baptist, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Friends, and a number of other denominations, and is supposed to number about a hundred millions in the world.

No two of these sects believe just alike, but each one claims that it finds ample evidence in Scripture that its faith is the true faith. A number of the Protestant sects believe in the doctrine of predestination, and think somehow that the glory of God will be promoted by consigning the great majority of mankind to the regions of eternal death, without giving them any chance to escape. Other sects believe that a chance of salvation is offered to all, but that by far the largest majority will nevertheless be lost. Others think that it is God's purpose to save all men, and that he is able to accomplish his purpose. Another class concludes that God only proposes to save those who believe in and submit to water baptism.

Now in all these conflicting systems of religious faith there is much honesty, and the devotees of each particular creed are no doubt comforted in the belief that they are right. Many of these, even in the smallest, narrowest sects, may perhaps look with a kind of yearning pity on what they imagine to be the great outside world of erring barbarians. But it is self-evident that so many opposite systems of faith cannot all be true, and the fact of so many creeds being honestly held is the strongest evidence that man has no infallible spiritual light, or inward teacher to show him just what is sound doctrine. If there was an infallible guide in all to direct them precisely right in religious matters, it would not be possible for humanity to be divided up as it is into Buddhists, Mohammedans, Christians, and Infidels. If it was God's plan to save only those who believe just right, he certainly would enlighten all so that they could know what to believe without making any mistake. Many persons think that it is necessary to believe in what is called the "plan of salvation"; but it is not likely that the inward light, apart from Christian education, would lead to this belief any more than it would to Mohammedanism. Some imagine that the comfort experienced when they exercise full faith in a certain doctrine is conclusive evidence that that doctrine is true; but it should be remembered that it is the nature of faith to comfort, and that faith in error may sometimes be equally inspiring and comfortable as faith in truth. So it appears that the inward light does not show people to a certainty what religious creed is right; but one Scripture-writer says: "He hath shown thee, oh man, what is good; and what doth the Lord thy God require of thee?" What is this? Why, simply to "do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God."

Now all men, no matter how depraved, have something of a sense of the beauty and propriety of doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly. The inmates of the worst dens of degradation in all lands will perhaps acknowledge the righteousness of the Golden Rule. This great rule of life has been taught in more or less emphatic terms in all the great religions of the world. Moses says: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Now if one loves his neighbor as himself, he will certainly be just and merciful to that neighbor. Confucius, who was born 551 B. C., said: "What you do not want done to yourself do not do unto others." Hillel, who lived 40 B. C., said: "What is hateful unto thee thou shalt not do unto others." And Jesus, in his great Sermon on the Mount, said: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you do ye even so to them." The doctrine of returning good for evil means, I think, that men should still do right to those who do wrong to them; and the duty of this course has been recognized and taught perhaps in all ages.

Buddha said: "The man who foolishly does me wrong, I will return to him the protection of my ungrudging love. The more evil goes from him, the more good shall go from me." Mohammed said: "Turn away evil by that which is better, and he between whom and thyself was enmity shall become as though he was a warm friend." Jesus said: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, and do good to them that hate you." Thus we see that the duty of loving enemies and of observing the Golden Rule has been taught in heathen as in Christian lands. In all nations and through all contradictory systems of religious faith, the sense which men have had of justice has been much the same. This universal sense of right, or justice, then, is the inward spiritual light or "grace" which, according to the Scripture-writer, "bringeth salvation" and "hath appeared unto all men, teaching them that they should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world."

While this light of itself does not show people fully what religious creed to believe, its tendency the world over is to bring mankind to the love and practice of righteousness. It brings condemnation for sin, and through condemnation works humiliation, repentance, and final amendment of life. And conversion through the instrumentality of the inward light progresses as the selfishness of human nature is slain, and as there is a yielding to the highest sense of right under all the trials of life.

But this gradual conversion through obedience from a bad to a good life appears to be almost lost sight of in this day, when so many things are done in a hurry by steam; but it should be remembered that "the mills of God grind slowly," and that it is a difficult thing to purge the badness all away from human nature by any quick steam-process. If we look out into the world, we may find great numbers who will tell of the day and the hour when they were "converted," and yet they seem all the time running over with the little and larger tricks of selfishness; they are not humble; they are not merciful; they are not peacemakers; they do not unto others as they would have others do unto them. In short, they seem almost entirely destitute of those qualities which were so conspicuous in the life of the great Nazarene. Yet they satisfy their consciences with the conclusion that they have been "converted."

It would be really healthy, if some people could conclude that the sudden change of feeling which is frequently called conversion, is nothing more than an experience which comes up under certain conditions, and that, if this experience does not lift people out of their selfishness and make them live purer lives, it amounts to nothing to them.

While this universal sense of right to them is certainly a light and a guide, it may not be entirely infallible in all the complications of life. Persons may be very desirous to do right, and yet under some circumstances they may hardly know what would be best. But I think the plan of the world in all its departments is one that is calculated to promote growth and progress, and it may not always be against man's final spiritual welfare to blunder and suffer under the impressive lessons of experience.

We know that reason is a guide in regard to temporal duties, but it is hardly infallible in any, for the wisest are sometimes mistaken. The best thing for all is to use what intellectual light they have, that it may grow stronger by exercise. The man who looks wholly to intellectual authorities for counsel, instead of to his own judgment and experience, will never be much of an authority himself. So the greatest spiritual lights of the world have undoubtedly been those who have risen entirely above the bondage to authority, and through the light in their own souls have searched after truth for themselves.

This inward light, in its operations upon most minds at least, does not reveal the facts of future existence; but it is saying in all men: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." Certainly those who live up to the best light which God has given them in this life have the best grounds for trusting themselves to his fatherly care for the life which may be to come.

The Church of Rome places infallibility in the Pope, and therefore necessarily denies the authority of the inward light and the right of private judgment in spiritual matters. The Protestant Church, without apparently knowing it, is about as fully committed to the doctrine of infallibility as the Church of Rome. Whenever any Church holds up certain articles of faith, as absolute truth, and demands that they shall be believed, without being questioned, and without being tried by proper evidence, it has planted itself squarely on the platform of infallibility. And it makes no difference whether the creed is dictated by the Pope, by an Evangelical Alliance, or by the pastor of some isolated congregation.

It is difficult to conceive to the full extent what a power a church may be for the crushing out of free-thought and for the perpetuation of mental slavery, when it claims to dictate infallible truth, and threatens all who do not believe with the vengeance of eternal fire. It is to be hoped, however, that in every conflict superstition may be weakened and the right may make some advance towards victory, and that finally humanity may be united together in the great brotherhood of one universal religion, in which the inward light, the voice of reason, and the demonstrations of science will all harmonize and work together for the highest good of the human race.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MR. ABBOT:—

I have to-day, for the first time, read your interesting journal, THE INDEX. Being a busy family man, I have not of late years attended public lectures, or sought communion with the progressive spirits of the age, as much as formerly; but my reading has been of the solid, scientific, and historic works of great modern writers. The investigations and discoveries of this age go far to confirm my early conclusions respecting religion. I am now upwards of fifty years old, and great is my joy that I found the right way even in boyhood. My grandfathers and one of my great-grandfathers were Universalists. Their instruction did much to open my mind for the reception of light and liberty. If the revivals of my youthful days disgusted me, they now astonish me more than offend my experienced mind. Our noted Evangelists are calling on us to "come to Christ," believe their creeds, ignore all science, all logic, all reason, and have faith, against common sense; that the Bible is an infallible book; that a certain earnest free-thinker of Galilee was a god to be worshipped; and that a handful of over-zealous enthusiasts in Christendom are the only conservators of true religion; and (worse than all) that, unless we all do just as they direct, and become "born again," we shall go to hell.

This is certainly a disgraceful sight to witness in such an age as this, unless we keep constantly in view that men are only civilized apes.

But I wish to be respectful to opponents. I heard Theodore Parker's sermons and lectures, though not one of his disciples. How glad it made my soul to hear him declare his unbelief in the miracles described in the Bible! Mr. Cook mystifies Parker's idea of Jesus. Parker said in his lectures at the Melodeon, that Jesus was nothing more than other men, although he might have had an extraordinary power of healing by his touch, as had been the case with certain other persons. Mr. Parker was ever trying to discover scientific truth. He once attended a little gathering at the lodgings of Andrew Jackson Davis. I was present, and some eight or ten other friends. Davis described his discoveries of spirits in the upper air. Mr. Parker asked Davis what sort of clothing the spirits wore. Davis was slow to describe it; and Parker asked if they had on "jackets and trousers." At this Davis seemed a little disturbed, and remarked that it was no great matter what they wore; "but," said he, "they had light, airy robes about them, and they dwelt upon the top of the ether that surrounds the earth." Of all this Mr. Parker seemed incredulous. Yet he was willing to listen and investigate. He evidently did not believe in spirits at all. I never could determine what sort of life Parker expected in a future state.

Theology has been over-practiced in the world as a means of acquiring power and wealth. As long as it is made a profession and a trade, so long will superstition and idolatry be preached. Converts often confront my arguments with the assertions that they don't need to reason about religion, for God speaks directly to their souls, and holds communion with them, and tells them what is true and what is false. Is this superstition, or is it insanity, or both? Indeed our communion with Nature is communion with Deity, which, as the moral poet sings:—

"Lives in our souls, informs our mortal part,
As full, as perfect in a hair as heart,
As full, as perfect in a vile man that mourns,
As the rapt seraph that adores and burns."

But there can be no miraculous intercourse between God and man any more than between him and brutes or trees. The stupendous theories of Providence erected by schoolmen in past ages have nearly faded out. Plagues, earthquakes, and misfortunes are seldom considered dispensations, as they were in Cotton Mather's time. But still much of the old leaven of folly inheres in certain creeds. The success of Moody and Sankey consists in their appealing to the affections of unsophisticated people, especially youth and the female sex, unaccustomed to reason for themselves. And by not denouncing any trade or profession, by not requiring any good past record in their converts, by not using any arguments or investigation respecting their doctrines, they attract all classes of weak minds; even the base and criminal look to them for fellowship. This cannot be of permanent benefit; for the converted will soon discover that they have been cheated and duped into unreasonable conduct. Fear of hell is not a high and effectual inducement to become good and noble characters. Moody and Sankey should preach righteousness for its own sake, truth because God is truth, virtue because that alone is happiness, temperance because licentiousness is death, faith not in myths of the dark ages, but in honor, honesty, brotherly love, forgiveness of injuries, justice. When people see plainly that a virtuous life pays best, they will become properly converted and born again.

AN ISRAELITE'S PROTEST AGAINST CHRISTIAN PROSELYTISM.

ATLANTA, Ga., March 31, 1877.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—Enclosed is a letter (one of the many I and my friends are troubled with) and some tracts, which came from one of your "brethren in the flesh" whose tender heart at New Brunswick, N. J., was touched with compassion for my poor soul at Atlanta, Ga. It may be of some spiritual benefit for you to peruse it. And perhaps you will be able to tell me why such "Christian" friends evince so little self-esteem and so little respect for the feelings of their fellow-men.

NEW BRUNSWICK, March 8, 1877.

REV. H. GERSONI:

My dear Israelite,—May I ask you why you are still clinging to your present belief? It is but a shell, and the kernel is taken out of it.

You may ask the reasons.

I. The sceptic has departed from Judah.

II. The number of weeks prophesied by Daniel were fulfilled at the time Christ was upon the earth, which would prove that he had come.

III. And when the Messiah came, the sacrifice on the altar was to cease, and there are other proofs to show that the Messiah has come.

But what I desire to impress upon your mind, my dear friend, is the necessity of a sacrifice. To be without a sacrifice is to be without one to bear the weight of your sins, of which the law is the criterion by which to judge. Man has the guilty nature of Adam, and how can he stand free at the bar of God without a sacrifice?

Your fathers had sacrifices by which they were made perfect in the sight of God, and that was effectual if that they believed in the coming of Christ who was to be the real sacrifice of which their sacrifice was a type. Therefore they were rendered just through faith in the sacrifices of animals, believing it to be a type of the coming sacrifice—the Savior—the Christ—the Son of God.

But now there is no altar fire; there are no sacrificial victims—the types of the true Lamb of God; yet you are compelled to do something. It will not be policy to wait until the time is at hand when you will be compelled to stand before the Judgment Seat of God, to answer for the many sins for which you have no sacrifice. For you must either build your fires upon the altar and sacrifice (but that will not be effectual, for the time of the types has passed away and the Lamb of God was sacrificed upon the cross), or you must accept Christ as your sacrifice. He is willing to accept you now in your present condition, and will wash away every stain of sin; so that when you die you will be sanctified and accepted of Jehovah as perfect.

Let this matter not be postponed, but settle it now.

The Holy Spirit is knocking at the door of your heart, now asking you to resign yourself to the Master—through the one sacrifice of Christ. There is only one way by which you may avoid the wrath of an angry God, and that way is through the blood of Christ, which was shed for all those who will believe.

Turn not, turn not your back to this call of grace. In whatever direction you may go, you will meet the same manifestations of the displeasure of God, which reaches its climax in the torments of hell.

Stop and think and pray to God earnestly for direction, lest you be turned aside from the way—the only way to a reconciled Jehovah!

Come, dear friend, do not delay. Christ's is the true, the loving way.

Your well-wisher,

C. W. HIGGINS.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.

Who gave that fellow Higgins and his "pals" the right to impose upon my time with his incoherent, gibberish? By what human, or divine, or devilish authority do they presume to pry on the matter of conscience between me and my God, and to force upon me the spectre of their mediæval ignorance, all blazing with the flames of hell and steaming with gore,—not the hell and the gore of a divine revelation (for such things could never be), but those which the ancestors of Higgins & Co. have created here on earth for my persecuted race, and which their worthy descendants are doing their utmost to keep alive?

There is not an instance in social and civilized life but we Israelites try to show to the world that we are ready to forget, that we have forgiven long ago, all the injustice we have suffered from the Gentiles. But like the Alaka of the Bible, whose progeny can never be satisfied, the miserable tools of a degrading and senseless theogony are incessantly at work with their devilish foolishness to stir the old wounds, to drip fresh poison into the healing scars.

Talk about the aggressive efforts which an ipse idem hierarchy is making against the liberal institutions of this land,—talk about the injustice which courts of justice and institutions of equity, imbued with the delusive frenzy of Christian theogony, are perpetrating almost daily against the rational and the liberal-minded! What will you say to those religious monomaniacs who, not satisfied with having turned their churches into nurseries of delirium tremens, endeavor to carry their influence into the quiet study of a man who knows them not, who has not the least desire to know them?

If I feel indignant about this matter, it is because I consider it a burning disgrace to humanity that they should be encouraged by Americans. Do not Americans maintain these "conversion" societies? Do they not uphold the tract societies which publish the enclosed trash? Do they not send them broadcast over the land and thus rock the masses into the sleep of ignorance and exclusiveness, instead of endeavoring to elevate them to higher thoughts and more dignified conceptions? As to the fellows Higgins & Co., who honor the Jewish ministers with their precious missives,—it is simply ridiculous that those who have perhaps never seen how the original of the Bible looks, should tell Hebrew scholars the meaning of Jewish legends written in the Hebrew tongue; that they should presume to tell a Jewish minister, "Your present belief is but a shell, the kernel of which is taken out of it."

May this my protest rouse all those who are troubled by the same parasites (and I know that almost every rational thinker and every Israelite are imposed upon in the same manner) to lay their cause before a generous American audience, and may it lead to the result of having the disgraceful stain washed away from the face of this "land of the free."

Respectfully yours,

HENRY GERSONI.

OBITUARY.

Died in Syracuse, N. Y., March 5th, in the eighty-second year of his age, Mr. ABRAHAM MILLS, father of C. D. B. and W. R. Mills, of Syracuse, and of Hon. H. A. Mills, of Mt. Carroll, Ill.—the last named gentleman well known to the readers of THE INDEX as one of its most earnest friends, and a staunch advocate of freethought generally.

Mr. Mills was formerly a clergyman in the Presbyterian Church, and in the old years, when the anti-slavery conflict was in progress, stood early and late among the devoted champions of the American slave. He cooperated earnestly with Beriah Green, Gerrit Smith, and others of like stamp, and the work wrought by these tireless, intrepid apostles, especially in Central New York, had much to do with the amelioration, the transformation even, of the general sentiment with regard to slavery, that opened the way for the significant events that have followed. Of strong polarity to truth and right, he was the fast friend of humanity universal, and he never ceased to regard with deep interest and cordial fellowship whatever enterprise sought sincerely and faithfully to promote the welfare of man.

In the latter years of his life, withdrawn as he has been from active service, he has not lost in the least his sympathy with human kind, or his love for its progress. Although he never perhaps outgrew fully the limitations of early theological education, yet his eye was ever opening to the broader recognitions of religious truth in our time, and he felt a lively interest in the discussions now going forward in behalf of freedom and growth in religion.

With the sterner qualities of a man, such as gave him a high, upstanding character, an exactitude and rigor of moral requirement, he united in fine blending the susceptibilities which mark and distinguish woman; he had deep tenderness, sympathy, and a warm, magnanimous love. Gentle, generous, kindly to all, he was ever one of the most genial and attractive of men, loving and loved by all.

The writer can never forget the signal patience and fortitude, the oblivion of self and tender consideration for others, that he exhibited in his last sickness, a sickness which at times brought sufferings the most excruciating and intense that flesh can bear. The gentle soul never lost its sweetness, trust, and generous love. It was an honorable, brave, victorious life, victorious in its day and in its gloaming and its close.

The record is laid up on high and can never fade away. It is inscribed in humanity and there it shall live. Fare thee well, thou loved and honored one, thou most kind, magnanimous parent, thou loving father, thou noble, universal friend! To the keeping of the infinite Truth and Love in death, as in life, we may most confidently commit thee. Peace to thy soul, and blessings ever on thy hallowed name and memory!

SYRACUSE, N. Y., April, 1877.

Sanctuary of Superstition.

ENGAGED.—The Triune God is engaged in your salvation. God is not going to compel you to serve him. Your money will never buy you a ticket for heaven. Prodigal, won't you return? Let the Lord have your soul to-night. He will make you happy to all eternity; but you must pray. God will come to meet you to-night and will fall on your neck.—Hammond, the Revivalist, at Harrisburg, Pa., February, 1876.

DABBLED IN ATONEMENT BLOOD.—I look a little forward, and behold you are at the judgment. Yes, you are there in murderous blood; the mark is on you,—it's on your feet! How hard you trod Him down, when you treated with contempt His salvation! Oh, how dabbled in Atonement blood you are! As these blood-spotted multitudes are made to face retribution, I seem to see restrained lightning grow restless and fiery. Oh, how its forkedness shoots out like adders' tongues,—lurid and red, all tremulous with charged damnation, as if in haste to be avenged on that spotted throng! How Atonement blood on feet stirs the vials of wrath.—"Shocks from the Battery": a volume of Sermons by Rev. B. Pomeroy, of the Troy M. E. Conference, published in 1869.

A CATHOLIC CIRCULAR.—

LOUISE LATEAU.

HER STIGMAS AND ECSTASY.

AN ESSAY

ADDRESSED TO JEWS AND CHRISTIANS OF EVERY DENOMINATION.

BY DR. AUGUSTUS ROHLING.

Translated from the German for the "Catholic Review," by Very Rev. W. Walsh, D. D., Professor of Moral and Dogmatic Theology in St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, Ireland.

This is one of the most remarkable books which has been issued from the press for many years.

Over EIGHTY THOUSAND copies of the German edition have been sold in Europe alone. It has created the profoundest sensation in Berlin, Paris and London, and the so-called scientists have endeavored to get rid of its inconvenient facts by sneers.

Amongst others who have been challenged to examine this miracle was Professor Virchow of Berlin. He has found it convenient to decline. "One is tempted to believe," says an eminent authority, "that Professor Virchow scented the possibility of something supernatural, and, with the instinct of his kind, he shrunk from going and seeing! He was frightened lest, like Dr. Klapp, of Hanover, he might be converted."

Every man and woman and child in America should read the marvellous history of Louise Lateau. Every Catholic should read it, and should lend it to non-Catholic friends.

Every Protestant should read it.

Every Jew should read it.

Who is Louise Lateau?

She is a living monument of the Passion of Christ, the stigmas of whose Passion she bears, having on her head marks of the CROWN OF THORNS, of the NAILS piercing the hands and feet, of the LANCE transfixing the side, of the mark of the CROSS on the shoulders.

These marks, wonderful as they are, are the least astonishing fact of her marvellous life.

Her ecstasy and its wonderful events are still more extraordinary. What these are may be learned in this book.

This history was originally prepared by Dr. Rohling of Münster, who, exiled by Minister Bismarck, is now a professor in Archbishop Henni's great seminary, Milwaukee.

It was translated and edited by the eminent Dr. Walsh, Professor of Theology in Maynooth College, Ireland. Dr. Walsh personally examined the miracle, and edited and annotated this account for the Catholic Review.

It is now republished as a Catholic tract, single copies twenty-five cents, fifty copies $10, one hundred copies $15.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent. On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1873.
 To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
 Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEVENS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tena-ly, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

PUBLICATIONS INDEX TRACTS.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

Freedom and Fellowship in Religion. A volume of ten essays upon speculative and practical problems of religion, by D. A. Wasson, Samuel Longfellow, Samuel Johnson, John Weiss, W. J. Potter, F. E. Abbot, O. B. Frothingham, J. W. Chadwick, T. W. Higginson, and Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Fifth Annual Meeting, 1872. 35 cents. (Four or more, 35 cents each.) Contains essays by J. W. Chadwick on "Liberty and the Church in America," by C. D. B. Mills on "Religion as the Expression of a Permanent Sentiment of the Human Mind," and by O. B. Frothingham on "The Religion of Humanity," with addresses by Rowland Connor, Celia Burleigh, Lucretia Mott, A. B. Alcott, C. A. Bartol, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loos, and others.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. 35 cents. (Four or more, 35 cents each.) Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. 35 cents. (Four or more, 35 cents each.) Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Galtrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. 40 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Reason and Revelation, by William J. Potter. 10 cents: ten for 50 cents; one hundred, $3.00.

For series of important Tracts see last page of THE INDEX.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited. Orders by mail may be addressed either "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston," or to the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyses the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX, A Weekly Journal

DEVOTED TO
FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE
INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT
 No. 231 Washington Street, Boston.

EDITOR:
 FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:
 O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 W. H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, England.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tena-ly, N.Y.

THE INDEX aims—
 To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.
 The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.
 Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.
 The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. ## A NEW QUARTERLY.

PROSPECTUS.

The want has been long felt in this country, by a large and growing class of thinking people, of a periodical publication serving the same purpose here that the Fortnightly and Contemporary Reviews serve so well in England. The progressive portion of our population demands some adequate literary vehicle for the carriage and diffusion of the most radical thought of our time. To meet this want, and in the hope that such demand may prove competent to maintain its object when once provided with it, it is proposed to issue, on May 1, 1877—or as soon thereafter as circumstances shall warrant,—the first number of a quarterly periodical, to be called

"THE RADICAL REVIEW."

The success or failure of this project will depend upon the more or less encouraging reception which its announcement shall meet with from the public previous to the date mentioned. Believing that involving, as it does, the basis of property, the principles of finance, and the organization of industry, and determining, in its settlement, directly the material, and indirectly the mental and spiritual condition of the people,—demands immediate consideration by the best minds, it is the intention of the management of the proposed Review, in selecting its contents, to give the preference largely to articles aimed at the solution of this disputed problem. While so doing, however, it will not exclude, but welcome rather, the proper presentation of all sides of all subjects pertaining to human welfare, whether social, economic, scientific, literary, aesthetic, or religious; prompted to this course by a firm faith in the omnipotence of Truth. It is hoped that the size of the Review, and the infrequency of its issue, will furnish opportunity for thoroughness of treatment, not afforded hitherto to the majority of competent exponents of radical ideas; but, while most of its articles will be of the weighty character peculiar to the best review literature, poetry and the lighter features of the monthly magazine will not be disregarded. To book reviews, large space will be devoted.

The editor and publisher avails himself with pleasure of the permission granted him by the following persons, to announce them as probable contributors; to which list he hopes to make important additions hereafter:—

John Weiss, John Fluke, Edmund C. Stedman, Sidney H. Morse, Octavius B. Frothingham, J. N. Larned, Lyander Spooner, Ezra H. Heywood, B. F. Underwood, Samuel Johnson, J. Stahl Patterson, Prof. E. S. Morse, John W. Chadwick, B. W. Ball, Joel A. Allen, Mrs. E. M. F. Denton, Dyer D. Lum, Stephen Pearl Andrews, Wm. J. Potter, Chas. D. B. Mills, John Orvis, Chas. W. Buck, Francis E. Abbot, Wm. Hanson, Howard N. Brown, Samuel Longfellow, Abram W. Stevens, Cyrus A. Bartol, Joseph H. Allen, John H. Clifford, J. K. Ingalls.

Each number will contain two hundred or more octavo pages, well printed on good paper. A limited number of book and other literary advertisements will be received at low rates.

Any person wishing to encourage this enterprise by subscription may notify the publisher to that effect, whereupon he will receive a printed blank, which, when signed and returned to the publisher, will bind the signer to forward the price of subscription as soon as informed that the success of the venture is assured.

Terms per annum, post-paid, $5.00.

—OF THE—

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

ATTRACTIVE ORNAMENT

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seat, but not to vote, in the Annual Congress.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues; conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church; in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT: PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.
SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

MOODY AND SANKEY have closed their thirteen weeks' meetings in this city; and Boston's intellectual neck is not yet broken!

THE MINNEAPOLIS Liberal League sent out an address to the people of Minnesota on the Governor's late proclamation of a day of fasting and prayer to avert the grasshoppers. It is a rich document, and will be given to our readers next week.

SIGNATURES to the Religious Freedom Amendment petition have been received as follows since our last issue: from Mrs. Almira L. Tracy, Peterboro, N. Y., 248 names; from Ingersoll Lockwood, Esq., New York City, 27; from Mr. George F. Ransom, Cleveland, Ohio, 31; from Mr. D. Q. Curry, Decatur, Mich., 79; from M. A. Blanchard, Esq., Portland, Me., 144. Total number thus far received, 4,836.

THE Independent incautiously admits that "numbering the additions to the churches is the best way of numbering the converts." We commend to its prayerful attention this anecdote from its own columns: "I am convinced that the world is daily growing better," remarked the reverend gentleman to a brother clergyman; "my congregation is constantly increasing." "Yes," interrupted the brother, who happened to be a penitentiary chaplain, "and so is mine." And there the discussion on the early arrival of the millennium dropped.

MR. FROTHINGHAM's new book, The Cradle of the Christ, an account of which by the New York Tribune we republished in THE INDEX of April 5, discusses the origin of the New Testament, especially of the four gospels, from a purely literary point of view, and gives information which we have often been asked where to find. It is quite unnecessary to mention the charms of Mr. Frothingham's style; they are too well known to the readers of this journal. But this book ought to be widely known, as a distinguished thinker's treatment of a scholarly problem.

THE FOLLOWING is from the Pasadena City Herald of April 7, and refers to the Religious Freedom Petition: "There is but one test, in fact, which is universally applicable—the test of life. He who makes the best husband, father, and citizen, who is governed by high aims and noble impulses may believe what he pleases without molestation. He who overruns with love to the neighbor cannot be far out of the way in his love for God. We have before us a petition to totally eradicate sectarian teaching from our public schools. We want to prevent any possibility of any union of Church and State. We want no Protestant country, no Catholic country. We want a universal country, in fact, free from all sectarian influences and where the mind of the child and adult shall be free. We have a petition to this effect to be presented to the next Congress already numerous signed. Those who wish may sign by calling at this office during the next three days."

THE BOSTON Congregationalist rejoices over a "debt-paying revival" on the Pacific coast; and the New York Observer urges a movement along the whole line upon church debts, taking advantage of the same means. Now we profoundly respect every honest attempt to pay a debt, though it is better to keep out of debt. But we do not respect the profession of tender concern for the salvation of converts, when the real concern is how to get dollars out of their pockets to pay church-debts with; and that, if we understand it, is exactly what a "debt-paying revival" means.

THE New York Daily Witness of March 22 crustily remarked: "The Sun says Robert Ingersoll dined with the President on Sunday. This is, we suppose, the blatant atheist whose advocacy was a reproach to the Republican party, and, if the report be true, which we doubt, we cannot help deeply regretting that President Hayes should entertain any such company. 'Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful.'" The Republicans were glad enough to have Col. Ingersoll's aid in prosecuting the Presidential campaign; but, now that their candidate is in the White House, they (or the dominant Orthodox portion of them) growl at the "blatant atheist" who does not know enough to keep in the background. "Equal rights in religion" are not likely to be made a part either of the Republican or the Democratic platform. But then the people do not care very much for equal rights in religion. It is only a few impracticables like the editor of THE INDEX who think such rights worth troubling oneself to secure. As to the future of religious equality, or the causes which are steadily rendering the demand for it more and more chimerical, there is not a statesman in the country who occupies his thought about a problem so absurd.

THE Pall Mall Gazette published this paragraph lately: "A strange story comes from the north of Spain. A moribund landed proprietor, notwithstanding the entreaties of his family and friends, refused to receive the consolations of religion. His family, thinking they had overcome his scruples, sent for the parish priest; but upon his arrival the sick man declined to receive him, and the priest withdrew, declaring that the devil would come in person to carry off so hardened a sinner as soon as he was dead. A few hours afterward the sick man died, and, while the family were watching over the body, the door of the room was opened with a great noise, and there appeared upon the scene a personage arrayed in red, brandishing a pitchfork, dragging a long tail after him, and smelling very strongly of sulphur. His appearance created so much terror that the women present fainted and the men rushed out of the room by another door. A man-servant, hearing the screams, and thinking that thieves had broken into the house, armed himself with a revolver, and made his way to the room from whence they proceeded. For a moment, he, too, was terrified by the appearance of 'the devil,' who by this time had got the body in his arms; but, mastering his fears, he fired three barrels of his revolver at him, and the supposed devil, who fell to the ground, proved to be the parish sexton, disguised as Satan. He was quite dead when picked up, and four priests, who are suspected of complicity in this attempt to work upon the superstitious feelings of the family of the deceased, have been taken into custody."

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

Thoughts Suggested by an Easter Sermon.

BY CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

The sermon in question is entitled "The Resurrection," and is founded on a passage in Paul's first letter to the Corinthians; namely, "If Christ be not raised your faith is vain." In most respects this discourse resembles the hundreds of others which are annually preached on the day called "Easter Sunday," but it contains one concession rarely expressed by clergymen, the introduction of which may make the discourse worth commenting on. The preacher says: "Our faith in the event commemorated by this Easter day is a historical faith, and we need not fear to go back to examine its foundations. Let us see who testify directly to the resurrection, and if their testimony is worthy of credence." This is a fair and reasonable proposition, and it seems a pity that most clergymen discourage, instead of favoring, scrutiny of the kind referred to. Indeed, the preacher of this very sermon does nothing but quote and insist upon such parts of the documentary evidence as seem to favor his theory. Yet, as he invites examination, we will look at some other aspects of the matter.

The first witnesses appealed to by the preacher are "the women" (Mary Magdalene and the other Mary) who are said to have visited the sepulchre early Sunday morning, and of whose visit four different and diverse accounts are given in the four gospels. These narratives, to some extent conflicting with each other, are the only documentary evidence in regard to what the women in question saw and heard. The inquiries first in importance then are: Who gives us these statements about the women? Who wrote the four gospel narratives? and, How soon after the events described were they written?

Somebody, we know not who, has labelled these narratives the Gospels "according to" Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John; which may mean either that they were written by those persons, or written on information or tradition derived from them. Inquiring more minutely as to authorship, we find good evidence that Matthew the Apostle wrote a life of Jesus; but the same evidence proves incontestably that the document he wrote is not the one now in our Bibles. The Hebrew gospel of Matthew is lost, probably beyond recovery. It may or may not have been used (nobody knows) in preparing our version of the gospel "according to Matthew," which nobody pretends to have been written earlier than thirty years after the crucifixion. Luke, writing at least as long after, tells us plainly that his narrative is a collection of testimony gathered from various quarters. The gospel "according to John" is, confessedly, of much later date, and the testimony gathered in regard to it in the last half century seems to show conclusively that if John the Apostle wrote the book called "Revelation," he did not write the fourth gospel. Moreover, the later critical scrutiny just referred to shows increased probability; first, that all these gospels were written much later than has heretofore been assumed, and next, that none of them were written by eye-witnesses of the events therein narrated.

In spite of the evidence to this effect brought out by modern criticism, which was, no doubt, accessible to the preacher if he had cared to look for it, he goes on to affirm: "No event in the history of the world is so well authenticated as this event which Christendom to-day celebrates. The concise histories of Tacitus are not so trustworthy. The accounts of Livy and Herodotus are less reliable."

I will not be so cruel as to hold the reverend gentleman to the precise terms of the above extravagant statement. I will not suppose him really to mean that we do not know "so well" the facts about the French and American revolutions, the defeat of Napoleon at Waterloo and his death at St. Helena, as we know the restoration to life of the dead body of Jesus. I will take what he meant instead of what he said, and accept his contrast of the gospel narratives with the writings of Livy and Tacitus. Let us look at some of the circumstances.

We know who Livy and Tacitus were, and when and where they lived. We know about the time when their respective histories were written; there is no question of the authenticity of those books, nor of the competence of their authors for that work. There is no reason to doubt that Livy and Tacitus inquired more or less carefully, and wrote according to the best of their knowledge and belief; and there is contemporary evidence to confirm most of their statements. Nevertheless, our confidence in their intelligence, their accuracy, and their honesty of purpose does not lead us to accept everything they said as true. When Livy says that, on a certain occasion, an ox spoke ("locutus bos"), we do not believe it. Nobody now believes it. Even the people who accept the speaking of Balaam's ass do not accept that of Livy's ox. They reject it promptly, on general principles, without thinking it worth the trouble of particular inquiry or critical examination; and this even while admitting that Livy probably believed it.

What is the standard of discrimination in this case? What is the rule by which, admitting Livy's general trustworthiness, we unhesitatingly reject certain parts of his testimony? The rule seems to be this,—that, the more extraordinary the statement, the fuller, more abundant, more minute, must be the evidence. Livy's bare statement is enough to assure us about an insurrection, a war, a famine, an imperial succession; but when it comes to articulate language uttered by an ox—something contrary not only to all our experience but to the most enlightened estimate of possibility,—there we stop; we feel it needful to inquire if there was any evidence in the case beyond common rumor; and, further, if any circumstances explain how Livy, or the Roman people in his time, could possibly credit such a thing.

Of the ox's speaking we find no evidence that came to Livy other than common rumor, a ground which we see to be quite insufficient to substantiate it; but inquiry shows us plainly how Livy and the Roman people of his time could believe it. The religion in which they were educated—a religion, dissent from which was thought impious, and was certainly dangerous to the questioner—assumed the reality of many things which we now see to have been impossible. So that generation, on theological grounds, accepted the speaking of the ox, just as our generation, while utterly discrediting that, accept, on similar grounds, the speaking of Balaam's ass; each generation accepting the affirmations of its own priesthood, without regard to evidence, or probability, or even possibility.

Returning now to the testimony of the women in regard to a resurrection of the body of Jesus, we find that they occupied, theologically, a position exactly parallel to that of Livy; they had been educated in the belief that miraculous restorations from death to life had repeatedly occurred. The records of their religion were full of miracle, and the coming of such things into their own experience, however startling, had nothing incredible about it. So when, on going to the sepulchre, they found it open and empty, and when, inquiring for the body, they were told that it had come to life and gone away, they had no difficulty in believing; neither had they any difficulty in assuming that this news, told them by "a young man," according to the second gospel, or by "two men," according to the third, was told by an angel, as the first gospel declared, or by two angels, according to the fourth. Their theology assumed, as a matter of course, that angels might at any time appear to men, and talk with them; and it was from traditions handed down from this sort of persons, holding this sort of theological belief, that the narratives which we call gospels were compiled, from thirty to sixty years later. Clearly, for evidence of something so intensely improbable as the coming to life of a dead body, we need something more to the purpose than what, thirty or forty years after, was reported by unknown persons to have been said by "the women," thirty or forty years before.

The next point made by our preacher is that Peter, James, Thomas, and the rest of the apostles believed this resurrection doctrine so firmly that they were willing to die for it. If this were an argument at all, it would prove too much, for Julian the Apostate, Hypatia, Servetus, Giordano Bruno, were equally willing to die for their widely different beliefs. But it has no force as an argument. Firmness of belief is not in the least a security for soundness of belief. As a matter of fact, here in New England as well as in India and China, unwavering theological belief springs from credulity far oftener than from intelligent conviction, and most of the vast variety of beliefs are held without evidence, though the believers are ready to die for their faith.

"But Paul too," says our preacher, "believed in an Easter day most strongly; and Paul was a sharp reasoner, a clear thinker, and an acute logician." Yes, both these points may be admitted, exceptions excepted in the latter. Paul was a firm believer and a very great man; but he could not escape from the circumstances and influences of his time; and he, like "the women," was so prepossessed by belief in miracle as to have felt, like them, no need of scrutiny in regard to evidence. Paul was a very great man; but his reasoning was sometimes unsound, his quotations from Hebrew Scripture were sometimes incorrect, and sometimes inapplicable to the matter in hand, and his confidence in the Hebrew idea of Messiahship was so overmastering that he could not help interweaving it with the character and the mission of Jesus, in spite of the fact that the life, the teachings, and the death of Jesus were irreconcilable with the chief features of that idea. Most Christians, reading the New Testament through "in course," finishing the four gospels and the Acts of the Apostles before coming to Paul's epistles, and not noticing the dates of these works and the chronological order of their succession, suppose the expressions of Paul to be confirmatory of what had been thoroughly established at first hand in the Gospels and the Acts; whereas, in fact, the confident and oft-repeated assumption in Paul's epistles that Jesus was both "Christ" and "Lord," being written and circulated years before the first five books in the New Testament were written, was no doubt the chief determining cause of so much of the assumption of the Messiahship of Jesus as appears in those five books. There can be no doubt that to Paul, much more than to Jesus, is due the authorship of what is now called Christianity. How he persuaded himself of it remains a mystery; but being so persuaded, he had force of character enough to impress that idea upon his contemporaries, whose traditions, echoing his assumption, gave rise in succeeding years to those records which have ever since been accepted as truth and law. We need better evidence of the resurrection of the body of Jesus than Paul's acceptance of it, under Paul's circumstances.

As our preacher insists so strongly on the sharp reasoning, the clear thinking, the acute logic of Paul, it may be well to look, in passing, at one of the many instances where Paul's rhetoric got the better of his logic. In regard to the very subject we are here considering, Paul says to his Corinthian converts, "If Christ be not risen then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain." Is that really so? Surely he preached, and they believed, something else besides the resurrection of the body of Jesus. So far as that preaching and that belief regarded God, and duty, and responsibility, and retribution, the doctrine of repentance as illustrated by "the prodigal son," and of loving helpfulness to one's neighbor as illustrated by "the good Samaritan," they were quite independent of the resurrection doctrine. Those ideas are just as good, just as true, just as needful to be preached and believed and acted on without a resurrection of Jesus as with it; and even immortality, if the resurrection of Jesus were sufficient to prove it, had long before been proved by the revival of Lazarus, of the daughter of Jairus, and of the son of the widow of Nain, not to speak of the more ancient instances in Old Testament history. Immortality was not first brought to light by Jesus. Socrates and Plato taught it before him. Neither was he, as Paul says, "the first fruits of them that slept." The cases just referred to had previously given the same sort and the same amount of demonstration, if the records in the two Testaments may be relied on. But the argument has no more soundness than the assumption. The revival of a dead body would not prove the immortality of even its own soul, still less of the souls whose bodies rotted in the earth without rising. The doctrine of immortality rests on other and better reasons, though even these do not amount to demonstration.

Our preacher, rivaling Paul in extravagance of statement, speaks of early Christianity as "the religion whose chief article of belief was in a risen Lord." Is that so? We had supposed that to be meek, to be merciful, to be peaceful, to be pure, to be honest, to be helpful, to seek righteousness, to stand fast in liberty, to turn away from all evil and follow after all good, were parts of the doctrine of Jesus and of Paul, and parts quite as important as any others. But our preacher is so much in the habit of exaggeration, and so much in bondage to the letter, that he even adopts, for himself and his comfortable New England hearers, the saying of Paul that if in this life only he and his brethren had hope in Christ, they were of all men most miserable. Paul had good reason for saying so. His doctrine, in that age, brought upon him not only general reproach and contempt, but persecution as bitter as any human being was ever subjected to, proceeding both from the government and the people, and including serious danger to limbs and life in every public address and every private gathering of Christians. Now, on the contrary, the public profession of Christianity brings a man not only higher respect and esteem in general, but more custom in the way of his trade or profession and a better chance of election to offices of honor and profit. At the present day, one great danger and misfortune to the Church is that its high estimation in the community tempts unworthy men to pretend piety to gain the worldly advantage of church-membership. Yet, none the less, the cant of revivalism constantly assumes that "to profess Christ" is to take up the cross, to make enormous sacrifices, to become as the offscouring of all things, etc., etc.

Another of the ingenious methods of our preacher, as of his class of proselyters generally, is to assume that "the resurrection story be not literally true, it is "a lie," "a monstrous fable," "a horrible lie," "a gross falsehood," "an imposture," "a baseless fabrication," "a gigantic fraud," "a grand imposture." And he tries to persuade his hearers that if they decline to accept this latter repulsive theory, they must needs accept the former; must inevitably admit that a dead body first returned to life, and then, having proved its restoration by walking, talking, and eating, ascended through the air, beyond the sight of the gazing disciples.

Our preacher goes still further in this sort of attempt to compel assent to his doctrine. He represents that, if the resurrection narrative be not literally true, Jesus himself must be regarded as "a worthless impostor!"

Why does our preacher pertinaciously refuse to admit—why does he try so hard to prevent his hearers from suspecting—the possibility of mistake in this matter, without fraudulent intention? Why does he not present, in explanation of the way such mistake may probably have occurred, the fact, admitted by commentators of his own sort, and printed in their editions of the New Testament, that the gospels were not written till many years after the events narrated, giving opportunity for large traditional modification of them, and supplying mythical features in current rumor, which might honestly be selected for record by persons whose whole religious culture had been saturated with mythological beliefs? Does he consciously venture upon the risk and the guilt of making false assumptions, or have the peculiarities of his theological training so confused his mind that the confident assumptions of his church seem to him equivalent to fact and evidence? Probably the latter supposition is the more correct, as well as the more charitable, of the two.

I will give but one more specimen of our preacher's quality. He sums up the doctrine of his Easter sermon by saying of Jesus—"If he is not an impostor, all that he has done and said is strictly true,"—meaning by this first that all which, thirty years or more after his death, was gathered from current rumor in regard to his sayings and doings was correct and accurate; and next, that such correctness and accuracy logically follows from the admission that he was not an impostor! Further comment is needless.

ACCORDING to the Norse mythology, man was made of trees—the ash and the elm. There is something graceful in this idea. This conception certainly is of a higher order than those which produce man from earth and stones. It is more natural and more noble to regard man as having been made of trees, which, as they grow from the earth heavenward show an unconscious attraction to that which is divine, than to make men stand forth out of cold clay and hard stones.—Prof. B. B. Anderson.

TRUTH is strong enough to indulge charity for error.—Paphon.

THE SCIENCE OF UNIVERSOLOGY.

NO. IX.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

I must still recur to Swedenborg. Some of the most important ideas embodied in Universology are derived directly from him. Among these is that of the Grand Man. Every consociation, or community of persons, held together by whatsoever bond, as a family, a church, a sect, a political party, a nation, is according to this idea necessarily conceived of in "the sensuous imagination," as in the form of a man; that is to say of the human body. It has its head, its hands, or executive arm, its feet, or runners, etc.; and especially we may say now that it has a Without, a Within (or interior circle), and their Between. Even an ideal personage, like Brother Jonathan, or John Bull, is submitted to these conditions, in order to be conceived of by us at all. (Boston is, I believe, called "the hub" of one of them; that is to say the Within, the core, the centre, the heart, or the like.)

Society has, therefore, no less than the individual, its body and its mind, and these have their without and their within, if not so distinctively, still no less truly than the individual. This is true, in a larger sense than any I have mentioned, when applied to the whole mind and population of the planet, not merely now living, but who have lived and will live. It is this which Comte calls "Humanity," and which he also names, in the spirit of the idea of Swedenborg le Grand être (the Great Being). Spencer has treated the same idea in his essay entitled "The Social Organism"; Draper has applied it to the rise and fall of nations, by analogy with individuals; and Fourier applied it to the planetary population, indiscriminately, as to its worlds or spheres, but chiefly in the mundane sense. It struggled in the minds of Hobbes, of Pascal, of Condorcet, and of numerous others. It is implied and assumed, rather than distinctly propounded, by Hegel as the basis of a Science of History; and the anonymous author of Vestiges of Civilization, grasping this thought and demanding this analogy to be made good, avers that "History is still written in America biographically; in Britain empirically; in Germany scholastically; in France alone philosophically." But nowhere, as yet, is it written scientifically." (p. 15.)

But more specifically, characteristically, and broadly than any other, Swedenborg has seized on and propounded this idea of the Grand or the Greatest Man; the reproduction in collective humanity, by analogy or coincident repetition, of the individual. But in accordance with his general drift, he sees the arena for the special display of this larger human personality, not in this mundane sphere of being, but in the spirit world; and the perfected, orderly, and harmonious development of Society in that world is what he calls Heaven. Still, by his principles, he would have accepted the perfect, orderly, and harmonious development of Society, anywhere, as a miniature or lower form of Heaven; down to such adjustment of the faculties and functions of the individual mind; which is Heaven within us, according to the words of Jesus.

Heaven, as an idea restricted to the spirit world, Swedenborg divides into three,—high, highest, and lower; or spiritual, celestial, and natural. This, then, is his account of the Grand Man: "The three heavens together constitute the grand or greatest man." Arcana Cælestia 4390. "All who are therein are in Heaven, but all who are not, correspond with the various corruptions and diseases of the human body, and are in hell." Arc. Cæ. 4225. "The Grand Man is Heaven. In the head of the grand man are those who are called celestial; from the breast even to the loins are those who are called spiritual; and in the feet [or lower limbs, the appendicular portions] are those who are called natural." Apocalypse Explained 708. This correspondential distribution of the body is more closely stated at other points, but this answers for the general view. "Not only those things in the body which are external and visible, according to their functions and uses, correspond to the grand man, but also those things which are internal and not extant to the sight; consequently, both those things which are of the external man and those which are of the internal man. The Societies of spirits and angels to which the things of the external man correspond, are in a great part from this earth; but those to which the things of the internal man correspond are for the most part from other earths." Arc. Cæ. 4330.

The attentive reader will observe that instead of Internal, External, and Interior, or Within, Without, and Between, we have here another division of the human body brought into view, into that which is Uppermost, Middle, and Beneath; and that almost the same terms and specifications are now applied by Swedenborg to this second series of discriminations as had been applied to the former. He is justified in what he does in this regard by inherent correspondences between the two series; but his method of presenting the subject is confused and unsatisfactory, he falling sufficiently to distinguish the two series, and to point out their differences, as well as their correspondential identity.

Observe, in the next place, that Swedenborg not only confines the Grand Man to the spirit world, but that virtually and practically, so far as his own writings inform us, and are concerned, he restricts the extension of this ideal grand personage still more; namely, to the Spiritual or Middle Heaven of those three which constitute Heaven at large, nearly omitting the Celestial Heaven above and the Natural Heaven beneath. Throughout Swedenborg's illuminated writings nothing is more obvious than that he almost constantly dominates or modulates in that realm which he himself distinctly specifies by the term spiritual or by the analogy, in the realm of the Heart and Lungs. He virtually cuts off both the celestial or ruling domain above (about which he gives us the least possible information) and the ultimate or terminal world, analogous with the extremities of the body (about which he gives us even less), and confines himself almost wholly to the breath-region, or the middle. He does, indeed, make his bow of deference to the head when he says, occasionally and, as it were, parenthetically, that the intellect is the supreme faculty, and that the brain is the realm of principles, and the heart and lungs only that of principles (or things acted upon, and resultant from, principles); and he confers great honor, in the same incidental way, on the limbs and extremities, when he says, in the same incidental manner, that all [realized] power resides in ultimates; but, for himself, he recoils at once from both extremes, and centres himself upon the region of the Chest, which our readers may now begin to perceive, is, in a preëminent sense, the Spiritual domain of the human body. The solution of this analogy is this: the Within (which we have already identified with the spiritual realm), coincides with and is, in a special sense, repeated by the Chest; the Without coincides with the Extremities in like manner; and the Rational Domain, the Between, coincides with and is specially reproduced by the Head, which is developed out of the Median Line of the body.

It would seem that it was Swedenborg's own personal position in the Grand Man, taking himself as authority, which rendered it impossible for him to have more than a glimmering view of the true distribution of the Grand Man; and that is the reason why every one must feel the utmost meagreness of detail, in this particular, in his writings; for, as he did rightly perceive, "angels [inhabitants of the head] know in what province of the grand man they are, but spirits [inhabitants of the chest or torso] do not." Arc. Cæ. 4800.

This intuitive utterance, which I presume Swedenborg did not himself perfectly understand, I interpret as meaning, in simple terms, that clean-cut intellectualists, those who dwell in the head, have the truth of things clearly defined to them; while those who dwell in the region of the heart and lungs (of the affections, and of inspirational knowledge merely), are liable to have their mental perceptions obscured by clouds and mists and fogs, though they may be as great as a Jesus, a Plato, or a Swedenborg, though their spiritual perceptions may be at times transcendently clear, and though, as in the case of Jesus, the great Heart—man—their sympathetic rapport may take hold of and sway the world for ages. Despite of all this, however, the religion of the Integral and reconciliative co-action of all the faculties, with the pure intellect presiding over all, will be the religion of the adult manhood of the world.

Everybody, each one of us, dwells in some part of the Grand Man, in the thinking and directing head, in the feeling heart, in the executive hand, in the upholding foot, or in some special tissue, viscera, membrane, fibre or cell, which is the social habitat of the individual; and it will be one of the results of universology to ascertain and fix the place of each, in this grand rational anatomy, as distinctly as geography now determines one's locality on the earth's surface. The individual may make excursions, may even be a traveller by profession, may go from part to part with the circulation, but some point is sure to be his appropriate home. Every individual character has, so to say, a centre of gravity, a dominant propensity, which settles his destiny, in the midst of all incidental deviations; and he finds, or constantly tends to find, his true position in the economy of the whole.

But, heretofore, the Grand or Greatest Man has never been rightly defined. Swedenborg, at his greatest, still confines him to the Spirit-world, to the virtual exclusion, or at any rate to the entire neglect, of this outer mundane world, and Comte confines him to this outer mundane world to the exclusion of the spirit-world. Let us begin by amending all this, and include in our definition of the Grand or Greatest Man, at least, the entire scope of Rational existences. Let us, in distributing his parts, instead of a subdivision of heaven, make a correspondential distribution of this grand totality of rational spheres. The exo-naturalism of our universological Grand Man (repeating more largely Swedenborg's natural heaven), will then be the mundane rational world which we now inhabit, prior to the event we call death, which is the entire grand être of Comte; the endo-naturalism of the same is, then, the entire spirit-world of Swedenborg and the spiritualists (or spiritualists); especially "heaven"; we need not trouble ourselves at present about "hell," as we are mainly considering what is normal, and as hell, with Swedenborg, means what is diseased and abnormal. (This entire spirit-world then repeats, more largely, Swedenborg's Spiritual Heaven.)

These two (the exo- and the endo-naturalism) coincide with the without and the within of the human body—the "soft solids,"—or, by the other analogy, with the limbs and trunk; and, in either sense, they, conjointly, make the naturalism at large. There remains, by the first analogy, "the solids" of the body; and, by the second, the Head (the "hard-headed" scientists) to fill the rôle of Swedenborg's Celestial Heaven, which he makes to be the head of the Grand Man. This is, then, the Scientism of our distribution; and, in our enlarged programme, this thinking head of the Grand Man, this scientism of the total rational career and destiny, is not something hid away in the spirit-world, or merely so; but is, instead, the universologized pantarchal régime of the future, rising above both the mere mundane and the mere spiritual, presiding over them, reconciling and adjusting them, through science and special scientific discovery adequate to that end, and being therefore truly the culmination and head, or the flowering out and fruitage of the tree of human progress.

The third of this trio, the Artismis of this growth of the ages, the analogue of the circulation within the body, in one of the series of analogy; and of the totality or completeness of the body (head, trunk, and limbs) in the other series, is evolution in the one view and Integralism in the other view. This whole showing is an epitome, and is liable to such obscurity as is incident to a "condensed statement." It confounds as Swedenborg has done, but with something more of discrimination, two series of analogy, which in a full treatise should be very clearly discriminated in detail.

There has not been, heretofore, and there is not, as yet, apart from universology, any genuine reconciliation and integration of the materialistic and spiritualistic theories, methods of thought, and orders of mind, any more than of the two corresponding worlds. We have seemed, from time to time, to be brought to the verge of such a reconciliation by the subtle thought of some philosopher; but we have somehow slid past it, and found ourselves again in the camp of one or the other of two hostile armies. If Swedenborg had adhered to and carried out his basic principle of a correspondential identity between the two spheres, the point would have been gained and the compromise effected; but he proved to be, in fact, as exclusively a mere Spiritualist as Spinoza or Comte was a mere materialist. If we look to the other side there is the same fulness of promise and short-coming of performance. Alexander Bain has stated the true view on this subject in a way to leave nothing to be desired. "His confession of psychologic faith was well summed up by him in his Mind and Body; the Theories on Their Relation, published in 1873. He utterly rejected the notion of two substances, and held human nature to be 'one substance with two sets of properties, two sides, the physical and the mental; a double-faced unity.' With this he maintained philosophers should deal, 'as in the language of the Athanasian Creed, not confounding the persons nor dividing the substance.'" And yet Alexander Bain proves to be in fact a mere materialist.

This doctrine, as stated by Bain, is the much-vaunted Monism of Hæckel, and quite generally of the naturalistic sciento-philosophers of our day; and adhered to it would be all right. It is Mr. Greene's account of the relation of subject and object in consciousness, generalized to the relation of body and spirit. But it is never adhered to, in any fairness or impartiality. We have only to read on a few pages to discover that any one of these gentlemen is as fully committed to the supremacy of matter, as Swedenborg is to the supremacy of spirit. We cannot trust the casual mental aperçu and specious fine statement of any author to decide on his habitual point of view. It is a matter of organic leanings, rather than of definition. We must follow up his exhibit and make, as it were, his personal acquaintance, and sense his character, apart from his sayings, much as we do that of individuals in society. The doctrine of equality between the two spheres, as heretofore uttered, on either side, and as commented on by the exposition, is like the confession of the equality of the sexes, of which we have heard, and which runs after this sort: The man and the woman are one, and that one is the man; or, if there is a sturdy Amazon in the case, that one is the woman. "One substance" indeed, "with two sets of properties, two sides, a physical and a mental!" But, read on a little and you shall find that the mental is a mere derivation from, and a pure dependency upon the physical, while the physical is something very substantial and independent of the mental; that is to say, the proposed adjustment is all a one-sided affair after all, and no genuine reconciliation in any just sense of the term.

Bain's double-faced unity of Matter and Mind (or that of his reviewer) is admirably explicit; and is exactly the universological point of view; pains being scientifically and religiously taken to maintain always the absolute equities of the adjustment. Such a procedure would habilitate Swedenborg for the Spiritualities, as completely as Tyndall for the materialities; would redeem our leading thinkers, on both sides, from their abject sectarianism or narrow-mindedness, in rejecting every thing which is not of their own school; and would conduct to that grand mental comprehensiveness, and judicial mental posture which I designate by the term Integralism. They would, in other words be whole men, instead of segments of men.

Of the double-faced unity, which is, indeed, the elementary form of all Being, the Principle which is illustrated in the Unity is UNISM; the Principle which is illustrated in the Double-facedness is DUALISM, and the Principle which is illustrated in the Totality—the embracing Unity (of the simple Unity and the Double-facedness)—is TRINISM. Hence it results that Unism, Dualism, and Trinism are the three fundamental Principles of Being, and so of all things.

INSURRECTION IN THE CHURCH.

The address which has just been presented to the archbishops and bishops, and which has been subscribed by four deans, eight archdeacons, a Regius Professor of Theology, and many other clergymen of position and influence in the Church, is a document of a truly startling character. It disposes once for all of any illusions as regards the extent to which the most outrageous pretensions of the ritualist party have spread among the general body of the clergy. Those who have looked upon Mr. Tooth as a solitary or at worst a slenderly-supported fanatic must abandon their belief on this point when they read an address signed with so many influential names,—an address which, from its substance, might have been drawn up by Mr. Tooth himself, in consultation with his faithful church-wardens. For what the memorialists demand is nothing less in effect than a total reversal of the relations which now subsist between the civil and ecclesiastical authority, and the erection of the latter into a supreme government for the Church. The case which they put forward for this revolutionary change is shortly and simply stated. "On the one side," they say, "we see coercive measures resorted to for enforcing uniformity such as have been happily unknown in this country for centuries; and, on the other, a determination to endure any suffering rather than submit to a jurisdiction which, rightly or wrongly, is regarded as purely secular." In other words, Mr. Tooth has been sent to prison for contempt of the jurisdiction of a court of law, which jurisdiction is regarded as "purely secular"; and whether it is "rightly or wrongly" so regarded, the position, it is insisted, is intolerable to those from whom submission is now required. But the memorialists are not content with demanding that the law should be altered, or even merely that the obnoxious jurisdiction should be purged of its secular character; it must be made impossible for such injuries to be inflicted on the Church in future. The evil must be attacked at its source, and the Church must be invested with that supreme legislative authority which will prevent the possibility of purely secular laws being passed, or of purely secular jurisdictions being created at any time hereafter. Such, at least, is the claim which emerges, somewhat obscurely perhaps, from the next paragraph of the address, but clearly enough from those which follow it. The memorialists are "much impressed by the unsatisfactory character of the authority and arguments to which appeal is made in the controversies now distracting the Church. For, while the Church of England to-day has the same right to decree rites or ceremonies and possesses the same authority in controversies of faith as the same Church had at any previous period of her history, appeal is now made, not to the living voice of the Church, but to events and documents which have themselves always been matters of controversy." This description of the existing system of church government and of the administration of ecclesiastical law is not, perhaps, as clear as could be wished; but there is no uncertainty at all as to the system which the memorialists wish to substitute for it. Believing, as they do, in the "presence in the Church of its Divine Head," they are "convinced that what is required is not the mere interpretation, however skilful, of existing law, but the living voice of the Church clearly laying down what the law shall be in future." The "living voice of the Church" is, it is needless to say, Convocation; it is Convocation which is "clearly to lay down the law of the Church" for Parliament, acting in a purely ministerial capacity, to register. Such is the modest demand of the memorialists, and it is supported on the plea, of all pleas in the world, that it would preserve the "existing relations" of the Church with the State. For these cannot be maintained unless "laws for the regulation of divine service and for other spiritual matters of primary importance" (such, we suppose, as the practice of confession), "are made by an authority which both clergy and laity would feel to be binding upon conscience; and we are equally satisfied that no authority will be considered thus binding which does not proceed from the Synods of the Church as well as from Parliament." Parliament is here politely admitted to a seat beside Convocation, but no doubt is left as to which of the two is to overrule the other. For what now "paralyzes the legislative action" of the Church is "the apprehension that, when her Synodical Acts are submitted to Parliament in the constitutional manner, material alterations may be made in them, and that the final result may be seriously at variance with the intentions of the Synods, and may become law without their consent." Remove this apprehension—enact, that is to say, that Parliament shall not introduce material alterations into the synodical acts of the Church, but shall merely register and give them binding force as civil statutes,—and the paralysis would disappear. No doubt it would; for when "paralysis" merely means subjection to existing authority, a simple interchange of positions between the subject and ruler is pretty sure to afford an effective cure.

This, then, is the claim which can be preferred at this time of day by a Dean of St. Paul's with a train of ecclesiastical dignitaries at his back. The archbishops and bishops are quietly requested to agitate for the abolition of the Royal supremacy and for putting Convocation in the place of the Pope. For that, simply stated, is what their demands amount to; and they are not at pains to disguise, even in words, a pretension which cannot be concealed in fact. They insist that Parliament shall not decree anything in ecclesiastical matters against the consent of Convocation; and they do not even offer in exchange that Convocation shall on its own part decree nothing against the consent of Parliament. Nor would such a concession have been compatible with obtaining a redress of the special grievance of which they are complaining. They want to abolish the jurisdiction of Lord Penzance and to repeal the Act which created it: which means that they would begin their "reforms" by overruling that decision of Parliament by which the Act was passed and the Court established. The address, in fact, is not even a plea for a division of authority between the civil and ecclesiastical powers,—a plea which would be in itself inadmissible; it is a naked demand for absolute ecclesiastical rule. And it comes, not from men who ask to be set free from their relations with the State altogether, but from Church dignitaries who wish to maintain the "existing relations" of the Establishment with the State; or, in other words, who wish to keep their present status and emoluments free of the conditions upon which they were originally conferred,—to Romanize the doctrines and practice of the Church by decree of "its living voice," and at the same time to employ the arm of secular authority in reducing to submission any Low Church Mr. Tooth who might resist the decree. That such extravagant pretensions as this can be put forward at this day is surprising; but that it should be put forward by dignitaries of the English Church, and supported on such grounds as appear in this address, is a circumstance of evil omen for the Establishment.—Fall Mall Gazette, April 5.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND AND THE STATE.

The Rev. Berdmore Compton, of All Saints', Margaret Street, forwards to the Guardian for publication an address which has been presented this week to the archbishops as representing the English episcopate. Mr. Compton says: "As the correspondence relating to it has mainly fallen on me, I venture to ask you to insert the following account of it. It was designed for representative rather than general signature, and has been signed only by the few clergy to whom the promoters were able to send it, and by a few others who accidentally saw it. But it is believed that very many other clergy not only concur in its sentiments, but wish for an opportunity of expressing their concurrence. The proper mode of doing this will probably be discussed in rural deanery or other clerical meetings, who will determine whether to concert large collective addresses or to adopt the reader method of small separate addresses to their dioceses."

"TO THE MOST REVEREND AND RIGHT REVEREND, THE ARCHBISHOPS AND BISHOPS OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND:—

"We, the undersigned clergy of the Church of England, being anxious to retain the relations of Church and State which have so long existed in this country, venture to express to your lordships, as our spiritual fathers, the great anxiety and distress which we feel at the present position of affairs. On the one side we see coercive measures resorted to for enforcing uniformity, such as have been happily unknown in this country for centuries; and on the other, a determination to endure any suffering rather than submit to a jurisdiction which, rightly or wrongly, is regarded as purely secular. Moreover, we are much impressed by the unsatisfactory character of the authority and arguments to which appeal is made in the controversies now distracting the Church. For, while the Church of England of to-day has the same right to decree rites or ceremonies and possesses the same authority in controversies of faith as the same Church had at any previous period in her history, appeal is now made, not to the living voice of the Church, but to events and documents which have themselves always been matters of controversy. Believing, as we do, in the presence in the Church of her Divine Head, we are convinced that what is required is not the mere interpretation, however skilful, of existing law, but the living voice of the Church clearly laying down what the law shall be in the future. With this conviction upon our minds, we beg to urge upon your consideration that, in our opinion, no peace can be secured for the Church, nor can her existing relations with the State be long continued, unless laws for the regulation of divine service and for other spiritual matters of primary importance are made by an authority which both clergy and laity would feel to be binding upon conscience; and we are equally satisfied that no authority will be considered thus binding which does not proceed from the Synods of the Church as well as from Parliament. In saying this we must add that the legislative action of the Church is now paralyzed by the apprehension that when her Synodical Acts are submitted to Parliament in the constitutional manner, material alterations may be made in them, and that the final result may be seriously at variance with the intentions of the Synods, and may become law without their consent. We trust that your lordships will take these representations into your serious consideration, and in your wisdom devise measures to allay the anxiety and distress which is now pressing upon Churchmen."

The first signature is that of the Dean of St. Paul's, and the next is Canon Gregory's. Nearly all the signatories (there are about eighty in all) are pronounced High Churchmen. The address is dated "Tuesday in Easter week, 1877."

The Times, commenting upon the memorial drawn up by certain members of the High Church party for presentation to the archbishops with reference to the relations of the English Church to the State, characterizes it as one of the most extraordinary addresses which, even in these days of such documents, has ever been seen. We might expect from such a body of men as those who sign the memorial some expression of opinion which would tend to allay the irrational excitement of the extreme members of their party and to strengthen the hands of authority in dealing with the spirit of rebellion by which the very existence of the Church is menaced. It will be seen, however, with equal disappointment and astonishment, that a course the very reverse of this has been adopted. Nothing more discouraging at the present crisis could well be conceived. In their demand for the self-government of the Church, the memorialists (says the Times) leave out of sight entirely what the mass of the laity and, unless we are much mistaken, the majority of the clergy require. The clergymen whose practices have been challenged have accepted their offices, and have received their orders as well as their benefices, upon a distinct promise to conform to the existing law. Such is the definite contract into which they have entered with the Church at large and with the State; and that which the State and the Church require of them is that this contract should be fulfilled. The Synods of the Church may perhaps some day acquire the power now coveted for them, but only on one condition,—that the clergy abandon the privileges and the benefices which they possess under the existing constitution of Church and State.

The Daily Telegraph says it would appear to be not liberty for all, but supremacy for themselves which the memorialists demand. The last word on the subject, however, must be that, so long as the spiritual power wants to have the privileges and emoluments of a State Establishment, the power which establishes it—that is, the will of the Queen, Lords, and Commons of England—must always hold supreme authority in finally determining what it is that it establishes.—Pall Mall Gazette, April 5.

PROSECUTION OF MR. BRADLAUGH.

Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, the editor, and Mrs. Annie Besant, sub-editor, of the National Reformer, were arrested yesterday morning on a charge of publishing what is alleged to be an immoral book. The work is a pamphlet by the late Charles Knowlton, M.D., entitled The Fruits of Philosophy, which deals with the Malthusian theory as to population, and it is sold by the defendants at the offices of the Free Thought Publishing Company. Some few weeks ago Mr. Charles Watts, who is also a free thought lecturer and publisher, was indicted at the Old Bailey for a like offence; and on his pleading that the work had been sold unchanged for many years by him and others, and that he had not, therefore, taken the trouble to peruse it, but that as soon as the proceedings were commenced against him he had diligently read it, and found that he could not conscientiously defend it, and had thereupon stopped its sale, he was let off on payment of costs, amounting to something like £200. Upon this Mr. Bradlaugh openly announced his intention to reprint and publish an edition of the work, as he considered that so far from containing anything of an objectionable nature it dealt with matters of vital importance, and was really conducive to the best interests of society, and that in its prosecution and suppression a blow was dealt to the freedom of the press. He therefore said he was determined to contest the legality of the prosecution, and about a fortnight ago commenced republishing what he called an amended edition of the work. Since that time many thousand copies of the work have been sold by Mr. Bradlaugh and his assistants, and the first two copies of the new edition he delivered personally to Mr. Martin, the chief clerk at the Guildhall Police Court, and to the authorities at the City detective office, at the same time stating to the latter that if it was found necessary to arrest him he hoped they would do so at as convenient an hour as possible, to avoid the unpleasantness of his passing a night in a police cell. It appears to have been found necessary to arrest the defendants, which was done about ten o'clock yesterday morning.

From the Bridewell Police-station the accused were taken to the Guildhall justice room, where they were brought before Mr. Alderman Figgins on the charge of publishing an obscene book on March 24. The names and addresses were given as Charles Bradlaugh, of 10 Portland Place, St. John's Wood, publisher; and Annie Besant, of Oaklands, Mortimer Road, St. John's Wood, journalist.

Mr. Bradlaugh asked that only formal evidence might be given, and the case adjourned, as he was not prepared with the witnesses for his defence.

William Simmonds, a city detective constable, said that on Saturday, March 24, he went to the Free Thought Publishing Office, at 28 Stonecutter Street, about twenty minutes to five o'clock. It was an open publishing shop. He saw the two defendants in the publishing office, and asked Mrs. Annie Besant for a pamphlet on The Fruits of Philosophy. Mr. Bradlaugh was by her side behind the counter, and could hear what witness said. Mrs. Besant gave him the book, for which he paid 8d. On March 29 he went there again, and purchased another copy of the work from a young man in the shop, but neither of the defendants was there.

By Mr. Bradlaugh: I was aware that you had given notice to the chief office of the City Police that you would attend at your shop on March 24 and sell the book from four to five o'clock.

Edwin Williams, detective officer of the City Police, deposed that on Saturday, March 24, about five o'clock, he bought a copy of the book from Mrs. Besant, the other defendant standing by at the time.

Simmonds, recalled, produced two memorandums, one addressed to Detective Sergeant Green, at Old Jewry, and one to Mr. Martin, chief clerk, Guildhall. He also produced a copy of the National Reformer, in which Mr. Bradlaugh advertised for persons to come forward to be bail for him in the event of his being arrested.

Mr. Bradlaugh maintained, whether rightly or wrongly, that the book was not obscene, and he wished to have the case properly tested. For that purpose he sent notice on March 24 to the chief office, to the City Solicitor, and to this justice room, stating what he was going to do.

Mr. Alderman Figgins remarked that it appeared to him that this was not a case for a warrant, but for a summons.

Mr. Martin (chief clerk) stated that the usual course had been taken.

Mr. Bradlaugh said he had no right to complain of that, and he did not; and he must say that he had been treated by the police with the greatest courtesy consistent with the fact of the capture.

Detective Sergeant Ontram then proved the arrest of the defendants, and also that he went with a search-warrant. When he saw Mr. Bradlaugh he stated that there were no books there that would come under the search-warrant. He had only five copies of the work at his private residence, and those he should require for his defence. Witness then took the two defendants to the Bridewell Police station, where they were charged.

Mr. Alderman Figgins suggested that they had gone as far as they could at present, and that they had now better remand the case.

Mr. Bradlaugh replied that that was what he wished, and he would ask for as long an adjournment as possible, as he had about forty witnesses to call for his defence, many of whom were medical men, and it would take some time to serve them.

Alderman Figgins said that as he should admit them to bail he could have an adjournment for as long as he wished. He presumed the defendants were prepared with bail.

Mr. Bradlaugh answered that he had about sixteen persons who were willing to become bail.

Mr. Martin observed that he had received four telegrams from Mr. Bradlaugh's friends in the country offering to become bail.

The Alderman then decided to adjourn the case until Tuesday, the 17th instant, and admit the defendants to bail in two sureties of £100 each, and themselves in £200 each. Dr. C. R. Drysdale, of Woburn Place, and Mr. Joannes Swaagman, of 28 Featherston Street, became bail for Mrs. Besant; and Mr. Edward Truelove, of 256 High Holborn, and Mr. William Bell, of 44 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn-fields, bailed Mr. Bradlaugh. The parties then left the court.—London Daily Telegraph, April 6.

PIEISTHOOD AND HUMANITY.

Mr. J. Kaines, in the National Reformer of February 4th, has favored us with an article under the above heading on the benefits conferred upon humanity by the priesthood, on which I wish to offer a few remarks.

Mr. J. K. says: "But even now, notwithstanding its obscurity and retrograde tendencies, the Romish priesthood, as a whole, exercise a wholesome social influence, as well as a moral control over Catholics, to which Protestant priests, mere creatures of the State, can lay no claim."

Whether "J. K." like myself, has ever been under the control of the Romish priesthood or not, I can safely say that that control is the most obstructive to and destructive of the development and powers of the human mind. The Russian general who, in his despatch to the Emperor, briefly said, "Peace reigns in Warsaw," which was saying as much as "I have blown the brains out of every Pole in Warsaw," is very much like the wholesome control exercised by the Roman priests over their unfortunate victims whose brains are made useless under the "wholesome control of the priests." This "wholesome control" has so made my unfortunate countrymen "the hewers of wood and the carriers of water" to the two hemispheres, that to-day you will not find a Protestant Irishman amongst all the Irish bricklayers' laborers in London. The reason of this is that the Catholic Irish are taught their Catechism, and the only books they are chiefly allowed to read are the lives of the Saints and the history of the Church, so that when they enter into the race of life with Protestants and men of the world, they find the lives of the Saints and the history of the Church no use to them, but an encumbrance, which they must unlearn or despatch if they wish to make headway in the race. "The wholesome control of the priests" is after this fashion: the Bishop, who is under the control of the Archbishop, who is under the Pope, who is God's vicegerent on earth, gives power to the Bishop to appoint parish priests over the parishioners, who are bound on pain of damnation to submit themselves to the Church, of which the parish priest is the representative, and to whom the parishioners are also compelled to make confession of their sins. Thus described by the poet:—

"Confess your sins about great Easter day,
And to the Church neglect not thy ties to pay.
Blessed be he who pays, Perdition to him who don't."

One can easily imagine the power the priests of the parishes of Christendom have acquired by this means, where they become the masters of the secrets of every man, woman, and child under their care, in their respective parishes; to which condition the English ritualistic priests are endeavoring to reduce their parishioners in our time, to that wholesome control over Englishmen, whose fathers fought the good fight successfully three centuries ago; but for that fight England would now be under the dominion of the Pope, and his tyrannical crew of priestly spies, who dole out such nonsensical stuff as the following, in order to be able to exercise that wholesome control that "J. K." seems to be so much enamored of. Superstition has in nothing more plainly manifested at once its foundation in ignorance, and its mighty hold over the popular mind, than in the extraordinary variety of relics which have claimed and received the homage and adoration of mankind. It is only a few weeks since, at Stonyhurst Catholic College, in Lancashire, that we were shown a piece of the real wood of the cross; and the following are some, mentioned in Brady's Clavis, which either have received or are receiving the wondering adoration of folly:—

"A figure of St. Andrew.—A finger of John the Baptist.—The thumb of St. Thomas.—A tooth of our Lord.—A rib of our Lord, or, as it is profanely styled, of the verbum caro factum (the word made flesh).—The hem of our Lord's garment which cured the diseased woman.—The seamless coat of our Lord.—A tear which our Lord shed over Lazarus. It was preserved by an angel who gave it in a vial to Mary Magdalen.—Two handkerchiefs, on which are impressions of our Lord's face; the one sent by our Lord himself as a present to Agbarus, prince of Edessa; and the other given at the time of his crucifixion to a holy woman named Veronica.—The rod of Moses, with which he performed his miracles.—A lock of Mary Magdalen's hair.—A hem of Joseph's garment.—A feather of the Holy Ghost.—A finger of the Holy Ghost.—A feather of the angel Gabriel.—A finger of a Cherubim.—The water-pots used at the marriage in Galilee.—The slippers of the antediluvian Enoch.—The face of a seraphim, with only part of the nose.—The snout of a seraphim thought to have belonged to the preceding.—The coal that boiled St. Laurence.—The square buckle, lined with red velvet, and short sword of St. Michael.—A vial of the sweat of St. Michael, when contending with the devil.—Some of the rays of the star that appeared to the Magi," etc.—Chamber's Papers for the People, "The Wonders of Human Folly," p. 7.

This is the kind of wholesome control the Romish priests exercise over their flocks, and even to be suspected of doubting the truth of the history of these relics would ensure for the doubter a specimen of that "wholesome control," something like the Egyptian darkness, which was a "darkness that could be felt."

Yours truly,

MYLES MCSWEENEY.

THE BLIND MEN AND THE ELEPHANT.

A HINDU FABLE.

BY JOHN G. SAXE.

It was six men of Indostan,
To learning much inclined,
Who went to see the elephant,
(Though all of them were blind),
That each by observation
Might satisfy the mind.

The first approached the elephant,
And, happening to fall
Against his broad and sturdy side,
At once began to bawl:
"God bless me, but the elephant
Is very like a wall."

The second, feeling at the tusk,
Cried, "Ho! what have we here
So very round and smooth and sharp?
To me 'tis mighty clear
This wonder of an elephant
Is very like a spear."

The third approached the animal,
And, happening to take
The squirming trunk within his hand,
Thus boldly up he spake:
"I see," quoth he, "the elephant
Is very like a snake!"

The fourth reached out his eager hand,
And felt about his knee:
"What most this wondrous beast is like
Is mighty plain," quoth he;
"'Tis clear enough the elephant
Is very like a tree!"

The fifth, who chanced to touch the ear,
Said, "E'en the blindest man
Can tell what this resembles most;
Deny the fact who can,
This marvel of an elephant
Is very like a fan!"

The sixth no sooner had begun
About the beast to grope,
Than, seizing on the swinging tail
That fell within his scope,
"I see," quoth he, "the elephant
Is very like a rope!"

And so these men of Indostan
Disputed loud and long,
Each in his own opinion
Exceeding stiff and strong;
Though each was partly in the right,
They all were in the wrong!

So oft, in theologic war,
The disputants, I ween,
Fall on, in utter ignorance
Of what each other mean,
And prate about an elephant
That none of them have seen!

The Index.

BOSTON, MAY 3, 1877.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, WILLIAM J. POTTER, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHERNEY, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), DAVID H. CLARK, MRS. ELIZABETH CARY STANTON, Editorial Contributors.

WE ARE REQUESTED to state that Miss Susan H. Wixon will speak next Sunday at the Paine Memorial Building.

WILL THE NUMEROUS correspondents whose letters remain still unanswered, though often important and urgent, excuse us for our seeming neglect on account of utter inability to meet all the demands on our time and strength?

A PRIVATE MEETING of the subscribers and friends of THE INDEX was held in this city on April 28, in accordance with the confidential circular of March 19. It is proper to inform those to whom this circular was sent that an adjourned meeting was appointed for 3 P.M., May 12, at the same place, to receive the report of a committee.

THE FIRST NUMBER of the Radical Review is announced as ready to be issued May 15, or earlier. The list of contents is as follows:—

THE TWO TRADITIONS, ECCLESIASTIC AND SCIENTIFIC. By William J. Potter.

TO BENEDICT SPINOZA. By B. W. Ball.

PRACTICAL SOCIALISM IN GERMANY. By C. W. Ernst.

THEODORE PARKER AS RELIGIOUS REFORMER. By D. A. Wasson.

THE DISCOVERER. By Edmund C. Stedman.

SYSTEM OF ECONOMIC CONTRADICTIONS. Introduction. By P. J. Proudhon. Editor's Translation.

THE INFLUENCE OF PHYSICAL CONDITIONS IN THE GENESIS OF SPECIES. By Joel A. Allen.

OUR FINANCIALS: THEIR IGNORANCE, USURPATIONS, AND FRAUDS. By Lysander Spooner.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Tennyson's "Harold."—Larned's "Talks about Labor."—Ellis's "Memoir of Sir Benjamin Thompson."—Lowell's "Three Memorial Poems."—Thompson's "The Papacy and the Civil Power."—Gross's "The Teachings of Providence."—Habberton's "The Jericho Road."

CHIPS FROM MY STUDIO. By Sidney H. Morse.

This is a very interesting list, and gives excellent promise of the new quarterly. Mr. B. R. Tucker, the editor, can be addressed at New Bedford, Mass. The subscription price is $5.00 a year.

THE PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL at Princeton, N. J., are trying Rev. John Miller for heresy. He has just published a book entitled Questions Awakened by the Bible. The questions it treats of are three in number: 1. Are souls immortal? 2. Was Christ in Adam? and 3. Is God a Trinity? In the preface to his discussion of the first question, Mr. Miller tells us that "the sole object of this book is to show that the immortality of the soul is not taught in God's holy word"; and, further, that "our doctrine is that man dies at death; that the body is mortal, and that the soul is mortal; that the body will live again, and that the soul will live again; that the body will live forever, and that the soul will live forever; and that, therefore, keeping them together, the whole man will die, sleep, rise again, and be immortal." The chief merit which he claims for this view is its antagonism to the Roman Catholic dogma of purgatory, with all its attendant consequences, and he denounces the prevailing belief of Christians in the separate existence of the soul after the death of the body as a relic of paganism. His ideas on the second and third points are thus summarized:—

"Second—That Jesus of Nazareth was a descendant of Adam and of David, not without the sinfulness of the flesh, inherent in his forefathers, but, through the miraculous conception of the Virgin Mary, incarnated with the spirit of God, and thus enabled to withstand the temptations to which mere men gave way. That in his death he opened a pathway for the redemption of the race.

"Third—That there is no Trinity, but one God, the Spirit which pervades all things. That it was the spirit of God born in Jesus which made the Savior of God, and that the term Holy Ghost is a mere rhetorical expression for the spirit of God, and synonymous with God himself."

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Tenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston as follows:—

Thursday evening, May 31st, at 7.45 P. M., business session in Horticultural Hall, for the election of officers, reading of reports, and consideration of the practical work of the Association. A special discussion is also invited on the proper interpretation of the word "scientific" in the first article of the Constitution of the Association.

Friday, June 1st, at 10 A. M. and 3 P. M., sessions in Beethoven Hall for Essays and Addresses. Morning subject: "External Dangers of Religious Freedom." Afternoon subject: "Internal Dangers of Free Thought." Speakers and essayists will be announced hereafter.

A Social Festival is to be held Friday evening at Horticultural Hall.

W. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

"NATURAL RIGHTS."

What are "natural rights"?

This phrase is used a great deal in discussions of a political or ethico-political character. In the New York State Senate, the question was recently put on submitting to the people a Constitutional Amendment restricting the suffrage to tax-payers and rent-payers in elections for members of the Board of Finance. This proposal to establish a new property qualification for suffrage in a certain class of elections, being opposed on the ground that it was an unwarrantable restriction of the right of suffrage, was met by the oft-repeated statement that "suffrage is not a natural right"; and it was supposed that this reply was unanswerable. In this opinion we do not coincide.

Strictly and properly speaking, all rights are "natural." There may be various classifications of rights, but they all come under the general head, "natural." A right which is not natural is not a right at all; it must have its foundation in Nature, or it is merely imaginary and unreal. The moment that the ancient, crude conceptions of Nature were enlarged so as to include the whole order and constitution of things,—all existent forces, laws, relations, and realities,—the words natural and real became coextensive in meaning, and no room was left for anything outside of the one all-embracing universe of Nature. To speak of any supposed rights, therefore, as otherwise than "natural," or to treat them as belonging to some system not included under that word, is simply to deny their reality altogether.

This is what people who affirm that "suffrage is not a natural right" substantially mean; they mean that suffrage is not a right at all, but a mere question of expediency, to be settled with regard to considerations of policy or utility alone, and without reference to general moral principles. To take this ground, however, logically commits one to more than is perhaps intended. The suffrage question involves the whole question of the ultimate source of political power; and it is impossible to prove that a republican form of government is any more just than a despotic one, if it is a matter of indifference, morally considered, whether political power is justly derived from the whole people or only from a larger or smaller part of the people. This prior inquiry into the ultimate source of political power cannot be got rid of; those who declare that "suffrage is not a natural right" thoughtlessly or designedly push it aside, but it will not be pushed aside. When the Declaration of Independence was made, the principle was laid down that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," and that is only asserting in other words that suffrage is a natural right. Let us be honest, frank, and explicit in this discussion all around; let us call into question, if you please, the truth of the principles laid down in the Declaration of Independence, and inquire whether our forefathers did not make a great blunder in founding this government on moral ideas,—on distinctions between natural rights and natural wrongs. But do not let us be satisfied with a shallow or superficial treatment of questions involving the very existence and perpetuity of American institutions from their foundations upwards.

Now the notion of "divine right," whether vested in king or lords or commons,—in a monarchy, aristocracy, or democracy,—may be dismissed at once. As an antithesis to "natural right," "divine right" has disappeared from the political problem in this country, except in the minds of those Christian fanatics who are aiming to Christianize the Constitution of the United States. A "government of the people, by the people, for the people," knows nothing of divine right, unless Nature itself is divine; for it must rest wholly on the natural relations existing by necessity in a community of intelligent and moral beings.

But the notion of "artificial" or "conventional" or "political" rights is, in a great many minds, opposed to that of "natural" rights, simply because these latter are supposed to be "absolute" and "unalienable," while the former are supposed to be dependent on circumstances or voluntary arrangements. Let us at once dismiss the notion that any right whatever can be "absolute" or "unalienable," if by those words it is intended to assert that such a right cannot be forfeited, or for any reason held in abeyance. That notion is the source of very great confusion in reasonings on this subject. Why, the very forefathers who declared that "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" are among the "unalienable rights" of "all men," certainly believed that these very rights can be forfeited or alienated by crime. Nobody, so far as we know, ever held that natural rights are absolute or unalienable in the sense of being non-forfeitable. All that can be claimed for natural rights is that they result from the natural and necessary relations of human beings in a state of society rather than from an original "divine ordinance," or a long-inherited "social compact." All individual rights are limited by the equal rights of other individuals, and are forfeitable on violation of the latter; and this is as unqualifiedly conceded by the defenders of the natural rights theory as by the defenders of any other theory.

There is, however, a distinction of kind among human rights, even when they are (as they should be) regarded as all purely natural in their origin. Instead of the false and misleading distinctions of "natural and divine," "natural and artificial," "natural and conventional," "natural and political," etc., let there be substituted a division of all natural rights into "primary and secondary," or "original and derivative"; and then the first approach would seem to be made to a scientific classification. Primary, original, or personal rights would include the rights to Existence, to Freedom, and to Development—to the possession and enjoyment of free individual activity, subject only to the restrictions imposed by equal rights in all other individuals. Secondary, derivative, or conventional rights would include the more numerous and complicated rights which grow out of a state of society among many co-equal individuals. It is among these that we class the right of suffrage, as the necessary and general means of securing protection for other rights; also, the right of contract, and the right to the execution of contracts, to which Sir Henry Maine traces so largely the growth of civilization. But both classes of rights, primary and secondary, are equally natural, and equally unalienable except for cause.

This exception is vitally important to the permanent welfare of mankind. Whoever would abridge the right of suffrage, and disfranchise any class of the community on the plea of social welfare, should be compelled to meet the issue fairly and manfully; he should be compelled to show adequate and unquestionable CAUSE for alienating the right of suffrage from anybody; he should not be allowed to escape with shallow assertions that "suffrage is not a natural right," or that "virtue and intelligence should govern," etc. When the great and sole defence of popular liberty is in question, and a proposal is made to reverse the whole current of American tendencies by taking away the suffrage from classes already enfranchised, those who advocate so grave a change should not be excused from treating the subject in its moral as well as in its other lights. The confinement of suffrage on property questions to those who have property at stake, for instance, may or may not be a just and righteous measure; but we shall never be satisfied that it is until it is abundantly proved that the first step towards a plutocracy is not thereby taken. We distrust profoundly all attempts to remedy the evils of universal suffrage by restricting it to a class; every principle of our ethical and political philosophy impels us to seek such remedies in educating the ignorant and, by the abolition of monopolies and unjust privileges, in giving every voter a personal stake in good government. Unless these results can be attained, the republican experiment itself is a foredoomed failure, and the future of America is dark indeed. But we believe they are attainable; and every patriotic citizen will do well to scrutinize closely any public measure which rests on a covert assumption of the contrary.

FINANCIAL REPORT OF THE "CENTENNIAL CONGRESS OF LIBERALS."

In fulfillment of the promise, made in Mr. D. Y. Kilgore's appeal to the public, March 1, 1876, of a "full report of all expenditures," the following statement of expenses, dated Dec. 30, 1876, was forwarded to us by that gentleman:—

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, in Trust.

BOSTON, Jan. 20, 1877.

This certifies that we have examined the above report of "Centennial Congress of Liberals in account with F. E. Abbot, in Trust," and have found correct. The $1324.18 shown on the Cr. side were deposited in the First National Bank of Cambridge the credit of "Francis E. Abbot, in Trust." All items of disbursement on the Dr. side were made by checks on the same bank; and these checks, issued by the payees, have all been handed to us for inspection. In addition, a regular receipt has been shown for every disbursement except those of no. 12 to James Parton and July 10 to Chas. F. Paige, for which receipts were superfluous.

FRANCIS V. BALCH.
GEO. W. PARK.

On February 1, 1877, after the above report had been audited, we received from Mr. Kilgore a cheque $35.45 and a promissory note for $100.00, dated January 31, 1877.

A CRITICISM.

There is no indelicacy in printing an anonymous letter, and the following communication is too characteristic to be thrown into the waste-basket, which was its first destination:—

BOSTON, April 23d.

DEAR SIR:—

I read, if you are correctly reported, that you "have no sympathy with the Christian system." If you mean the Orthodox system, it is not any matter of surprise. Neither have I among a multitude of others. If you mean that system of faith, hope, and love,—that system of faith in God, hope of another and better life and love of our brethren which lie at the foundation of Christianity, it is a lamentable fact. You certainly have degenerated very much from the belief of your beloved and venerated father, as well as the fathers of liberal Christianity. I really hope that you are not correctly reported. Again, although Jesus said he could call on his Father for a legion of angels to support and defend him, he did not do it, but submitted to his predicted fate, willingly and without a murmur. "Not my will but thine be done." "Thus it is written and thus it behooved Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead the third day, and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations." How could he, feeling he had such a mission to perform, call upon God to save him from the cruel death by crucifixion? The sufferings of his sensitive nature were so intense, that, at last, his great heart gave way and uttered the exclamation: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me!"

It appears to me that the Free Religionists often leap to their conclusions hastily. You are a man of talent, a good writer, and exert, no doubt, much influence over many minds. I, for one, beg of you to ponder well before you throw away your faith in the Christian system or pure Christianity.

Yours respectfully,

A UNITARIAN.

To be entirely ignorant of the principles of the Free Religionists is no crime; neither is it a crime to be unacquainted with the meaning of the phrase "the Christian system" as used by writers of the rationalist school; nor yet is it a crime, or a grievous fault to confound, even in these days, the teachings of a sect with the teachings of Jesus; nor, further, is it an unpardonable offence to imagine that the "fathers of liberal Christianity" had penetrated to the inmost secret of religion; neither, to make one specification more, is it positively sinful to think that faith in God, hope of another and better life, and love of our brethren are peculiar to Christianity, or are, in any special sense, characteristic of it; the habit of identifying Christianity with religion, and ascribing to it every perfection is, unhappily, too deeply-rooted to excite indignation. The letter is not remarkable on account of the positiveness of its assumptions or their groundlessness. It is not remarkable for any thing. But it is noticeable as an evidence of the neglect of the Unitarian denomination to pursue its original bent, and carry out its cardinal principle of inquiry into matters of historical and literary interest in the domain of religion. There is, and has been, particularly since the Parker controversy, a deplorable remissness on the part of Sunday-school teachers, instructors of Bible-classes, pastors, and superintendents, in their duty of explaining the New Testament, according to the most enlightened rules, communicating the most recent discoveries relating to its origin and composition, the relation of its parts to each other, and the relation of the whole to the religious literature of the Jews. The criticism of the New Testament has not been faithfully dealt with. The history of the religion that is supposed to rest upon it has not been philosophically delineated; in a word, Christianity has not received the candid, scholarly treatment it had a right to look for from the successors of Norton, Palfrey, Channing, the Wares, to say nothing of men more recently passed away. Had such instruction been given, had interest in this real knowledge been sustained, had the willingness to accept or consider it when it was offered been cherished, it would have been impossible for a Unitarian to write so curiously and ingeniously bemuddled a letter as the foregoing,—a letter in which nearly every form of logical stupidity is illustrated. Of course, all Unitarians are not so benighted as this one; but the remonstrances I individually receive from Unitarian well- or ill-wishers compel me to believe that the number of such is very considerable, even among the best-educated of our metropolitan congregations. Many times lately I have been astounded at the ignorance and unintelligence of people who think themselves somewhat on account of the eminence of their Unitarian standing. It is coming to be recognized that this sect, like all the others, has assumed the policy of the defensive against the discoveries of scientific criticism.

On one other point it may not be indelicate for me to say a single word. The memory of my "beloved and venerated" father is as dear to me as it is to anybody, and it is the dearer because he was not afraid to read and think. However he may have thought it unwise to divulge all his mind—in this, he was countenanced by so venerated a person as the late Dr. James Walker,—he let it be pretty well understood that his place was among the intelligent and active inquirers. In his latter years he was a convert to the views of the New Testament and of primitive Christianity that are maturely summarized and presented in The Cradle of the Christ, and was in cordial sympathy with his son's endeavor to spread them. This is a matter of no logical importance; for one generation does not bind another, but properly helps to emancipate it; so that the son can justify the father only by going beyond him; but it is of importance that the attitude of an eminent divine and teacher should not be misrepresented.

O. B. F.

LIVE ISSUES.

DEAR EDITOR:—

Several points of interest have come up lately in THE INDEX of which I should like to say a word, but busy hours have slipped by without doing so. So I am going to say a few brief words on them now, and perhaps leisure will come to develop thought more fully.

It is a cheering sign that the discussions of THE INDEX are reaching such real and vital questions as divide and interest those who think freely, instead of being occupied with old issues. When one feels constrained to differ from Mr. Wasson or Mr. Gannett or Mr. Abbot, one feels bound to search and review one's own thoughts, sure that the contest is not with a dead lion but a living one; and that the speaker is representing a real mental experience, and not a dead tradition.

I have felt a difference of thought on the subject of suffrage with both Mr. Abbot and Mr. Wasson which seems to me to touch the essential basis of the right of suffrage. Mr. Wasson's well-known views in regard to the right of intelligence and virtue alone to suffrage are worthy of great respect. But it seems to me that I should state it the other way. The virtuous and intelligent alone must have suffrage, he says; I should say, the voter must have intelligence and virtue. That the world shall be governed by intelligence and virtue is its only hope of salvation. But how shall we secure that it is so? By shutting out the masses from any participation in government? That has been abundantly tried, and we have had French Revolutions and abundant other horrors as the result. But universal suffrage makes it the interest of all, that all shall become intelligent and virtuous, and so secure that basis of government. The man, however, who assumes that he or his class or his party alone is "intelligent and virtuous," and so entitled to rule others, disproves his statement, it seems to me, in the very act; for he shows at least that he has not the virtue of humility and respect for others.

Widely apart as Mr. Wasson's views and Mr. Abbot's often are, it seems to me the same distrust of this great principle, which he has nobly advocated in other relations, lurks in Mr. Abbot's suggestion that woman suffrage is unsafe or in any way to be postponed because women generally are more attached to existing religious superstitions than men. Women have a right to express their opinions and to exercise their choice on this as on all other subjects, and, if existing religious beliefs are dangerous to the State, it is precisely owing to the want of interest which women must have in a government in which they have no share that they do not see fully the bearing of Church interests upon the security of the State. My remedy would be to give women a motive and a chance to study the good of the State as much as of the Church; and then their genuine religion would be as loyal to it as now to the institution which has given them most recognition. I am sorry that the expression "lukewarm" was unpleasant to any one, for after all it is a purely relative expression; but since it has brought out a claim on the part of THE INDEX to stand as a hearty advocate of woman suffrage, I am not sorry to have used it.

Again, I do not think it is the Bible which delays woman suffrage, but it is the opposition to woman suffrage which makes use of the Bible. The Bible is, as the negro said, "like Massa's fiddle; you may play any tune you please upon it." The Bible used to be made out to be the great bulwark of slavery; and Parker Pillsbury was wont to say, we must batter down the Church and the Bible before we could free the slaves. But slavery is gone, and the Church and the Bible remain; and ministers who believe in woman suffrage, like Jesse Jones, can find just as good texts for it as his opponents can against it. But the same great principle which is the basis of free religion is the strong foundation of universal suffrage for both men and women,—the principle that every human being has his own right to be and to judge of his own welfare, and to accept truth on the evidence which is conclusive to his own mind.

The same thought, it seems to me, would meet the difficulty between Transcendentalism and what Mr. Abbot calls the Scientific Method. The Transcendentalist affirms an inward evidence of certain truths which satisfies his mind of their truth; he has a right to rest in his affirmation, but no right to assert that no man can attain these truths on other evidence, or that he must be satisfied with evidence which is not conclusive to himself. The heart asks no evidence that what it loves is lovely; but it cannot demand that any other shall so accept it. If the Transcendentalist becomes a dogmatist, he is wholly untrue to his theory, and is the worst of dogmatists, because he may make his narrow self the standard which he claims to be universal. Science can also be narrow and dogmatic. The great idea of Transcendentalism, that the mind has cognizance of truth which does not come to it through the outward senses, is one not easy to prove to one who does not receive it, but which I do yet most potently believe. It may be a womanly weakness so to do, for, I confess, nothing more strengthens that faith than intercourse with the little buds of humanity who come "trailing clouds of glory" into our prosaic world.

DR. BARTOL'S ACCUSATION AGAINST THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

In the eighth line of Dr. Bartol's letter, published in THE INDEX of April 19, the word "correctness" should have been printed "earnestness." This merely typographical error, though not of much consequence, we correct in deference to Dr. Bartol's wish, communicated through a friend.

But we have anxiously hoped, for his own sake as well as that of the Free Religious Association, to hear from him directly on the main subject of his letter. He has repeatedly insinuated that the Association as such were guilty of the offensive rebuke administered to him by an individual member at the Providence Convention; and this persistent attempt to lay the blame of one man's offence on innocent shoulders we have proved, by a simple recital of undeniable facts, to be contrary to justice and truth. Every clear-headed reader now understands that perfectly well; and it is not the Free Religious Association that is now on trial. Whoever brings an accusation against another incurs by his own act a sacred obligation, from which he can in no manner free himself, either to stand by that accusation bravely and prove it, or else as bravely to withdraw it. If, being called on by the accused party, he fails to do either of these things, he condemns himself as a calumniator and defamer. We are confident that Dr. Bartol will never be willing to put himself in any such position as that.

Of all men, he can least afford to disregard the demands of equity in this respect. For the second time, we quote from his Anniversary Discourse of March 4, 1877, these solemn words of his own:—

"I received from New York, in return for public words, vague, vindictive, anonymous insinuations, to which I made no answer at the time. My only reply now is to adjure any man, woman, or child, in the body or out, whom I ever in any way have wronged or hurt, by their voice or letter, by telegraph or telephone, through any medium from earth, or heaven, or hell, to speak."

As merely one of many members of an Association which Dr. Bartol has "wronged," we did "speak" a fortnight ago; and he is silent! In the case of another, he has severely denounced the "policy of silence"; will he now adopt it? Was his solemn adjuration, above quoted, a mere piece of empty rhetoric? Did he intend, when he uttered it, to take no notice of a sincere response to it? We cannot believe this. The charge he makes is that the Free Religious Association, as a body, is false to its own professed principles—false to the "freedom" which its Constitution guarantees to all who speak upon its "platform." It is a charge most grave and serious in its nature, affecting the reputation of the Association for sincerity and integrity; and it ought not to be left in the form of an oblique thrust or insinuation. Let it be boldly stated and as boldly defended, or altogether withdrawn. We have denied and (as we believe) disproved this charge; and we now, in all calmness and kindness, publicly request him either to make it good or else to withdraw it altogether.

HOW TO CHOOSE A MINISTER.

To all flocks, pastor-searching or pastor-sought, the following is dedicated with absolute gratuitousness:—

Freely ye have received, freely give—advice. Imprimis, choose not rashly. The foundations of repentance are laid in haste.

Be not too easily captivated by outward show. Even a "perfect love of a man" may not be without disadvantages. Pretty men, male flirts, and gay Lotharios, are not so scarce in this world, even in the clerical profession, that they need be angled for with a golden bait.

Avoid specialists. Whatever his particular excellence—be it orotund delivery, crude masses of unassimilable learning, irresistible personal magnetism, or devotion carried to the verge of insane fanaticism,—if he is one on whom some one talent sits like an excrescence and starves all its fellows, refuse him; demand a whole man or none.

Beware of professional clergymen, men who have gone into the ministry just as they might into law, medicine, the army, or life-insurance, adopting it in cold blood as their means of winning fame or money. These are, of course, of the order, hypocrite absolute; as well have Satan himself for your teacher as one of these. They are usually men of aggressive materialistic egotism, bound to push their way; they will look upon you as their "flock" in several senses of the term. Give them no opportunity to fleece and despise you.

Of course you do not want a man who is pointedly inferior to the general average of intelligence and virtue among yourselves. He could not be in any satisfactory sense your teacher. I often wonder how people can think it worship to listen to sermons that are mere cant,—simply a more or less congruous fermentation of well-known phrases, never even accidentally irradiated by a spark of originality or freshness in word or thought. More profitable than these is the creaking of signs or the hooting of owls.

Refuse peremptorily an aristocrat. Christianity, if it is anything, is democratic, even to communism. Undemocratic men or institutions are reliably bogus, as far as their Christianity is concerned.

Avoid the ultra-conservative who has got everything, from theology to tailoring, "fixed," and intends never to change his mind again. If you want a code, buy a printed one, but distrust the petrified man.

Beware, too, of his near relative, the man who is perfectly satisfied with everything. A soggy soul is that in which there is no least leaven of "noble discontent."

The o'ertrue legend of the Minister's Wooing flows often in a sleepy doggerel gurgling over Pactolian sands, to wit:—

He wooed a congregation;
Fine, wealthy men were they;
And a $5000 salary,
They were willing for to pay.

But, alack! many dangers lie in wait for the adventurers after high prizes; rocks, whirlpools, and shallows, in whose no-thoroughfares many a promising career has been hopelessly stranded. You have seen the underrated preacher? Yes, we all know him well. A few years ago the expression of his face, though a little too defiant and combative, was neither sour nor cynical. He failed to get as remunerative "calls" or appointments as he thought he deserved, and this habit of not being appreciated has grown on him. I saw that look in his face deepen year after year, grow sterner, more strenuous, and bitter, till now it is something sad to see,—such a hopeless eclipse under years of disappointment, wounded pride, and disgust with the world's misjudgments! And I am told that he was a man of superior Johnsonian diction in his sermons; exemplary in every respect; a man of learning and virtue, but nevertheless not wanted by the world as pastor at a fair salary. Rocks, whirlpools, and shallows!

And when the shining goal is won, 'twere often better missed. The church that rears a vast temple, and rewards with much greenbacks its officiants, is quite likely to be ruled by a coterie of "merchant princes" who have acquired fortunes in the crooked, unclean ways of trade, and now fee a holy and talented divine to sanctify and legitimize their title to their gains. Analyze a rich and preëminently respectable church association, and you will generally find a black and bloody basis of rum-selling, slave-driving, smuggling, stock-gambling, usury, life-insurance lottery, puffery, or "protection to home manufactures" by boughten legislation. Such an audience may be flattered or narcotized, but must not be chidden. A large salary is a devil's retaining fee, and operates steadily three hundred and sixty-five days and nights of the year to induce the accipit thereof to pamper his patrons with the sweets of discriminating encomium rather than shock them with truth's tonic bitter. Therefore, if you would have sincerity from your pulpiteer, do not bias his utterance with a large salary.

Be not surprised nor cast down, if the desired, when you have sought him out, proves not to be a very pronounced formal religionist. Remember that Jesus, the pattern of imitation, was put to death for irreligion and blasphemy by the orthodoxy of his day. Remember that he was infidel to the faith of his birth and nurture,—was on the whole a very radical, heterodox sort of person.

Ten to one, the object of your search, when found, will prove not to be a clergyman at all, but excessively laical; you may find him in a factory or on a farm; perhaps in the pages of a book; happiest of all if you find some degree of him in your own hearts. As the best physicians hold for one of their mottoes, "Throw physic to the dogs," so the real shepherds of the soul will toast you, "Every man his own priest." And this sentiment is not a reckless whim, but the expression of a natural law; the light of Nature, to truly fertilize, must fall direct nor be intercepted by the opacities of an intervening mind. It is little less foolish to think of eating, drinking, or loving by proxy, than to think of worshiping or knowing by proxy. G. E. T.

REFLECTIONS.

EDITOR INDEX:—

The prospect for many signatures to the Religious Freedom Amendment petition is not likely to be very flattering in places where the authority of old tradition has been questioned to but slight extent, and where revivals, so-called, are actually raging. The purpose of the petition is apt not only to be misunderstood, but widely and variously misrepresented, and he who circulates it to be made a subject of special prayer. Whether such things are done charitably or not, it is hard to say, since the affection that waits upon idolatry may take quality from the supposed administration to which it avows allegiance. This may be all well enough. We can wait awhile, and long before Congress meets again the prospect may be more favorable. Well, indeed it is small business that people should have their attention diverted by such small things as the perfection of Republican liberty (which some are foolish enough to think those trying to govern themselves ought to be ashamed to stop short of) and the means of its continuance, while they have the more important work on hand of seeking pardon or excuse for the horrid rascality of being born of a parentage not in all respects perfect.

Oh, it just occurs to me why so many of the ministers of the Gospel, a few years ago, were accustomed to declare in sermons that slavery was a divine institution. If the negroes had never concluded to be slaves, what business had they to be born of such black parents, and come into the world in such an unfashionable shape, with their woolly heads and flat noses and thick lips? The wickedness of doing so is just of a piece with that which the revivalists want people to cry over now. We ought to be thankful for small favors. If the God these people worship has as clear an idea of moral responsibility and obligation as the man-stealers, there is surely hope for the nation, at least as long as they are allowed to practise their arts at the expense of other people. They affect really to think that their fellow-citizens have no right to complain of injustice or to criticize absurdity, so long as such citizens do not profess themselves able to explain the whole theory of the universe and the origin and destiny of mankind.

We are not specially interested in attempts or pretensions to do that which is impossible. But all of every creed are alike interested in the security of just government. Who can be so illogical as not to know that while, under a free republican government, every man must be secure in his right to be as austere or as babyish, as prudent or as thoughtless, as upright or as hypocritical, as manly or as subservient as he sees fit to be; to accept what gods or demons he prefers, if any; to think what he will, and say what he thinks, being subject to fair criticism and responsible for invasion of another's rights,—he is not to be required to do service or homage to any sect or party, or even to be burdened with the expense of carrying out other people's projects or caprices?

Experience abundantly proves that, in asking signatures to this petition, you will occasionally meet with a man more outspoken than the rest, who will say that infidels have no rights which other people are bound to respect; that all government and order rest upon the Bible; and that infidelity and treason ought to be treated alike. How thankful might such a person be to the God he worships for that phase of human existence which it is given him to enjoy, and might be given him to illustrate, if that which blossoms now in theory could but ripen out in practice, as the abject slave of a despotism weighted on its march to judgment; by responsibility, not for one only, which would be amply sufficient for its condemnation, but for unnumbered savage outrages and murders! Such proofs are not wanting to show that the world has not yet outgrown the hideous barbarism which not long ago deliberately roasted people at slow fires for fidelity to conscience on occasion of differences of opinion. It would take but little to transform the hypocritical politicians, who are ready to float into official station on such a Stygian current, to persecuting inquisitors.

Indifference to injustice may be as wicked as the indifference of it. It was by being suffered to take advantage of wide-spread popular prejudice that what was called religion became not only the enemy of civilization, but the scourge of the world; and it may be so again unless the worshippers of mammon, who slumber upon a volcano all unmindful of the inexorable law that the energy of active virtue is essential to salvation, and that present blessings of liberty will not long remain where undeserved, shall hasten to arouse themselves from their selfish and inglorious indifference.

It must be confessed, however, that the senseless jargon of this artificial theology, by which natural reason, that sublimest gift of God, is habitually replaced or obscured, is sometimes relieved by utterances much more rational, and that persons who are even inclined to the childish enthusiasm of revivalism will sometimes put forth a salutary doctrine of moral responsibility, so that the hearer is led to exclaim, almost like Pope in the "Essay on Man":—

Good men and honest, when of late they saw
A Christian preacher teach the moral law,
Wondered that souls, by superstition soiled,
Could show some vestige still of sense unspotted.

It would be no more than fair that the more benighted of such teachers and their blindly-led constituency should sometimes awaken sufficiently from their gloomy and debasing mental servitude to reciprocate the justice of favorable construction, and to suspect that those persons who are faithful to the revelations of the real Almighty are none the worse for the moral and manly fidelity which compels the rejection of silly nursery lore. It is high time for all to see that such lore, even as poetical imagery, becomes immoral, repulsive, and contemptible, when authority is arrogated for it above the eternal and unchanging testimonies of Nature's law, involving, as that does, the claims of justice, the dictates of common-sense, the teachings of true science, the substance of all true religion. That law, whose only fit interpreter is reason, proceeding upon the basis of observation, and, by original, divine, and exclusive authority, present with every man in the exact ratio of his enlightenment, must ever be to all honest and intelligent minds the only authoritative expression of the will of the Almighty. Human enactments may give recognition to such portions of that law as come within their legitimate province, but must not be allowed to forbid its further ascertainment.

If truth lies dormant where there is no present capacity to comprehend it, it does not follow that error of wild and distorted fancy, whether born in past or present times, ought to be enjoined or accepted to supply its place; for the extravagant machinery of dogmatism, when made the means of concert of action, becomes ever the patroness of ignorance and the prolific mother of social abuses. However sweet or meritorious might be the grace of pious fraud or that of accordant humiliation, it would be as impious as it would be absurd to assert that the religion which rested on robbery or injustice could be divine. Let us all take timely warning from the muttering thunder which announces the approaching storm, and be true to humanity rather than, by recreancy to the duty of insuring success to this example of free government, which is the hope of the world, give sad occasion not only for the scorn but the pity of mankind. But let us indulge the hope that, in proportion as arrogant and interested assumption and gross ignorance shall recede with the advance of fair inquiry and free discussion, men will come to appreciate better and better the sentiment:—

"How charming is divine philosophy,
Not harsh and crabbed, as dull fools suppose,
But musical."

VISIBLE DARKNESS.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Several weeks since, in a very short communication, I called for information concerning scientific evidence bearing on the subject of immortality. From the tenor of two replies and the able and interesting essay by Mr. Stoddard, I conclude that I may have been laboring under a sad misapprehension. It is clearly made to appear that there is no scientific evidence, nor evidence of any kind,—that all we possess is a "solemn hope" of the god Wiah. In other words, the human conception of immortality is purely mythological. Science must be sorrowful. I deeply sympathize with her!

Moreover, we learn from Mr. T. J. Atwood that she cannot furnish such evidence. These are his words: "If true, it (immortality) lies beyond the domain of science to show it." Valiantly have I striven to imagine something above, beneath, or beyond "the domain of science." I find myself incapable of any such stretch of imagination, and have only succeeded in being reminded of the old problem of creating something out of nothing, or of that "outermost orb" of Milton's known as the "Limbo of Vanity." That "cannot" has a strange sound in mine ear, and again I feel constrained, sorrowfully and deeply, to sympathize with science! Will Brother Atwood be so kind as to inform us how he discovered what evidence science "cannot" furnish?

I asked for a morsel of bread, and received—a whole cart-load of stones! Mere hope, solemn or otherwise, is a thin diet for some intelligent persons. Doubtless it is better than downright despair. Stone walls are useful; if I cannot "go to glory," that is no reason why I should think disrespectfully of the wall.

Mr. Atwood also consoles me by saying that Mr. Lum's logic is "invulnerable." If it is, any the slightest hope of immortality is an absurdity. But Mr. Atwood mentions a "distant probability" and quotes approvingly from THE INDEX: "Human knowledge is far too limited, as yet, to permit a final disposition of it." John Phoenix once asserted a suspicion that the sun must have "wiggled a little" when Joshua "wasn't minding." I fear the afore-said logic must have wiggled a little when Mr. Atwood wasn't minding!

Let us proceed with the indictment: "But few are willing to accept as scientific evidence the mysteries or madness of modern spiritualism." This is too mild. Let us have a fair count. Mystery enough; surely, more than enough; and we will allow no abatement because some high authority has said that genius is closely allied to madness. But vastly more than this can be brought against modern spiritualism, and I could give it a terrible slashing if it were not for one thing, which is this:—

I have a profound and abiding reverence for facts. A methodical and reasonable exposition of facts, as we call science, is to me revelation,—the genuine word of God. Science is the only and universal court of appeals. Let the case be what it will, no other court can have final jurisdiction. It is God's law and the universe its realm. There is nothing beyond, nothing super; whether the question is of God, man, immortality, duty, or whether the building of a boat, the final and conclusive decision must be rendered by science.

It is natural, therefore, that I should have respect and sympathy for any man, or set of men, who are striving to solve a difficult problem by the scientific method. The manner of their pioneering should not frighten us. It may be confused, malarious, disagreeable, and worse; but if the tendency be correct, the attempts, however abortive, should not be condemned as wholly unprofitable. For my part, I would not give a button for all the arguments in favor of immortality from Plato's time down to now. If spiritualism can succeed in finally establishing one of her peculiar phenomena as veritable fact, the world will freely forgive her sins. A scientific demonstration of immortality will richly repay mankind for all the ballooning in "mesmeric heavens," for all confused floundering in "mesmeric hellas." Some worthy people are concerned because so much precious time and talent are wasted in the consideration of other worldliness. But intellect and heart cannot be satisfied with an inherited myth, a "solemn hope." The pangs of doubt impel us to dwell often and persistently on this subject. If spiritualism succeeds, doubtful hope will give place to confident joy; men will be more likely to attend carefully to the duties of this life, knowing that thus it will be better for them hereafter; and the "light from above" will effectually dispel the dark cloud of fettering superstition that has settled down on us from the past, closely enveloping the ancient "hope."

Yes, there is at least one other reason why I am averse to exercising my wits on the follies of spiritualism. Our honored prophets affirm that this nation is destined to pass through a fiery agitation of a religio-political character. In such a case it is clear that if all liberals do not hang together, they may be in danger of "hanging separately," as Franklin said to his comrades. In consequence of their numbers and zeal, the Spiritualists are likely to prove an important element in the strife; perhaps the most important. Brethren, let us associate, reason, and organize together in peace and unity. The times demand it of us as a duty.

Dr. Parkhurst shows himself to be a true brother Yankee by putting several knotty questions to me instead of answering my two. With all due respect I will suggest that he "carried his coals to Newcastle." My position is that of a student, not an expounder of science. But I would like to see his queries answered through THE INDEX, and trust that some one of your readers will feel competent to the execution of the task.

PRESTON DAY.

LONGFELLOW.

I observe, in the list of "popular books sent by mail at publishers' prices" from the office of THE INDEX, Longfellow's poems.

In his poetry Longfellow is of the ultra-romantic school. He might be called a sentimental Romanist. The space which nuns, monks, and cloisters occupy in his verses is large. His Evangeline, which is an imitation of Goethe's Hermann and Dorothea in style, is all in the interest of reactionary Romanism. During his sojourn abroad in his youth, Longfellow became deeply imbued with the medievalism which the German romanticists in literature and art, the Tiecks, Overbecks, and their coadjutors, had made fashionable. Without questioning for a moment his exquisite taste and exquisite poetical faculty, one may regret that he has not more intellectual brawn and muscle. The influence of his poetry is enervating. It is too much drugged with Roman Catholic imagery to be healthful. Certainly it is not the sort of verse which an apostle of free-thought in religion is called upon to circulate. His earliest book of poetry (the title of which, Voices of the Night, was evidently suggested by the Hymns to the Night, of the German mystic, Novalis) contains a "Midnight Mass of the Dying Year." His Golden Legend is pure romanticism and Faust diluted. Even his Hilawatha sings the praises of the Jesuits. I have spoken of the lack of muscle in this exquisite versifier. There is the same lack in Whittier, whose poems, when read separately, are so delightful, while they are monotonous in the mass. The haze of an Indian summer broods over the Quaker poet's verse.

B. W. B.

[The list of books referred to has nothing to do with propagandism; it is only what it purports to be, a list of "popular books." Literature knows no creed, and welcomes all genius. Would Mr. B. object to the sale of Milton or Dante?—ED.]

SHADOWS in portraiture are often an inscrutable mystery to many otherwise well-educated persons. When Queen Elizabeth sat to Zuccheri she desired to be painted "neither with shades to the right nor to the left, but in an open garden light." In other words, Her Majesty was for having her countenance depicted in the similitude of a mufin. A portrait of George III. was sent to China under the emblem of Lord Amherst, in which the features were in half shadow. It was destined for a gift for the Emperor of China, but a Celestial critic inquired why the King of England had one side of his face covered with dirt. Oliver Cromwell warned the artist who painted him that he would not pay him a single penny if he suppressed a pimple or modified a single wrinkle in his rough visage; but Charles II. took Sir Peter Lely to task, and said: "O'ds fish! if that's like me I must be a monstrous ill-favored fellow." A nobleman, both stingy and ugly, refused to pay Hogarth for his portrait on the ground that it was not a good likeness. Whereupon Hogarth threatened to put a tail to it and sell it to the Barnum of those days to be shown with the wild beasts. The money was paid at once.

Sanctuary of Superstition.

SEEKING JESUS.—The glory of heaven will be in seeing Jesus. . . . If we ever weep in heaven, it will be tears of joy at meeting Jesus. Perhaps in that "upper room" also he may show unto us his hands and his side, and we may cry out with happy Thomas: "My Lord and my God!"—Theodore L. Cuyler, D. D., in the Independent.

BENEVOLENT CRUELTY.—O my friends, where are you? If your life is hid with God in Christ, Satan can't get at it. I can now shout over death, and over the grave, and if you can do that all will be well. Now, my friends, if you can't say that, I hope you will have no rest. I hope sleep will depart from you, and you will have no peace until you confess Christ.—Dwight L. Moody, at New York, Feb. 20.

THE BIBLE EARTH LEAGUE.—That truth is often stranger than fiction is once more exemplified by the formation of the "Bible Earth League of Christians" in London, under the leadership of a Mr. Fitzgerald, who purpose to upset the Newtonian system by proving that the earth is flat. The promoter pleads that "the work of surveys and obtaining other incontrovertible proof that the earth is not a rotating revolving globe, will be necessarily expensive, and can only be effected by liberal contributions of Christians." The Bible Earth Monthly will cost six shillings yearly, payable in advance.—N. Y. Sun, May 12, 1876.

A CAMP-MEETING PLACARD.—The following placard was published in the St. Paul, Minnesota, Dispatch of Jan. 26, 1876, which protested against "the Lord Jesus Christ being advertised as one of the attractions":—

TAKE NOTICE!

GREAT GOSPEL CAMP MEETING.

SERVICES WILL COMMENCE THIS EVENING AT THE FIRST METHODIST CHURCH,
COR. SUMMIT AND DAYTON AVENUES.

To these meetings, which will be continued all the week, the following persons are specially invited; viz., all the members of the Legislature now in session; also prodigals of every class, including thieves, pick-pockets, gamblers, blacklegs, rum-sellers, drunkards, the fallen and wandering of every condition and sex.

These meetings will be conducted in old-fashioned Methodist camp-meeting style. Old-fashioned camp-meeting songs and tunes will be sung. Christians of every name who can sing and who have a religious experience to tell are invited to be present and take part in the exercises. W. B. Barber, formerly from Brooklyn, New York, who goes at things in an earnest, old-fashioned way, will be present to conduct the exercises. The Lord Jesus Christ has also promised to be present to save sinners of every class who will come to him.

No reserved seats. Everything free. If you desire seats be on hand early. Doors open at 7½ o'clock; services commence promptly at 7½.

To all, we say, come to these camp-meeting services and become a disciple of Jesus.

WHY NOT?

SUNDAY TRAINS.—The following remarkable statement appears in the North-western Christian Advocate of July 3:—

"The Sunday-train question relating to the coming Chicago District Camp-Meeting must not be misunderstood. The committee stipulates with the railway that there shall be but one Sunday train to run out and back after the Sunday services. The fare is reduced, and perfect order and decorum are observed. One engine and six men can do the work that would otherwise fall upon two thousand horses and many drivers, while thousands of people will thus be enabled, under proper and perfectly possible restraint, to attend religious services on the camp-ground."

This is a very lucid and unanswerable defence of the position of Chicago Methodism on the "Sunday train question." A committee of distinguished Christian gentlemen deliberately stipulate with a railway that a train shall be run to their camp-meeting and back on the Sabbath. Wisconsin Methodism has long been shocked by the running of Sunday trains on the same railway, not to and from camp-meetings, but for the same purpose,—to make money. We have felt that said railway thus profanes God's Sabbath. But Chicago District Methodism deliberately bargain with the same concern to employ "one engine and six men" to do what the general rules of the Methodist Episcopal Church positively forbids,— "doing ordinary work therein."

Seriously, we enter our solemn protest against this whole transaction. It yields the whole question at issue between the Sabbath and anti-Sabbath theories. It is as wicked to run a Sunday train to a camp-meeting as it is to a beer-garden, for the end does not sanctify the means. Is it said that the choice is between the Sunday train and "the two thousand horses and many drivers"? I deny it; there is of necessity no such choice. Better never hold another camp-meeting on the American Continent than for the Methodist Episcopal Church to stipulate for Sunday trains. If such meetings must be held on the Sabbath, leave the people to their own choice how to get to them. And if they will profane the Sabbath let the sin be on their own souls. This action of the committee is exceedingly unfortunate.—Rev. H. C. Tilton, in Milwaukee Christian Statesman of July 18, 1872.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1873.
 TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
 Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.20 for one year, including postage, or 9 cents for three months on trial.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. 40 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Reason and Revelation, by William J. Potter. 10 cents: ten for 80 cents; one hundred, $3.00.

For series of important Tracts see last page of THE INDEX.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited. Orders by mail may be addressed either "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston," or to the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyses the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practicing the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

REV. JOHN MILLER, D. D., has been convicted of heresy by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, N. J., and suspended from the ministry.

SIGNATURES to the Religious Freedom Amendment petition have been received as follows since last week: from Dr. C. W. Fillmore, Providence, Rhode Island, 74; from Mr. Titus L. Mann, Napoleon, Ohio, 90; from Mr. D. P. Willcox, Yankton, Dakota Territory, 228. Total thus far received—5,228.

THE OLD SOUTH MEETING-HOUSE in Boston was sold by the society to those who at present hold it, on the express condition that no religious services should be held in the building on Sunday for thirty years—a mean condition, yet one the former owners had a right to impose. The new proprietors have now got the Legislature, under the alleged right of eminent domain, to cancel the condition after the transfer of the property. It is a disgrace to Massachusetts that her Legislature should thus make itself a party to a flagrant breach of contract.

REV. DAVID MCALLISTER, Secretary of the mis-called "National Reform Association" which is trying to Christianize the Constitution, reported that "only two Christian ministers [in Chicago], of all the large number I have thus far called upon, have declared themselves opposed to the National Reform movement." Bishop McLaren, of Illinois, is announced by Mr. McAllister to be a fresh convert to the Christian Amendment. That the clergy will almost universally support it, when the time for action arrives, may be safely taken for granted.

THE IMPORTANCE of not desecrating the Sabbath is thus strikingly illustrated by Boston Christians: "The pastors and evangelical churches of Boston and vicinity have united in and approved of the gathering of thousands at the Tabernacle every Sabbath for three months, to hear Mr. Moody preach, necessitating the employment of two hundred horse-cars, a large number of omnibuses and private carriages every Sunday, besides the patronizing of the steam-railroads, as the way to promote a glorious revival of religion, save souls, and elevate the standard of piety in the churches."

THE MASSACHUSETTS Legislature have passed a law requiring all religious societies, as well as all literary, educational, benevolent, charitable, or scientific institutions, to report annually on or before the fifteenth of May the amount of their property which is exempted from taxation, on penalty of losing the exemption. The act takes effect on the first of June next—an unnecessary postponement which defers all such reports another year. But the law itself is a very good one, and indirectly recognizes the right of the Commonwealth to tax such property. That is a great point gained in the approach to public justice on this question, and was probably not considered in all its bearings by those who passed the law.

ONE OF the Boston papers says: "The text of the extraordinary letter of the bishop of Nevers to Marshal McMahon, written April 7th, bears out the report of its high clerical pretensions and accounts for the profound sensation it created in France. The bishop writes in discharge of his pastoral duty to a great Catholic population. He assumes that the President is acquainted with the appeal of the Supreme Pontiff to the Catholic faithful against the ever-increasing encroachments of the Italian government. He alludes to the high importance of the commercial treaties with England, now in progress, to the national prosperity of France, but asks what are these interests compared with the religious interests connected with the religious liberty of the Sovereign Pontiff? The letter wholly ignores the fact of the unity of Italy, regarding the present situation as only revolutionary, and asks in effect for the breaking of diplomatic relations with the Italian government. The bishop dreams of reviving the priestly rule of three centuries ago, and of seeing once more the policy of Europe governed by ecclesiastical considerations."

THERE SEEMS to be a growing disinclination on the part of freethinkers, on the death of friends, to conform to the stereotyped funeral ceremonies. A fresh instance of this has occurred lately. The residence of General I. N. Stiles, in Warren Avenue, Chicago, was the scene of a touching funeral a few weeks ago. The wife of the General died on April 7, and on the occasion in question her friends and relatives had assembled to take their farewell of their beloved associate, and to pay their last tribute of respect to her earthly remains. General Stiles is one of the most prominent lawyers in Illinois, and the leading men of the bench and bar of the city were in attendance, but no clergyman was present. The services were of an unusual character, but were conducted in a manner which, as General Stiles said, was in accordance with the desires of his wife. She was a woman of rare intelligence and superior culture, and in common with her husband was a freethinker. When the friends had all assembled in the parlor, General Stiles greeted them with a few remarks in which he explained to them why the usual services had been dispensed with. They might think it strange that no minister was there, but he had consulted his wife's wishes in the matter as well as his own. He then, in a few words, told those assembled some facts in the life of the deceased. She was born in 1837, in Sag Harbor, N. Y. In 1860 she was married, and in the following winter she accompanied her husband to the war. She was present at two battles, and in one of them a shell burst only a few feet from her. She was not only an accomplished musician, but a fine linguist, and was ardently devoted to literary pursuits. General Stiles related a few touching incidents in reference to her last hours, and closed by reading a little poem which his wife had written and presented to him on the tenth anniversary of their wedding. A short memorial was then read by the president of the Athenaeum Club, as was Mrs. Browning's "De Profundis," and then, after the two sisters of General Stiles had sung a hymn entitled "Farewell," the remains were removed for burial. Our readers will remember the exquisite lines, "In Pace," by "J. L. S.," in THE INDEX of January 11, 1877, which, as we happen to know, reached and deeply touched many a heart.

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

Transforming a Religion.

THE JEWS OF THE WORLD IN ARMS OVER THEIR ANCIENT RITUAL.

STRIPPING THE FAITH OF ALL OF ITS PECULIAR FORMS AND OBSERVANCES—ADAPTING THE JUDAISM OF THE BIBLE AND THE TALMUD TO THE CONDITIONS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

Whoever first conceived the idea, lately acted on, of requesting the Jewish congregations of the United States to prepare records of their settlement and of the foundation and development of their synagogues, schools, and other institutions, with a view to the permanent preservation of these local histories, deserves undoubted credit for it. The thought is a good one, and it is well that there is to be no delay about carrying it into execution. A collection of such records, if accurately and intelligently prepared, will prove of considerable and peculiar interest. They will constitute a history of an entirely unique character; the narrative of a religious conflict, that has been in progress for more than a generation past; a persistent struggle in every synagogue and every Jewish household for change, reform, and abolition in an ancient ritual and a revered system of religious observances. That conflict is to-day at its height in the United States as well as other lands, and it will continue in one country or another for generations, perhaps, to come.

The Jews are distributed all over the world to-day, as they have been for a good long while past. Only to-day their dispersal, instead of being a curse and a mark of misery, as people are accustomed to say, increases with every improvement in their condition. With every new country that opens its doors to them, or that invites them by evidences of liberality, the boundaries of their habitations are extended, and the extent of their dispersal is by that much enlarged. No sooner do they see evidences of toleration in Switzerland or Spain than the peculiar people are scattered over that much additional area. What was once a calamity has become, in the nineteenth century, a privilege, a choice, and an evidence of amelioration and prosperity.

In every land in which they have thus dwelt, they have formed numerous communities in city and country, where for centuries they have worshipped and have conducted their households and all the affairs of social life in strict conformity with a peculiar religious code which had its basis in the Books of Moses, but in the course of time was elaborated by the rabbinical scholars into a system of the most extraordinary detail and technicality. That code regulated their services in the synagogues, their prayers in public and private, their table and kitchen, the burial of the dead and the care of the newly born, their betrothals and their marriages, the observance of their Sabbath and their festivals; nearly all their affairs, indeed, of whatsoever character, besides providing tribunals and laws for the settlement of their personal controversies. All the torments of the Middle Ages did not disturb its observance. Persecution only strengthened it, and the vicissitudes and perils of centuries only rendered it the more sacred. But its day has come at last, and for our time has been reserved the impressive spectacle of its decay. With the great change in the temporal condition of the Jews that the enlightenment and liberality of the nineteenth century have brought about, there has come a corresponding change in their religious status. As long as the Jews had no choice but to keep to themselves, their religious system remained intact. But now that they come constantly into closer relations with their neighbors of other faiths, they find many of their traditional observances inconvenient, and some objectionable for other reasons; and an agitation has arisen for their modification, or even entire abolition—an agitation pertinaciously resisted by those of a more conservative disposition,—that is destined not to cease until the entire system is overthrown.

This state of affairs is not by any means precisely the same in all parts of the world. In countries where illiberal laws and an intolerant people make the civil status of the Jews most like that of the past, their religious condition has likewise undergone least change, and there is much less desire for reform than in others where the Jew enjoys freedom and security. Thus it is that there are some parts of the world where the old Jewish code is still observed with the Orthodox strictness of the Middle Ages; but there is no land, no place to which the clamor of the struggle has not penetrated. Not even in Poland or on the Black Sea does the old order of things prevail entirely undisturbed. Even those free spirits who are denounced by the rabbis as apostates proclaim the necessity for reform, and urge it at every opportunity.

It is, however, undeniable that in such regions the cry has been little more than an echo, and compared with what has been going on in other lands, it may be said that in Russia, parts of Austria, Poland, Roumania, and the neighboring provinces and principalities, Turkey and the Asiatic countries, the Jews maintain the observance of their religious system as it has descended to them, uninfluenced to any noticeable extent by the spirit and the working of the modern world.

The assertion that the desire and the struggle for change is in proportion to the improvement in the civil and political condition of the Jew, while true on the whole and as applied to countries widely different in civilization and enlightenment, is not strictly accurate where the differences are not so great.

In France, England, and Holland, where the Jews enjoy entire civil and religious liberty, the agitation is not very persistent, nor has it, comparatively, made very much progress. Changes that were effected in many congregations in the United States years ago are only beginning to be talked about in England; and the Jews of France are equally conservative. This difference is owing partly to the absence of aggressive and inquiring minds, such as abound in Germany, to take the lead, and partly to a difference of national, as distinct from race, characteristics.

Much the greatest advance in the agitation has undoubtedly been made in Germany and the United States. The Jews of these two countries are abreast in that regard; and it is entirely natural that they should be, for a large majority of American Israelites are emigrants from Germany, whence many of them have come with spirits of inquiry and speculation, aroused already at home, and either desirous of reform, or at any rate prepared for it. From Germany they have most of their rabbis and religious teachers, and thither they often send their youth to be educated.

In the United States the Jewish communities are now found in every city of forty thousand population, from one end of the broad land to the other, and there is probably not a hamlet of five hundred souls from the Rio Grande to the Canadian border in which there are not representatives of the ancient race. While every European country is represented among them, a very large majority over all others combined is formed by the Germans, with whom only the Poles compare in number. The Germans here take the lead in the reform movement; the Bohemians cooperate with them. Of the Poles some are among the most progressive, some among the most Orthodox. The English and Portuguese are mainly very conservative. In every community and every congregation these different nationalities are more or less mingled. It is only in a few of the largest cities of the country that the Jewish population is sufficiently numerous and the pick large enough to make the formation of congregations of exclusively one nationality or one shade of opinion possible. It is generally necessary, and in the smaller cities almost always so, to associate all these various nationalities with their diverse characteristics of prejudice, manners, and sentiment. There are thus very few Jewish congregations in the whole land in which the opinions even approach a state of unanimity. There is everywhere struggle, dissension, and upheaval.

In New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Baltimore, and New Orleans there are a few congregations composed entirely of persons who had reached a certain pass in the reform movement beyond which there is very little ritual or ceremony to differ over; very little, at least, that gives any of them inconvenience or annoyance. Here, then, in these few larger cities we find a few congregations in which a certain amount of harmony of sentiment prevails. They have rejected many of the laws relating to prayers, observances, and ceremonies in the synagogue, and pretty nearly all appertaining to home and social life. Most of them entirely disregard practically, even if not avowedly, the laws relating to the use of animal food, the slaughtering of animals, and their cooking. What they have retained is a modified use of Hebrew in their public services, in which there is a large infusion of German and English, a modified observance of the festivals, such as the Passover, the Day of Atonement, and the Jewish New Year's Day, and they still hold, at least formally, to Saturday as their Sabbath. Otherwise they follow the manners and customs of their Christian neighbors.

In these large cities there are also a few congregations of Polish and Russian Jews who, because they have but recently come from abroad, or from other causes, adhere as yet with absolute faithfulness to every letter of the Orthodox Jewish law. These are the extreme opposites to the "reform" congregations, and for the moment are equally unanimous in their opinions. There may be a few individual congregations between these extremes that, from exceptional causes, also get along without serious dissensions; but as a rule, all the other Jewish congregations of the country are in a state of tumult and contention unlike anything experienced in any other religious denomination in the world.

The leaders in this wide-spread and vital agitation, as well as to a great extent its originators, have been the German rabbis. They have had numerous conventions, not only in Germany, where they date back over half a century, but also at various times in the United States. There they discussed most of the reforms that have now been effected; and there they laid the foundation for future agitation, and secured each other's cooperation. There were able, learned, strong, and upright men among them. Dr. Geiger, who but recently died in Berlin, was all his life a famous champion of the reform movement. Drs. Einhorn and Adler of this city were prominent advocates of reform in Germany, and continued the agitation all through the twenty-five years or more that they have lived here. Those rabbis were men who were not only learned in the Talmud, like many of their predecessors of earlier times, but they had also imbibed from modern fountains of knowledge; were filled with progressive ideas, and desired to fit the faith of their fathers in all its usages and appearances to the more liberal and humane age in which it was their fortune to live.

Among the reforms to which they earliest turned their attention were those relating to the services in the synagogues, into which they desired to introduce decorum and intelligence. A book of Hebrew hymns and prayers was then in use which was thought susceptible of a large amount of useful curtailing. The prayers were too many and too diffuse, prolonged the services uselessly and requiring intolerable haste in their recital. Other prayers, again, were objectionable on account of their contents, as, for instance, the petitions for a speedy return to the Holy Land and the restoration of the monarchy of David. During the services the men and the women of the congregations were rigorously separated, the men sitting together in the body of the synagogue, while the women were usually confined to a gallery. On the anniversary of the second temple's destruction, it was the practice to sit on the floor of the synagogue in stocking feet, and recite the lamentations. On the Day of Atonement the elders entered the synagogue in their burial attire, a white cotton robe, and in that attire worshipped the entire day, and frequently the whole of the preceding night, without food or drink, and in a state of the extreme abandon. No prayers in German were permitted. No organ or choir was allowed. Services on many occasions began before daybreak and lasted until near noon. So there were also in regard to the burial of the dead many superstitious practices that needed improvement. There was too much haste in the burials, the departed being hurried to the grave as soon as cold. The relatives were not permitted to see the dying being's last moments. They were removed from the apartment, and were rigidly debarred from contact with the remains, strangers preparing the body for interment, and depositing it in the grave. The relatives, however, were required to give expression to their grief by rending their garments, and by sitting for seven days on the floor in mourning. At the grave there were also various absurd ceremonies. And of a similar character were other customs and observances that in the interest of reason and decorum these rabbis declared must be changed or discontinued.

Among those German rabbis there were others who adhered tenaciously to the old customs and the letter of the old law. They opposed reform of any kind, and there followed a bitter and uncompromising warfare from the pulpit and in the religious press. The rabbis of Poland were particularly zealous in their support of the old order of things, and they resisted the innovators with rage and hatred, and often with threats of violence and curses. Their followers hardly ever mentioned these men of new-fangled ideas without expressing the hope that all kinds of calamities might overtake them; and every ill that did befall them was attributed to divine displeasure at their infidelity.

The opposing parties acquired the designations of "reformers" and "Orthodox," and as such they are known to-day, both in Germany and the United States. There are not two clearly divided bodies who can be classed under these heads, one believing one definite set of doctrines, and practicing one definite ritual, and the other another. On neither side are there any two men who are entirely agreed, and who in their private life retain and have discarded the same share of the old ritual. The "reformers" are fairly described as those who, without being agreed among themselves, some being much in advance of the others in their demands, are constantly endeavoring to institute changes and improvements, and the "Orthodox" are simply those who are resisting them. Reformers in one congregation would not necessarily be so in another that is more advanced. Take a very Orthodox congregation like that old one in Thirty-fourth Street in the city of New York, and there the questions about which war is waged are such as the introduction of a choir or the institution of family pews. The Orthodox there oppose these changes. The reformers demand them. But one who should go somewhat further and propose that the congregation remove their hats in the synagogue, as is the usual custom in houses of worship in civilized European and American countries, would find himself altogether too daring for the most extreme of these reformers. Yet that has been the custom in the congregation of the Fifth Avenue Temple Emanuel, in the same city for many years. The reformers of the Thirty-fourth Street Synagogue would, therefore, be extremely Orthodox in the Fifth Avenue society.

The bitterness that characterized the conflict when the reform movement was initiated has in no wise abated. It is to-day marked in every country by a very great degree of partisan feeling. The rabbis assail each other unsparingly from their pulpits, at conventions, in the Jewish press, and in pamphlets and books. The laity participate to some extent in the controversy, and the Jewish press, in which the main shades of opinion have their pronounced organs, is largely devoted to it. In the United States the Jewish Times and the Jewish Messenger, published in New York, and the Israelite, published in Cincinnati, have long been known as the leading Jewish journals, the Times being the advocate of the more advanced reforms, the Messenger representing the Orthodox, and the Israelite holding a position between the two.

In most congregations the rabbis take the lead in advocating reforms, and they surely bring them about in the end, though in some places more slowly than in others. Where they possess tact and foresight, they remain on harmonious terms with their flocks; but where they are hot-tempered and headlong, the most violent quarrels often occur. A congregation of the old Scotch Covenanters could not have been a more unruly flock to one of the priests of Baal, than the Orthodox members of an average Jewish congregation to such a rabbi. Personal collisions have more than once occurred between the teacher and the taught, contracts have been broken, rabbis have suddenly left their congregations, and congregations have repudiated their rabbis. These occurrences show how little reverence is paid to the office of rabbi. Many rabbis, throughout the land, enjoy the highest respect and affection of their congregations; but it is invariably their personal superiority that causes it.

With this constant open agitation for change and reform by minds dissatisfied with the old customs and observances, other causes combine,—association with people of other faiths, the indifference and, upon some points, the ridicule of the younger generation, even the mere lack of any positive opposing influence; and the result is with all, even the most Orthodox, an almost unconscious but certain advance from their old stand-point of view and feeling; so that daily the Orthodox grow less Orthodox, and the reformers more advanced in their notions of reform. A man, who, ten years ago, would have offered to take up arms in opposition to the introduction of an organ into the synagogue will to-day, be unable to understand how anybody could become so excited over such a matter; and this change will have been effected without his being able to recall the stages of the transformation, or ever reflecting upon it.

There are individuals who prove an exception to this rule, and will not go with the world. Here and there is an old man who observes every ceremony and repeats every prayer as faithfully and as accurately as when a lad he was taught them in his German or Polish home, when the Jews were ill-treated and in danger, and reformers were unknown. Learned in the Jewish lore and ritual; spending an hour or more in prayer every day, strapped in his phylacteries, and four or five on Saturday and the festival days; bowed in the dust on the anniversary of Jerusalem's destruction and other fast days; humbled and stricken as though at the entrance of the tomb on the Day of Atonement; joyous on the festivals; at all times a great authority with Jewish housewives upon questions of dietary law and other household observance; very select in what houses, even of Jewish people, he touches a morsel of food, for fear that it may not have been prepared with strict obedience to the dietary code; confining his food when away from home to boiled eggs and potatoes cooked in the skin; a man well understood by his more worldly Jewish neighbors, but an exception and queer even in their eyes. This kind of Jew looks to Jerusalem as the holy city where David's throne is to be reestablished, and is about the only kind of Jew who has any desire to remove to Palestine. A few individuals of this kind are to be found in different cities of the United States, and here and there a few families of the same type exist. But they are curious even to the Jews. In European countries they are, of course, more numerous.

The Portuguese, as I have already said, are much more conservative throughout the United States than the Germans, and they have been so for a hundred years. They seem to be of a different temperament as well as of a different type of mind; but the time has evidently come when even they are to move. The rising generation of the Portuguese Jews of the United States shows no more of a disposition to follow in the footsteps of their fathers, so far as regards their religious opinions and practices, than the upgrowing Jews of other nationalities. There will be no agitation for reform among the rising generation; at least, in the United States. There will be no occasion for it. There will be nothing to reform. None of the ceremonies, observances, or customs that are now the objects of the struggle for reform, will be followed or practiced by them. They will not have the desire; they will not have the capability. As a rule, they know little or nothing of Hebrew, in which their parents are more or less versed, and of which a knowledge is necessary for an understanding, and for the preservation of the old ritual; they know nothing of this ritual except the slight, imperfect, and superficial knowledge resulting from seeing it in practice without understanding the reasons for it, its meaning, or its origin and authority; they have no affection and no reverence for it, and not even the attachment that grows from habit; they have only seen it denounced and ridiculed; no solemn memories and no loved associations lend in their eyes beauty, authority, and significance to dubious forms as they have done in those of their fathers; they have hardly been accustomed even to observe Saturday as a Sabbath, and the festivals have been little else to them than days of leisure, good fare, and holiday attire. Family, business, and other influences may induce them to join some kind of religious body as they go into life for themselves; but it will likely be more and more congregations with nothing distinctively Jewish about them. Hebrew will doubtless be ultimately dropped altogether as a feature of religious services, and no forms or ceremonies will be permitted for which they do not see some good modern reason. They will adopt Sunday for their worship, such as it may be. After a while they will lose more and more even of the influences of German and Jewish descent. Then intermarriage with those of other faiths will follow, and that can result only in the merging and disappearance of the Jew, so far as those are concerned who are born and reared on American soil. A new element of immigration will constantly come from abroad, but that will go through the same process; and, meantime, the world stands not still beyond the borders of the United States. The process that has been gone through here will not fail in other lands, though it may not be so speedy.

Meantime the present generation continues its war about reform. Entire congregations, as I have stated, have already reached a point at which there is nothing further worth contending about. Take, for instance, in New York, the Fifth Avenue congregation, the Temple Emanuel. The services there consist of a few hymns, brief prayers of a general character, reading from the Pentateuch, and a sermon. The congregation sits as in the ordinary Christian Church, with uncovered heads, families together in family pews, quiet and decorous. There is a fine choir, a handsome religious edifice, the service begins at the usual hour for such a thing, and lasts about the same time as the ordinary church service. There is absolutely nothing peculiar about it, except that some of the hymns and prayers and the reading from the Scriptures are in Hebrew, and that the chapter of the Pentateuch is read from a parchment-scroll instead of a bound volume. But until the station of this congregation is reached, the agitation will not cease, and the generation that has been chiefly troubled by it will die out while it is in progress.

That there is no breaking up into sects with definite differences of forms and ceremonies is owing to various causes, but chiefly to the fact that none of these forms and none of these observances possess sufficient importance to make men rally around them and abide by them. Nothing will permanently satisfy any mind of average intelligence uninfluenced by early association or long habit save their entire overthrow, and were a congregation, in the efforts to discard them, to break up, as has frequently happened, the only result would be that very soon in the severed portions the old struggle would be renewed and carried on as before, the Orthodox growing less Orthodox, and the reformers more advanced in their notions of reform.

A natural inquiry is, "But is this entirely and purely a conflict over forms, or does it involve, also, to some extent, questions of doctrine and principles of belief; and if so, to what extent?"

Dogma is undoubtedly involved to some degree, but it is only collaterally. No essential principle of belief has been made directly the object either of discussion or dissension; but there are two or three which certainly have been drawn into the conflict by implication. One long-settled article of the Jewish creed has been the belief in the coming of a future Messiah, who was to be a personal redeemer, and with whose advent the Jewish people should be restored to their kingdom in the Holy Land; and the hastening of that event is implored in various prayers and hymns that for a long time had been a part of the regular Orthodox service. These passages the reformers have sought to expunge, and, as upon all other points, have met with a tenacious resistance from the Orthodox. Here, then, an undoubted question of doctrine seems collaterally involved; and to some extent it may be so. The doctrine of the Messiah has not itself been directly the subject of controversy, but collaterally it undoubtedly seems to be involved in the conflict over the prayers. And yet that controversy furnishes no indication of the extent of the belief in the doctrine. It is not entertained by any of the reformers, who construe the apparent prediction in the Prophets of the coming of a redeemer in a figurative sense. They do not believe that a personal redeemer is ever to appear. The ultra Orthodox think otherwise. They believe, unfalteringly, that a Messiah will come some day, and may come any. But of a class as Orthodox as that, there are few in the United States, and few in Germany. Doubtless in other countries the proportion is greater; but in America, it has been said so often as to have become hackneyed, that not only do the Jews not believe in a return to Palestine and a restoration of their kingdom, but they would refuse to take part in it if they had the opportunity. The resistance on the part of the Orthodox in American congregations to the proposed modification of the prayers was in truth based upon a disinclination to change of any kind, and from a general distrust of the reformers and a desire to concede nothing to their wishes. The prayers being in Hebrew, understood by few, and well understood by hardly any, their incongruity was not so glaring as might otherwise be supposed.

Another principle of faith that is collaterally involved in the controversy over the ritual is the belief in the divine authorship of the Old Testament, and in revelation as there narrated. If the Old Testament is merely human poetry and philosophy, inspired by nothing save the fire of genius and history, more or less dubious and unauthenticated, as the advanced reformers believe, the many observances enduring to the present day that are based upon passages in the Books of Moses, are entitled to very different consideration from what they should receive if those passages are, as the Orthodox believe, direct communications from God, expressive of his will. Here there is clearly involved a principle of belief of the highest importance; but, like that of the Messiah, it is only collaterally so; it has never been made the subject of congregational discussion or action.

Some reformers who have not gone the length of avowing their disbelief in the divine origin of the Old Testament, draw a fine distinction on this point. Without committing themselves distinctly upon the main question, they say that, even supposing the directions contained in the Books of Moses for the social and religious government of the Hebrews to have proceeded from divine dictation or inspiration, they were evidently designed solely with a view to the temporal condition of the Jews as it was at that time, and they in no way go to the essentials of the religion, and, amid different circumstances, may be altered accordingly. At the time these commands were proclaimed, the Jews were a nation by themselves, were the only people professing the pure monotheistic belief, and were surrounded by idol-worshipping peoples, guilty of all manner of barbarous and immoral practices, from whom it was necessary to keep them separated by numerous marks of distinction in dress, laws, customs, and observance.

That is all changed now, and it was obviously never contemplated that the directions then prescribed should not change likewise. All the minute rules relating to the priesthood and the sacrificial offerings, and those appertaining to the jubilee year, not only cannot be observed to-day, but actually have not been since the upturning of the Jewish State.

Even the most Orthodox do not dream of restoring them, nor do they think them essential to the religion. Equally unessential are the other commands, such as those relating to the animals that may and may not be eaten, to the observance of the festivals, and the wearing of a fringed garment as a constant reminder of their God. On this principle, the reformers ought, logically, to see nothing objectionable in intermarriage by the young people of the rising generation with those to whom their hearts take fancy in other faiths; but very few go quite that far as yet, although it is true that where the reformers oppose intermarriage, it is not on the ground that their creed forbids it, but rather on grounds of convenience and expediency, and for fear of dissensions and unhappiness.

Some of the forms and observances that the reformers have been discarding are based either wholly or mainly on rabbinical authority, such as the fast days and most of the refinements and technicalities about the slaughtering of animals for food and the observance of the Sabbath. In regard to these, there is merely a difference of opinion between the reformers and the Orthodox as to the weight to be given today to the rabbinical synods of the past and to the dicta and views of rabbinical scholars as found in the Talmud and other works,—all this fabric of the rabbis the reformers declare themselves prepared to repudiate so far as their opinions condemn it. They assert that it has no authority, and that the views of rabbinical scholars of the past have no preference over those of the scholars of to-day. The test of reason will be applied to them, and the palm be given to those that best stand that test. In rejecting the Talmud, they are only doing what the Caraites of Russia have always done. This peculiar sect is a class of Jews who have never received the Talmud as of any authority whatever, and have adhered closely and literally to the text of Moses. Many of the observances that the Jews in other places have conformed to for centuries were never known to them. Yet nobody has ever questioned that they were Jews or doubted their Orthodoxy.

It thus results that, however advanced the reformers may be (excepting some who reject formal creed of any kind, and call themselves freethinkers, deists, or what not), they still call themselves adherents of the Jewish faith, and assert that between themselves and their Orthodox brethren—even the most Orthodox—there is no real doctrinal difference, but only a conflict of forms and observance. The essentials of Judaism, they say, are only the belief in one God, the doctrine of the soul's immortality, and the pure principles of morality, whose foundation is in the Ten Commandments; and over these they and their most Orthodox brethren have no difference of opinion.

This is the reform movement among the Jews of to-day,—a movement and a conflict that in many respects have no parallel. It is at the present moment incipient in some countries, and at its very height in others; it will and in all with stripping the old creed of Moses of all the curious excrescences that have grown over it in the course of its marvellous career, as well as of those forms and practices that were by necessity made a part of it in the remote days of its foundation."—New York Sun.

SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT.

NEW APPEAL TO THE FRIENDS OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE TO ROLL UP MAMMOTH PETITIONS TO THE NEW CONGRESS.

TO THE FRIENDS OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE:—

In response to the appeal of the National Woman Suffrage Association issued in November last, petitions from twenty-two States, at the rate of a thousand names per day, during the first ten days of January, were received by the Chairman of our Resident Congressional Committee in Washington, D. C., were counted, classified in States, duplicated for the Senate, and prepared with appropriate titles for presentation in Congress. It has been the custom, heretofore, in the House of Representatives, for the member who was requested to present a woman suffrage petition to slip it quietly into a box without a word, even a friendly member being unwilling to risk the storm of objections and ridicule likely to burst upon his head if he asked for unanimous consent to present it in open house. But now, in the midst of the most exciting Presidential conflict in our national history, when important legislation for the whole country is thrust aside to await the decision of the great question of the hour, our request that these petitions from twenty-two States might be publicly presented and read by their titles, met with a general and cordial response from the leading representatives of all those States, coming from every section of the country, and holding every variety of public opinion. The Speaker of the House, who was asked to entertain a motion to grant unanimous consent to have the presentation made in open House, anticipated the motion by himself presenting the request.

A single objection would have sent them all to the box in silence. There was no objection, and twenty-five representatives arose in succession and presented petitions numbering seven thousand names from twenty-two States. Some of the oldest representatives said "It was a grand scene,—the finest demonstration on the woman question ever made on the floor of the House." The following day the duplicate petitions were presented in the Senate in the same spirit, with earnest commendations from leading senators.

Three thousand more names had already arrived, but were not classified and labelled, and on January 31 a second public presentation in House and Senate was made in an equally courteous manner by other representatives and senators from twelve States. In all, more than ten thousand names to Sixteenth Amendment petitions were presented on January 19, 20, 22, 23, 31, and February 7, by Representatives Banks, of Massachusetts; Blair, of New Hampshire; Bland, of Missouri; Brown, of Kansas; Cox, of New York; Eames, of Rhode Island; Fenn, of Colorado; Hale, of Maine; Hamilton, of New Jersey; Hendee, of Vermont; Hoar, of Massachusetts; Holman, of Indiana; Jones, of New Hampshire; Kasson, of Iowa; Kelley, of Pennsylvania; Knott, of Kentucky; Lane, of Oregon; Lapham, of New York; Lawrence, of Ohio; Luttrell, of California; Lynde, of Wisconsin; McCrary, of Iowa; Morgan, of Missouri; O'Neill, of Pennsylvania; Springer, of Illinois; Strait, of Minnesota; Waldron, of Michigan; Warren, of Connecticut; Wm. B. Williams, of Michigan; and by Senators Allison, of Iowa; Boggs, of Missouri; Burnside, of Rhode Island (for Connecticut and Rhode Island); Cameron, of Pennsylvania; Cameron, of Wisconsin; Chaffee, of Colorado; Christianity, of Michigan; Cockrell, of Missouri; Conkling, of New York; Cragin, of New Hampshire; Dawes, of Massachusetts; Dorsey, of Arkansas (a petition from Maine); Edmunds, of Vermont; Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey; Hamlin, of Maine; Kernan, of New York; McCreery, of Kentucky; Mitchell, of Oregon; Morrill, of Vermont; Morton, of Indiana; Oglesby, of Illinois; Sargent, of California; Sherman, of Ohio; Spencer, of Alabama (a petition from District of Columbia); Thurman, of Ohio (a petition from Kansas); Wadleigh, of New Hampshire; Wallace, of Pennsylvania; Windom, of Minnesota; and Wright, of Iowa. Members who were not on the floor during the general presentation, improved the first opportunity to ask for unanimous consent, that the women of their State might receive the courtesy which had been extended to others, all the members taking evident care to commend attention to the subject.

Upon being asked to present the Massachusetts petition, Judge Hoar said to Miss Anthony: "I am glad to see you on the floor of the House, and I should be glad to see you here, returned by your own constituents."

Senator Sargent, upon introducing the California petition, said: "To deny the ballot to one-half the people of the United States, who are recognized as citizens by the Constitution, is an injury to the country, if those excluded have at least the average virtue and intelligence of the voting class. I claim that the women of the United States are the equals in intelligence and the superiors in virtue and good intentions of the men, and that their influence at the polls would purify elections and give us a better class of public officials. It cannot be insisted that women do not need the ballot for self-protection, while laws exist in so many States putting them under disabilities as to property, inheritance, business, and even the custody of their children." He called attention to the rapid growth of the woman suffrage movement in England and in the United States, and said: "But the advocates of this measure should not be left to the herculean task of applying to the States in detail. The colored man would never have had a vote left to that process. Congress should fairly submit the question to the people, as is its custom in such matters, and the people can be safely trusted to decide it rightly."

Senator Dawes, Senator Wright, and Senator Christianity urged early and fair consideration of the merits of the question, the latter remarking that his own observation proved that the forty thousand citizens of Michigan who voted for woman suffrage were among the most intelligent, thoughtful, and benevolent people of the State.

Mr. Bland, upon presenting the second Missouri petition in the House, added: "I will say that there are, I believe, a hundred thousand more on the way." (Laughter.)

The Congressional Record now contains the names of prominent men and women citizens from twenty-two States asking for national protection for the rights of women. But letters from every State prove that not one-tenth of the friends of woman suffrage had an opportunity to sign the petitions. Venerable men and women eighty-five, eighty-three, and seventy-six years of age, men and women of middle age, and young men and women full of enthusiasm and willing to work, have written to the Chairman of our Resident Congressional Committee that they have gone through snow and sleet and rain at the most inclement season of the year, obtaining signatures in most unexpected quarters, but pressed for time (since all the petitions were to be sent to Washington by January 10), and far from being discouraged and weary, their only regret was that we could not postpone the presentation that they might roll up larger petitions.

In answer to the general desire of the friends of woman suffrage throughout the country, and after counsel with friends of the cause in House and Senate who intend to advocate a Sixteenth Amendment for women in the new Congress, we now issue another call for new mammoth petitions to the Forty-fifth Congress. We urge the women of the United States, who are taxed without representation, governed without their own consent, classed with lunatics, paupers, criminals, and idiots before the law, denied the custody of their own children and their own persons, compelled to stand bound hand and foot while licensed and protected crime and vice tempt and sweep away their nearest and dearest, to work now for their own enfranchisement with the same energy, devotion, and enthusiasm which they have hitherto devoted to thankless toil in their homes and in the great fields of reform. Canvass every city and town and village and farm throughout the broad land. Continue to labor early and late. Remember it is for your homes, your firesides, your sons, and your daughters. Work while others pray, and you will return rejoicing bearing your sheaves with you.

Call Sixteenth Amendment meetings, organize a local society, read to your friends this Appeal. Urge them to circulate the petitions. Ask local journals to reprint this paper. Subscribe for a woman suffrage paper. Keep two copies of the petition always on hand, and lose no opportunity of obtaining signatures. Have each name written plainly with ink on both papers, one for the House and one for the Senate. Ask for the signatures of all who signed the late petitions (since these are to be presented to a new Congress), and as many more as possible. Do not fear refusal. Many write to us that those who refused yesterday sign to-day. Even active opposition will awaken thought, and the end of fair argument must be a verdict in favor of human rights.

Read carefully the instructions "To Signers" at head of petition, and also at head of "Petition for Relief from Political Disabilities." Do not forget to ask each signer to remit ten cents to our Treasurer in Washington. To reach one hundred thousand persons who have at various times signed woman suffrage petitions in the various States, and furnish each one with copies of the petition, and an urgent request to sign and circulate, would cost us at least 100,000 x .05 = $5,000. No one supposes we ever had a tithe of that amount in our Treasury. Our work will be limited only by our resources. Every dollar and every dime received will be used to carry on Sixteenth Amendment work. If you need more Petition Headings and Appeals, you can obtain them by mail, post-paid, from the Chairman of our Congressional Committee in Washington, D. C., for 15 cents per dozen, $1.00 per hundred, or $10 per thousand.

When you have obtained all the names possible, roll up the two petitions (pasting together your own and those circulated by your friends), and send by mail to Sara Andrews Spencer, Chairman of Resident Congressional Committee, corner of Seventh and L Streets, Washington, D. C. Every name sent to this address will be appropriately classified and presented by the proper Representative and Senator. All petitions should be received in Washington before December 1, 1877.

On behalf of the National Woman Suffrage Association.

THE LIBERAL LEAGUE AND THE GRASSHOPPERS.

THE EFFECT OF FASTING AND PRAYER ON GRASSHOPPER NOISE.

The Minneapolis Liberal League, on Sunday last, adopted the following address to the people of Minnesota, and that it may be seen and read by the people, they ask for it a place in the columns of the Pioneer Press. Here it is:—

"It has pleased the Governor of this State, in deference to the petition of various religious bodies, to designate a day upon which all the people, with fasting and humiliation, are urged to pray for deliverance from the threatened grasshopper calamity. It is fair to presume that this petition of these religious bodies is made in full belief that the end sought can be attained by the means proposed. This belief is also now accepted and proclaimed as true by the State, through its official head. We hold that the belief is palpably untrue, its influence pernicious, and at this day a marked discredit to the intelligence of Minnesota.

"The doctrine of the proclamation is based upon the assumption that the grasshoppers are a special scourge sent by the Supreme Being upon our State in punishment for sins committed. If any persons really believe this theory, we appeal to their candor as to whether such punishment does not seem to be cruelly indiscriminate and disproportionate to any known offences. Unless it be a great sin to be very poor, are the suffering men, women, and children of our frontier sinners above the comfortable people in the Eastern States? Besides, see what a pitiful picture we make by this business. Some of the settlers out in Nobles County, we will say, have told lies. For this offence there comes down now the great First Cause in the Universe to whip the whole western line of settlements with grasshoppers. Next on the scene appear all the inhabitants of Minnesota, a great concourse led by the governor, with garments rent and bodies dilapidated by voluntary hunger, trying by genuflections and such-like persuasions to stop the whipping!

"It is plain that all external disasters and annoyances, great or small, whether of fire, or flood, or pestilence, or heat, or cold, or any other thing, must all alike have their origin either in the orderly processes of Nature or all alike in the direct personal intervention and management of the Creator. The magnitude or the rare occurrence of a calamity in no degree implies a different law or origin from that of ordinary events. If grasshoppers are a providential infliction, so are rats, potato bugs and mosquitoes.

"The only hypothesis, therefore, which the rational man can accept as to this destructive insect is that it is subject to a line of natural causes, both in its coming and going. Now then, are prayers and fasting likely to banish it? For four years past many of the frontier people have not ceased to pray; and they have prayed with great unction and importunity, because their bread was at stake. The grasshopper, meantime, has continued to chirp and to multiply. Nor is this experience a new one. For thousands of years the generations of men have been accustomed to call upon heaven lustily as a cheap way of deliverance from physical ill, the frequency and urgency of the call being generally in direct ratio to the ignorance of the people. Yet from the beginning down to this day, outside of the so-called sacred history, there is not one well authenticated instance of such prayer having been answered—not one! The dictates of reason and all our actual experience is, fight manfully against physical evils with your own brain and hands, and thus manfully submit to the inevitable. Prayer is still left us, but it is simply communion with the All-Father in which material good or evil is best not thought of. What man in Minnesota who has lived his life with open eyes really believes that there will be one grasshopper the less by reason of this day of supplication? How thoroughly astonished everybody, including the above-mentioned petitioners, will be if these pests should really disappear provably in response to the prayers of the 28th of April!

"Once more the respectable old experiment is to be repeated; and this time the stage is so conspicuous, the spectators so intelligent, the calcium light of science meantime streaming down, that any feats of legerdemain will hardly be successful. Let it also be remembered that the prayers of that day are not answered by mere increase of goodness or piety, unless thereby grasshoppers be destroyed. To the end that the exact and true result may be known, we call upon all thoughtful men to note carefully and systematically the condition of the eggs and young insects in their respective neighborhoods on the 25th inst., and then again on the 27th, and so on from time to time through and communicate their observations to the entomological commission lately established by the United States in our behalf, and which will soon be in the field prosecuting its investigations in the same direction. Then if what shall actually happen cannot be accounted for except by miracle, a miracle it shall be."—St. Paul Pioneer Press, April 19th.

VIEWS OF A BROAD CHURCHMAN.

Rev. John Service, of Inch, England, recently published a small volume of sermons, which attracted no notice till an article in the Spectator, written, it is said, by Thomas Hughes, called attention to the work. This review awakened curiosity; other papers noticed the book; the publishers were soon obliged to issue a second edition to meet the demand, and now a third edition is called for. This shows that sermons are not such a drug in the market as many people imagine; a fresh, earnest, first-hand dealing with the great vital questions of life and duty always finds waiting readers. The sermons of Mr. Service are characterized by a frank, forcible, manly, yet reverent treatment of religious topics. He is a nineteenth century Churchman; and while he holds firmly to the historical religion and its institutions in a large and generous way, he uses his ears and eyes, and is as ready to believe the new science as the old traditions. His sermons show what breadth and diversity of sentiment and variety of feeling and character there are in the Established Church, which really includes a number of sects in a single body, and needs but a little further enlargement of its lines and scope of operations to be national in the sense of representing the religious thought and life of the English people. Mr. Service believes in the Church, but he thinks it must hold its place not by prescriptive title, but by becoming truly helpful; it must be the Church beneficent. He "does not believe in any magical effect belonging to the habit of attending regularly," and complains that so "many good people make of their church-attendance a substitute for various cardinal virtues and an atonement for many sins and shortcomings." But if the services were made what they ought to be, he thinks they would be invaluable as a religious and educational help and socializing and humanizing influence. He is not scared by science, but says "that when Christianity is opposed in any sort of way to science, it is made to reject the help of its best friend against its worst enemy." And he boldly says that "for one man who is shaken in his belief of this or that religious doctrine by arguments advanced by men of science, a hundred might perhaps be counted who owe a suspicion of the religious teaching, or a contempt for it, to apologists for Christianity, who undertake to defend it against science, and succeed only in showing with what bad arguments a good cause may come to be supported." He does not imagine that all men can adopt the notions of God, which are cast in the prevalent theological moulds, and he says, "Whether we will or no, God will be different to different men's thoughts; but that each man should think for himself, and should think freely rather than according to some common notions,—this, if anything is sacred and certain, is sacred and certain. Poorer, more irrational, more superstitious notions about God, it would not be possible to find anywhere on the face of the earth, than are common among ourselves, and, I will venture to say, are commonly enough preached among us." Authority in the sphere of religion, he contends, has no place. The only authority in its domain is truth. "The authority of truth is all that it is good for any soul that religious beliefs should have." The stereotyped notions of heaven he has quite outgrown and sloughed off. The projection of pure selfishness into another world does not strike him as specially desirable, and in the heaven of many if not of most people there is no room for "what is most sublime and glorious in man's being and history—his love of his kind, his courage, his magnanimity, his pity, his self-sacrifice. They superannuate the moral part of man." "David Livingstone, wandering through Africa on a moral errand—an errand of pure humanity,—drinks even in the burning and alien desert from fountains of deeper satisfaction than he could have done if he had stayed at home and cultivated his own farm and soul. We see no such room anywhere in heaven as in the heart of Africa for this moral activity, if the common representations of heaven are correct. They do not seem to provide at all for the exercise of some of the noblest and best feelings of our nature." Mr. Service writes with admirable simplicity and directness.—New York Graphic.

MR. BRADLAUGH'S PROSECUTION.

LONDON, April 21.

Irish-Americans ought to be interested in the result of the Salford election; though not, perhaps, pleased. The American politician who angles for the Irish vote ought to be not less interested. Here is a large English constituency, next door to Manchester, with as large a mingling of Irish voters as any place in England, except Liverpool, can boast. The Liberal candidate, Mr. Kay, or his managers for him, think it necessary to seek Irish support by a qualified pledge in favor of Home Rule. The result is the election of a Tory. The Irish vote was secured, but a still larger English vote was alienated. It is admitted by both parties that this is the true explanation of the result, and there is some reason to suppose the Liberals mean to profit by the teaching. It is their coquetry with the Home-Rule party in Parliament which has made that party important. It is the Liberals who are responsible for Messrs. Bigger and Parnell, the two Home Rulers who are just now occupied in proving the fitness of Ireland for separate Parliamentary government by doing what they can to make all Parliamentary impossible. It is the Liberals who to some extent still believe in that policy of conciliation which, as Mr. Froude has shown, has been so often tried during the last fifty years, and so uniformly failed. The Tories are not free from the same reproach, but with them it has been the exception, not the rule. A debate is shortly to come off in the House on this very question of Home Rule. It may then be seen whether the Salford lesson has been well learned.

The prosecution of Mr. Bradlaugh for selling an obscene book has filled some space in the papers, but the whole matter may be briefly stated. The book in question is not of the usual Holywell-Street order. It is a book which (as I am told, for I have not seen it) undertakes to give a certain amount of popular physiological instruction, and especially to supply practical directions for preventing an undesired increase of the population. I should suppose it was such a book as Miss Martineau would have approved. The real complaint is, that the book is brought by its cheapness within reach of the masses. It is sold for sixpence, and has now been advertised by this prosecution to an extent which will insure it a largely increased sale, no matter what police precautions may be put in force against it. Mr. Bradlaugh's position is a plain one. He took up the sale as a matter of principle. He contends that he has as much right to sell this pamphlet at sixpence as Messrs. Churchill have to sell elaborate treatises on similar topics at half a guinea. He will doubtless be able to prove that one is no more "obscene" than the other. But I apprehend he will fail in the end. He will be tried before a British judge and British jury, who will be likely to agree in suppressing a sixpenny tract which enables unmarried young men and women to indulge as much as they like in sexual intercourse without fear of the usual restraining consequences. They will be the more ready to adopt this view from the fact that Mrs. Besant is indicted along with Mr. Bradlaugh, and that the two must be acquitted or convicted together. And there is a strong general feeling that, if such literature must be sold, a woman is not the person to be publicly concerned in its sale. All this may be prudery and unscientific to the last degree. I am expressing no opinion. I am only recording what I believe to be the state of the British mind on this matter.—G. W. S., in the New York Tribune, May 5.

THE OLD SOUTH BILL.

The House passed the Old South bill yesterday, there being only thirty votes in opposition. The bill provides that the Governor of the Commonwealth, the Mayor of the city of Boston, the President of Harvard College, the President of the Massachusetts Historical Society, the President of the American Antiquarian Society, and the President of the New England Historic-Geographical Society, ex officio, and William Gaston, John Lowell, Samuel E. Sewall, Henry Lee, Edmund Quincy, Samuel A. Green, Martin Brimmer, and John D. Long, and their associates and successors, are hereby made a body corporate by the name of the Trustees of the Old South Meeting-house in Boston, for the purpose of acquiring and holding the Old South Meeting-house in Boston, and the land under and adjacent to the same, upon the corner of Milk Street and Washington Street in said city, for historical, memorial, educational, charitable, and public religious uses and none other, with all the powers and privileges, and subject to all the duties, liabilities, and restrictions set forth in chapter sixty-eight of the General Statutes and acts in addition thereto. Said corporation shall have the power to take and appropriate to the uses of said corporation said meeting-house and land; provided, that in case it shall exercise said power, it shall, within sixty days from the time of said taking and appropriation, file in the registry deeds for the County of Suffolk a description of the premises so taken as certain as is required in a common deed of conveyance of land; and any party aggrieved thereby shall have the right to apply for a jury to assess the damages sustained by him, in the manner and with the effect provided in the seventy-ninth section of chapter forty-three of the General Statutes. And said corporation shall also have power, until the foregoing powers are exercised, to take a lease of said meeting-house and land, and hold the same thereunder for the purposes aforesaid.

The officers of said corporation shall consist of a board of managers, the number of which shall be fixed by the by-laws, and of which the six first named in the act shall be members ex officio, and two shall be elected annually by the City Council of the city of Boston, and the rest shall be elected by the members of the corporation; and said managers shall elect one of their number president, and shall also elect a secretary and a treasurer. All officers shall hold over until others are chosen in their stead. New members may be admitted in such manner as the by-laws shall provide.

Said corporation may make contracts with the Commonwealth for the use of said meeting-house for the annual Election Sermon, and with the Commonwealth or the city of Boston for its use for any public purposes not inconsistent with the provisions of this act. Said meeting-house and land shall be exempt from taxation while used for any of the purposes aforesaid. The act takes effect on its passage.—Boston Journal, April 27th.

NO PIONICS FOR THE PIOUS.—Who are ready to come to the front when a picnic, a pleasure excursion, a worldly party, or other pleasure-seeking movements are proposed? Are they, in fact, the class that always attend prayer-meetings, that are always in a revival state of mind? Do they belong to the class whose faces shine from day to day with the peace of God pervading their souls? Are they the Aarons and Hurs that stay up the hands of their pastor with continual and prevailing prayer? Are they spiritual members, whose conversation is in heaven and who mind not earthly things? Who does not know that it is the worldly members in the Church who are always ready for any movement in the direction of worldly pleasure or amusement, and that the truly spiritual, prayerful heavenly-minded members are shy of all such movements? They are not led into them without urging, and weep in secret places when they see their pastor giving encouragement to that which is likely to be so great a stumbling-block both to the Church and to the world.—President Finney, of Oberlin.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE GOSPEL OF HEROIC UNBELIEF.

Perhaps 'tis best that some souls should not see
The higher truth, the blessed verity
To which we cling through all life's good and ill;
That we may know that God is greater still
Than our sublimest thought or dearest dream,
Because these ever to high duty beam,
Who "without God" are yet so full of Him,
They help to make our faith less vague and dim.
O when we see such souls with "lesser light,"
So brave, so buoyant, scornful death's cold night
With such sweet courage, can we not endure?
Do not their very doubts make heaven more sure?

FROM THE SPANISH OF YSOLDE DE QUELSI.

You tell me there is Heaven
Beyond the grave;
That Christ died on the cross
My soul to save.

That he who died for me
Now reigns on high;
That what you call the soul
Can never die.

I know what'er I do
For good or ill,
Even when my life is o'er,
Endureth still.

I pray that I may learn
To do the best;
Gladly to God I'll trust
For all the rest.

Fresh may the hearts I love
My memory keep;
For nothing else I hope
But dreamless sleep.

MR. JAMES S. BEDEL, Secretary pro tempore, writes as follows from Hudson, Michigan: "We have just organized a Liberal League in this village. President, L. R. Pierson; Secretary, Dr. F. O. Baker; Treasurer, Philip Sewald; Councilors, H. Welch, S. Lamb, J. B. Allen, and R. W. S. Johnson. We have a membership of forty-nine. I think we shall send for a charter soon. . . . Our prospects are fair for a large League. The printed matter you sent me last came just before Mr. B. F. Underwood visited us. He gave us four lectures, which were very entertaining and instructive. The hall was well filled every evening by a fine-looking and intelligent audience. The Patriotic Addresses and other papers were freely distributed, and have had a good effect in opening the minds of the people to the great movement before us. . . . Our League was organized Sunday, April 15."

THE LONDON Jewish Chronicle, singularly enough, defends the union of Church and State in England, but offers some reasons for its preference. It discusses the "continued movement of Great Britain toward the disestablishment of the Church, which has taken the significant title of 'Religious Equality.' The Jews profess little interest in the question beyond the benefits or disasters to common humanity which it involves. The separation of Church and State in England, in the Chronicle's view, would make a ragged wreck of a very compact social structure, which is the shelter of multitudes and the spiritual home and shrine of large classes, whose faith and hope and consolation are built upon the foundations of the Established Church. The Jewish organ characterizes such a spiritual and temporal rupture and demolition of idols as 'an act of vandalism from which thoughtful and sensitive minds may well recoil.' In the view of the Jewish editor the intimate association between Church and State has incidentally produced the most beneficial effects for the country at large. Each is a complement of and at the same time a check upon the other. They act together as sort of mutual monitor, and are a combined protest against both religious and political intolerance. The Jews are well enough off under the consolidated institution of Church and State. What is passing in the United States, where religions are perfectly free, proves at least that the Jews could gain nothing by the abolition of a State Church. Religious equality is bearing its fruits in the United States, and among them are a feeling and practice of intolerance which does not and could not exist in England. It crops out particularly against the Jews, and the Chronicle cites several late instances of intolerance toward the Jews in America, and the very opposite treatment of them in England in parallel cases. After looking calmly over the whole field of the Established Church and religious freedom and equality, the Chronicle gives a decided verdict to the former in the interests of humanity in general." All this is interesting. That there is a growing intolerance in the United States, and that it presses heavily on the Jews in some places, is undoubtedly true. But the answer is that Church and State are not thoroughly separated here, and that the tendency at present is to increase, not diminish, their connection. The Liberal League movement, under some name or other, is destined to vindicate its own necessity, as the only preservative of religious equality and liberty. For our own part, we are inclined to prefer an honestly avowed marriage of Church and State, like that of England, to the dishonest and clandestine concubinage of the two which to-day is demoralizing both Christians and liberals.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Tenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston as follows:—

Thursday evening, May 31st, at 7.45 P. M., business session in Horticultural Hall, for the election of officers, reading of reports, and consideration of the practical work of the Association. A special discussion is also invited on the proper interpretation of the word "scientific" in the first article of the Constitution of the Association.

Friday, June 1st, at 10 A. M. and 3 P. M., sessions in Beethoven Hall for Essays and Addresses. Morning subject: "External Dangers of Religious Freedom." Essayist—C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, N. Y. Afternoon subject: "Internal Dangers of Free Thought." Essayist—Rev. Wm. R. Alger, of New York City. Among the speakers invited whose attendance we have reason to expect are Prof. Felix Adler, of New York; Rabbi Lasker, of Boston; Wm. Henry Channing, of England; Rev. Dr. Dudley, of Boston; and Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, of Illinois. Further announcements hereafter, especially in the Boston dailies.

A Social Festival is to be held Friday evening at Horticultural Hall. Col. T. W. Higginson will preside. There will be brief speeches, music, conversation, refreshments, and a chance to contribute to the Treasury of the Association.

W. J. POTTER,

Secretary.

MR. LONGFELLOW ON TRANSCENDENTALISM.

So profoundly important a topic do we consider the relations of science and its method to the Transcendental philosophy of religion, that it has been our wish for years to see a general discussion of it, conducted at the same time with the thoroughness and frankness of treatment which are due to truth and the kindness of tone which is due to fellowship in the pursuit of it. In both these respects the letters from Rev. Samuel Longfellow which appear below are a model; and it is with peculiar pleasure we are permitted to publish them. Mr. Longfellow is by nature both a poet and a thinker, and has made his name in very many minds a synonyme for brave yet reverent and tender radicalism in religion. What such a man as he has to say on this great subject will command the strict attention of all who are interested in it; and we augur well of a discussion which has elicited already such statements as his and that of Mr. Mills. We have numbered the sections of his letter for greater convenience in making the comments which he courteously invites.

CAMBRIDGE, April 28.

MY DEAR ABBOT:—

After hearing your lecture at Horticultural Hall—and I need not say that I listened to it with close attention and interest,—I wished to write you a few words about it, but waited, hoping to read it in print. Somehow I missed the number of THE INDEX in which it appeared. But it is not too late for me to say something of what was in my mind, trusting to my memory.

1. I failed to see, and I still fail to see, the necessary contradiction between the "scientific method" and the Transcendental position that there are certain primal ideas and sentiments given in the constitution of the human mind, by the operation of its laws springing up spontaneously and perceived immediately, i. e., intuitively or by self-evidence, and that these are authoritative in the sense of being a trustworthy and sufficient ground of belief. It seems to me that the scientific method of observation, verification, and induction may fairly lead a man to the conviction that the ideas of God, Right, Truth, Immortality, are such primal ideas given in the human mind and springing up by its laws, under certain conditions; that these are not the results of reasoning, but data and grounds of reasoning; and that they are not merely subjective notions, since he finds with them an inherent tendency and necessity to regard them as truly representing some objective reality.

2. Surely all science starts from certain assumptions, unproved and unprovable, such as the trustworthiness of the senses by which we observe the outward world, and the trustworthiness of that necessary inference which we make that there is an outward world corresponding to our subjective perceptions. Is it unscientific to hold that we have spiritual faculties by which we perceive spiritual facts (i. e., ideas and principles), and that these faculties are trustworthy? Is it unscientific in me to say that, observing my own mind, I find these ideas and sentiments spontaneous there—instinctive, intuitive; that I find my individual experience verified in the history of the race, these same ideas and sentiments being, under some form, almost universal; that I make the induction that they represent, or present, an objective reality; that my intuition is indeed a looking upon a reality?

3. But it is asked, if the ideas of God, Right, Truth, Immortality, be spontaneous and intuitive in the human mind, why do not all men alike have them? Surely an instinct and a faculty may be native to man, and yet not equally developed in all men. You would call hunger a natural human instinct; yet all men do not hunger equally, nor for the same kinds of food. Sight is a human faculty, acting spontaneously; yet all men do not see equally far, nor with equal accuracy.

4. Our idea of God, or our conception of him, is doubtless a complex one, and a highly and long developed one; but at its heart is the simpler primal conception of Invisible Power, other than ourselves and the visible world, which lies under all the varying conceptions which men have had of God.

5. I find scientific men everywhere speaking of Causes, Forces, Atoms; all conceptions of the mind, springing up instinctively and spontaneously and believed to be real outside of the mind, because, in common phrase, "we are so made that we cannot help believing it." The Positivist, however, denies their reality, and says we have no right to speak of Cause or Force, but only of an observed sequence of phenomena. Perhaps he is the only consistent anti-intuitionist, yet he speaks of the obligation to live for others; on what ground I do not know. Why should we live for others, except that a native, instinctive, authoritative impulse moves us to do so?

6. One word about authority. Surely there is a vast chasm between the ecclesiastical assertion of an external authority, to which we are bound to render obedience because it imposes it, and the Transcendentalist's inward authority of the constitution and laws of our mind. Can there be any other definition of freedom than obedience to that constitution and law? Of course you do not consider the Free Religionist absolved from that obedience. You seemed to consider him bound by the scientific method, as opposed to the Transcendental. And I understood you to imply that a Transcendentalist could not logically or fairly stand upon the "free-religious" platform. Not, of course, that you wished to read out the individual Transcendentalists who may be there; but you felt their need of conversion for full fellowship.

7. A word, also, about your statement that "the appeal is to the intellect alone." Surely you do not mean to rule out imagination and feeling as avenues to certain classes of truth. The passion for Right, for Love, and for ideal Good and Beauty, is as strong in some minds as the passion for truth in others. But no doubt all feeling, all sentiment, all ideality, needs to be balanced by the truth of the understanding.

I have written hurriedly; but you will get at my meaning, I think, and believe me for all differences no less truly yours,

WEDNESDAY [May 2.]

MY DEAR ABBOT:—

I am much obliged to you for the copy of the lecture, which I am glad to have and to read. It comes just as I am packing for a journey: so that I can only now say what I meant to have written in my previous note—that I do not think the Transcendentalists ever regarded the spiritual intuitions as infallible. Nothing human is that; the scientist would not claim it for his experiment or his induction. He would regard these, under proper conditions, as sufficient grounds of certitude; and that is all that the Transcendentalist regards his intuitions to be. Of course, both believe that they are not deceived.

Of course, too, what is a sufficient ground of belief, in any particular instance, to one man may not be to another. There are men who do not see the force of an argument or a logical inference. But the Transcendentalist believes that the insight or intuition of the mystic will prove to have been as valid as the observation and deduction of the scientist.

Yours for the truth, and the whole truth,

SAMUEL LONGFELLOW.

1. The "necessary contradiction between the scientific method and the Transcendentalist's position," if we mistake not, appears in this, that the scientific method claims for the logical intellect or understanding, beginning with observation of facts and ending with verification by facts, the right to answer, or to pronounce unanswerable, any and all questions which can be stated in human language; whereas Transcendentalism denies that the questions of God, Immortality, and Duty can be answered by the logical understanding at all,—nay, more, it denies that God, Immortality, and Duty can be regarded in the light of questions, since (to quote Mr. Longfellow's phraseology) they are "primal ideas and sentiments given in the constitution of the human mind." The issue turns on the degree of liberty to be granted to the logical understanding, or discursive reason, or scientific intellect—which are merely different names for one and the same thing. Science requires that the scientific intellect shall have absolute liberty—shall be permitted without restriction to ask any question it pleases, and answer it in accordance with its own laws—shall not be called upon to assume beforehand any "primal ideas given in the constitution of the human mind." Nothing less than this is the freedom of thought which science demands and exercises. But Transcendentalism lays a veto on the claim of advancing science to subject the ideas of God, Immortality, and Duty to her own tests of truth. The natural and entire freedom of the scientific intellect cannot be conceded by Transcendentalism without the abandonment of all a priori or innate ideas. The "necessary contradiction" lies in the fact that science affirms, and Transcendentalism denies, the right and competency of the logical understanding to accept or reject the ideas of God, Immortality, and Duty. The whole issue is one of freedom of thought.

If, as Mr. Longfellow suggests it may, the scientific method itself shall at last lead to the acceptance of these ideas as "primal" and "given in the constitution of the human mind," belief in them will then rest on scientific verification, and no one will dispute them. But we do not see any possibility of that result, and certainly cannot take it for granted in advance.

2. Is it true that "all science starts from certain assumptions, unproved and unprovable," such as the trustworthiness of the senses and of the inference of an outward world? We think not. The senses are not entirely trustworthy; their errors have to be eliminated as far as possible by indirect means, often of a highly complex nature; and science only accepts the observations of the senses as provisional and liable to correction by processes of calculation and intellectual comparison. Professor Julius Bernstein, of Halle, says in his Five Senses of Man [p. 183]: "We cannot help conjecturing that . . . the perception of the external world is essentially an act of the mind, which has its seat in the cerebrum and is connected with this organ; and, further, that the sensory organ with its nervous connections only affords the brain the material which it converts into a sensory perception." Science does not really rest on assumption, either of the trustworthiness of the senses or of the intellectual faculties, but rather upon an experimental comparison and (as it were) checking-off of one by the other; it corrects the senses by reasonings, and reasonings by the senses; and its certitude mounts only to the very high probability that truth has been attained, at least approximately, when the senses and the reasonings have at last been found to agree. The belief of an external world, so far as science holds it, is the result of the concurrent testimony of several senses which singly are often deceived; and belief in the correctness of the inference, instead of being an a priori assumption, is rather the consequence of a close cross-examination of witnesses who are found to agree substantially in their evidence.

But there is no doubt that we have spiritual faculties whose function it is to take cognizance of spiritual or interior phenomena; as for instance memory. The question raised by Transcendentalism is whether God, Immortality, and Duty are thus cognized as primal or elementary constituents of the mind—as innate ideas given in its very constitution. If the Transcendental position is correct, these ideas are known only as subjective facts, and have no objective validity at all. Kant's doctrine that they are only "regulative principles" of thought, and reveal nothing outside of the mind itself, would follow as a matter of course; and this doctrine is that of the original, the severely self-consistent Transcendentalism. We are unable to see how Mr. Longfellow "makes an induction" from his own premises as to the existence of any "objective reality" corresponding to these ideas. Conceding for argument's sake that God, Immortality, and Duty are indeed "primal ideas given in the constitution of the human mind," we are constrained to conclude that Transcendentalism can find no warrant for believing in any objective correlatives of these ideas, except in the claim of a Divine Revelation.

This is the claim actually made by Rev. Dr. Hedge, one of the original and representative Transcendentalists of New England, in his Reason in Religion. Declaring [p. 86] that "the knowledge of God is not a conclusion of the understanding, but an intuition of the moral sense," he consistently declares also [p. 209]: "What is true of the being of God is true of all kindred verities. All our perceptions of the primary truths of religion are products of divine illumination. All religion that is true is revealed religion." This seems to us the only conceivable escape of the Transcendentalist from hopeless subjectivity, when the jurisdiction of the scientific intellect is once denied in these matters; that is, Transcendentalism offers a supernatural divine revelation as the only possible alternative of objective atheism. The scientific method shuts us down to no such untenable and already doomed alternative; it seems to lead (we speak diffidently because we have no right to speak otherwise) to the conclusion that the being of God is an objective and eternal truth of the universe, not a mere time-born and perhaps time-perishing idea of the soul.

3. Mr. Longfellow inquires whether the intuitions of Transcendentalism may not be supposed to lie latent or undeveloped in some men, without thereby throwing suspicion on the claim that they are "primal ideas given in the constitution of the human mind." We should certainly answer this inquiry in the negative. His own illustrations tend to the same answer. Men may not hunger "equally," but they all hunger; they may not see "equally," yet (if they are not blind) they all see. To carry out the suggested argument, the Transcendentalist must hold that whoever is wholly unconscious of his alleged intuitions must be wholly blind in a spiritual sense. Now this conclusion must cover a great many more cases than the Transcendentalist would like to admit. Thousands and thousands of educated, intelligent, seemingly normal minds will confess that they are wholly unconscious of these alleged intuitions, and must therefore be set down as, spiritually considered, wholly blind. We have known many such among those whom we respect the most highly for mental and moral worth. But perhaps this testimony may be doubted. Very well; we will offer ourselves as a "horrid example" of this utter spiritual blindness, and confess that we have not a shred or suspicion of the consciousness of the Transcendental intuitions in our own mind. We possess no such consciousness at all, and are as blind as the blindest, if it is indeed spiritual blindness. Every particle of belief or certitude we have on these subjects is due to the activity of the despised "logical understanding"; and we happen to know that we are by no means alone in this.

Therefore, the Transcendentalist must either set down a large and respectable part of his fellow-beings as totally lacking in the "primal ideas given in the constitution of the human mind," and as abortive or only half-made mortals, or else surrender the position that God, Immortality, and Duty are intuitions in the sense assigned. But it is for him, not for us, to elect between these alternatives.

4. If we do not misunderstand him, Mr. Longfellow here reduces the idea of God, so far as it is "given in the constitution of the human mind," to a simple conception of "Invisible Power, other than ourselves and the visible world." This is certainly going a long way towards abandoning the "intuition of God" altogether. Power itself is always invisible; only its effects, only the changes it produces in visible objects, are visible. If there is nothing more than this in the "intuition of God," and if all the moral attributes usually connoted by that word are conceded to be later additions, then the intuition is reduced to a simple recognition that we ourselves are not the only power in the universe—which perhaps no one could be found to deny.

5. We agree with Mr. Longfellow entirely in the opinion that there is a consciousness of causation in the human mind, and that even scientific men cannot get rid of causation as manifested in the phenomena they study. The Positivist does indeed deny that causation is anything more than a mere sequence in the order of phenomena—the cause being only the sum of the antecedents, and the effect being only the sum of the consequents. This is certainly a position of "anti-intuitionism," not only in the Transcendental, but also in the philosophical sense. But since it is only the Transcendental intuitions, described by Mr. Longfellow, that we are now discussing, we must forbear at present to enter into the very interesting philosophical question to which he alludes.

6. The way in which Transcendentalism, forbidding the scientific intellect to undertake the settlement of the great questions of God, Immortality, and Duty, exercises an "internal authority" over thought which is a restriction of its just and rightful liberty, has been already pointed out above. Any authority, external or internal, which sets any conceivable limit to the movement of the logical understanding in any direction whatever, in our opinion, violates arbitrarily the true "constitution and laws" of the human mind. The scientific method recognizes no such limitation as lawful, and presses steadily against any "authority," within or without, which presumes to make it. We therefore see no important difference between the ecclesiastical authority of Romanism and the spiritual authority of a Transcendental intuition which would seclude the questions of God, Immortality, and Duty from the action of the scientific intellect.

With respect to the bearing of all this on the question of fellowship, we certainly wish to be understood. The "Free Religious platform" is pledged, by universal consent, to "absolute freedom of thought and expression." It was established for that—it exists for that. Now all who are in favor of that "absolute freedom of thought and expression" have a right to the fellowship of that platform, if they wish to avail themselves of it. But if any one is not in favor of such freedom, he certainly is not entitled to the fellowship, and will as certainly not seek it. Why not accept the fact that whoever seeks the fellowship is entitled to it, since his seeking it is sufficient proof of his favoring "absolute freedom of thought and expression"? THE QUESTION WE HAVE RAISED IS ONE OF THOUGHT, AND NOT OF FELLOWSHIP. Each member is entitled to his own conception of what constitutes liberty; we certainly wish to impose ours on nobody. But we just as certainly wish to explain it, and advocate it, and recommend it. Perfect freedom is anti-Christian, in our view of it; we have said so from the beginning, and nobody ever suggested that we denied the right of Christians to join the Free Religious Association on that account. It is possible to believe that Free Religion is both anti-Christian and anti-Transcendental, and that all who care more for intellectual liberty than they do for special doctrines will by and by come to see it, without a remotest wish or a faintest intimation that those who think otherwise should be considered as out of place on that platform, or as "needing conversion for full fellowship." He who thinks Christianity or Transcendentalism is itself perfect freedom is as honestly on that platform as ever we were; he who thinks that neither of the two is compatible with freedom, and yet consciously prefers to sacrifice freedom for the sake of any doctrine whatever,—he is the only one who does not belong there rightfully. On the freedom issue the Free Religious Association is not neutral; and our whole aim has been to give a higher and truer idea of what perfect freedom is and requires.

7. Mr. Longfellow could not overstate the high function of the imagination and the affections, as conducing to human nobility and happiness. They play a part in human life which could just as ill be spared as that of the intellect. But in questions of truth as such the intellect is the only appeal, for the simple reason that the intellect is the only faculty that can conjoin subject and predicate. The imagination imagines; the feelings feel; the intellect alone thinks. And because truth is always a matter of thought, we hold that the intellect alone is the guide to truth. Recognized or not, it is always that which thinks; and we have only tried to dispel the illusion that there is any thinking faculty other than that which thinks.

But it is impossible to do justice to Mr. Longfellow's pleasant and suggestive letter in our necessary limits. We can only renew our acknowledgments, and cordially invite his correction of any errors we may have committed in interpreting or treating his thought.

LORD AMBERLEY'S BOOK.

About a year ago, Viscount Amberley, the eldest son of Earl Russell, died at the early age of thirty-three, leaving in course of publication a work entitled An Analysis of Religious Belief. Efforts were made by his family to suppress the book, because of its sceptical character, but they were unsuccessful, and after duly appearing in England, it has been reprinted here (D. M. Bennett). It forms an octavo volume of more than seven hundred pages, and apart from the high social standing of its author, has merits of its own deserving of consideration.

The task which Lord Amberley set himself was nothing less than to examine the religions of the world, to describe their origin and characteristics, and from these to deduce the truth common to them all and constituting the bond of unity between them. The preparatory labor involved in such an undertaking is evidently immense, and the dedication of the book pays a touching tribute of thanks for aid in performing it to the wife of the author, who, like him, died before the full completion of their joint work. A prefatory note gives the titles of eighty-seven publications in English, German, and French, which are most frequently referred to, and there are, besides, many others mentioned but once or twice. The facts derived from these sources, with the author's comments upon them, fill the first six hundred pages of the volume. They form, indeed, a small cyclopaedia of religious creeds and practices, and bring within a short compass a mass of information valuable in itself to the lover of knowledge. The remaining pages only are occupied with the author's conclusions, and give his own personal views of the subject.

In arranging his preliminary matter, Lord Amberley assumes that the underlying principle of religion is "the desire felt by the human race in general to establish a relationship between itself and those superhuman or supernatural powers, upon whose will it supposes the course of nature and the well-being of men to be dependent." This desire, he says, gives rise to the employment of means, first, of conveying information upward from the worshippers to their deities, and second, of conveying it downward from those deities to their worshippers. Under the first head he classes not merely prayer, sacrifices, and ceremonial worship, but the consecration of places, such as shrines and temples; objects, like idols and votive offerings; persons—that is, ascetics and monks; and mediators, or priests, who are regarded as official mouth-pieces of the god they serve. In the second division he includes holy events—that is, dreams, omens, and miracles; holy places, of which the ancient oracles are a specimen; holy objects, such as relics; holy persons, or priests and others (also embraced in the first class); and finally, holy books. After a brief but comprehensive account of the religious ceremonies of all nations, he takes up and discusses in order the founders of the various great religions of the world—Confucius, Lao-tse, Gautama Buddha, Zoroaster, Mohammed, and Jesus Christ—and then gives an analysis of the chief books revered as holy by their followers; namely, the thirteen King of the Chinese, the Vedas, the Tripitaka, the Zend-Avesta, the Koran, and the Old and New Testaments. The views he presents are those of the extreme rationalistic school. The points of resemblance between the character and deeds of Jesus Christ and those attributed to the other personages grouped with him are brought into prominence, and so are the leading features common to the Bible and the sacred writings of other religions. The real Jesus Christ is assumed to have been the son of Joseph, and to have perished on the cross, while upon him has been built up a mythical Jesus, who, in the view of our author, never existed save in imagination. All the usual infidel objections against the Old and New Testaments are likewise marshalled anew, and, it is but fair to acknowledge, candidly and temperately. An occasional phrase, however, reveals a feeling of contemptuous bitterness for some of the saints of the Biblical history, and jars upon the mind.

The main interest of the book, it will readily be seen, centres in the short concluding portion, in which, as we have said, the author expresses his own opinions. If, as he undertakes to show, all religions have a common origin, and are alike unworthy of adoption by intelligent thinkers, and if all holy books are alike of human composition and marked by human imperfection, is or is not the essence of religion itself a delusion, resting upon no solid basis, and destined to disappear before the advance of science? Lord Amberley considers this question at length, and, after his fashion, answers it in the negative. His argument is this: There are three fundamental postulates involved in the religious idea: that of a hyperphysical power in the universe, that of a hyperphysical entity in man, and that of a relation between the two. The universal adoption of the first postulate by all peoples, nations, and kindreds is a proof that it embodies a truth which satisfies a permanent need of the mind. As men always have been, so they always will be, irresistibly impelled to conceive of an unknown power hidden behind sensible phenomena, and to clothe this power with the attributes of deity, and thus religion will always exist in some form or other. Science never has and probably never can dispense with the assumption of a permanent force dwelling in matter and giving it quality, and hence science cannot destroy the idea of God. Equally ineffaceable is the contrast between mind and matter, or the second of the three postulates of religion. "Between that which thinks, perceives, and reasons, on the one hand, and that which is felt, thought about, and reasoned, there is no community of nature. The distinction between these two, though it need not be ultimate in the order of things, is absolutely ultimate in the order of thought. In their own undiscoverable nature these two manifestations may be one; in their relation to us they are forever two." In like manner the third postulate, that of a relationship between the unknown power called God, on the one side, and the human soul, on the other, is proved by its universal acceptance. If it were not true it could never have been invented, since nothing in nature suggests it. There are no analogies from which it may be inferred. "It is one of those primary constituents of our nature, which are incapable of proof because they are themselves the foundations on which proof must be erected." Thus, while the various forms of religion are unessential and temporary, its uniform substance is essential and permanent.

But, although conceding the reality of the underlying substance of religion, Lord Amberley is none the less decided in his rejection of all the forms in which it has hitherto been embodied. Science, he says, shows the imperfection of all the concrete expressions which have been found for the Unknowable. It proves that we cannot think of the Unknowable as entering, in any peculiar sense, into special objects in nature, dwelling in special places, or speaking through special channels. And he continues:—

"Thus, while scientific inquiry tends to diminish the intensity of religious ideas, it tends to widen their extension. They do not any longer cling to partial symbols. They do not attach themselves with the same fervor to individual embodiments. But, in becoming more abstract they become also more pervading. Religion is found everywhere and in everything. All Nature is the utterance of the idea. And as it gains in extension, while losing in intensity in reference to the external world, it goes through a similar process in relation to human life. No longer a force seizing on given moments of our existence, at one time inspiring devotional observances, at the next forgotten in the pleasures or the business of the day; at one time filling men with the zeal of martyrs or crusaders, at another leaving them to the unrestrained indulgence of gross injustice or revolting cruelty, it becomes a calm all-pervading sentiment, shown (if it be shown at all) in the general beauty and spirituality of the character, not in the stated exercises of a rigorous piety, or in the passionate outbursts of an enthusiastic fervor."

To the objection that so abstract and cold a faith as this can afford no satisfaction to the moral sentiments, the reply is that this is a necessary loss, and one no greater than that which the early Christian suffered when he gave up the Greek mythology with its gods and goddesses, or which the Protestant has to endure by his rejection of the worship of the Virgin Mary, and of prayer to the saints:—

"It is, in fact, the very condition of progress that, as we advance in knowledge and in culture, we give up something on the road. But it is also a condition that we do not feel the need of that which we have lost. Not only as we become men do we put away childish things, but we can no longer realize in thought the enjoyment which those childish things brought with them. Other interests, new occupations, deeper affections take the place of the interests, the occupations, and the affections of our early years. So, too, should it be in religion. Men have dwelt on the love of God because they could not satisfy the craving of Nature for the love of their fellow-men. They have looked forward to eternal happiness in a future life because they could not find temporary happiness in this. It is these reflections which point out the way in which the void left by the removal of the religious affections should hereafter be supplied. The effort of those who cannot turn for consolation to a friend in heaven, should be to strengthen the bonds of friendship on earth, to widen the range of human sympathy, and to increase its depth. We should seek that love in one another which we have hitherto been required to seek in God."

Even those who cannot accept this opinion as true, will admit the spirit which animates it, and the honesty which impelled its utterance. The youthful author had everything to lose and nothing to gain by renouncing the faith of his childhood, and setting himself against the social as well as the religious prejudices of his class. For, in England, to be unorthodox is to be both unfashionable and heretical. Even a dissenter is looked upon with dislike, and practically excluded from good society; much more an infidel. That a young man like Lord Amberley, therefore, should have written and commenced the publication of this book, and thus incurred the risk of outlawry from the circle in which he was born, proves him to have been one of those heroic inquirers who, in all ages of the world, have preferred to meander objects that they conceived to be the truth, and have not been deterred by fear of the consequences from speaking their convictions.—N. ### THE SCIENCE OF UNIVERSOLOGY. No. X.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

Having now sketched the Grand or Greatest Man, as the total mentismus or mind-realm of the total universe, aggregated and organized in a manner of which the constitution of the human body is a material and visible type, let us reconsider the within and the without of this immense idealization (and their intermediate) upon a still larger scale than any which has been hitherto presented. Before, when considering the human mind, I adverted to Hegel's division of mind into the Subjective mind—that of the individual, as a special withinness,—and the Objective mind—that of the many persons in society as its special withoutness. But Hegel was contrasting the individual mind with the social mind in the limited sense of mundane human affairs, or, at the most not ex professo, extending his scope to the pneumatological and divine spheres,—spheres which philosophy must take into account, as phenomena of thinking, whether their reality be assumed or denied. We are now to extend our generalization to those spheres, especially to the divine sphere (for the present) in conjunction and contrast with the human sphere of affairs, and to establish their proper relationship.

What is it which we think when we think God, and what is it which we think when we think man, as a mind? What, in other words, are the highest philosophical aspects of these contrasted ideas? I reply that the God-thought is the thought of a withinness of the total mental sphere, of a central and pivoting mind as contrasted with a withoutness of the same mental sphere, consisting of the many individual minds of men, and other orders of being, which constitute the mental environment of the divine mind. God is the presiding mind in a conclave of minds. Hence he is called a king, a lord, and a father, words which denote this pivotal and presiding relationship.

Observe, however, that this Kinghood taken as the withinness reverses the order which made the individual mind, generally, the within and the sphere of society to be its withoutness. All individual minds, except the mental pivot, are now aggregated, and as a whole become the withoutness, relatively to the pivotal as the withinness. This is always the case from the socialistic as contrasted with the individualistic point of view. Individuality of lead is substituted for the diffusive or distributive aspect of individuality. The monarchical idea is put in the place of the democratic idea; but they have this in common, that whether we start from the common individual or from the representative individual, as the within—the standing-point of observation—the common mass of individuals as society at large, is the matrix of the conception, and is in both cases, therefore, the without.

The Kantian group of the categories of quantity sums-up as ONE, MANY, ALL. In accordance with what has been said, the One may be any one of the many taken singly, or it may be a single, central, and representative one, which is the case now under consideration. Instead of numerical units, think geometrical points, and one particular point as centering and representing the entire group of points, no matter how restricted or extended. Or again think, instead, the group of material atoms which constitute a given body, with a centering and representative atom. It is in this manner that astronomers take the geometrical centre or the central atom of the Sun to signify the whole Sun. It is in this manner that Louis signed himself "France." It is in this manner that God is, representatively, "All in all." It is in this manner that pivots, in all spheres, stand for the sphere of things pivoted and represented. In this manner the representative One is a withinness, and the indifferent manyness is its withoutness, matrix, or environment; and it is in this way that the God-idea is the within of the Grand Man, and the many-headed-personality of humanity the without. The category of unity is thus the divine category; the category of manyness is the human category; and the category of all-ness is the betweenness of these (mediatorial), as this word has to be used, with a variety of modification, first for that which intervenes; then for that which clasps and holds in the larger or complex unity; and then for the representative totality of the first two factors, and of itself included.

In the human body it is the punctum vite, in the base of the brain and at the decussation of the nerves, which is the representative unit; an idea which cannot now be adequately elaborated.

We may now pass to the deeper significance of these preliminary ideas. The mathematical unit, which centres a group of units in the sum, the geometrical point which centres the group of points, the material atom which centres a star or sun, the punctum vite which centres the human body, are analogues or repeaters of each other. Each of them is the representative one, as a within, centering the circumferential aggregation of its sphere, as a without. The geometrical point centering and representing its group of points may be taken as representative, in turn, of all the other cases; and I shall therefore mainly advert to it. Observe now that this Central Point is novitas different, in its own essential nature from any other point in the group. It is only a mere point, as they are mere points. It differs from them positionally, merely. It is not, in other words, absolutely different, but relatively different only. It is not different in kind but different in condition, or the degree of its promotion. Among all the points of the group, there is EQUALITY OF WORTH WITH DIFFERENCE OF RANK. Fundamentally, substantially, essentially, inherently, the points of the group are all equal, each to the other; superstructurally, formally, existentially, apparently, they are different. The order of their arrangement alone, with the function incidental to their position, makes their difference. By means of this difference, the central point outranks and reigns over all the rest, and all the others rank high, we may assume, in proportion, as they approximate the centre, or gather round the throne.

But we have seen that the God-idea is simply such as that of this centering-point in the group of points. The God-mind is simply the supreme or paramount mind in the given group or consoaction of individual minds, from the smallest such up to the total rational universe, the Grand Man, of whom such godlike personage would be the punctum vite, or focus of life—not, however, by virtue of any inherent and essential difference between him and the humblest individual of the whole group; but positionally and functionally, merely. Mr. Beecher is the God-man of Plymouth Church. Mr. Cook reigns supremely at the Boston Tabernacle. The Czar of Russia is called God by many of the common people of Russia. This, it would seem, was the idea which Jesus entertained of the meaning of Godhood. When the Jews were shocked by his open claims of partaking the divine nature, and accused him of blasphemy, he repelled their charge by appealing to their own Scriptures to the effect that distinguished and representative men were therein called Gods; meaning thereby, as we shall see presently, that Godhood is simply supreme Manhood, in some sphere of being.

The point herein of paramount importance is that the true God-idea makes God to be not essentially different, not different in substance and kind, from Man, nor Man from God; that it identifies them in quality and real being, each with the other—their difference being merely one of the greater and less unfolding of the same faculties, attributes, nature and powers. If this be true, then every human being, as to the inmost potentiality of his being, is equal with God and is God. The same may be said of him, as an individual being, as is said of the abstract logos in the first chapter of John. This thought does not degrade the divine but elevates the human aspect of things. Jesus, whose intuitions on this central doctrine of religion were deeper and truer, it seems to me, than any one's else was thus, and could only thus be justified in saying, in one breath, to his disciples: "I and my father are one"; and in the next breath: "I am the vine and ye are the branches."

These are wonderful dicta, with a direct and a reverse signification. They mean directly, that God is essentially and inherently one with, and so only equal with, my personality, and I am essentially and inherently one with, and therefore, only equal with, your personality; and, inversely, that I am essentially and inherently one with and so equal with God, and you are essentially and inherently one with and so equal with me; and so finally you are inherently and essentially equal with God, as beings of the same nature and possibilities,—not equal position ally and functionally, but with such differences only as characterize the root, the vine, and the branches—one in kind but different in organic relation and in development.

Jesus thus labored to inculcate what may be called the democratic element in theology; but with eminently bad success. The world was not prepared for that idea. The opposite idea of the absolute and unlimited supremacy of one mind, in all senses, over all other minds, accorded with Oriental despotism and Cæsarism then prevalent over the known world; and that side of the complex thought which haunted the mind of Jesus alone survived in traditional theology, and has come down to our day in the churches. That was the unalms and simpler form of the conception. The development of the democratic or dualist side of the thought had to wait till the eighteenth century, and get itself then expressed as a political, and not as a theological idea. The politics of the universe will be further considered in the next following article. We must accustom ourselves to some shocks of existing well-bedded opinions. Swedenborg curiously says that bed means, by correspondence, doctrine, because as the body rests in its bed, so does the mind in its doctrine. We need not be surprised, therefore, if when the morning comes, we are summoned to get up; and if some shall be more sluggish than others in answering the call; for "there shall be two in one bed; the one shall be taken and the other left."

CHARLEMAGNE.

Near the close of the eighth century the fleets of the Saracens dominated in the Mediterranean, and their armies had wrested from Christendom nearly all the countries of the East. Jerusalem and Carthage, Antioch and Alexandria, had passed from Christian domination. Their bishops had disappeared; and of all the great episcopal seats, only Constantinople and Rome remained. The latter lay at the mercy of Arian Lombards and the barbarous hordes of Germany. Everywhere the imperial power seemed paralyzed, and even communication between the great capitals of the Roman world was at the sufferance of Mohammedan navies. The Arabs had made themselves masters of Spain, and boasted that they would speedily traverse the Pyrenees and the Alps, and proclaim the name of Mohammed on the seven hills. Aristolpho, at the head of his Lombards, brandished his sword before the city gates, and threatened to put every Roman to death.

Christ came to bring a sword, and it was now needful that the sword should be called into requisition. Pope Zachary wanted liberation from the Lombards, and Pepin le Bref wanted the crown of France. So the warlike Franks unsheathed their swords in defence of the "Republic of God." Pepin recovered from the Lombards their conquests from the Romans, deposited the keys of the conquered cities on the altar of St. Peter's, and caused himself to be raised on a buckler and proclaimed king, while the bishops anointed him with oil. When the succeeding Pope, Sylvester II., visited France, he placed the diadem on Pepin's brow, and anointed him, his wife and children with holy oil in the monastery of St. Denis. Thus by the sword of a successful soldier the Bishop of Rome became a temporal sovereign, and the keys of St. Peter became firmly bound to the hilt of the sword.

Charlemagne appeared. His name and Constantine's mark the two most important eras in the history of Christianity. First proclaimed by a few humble fishermen along the shores of Galilee, the gospel of the manger-born son of Mary had been accepted by the first Christian Emperor of Rome, confirmed by council and creed, and established upon the throne of the Cæsars. At the accession of Charlemagne to the government, all the ancient landmarks of social order had been overthrown with the colossal power of Rome, and the whole civilized world was covered with its ruins and infected with its crimes. The ancient seat of empire was divided among a score of petty tyrants; the Saracens had overrun Spain and threatened the further West; the northern kingdoms of Europe were only known as the cradle of adventurous armies; Russia did not even exist, and England was just emerging from the confusion of the Heptarchy. The unbought ambition and vast genius of Charlemagne were made subservient to the papacy for the building up of a powerful Christian protectorate in the West. Encouraged by the Roman Pontiff, and prompted by that warlike religious zeal which has ever deluged with blood the altars of the Church, he took up arms for the Christianization of the still idolatrous Saxons. In 772 he commenced a conflict with that valiant and stubborn people which was maintained for upwards of thirty years. As the circle of his power extended, he everywhere founded churches and established bishoprics, enriching them with territorial possessions. He always insisted upon the rite of baptism as a sign of submission. Resistance to this saving ceremony was punished with the most appalling barbarity. The conquered Saxons had to choose between baptism and death. One day in 782, this Christian butcher cut off the heads of forty-five hundred persons at Verdun who refused the baptismal rite, which to them only signified the most servile submission. The influence of Christianity rapidly extended, sustained by the successful sword of Charlemagne. He had made a solemn engagement with the papacy to enforce Roman Christianity upon Europe wherever his power could reach; and most fearfully did he observe his obligation by making his sword a terrible, but convincing, missionary. To the day of his death he observed a savage fidelity to his bond with the head of the Church. In return, Pope Leo III., after the celebration of the holy mysteries in the Church of St. Peter at Rome, on Christmas day, 800, placed on his head a diadem amid the acclamations of the people: "Long life and victory to Charles, the most pious Augustus, crowned by God, the great and pacific Emperor of the Romans." His head and body were anointed with the holy oil, and, after the example of the Cæsars, the pontiff himself saluted or adored him. He might now be appropriately distinguished the "Emperor of the West," for his empire comprised all the regions between the Elbe and the Ebro, extending eastward to Hungary, and southward to Calabria. He manifested his appreciation of St. Peter by his princely munificence to that apostle. At the request of the Pope, he substituted the Gregorian for the Ambrosian Chant in his dominions; and wherever his priests or singers resisted, he burnt them along with their books. The private life of Charlemagne was stained with great immoralities and crimes. After having divorced his first wife, he indulged in a polygamy scarcely worse than that of the caliphs, so-lacing himself with not less than nine wives and many concubines. He sought to increase this number by a marriage with Irene, the infamous Christian Empress of the East, who put out the eyes of her own son in the porphyry chamber of Constantinople.

The career of Charlemagne marks an epoch in modern history, and his sword shaped the map of Europe. He was a great and remarkable man in many respects, a man of genius, a wise sovereign, and a victorious warrior. But only this does impartial history speak in his praise. He was immoral and ambitious, cruel and intolerant; he was a polygamist, a wholesale murderer, and a Christian zealot. Still he was great. He was a great ruler, a great robber, and a great butcher. He was great in that which will forever render his name infamous in the memory of mankind. He was the greatest propagator of Christianity since the time of Constantine. He gave to the Papal Church its lease of power over the governments of the earth,—its ecclesiastical supremacy that only succumbed before the successful arms of Victor Emanuel, and the mighty, relentless waves of progress in this nineteenth century. He sought the compulsory Christianization of his subjects, and his effectual missionary was the sword. His sole argument with unbaptized Saxons was death or immersion. He exalted the Church above the State, and confirmed the claim of the Holy See to secular supremacy. To conclude, Charlemagne was a great General, a great Christian, a sanguinary and victorious villain. S. H. PRESTON.

MOHAMMEDANISM AMONG THE AFRICANS.

Several remarkable papers have lately appeared in an English magazine on the comparative progress of Christianity and Islam in Africa. Some of the facts and suggestions offered merit careful attention, not only by their intrinsic importance, but because the author of the articles, Edward W. Blyden, the Principal of the Liberian College, is himself a black of pure African descent.

At a time when events in the East provoke appeals to religious prejudices, and when a narrow view of Mohammedanism, its moral worth and its true function in education is often put forth even in England and America, nothing could be more opportune than a lucid account of what it has done for Western and Central Africa. We are told, for instance, that Islam has a tendency to pen up nations in Chinese immobility; that it is a sort of progress which stifles the progressive spirit; that it is not a short cut or stepping-stone to a better civilization, but a blind alley. Now that this notion is quite erroneous, as regards one branch of the human race at all events, the data collected by Mr. Blyden effectually prove.

For three centuries Western Africa has been in contact with Christianity, yet not a single tribe has been collectively converted, nor has one powerful chief accepted the faith which European missionaries have offered him. Mr. Blyden tells us that even on the coast of Liberia and Sierra Leone there is not a point, with the exception of one small island, where the imported Christianity can fairly be said to have taken root. Islam, on the other hand, since its introduction by Akbar in the ninth century and establishment at Timbuctoo, has steadily and vastly widened the circle of its authority, showing itself competent to master the most virile and refractory tribes, addressing itself, indeed, by preference to those peoples which already possessed the rudiments of civil government and a social organization. It is Islam which has built and now occupies the largest towns of the interior, which has evoked and still controls most of the trade between equatorial Africa and foreign countries, and which gives laws to the most considerable kingdoms, such as Hausa, Bornu, Daffour, Kordofan, and Sennar. We are reminded, further, that in this quarter the fervor of proselytism is unquenched, and that every day the Moslem missionaries are gaining ground on the native fetishism and idolatry, and enforcing respect for their faith upon all Africans, even those who are not yet enrolled under the standard of the Prophet.

As to the work of mellioration performed by Islam within its expanding pale, Mr. Blyden tells us that with the first step inland from the West Coast you are struck with the different aspect of localities according as the inhabitants are heathen or Mohammedan. The divergence runs through the form of government, the social laws, the manners, and even the amusements of the people. Passing in 1873 from Sierra Leone to Futa Jallo, he had to traverse some large pagan villages, and soon afterward entering a Mohammedan town, he seemed to breathe a higher and purer atmosphere, the character, sentiments and condition of the population having undergone a complete metamorphosis. It appears that the ascent of an African community in the social scale, under Moslem impulse, is often attended with signal exhibitions of individual capacity. Those who are familiar with the Mussulman world of Western and Northern Africa tell us of more than one great man among the negro converts who has exercised a potent influence in the religious and political affairs, not only of his own land, but of the older and classic seats of Islam. In the Arabic collections of biography, many Mussulman blacks of merit are said to figure, and much space is given to the achievements of a negro named Fodie, whose zeal and daring won to the true faith a large part of the region watered by the Niger. One of the most noteworthy persons of recent times in the country lying between Timbuctoo and the West Coast, was a native of Futa-Toro, known as the Sheikh Omarwal-haj. This man, brought up by an Arab missionary and instructed in the Arabic language, made two pilgrimages to Mecca, and returning to his native district undertook a proselyting campaign against some formidable heathen tribes whom he subjected to Islam, next settling himself to purify the practices of several Mussulman peoples among whom vestiges of idolatry yet lingered. We may add that sons of this Moslem apostle militant are now reigning in two of the largest towns of central Africa. One or two additional facts deserve mention. For instance, in Sierra Leone and Liberia the Mohammedan converts build mosques and maintain public worship at their own cost, and contribute largely to the support of Arab missionaries coming from foreign parts, whereas it is notorious that the native Christians depend almost wholly in such matters on European and American aid societies. Again, in the last Ashantee war the staunchest and bravest of the black troops were the Hausas, who are strict Mohammedans, while the Christian negroes proved quite unstable. Mr. Blyden assures us that Sir Garnet Wolseley's statement, in an order of the day, that "the indigenous African feels a superstitious terror of the white man," if applied to the heathen or Moslem black, is ludicrously ill-founded.

Now, the key to this strange contrast in the effect of the two religions upon the native African doubtless lies in another fact frequently remarked, and in the explanation of that fact. Almost all travellers agree that the negro convert to Islam evinces a sentiment of personal dignity and self-respect not observed in the Christian neophytes. The reason, of course, is not far to seek. If Christianity were now preached, as it once was, to the non-Aryan races by missionaries of their own or a less alien stock, we might possibly witness something like the success of those Nestorian monks who swept across Central Asia into China some ten centuries before the advent of the Jesuits in the latter country. But as it is, the work of Christian propaganda is wholly committed to men of European origin; that is, to men in whom the subtle teachings of laws and manners, of literature and art, have planted an overweening and inveterate pride of race. We can judge how grave a bar this feeling must prove to a close and fervid sympathy on the part of their white pastors with the African proselytes, from the plain admission of so enlightened a man as Bishop Heber, that "there is certainly something repugnant in the negro to those who are unaccustomed to him." Where his conversion is effected under these conditions, it is not surprising that the native black should regard its author as a superior, or at all events alien being. Hence he conceives a poor opinion of himself, learns to depreciate his characteristic qualities, and is discouraged by the manifest hopelessness of reproducing the physical and mental traits of his preceptor.

In the hands of its Semitic apostles, Islam seems to have been more profoundly loyal to the spirit of broad humanity which was the common emblem of both faiths. There is not now, and there never has been, any instinctive repulsion, or assumption of in-bred superiority, on the part of Arabic conquerors and educators toward Mussulman blacks. The case might have been different if Moslem art had been allowed to idealize and, so to speak, sanctify the Arab type; but this an express precept of the Prophet, and perhaps the genius of the race, forbade. The fact is that the traditional prayer, the Adzah, which convokes at the same hour more than a hundred millions of human beings, was first formulated by a negro named Bilal, whom Mohammed, upon the prompting of a dream, made muezzin or public crier; and travellers say that even the renown of Alexander the Great is eclipsed in Central Asia by that of this famous black. We read, too, of a negro caliph who reigned with credit at Bagdad in the ninth century, and is said to have been a man of rare merit and accomplishments. Finally, the Moslem propagandists have at all times proved the sincerity of their sympathies in the most conclusive way,—namely, by intermarriage; and some of the most esteemed Arabic authors were the offspring of such mixed unions. With such precedents and principles, tolerance and fellow-feeling are easy to the missionaries of Islam, while the African disciple finds himself stimulated to self-improvement and fortified in self-respect by the bracing benignity of his new relation.—New York Sun.

SATAN AND CONSCIENCE.—"But now, tell me, Mr. Chambers, which is it, Satan or my conscience, that is telling me I am too bad, that I have committed too many sins to be saved?"

"My opinion, John, upon that matter is, that it is Satan making use of your conscience."—"After All": American Tract Society.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers. Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenafly, N.J.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or ending article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.40.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX, A Weekly Journal

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 231 Washington Street, Boston.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 W. H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, England.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenafly, N.J.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

Sent, postage prepaid, on receipt of price. Address THE INDEX, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

ATTRACTIVE ORNAMENT

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sepioids, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practicing the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

THE REPUBLIC of Colombia is torn by a bloody civil war between the Catholics and the Liberals.

THE FACULTY of Michigan has forbidden dancing in the University Hall. The Seniors in indignation have resolved to take no part in Class Day and Commencement. This is one of the straws which show the current of a reviving and spreading fanaticism.

SIGNATURES to the Religious Freedom Amendment petition have been received as follows since last week: from Mrs. M. G. House, Avoca, N. Y., 74; from Mr. James M. Rowen, Louisville, Kan., 42. Total thus far received—5,344. Every friend of Equal Rights in Religion is earnestly requested to aid in obtaining signatures. Petitions will be cheerfully sent free to any address by the National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston, on receipt of a stamp for return postage.

HERESY-HUNTING is a delight which no full-blooded Evangelical will ever voluntarily forego. Rev. John Miller has been fairly torn to pieces by the hounds, and now the pack are in full chase after Rev. O. L. Ashenfelter. The latter, indeed, is a much worse heretic than the former, though he is a man of singularly gentle and reverent spirit, even in the worst of his heresies. There is considerable Gospel-spluttering in this case, but not much sense; and we hope that the result of the whole business may be the final establishment of a strong independent society at Carlisle, Pa., unbound by the least remnant of a creed.

DR. D. K. BOUTELLE, of Lake City, Minn., one of the warmest friends of THE INDEX, is publishing a series of articles in the Lake City Leader in explanation of the National Liberal League and its objects. He has incorporated long extracts from its Constitution, and is doing a most valuable service in the cause of equal religious rights by spreading accurate information about this organization. We wish heartily that every reader of THE INDEX would do the same. By their combined exertions through their local press, they could wield an enormous influence, and create at last a public opinion in favor of the League which is certain to follow knowledge of its aims and principles.

FATHER HYACINTHE lectured at Paris, April 15, on "Respect for Truth." Among other things he is reported as saying that "thirty years ago, while walking with a young man on the banks of the Lago Maggiore, they met the great philosopher Rosmini. His companion, whose name was Montalembert, said: 'Oh, how I sigh after truth!' Rosmini said: 'Young man, you can never get through without martyrdom.' Although there were not now, and never would be again, martyrs in the old sense of the term, and the lovers of truth had not to fear the scaffold, the stake, or the rack, they must be prepared for the scorn of relations and dear old friends, and the calumny of the world; and as regards this moral martyrdom the words of Rosmini were true."

A TELEGRAPH dispatch of May 4 says: "There was closed to-day in the New Brunswick (N.J.) Presbytery a trial of a clergyman on the charge of heresy, which has attracted wide-spread attention in the Christian community. The Rev. John Miller was convicted of publicly denying and assailing important doctrines of the Confession of Faith and the catechisms of the Church, in teaching that the soul is not immortal, that Christ was a child of Adam, and denying the doctrine of the Trinity. The conviction was by unanimous vote of the Presbytery, and it was also unanimously voted that the Rev. Mr. Miller be 'suspended from the preaching of the word of God as a minister until such time as he sees the error of his way and returns to Orthodoxy.' There were many Princeton theological students present at the trial, and it was noticed that they frequently applauded the accused while he was speaking in his own defence."

IT TAKES one lady to understand another. Gail Hamilton says of Mrs. Hayes in the Christian Union: "There is not a woman from Mount Desert to Vancouver's Island who would not be willing to economize any day in a camel's hair shawl costing three or four times its weight in gold. Mrs. Hayes wears her hair plainly on the face and over the ears and fastened in a knot with a comb, not, I venture to assert, from any 'I am hollower than thou' uppleness, but because she knows she has a face fine enough to stand it. She assumes black silk as innocently as the milkmaid dreamed of green, because that suits her complexion best, and because nothing is so dignified and distinguished; and the attempt to throw a wet blanket over woman's divine, artistic instinct of adornment by calling it Mrs. Hayes' camel's hair shawl, only adds another to the myriads of futile efforts which man has already made to gather thorns of grapes and thistles of figs!"

THE SECULAR PRESS deals with religious topics to an amazing extent, and in a way very unlike that of the religious press. The Seymour (Wisconsin) Weekly Times of March 31 is a case in point. It said: "Jefferson County has a meek and lowly servant of his Master by the name of William Y. Monroe—Rev. William Y. Monroe. The Rev. William is zealous in the cause of his Master and thirsts for the salvation of souls. In fact, in his zeal for souls he sometimes gives his God a character that would doom him to the penitentiary, if we could identify him and fetch him into court. In preaching the funeral of a poor little innocent child recently, the Rev. William said that he believed that God 'killed that child' in order to arouse religious sentiment in the hearts of the parents and friends and draw them to him! God murdering a poor innocent child to help on a religious revival! Isn't this giving God a nice character? Can you worship and love a being that would murder a child? And this is the stuff that is preached in order to scare people into the churches. Is it any wonder that the churches and priests are tottering to their fall? Is it any wonder that the people are looking to common-sense and a sounder philosophy for their moral guides, when such monstrous doctrine as this is preached by an authorized priest right now in the steady light of science and the glare of the noon-day sun of the nineteenth century?"

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

Joseph Cook Measured by his own Rule.

A DISCOURSE PREACHED IN THE CHURCH OF THE UNITY, BOSTON, ON SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1877.

BY REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

There are two or three things that I wish to call to your attention in regard to this movement in Tremont Temple, as they are signs of the times. In the first place, all men are aware that the movement for twenty-five years of science, of intelligent thought and criticism, has been directly and squarely against the main positions of Orthodoxy. The drift of the tide of intelligence has been all the other way. The success of Mr. Cook, then, in Tremont Temple, and the crowds he gathers about him, seem to me perfectly intelligible when you remember the joy that comes to the hearts of those that have been discouraged and troubled about questions which they supposed essential to the holding of revelation and to their hopes of a future life. When, I say, he comes and claims to stand on the basis of science and enter upon the work of their defence, it is an unexpected championship that they had not looked for. And so, without any very careful discrimination, they are ready to applaud and to fling their hats in air and to rejoice as though at last the inroads and approaches of liberalism were to be brought to an end.

But, on the other hand, let me call your attention to a very significant thing: Mr. Cook has dared to plant himself deliberately and squarely on the basis of "the scientific method," so far as his claim is concerned. And this is so significant that I wish to emphasize it in your thought for just one moment. In so doing he has totally and utterly abandoned, as indefensible, the old ground of revelation, as revelation, and has confessed to the city of Boston, to New England, to America, that, so far as his thought and study are concerned, this same claimed "revelation" must go by the board unless he can make it square with the conclusions of modern science and criticism. This is a significant confession that I wish you to take to heart.

Now, there are two or three superficial characteristics of the Monday Lectureship that of course I do not offer in the way of argument pro or con, but that I wish to refer to simply as indicating the style of the man and of his dealings with these great questions; and I do this the more readily because he has given me adequate excuse. He has not hesitated to fling out against "small philosophers"—meaning by that those persons that did not agree with Mr. Cook. He has not hesitated to talk of "low, loaferish liberalism," or of "a liberalism having venom but no fangs," as though it would be glad enough to overthrow the positions that he was defending but utterly lacked the power and the ability to do so. Now, I have not any more respect than Mr. Cook has for a "low, loaferish liberalism"; and I have not one iota more of respect for a low, loaferish Orthodoxy. Neither have I any more respect for a concealed, self-sufficient, assuming Orthodoxy, such as Mr. Cook himself represents. The modesty of the man is apparent from the fact that the reports of his lectures (which he himself takes a whole day to supervise, so that they do not appear in the paper until Wednesday morning) are sprinkled and filled all through with "Great and prolonged applause!" "Profound sensation!" "Great applause!" "Sensation!" "Applause!" repeated and re-repeated! Of course if he chooses this no one has any right to object to it. But in thinking of it I have been irresistibly reminded of those funny lines of Mr. Lowell in the "Biglow Papers," in the introduction to the last paper of the second series, which purports to be the report of a speech delivered to the rows of cabbage-heads in his garden, at a March meeting. Mr. Lowell says:—

"I've noticed that reporters get a hint
 To make dull audiences seem 'live in print;
 And, since I've got to report myself, I vum!
 I'll put the applauses where they'd ought to come."

Now, I don't doubt for a moment that Mr. Cook gets the applauses; but he seems exceedingly anxious to put them "where they'd ought to come"; and I was told the other day (and I do not question the truth of the statement), by a minister who heard the lecture and carefully looked at the report the next day, that in one instance there was "Great applause!" in the report where there was not a sound of applause in the lecture-room itself.

And then Mr. Cook has made a great deal of the fact of his travels abroad in Europe, and of his introduction to and conversations with great men,—over-awing the unintelligent mass of his hearers by these foreign and high-sounding names, as though they all stood in serried ranks at the back of the Monday Lectureship, ready to give him their ardent support. Now, if a man becomes exceptionally wise by conversing with and being introduced to great men, it is a short and easy way to scholarship. But let me suggest to Mr. Cook, in the words of Mr. Moody in a sermon of his, the other day, on another subject, that possibly conversing with or getting very near to some great personage may not result in making you equal to him, or giving you a place by his side. In a sermon which I heard Mr. Moody preach he said: "Judae got near enough to God to kiss him, and then went straight to hell!" So it is possible that a man may get near enough to a wise man to shake hands with him, and then straightway go to the outer darkness of illogicalness and ignorance.

And, then, the mass of authorities that Mr. Cook brings, overawes and subdues his audience,—quoting from this name and that and another; flinging the German dictionary at the heads of his hearers until they are perfectly bewildered at the array of authorities, and suppose that at least some out of the great mass must stand substantially for the positions that the Monday Lectureship represents. I am reminded by this of what one of your own number told me a short time ago concerning a celebrated case in which Mr. Choate was engaged, in the western part of the State. A gentleman was talking with one of the jury who served on that occasion, and asked whether they gave Mr. Choate the case or not. "Why," said he, "of course we gave Mr. Choate the case. Why, he had a pile of papers so high!" And so with the great mass of people,—if you only bring a long array of authorities they suppose the matter is ultimately and finally settled.

Now, there are just two characteristics of Mr. Cook, and his position this winter in Boston, that you want to keep carefully in mind, in order to estimate how much reliance is to be placed on his statements,—whether he intends to misrepresent or not. In the first place, his distinguishing quality and characteristic is that he is a rhetorician. And let me here give him grand and magnificent praise. I do not know of any speaker of modern times who surpasses some of the things that the Rev. Joseph Cook has given to the city of Boston in the way of grand and magnificent rhetoric. But fireworks, while they are very fine to look at, are not so good to capture a strong fortification with as even a muddy artillery train. It is solid shot that batter down walls, and not the brilliant firing off of words.

And there is one other thing that you must remember, and that is that Mr. Cook stands as the avowed advocate of a system, and not as a person simply seeking after truth. You are perfectly familiar with the logic of this in your every-day conversations. "Why," you say, "it is of no use to talk to such a man about a particular plan or idea. He will not hear you. He is given up to another system and plan, and stands as the representative of it, and is working for it before the community. It is of no use to talk to him about such things as that!" So I say that Mr. Cook, however he may talk of "logic," however he may talk of "fairness," and however he may talk of the using of arguments on one side and the other, perfectly well knows that if he starts on a train of argument and does not land on the Orthodox platform, the whole foundation of the Monday Lectureship is out from under his feet at once. He stands, then, as the avowed advocate of a system, and you should test his words with this idea.

Now, then, I have done, so far as anything personal is concerned.

Mr. Cook has said, in his last lecture—two or three words from which I wish to quote—that he places himself distinctly and deliberately on the scientific basis and method, and is ready to stand or fall by that method—holding that Orthodoxy itself, if it is to endure, must endure as tested and measured by that method. Now, he says: "Clearness will not mislead us if we set it up as a goal. But our prejudgments as to what is true may easily do so." And, again, he says: "Let us be true to the scientific method, and truth will take care of itself." And again: "Let us seek first, midst, and last, all that intuition, instinct, experiment, and syllogism can teach us, or perfect loyalty to the scientific method, whatever stands or whatever falls." That is Mr. Cook's own measure, by which I propose to test some of his judgments.

And now I wish to quote just a word from Mr. Huxley to give you an idea of what a prominent scientific man means by the "scientific method." In his first lecture, last fall, in New York, he said: "We men of science get an awkward habit, of reasoning, so that we believe nothing unless there is evidence for it; and we have a way of looking upon belief, which is not based upon evidence as not only illogical, but as immoral." That is, in a word, Huxley's idea of the scientific method; and, to put it in my own words, the scientific method is, in short, simply this: you cannot establish by it anything for which you cannot bring direct proof of facts, or strict logical deductions from facts. That is the "scientific method." Now let us test Mr. Cook in some of his main positions by that. Of course I cannot review here this morning sixty or seventy lectures. My purpose will be accomplished when I take a single leading argument from some of his main points, and let you see his method, let you see what he has done with it, and how much he has accomplished.

I shall pass over his discussion of "Evolution," on which he spent so long a time in the early part of the winter, for the simple reason that it is capable of taking care of itself. It is in the hands of Mr. Darwin, and of most all the scientific men of the time. There is hardly a man in the civilized world to-day, who has given it competent, earnest, unbiassed study, who has not accepted it in some one of its forms. Let me, in connection with this, simply give you, in my own words, the warning of Peschel, a prominent scientific man of Germany. When, he says, a few years ago, the Pope and his followers put the Creator of this universe on the Index, because he had not chosen to create the world after the Ptolemaic pattern, but had chosen to create it after the system that Copernicus himself had discovered, they simply showed the power of prejudice and bigotry. Peschel warns the men of this time,—and I give his warning again to you, lest we again repeat that folly of persecuting the Creator, in the persons of those that are giving the grandest expositions of His methods, and doing it all for the sake of a mental phantom or a theological prejudice. When Newton discovered the law of gravitation, Leibnitz, the grandest living mathematician besides Newton, rejected it to the day of his death, for a purely theological reason. And yet since that time all the preachers of the world have been using Newton's discoveries in astronomy as a means whereby to set forth the glory and grandeur of the creative work of God. And I prophesy here to-day that it will not be twenty-five years before the Orthodox ministers of this country will be reading the law of evolution in the first chapter of Genesis, and telling the world that they always believed it.*

I pass this, then; and the first point that I wish seriously to take up and analyze at any length is Mr. Cook's treatment of the question of materialism, as opposed to spirit. Now you know me, well enough, friends, to know that if any man in this city, or in any part of this world, could give me in my hand, so that I could grasp it, a new weapon against materialism (which I disbelieve, utterly reject, and despise),—if, I say, he could give me a new weapon against materialism, I would give him heartfelt thanks. I should consider it a favor and a blessing conferred upon the city of Boston if Mr. Cook could have succeeded in such an attempt. But what did he do? He reviewed at length the arguments that are familiar to all who are acquainted with science, in this direction, concerning the mechanism and structure of the brain. He merely echoed thoughts and guesses and speculations concerning this. Ferrier is the great authority on this subject,—the man who stands recognized as leader. And such men as Prof. Youmans, such men as George Henry Lewes of England—the most competent men of the age, all will tell you that Ferrier's work is only preparatory, and that there is nothing in this direction that is definitely and finally settled. We know very little indeed about the brain. So that Mr. Cook's science, so far as this is concerned, was simply standing on the speculations of other men, and carrying the speculations a little farther.

But the principal point here is this: you will remember how, week after week, elaborately and at length, Mr. Cook abused, vilified and misrepresented such men as Tyndall, such men as Huxley, such men as Herbert Spencer, such men as John Fiske of Harvard,—abused them at length for their materialism. And here let me tell you what I propose to prove, and defy Mr. Cook, or any one else, to controvert: that the only argument which the Monday Lectureship, during the whole course of this winter, has brought against materialism which is worth five minutes' consideration on the part of a thoughtful man, the said Rev. Joseph Cook did steal bodily from Huxley, from Tyndall, from Spencer, and from John Fiske,—the very men that in the same breath he was abusing. This is not the vapor of words. I am not one—being such as Mr. Cook would call "a small philosopher"—I am not one to assume that the Monday Lectureship had not read Huxley and Tyndall and Herbert Spencer's Psychology, and Prof. John Fiske's Cosmic Philosophy. I would not dare bring a charge against his claimed "colossal scholarship" that he had not even read these works. And yet the fact remains, just as I have stated it, that the one sole argument against materialism which he has brought forward this winter that is worth, as I said, a moment's consideration by a careful and intelligent thinker, is contained, and elaborately wrought out, in the works of these men. I wish to read you just one sentence as a specimen. Prof. Huxley (whom Mr. Cook put forward as the prince of "materialists"), after dwelling on Berkeley's celebrated argument for idealism, goes on thus: "I conceive that this reasoning" (that is, the reasoning of Berkeley) "is perfectly irrefragable; and therefore, if I were obliged to choose between absolute materialism and absolute idealism, I should feel compelled to accept the latter alternative." That is from Huxley's Critiques and Addresses, page 314. A similar argument you will find in his Lay Sermons, in his Discourse on Descartes. You will find the same thing wrought out elaborately and at length in Spencer's Principles of Psychology, Vol. I.—the chapter on "The Substance of Mind," particularly,—pages 157 and 158. You will find it in Tyndall's Fragments of Science, the chapter on "Scientific Materialism," pages 119 and 120. You will find it in Prof. Fiske's Cosmic Philosophy, the chapter on "Matter and Spirit," Vol. II., page 432, et seq. The whole argument of Mr. Cook on this subject is not only touched on, but elaborately wrought out in a magnificent manner, finer than I have ever seen it anywhere else, in a whole chapter of Fiske's Cosmic Philosophy; so that if Mr. Cook had taken this one chapter into Tremont Temple and had read it to his audience he would have presented the identical argument in a much finer and stronger way than he did in his own language.

I am reminded here, as suggested by this "Method," of that sharp epigram of a wit of the last century, who, having read a play that had been written by a friend, said to him:—

"Your comedy I've read, my friend,
And like the part you plucked best.
But sure the drama you might mend;
Take courage, man, and steal the rest."

If Mr. Cook had stolen the whole of it he would have made a better lecture than he did. So much for materialism. You can estimate how much this style of treatment is worth on the basis of the scientific method.

I come now to look at Mr. Cook's treatment of the doctrine of the Trinity—one of the cardinal central points. His argument, in outline, is simply this: he asserts that it is taught in the New Testament, by implication, at any rate. He asserts that it was believed by the ante-Nicene fathers—that is, the fathers living before the formulation of the Nicene Creed. He asserts that it was the creed of the martyrs. And then, after three assertions, he goes on to outline it with that celebrated figure, which you will remember, of the rainbow. Now let us test this argument a little by the "scientific method." And in the first place suppose, for the purposes of this argument, that the doctrine of the Trinity is written in large letters all over every single page in the New Testament. How much would it mean as a scientific argument on the basis of the "scientific method"?

* In fact, an article appeared in the New York Tribune last fall, while Huxley was in New York, advocating this very idea.

Why, it would mean simply this (and when people fling texts at your heads I ask you to notice and remember this idea),—it would mean simply that certain men who wrote the New Testament books, eighteen hundred years ago, more or less, believed the doctrine of the Trinity. But these same certain men, eighteen hundred years ago, more or less, believed that the world was flat, and that the sun moved around it. They believed in witchcraft. They believed in possession by devils. They believed in exorcism. They believed in all sorts of things. It seems a little strange, when you are going to argue strictly on the basis of the scientific method, that these men's opinions should be absolutely taken as fact in regard to one point of their belief and utterly rejected as nonsense concerning every other! But until Mr. Cook establishes the infallibility of these men's opinions he has not taken one single slightest step towards proving the doctrine of the Trinity.

His next argument was "that it was believed by the ante-Nicene fathers." Here, again, the same principle holds. Suppose it was believed by the ante-Nicene fathers. I admit for a moment (which I shall deny in the next breath) that they did believe it. Suppose they did believe it; what of it? They believed a good many other things. Thousands of people believe in Mormonism. Millions of people believe in Buddhism. Is that scientific argument for their truth? If it is, we have got more infallibilities in this universe than we shall know what to do with.

His next argument is that it was the faith of the martyrs. Suppose it was; it simply means that certain men believed the doctrine with sufficient certainty to die for their faith. Mormons believed in Joe Smith sufficiently to be willing to die for their faith. There is no faith on the face of the earth that has not had its martyrs. Does the belief of the martyr in his creed make it true? When the Mohammedan leaps on the swords of his enemies, dying with the vision of Paradise, with its seventy thousand hours, opening before him, does that prove the Paradise with the seventy thousand hours? It proved that the martyr believed it, and that is all.

Now, then, let me give you a specimen of Mr. Cook's treatment of these "arguments," as he calls them. (As you see, of course, they are no arguments at all.) I want to refer to that celebrated epistle of Clement, that he made so much of in his Tremont Temple lecture two or three weeks ago. Clement, it is supposed—notice there is a little weak link in the chain of argument; it is not known that he was the author—it is supposed that he was the author of a celebrated Epistle to the Corinthians. And it is supposed that this man was the one whom Paul refers to in his Epistle to the Philippians, and so was a person known to Paul. Of course if it could be proved that this man, living away back in that time and known to Paul, believed in the Trinity, it would be a very strong argument in favor of the proposition—not that the Trinity was true, but that the ante-Nicene fathers, some of them, believed it. But let us see how he treats this epistle of Clement. This epistle, as is admitted by every competent critic in the world, in its prevailing tone, and in most all of its passages, is utterly inconsistent with the doctrine of the deity of Jesus Christ. It fairly bristles with passages from one end to the other that teach the subordinate and derived nature of Jesus. There is one passage near the beginning of the epistle that some critics have supposed might possibly teach another doctrine. We have just one manuscript in existence (one original one) of this epistle of Clement. The whole argument turns on the use of one word—whether it is mathemata or pathemata,—and the p and m in Greek are so nearly alike that it is one of the commonest things in the world to have them mixed up by transcribers; and in the present instance a part of the letter is gone, so that it is utterly impossible for any human being living to decide whether it was one or the other. If it is mathemata it means nothing at all to our purpose. If it was pathemata it might possibly be twisted into meaning a little something. But such authorities as Lardner and Bunsen, such authorities as Reuss and Dörner—one of the greatest of German theologians—all of them Orthodox—every single one of them concedes that it is not worth a straw as an argument. And yet on the strength of this, and half-a-dozen "ifs" and "perhappes" plied together, Mr. Cook, by injecting, in brackets, some words of his own, and putting a meaning into the passage that is not there at all, brings forward the shade of the mighty Clement and puts him at the right hand of the Monday Lectureship and stands him up as a witness to the doctrines of Joseph Cook,—a mere shuffling with authorities, for he does not even hint at a question concerning the interpretation that he brings forward. Photius, Bishop of Constantinople in the ninth century, says this epistle is not Orthodox concerning the person of Christ. And chiefly for this reason—though once read in the churches—it was left out in forming the New Testament canon. The other authorities that he quotes do not even go so far as this.

And now let me clear your minds a little bit on this point before I leave it, because I know it must trouble a great many of you. It used to trouble me before I learned so much as I have concerning the thinking of the early ages. There are undoubtedly passages in the Bible, and passages in the early Church fathers, that ascribe to Jesus certain supernatural qualities and offices and powers. That means simply that these men believed that he was a supernatural being and possessed some of these supernatural qualities. And in the first chapter of John it looks in one place as though Jesus were himself called God.

And now, suppose this were all true, what of it? Remember that, so far as any passage speaking in exaltation of Jesus, or referring to him as the son of God, or as the child of God, or as a supernatural being or preëxistent being, is concerned, remember that not a single one of these passages has the slightest bearing on the question of the truth or untruth of the doctrine of the Trinity. Even if you proved that Jesus was God, it would be a "Duality," and not a Trinity. There is no reason in the nature of things why you should stop at three and not make it six.

It was a common, familiar, early belief, a belief not confined to Judaism, but universal in that period of the world, that God was likely to send supernatural beings, angels, and messengers into the world, for this purpose or that. So it was nothing strange if people believed that Jesus was one of these supernatural beings sent on such a mission. But even if he were called God, what then? Take that first chapter of John, and that remarkable verse, how much does it mean to a person familiar with the thought of the early ages? I have had occasion to tell some of you in my Bible-class what I must repeat here for the benefit of you all. You know that there was at that time a wide-spread sect called the Gnostics. And even outside of this sect the peculiarities of the Gnostic belief were spread everywhere through the current philosophy and thought of the time. The New Testament itself—of course you cannot observe it in the English translation, but every one who knows anything of it in the Greek, and otherwise is familiar with the doctrines of Gnosticism, knows the truth of this—is covered all over with the finger-marks of this Gnostic belief. The Book of John is full of technical terms and phrases of the Gnostic philosophy. What was the Gnostic belief? The Gnostic belief was that the original and supreme God dwelt apart and afar from the operations of the material universe, and had nothing whatever to do with matter. They taught that he did not create the world, nor sun, nor star, nor anything that appears; but that it was a sub-deity, a delegate-deity that they called a Demiurgus, that was the creator of the world.

Now Mr. Cook, in the face of facts like these, goes on and makes a striking impression on his audience by quoting some passages from the early fathers, in which they speak of Jesus as the creator of the world. And people to-day say, as they take up the Bible and read the passage that speaks of the world being created by, or through, Jesus Christ (notice how that chimes in with the Gnostic philosophy, that God created the world by, or through, an agent, just as you make a trade in Chicago by, or through, your agent or messenger)—Mr. Cook, I say, makes an immense impression on his audience by quoting passages that refer to Jesus as creator of the world; and we all feel to-day, when we come to such a passage, that Jesus Christ was divine, for we say, "Nobody but God could create a world." But mark you, in the philosophy and belief that prevailed at that time the doctrine that Jesus Christ was the creator of the world was the strongest of all possible ways of asserting that he was not the original and supreme God, because it was a very fundamental article of their belief that this original and supreme God did not do the work of creation. Now here again a "small philosopher" does not dare to assume that the "colossal scholarship" of the Monday Lectureship is not familiar with this truth. But if he is, unless he is convicted by this of ignorance, you yourself can draw the inference as to whether he is or is not convicted of the wilful suppression of evidence, the perversion of truth, the misrepresentation of facts.

And this is the sum total of his proof of the doctrine of the Trinity. There is not an intelligent jury in Boston or in New York that would think of convicting William Tweed of stealing the worth of a pin on the basis of evidence so flimsy as that. And this he calls his "scientific method"!

I pass now to consider for a moment the doctrine of "the atonement" as he treated it by "the scientific method." I must deal with this very shortly—simply by pointing out one or two principles which you can readily apprehend. What are the facts on which is based any claim that there ought to be an atonement? Simply this: there are certain laws of this universe—laws grounded in the nature of things,—by which the universe stands together, and which are essential to its permanence. If you break these laws you necessarily and inevitably suffer the penalty of broken laws. If you keep them, it is life and health and peace. Most of us, through ignorance, inherited weakness, tendencies this way or that, have, in some direction, at some time, broken these laws. Now comes in the Orthodox and says: "On account of this fact (which all the world admits), since it is necessary that law must be upheld and the breaking of that law must be punished, therefore somebody must take the penalty." (But consider, friends, somebody does take the penalty already—every day, every instant. You can no more break any minutest fragment of the law of God and not suffer than you can put your hand in the fire and it not be burned.) And since some men are saved and delivered, the argument is that God must take the penalty upon himself. Mr. Cook deliberately shifts the whole ground of the old Orthodox faith, and says that it is "chastisement" that God takes upon himself rather than "punishment." But it amounts to the same thing, or amounts to nothing at all, as argument.

Consider, then, this, and it will be a light to guide you through all this wilderness of confusion surrounding the subject of "the atonement." There are just two ways by which any law, human or divine, can be magnified and supported: one is by the person who breaks it suffering the penalty. A law is not broken. We simply say figuratively that a man breaks a law; but he transgresses and the law breaks him. The law stands in its integrity, perfect in every part; works under the impulse of the divine and eternal Omnipotence. The other way by which to maintain a law is to have it kept. Now, so far as the law itself is concerned, it is indifferent to that, of course, whether it is maintained by the penalty being exacted when it is broken, or whether it is maintained by being obeyed. Now, then, the man does suffer the necessary, essential, and adequate result of broken law every time that he breaks it. And if men are brought into obedience to that law, the law has no desire or power of going back and exacting something for that which is passed. Suppose to-day the whole universe were brought up into perfect order, and all persons were keeping exactly this law of God; who cares, then, for the past? Evil has passed away like a morning cloud. It were only criminal, causeless revenge to punish any one after the evil itself had ceased to be.

With that slight touch upon the doctrine of the atonement I pass to the last main point in my discussion of the importance of clear-thinking everywhere; and that is Mr. Cook's method of dealing with the doctrine of everlasting punishment. I am not going to argue it on general grounds. I shall simply give you the method in which he treats it,—claiming that it is scientific. And here let me say that the sum total of his teaching (which he calls scientific) is based on simple, unqualified assumption, from first to last. Throughout the whole argument he does not touch his feet anywhere. What is his argument? The first point in it is this: he assumes that men may voluntarily come into a condition of permanent, confirmed sinfulness. Has he proved it? Has he proved that a man may do it? What is the totality of his proof? Simply that there are men who die unrepentant and apparently still on their downward course, as we say, morally. But let me indicate to you how much this is worth: here is a man who goes on in the downward course until he is twenty years old; then he repents, turns, and goes upwards. Another man goes on in the downward course until he is forty; then he repents and goes upwards. Another man goes on in the downward course until he is sixty; then he repents and goes upwards. And I remember one remarkable case in my own ministerial experience of a man at eighty years of age repenting and coming to me like a little child to become "a member of my church"; so it is possible for a man to repent even at eighty years of age. Now, suppose this man who repented at eighty had died when he was fifty; he would die still going downward, as we say. How does Mr. Cook happen to know that at the end of fifteen or thirty years in the other world it is utterly impossible for this same man who would have repented here at eighty, at the same time, when he gets to be eighty there, to turn and go upward in the other world? Before this assumption of Mr. Cook is worth the breath he takes to utter it he must give us one poor little fact. And until he can go into the other world and follow the course of each one of its innumerable inhabitants until he gets clear to the other end of eternity, it is utterly impossible for him to tell us that any man will continue on his downward course forever. That question cannot be decided until the end of forever,—not on the basis of fact and the use of the scientific method. When Mr. Cook has been to the other end of forever, and comes back and reports a case, then we will account his argument worth something.

After he has assumed that a man may do this, then he goes on to make another gigantic jump of assumption and assumes that ever so many people will do it. Even if you proved that a man might do it, that would not prove that anybody would. Perhaps I can prove that any one of you may do any sort of unreasonable and unheard-of thing before night; but on the basis of that it would hardly be reasonable for me to assume that you would do it, and then go and tell your neighbors that you had done it.

And then, again, another gigantic assumption is that the Omnipotent power that we call God, who reigns and rules at the heart of this universe, could not help himself if anybody chose to go on and confirm himself in a character of evil and become permanently opposed to him; because Mr. Cook says (I quote his own words in his last Monday's lecture)—he says deliberately, and makes it the foundation of one of his grand structures of argument and syllogism—"God wills man's perfection." He admits, then, that God wants everybody to be perfect; and he dares, for the sake of upholding the blasphemous assumption of the Pagan doctrine of everlasting torture, for the sake of upholding that, he dares to assert in the face of the Almighty that if men choose to go on in opposition to him forever he cannot help himself. That is the sum total of his argument on that point. For if God wills man's perfection, and he can help himself, then it would seem to be the next logical step that he would help himself, and that man would some time be perfect.

If a man, then, who plants himself on the scientific basis, and is going to argue strictly in accordance with the scientific method, offers, as the sum total of his gigantic argument for everlasting punishment, three magnificent "ifs," it is not a very substantial affair, after all. You may build a structure as high as heaven, and if it rests on an "if" at the bottom it is about as good as a cob-house in a storm. The scientific method starts with its feet on a rock somewhere—with a fact,—and there cannot by any possibility be a scientific method until you get your feet on that rock.

As to Mr. Cook's treatment of Theodore Parker I shall say nothing beyond remarking that he is in the hands of careful year-long students of Mr. Parker, who are critically acquainted with his works. I confess to you that I am not sufficiently acquainted with Theodore Parker's writings, in all their particulars, so that I am fit to take up the statements of Mr. Cook concerning them. I have kept myself to-day on that which I do know, and which I can prove if I were called upon to do it in a court of justice. Therefore I leave Theodore Parker one side, merely remarking that Mr. David A. Wasson, a man who has made Theodore Parker's works the study of years, said only last Sunday (a statement that means a great deal more when calmly put, as he put it, than when uttered in the excitement of debate) that, so far as he had studied and read Theodore Parker's works, Mr. Cook had not made one single statement about Theodore Parker yet that was not a misstatement. I give you that, on Mr. Wasson's authority, for what it is worth.

And now, then, Christian friends, I must ask your time for a few minutes longer while I take up Mr. Cook's method of treating authorities, in two or three instances, that have not come in the line of my regular argument. I do it because from one case you can know all. And I want you, and I want any person that reads what I say here this morning, to understand how much dependence they can put upon the Monday Lectureship's use of authorities. Here the other day he quoted from a fresh book called The Best Reading, edited by Mr. Perkins, and brought him up as an authority for the position he was taking concerning the Bible, as against Mr. Gibbon, the historian. A day or two afterwards Mr. Perkins comes out in an article over his own name, in the Globe, and fairly laughs at the idea of Mr. Cook's making any such use of it, and says that his authority is just as good on one side as it is on the other.

You will remember, some of you, Mr. Cook's citation of Carlyle's opinion of Darwin, some time ago, full of misstatements of fact to start with. And then consider the absurdity for a moment of Carlyle, the great littérateur, but no scientist at all, sitting in judgment upon a man like Darwin, and being brought to the city of Boston to condemn his system!

Another point: one of Mr. Cook's strongest appeals that he has made this winter has been by means of conjuring up the shade of Hermann Lotze, a celebrated writer, a philosopher of Germany, one of the greatest men of the age; and he brought him, in his argument against Huxley, and put him in opposition to Huxley,—telling the intelligent city of Boston that here was the greatest man of Germany who was going utterly to demolish one of the greatest men of England; and he stood him up, and with his image attempted to knock Mr. Huxley down. You can judge of the accuracy of the scholarship involved in such a performance as that. In regard to this particular point where Mr. Cook set Lotze in opposition to Huxley, Lotze teaches precisely and identically the same doctrine that Huxley teaches. This is another illustration of Mr. Cook's use of authorities!

But the most strange, far-fetched, and outrageous one of all was his treatment of Mr. Carlyle and Dean Stanley, as backing up his position as a believer in the Thirty-nine Articles, or the Nicene Creed. You will remember that, for it has been written about in papers; and it is one of the most noteworthy occurrences of the winter. He goes on and states that Carlyle and Dean Stanley are both believers in the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. Now let me delay you a minute in regard to these men. Mr. Stanley delivered a very celebrated address before the students of the University of St. Andrew's, at Edinburgh, the other day. It is so thoroughly rationalistic in its whole doctrine, from one end to the other, that it is republished as a liberal document in the Unitarian papers of both England and America. And this same lecture was the basis of Mr. Cook's assertions. In it Dean Stanley explicitly and implicitly abandons almost every single essential point of the Thirty-nine Articles, and places himself substantially on the platform on which I myself claim to stand. Mr. Cook, in quoting the words of Dean Stanley, says of Mr. Carlyle: "Mr. Carlyle has not broken with the traditions of the Scottish Church." That is Mr. Cook's quotation from Dean Stanley. Mr. Stanley's own words are these: "Mr. Carlyle has not disdained the traditions of his Church." You might say that of anybody. Mr. Cook, for the sake of bringing Mr. Stanley as a witness to the Orthodoxy of Carlyle, changes the words that are published all over America, and puts entirely another meaning into his language.

And, then, as to Mr. Carlyle's adhesion to the Thirty-nine Articles, why, read him in the Life of Sterling, and all throughout his different books. He stands as the one gigantic representative, in this age of that contempt for shams, that hates a pretence of belief where the heart has been eaten away.

And to think of Carlyle's praising the Thirty-nine Articles when nearly half of the ministers of the English Church, to-day, by their own confession, do not believe the Thirty-nine Articles! Think of him standing behind to bolster up a sham like that!

And then Carlyle himself, in his own language, has used words of bitterest contempt for these Thirty-nine Articles. Let me give you a specimen, and you can see, then, how Orthodox Carlyle is concerning the creed of the Church of England. He says, in the celebrated verse quoted by Tyndall at the end of one of his lectures:—

"The Builder of this universe was wise;
He formed all souls, all systems, planets, particles.
The plan he formed his worlds and zones by
Was—Heavens!—was thy small nine-and-thirty articles!"

That is Carlyle's Orthodoxy on the Thirty-nine Articles, in his own words, without changing the sense to make them mean something else.

And then he brings Carlyle and Stanley up in Westminster Abbey and says he is going to make them recite the Thirty-nine Articles in opposition to certain words he shall quote. But after he has got them installed in his imagination, in Westminster Abbey, he drops the Thirty-nine Articles, and there is no hint of them from that time forth in all the rest of his lecture. For that he substitutes the Litany, which is simply general expressions of praise and worship of God, which not only Carlyle and Stanley, but which Theodore Parker, which Confucius, which Zoroaster, which any man with intelligence and reverence in his nature, all over the world, could have repeated just as well as Carlyle and Dean Stanley. And that is an argument that they believe the Thirty-nine Articles.

Now I have just one word more to say in regard to this scientific method with which we began: Mr. Cook has not offered one single fact in regard to these matters which I have brought up for discussion, the central ones that he has treated this winter. He does not know, or if he does he has not put in practice, the very first letters of the alphabet of the scientific method. And, furthermore, I dare to assert here, in opposition to the teaching that has been so bruited abroad in the city of Boston this winter, I dare to assert, and challenge New England or America for a reply,—there is not one single distinctive doctrine of the Orthodox system that ever has been proved by the scientific method, that can be proved by the scientific method, that in the nature of things the scientific method can even be brought to apply to. The man, then, who appeals to that method and stands faithfully by it is lost, at any rate to Orthodoxy.

Now, then, what is the summing up?
Mr. Cook's claimed science is scilettism. His hydra-headed propositional logic is assertion. His proof is rhetoric. His insight is persecution. His Orthodoxy is Cook-ism. His honesty and fairness in debate are either ignorance, carelessness in the use of authorities, or something which I will not name, but which you can infer for yourselves. He has poured out his reading undigested before the audiences that have gathered around him, as a champion of the old beliefs. He has added hardly one thought of his own that will stand the investigation of a critic. That in him which is true is not new, and that which is new is not true; or, at any rate, if it is, he has utterly failed to prove it.—Boston Commonwealth.

ON THE ANNIHILATION OF THE MIND.

BY JOHN TROWBRIDGE,
ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF PHYSICS, HARVARD COLLEGE.

There are some subjects which are unapproachable by any of the present methods of scientific investigation; yet the human mind, especially that form of it which is utterly untrained in scientific methods of thought, loves to ponder over the profoundest mysteries, and calls upon Science with an almost imperative tone to solve moral doubts and fears. One of the greatest questions which one finds perplexing the general reader of popular science, who is also an independent thinker on religious questions, is that of the survival, so to speak, of the human mind and all that betokens the mental and moral power of man after death. The alarming doctrine that the mind and soul are the result of a process of growth in the individual, like physical growth of bone and muscle, and that body and mind increase and decrease together, and are resolved into the elements again at the close of life, is not infrequently put forward by materialists. It is maintained, further, that the belief in immortality is largely a matter of education, notwithstanding the evidence which is brought forward to prove that even uncivilized nations have a belief in deities and a future life. To the materialist, the picture presented by the unwrapping of a Peruvian family burial-sack, with its young and old mummies, and its collection of pottery and a bag of grain to help the disembodied spirits on their way to a happier hunting-ground, is pathetic only because it seems a hopeless superstition. What kind of a soul, it is asked, has the Digger Indian who is hardly more intelligent than a wild animal? If he has a mind and soul, so has my dog. No; what we call the soul is a cultivated state or condition which perishes like a highly-disciplined adaptation of the muscles of the body which a gymnast possesses. It is a state of crystallization; it is a reaction or interaction of atoms consequent upon physical growth. When the body dies, the mind and its attributes perish. Such utter disbelief in the great doctrine of the resurrection is hard to combat; for, even among scientific thinkers, the class of men who do not become attached to the cast-iron ways down which thought has traveled to time is small. A logician who sets his mental machinery in motion, and then steps to one side to scrutinize its defects and limitations, is rare. To hint that there may be higher processes of logic than those generally accepted, implies the possession of a scientific mind, to say the least, not of a quantitative cast. It has seemed to the writer that a discussion of the idea of the degradation of spiritual energy, so to speak, would not be an unprofitable or irreverent subject from the purely scientific point of view. A little thought will convince one that no transformation of energy can take place in Nature without degradation or dissipation of it. In order to generate steam we must expend the energy stored up in the coal; and in its turn the steam in doing work passes from a hotter state to a colder one. A fresh supply of energy is needed in order to enable the cold body to do work again. There is a tendency to a uniform diffusion of heat, or to a degradation of energy.

In the process of physical growth and decay, the doctrine of the conservation of force, and the degradation of energy, is clearly exemplified. What the body receives from the sun in the process of growth is given back, transformed, to the earth. At death the physical being undergoes a chemical change; and the earth and air recall to themselves their respective portions. Here there is an equivalent rendering of matter. If the soul and mind have been the result of a process of growth, the entire potential energy of the living unit has not been accounted for in the final dissolution. The song of a bird can be resolved into waves of motion which, although they cease after a moment, and the consequent vibrations of the human ear die away, are still exerting an influence upon matter. Babbage, in his "Bridgewater Treatise," has drawn a powerful picture of the possible permanence of the motion which has been communicated to the ether by the tones of a human voice, and shows that it may not be impossible to believe that the eloquence of Demosthenes still continues in some form of motion. So we can believe that the physical effects of a bird's song can remain forever impressing some form of motion upon matter. Besides the physical vibrations which the song communicated to the human ear, it has so impressed the mind that, after the lapse of years, the repetition of the same notes can call up innumerable memories of deeds and a thousand pictures of the past. In the mind of the poet it may be the one detached note from which he can construct a song of home which can serve to arouse the ardor of the Christian Slav against the Turk, and store up a fearful potential energy which by its fall can destroy entire nations. Here we have, in the transformation of the vibrations of sound to another form of energy, a continual degradation of energy; but we may have by the same means an exaltation of spiritual potential energy which is unexplained by our doctrine of the conservation of force, and seems to require the incoming of another element in our calculations. Where does appear the force of mind, the high courage, which can enable a feeble body to maintain a high potential energy out of the same physical materials which contribute to the formation of the sluggishness of others? It may be answered: What makes the difference between the energy of the blooded hunter and that of the dray-horse? Where does the difference appear in the final dissolution? With this latter question we immediately perceive the difference between the degradation of energy which accompanies that which recalls life, and that which is manifested in the combinations of matter. Gunpowder, fired by the concentrated rays of the sun, leaves only ashes and a rapidly-disappearing veil of smoke. It has impressed upon the ether vibrations which are forever undergoing rapid transformations: In regard to its physical nature it goes from inertness to inertness. A current of electricity is maintained by chemical action which takes place in a voltaic cell. As long as this action continues, the current can exercise its functions. When the potential energy of the chemical activity falls, the current dies away. From the earth the gunpowder can be reconstructed with exactly the same characteristics. From the earth, beings endowed with life can be created by a process which is far beyond our ken, yet the new creations are never exact reproductions. We are forced to acknowledge that there must be something which is called the principle of life. If there is such a principle, does it die at the physical death of each individual? If so, we must modify the all-embracing scope of the doctrine of the conservation of force and its non-annihilation. When a body loses its heat, or its electrical charge, we can readily form the equation of transformation. With matter endowed with life we must join, by an additive or subtractive sign, an unknown function which we may term the life-function. In discussing such an equation of transformation of energy, we must refuse to admit such a term depending on the life-function, on the ground that we are dealing with matter and material forces, and that there is no energy distinct from that communicated by chemical processes. Or we must admit it; and make some assumption which can just as well be made in reference to its spiritual or non-physical nature as in regard to the peculiar relations which different organic compounds may maintain toward each other. The first step leaves an hiatus in our expression for the transformation of energy, and the second gives a choice of belief.

It may seem to some that the doctrine of Darwin is capable of being extended to intellectual philosophy; and, as certain animal types fail to flourish and perpetuate themselves because the conditions are not propitious, so we can admit the possibility that the South Sea cannibal is endowed with a mind or soul germ which could be developed if the right conditions were at hand. In chemistry we find many substances which are apparently identical in composition, but which possess diverse qualities. Certain conditions are requisite to produce different states of the same compound. If these conditions are not fulfilled, the required combination is not made. With the cannibal our equation of the conservation of force would require a small term to represent the mind and soul, but a comparatively large one, it may be, to account for that stress of the particles, so to speak, which manifests itself as life. The source of the physical energy is the sun's heat. Looking, therefore, at the problem of life and mind from a purely scientific point of view, we seem to require a source from which can come the principle of life, and which can create moral and intellectual growth in suitable soil and under fitting conditions. In the case of the energy derived from the sun's heat we have a cycle of operations in which there is no annihilation of force. If we grant that there is a source of life and mind independent of mere chemical change produced by the sun's heat, and if we adhere to the notion of the conservation of force applied to this principle of life and mind, we are led to adopt the idea of a cycle of operations in which there is no annihilation of spiritual force. The doctrine of the existence of the spirit after physical death seems to me not to be foreign to the scientific ideas of the conservation of force, which have now obtained such complete supremacy in the science of physics; or to the doctrines of Darwin, which are accepted by so large a body of eminent naturalists. Without the sun; there would be an annihilation of force. When energy is dissipated, we find the sun exalting it again by processes which we cannot completely follow. The idea of a great source of life and mind, the prototype of our physical sun, which sets in motion a vast scheme for the survival of the fittest, and the exaltation of energy in vast cycles, is not inconsistent with the doctrine of the New Testament, and seems to be required in a philosophical theory which shall endeavor to account for the differences in that great spiritual world which are continually suggested to the human mind by the various types of mental growth.—Popular Science Monthly for April.

PROGRESS OF THE CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT MOVEMENT.

CHICAGO, Feb. 24, 1877.

DEAR STATESMAN:—

Only two Christian ministers, of all the large number I have thus far called upon, have declared themselves opposed to the National Reform Movement. One of them, Dr. W. W. Patton, takes squarely the ground of secularism, and opposes not only the Religious Amendment of the United States Constitution, but every law or act of our government which favors Christianity. At a large meeting in Farwell Hall one Sabbath afternoon last fall, this gentleman upheld the exclusion of the Bible from the public schools, and was applauded to the echo by a multitude of the enemies of the Christian religion, and by other secularists. He assured me that his views were gaining ground rapidly among Christians; but I have not met with a single minister of his own church who does not emphatically condemn his course and oppose his philosophy. So far as I can judge, his discourse has opened the eyes of many to the logical results of the secular theory of government.

The other minister to whom I referred above does not oppose the Christian elements of our national life. He most cordially sustains Sabbath laws, Christian education by the State, etc., but regards any clause in the National Constitution authenticating these Christian institutions as oppressive in its character. When I asked him if the religious acknowledgments in our State Constitution were oppressive, he said that was not in point; and again, when I reminded him that the facts of the Bible in the schools and Sabbath laws, and not the authentication of them in the Constitution, must specially touch the infidel or atheist, he said his mind was made up, and he would not argue the question.

With these two exceptions the ministers of all denominations have given me hearty encouragement. Even the comparatively few who have declined to unite in the call for the Convention, have still declared that they sympathize fully with the National Reform Association in a large part of its work; and many of them admitted that they might yet be led to cooperate with it.

Only one man has objected to the distinctively Christian character of the acknowledgment proposed by the National Reform Association. After he had stated his objections, and I had assured him that in this distinctively Christian character of the movement lay its whole power, I frankly told him that I thought he had better not give his signature to the call, and was about to put the document in my pocket, when he insisted on appending his name. I tell every man that his name is not wanted, if he does not cordially approve the objects of the National Reform Association.

I have not yet called on many citizens of Chicago outside of the ministry. John V. Farwell, H. S. Spafford, and Alonzo Abernethy have given their names. The first of these said this was the beginning of a great struggle, especially with Romanism, and he wanted to take his stand. Mr. Spafford is a Pre-millennarian. He has no hope for the reformation of our nation. He is waiting for the coming of Christ in person, when the nation will be destroyed, and not until then does he look for the acknowledgment of the authority of God and Christ and the Bible in the Constitution of our country. At the request of the Hon. Mr. Abernethy, President of the Chicago University, I am to address all the students next Tuesday on the National Reform cause.

The most interesting interview, all things considered, that I have yet had, was with the Hon. J. A. Jameson, of the Superior Court of this city, and author of the celebrated work on The Constitutional Convention. Mr. Gault, a lawyer of this city, who has given me efficient aid, introduced me in the court, and I had the opportunity for a very satisfactory conversation. Having understood that Judge Jameson did not favor the Religious Amendment, I was desirous of learning the ground of his opposition, inasmuch as the principles and arguments of his book, in my view, logically lead the other way. The essential point of our conversation was on the expression in the unwritten Constitution, of the connection of our government with Christianity. Judge Jameson in his book, as readers of the Statesman will remember, carefully distinguishes between written and unwritten Constitutions, and insists that in any case where the written instrument does not express and authenticate what is vital in the unwritten Constitution, the former must be amended to conform to the latter. I asked him if Christianity was not a vital fact in our unwritten Constitution, and urged that, according to his own argument, the written Constitution of the United States should be amended to conform to that essential fact. He replied that it was such a fact as did not require expression. Let me suppose by way of analogy, he continued, that the people of Illinois are forming a Constitution. Here are the facts of her broad prairies, her system of rivers, etc., entering into her vital, unwritten Constitution. They do not need expression and authentication. So with the connection of our government, as a fact with Christianity. I respectfully suggested that the facts of prairie lands, rivers, etc., were physical matters, which no human enactments could annihilate. But the existing Christian elements of our national life run in the sphere of morals,—facts which might cease to be matters of vitality. The former class of material facts did not come within the scope of the principle of his own argument, as it viewed such facts as, if not expressed and authenticated, would sooner or later disappear. And hence the analogy would not hold. He admitted that he had greatly modified his opposition to the movement; when I insisted that he must choose between authenticating our Christian institutions of government in the National Constitution, and letting them be gradually disintegrated and destroyed, he said he might yet be convinced of the necessity of the National Reform Movement. But at present he was content to leave things as they are.

Bishop McLaren, after carefully considering the whole subject, decided to cooperate with the National Reform Association. He had always opposed secularism, but had never before been called upon to decide in regard to the religious amendment of the Constitution. He gave me a copy of a sermon preached by him at the last Commencement at Racine College, which I forward for the readers of the Statesman.

In another letter I may refer to points of conversation with lawyers on whom I have called.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

TWO PREACHERS.

Two preachers touched my soul one night;
Both woke within me earnest thought;
One charmed by Fancy's airy flight,
One bitter anguish wrought.

The first, 'neath freecode, fretted roof,
With flowers making sweet the air,
On ornate dais stood aloof,
And uttered praiseful prayer.

He thanked his God, in mankind's name,
For light, for life, for home, and friends,
For all that through our sensuous frame
A thrill of gladness sends.

And then he spoke, in choicest phrase,
Of fruitful earth and glorious heaven,
Of love that guardeth all our ways,
Of pardon freely given.

And, listening in a cushioned pew,
Wrapped in a dreamful, dazy mist
Of music, lights, and warmth, I grew
A sudden optimist.

Wealth, beauty, grace, and culture rare,
Proud faces fashioned fair by fate,
Filled up the pews—no hint was there
Of misery, want, or hate.

The world was fair—and God did reign—
So ran my musings glad and sweet,
As at the organ's grand refrain
We surged into the street.

Into the street! 'Twas here I found
The preacher who spoke words of woe;
The stars shone fierce above—around
All things were draped in snow.

And bitter was the north wind's rage,
Yet thin-clad forms went hurrying on—
Forms bent with toll, disease, and age,
From whom all joy seemed gone.

And baby-voices begged for bread,
And voices rude made night more drear,
With oaths enforcing words of dread;
I wondered—was God near?

And maddened men went reeling by
To homes where wives, with inward moan,
Hushed childhood's quick, impatient cry
And hunger's fretful tone.

And by the street-lamp's flickering glare
I glimpses caught of faces bold,—
Girl-faces, whose defiant stare
Their dismal story told.

From sights and sounds like these—not creeds—
Did this strange preacher preach to me,
His sermon was on human needs;
His name—Humanity!

And this the moral that he drew:
That man for men in larger sense
Become—what Heaven fails to do—
A loving Providence.

The Index.

BOSTON, MAY 17, 1877.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FRET, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, WILLIAM J. POTTER,
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHERNEY, GEORGE JACOB
HOLYOAKE (England), DAVID H. CLARK, MRS. ELIZABETH
CARY STANTON, Editorial Contributors.

THE ADJOURNED MEETING of May 12, referred to a fortnight ago, was held in this city as announced. The committee appointed on April 28 made their report. The result of the meeting was that THE INDEX will be continued another year under its present management, while a vigorous attempt will be made to carry out the suggestions of the original circular calling the meeting.

THE INVETERACY of superstition is amusingly illustrated in these rather astonishing remarks which we cut from a copy of the New Zealand Christian Record, published at Dunedin, Feb. 17, 1877: "Professor Huxley has been lecturing in America on Evolution. The lectures did not excite much interest. [1] Two of our newspapers refer to him in the following terms: 'Professor Huxley has come and seen, lectured and gone. To build so revolutionary a theory, in the name of science, upon the 'toes' and 'shin-bones' of four or five geological horses, which did unquestionably resemble each other, but with certain curious differences, demonstrates, first of all, an ease of credulity to which the Christian belief in miracles bears no comparison. Really, from this foremost popular advocate of the materialistic evolutionism we had looked for something stronger. Even the alarmed Dr. Blauvelt ought to breathe more freely.' Another paper says: 'It seems to be pretty clearly established that the visit of the great scientist to our country was a failure. We are really no wiser than before his coming; our favorite doctrines are no less dear to us; our confidence in the Word of God, and the Divine plan for the salvation of lost man, is no less than when Professor Huxley set foot upon our shores.'"

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Sixth Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Index Association will be held at No. 35 Monroe Street, Toledo, Ohio, on Saturday, June 2, 1877, at half-past two o'clock, in accordance with the articles of incorporation.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Tenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston as follows:—

Thursday evening, May 31st, at 7.45 P. M., business session in Horticultural Hall, for the election of officers, reading of reports, and consideration of the practical work of the Association. A special discussion is also invited on the proper interpretation of the word "scientific" in the first article of the Constitution of the Association.

Friday, June 1st, at 10 A. M. and 3 P. M., sessions in Beethoven Hall for Essays and Addresses. Morning subject: "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom." Essayist—Rev. Wm. R. Alger, of New York. Afternoon subject: "Internal Dangers of Free Thought." Essayist—C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, N.Y. Among the speakers invited whose attendance we have reason to expect are Prof. Felix Adler, of New York; Rabbi Lasker, of Boston; Wm. Henry Channing, of England; Rev. Dr. Dudley, of Boston; and Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, of Illinois. Further announcements hereafter, especially in the Boston dailies.

A Social Festival is to be held Friday evening at Horticultural Hall. Col. T. W. Higginson will preside. There will be brief speeches, music, conversation, refreshments, and a chance to contribute to the Treasury of the Association.

W. J. POTTER,

Secretary.

THE "AUTHORITY" OF SCIENCE.

The disintegrating influence of science upon Christianity has been tremendous, and appears nowhere more conspicuously than in the ground-and-lofty-tumbling of such anomalous acrobats as Joseph Cook, who presents a somewhat curious phenomenon to the student of the times. What with his tomahawk and his skin-tights, it is a difficult problem to decide whether he should be classed with theological braves on the war-path, or perhaps more scientifically referred to the species of circus-clown. It is at least patent that the belligerent and the ridiculous enter into his composition in about equal proportions. Bustling before the public as the champion of Orthodoxy, he yet pretends to plant himself squarely upon the "scientific method" and the "nature of things"! Notwithstanding the noise he makes, there is very little importance in his inflated and obstreperous Philistinism. He will yet be found out to be a more dangerous enemy to Orthodoxy than anybody outside its lines, because, while he vociferates the old doctrines with a bluster that fairly stuns, he has learned just enough science to know that he can no longer do it in the name of the old authorities, and has not the sense or art to keep this perilous secret to himself. For a time it may dazzle and delight his not over-bright audiences to see Orthodoxy tricked out, like the jackdaw in the fable, with the peacock's plumes; but when the peacocks appear to strip the pretender, and the misbehaving old bird is pecked to death by her new associates, the poor blunderer who got her into the scrape will need to be rescued from his own backers. The only permanent lesson of the whole farce is that Orthodoxy, if Joseph Cook is voted Orthodox, gives up the Bible as her ultimate ground of certitude, and professes to plant herself on the "scientific method." The mischief, once consummated, can never be repaired. The "scientific method" will not be hurt in the least; but Orthodoxy, striving to steal its prestige in violation of her own organic necessities, is simply cutting her own throat.

The impossibility of reestablishing the tottering dogmas of the Church on a scientific basis, which will prove to be the only final or lasting result of such desperate experiments as the Monday lectureship, raises a natural question whether the scientific method will in the end show itself equally incompatible with religious ideas in general. On this point no wise thinker will dogmatize. We are fully persuaded in our own mind that the methods and principles of scientific investigation, modified as they always are by the nature of the subjects investigated, constitute the only means we possess of arriving at objective truth in any direction; that this means must yet, in the progress of knowledge, be applied to the highest problems of human thought; and that no opinions can ultimately hold their place in human belief, unless authenticated in this manner. Nor is this all. There is a spirit of the ages, no less than a spirit of the age—a certain general drift and tendency of human thought manifested in human history as a whole, and independent of the temporary fluctuations or oscillations of it which characterize special periods in this general history. While we admit unreservedly that the spirit of this age, as represented by its most advanced scientific men, exhibits a certain bias towards materialism,—while we see a sufficient reason for this bias in the fact that science is still so young, and has not yet fairly entered upon the study of other than purely physical phenomena,—we discern in human history on the whole a profound and ever-growing emphasis of purely moral values, which points to a counter-movement in the future, when science shall have finally established the supremacy of her own method in the higher departments of human inquiry. Nay, even in the present, there are most significant signs that a reaction against excessive materialism is setting in already—notably the gradual changes that are coming over the materialistic theory itself. The materialism of the nineteenth century differs widely from that of the eighteenth, and the change is all in the direction of a spiritual philosophy of the universe. The destruction of the old Christian distinction between "natural" and "supernatural" leaves man, mind and all, an integral part of Nature; it begins to be seen and acknowledged that more cannot be evolved out of a thing than it originally contained; and man's moral and spiritual consciousness, for which in vain is an explanation sought in molecular motions, has got to be accounted for on cosmical grounds.

It is therefore no lurking remnant of inherited dogmatism, but at least an honest tentative application of the scientific method to the subject-matter of religious ideas, that leads us to look hopefully on the extension of the scientific method to all possible problems. This extension is inevitable at last—of that fact no doubt remains to us; but all apprehension as to the ultimate effect of it upon religious belief disappears in the certainty that it can bring only a profounder, intenser, and more intelligent appreciation of man's moral consciousness as a cosmical, and not merely an individual, fact. In other words, the scientific method, bringing all verified phenomena into relation with each other as parts of one omnicohesive system, must in due time relate man's moral or spiritual being to the universe as a whole, and lay the foundation of a new philosophy in which moral consciousness shall hold the central place,—not as an unrelated fact of merely human significance, but rather as a fact related to every other in the universe, and presenting the only position-point whence the universe can be apprehended as a unit. Science cannot stop short of such a philosophy as that, however little inclined physicists may be at present to recognize the legitimacy of an extension of her method to regions with which they are not familiar. Fortunately, nobody is able to direct the progress of human knowledge in the path of his own preconceptions; the human mind is greater than any man, moves by laws which no generation fully illustrates, and cannot be even measurably understood except by those whose vision sweeps over the whole of its recorded past. If this wide survey teaches anything, it would seem to be the fact that religious ideas, transient in form, have been permanent in substance, and that science with her careful method, instead of destroying them altogether, is likely to bring out the truth they contain all the more clearly and beautifully by disengaging it from the superstitions that have so long enwrapped it.

This line of thought is sure to be welcomed by those who look eagerly and anxiously into the future to discern what changes science is yet to work upon the venerable religious beliefs of the past. It is easy to decide off-hand that religion itself is superstition; it is difficult to make the exact discriminations which truth and genuine culture require. Knowing that mankind have no real or permanent interest in the perpetuation of error, it is well for those who love truth supremely to scrutinize the tendencies of the age in the light of still larger tendencies, to keep an open mind, and to cherish a fearless confidence that in religion, as in everything else, science is only accurate knowledge, and that knowledge bears only a blessing in its bosom. The ancient authorities on which the world has leaned, as every penetrating mind perceives, are melting away; it is certain that the reign of pure individualism, which is nothing but intellectual anarchy and confusion, is to be a brief one. What is the great, new authority that is destined to govern the religious thinking of the instructed and emancipated human mind? Eccentricities and idiosyncrasies will not meet the demands of the situation; merely subjective faiths, hopes, fears, intuitions, valid for the individual alone and incommunicable to others, will not redeem human society from the reproach and pain of a general mental lawlessness, or permanently satisfy even the individual himself. There must yet be developed a new and universally recognized authority which shall at once guarantee the absolute freedom of individual thought, and yet establish and preserve the conditions of a true spiritual solidarity of the race. Where shall it be found?

If it can be found anywhere but in the scientific method, we long to learn where. This method has been proved adequate in most important matters to create unity of thought on the ground of ascertained truth throughout the civilized world. In many other matters, even more important, no such unity has as yet been reached; but it should be expected that new questions will always continue to arise, as answers to preceding questions take one by one their place in science as undisputed verities. It is no diminution of the glory of Science to confess that she has not yet mastered infinite truth. The fact remains that a vast body of acquired truths has been organized under the name of science, and that no one who patiently studies them can doubt their validity; they force themselves on credence whenever the grounds on which they rest are once understood. It is the method of science, then, which alone offers unity of thought on the basis of perfect freedom. To include religion under this method is only to say in other words that religion offers truth to be known; while to refuse to include it is to confess that religion deals only with phantoms and unrealities. No greater service could possibly be rendered to mankind than to persuade them to discard all the old, cramping, arbitrary, tyrannical authorities, and to accept this beneficent new authority of science as the common appeal in religious controversies. Oceans of human blood would have been spared, if the world had only learned this transcendent lesson two thousand years ago. How often has THE INDEX been blamed for being "destructive," and not "constructive"! And what a satire on the intelligence of those who made it has this criticism been! To establish the method of science as the common appeal in all questions of religious truth has been our unremitted effort from the very beginning of this paper,—aye, and years before. No constructive work in religion, surely no creed-building, can be compared to it one instant in world-wide importance. Yet this work of construction has been going on under the very eyes and noses of the critics, and scarce one of them has seen anything but "destruction" in it! The most thoroughly positive and constructive work that is possible in this age has been the never-forgotten object of THE INDEX from its birth; and the stale complaint has gone up all the while, "Why don't you construct?" "Why don't you construct?" "Why don't you construct?" O blind generation, what could one do more in beneficent construction than he who toils faithfully to build a new and better highway to religious truth?

That, and no less, is the authority of the scientific method in religion.

A charmingly ingenuous letter on "The Scientific Method not the Sole Authority in Religion," by Rev. S. P. Putnam, will be found on a succeeding page of this paper. Mr. Putnam has often contributed to these columns, and always with the same candor, earnestness, and courtesy which characterize this communication. What we have written above has more or less relation to the same general subject; but it is due to Mr. Putnam to notice the special points of his letter.

1. It is perfectly true that, in all questions of objective truth, we acknowledge the "authority of science" as superior to that of any individual conclusion. But before there is any "new protestantism to protest against the new claim," it will be necessary to understand this claim fully, and thereby avoid a mortifying blunder. The authority of science is simply reason; not the individual reason of A or of B or of C, not the aggregate reason of A + B + C, but the authority of reason itself, as the supreme prerogative of universal mind. That is to say, the FACTS OF THE UNIVERSE AND THE LAWS OF THOUGHT are the ultimate tribunal on all questions of truth or error; and any man or body of men claiming to represent these must, in order to establish the claim, prove it to the satisfaction of the world's intelligence. The "authority of science" is not that of any conclave of savans—much less that of any individual savant, however eminent or renowned. The decisions of all such have been often overruled by their better instructed successors; and the one far-seeing mind which proclaims truths in advance of its own generation suffers no repression or discouragement from the "authority of science," which is as certainly on the side of the strongest arguments as Providence is on the side of the heaviest battalions. It is impossible to "protest against the authority of science" except in profound ignorance of what it is; for it is only the authority of knowledge. Surely no man protests against that. If he does, no external power of any sort will interfere with him in the slightest degree; but he will literally "make a fool of himself"—that is, set up his own mere ignorant whim or caprice or superstition against the known truth of things. When Pastor Knaak protests against the authority of science by denying the Copernican theory in the broad daylight of this age, the world only laughs; it does not domineer or persecute. Mr. Putnam is very courageous, and means to avow his allegiance to truth as he sees it; he surely cannot mean, however, to set this truth as he sees it above the truth as it is, or to affirm that the latter must necessarily agree with the former. The only possible way to protest against the authority of science is to set up a claim of absolute infallibility somewhere, either in other men or in oneself. Science substitutes the simple authority of truth for that of all imagined infallible tribunals, and nobody who understands the difference will dream of disputing the propriety of the substitution—nay, its necessity for all who are reasonable and instructed. The only "protestantism" against her authority appears already in the infallibilists of all sorts. To run away from Reason is simply to run back to Rome.

2. Art and poetry have their own special standards, which are not involved in the least in this discussion. Their function is not like that of science, to determine objective truth, but rather to clothe imagination with beauty of form and expression. Nevertheless, just so far as objective truth is involved in their creations, art and poetry are subject to the authority of science. Rubens, for instance, made his lion pictures utter artistic failures by his gross ignorance of the lion's form. The same is true of religion. Just so far as this is feeling or sentiment only, it has no direct relation to truth as such; but just so far as objective truth is involved, it cannot escape the rightful jurisdiction of science. Religious ideas claim to interpret the highest truth of things, do they not? Would they possess value in any one's estimation, if they made no such claim? It is only at this point that science asserts her jurisdiction; and the discussion will escape confusion if this is carefully borne in mind.

No—there is and can be no "civil war in science," though unsettled questions among scientific men will doubtless continue to exist until they become gradually settled. The discarded title of an old lecture—discarded because found to be liable to misconstruction—does not need to be here considered. But Mr. Putnam very properly inquires how unsettled questions are settled by scientific men themselves,—what tribunal they appeal to in case of difference. Briefly, they appeal to further experiment, continued investigation, prolonged discussion; they treat no question as finally closed so long as two sides are left to it. When one side convinces all the well-informed, and the other side is fairly silenced by argument and evidence, the question closes itself. There is no arbitrary authority in science; and there is no sort of compulsion in it but that of facts—which any one is at liberty to dispute if he pleases, though with small prospect of an audience. The question—"Can there be a philosophy of the infinite?"—is simply one of the questions which remain still open; that is all. The fact of its openness proves nothing against the scientific method, by which it will probably be closed at last. "Individual sentiment" [opinion?] has full play and free sweep; nobody is obliged to sacrifice a jot of his own conviction, but may hold to his own position as tenaciously as he pleases, and argue for it as long as he can or can find listeners. This absolute freedom of individual thought is the great safeguard of truth, and the scientific method is wholly built upon it as its first principle. No scientific man is ever "shut up" except by manifest facts against which he cannot contend. But, however stubborn individuals may be in pleading lost causes in science, they cannot keep questions open after enough is evidently known to close them; reasonable minds become convinced of reason's decision in the case, and turn their attention to other problems. That is the way in which all "civil war in science" is made impossible; freedom of discussion at last elicits manifest truth, and manifest truth compels all intelligent minds to bow before it. This objective standard—reference to the truth of things outside of one's own "individual sentiment"—is that which gives her immeasurable superiority to science, as compared with the individualist's "sentiment" or "intuition."

4. It is not necessary to postpone all opinion on the unsettled questions of science—notably this one touching the possibility of a philosophy of the infinite,—until all scientific men are agreed about them. Each mind has an undoubted right to judge the case for itself, and come to its own independent conclusions, and plead for them as earnestly as it pleases. There is nothing in the scientific method to forbid this. But so long as intelligent men are divided in opinion on any widely debated question, the dogmatic spirit should be conspicuous only by its absence. Let each apply the scientific method as best he can, and form his own conclusions. But then let him hold them as the conclusions of a fallible mortal, not as those of an infallible Pope. Mr. Putnam says: "Faith has been too imperious, and overstepped its bounds. Let not science commit the same mistake. You object to the Lordship of Christ; I object equally to the Lordship of the scientific method." Faith is still too imperious, if it drives so honest a mind to protest against the authority of science, which is only the authority of reason and truth and knowledge. Does he really mean to shut his eyes desperately to any facts, in order to cling to what he himself suspects to be dreams? Millions do this, it must be confessed. There are some, however, who do better than that, and follow truth with steadfast loyalty. Science asks nothing but this alone.

5. We admit that most persons at the present day follow the method of theology and the method of science with vacillating, irresolute, alternate allegiance. That accounts fully for the existing chaos of religious belief. Such riding of two horses, however, is perilous for most, and not admirable in any. Greater courage and greater clearness enable one to choose which king they will follow, Tradition or Truth.

6. Any "kind of a reason" is "scientific," if it is a real reason. We should not say, however, that the fact of the mere existence of a belief is any evidence at all of its truth. Life has been made "happy and beautiful" by many delusions; and this subjective effect of a belief is no test whatever of its correspondence with reality. Alas, it is not without sacrifices, inward and outward alike, that any one can even in this age follow the ideal of the True with inexorable and unshakable fidelity. Nevertheless, our unbought reverence goes out to all who can thus live by the highest law in the midst of thousands who despise it.

"THE PRESIDENTIAL POLICY."

This term appears just now to be coming into use again. It is one that does not fall altogether pleasantly upon the ears of those who retain vivid recollections of its association with Andrew Johnson's administration. Indeed it is already affirmed by some that an analogy exists, in respect to its employment, in the two instances. But is not this a premature conclusion? And after all, when it comes to the question whether the President is entitled to a purpose or views of his own as to shaping the course of the government, or should be without any and at the mercy of the politicians who may chance to environ him and wheedle him this way and that at their pleasure, as has been sometimes done, there are few reasonable persons who would hesitate to decide which is better. But with the distinguished historic example before them, referred to, it is not easy to assure every one that this is all which the term at present implies.

The difference between the policy of Andrew Johnson and Rutherford B. Hayes consists in this, apparently, that the former lent the influence and support of his position to the men who aimed to denationalize the country, while the latter strives to bring his administration into accord with an enlightened spirit of nationalism. The one was the ally of the acrimonious prejudices and senseless antipathies of Southern sectionalism; the other is the conservator of freedom and the united interests of the country.

The charge is made that President Hayes has proved recreant to his party; that he has betrayed the lately emancipated race and their friends into the hands of their enemies. It is true that some circumstances in connection with the case assume a rather questionable appearance. We confess we do not sympathize very heartily with the bargaining mode of effecting political adjustments. It looks as if there had been more of this procedure in securing the succession to the Presidential office in this last instance than one inclined to scrupulousness of conscience is prepared readily to commend. How far President Hayes should be held accountable for this procedure, if such there was,—how far the course of his administration is simply the fulfilment of a promise to pay for goods delivered, the stipulated return for the purchase negotiated by his agents of certain electoral votes,—is not obvious. It is announced as a rebuttal to such prejudicial insinuations in respect to the new President that he is only striving to put into effect long-cherished convictions with reference to Southern affairs; and the probabilities of the case render this plausible, to say the least.

The administration of President Grant opened with the exclamation, "Let us have peace!" But progress in that direction has neither been rapid nor assuring. It has been becoming more and more apparent that, untrustworthy and ill-deserving as were those who formerly held the reins of power, things were no better than they ought to be in the hands of those to whom they had newly fallen. Republicanism at the South has shown itself as dexterous as Democracy at the North in the arts through which the latter has won its worst distinction. Two irreconcilable parties at the South, with distinctly antagonistic purposes and antecedents, were arrayed against each other. On the one side were those who had been the dominant class, including for the most part the wealth, education, and social influence of the locality; on the other, a class of new-comers whom the changes of the war had drifted thither through the inducements offered of extraordinary opportunities for emolument and political distinction, and the recently emancipated race as their dupes and allies, constituting in most instances together a preponderating political power. In two of the States there were rival governors and legislatures, each strenuously seeking 'to displace the other with no prospect on either side of an abandonment of their claims. United States troops were already on the spot ostensibly for the maintenance of law and order, but practically to give countenance and strength to the party of the National Executive. But neither party superiority nor law and order can be permanently sustained by force in a country in which the people have been educated as ours have been; the policy, therefore, of President Grant, or his administration, offered but little promise of success. Indeed it had effected nothing in the way of reconciliation, but seemed rather to be widening the existing division at the South. It was evident that the exigencies of the case demanded a new departure, a bold, decisive, and judicious mode of dealing with the difficulties involved, unlike any that had hitherto been adopted. The one which President Hayes has resorted to may not be the one which our predispositions would have inclined us to for the settlement of affairs. It may seem like a too summary and easy wiping out of the memories of past offences, or like too much dilution of justice with mercy. But nevertheless, if it succeeds in giving us prosperous order for anarchy and the general derangement of society, we must be willing to surrender our cherished abstractions and punctilios, and shall rejoice at last in the results of a wisdom that was superior to our own.

We believe that the years which have passed since the close of the Southern rebellion have not been wholly in vain to the people of that section; that, like the rest of us, they have been learning a good many things; that, while much of the barbarous effect of the old institution still survives there, and will inhere in the character of the people for a long time to come, they are gradually coming to a knowledge and clear perception of the inevitable, and are willing to act accordingly; that the negro is henceforth to be an important factor in their social and political life, and that it is their interest, no less than his, to protect him in his natural rights and educate him for the duties of citizenship. To encourage, develop, and assist this spirit, which we believe to be beginning to manifest itself at the South with increasing clearness and positiveness, is the aim, if we rightly apprehend it, of President Hayes' policy. Whatever may be our judgment or views of the means employed, it is our conviction that his intentions will compare favorably with those of the worthiest that have occupied his position. Since the auspices are so favorable, let us not hesitate to sanction his experiment.

THE "SCIENTIFIC METHOD" NOT THE SOLE AUTHORITY IN RELIGION.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Rejecting the scientific method as the sole authority in religion, I write to state some objections as they lie in my mind. I am in thorough agreement with yourself in rejecting the other authorities you mention; and would labor to strip them of the power over human thought and action which has been so strenuously claimed for them.

1. But it strikes me that you substitute another authority: and so there must be a new protestantism to protest against the new claim. I can no more submit my whole belief to science than to Church or Intuition; that is, so far as these are outside of me. I am willing to submit to my own individual science or reasoning about things. But, as I understand it, the science you speak of is not this or that man's science, but universal science, to which I cannot submit all my faith and hope, and I would protest as strongly against its authority in religion as against that of the Pope. I have that within which cannot be verified by science any more than by the Church. It is an indefinable light and glory which cannot be transferred into another's mind for examination. It cannot be made sensible to universal science. It cannot be compared, analyzed, or classified. Nothing outside of me can pass upon its validity. Only my own being can judge of its inexpressible reality.

2. As the artist's and poet's soul cannot submit altogether to critical canons, though one may acknowledge their value and follow them to a certain extent, so man's religious impulse cannot flow altogether in the channels of the scientific method, though the vast importance of that method may be acknowledged. Who would read a poet whose verses were moulded altogether by the voice of criticism? Would not his books remain on the dusty shelves of libraries? If the soul of poetry and art will not be confined by outward rules, neither will the soul of religion. It may ask the help of science, but it will not plead with science for leave to exist. Its life is original with itself, and its claim to fundamental reality is as valid as that of science.

3. You affirmed a "civil war" in free religion. Is there not a "civil war" in science itself? Is there not a vast conflict going on among those who adopt the scientific method as the sole authority, as to what shall be the sweep of that method; a conflict as impossible to close as that between Science and Intuition? Does not this question confront science: "Can there be a philosophy of the Infinite?" Has a united answer been given? Do not the keenest scientific intellects differ? You come to one conclusion, Spencer to another. Both adopt the scientific method as the sole authority, yet one answers "yes," the other "no." How is this question to be finally settled, seeing that the scientific method is at war with itself? What tribunal is to decide? What is it that induces one to carry the sweep of the scientific method into the consideration of the Infinite. Not that method itself, for many who adopt that method, of the first order of intellect, refuse so to carry it. Is it not one's individual sentiment? I ask you to consider this question, Why is it that you affirm a philosophy of the Infinite and Spencer denies it, when both are thoroughly committed to the same method? Is not the difference founded upon difference of original sentiment? Here, therefore, is a question of the first importance, decided not by science but by sentiment. I do not see how you can help admitting this. At least I am curious to know how you will reply, and how you will settle this "civil war" in the very ranks of those who adopt the scientific method.

4. While science is dubious, and likely to be for ages to come, on so vast a subject, not giving a clear, united answer to our longing cry, "Is there a philosophy of the Infinite?" are we not justified in refusing to put into its hands the fate of our best thought and hope? I accept science as a helper; I am willing to submit all questions of pure relation to its tribunal. In these it must have a far ampler play than heretofore, and you do not overrate its benefits; but I cannot accept it as decisive of my attitude towards the Infinite and absolute. Faith has been too imperious, and overstepped its bounds. Let not science commit the same mistake. You object to the Lordship of Christ; I object equally to the lordship of the scientific method.

5. I have read your answer to Mr. Mills, and agree with you in your estimate of the Transcendental method, and am glad that you have dealt it such vigorous blows; for it is certainly dogmatism to assume that one's individual interpretation of consciousness is a universal law of mind. Still I do not wish to adopt any method as sole authority. I think that religion is somewhat, though not altogether, individual. There is a belief in one's soul absolutely incommunicable. Now science, as I understand it, deals with what is universally cognizable,—with what can be compared, analyzed, and classified by different minds. If, then, I have in my mind a belief that cannot be "bodied forth" to another, how can science judge of that belief? Do you mean to say that, if I have an individual belief that cannot be brought before the tribunal of science, therefore I must reject it? Then I should differ, for I claim the right to hold an unverifiable belief; and so long as I do not insist on others holding it, and do not the less respect their moral and intellectual worth for not holding it, I think I am in accord with Free Religion.

6. In your article on "Freedom and Faith," you say that scientific faith is that which can opine a reason for itself. But you do not say what kind of a reason is scientific. Now I have in my mind a belief which cannot be proved or disapproved by science. I hold it because it makes life happy and beautiful, full of meaning and power; this is my only reason for holding it,—that it comes into my life with such unutterable joy. This is not a theological faith. Is it scientific? Is the fact that a belief makes life immeasurably grand to me individually, a good and sufficient reason for clinging to it, though I cannot demonstrate it by the scientific method? Yours inquiringly, S. P. PUTNAM.

DID LIFE ORIGINATE IN THE TROPICS?

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Evidence, as is well known, is a thing of degrees. While it is true that a proposition cannot be considered as properly an acquired scientific truth until it has been demonstrated by existing facts, by experiment, or at least by a chain of reasoning so satisfactory to the logical mind as to exclude the possibility or the probability of antagonistic theories, yet science recognizes hypotheses about the causes of existing conditions in Nature as a valuable means of ascertaining these causes. It is mainly by reasoning from the known to the unknown that man is enabled to unfold the causes of unexplained phenomena. He uses the ascertained and demonstrated as foundations and stepping-stones to further discovery. In this light hypotheses, if not absolutely belonging to exact science until all the facts bearing upon them agree with them, must yet be recognized as a scientific process,—the only process, sometimes, by which the human mind is enabled to work out the solution of knotty questions, or explain apparent anomalies. I say apparent anomalies, because I do not think that there can be such a thing as a real anomaly, all existing conditions being produced by natural causes only. An anomaly would be the same thing as a miracle. Now, while everything in the natural world is in one sense miraculous or admirable, yet science does not recognize what is understood by the word miracle; that is to say, an effect produced by any other agency than the ever-acting, invariable laws which govern the universe.

The aim of science is to ascertain and apply those laws to all the facts and conditions which claim its observation and study. It is quite certain that to look for the explanation of phenomena to causes independent of or contrary to the laws of Nature, is time absolutely wasted. As it is quite impossible that an effect could be produced without a cause, so it is likewise impossible that the cause could be found outside of the inexorable and invariable laws of Nature; in other words, that the cause could have a miraculous origin. No point is better established than that Nature is never capricious and never tries experiments, but unerringly, unhesitatingly, works out all results in accordance with her laws. Therefore, anomalies are only apparent, not real. When we meet with them, we can only say that their causes are still undiscovered. The object of science is to discover causes and confirm the discovery, whenever possible, by practical experiment. The unravelling of mysteries in Nature is perhaps the noblest ambition of man; he wants to find out the why of everything. The world is a sublime puzzle which the highest minds endeavor to solve, and the famous verse of Virgil,— still finds an echo in the human breast.

"Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas!"—

Trusting that your pages are open to the exposition of all ideas bearing upon the past history of the earth, I send you a few thoughts, as they have occurred to me, about the probable locality of original life on our planet. By the word life, as used in this paper, it is meant to include all living existences, whether animal or vegetable.

The generally accepted belief is that life, having originated in the warmer or tropical regions of the earth, gradually spread on either side of the equator in the direction of the poles. This view, for reasons hereafter given, I conceive to be a mistaken one, and believe that the process must have been precisely the reverse of this; that is to say, that life must have originated toward the poles, and from these, as starting-points, must have gradually spread itself until it met at the equator. This proposition, which may possibly appear to many readers as startling and perhaps wild, I will proceed to elucidate, simply saying that I invite criticism and am ready to yield the point to any course of reasoning founded on natural laws or geological records or evidences disproving its probability or truth. I hope that no one will try to controvert by reasonings resting upon scriptural or traditional writings,—it being quite clear that no human records are sufficiently ancient to elucidate a process which, if it ever took place at all, must have taken place millions of years ago. It is evident that in discussing this question, geological records and arguments resting upon the laws of Nature must be of greater weight than those founded upon human writings or testimony.

Remains of plants and animals, some of them belonging to species long since extinct, others having their present habitat in tropical climates only, have been found disseminated over parts of the higher latitudes of our planet, showing conclusively that in the long by-gone ages there has been a time when these latitudes enjoyed a tropical climate; that those countries now so barren and inhospitable, covered over their whole extent with perpetual snow and ice, were once the scene of busy tropical life. How came it there?

It does not seem probable or even possible that life, tropical life, could have spread itself into those regions from the regions of the tropics; the difference of mean temperature between the two sections is too great to permit such a supposition. Either the polar regions were too cold for tropical life, or the equatorial zones must have been too hot for any living beings whatever. There are limits, both of heat and cold, beyond which life is destroyed, and is burned out or frozen out.

Various suppositions have been made in the endeavor to account for this apparently inexplicable state in the northern zones, so different from that which prevails there at the present day. The silent witnesses are scattered over the polar regions, telling unmistakably that a torrid climate prevailed at some period of the earth's history in those sections, which are now the seat of intense cold.

Among others, the most generally accepted idea, if I mistake not, is this: that, as a consequence of the active evaporation at the tropics, large quantities of vapor are constantly floated, through the upper atmospheric strata, to the northern zones, and there deposited in steadily-accumulating masses of snow; that this accumulation may, after the lapse of many ages, become sufficient to displace the centre of gravity of the earth, thus causing a gradual change in the direction of its rotation, by which it may eventually revolve in the direction of the poles instead of around its present axis, the poles thus becoming included in the new equatorial line of revolution; and that this change of motion, having already taken place several times during the long successions of ages, might account for the evidences left in the polar regions of a former tropical climate in those regions.

This theory, not entirely devoid of plausibility, appears to be exposed to insuperable objections. It is hard to conceive how accumulations of snow could become sufficiently vast to produce such a result, if we take into consideration the flattened shape of the earth at the poles as one of the elements of the problem. If the difference between the larger and the shorter diameters of the earth be accepted as twenty-six and one-half miles, then a deposit of one-half, or thirteen and one-fourth miles in depth, of glacial masses at each pole would be required to make the earth spherical. This is about three times the height of the loftiest mountains on our globe. But this would be but a small proportion of what would be required to displace the centre of rotation of the earth, that rotation being dependent upon the specific gravity of the mass. Now the density of the earth is five and five-eighths times greater than that of water, and water itself has a somewhat greater specific gravity than ice; therefore, in order to bring the polar regions, by means of snow deposits, to the point at which their weight might be equal to the task of counterbalancing the gravity at the equator, we must suppose a coating over those vast regions equal in depth to seventeen or eighteen times the altitude of the highest mountains on our globe! Even then, the centre of gravity would still continue as at present; there being an equilibrium between the two diameters, a still greater accumulation would be required in order to overcome the original rotary impulse. Nor is this all; another and seemingly fatal objection to this theory lies in the fact that, as ascertained by the barometer, the atmosphere of the earth does not attain a greater altitude than forty miles, and that clouds scarcely reach a greater elevation than one-tenth of this, let us say, in order to be quite liberal, five or six miles, or from twenty-six thousand to thirty-two thousand feet. How can we, then, admit the truth of a theory the main postulate of which would require the floating and deposition of moisture at an elevation above the sea-level of seventy-five or eighty miles, nearly twice as high as any atmosphere is known to exist? It would also seem rational to presume that the centrifugal force would produce a greater depth of atmospheric air over the equatorial than over the polar zones.

It appears to be a universal law, ruling the shapes of the planets we are enabled to observe and study, that they are swelled in the direction of their equators, in a degree proportionate to the rapidity of their revolutions around their axes and their density. The planet Jupiter, whose rapidity of rotation is about twenty-seven times as great as that of the earth, is much more oblate than the latter, the difference being about one-seventeenth of its mean diameter. All the planets appear to rotate perpendicularly to their shortest diameters, the oblateness at their equators being undoubtedly due to the centrifugal force resulting from their rotation at a time when their bodies were in an incandescent or fluid state. If the centre of gravity and the direction of rotation of the earth have ever been different from what we find them to be at the present time, it seems remarkable that the rotation and oblateness should happen to be in such perfect accord as they are now, and as they appear to have been from remote antiquity. The walls of Assuan undoubtedly tell the same tale as in the time of the Pharaohs; the sun continues to strike the bottom at the time of the summer solstice as it did four thousand years ago. There does not seem to be any satisfactory evidence that the earth ever changed its axis of rotation in any important degree. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the probabilities are in favor of its permanence, with possible unimportant irregularities, from the earliest times when the earth assumed her present shape.

The natural desire of men to ascertain causes has led them to speculate about the origin of our solar system, and about the probable processes through which it assumed its present form and intricate motions. Many speculations have been the consequence of this desire. The most plausible, and therefore the most generally accepted by scientists, is that of Laplace, which supposes that in the vastly remote past matter was disseminated in a vaporous condition throughout space; that, by reason of the attraction of matter for matter, vast portions became detached from the general mass and were left to concentrate; that they assumed a slow rotary motion; that during this process the planets became in their turn detached from the central mass by the action of centrifugal force and were left to revolve in necessarily elliptical orbits around it at various distances, assuming rotations of their own around axes in the direction of the rotation of the original mass from which they were parted or ejected, as well as orbital revolutions; and that this process of concentration of the central mass, now represented by our sun, is still going on; that the original rotary motion of the general mass of detached vapor can alone account for the remarkable fact that all the planets revolve within a narrow zone, more or less perpendicularly to the equator of the central mass and in the same general direction, thus showing a common original force of impulse; that the planets thus left on the way were in a state of intense heat or incandescence, and that on this supposition alone can their spheroidal, instead of spherical, form be accounted for, because, if they had been cold and rigid as the crust of the earth is at the present age, the centrifugal force of rotation would not have been able to cause oblateness; they would be perfectly spherical.

This theory, of which only some points are here quoted from memory, is perhaps the most plausible that has ever been devised. There does not appear to be anything in Nature to clash or conflict with it, and we may consequently assume it to be true. The large number of nebulae disseminated through space which the telescope discloses to our view, some of them, like the great nebula in Orion, sufficiently vast to be equal to the production of many scores of such solar systems as our own, seems a corroboration of this view; many of those nebulae appear to be actually in a stage of formation and concentration more or less advanced, leading us to the almost irresistible belief that such is the way of Nature in evolving new worlds from chaotic matter.

The planet Jupiter has already been mentioned as to its oblateness. But there is another fact connected with it that seems further confirmatory of the truth of the theory of Laplace: astronomers tell us that Jupiter is yet so hot as to be unfit for any animal or vegetable existence; this result might be expected on account of its enormous size, even if we grant the probable fact that it was left detached from the solar mass of matter many ages before our earth; its volume being about twelve hundred and fifty times greater than that of our planet, it would probably require many millions of ages before it would arrive at the same thermal conditions as the latter.

Assuming, then, that such was the way in which the planets were left to revolve around the central mass of matter which composes our sun, and that they were left in an incandescent state, what would be the probable course of events in the case of the earth? For an inconceivably long period her whole surface would be too hot for any life whatever. But what portions of that surface would first assume a sufficient degree of coolness to permit the evolution of plants and the subsequent existence of animal life? Evidently the poles and the adjacent regions, for the fierce heat derived from the still receding central mass would strike those regions with more slanting and far less intense rays, and for periods of six months every year each pole would be entirely free from them; they would be cooling in the shade, quietly radiating their inherent heat through space. Consequently life would be possible at the poles long before it would be possible for anything to exist in the equatorial zones. As the same refrigerating process would continue without interruption, the latter would, after a long succession of ages, assume conditions more and more favorable to the development of life; while, by reason of the more rapid cooling, the polar regions would become less and less adapted for it, until a time would arrive when, having undergone all the vicissitudes of incandescent, torrid, tropical, temperate, cold, and finally glacial states, they would at last arrive at the condition in which we now find them.

If the theory of Laplace be true, this seems to be the only course that could have been followed, and life, therefore, must have had its incidence at and around the poles of the earth. If life, as seems probable (might we not say certain?), does exist in other planets besides our own, not in our solar system only, but in the unknown and unseen planets revolving around the countless central suns scattered through space, then such must have been the succession of events in those orbs also. The abundant fossil remains of plants and animals that could only have existed in hot climates, as found in Siberia, and indeed, in many countries within the polar circle, are a strong corroboration of that theory. If that theory be true, the development and spread of life could scarcely have proceeded in any different order from that indicated: not from the equator to the poles, but from the latter to the former; and this in all the planetary systems.

The conviction is fast gaining strength with reflecting minds that original life was evolved; that it is one of the properties of Nature's forces that, wherever conditions favorable to the support and development of life exist, then life will be evolved by slow processes from the lower to higher orders; that life, in fact, exists in a latent or dormant condition in matter like electricity, etc., ready to be evolved with all its possibilities of motion, mind, variety, and constant modifications of form, modes, and conditions of existence, combinations, and recombinations according to infinite proportions and differences of compound elements, whenever conditions favorable to its evolution occur; that it is one—and so far as we know, the highest—result of Nature's forces and inherent properties. That life exists is undeniable. The fact that life exists is proof sufficient that its principle also exists in Nature. Had the life-principle, the element of life evolution been wanting, been absent as one of Nature's inherent properties, it could never have been evolved as an actuality. Whatever is not in a thing cannot be evolved out of that thing.

Now life is; therefore its original principle likewise is. However this may be (and it is not within the scope of this paper to consider the mode of origination of life), in whatever way implanted or evolved, it seems clear that the polar regions must have been its first scene, for the necessary conditions to its existence must have been present in those regions many ages before they could have prevailed in the temperate or tropical zones.

If the theory of Laplace be correct, it follows that our planet, which, by the volcanoes scattered over its surface, is shown to be in a state of intense internal heat, is gradually cooling; that it is slowly radiating its original heat into the depths of space; that a time must arrive in the far distant future when, like the polar regions and the moon, it shall have returned to the desolation of death. But since matter and its forces are imperishable, who knows what new transformations or regenerations may yet await it in the eternal flow of time? GUSTAVE DE NEVEU.

FREAKS OF A CRAZY FANATIC.

WORCESTER, May 8, 1877.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

Enclosed you will find a communication from the town of Phillipston which was published in the Gardner News. It well illustrates the fanaticism which is the direct result of the present "religious" excitement now running over the country, being the fruit of Moody's teachings. A few comments by you will be welcomed by A READER OF THE INDEX.

[No comment seems necessary on the extract enclosed as above. It speaks for itself, and we append it as a curiosity.—ED.]

Meetings have been held night after night in a school-house in the west part of the town, and among those who have been influenced by the meetings is Luther Newton. Mr. Newton is a middle-aged farmer, has been an industrious, temperate, and respectable man, and has taken great pains with his stock for years past, especially his horses. He attended the meetings and became crazed with excitement. He seized his father, a man nearly seventy years of age, threw him on his back, and told him he should never get up until he forgave his enemies. He went on to the railroad track and ordered the engine to stop; but as it would not obey his modest request, he said God took him by the hand and twitched him off the track just before the engine reached him. His most notable freak, however, was his "anointing" process, as he termed it. He seized his wife and anointed her from head to foot with butter, claiming that it was a religious duty so to do. His friends report that he is improving in mental condition. This Newton, and a middle-aged man, a poor cripple, but who has always borne an excellent character, H. L. Upham by name, are recognized as the leaders in this religious crusade.

CONSECRATION OF A NEW CATHOLIC BISHOP.

The Rev. John Lancaster Spalding was consecrated as Bishop of Peoria, Ill., at St. Patrick's Cathedral, in Mott Street, yesterday morning. Fully an hour before the services began every seat in the church was occupied, and the two side aisles were crowded from the altar-rail to the doors. It was with great difficulty that the middle aisle was kept clear for the accommodation of the priests. The decorations of the church were not profuse but elegant: The altar on the epistle side of the sanctuary was prepared for the Bishop-elect. Near by was a large and handsome collection of flowers, presented by the teachers of St. Michael's School. From the reredos and all parts of the sanctuary wax candles and gas jets shone brilliantly, which, with golden-colored vestments arranged in different parts of the chancel, made a scene at once striking and impressive.

At 10 o'clock those who were to take part in the ceremonies marched from the sacristy to the sanctuary through the front of the church. The procession was led by the Rev. Father Hurley of St. Michael's Church; then came thirty altar boys, some in red and others in black cassocks with white surplices, followed by nearly one hundred priests, eleven prelates from different parts of the country, and the assistants at the mass. Lastly came the Bishop-elect in purple robes, and Cardinal McCloskey, attended by the assistant consecrators, Bishops Foley of Chicago, and Gibbons of Richmond. Two boys, in white cassocks with scarlet trimmings, holding the long scarlet train of the Cardinal's robes, followed by several boys similarly dressed, who were to act as crozier, mitre, candle, book, and apron-bearers, closed the procession. The officiating priests were Father Ducey of St. Michael's Church, deacon of the mass, Father Benedict Spalding, brother of the Bishop, sub-deacon, the Rev. A. J. Donnelly, pastor of St. Michael's Church, and Father Hurley of Peoria, deacons of honor to the Cardinal, Vicar-General Quinn, archdeacon. The bishops present were Rosecrans of Columbus, Ohio, the preacher of the day, Lynch of Charleston, Corrigan of Newark, Dwenger of Fort Wayne, Loughlin of Brooklyn, Conroy of Albany, Beckes of Wilmington, Galberry of Hartford, Healy of Portland, and Monsignors Chatard, rector of the American College at Rome, and Seton of New Jersey, all dressed in their full purple episcopal robes.

The Cardinal went to his throne and dressed in full pontifical robes. At the same time Father Spalding, attended by the two assistant consecrators, was vested with the amice, alb, cincture, and stole crossed upon his breast as a priest, and the cope. Bishop Foley presented the Bishop-elect to the Cardinal, after which the Papal bull appointing Father Spalding Bishop of Peoria was read. The oath of fidelity and duty was then administered. Then followed an examination of the Bishop-elect, which being finished, the Cardinal began the celebration of mass at the high altar, Father Spalding at the same time beginning it at the side altar, having been vested with the tunic, dalmatic, and chasuble, the sandals having been placed on his feet and the pectoral cross around his neck. After the singing of the epistle the Bishop-elect prostrated himself at the foot of the altar while the Litany of the Saints was chanted. The Book of the Gospels was placed upon his neck and shoulders, and the Cardinal and the assistant consecrators laid their hands upon his head, saying, "Receive thou the Holy Ghost." His head was next bound with a linen fillet to prevent the oil with which the crown of the head is anointed from dripping to the ground. The sign of the cross was first made with the chrisam, and then the whole crown was anointed. This was followed by the anointing of the hands. The blessing and presentation of the crozier, the ring, and the Book of the Gospels, with the commission to preach to all people, followed. The mass was then proceeded with, the Cardinal being at the high altar and the Bishop-elect at the side chapel. At the part known as the offertory the Bishop presented the cardinal with two large lighted tapers, two ornamented loaves, and two miniature gold barrels of wine as the perquisites of the consecration. They continued the mass together at the high altar, two missals being used. The blessing of the mitre followed, the Cardinal placing it on the head of the elect with the admonition that it was "the helmet of protection and salvation." After the white alken gloves were placed on his hands and the ceremony of placing him in the episcopal chair was gone through, Bishop Spalding, attended by his assistant consecrators, marched down the centre aisle blessing the congregation; but the throng of people and priests did not permit him to proceed more than half way. The ceremony was concluded by the new Bishop giving the regular episcopal blessing with mitre and crozier, for the first time.—N. Y. Tribune, May 2.

A BRIGHT little three-year-old in Hartford, Conn., having become a little mixed between her religious instruction and her nursery rhymes, gravely recites: "The Lord is the shepherd, and he lost his sheep, and don't know where to find him."

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:-

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEBBINS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:-

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keeshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains Essays by Wm. O. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, S. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. 40 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Farton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wilson and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Reason and Revelation, by William J. Potter. 10 cents: ten for 60 cents; one hundred, $3.00.

For series of important Tracts see last page of THE INDEX.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited. Orders by mail may be addressed either "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston," or to the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution", by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath", by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education", by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

Sent, postage prepaid, on receipt of price. Address THE INDEX, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient co-operation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT: PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

IT IS ONLY JUST to say that Mr. Luther Newton, of Phillipston, who was mentioned in last week's INDEX in a communication headed "Freaks of a Crazy Fanatic," disclaims the whole story, and attributes its origin to malice.

ON THE vexed seas of modern thought, Rev. Joseph Cook sails about magnificently, with pennants flying and band playing, as the Great Evangelical Tin-clad. Benevolent spectators hope that he will not rashly approach the shore; for boyish beam-blowers are about, and a single bean that should strike his craft beneath the water-line would send it precipitately to the bottom.

THE Y. M. C. A. of Indianapolis have undertaken to break up theatrical entertainments in that city on Sunday. They recently arrested twenty-five managers of the "Matt Morgan Art Combination" on a Sunday evening, in the presence of an audience of twelve hundred persons, at the Metropolitan Theatre. The arrested parties were prosecuted, not for disorderly or immoral exhibitions (that is not alleged), but for "desecration of the Sabbath." As the sects unite, they grow evidently more disposed to use their increasing power for the pushing of their common interests. We believe that things will be very much worse in this respect before they are better. But the reaction against the violators of equal religious rights is sure to come at last; bigotry is not destined to rule America forever.

IT IS the well-known object of the Ultramontanes, with Father Beckx at their head, to restore the Pope's temporal power; and President MacMahon, by his abrupt break with the Republicans, has thrown himself into the power of the Ultramontanes. What if the President's letter to M. Simon and the consequent grave cabinet crisis in France were secretly instigated by the Jesuits, for purposes deeper than the honest but irritable and not clear-sighted Marshal comprehends? Now that the election of a new Pope is not far off, it will be very convenient for them to hold France well in hand. The letters of the Bishop of Nevers to the Marshal-President and to all the Mayors in his diocese forbid the supposition that such conjectures are groundless. Rome never sleeps, and her power for mischief is still incalculable.

HERE IS a new outbreak of the irrepressible Bible-in-schools question, and Evangelicalism gets the victory—we quote from the New York Tribune of May 14: "Judge Pillsbury of Pontiac, Ill., decided on May 9 that the directors of a public school have a right to dictate what books shall be studied and used, and hence can order the Bible to be read as a text-book in connection with other studies. The decision was rendered in a suit brought by a Roman Catholic, who had instructed his son to pay no attention when the Bible was read in the school, but to go on studying his lessons without making any unnecessary disturbance. Attendance during the religious exercises was not rendered compulsory; any pupil whose parents objected to the Bible-reading could stay away; but the regulations required all who were present to lay aside their books and pay attention. This boy was suspended from the school in consequence of his behavior, and the judge justifies the action of the school-mistress."

THE METHODISTS are trying to unite the many sects of that general name into a single body. At the same time they are manifesting a strong disposition to exert a collective influence in politics. The political resolutions of the late Lynn Conference in this State made quite a breeze throughout the country; and now the Baltimore and Washington Conference is making itself equally conspicuous for a similar reason. A Washington dispatch of May 19 gives the report of a committee of that body on the political situation which recommends the bishop and Conference to make certain suggestions to President Hayes about the appointment of officers and the proposed removal of Marshal Douglass. It matters little what particular measures are recommended; the important fact to note is the growing purpose of Evangelical bodies to make themselves felt as such in strictly political affairs. This purpose will certainly strengthen as the sects become more effectively consolidated, and the time is not far distant when all the Protestant sects, organized in some General Protestant Union, will assert themselves as a practical political power which will make all the self-seeking politicians of the country its own obedient slaves. Liberals may shut their eyes to all this as tightly as they please; but the time is approaching when they must organize to protect secular government or see it gradually lost in a practical union of Church and State.

A NEW LIBERAL LEAGUE has been formed at Denver, Colorado, auxiliary to the National Liberal League. Mr. B. F. Underwood, to whose influence and exertions the formation of the new League is largely due, has kindly transmitted information on the subject. The first meeting was held on March 4 at Männerchor Hall, in response to the call of Mr. John G. Jenkins, and organized temporarily by the election of Mr. Orson Brooks as chairman, and Mr. John H. Cotton as secretary. The "Patriotic Address of the National Liberal League" was read, and the objects of the movement explained (we suspect that Mr. Underwood's modesty deprives us of knowing by whom), when about fifty persons of both sexes signified their willingness to join the new society. An adjourned meeting was held on March 18, resulting in a permanent organization with the following officers: President, Orson Brooks; Vice-Presidents, Peter Gottesleben, J. S. McCool, Hyatt Hussey, M. Fisher; Secretary, John H. Cotton; Treasurer, John G. Jenkins; Councilmen, Henry C. Dillon, A. L. Reichard, D. M. Richards, A. W. Smith. Committees on Public Work, Public Discussion, Finance, and Social Affairs, were also formed. The new League have secured comfortable rooms at 338 Lorimer Street, where a Free Reading Room is kept open daily from 8 A.M. till 9 P.M. All donations of books, papers, periodicals, etc., will be gladly received, promptly acknowledged, and kept constantly on the tables. When such Leagues as this are sufficiently multiplied to enter into active coöperation, the liberal movement will receive an impetus of which few dream to-day.

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

Transcendentalism and Intellectual Liberty.

DEAR FRIEND ABBOT:—

I very gladly avail myself now, at the first leisure moment I have been able to command, of the privilege of a response to your very able and suggestive article in THE INDEX of April 19. The force of some of the things you urge I more than willingly concede; and yet from the general conclusions you seek to establish and commend, I am sure that I dissent deeply and emphatically. It is doubtful that any words of mine may avail for setting the points of difference in clearer light, or contributing at all to the just solution; but, accepting your kind invitation, I will try to speak of two or three things that most arrest my attention.

1. I begin by stating what seems to me a source of error in your discussion of this Transcendental question, as indeed I have thought myself to notice the like before and in other connections; namely, a partial confusion in the mind, or the lack of a clear and well-determined conception in regard to liberty, what it is in its just scope and true limitation. It is from this cause, as I deem, that you make against Transcendentalism the charge that it infringes upon the rights of freedom of thought in religion: "He," you say, speaking of the Intuitionist or Transcendentalist, "if not willing to submit it [his intuition] to the test of scientific verification, makes the refusal of complete intellectual liberty which necessitates the protest of Free Religion against Transcendentalism."

Liberty has, as you will agree with me in recognizing, its laws, and there are some things so fundamental, so necessary to be held inviolable, that no supposed rights of freedom can be permitted to call them in question. We cannot attempt to impugn their authority, without making ourselves unreasonable, absurd, monstrous. "The freedom of science," you declare, "is the freedom of the scientific intellect to question and test all things whatsoever." (The italics are mine.) May it question and test that fundamental basis, the primal postulates on whose admission alone science is possible? Some ardent friend of science, we will suppose, anxious and eager to vindicate to the utmost the liberty of the intellect, begins by calling in question or denying the validity of the impressions we receive—this not in a particular case, but in the large in toto—of the outer world; our senses, he will have it, are not trustworthy, not veracious; at any rate they must be tested, the report verified. He insists that, as a scientist, you shall not proceed a single step, must not affirm anything in way of knowledge, until you have known your organs of knowledge. You must not assume to have any knowledge, not even of the trustworthiness of your senses, your powers of knowledge, until you have, starting utterly without knowledge, made them a matter of knowledge. Otherwise you infringe upon the rights of intellectual liberty, and he interposes with his protest.

You would say, would you not, and very properly: "My dear sir, what you propose is unscientific and absurd; you are ruled out of court at the outset, for what you demand is irrational and flatly impossible. You must assume a postulate, a datum somewhere, in order to arrive at any thing. You must take for granted, must affirm, call your authority by the name knowledge or faith or what you will, the trustworthiness of your powers, your organs of knowledge, or you can by no possibility make a beginning. You have no organ whereby you can go back of the organs of sense, in dealing with objects of sense, and to attempt to deny the validity here is to non-suit and annihilate yourself." If now, in the interests of free investigation and inquiry, he should charge you with making a refusal to him of complete intellectual liberty, and so on his part declare himself necessitated to utter a protest in this behalf against the dogmatism of science, I think you would very justly dismiss the charge as flagrantly irrational and absurd.

Now, I do not for a moment intimate that you are guilty of the same obliquity and unreason towards Transcendentalism as this man in the case I have supposed would be towards Science; but I think, if the ground of Transcendentalism can be maintained, the protest of Free Religion against it would be equally gratuitous and unjust. I think in your own case there is a subtle self-deception in the mind, or lack, perhaps, of finely-just and clearly-determined conception of liberty, that makes your position an equivocal one, makes you at times seem to do a thing analogous to what I have supposed in the other province, in relation to Transcendentalism. I speak of the thing, of course, as it appears to me.

2. There are laws of thought in the realm of the supersensuous and unseen. The Transcendentalist would aver that, by the very necessity of the being within us, there are affirmed certain facts or realities, realities that transcend the sense, that transcend observation, transcend empirical knowledge. These facts or ideas (spoken of as they stand present in the soul) are, for one, say of immensity, the infinitude of space, a reach on and beyond all suns and stars and realms, without limit. If there is this as a fact affirmed in the soul, the Transcendentalist would say it never came there as the product of observation; for observation never went, never can go so far as to cover, to embrace it. It is transcendent, and therefore not reported by the world of sight and sensation without. They are, for another, ideas of eternity, infinitude of time, and this also is unborn from the outer world, or the sensuous experience, or any empirical knowledge, since no mind of man has ever traversed and known the measureless of duration. They are, for another, substance, an essential reality within, that no eye ever saw, no sense ever grasped.

There are other things, of course, in the sphere of practical expression and application, of the interpretation or appropriation of this thought or consciousness,—getting it, so to speak, incarnated and brought to the plane of the practical apprehension,—verities of the ideal,—to which I have not time specially to refer here.

3. The Transcendentalist cannot submit his intuition, a veritable intuition, to the test of scientific verification, as Mr. Potter seems to suppose he ought, since Science has no instruments wherewith to deal with it; it is out of the sphere, beyond the arithmetic entirely of empiric, observational knowledge. You will not take a line and plummet, will you, expecting to sound the depths of infinite space? Your metre here will not measure. These powers must carry their certificate with them, or their affirmation is by no possibility verifiable. If this cognition, or whatever may be the proper term for it (language is lame and inadequate here), comes by the inevitable laws of the mind, and furnishes, as the Transcendentalist believes, the postulate upon which religion alone is possible, the only ground upon which you can build it, then how does he by this affirmation infringe upon the rights of intellectual liberty, and necessitate for the Free Religionist a new protest? If the Transcendentalist has imported something not in the intuitionist thought, if he has affirmed and imposed as fact in his consciousness something that belongs not there, but comes of his own subjective imagination merely, his fancy or his prepossession, then indeed has he laid himself open to grave charge, and a new protest in the very name and interest of Transcendentalism itself is needed.

4. This, as I understand it, is the essential position of Transcendentalism; and if it may be shown that these cognitions or intuitions do not belong to the very laws of the soul,—shown that they are fictions of the fancy, or dreams of the highly wrought imaginations of these withdrawn, abstracted speculators who dwell and go "burrowing" in the dim depths of their own consciousness, or that, being veracious, Science can take them out of the hands of the Intuitionist, can demonstrate them, can legitimate them by its instruments,—it is a task that awaits the hand of the doer.

5. It is denied, as I understand you to say, in the name and interest of Science, that such affirmations do belong to the necessary laws of thought; it is declared that there is no datum, nothing a priori, nothing that may be assumed in the mind. But let us look for a moment to some of the things that you would affirm, I suppose, as among the great facts established or reached by Science,—the universality of Law, the eternity or indestructibility of Force, etc. How has Science learned and come to know the fact of this universality, since the universe in its length and breadth has not yet been traversed? The indestructibility of Force,—how is that known, since the scientific, observing mind has not yet passed through the range of the eternities to see? You would affirm, I believe, the omnipotence, at least the power and final triumph of Truth in the world, Truth as incarnated and radiant in Justice, Virtue, Right. On what ground can you base your affirmation, not yet having seen it tried through? If you say that this even is not a thing that any one knows, or is entitled to hold as assured at all, that at most the mind makes here "a sublime guess," I would inquire how comes it about that it so guesses, so and not otherwise, and by what measure or amount of scientific observation may the guess be verified, so as to be exalted to knowledge; or, if you please, by what array of adverse facts might it be refuted, so that the mind in obedience to the laws of evidence or the verification of Science, should have to throw it aside as a fearful, fatal illusion? If the idea of God is an "attempt of the intellect to conceive self and the environment in an all-embracing unity" (a very partial and defective definition, as I think), then why does the intellect so attempt, and persist in so attempting; why not as well do the opposite, or make no attempt in this regard whatever? If there is no datum, nothing given within, I cannot at all see.

6. In brief, it appears there is a Transcendental element subtly present in the mind of Science, in all its researches and conclusions. Science cannot proceed a step without using it. Spinoza said, if I rightly remember, that "substance is that which it is impossible not to think of." These realities of thought assert themselves in all investigations, and those who attempt to deny them are held firmly and irresistibly within their grasp. How does it involve any restriction or infringement of intellectual liberty that this element should be so held, and Science have to make the acknowledgment of its presence and authoritative power?

7. You ask the question, "How can Infinite Spirit be contained in a finite consciousness?" It is a very old question, runs through all the ages, and has never yet received, so far as I know, an answer. I frankly own I cannot tell, nor do I see how any one can know. I cannot comprehend, and I cannot describe how finite is in infinite; or how eternity dwells incarnated in the world of time. Nor do I see that you have relieved the embarrassments of thought in getting Infinite Spirit objectified, making it a matter of finite objective experience. How can infinite be in that finite? Or how did Science climb up from her finite experiences, her empirical knowledge, to knowledge of the Infinite Fact? She is involved in as grave embarrassments in the attempt to get from finite to infinite, or to escape her objective limitations and reach infinitude, as is hopelessly shut up in the objective, as Transcendentalism with her subjective element under your strongest representations can be. How is she, thus imprisoned, in her turn to "make headway against the scientific materialism of to-day?"

8. The difficulties are not, by any means, all on one side. The embarrassments of thought are not relieved by shifting the ground from inner to outer. Unless Science can legitimate in the court of scientific observation, the step from a finite objective experience to knowledge of Infinite Spirit, she has no ground for vaunt. If she professes to have gotten the key whereby the mystery is solved, and all is elucidated,—cleared up for the understanding,—there are some of us who will be a trifle curious to see how that solution may be wrought out.

Carlyle well and strikingly said, many years ago, that, what with the wondrous advances made nowadays in Science, every nook, cranny, or dog-hole in Nature or art fast getting illuminated, geology and geognosy so advanced, the labors of our Werners and Huttons so productive and complete, "it has come about now that to many a Royal Society the creation of a world is little more mysterious than the cooking of a dumpling; concerning which last, indeed, there have been minds to whom the question, How the apples were got in, presented difficulties." There are other like puzzles in the world of thought.

9. You deem that Transcendentalism, in declaring the inward self-revelation of God, "takes for granted the objective existence of Infinite Spirit." "If it is infinite," you say, "it must necessarily be objective to a finite consciousness." No sober, thoughtful man will deny the difficulty of articulation and expression here. Language has its embarrassments, as speculative thought has. In objective and subjective the categories of our conceptions, as of our speech, seem exhausted; and, as we speak of God or Infinite Spirit, we have to speak of Him or It as objective in relation to what may belong to us in the character of subjective. But it cannot be objective to us in the sense in which we know objectivity; it negates the conditions under which objectivity exists. If objective, it would be determinate, and, if determinate, not infinite. We here transcend, in coming into presence of a reality not subject to the conditions of finitude, the sphere both of objective and subjective as we know these in our experience. In beholding, in contemplating God, I am dealing with being the most abstract and ethereal that can be thought. Language is lame, is impotent to describe the experience, the consciousness of the soul. I subscribe here to the declaration of the Hindu sage: "One cannot attain to it through the word, through the mind [i. e., the sensuous understanding], or through the eye. It is only reached by him who says, 'It is! It is!' He perceives it in its essence." [Katha Upanishad.]

10. You characterize the method of Transcendentalism as relying "on intuition as an interior phenomenon of the consciousness which has no relation to the outer." I think you are in this matter under positive misapprehension. No Transcendentalist that I know or ever heard of, would affirm that. There is, as is well known, a close and very subtle relation ever present of the outer to the inner. What Transcendentalism would hold, as I suppose, is this: that the relation, whatever it may be, is not such that the thought in the mind, the intuitional consciousness, has its sufficient ground, or can be accounted for and explained from the objective experience. We cannot find for it any adequate general in such experience. It transcends that content. I judge that here may be involved the gist of the whole question that lies at issue between the champions and apostles of Science and the advocates of Transcendentalism.

There are other points upon which I would like well to touch, but my paper is already too long, and I must bring it quickly to a close. I will only say that God, as I conceive, is not only present in the consciousness within, a pervasive, overshadowing reality, but he gives himself to us also in the world without, addressing us in the expressive language of symbol. The soul shall find,—if indeed it shall feel itself bereft at all in the withdrawal of Him from its apprehension as an object of outer knowledge, a reality of the objective experience,—find itself more than indemnified in the possession of His presence in those sublime hints and intimations, veil at once and revelation, eye-beam of the Infinite, the pregnant and all-impressive symbolism of this world of time.

11. I do not at all see how the "authority of the moral ideal" can be maintained, except on the basis of the intuitional. If the intuitional cannot be held, that authority, I believe, must fall to the ground. God is to me the ideal of the soul, as also the substance and innermost being of the universe. For any deliverances upon God and Immortality coming in the character, if not in the form, of determinate dogmas, albeit propounded sometimes in the name of Transcendentalism,—for these in themselves I care little. The question, "Does man live after death?" may be solved, may, by possibility, be answered in the affirmative, by most unexceptionable and conclusive scientific proofs, and yet the problem of Immortality, in my view, remain essentially untouched. The metre, here again, does not measure. The proofs do not reach to the case, the ladder falls short of the sky.

I hope we may understand each other and our question the better for this free, frank, and careful comparison of views. You, I am sure, count nothing dear or aught worth beside the possession of truth, let it bear as it may upon any doctrine of your cherished Science; for myself, I hope I am willing, yes, more than that, to surrender and offer up all else for that pearl of inestimable price.

A BLIGHTED BOOK.

THE JESUIT MUTILATIONS AND CORRUPTIONS IN APPLETON'S NEW CYCLOPEDIA.

More than three years ago we criticised the revised edition of Appleton's American Cyclopædia for its sly and unfair coloring in the interest of the Roman Catholic Church. We showed, according to a circular issued by the publishers, that a special editor, who had been a teacher in a Jesuit college, named Dr. Bernard O'Reilly, was employed "to supervise the articles touching in any way on the Catholic religion," and that he had "the eye of authority" to help him in no less a personage than Archbishop McCloskey of New York, since promoted to be a Cardinal.

From time to time we published quotations from the old edition of this cyclopædia, issued in 1860-3, contrasting them with articles under the same heading in the new cyclopædia, of which the first volume was issued in 1873 and the last in 1876. The editors and publishers made a lame reply to the first batch of quotations; but they have never since wrestled with the subject, so far as we know, although our columns have been open to them, and we would gladly publish any defence that anybody might make of the book.

Up to the close of volume eight of the new cyclopædia, we enumerated over fifty important changes made in different articles having more or less bearing on Romanism; and every change from the old cyclopædia was of a whitewashing nature. Every one showed the hand of a practised Jesuit. Every one poisoned the wells of literature from which the rising generation are invited by D. Appleton & Co. to drink in a knowledge of theology, history, and biography. We trust the invitation will be respectfully declined by Protestants and liberal thinkers. Let the Romanists support their own publications.

The only newspapers in the country which (so far as we can learn) have thoroughly rebuked this poisoning of American literature,—this putting of falsehood in the place of truth on the shelves of our educational institutions, professional and private libraries, etc., so as to wet the powder of Protestants against the approaching battle with the Jesuits on the school question,—are the New York Christian Intelligencer, the New York Witness, the Christian at Work, the Baptist Weekly, and (rather tamely) the New York Observer and the New York Methodist. The Protestant press of the country in general will pour out columns of wailing and cause its readers to weep barrels of tears over the dreadful sufferings of a few "heretics" in Spain or Mexico; but when they see, right under their noses, a professedly American cyclopædia poisoned by the cunning of a Roman priest, through the subterfuge of a Protestant publishing-house, they are silent! They stand just where a vast majority of the religious newspapers stood on the slavery question before the great rebellion; their bread and butter are in danger, and so they whine, "Give us peace and pelf, no matter what becomes of liberty."

We have paid careful and minute attention to the articles touching the Roman Catholic Church in volume thirteen of the new cyclopædia, by the side of similar articles in the old cyclopædia; and the results are briefly stated below. We challenge an examination of these extracts.

The agent of the work, in delivering to us the last volume, said he was aware that "something had been done by the Republican to advertise it." We have neither asked nor received anything for the advertising done. It has been a pastime for our leisure hours; but we hope the community, which is deeply affected by any cyclopædia to which references are constantly made, will not pass over our criticisms hastily.

PASSAGLIA AND PERRONE.

These Jesuit theologians, who have come into prominence in connection with the dogmas of immaculate conception and papal infallibility, have each pretty full biographies in the new cyclopædia (vol. xiii., pp. 148, 310). They are not mentioned in the old cyclopædia. Sixteen years ago the above dogmas were not much heard of in this country, in connection with the unchangeable Church.

PORT ROYAL.

The old cyclopædia has nothing under this heading. The new cyclopædia devotes nearly two and a half pages to the Cistercian monasteries which, it is said, "during the civil wars of the Fronde and subsequent seasons of distress displayed the most unbounded charity and hospitality toward the suffering population." This was more than two centuries ago. Port Royal and the Jansenists were wiped out. But the record of these heroic and zealous foes of the Jesuits is worth preserving, even if it is done to shed a little lustre on a branch of the Roman Church.

PAULICIANS.

The old cyclopædia (p. 48) says of this ancient sect of Christians that "they made no scruple of using falsehood in dealing with other sects, and were ready to deny their faith when interest served."

The new cyclopædia (p. 178) omits the charge of falsehood and infidelity against these early Christians, as it is now the fashion to smooth over the sins of professedly pious men in olden times, in order to exalt the ancient Church, and show that all godliness was preserved within her inclosure.

ETIENNE PASQUIER.

The old cyclopædia (p. 22) says that this French jurist and author "in 1564 was counsel for the university in its lawsuit with the Society of Jesuits. His pleadings made him popular and clients flocked to him." After 1588 "he found himself involved in new quarrels with the Jesuits, who were expelled from France in consequence of the attempt of Jean Châtel on the life of the king," Henry IV.

The new cyclopædia (p. 147) expunges the "popularity" of Pasquier, owing to his pleadings in a lawsuit against the Jesuits, and also expunges the fact that the Jesuits were "expelled from France" because of assassination plots against the liberal-hearted king, Henry IV. Nothing must appear in the "revised" cyclopædia, reflecting on that unscrupulous order which now holds the helm of the Roman Church, although it was suppressed by an infallible Pope only one century ago.

PASQUIN.

The old cyclopædia (p. 22) describes the mutilated statue in Rome from which the word "pasquinade" was derived, saying that "in the lampoons upon persons in high station, the pope and cardinals were favorite objects of attack." One of these satirical epigrams, directed against Alexander VI. (Roderick Borgia) is unsurpassed by any utterance of Pasquin: "Vendit Alexander claves, altaria, Christum; emerat ille prius, vendere jure potest." [Alexander sells the keys, the altars, Christ. He bought them first, and has a right to sell.]

The new cyclopædia (p. 148) devotes only half as much space to Pasquin as the old one, and the satirical epigram against Alexander VI. is "revised" out by the Roman Catholic editor, as is the fact that Pope Adrian VI. proposed to throw the mutilated statue into the river Tiber, because such formidable verses were affixed to the battered marble.

SAINT PATRICK.

The old cyclopædia (p. 33) says that the patron saint of Ireland "perhaps visited Italy," and refers to the "popular legend of his having banished all the venomous creatures from Ireland by means of his crozier or staff."

The new cyclopædia (p. 168) is certain that the great saint was once "in Rome, and had the name of Patricius bestowed on him by Pope Celestine, his original name having been Succath." It also states that "Patrick devoted the lands bestowed on him to the foundation of churches, or cloisters for both sexes, and of numerous monastic schools which flourished during the next three centuries. He was also zealous for the suppression of slavery."

During the sixteen years that elapsed between the publication of the old and the new cyclopædia, St. Patrick's followers have vastly multiplied in America. This makes it an object to give the saint a longer and better sketch, to claim new merits for him, and especially to honor him as an early abolitionist; for, now that American slavery is abolished, the Roman Church—which in solid mass opposed the anti-slavery reform—asserts itself and its saints to be the only true friends of human freedom. As St. Patrick died thirteen hundred and eighty-two years ago, the discovery of such important new facts about him shows the enterprise bestowed on this "revised" cyclopædia.

PAULINUS.

The old cyclopædia has nothing under this heading. The new cyclopædia (p. 178) contains elaborate sketches of four different Roman saints named Paulinus, the last of whom died over one thousand years ago. It is of immense importance to Americans to know all about those ancient personages; and in securing their history it is of no consequence that the new cyclopædia omits to mention such men as John M. Palmer of Illinois, Amasa J. Parker of New York, Joel Parker of New Jersey, the war governor, George H. Pendleton of Ohio, Gen. John W. Phelps of Vermont, Edwards Pierpont, United States minister to England, and many others.

PERU.

The old cyclopædia (p. 180) states that "the education of the lower orders is almost completely neglected, and in the interior of the country it is sometimes difficult to procure men qualified for a public office by being merely able to read and write." "The established religion is the Roman Catholic, and but little toleration is extended to other creeds. The Church is immensely rich."

The new cyclopædia (p. 341) announces a great change in Peru within sixteen years. It says that "public instruction has been the object of sedulous care, and is compulsory and gratuitous." There are about one hundred thousand pupils in the various educational establishments of the republic,—primary and grammar schools for both sexes, normal schools, schools of arts and trades, agriculture, commerce, fine arts, a naval and military school, and six universities. We hope this is all true, although doubts will arise, on reading further that "the religion of the State is the Roman Catholic, the public exercise of no other being lawful."

CORNELIUS DE PAUW.

Relative to this Dutch author the new cyclopædia (p. 191) omits the statement in the old (p. 54) that in a certain work "relating to Paraguay he bitterly assailed the Jesuits, and his attacks on them made him unpopular with the Catholic clergy." Everywhere the Jesuits are screened in the new cyclopædia, even if it has to be done by garbling.

PEASANTS' WAR.

This revolutionary movement in Germany, in 1524-5, is said in the new cyclopædia (p. 216) to have been fiercely condemned by Martin Luther in a pamphlet which he published, calling on the princes to kill the insurgents "like mad dogs," and declaring that "none could die in a way more pleasing to God than fighting against such miscreants." In the old cyclopædia (p. 73) Luther's harsh language is not referred to. The revising editor has got in a thrust at the great Protestant reformer.

ST. RAYMOND DE PENNAFORT.

who died just six hundred years ago, was not deemed worthy of mention in the old cyclopædia; but in the new (p. 253) he receives a complimentary sketch, for the reason probably that he "was instrumental in establishing the inquisition in Aragon and Southern France."

ROBERT PERSONS,

an English Jesuit, who died in 1610, is not mentioned in the old cyclopædia; but in the new (p. 330) a biography of him is given, his labors and travels are described, and among the books published by him one is mentioned which "claims for the pope power to dethrone sovereigns and absolve subjects from their allegiance." The American people need to be familiarized with such sentiments, we suppose.

SAINT PETER.

The old cyclopædia (p. 190) casts some doubt on this apostle's ever being at Rome, and makes no allusion to his apocryphal writings or his burial-place.

The new cyclopædia (p. 353) argues strongly that St. Peter lived for several years at Rome, and that his body and skull are enshrined there, while his "revelation" was read once a year in the churches of Palestine, and his "preaching" was quoted by Clement of Alexandria.

St. Peter is the favorite apostle of the editors of the revised cyclopædia, and they are determined to have their preference known where it will do them the most good.

PETER CLAYER,

a Jesuit missionary, not mentioned in the old cyclopædia, receives a flattering notice in the new (p. 353). He is said to have labored with zeal and self-denial to convert the slave population of New Granada. Every Jesuit gets a "first-rate notice" in the revised American cyclopædia, at this very time when every European government is restraining or expelling the Jesuits as the enemies of human liberty and progress.

PHILIP II. OF SPAIN.

The new cyclopædia (p. 411) omits an important and characteristic act of this cruel, treacherous king, which is told in the old cyclopædia (p. 242). He gave minute directions in writing for the secret murder of the lord of Montigny, who, although a devout Catholic, had opposed the persecution of the Protestants. Philip caused it to be given out that Montigny had died of a fever. The portrait of the Spanish bigot and tyrant is not so black in the new cyclopædia as in the old one.

JOSEPH MARIE PORTALIS.

The old cyclopædia (p. 498) speaks of "trouble between Napoleon I. and the pope," and the banishment of Portalis for his relations with a certain Abbé.

The new cyclopædia (p. 722) says nothing of any "trouble" in which the pope was implicated.

PREMONSTRATENSIS.

The old cyclopædia (p. 551) says that "this religious order at the time of the Reformation had about two thousand convents, of which five hundred were for women. The female convents were at first contiguous to the monks, and separated from them only by a wall; but later this arrangement was given up. The order suffered great losses in consequence of the success of the Reformation."

The new cyclopædia (p. 807) omits the statements that the separation of the two sexes was given up, and that the order "suffered great losses" by means of the Reformation.

ANTOINE FRANÇOIS PREVOST D'EXILES.

The old cyclopædia (p. 574) says that this French novelist, popularly known as Abbé Prevost, "was intended for the Church and educated by the Jesuits, but ran away and for four or five years led a very dissipated life." He was afterwards "ordained as priest of the Benedictines and proved a very successful preacher"; but, unable to bear "the austerities of a convent," he abandoned the order and went to Holland, where he supported himself by his pen.

The new cyclopædia (p. 828) says nothing of the Abbé Prevost being educated by the Jesuits, or of his early dissipated life, or of his being ordained as a Benedictine monk.

PRIMATE.

The new cyclopædia (p. 834) devotes about thrice as much space to this ecclesiastical title of honor as the old cyclopædia (p. 580); and the assertion is made in the new cyclopædia that in early times in the countries of Western Europe "the first rank, primatus, was conceded universally to the Roman bishop."

This bold statement is not found in the old cyclopædia, for the very good reasons that it is untrue, and that the publishers of the American cyclopædia of sixteen years ago were not fishing in St. Peter's pond. Upon such false yarns, woven silly into historical books, does Romanism base its claims to spiritual and temporal dominion. Seldom, however, can the trick be detected, as in this case, and still more seldom can it be fastened on a professedly Protestant publishing house.—Lansing (Mich.) Republican, May 2.

PROF. WILLARD FISKE ON CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

SOME FALLACIES REGARDING THE PUBLIC SERVICE—HOW TO GET THE BEST MEN—EDUCATIONAL TESTS—SOLDIERS' CLAIMS.

There seems to be a good deal of mistiness in the public mind in reference to the methods which ought to be pursued in order to purify our civil service and to render it efficient. Numberless plans and theories, often of the crudest sort, have been propounded. Suggestions and hints, wise and otherwise, abound in all the journals. A peculiar source of perplexity is that each new political doctor seeks to attack only some special evil of the service, without much consideration for its relation to the rest of the system. One wishes to remove the inefficiency of the service, another its corruption, another its partisanship, another the favoritism through which its positions are bestowed. The remedies proposed are equally various. One recommends a very simple nostrum; namely, "to put the best men into office"; another wants to make the heads of bureaus personally responsible for the character of their subordinates; another sees the cure-all in permanence of service, with or without pensions; another fancies that if the offices could be fairly portioned among all the States corruption would cease. It is time that some of these cobwebs were brushed away, and the task of doing it ought not to be very difficult. Other nations have, in the past, been through trials not unlike our own, and have succeeded, often after many efforts, in freeing their administrative service from corruption and incapacity. Guided by the light of their experience, we may be able to clear up a good deal of the obscurity which surrounds the subject, and to point out a few of the fallacies which most frequently find utterance through the mouths of politicians, or the columns of the press. Some of these fallacies are:—

1. That you can "put the best men into office" without first determining by what process you are to find the best men. It is indeed a very simple matter to "put the best men into office" when you know who they are. But how are you to know them? Can the President designate them? He cannot possibly have a personal acquaintance with one in a thousand of those required to fill all the public positions, nor, with his other duties, can he afford the hours and days necessary to inform himself of their character and capacity. Can he depend on his friends, or his advisers, or the party leaders, or Congressmen, to indicate them to him? Experience has shown, with sad certainty, that he cannot; and Congressmen, too, have other functions, proper to them, which, if rightly performed, will leave them no time for such business. Can he allow the people to select collectors and assessors and postmasters and light-house-keepers and clerks by election? Such a scheme is impossible of execution, and, if possible, would result in a service even worse than the existing one. Some general test of fitness, applicable to all candidates, must, therefore, be found.

2. That there is any better test of the capability and fitness of the candidate than the educational one. This test is not perfect; no one, which human ingenuity can devise, will be. But it is far better than any other which has yet been proposed, and is consequently adopted by all the principal civilized nations. It, at least, excludes ignorance from the public service, and it is easy to see that by excluding ignorance we go far toward excluding corruption. If anybody know a better test, available for all branches of a vast and complete service, let him name it.

3. That candidates for office should be examined solely with a view to ascertain their fitness for the special duties to which they are to be assigned. The civil services of the foremost contemporary nations are based upon the theory that, if education be of any value at all, it ought to develop better men than ignorance. In other words, the methods of selecting government employes in vogue elsewhere are founded upon the advantages which a high culture is supposed to confer. It is taken for granted that a young man, with a thorough general education, can, by virtue of the training he has undergone, speedily qualify himself for any special service. Why demand that a candidate for a clerkship in the Custom House shall repeat the dynasties of the German Emperors, or explain the formula of algebra? Why not be content with the assurance that he understands book-keeping and can write a good hand? Because the prime object is to learn whether he be a man of sufficiently complete mental training to be able to readily adapt himself to any ordinary position, and to any ordinary routine of duties.

4. That a mere "pass" examination can secure the best public servants. Years ago John Stuart Mill, in his work on "Representative Government," exploded the theory that an examination which simply requires candidates for the civil service to evince a certain proficiency, or to come up to a certain standard of excellence, is all-sufficient; and the history of the efforts to reform the English service amply confirms the truth of the conclusions at which Mr. Mill arrived. Competition is a necessary element in examinations for the public service.

5. That those who have served in the nation's armies have any special claim to positions in the nation's civil service. They have just as great a claim as other classes of citizens, and no greater. The object to be steadily kept in view is the admittance of no man into the service who has not fairly won the place by proving himself the most capable of all competing candidates. If an ex-soldier have done this, then give him the place. But between a more capable citizen and a less capable ex-soldier there can be no choice. The citizen must have the position. That the nation should provide for those who have fought in its defence is altogether proper, but it has no right to do this by foisting incapables upon its public service. Let such be pensioned. It is far cheaper in the end.

6. That just so many positions in the service, and no more, should be filled by individuals from one State, or from one section of the country. This is the most absurd of fallacies. A great nation should secure, for the execution of its administrative business, the best men, let them come from what quarter of the land they may. If more of these best men come from the East than from the West, how are you to induce the candidates from the West to qualify themselves more thoroughly, if you continue to give them just such a number of offices, whether they be qualified or not? Geographical locality ought to have no influence in the matter. The young men of the whole country should be admitted to precisely the same competition. If fewer from one State succeed, and more from another, it will simply encourage the former to prepare themselves with greater thoroughness for the next trial.

7. That any patchwork attempt to reform this or that department can be of any avail. The general principles adopted should be applied to every branch of the National service, commencing at the lower grades, and gradually, by means of proper promotion, effecting the purification of the whole service. So long as any department is at the mercy of the party leaders we shall still suffer from the existing evils. Its control will afford them a foothold by means of which they can prolong the struggle against a better system. The entire aristocracy of selfish office-mongers, the entire army of ignorant office-seekers, should be made to understand that their time is past.

8. That any reform can be successful which does not interdict the members of the civil service from engaging in partisan acts. It is absolutely essential that the employes of the government should fully comprehend that they are in the service of the government and not in that of a party,—that their wages are paid by the whole people and not by any partisan fraction of the people. Participation in party caucuses; the contribution of funds in aid of any partisan object; the acceptance of an office in any partisan convention or of a place upon any party committee; the effort to obtain promotion through the influence of any party leader; the editorship or ownership of a partisan journal,—all these should be considered as sufficient causes for instant dismissal. The rules for the military and civil services should be alike in this respect.

The crude notions which have here been briefly considered are by no means the only ones afloat upon this subject; there are various other opinions which are frequently expressed but which certainly seem equally erroneous. Among them is the all-prevailing idea that there is something political in a government position. The actual truth is that only the very highest places, those filled by members of the Cabinet and by Foreign Ministers, are at all political in their character. Members of the Cabinet do aid in directing and deciding the policy of the Administration; but below them hardly a single appointed official can be named who properly has anything to do with what may be styled the high affairs of State. The whole multitude of employes, from heads of bureaus and collectors down to the lowest grade of clerks, are simply administrative functionaries, and are no more authorized to interfere with the policy of government than a clerk in a mercantile establishment is authorized to interfere officiously with the direction of his employer's affairs. They have no interest, beyond that of the ordinary citizen, in the matter; and the very fact that they are the servants of the government should impel them to keep rigidly aloof alike from politics and partisanship.

HOW SUFFRAGE WORKS IN GERMANY.

BY JOSEPH P. THOMPSON, LL.D.

The Germans are beginning to discover that in experimenting with free institutions they are playing with edged tools. Since the last election for the Imperial Parliament has revealed the activity and strength of the social Democrats and the persistency of the Ultramontanes, one often hears it said: "Better a quiet servitude than this rampant liberty." This is the feeling especially of those old-line Prussians who to this day ignore the empire, and refuse to know their sovereign by any other title than "our dear good king." In Prussia the parliamentary system, introduced only a quarter of a century ago, has always moved haltingly, the government remaining practically with the king and his ministers. The Prussian Parliament (Landtag) continues to be elected—that is, the House of Deputies—by a system of class suffrage, working through intermediary boards of electors (Wahlmänner). This plan serves to balance the various interests of society upon the basis of taxation, and secures in the Parliament a more substantial element than our American system of direct voting is apt to supply to Congress or the State legislature. But the Prussian Parliament—which legislates only for the internal affairs of the kingdom, and has now nothing more to do with army, navy, postoffice, customs, currency, nor with any foreign policy—is quite overshadowed by the Imperial Parliament (Reichstag), which represents all Germany, and is chosen by direct and universal or manhood suffrage.

In framing a constitution for the empire that was formed after the conquest of France by the united armies of Germany, Bismarck had to conciliate or appease two widely opposite interests,—the popular and liberal, and the hereditary and monarchical. To the first he gave universal suffrage and a Parliament of a single house; for the other he provided a Confederate Council (Bundesrath), made up of the personal representatives of the several sovereignties that combine to form the empire. In this Council are represented the four kingdoms—Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony, Württemberg; the six grand-duchies—Baden, Hesse, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Saxon-Weimar-Eisenach, Mecklenburg-Strelitz; the five duchies—Brunswick, Saxon-Meiningen, Saxon-Altenburg, Saxon-Coburg-Gotha, Anhalt; also seven minor principalities and the free Hanse cities—Lübeck, Bremen, and Hamburg. This Council of sovereign States prepares the measures to be submitted to the Imperial Parliament, and no act of Parliament can have validity as law unless subsequently ratified by the Council and signed by the emperor. Hence, the conservative interests have a powerful check upon universal suffrage, and perhaps it was in the thought of Bismarck to play off one against the other. But suffrage has freaks of its own and refuses to be managed.

The unity of Germany was sought by three classes,—by statesmen, who saw in this political unity a means of strength and progress for the Germanic race; by idealists, to whom national unity was a lofty sentiment; and by revolutionists and socialists, to whose vague aspirations the union of Germany would be but another experiment toward their unattainable ends. Neither statesmen nor idealists made much account of suffrage as an agency or an expression of unity; and when unity came—not as a normal development, but as an accident of foreign war and victory,—and universal suffrage was adopted as a solvent by which the conglomerated elements of the empire should be made to coalesce, the great body of sober-minded Germans hardly knew what to do with their new function of imperial voters.

The actual working of suffrage in Germany is a curious and instructive study for Americans. Having been accustomed to be governed from above, the Germans are slow in learning political action from beneath, with the people as the moving force. They know little of public opinion, and still less of party drill, as these are felt in American politics. They are not yet accustomed to public meetings, as a means of political action, and their press is much wanting in coöperation and in force. A young man of a noble house was put in nomination for Parliament in a Rhine district, upon the testimony of his older brother (a staunch liberal member) that he was worthy of the place. No rival candidate was brought forward openly, and he was returned over all secret opposition; but the poll was light. Many Germans were from the first indifferent about suffrage, and to this day maintain their inaction in affairs of the empire. Others looked upon it with disgust, and, taking it for granted that the rabble would rule, held themselves aloof from politics. Too many of the better sort of people acted with that individual independence which educated Germans carry to an extreme rarely known in political action in the United States. These refused to enter into party combinations, or entered into so many smaller combinations, upon minor crotchets of their own, that harmony of movement in the nation or in Parliament upon great public interests is made extremely difficult. Bismarck first gave his influence toward the creation of a National Liberal party; but this, though numerically the strongest, is far from commanding a majority in Parliament, and in the recent election has lost over twenty members.

But while so large a body of the people were thus indifferent or disinclined, the socialistic and revolutionary agitators, chiefly of the working classes, seized upon suffrage as their efficient weapon, and by organized agitation these are now becoming a formidable power. They are not at all satisfied with things as they are. They would gladly see the overthrow of monarchy and the dissolution of the empire as at present constituted. The unity of Germany has saddled upon them heavier taxes and a larger army; and the financial and commercial perturbations that followed the war have crippled industry and overturned the very foundations of trade. Hence the socialists are agitating for "a change," though with no definite notions of what a change should accomplish. They do not as yet throw many members into Parliament; but they gain ground steadily by their organization.

The Ultramontanes or clericals are much more largely represented in Parliament, and keep up their organization by compact and constant drill. The old Conservatives, too, keep well together and hold substantially their own. Add to these the Poles, the Hanoverians, and a portion of the Alsatians, and if all these elements of hostility to the imperial policy of Bismarck should chance to combine, the opposition would be formidable indeed. The government could not count upon carrying any measure.

The hope of orderly and peaceable progress lies with the Liberal Conservatives and the National Liberals; but the power of these is much hindered by the Progressionists—who are at heart opposed to Bismarck's policy—who really serve to keep the Socialists in countenance. If ever a people were entitled to universal suffrage, that people is the Germans, since all are taxed roundly for the support of the government, and every man may be summoned to lay down his life for the nation. And if any people could be safely trusted with universal suffrage, it is a people among whom education is so largely and so equally diffused by force of compulsory laws. Here all voters must read, pay, and fight. The freaks of suffrage as shown in Radicalism, Ultramontanism, and Particularism are likely to work the cure of indifference. They are arousing thoughtful men to the duty of caring for the State and of widening their own horizon, to embrace all who will act together for the public good. The conflicts to be anticipated in the present Parliament may prepare the way for a higher and broader patriotism, that shall secure the stable advance of liberty over all the discord of factions.

THE NEW LAW FOR ANNUAL RETURNS OF PROPERTY EXEMPTED FROM TAXATION.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

IN SENATE, April 3, 1877.

The committee on Just and Equal Taxation, to whom were directed the Orders to consider the expediency of limiting the amount of property to be exempted from taxation in the possession of religious, literary, and charitable associations, and to whom also were referred sundry petitions setting forth that the property owned by the churches in this Commonwealth amounts to $30,000,000, and the property held by charitable institutions exceeds $8,000,000, and that of literary, benevolent, and scientific institutions $21,000,000, and asking that said property may not be exempted from taxation, respectfully submit the following Report:—

Several public hearings on the matters embraced in said Orders and petitions were held by the Committee and were attended by a large number of people. Scarcely any who addressed the Committee advised taxing the property of benevolent and charitable associations, and but few expressed a wish to have the property of educational institutions taxed, while upon the question of exempting church property there was more division of opinion.

It was evident that religious and charitable, or charitable and educational purposes, were often combined in the same society, and that there is a lack of statistics and exact information concerning these associations on which to base judicious and discriminating legislation, either for the correction of abuses or making material changes, if such changes shall be demanded by the people of the Commonwealth. The Committee, therefore, came to the conclusion that, it would be unwise, at the present session of the Legislature, to recommend any important alterations of the law which now exempts from taxation this class of property.

It was suggested by a distinguished gentleman who came before the Committee, that, as these institutions held public trusts, greater publicity might be desirable in regard to their administrations, and that it would be well to provide for annual published returns concerning them. This suggestion met the unanimous approval of the Committee. For the purpose, therefore, of securing such returns and thereby gaining the statistics and information which the public, and especially the Legislature, ought to possess for future guidance, the Committee report the accompanying Bill.

For the Committee, A. B. COFFIN.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.
In the Year One Thousand Eight Hundred and Seventy-seven.

AN ACT

To provide for Annual Returns from Literary, Educational, Benevolent, Charitable, Scientific, and Religious Societies.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, in General Court assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

1 SECT. 1. Every literary, educational, benevolent, charitable, or scientific institution within this Commonwealth, having any property therein exempt from taxation, and every religious society or body, whether corporate or unincorporate, having property so exempt, shall annually, on or before the fifteenth day of May, make a return to the assessors of the city or town where the same is established or located, in such detail as may be herein provided, attested by its treasurer or other financial officer or officers, setting forth the quantity and the fair cash value of all real and personal estate owned by it on the first day of said month of May, the amount of incumbrance thereon, the amount of mortgage on its untaxed property, the amount of trust funds held by it, or for its benefit, and also the amount of money raised or received from all sources during its next preceding financial year ending prior to the time herein fixed for making such return, and the disposition made of such income for expenses, for its specific literary, educational, benevolent, charitable, scientific, or religious purposes, or otherwise. In case any institution, society, or body above mentioned neglects to make the annual return as aforesaid, its real estate for such year shall not be exempt from taxation.

1 SECT. 2. Every institution, society, or body mentioned in the preceding section shall make a duplicate of said return to the tax commissioner of the Commonwealth; and in case it shall omit to make such return to the tax commissioner at the time fixed in the foregoing section for making returns, it shall forfeit therefor the sum of one hundred dollars, and its treasurer or other financial officer or officers, for the time being, whose duty it is to make such return, shall in addition be liable in a like sum for such omission; said sums to be recovered to the use of the Commonwealth, separately or jointly, upon information brought in the County of Suffolk, or in the county in which such institution, society, or body is established or located, in the name of the Commonwealth at the relation of said tax commissioner.

1 SECT. 3. Said tax commissioner shall prescribe and furnish the blank forms for the returns required by this act, and shall distribute the same before the first day of May in each year, and shall also annually prepare, cause to be printed, and on the first Wednesday of January submit to the legislature a true abstract of said returns received by him.

1 SECT. 4. This act shall take effect on the first day of June next.

THE GRASSHOPPER FAST.

EDITORS SENTINEL:—

Gov. Pillsbury's day of "fasting and prayer" for the extermination of grasshoppers has come and gone. We must now wait results,—the Lord only knows how long.

In Lake City the four Evangelical churches held a union prayer-meeting in the morning, of which due notice had been given. At the time appointed the meeting was opened with just twenty-nine persons present, counting in your correspondent. Only two of the pastors of these churches were present. A few more persons came in, and at the close there were thirty-six all told.

There was little that was noticeable about the meeting. There was no enthusiasm, and scarcely earnestness. The prayers were mostly of a commonplace character for various objects. One man made a prayer of reasonable length, but in which there was not the slightest allusion to the grasshopper scourge. Doubtless he forgot it. The most prominent feature of the prayers offered was the necessity of our humbling ourselves before God. The most earnest prayer put up was by Elder Moon. It was directly to the point and for the object of the day, and in a manner that indicated that he felt conscious that God heard him.

Several short speeches were made, but in none of them, as far as could be seen, was there any information given to facilitate the extermination of grasshoppers. Mr. Door, in his remarks, claimed to give a quotation from the sermon of presiding Elder Chaffee, preached last Sunday evening; viz., "That God can kill a grasshopper." Elder Chaffee presented it in this way. He was "going for" the Free Thinkers a little, and said, "The scientists conceive of this universe as a great grinding-mill run by law, with God so hedged in with law that he cannot specially kill a grasshopper." We take it that no rationalist will wish to dispute the Elder on this statement. He has put it very well. I thank him for it, the more because we do not always get treated as fairly. We have before heard the Elder speak of the rationalists in the same handsome manner. He went on to state his views to the effect that God "can kill a grasshopper." He said "this world is run by God, and God is moved by prayer." If this be true, then the rational conclusion is that the world is really run by prayer. And, again, if this too be true, then the next rational conclusion is that the grasshoppers are in Minnesota in answer to somebody's prayers. Last year the Governor of Missouri got up prayers to get the grasshoppers out of that State; and it is claimed that he did it. If so, they probably came to Minnesota. Now, if God really answers prayer, and the praying people of each of the States pray him to send the hoppers out of their State, then it would seem that God must either keep them on the wing and starve them out, or else let them light down here and there and eat out somebody who does not pray.

Now, Mr. Editor, all this seems too absurd to really treat seriously. However truly God may be behind the existence of all law, all cause, yet it would seem that all phenomena in the universe are simply cause and effect. It seems clear that every physical effect must necessarily have a physical cause. Some of these are within the influence of man to effect, while others are seen to be beyond any control of his. It is simply egotistic selfishness for man to conclude that all things are made for his use. There are some things that man must take as he finds them, and either get out of their way or accept the situation,—the consequences.—D. K. B., in the Lake City (Minn.) Sentinel.

TO THE MEDITERRANEAN.

Midland ocean, round whose margin
Towered the city-states of old,
To their arms your surges wafted
Power and riches as they rolled.
All your depths with bones are whitened—
Bones of mariners of yore,
Wrecked and drowned by myriad tempests,
Through the ages strew your floor.
Nearth your waters they are lying Thicker than the waves o'erhead,—
Buried nations, Tyrians, Grecians
Numberless, the ancient dead.
Gold and gems among them glisten,
Sword and helmet glimmer there,
While the shades of the unburi'd
Swarm above the haunted air.
Every billow has its shadow,
Tyrian, Grecian, Roman ghost;
O'er the waters, which submerged them,
Hovers still the countless host.
Thus, through shadowy armies ploughing,
Bail the ships which traverse thee;
Not a channel, but a charnel
Is thy floor, O Midland sea!

REV. L. K. WASHBURN, minister of the Unitarian society at Revere, in this State, has been preaching sermons lately in which he has made such very true statements as that "this world deserves a better religion than Christianity," etc. We do not know that he is charged with any other offence than simply asserting his independence of the Christian theology. A statement by Mr. Washburn of his own position, and of the extraordinary steps taken by the conservatives to prove the genuineness of their Unitarian Christianity, will be found among the "Communications" on another page. The final result will probably be either that Mr. Washburn will be forced to leave his society, or that the society itself will be cut off from the Unitarian fellowship. We do not believe that any society which desires to retain this fellowship will be able to maintain at the same time the degree of pulpit freedom which Mr. Washburn bravely demands. It is to be hoped that the Revere society, a majority of which are evidently more radical than Unitarianism permits, will take steps to complete the victory they have gained for free-thought by explicitly terminating all connection with sectarian organizations. There is no other mode of preventing an ultimate wasting away of the present radical majority. It is not enough for the minister to declare his own freedom; if the society are unwilling to declare theirs too, failure is certain in the long run. But there is reason to expect no little nerve from a society which by a vote of four to one sustains a non-Christian preacher. A smaller fellowship must sometimes be sacrificed to secure a larger one; and it is well to remember that humanity is more than Unitarianism.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Sixth Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Index Association will be held at No. 35 Monroe Street, Toledo, Ohio, on Saturday, June 2, 1877, at half-past two o'clock, in accordance with the articles of incorporation.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Tenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston as follows:—

Thursday evening, May 31st, at 7.45 P. M., business session in Horticultural Hall, for the election of officers, reading of reports, and consideration of the practical work of the Association. A special discussion is also invited on the proper interpretation of the word "scientific" in the first article of the Constitution of the Association.

Friday, June 1st, at 10.30 A.M. and 3 P.M., sessions in Beethoven Hall for Essays and Addresses. Morning subject: "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom." Essayist—Rev. Wm. R. Alger, of New York. Afternoon subject: "Internal Dangers of Free Thought." Essayist—C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, N.Y. Among the speakers invited whose attendance we have reason to expect are O. B. Frothingham and Prof. Felix Adler, of New York; Rabbi Lasker, of Boston; Wm. Henry Channing, of England; Rev. Dr. Dudley, of Boston; and Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, of Illinois. Further announcements hereafter, especially in the Boston dailies.

A Social Festival is to be held Friday evening at Horticultural Hall. Col. T. W. Higginson will preside. There will be brief speeches, music, conversation, refreshments, and a chance to contribute to the Treasury of the Association.

W. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

"TRANSCENDENTALISM AND INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY."

Under the above caption, Mr. Mills contributes another letter to THE INDEX, for which we desire to express our sincere and cordial gratitude. It is only by the frank speech of those who take unlike views of great subjects that new truth can be elicited or made known to mankind; and Mr. Mills renders a very noble service to truth by an unflinching directness of criticism whose evident root is deep and powerful convictions of his own. It is precisely such writers as he whose coöperation we have always most earnestly coveted in these columns,—writers who hold convictions too precious in their own eyes to be covered up or withheld out of a mistaken deference or courtesy to other people's opinions, yet who know how to defend them without stooping to misrepresentation or incivility or unworthy tactics of any sort. No matter how much at variance with our own ideas or conclusions, we welcome most heartily all articles of this high quality; and if they should prove our own ideas or conclusions to be erroneous, so much the better for the interests of truth. When every strong thinker on religious subjects shall be willing to bring out his thought in its full strength side by side with the perhaps opposing thought of others, as Mr. Mills has done, the world will grow rapidly in spiritual wisdom. We wish that the discussion might lead to a similar expression of opinion by others, and thereby to a more thorough sifting of the true from the erroneous in the general mind. But meanwhile we must try to explain more satisfactorily the views which Mr. Mills so ably criticizes.

1. It may be true, as he suggests, that our conception of "intellectual liberty" is confused; and, if so, we desire sincerely to be enlightened. He says that "liberty has its laws"; by which he probably means that the intellect must exercise its liberty in accordance with the natural laws of thought. To this we certainly assent; and we have never denied it. Mr. Mills, however, argues that some "primal postulate" must be taken for granted as the very condition of all knowledge, and instances the "validity of the impressions we receive of the outer world"—"the trustworthiness of your powers, your organs of knowledge." This is opening a very profound question, one which we briefly touched in our reply to Mr. Longfellow a fortnight ago. We hold that any assumed "postulate" must be submitted to verification by experience before it can be admitted as a necessary condition of knowledge. All that is really assumed by science is the reality, not the validity, of our sense-impressions; and science not only insists on her right to test these impressions (that is, to doubt their validity), but also on her right to correct them by comparison and reasoning, which are strictly intellectual processes. We are not aware that science rests on any "postulate" as an absolute truth independent of experience; and we think it by no means "absurd" to submit any such alleged "postulate" to the test of verification by experience. It is upon experience as a fact, not upon any postulate as an abstract proposition, that the slowly-built fabric of verified knowledge has been reared. "Intellectual liberty" is, of course, neither more nor less than the liberty of the intellect, which is the liberty of science; and we are obliged to believe that it is a violation of this liberty to deny to the scientific intellect the right of submitting all abstract propositions whatever to the test of verification by experience. Perhaps there is "confusion" and "subtle self-deception" in this position; but we really do not see where it is.

The protest of Free Religion against Transcendentalism, however, does not depend upon this position at all. It is the assumption of Transcendentalism that God, Immortality, and Duty are absolute truths "given in the constitution of the human mind," and absolutely certain independently of all experience,—the assumption that these are "intuitions" or "primal postulates" not subject to the test of scientific verification,—which seems to us to curtail unjustifiably the freedom of scientific investigation. It may be true that science must make some abstract fundamental postulate to start with, though we doubt it; but it would not follow that the Transcendental "intuitions" come properly under that head. This is the real assumption against which the protest of Free Religion lies. It is the function of the thinking faculty, the scientific intellect, to determine what is true; and it appears to us a very arbitrary limitation of intellectual liberty to say that the intellect must not exercise itself on those questions of solemn and all-appraising moment: "Does God exist? Does man survive the grave? Is virtue nothing but a dream?"

What we would vindicate for human thought is the right to ask and to answer these weighty questions in utter freedom, and to seek the truth in these directions by the same method which has led to truth in so many others. That is the "head and front of our offending."

2. Mr. Mills would have us "affirm certain facts or realities" which transcend our own consciousness, not on the ground of any verifiable perception of the objective universe, but "by the very necessity of the being within us"; and he instances the infinitude of space, the infinitude of time, and substance. The implication, we presume, is that God, Immortality, and Duty are realities of the same order and known in the same way. But, to take the first of his own instances, it is very manifest to us that the belief in the infinitude of space is due solely to the scientific intellect, acting on the commonest data of experience. What space is we learn through our contact with the world about us; and what its infinitude is we learn by a simple analysis of the fact. That is, we learn by constant experience that everything we touch or handle exists in space, but that nothing can limit it—that space necessarily extends on all sides of all objects; hence, if we try to imagine any sort of a limit to space, no matter how far off, we infer instantly that space must still be on all sides of it, and cannot, therefore, be limited by it after all. The impossibility of a limit to space, even beyond the remotest nebula, is a short but necessary inference from our immediate experience; every wall, fence, enclosure, no matter what its nature, presupposes space on both sides of itself, and the very idea of a limit to space is a self-contradiction. In other words, the infinitude of space is no a priori intuition, but an irresistible conclusion of the scientific intellect. The inability of the imagination to form a picture of infinite space has nothing to do with this conclusion, which it can neither strengthen nor weaken, and which rests on no Transcendental "necessity" whatever.

A similar result could be explained in the case of the other given instances, but one must suffice.

3. Mr. Mills says frankly: "The Transcendentalist cannot submit his intuition, a veritable intuition, to the test of scientific verification, as Mr. Potter seems to suppose he ought, since," etc. This we have considered to be the necessary logical position of Transcendentalism; but all doubt on the point is removed by this explicit statement. It is plain that a real and radical difference exists between this philosophy and the scientific method; and a general recognition of it will conduce to clearness of thought and a good mutual understanding. But we ought in turn to admit that science has no "instruments," no "line and plummet," to apply in such great questions as these. The tests which science applies are always adapted to the nature of each special inquiry; but they can all be classed under the general head of Experience. Microscope, telescope, spectroscope are worthless in political economy, or sociology, or any other science which deals with moral forces and phenomena; yet all these anthropological sciences have their own appropriate modes of appealing to human experience as their general test of truth. So also the science of religion will develop its own peculiar forms of appeal to the same ultimate test; and we think that those who now dread the extension of the scientific method to religion will lose their apprehensions in this respect as time goes on. Science dignifies all it touches, and never degrades; it enlarges the bounds of thought, and never contracts them; it reveals new wonders and glories to the human soul, and never robs it of those it now beholds. Does not the universe appear more awfully magnificent, more vast and sublime, in proportion as the march of human thought discovers more and more of the marvellous secrets hidden from the less favored eyes of the past? Be it what it may, the majesty of truth surpasses forever the dreams of those who know it not, and superstition alone would arrest its slowly-rising veil. "Intellectual liberty," we repeat, is the liberty of the intellect, the liberty of thought, the liberty of science; and who or what shall dare to set bounds to its gradual but resistless expansion?

4. It may possibly be shown by advancing science that God, Immortality, and Duty (which, it must be borne in mind, are the only "intuitions" of Transcendentalism that are properly concerned in this discussion) are not a priori "laws of the soul," without reducing them on that account to mere "fictions of the fancy." If they should be shown to be something more and greater than "laws of the soul," which, say what you will, can never establish a claim to more than a merely subjective certainty,—if they should be shown to be truths of the universe, and clothed in all eyes with the majesty of the Eternal Nature of Things,—what Transcendentalist would not confess that the little taper of his philosophy could well be spared in the sunlight of science? It is not for us to announce beforehand the achievements of the enfranchised universal mind of humanity; yet we look for that splendid consummation with steadfast hope. Though the skies are but redeeming with the early dawn, what one solitary watcher has beheld may be found in "The God of Science" and in "Darwin's Theory of Conscience"—lectures which may not be conclusive, yet which must be understood and refuted before we can be persuaded to despair of science.

5. In this section of his letter, Mr. Mills raises the abstruse question of necessary truths—the question which Kant undertook to answer in the world-famous Critique of Pure Reason. It will scarcely be considered proof of a wish to evade, if we forbear to undertake the settlement of such a question in a brief paragraph. But Mr. Mills will find our answers to some of the questions he here puts, if he will take the trouble to read patiently the lectures above mentioned.

6. We fail to see that "there is a Transcendental element subtly present in the mind of Science." That the ideas of space, time, and substance belong in science, we certainly admit, though we believe that they rest on the basis of verifiable experience. But we are obliged again to enter a mild protest against classing these ideas with the alleged "intuitions" of God, Immortality, and Duty,—the theological ideas which the scientific method insists on its right to submit to its own test of verification. It is the denial of this right in these particular instances, and in no others, that contains the infringement of intellectual liberty we find in Transcendentalism. We think it not improper to ask Transcendentalists to show sufficient cause why this denial should be made.

7. Possibly by our own lack of clearness, Mr. Mills misunderstands the purport of the question he quotes. We meant to inquire how it can possibly be true that Infinite Spirit is contained in a merely finite consciousness; we did not mean to take the fact for granted, for it is self-evidently not a fact at all. A finite consciousness may be in immediate relation to the infinite (e. g., infinite space, as we have above clearly explained), but it cannot possibly contain it. The object of our question was to point out the necessity of considering Infinite Spirit a universal and objective fact, if it is a fact at all, and not an individual and subjective one, as Transcendentalism makes it by reducing it to a mere "idea given in the constitution of the human mind." That is, if educated humanity is to retain belief in Infinite Spirit at all, it can do so only on the ground that Infinite Spirit is a truth of the universe, and not a mere constitutive or regulative principle of thought. We are sorry that Mr. Mills fails to appreciate this point in its full force, for it involves the whole question at issue. Transcendentalism gives no warrant for believing in God at all otherwise than as a beautiful dream; it fails to afford any rational ground for considering universal Nature the self-expression of Infinite Spirit. If science shall (and we see strong reasons for believing it will) prove to be utterly unable to account for man as a cosmical fact except through a spiritual philosophy of the cosmos itself, theism will be established on a basis of reason and not of blind, irrational faith. But we cannot see how Transcendentalism with its fatal subjectivity can rescue theism from the influences of modern science, which insists more and more on viewing the universe as a unit. Surely this is no trivial or capricious criticism; it deserves to be considered most seriously and fairly and fully.

8. It is true that "difficulties" will always remain to human thought, but thought exists to clear them up one by one. When the argument advanced in "The God of Science" has been discussed and set aside, we shall do our best to meet the demand for another "solution"; but until then, the demand is not in order. We have there pointed out that science itself has discovered in the cosmos an all-pervading unity of force, unity of action, unity of plan; that these things are the characteristics of intelligence as it works under our direct observation; and that this analogy points to scientific theism as the true cosmical philosophy. We wait still for a refutation of this argument. It may, perhaps, be easily refuted, but we are also "a trifle curious" in this matter.

9. Mr. Mills says of Infinite Spirit: "If objective, it would be determinate, and, if determinate, not infinite." Apply the same reasoning to infinite space, and it would reduce this to what Kant considered it, a merely subjective "form of the sensibility." But the outcome of this position is idealism, which, if logical, ends in absolute egoism—the doctrine that the thinker's consciousness is the sole existence, and that the whole universe is a mere phase or inward phenomenon of it. Transcendentalism cannot help travelling the same path; it ends, as we have pointed out, in a hopeless subjectivity. Such a philosophy seems to us thoroughly unhealthy, and we turn with relief to the wholesome atmosphere of science.

10. We do not think it legitimate to treat intuition now as a merely subjective experience, and now as both subjective and objective. But we cannot pause to dwell further on this point at present.

11. The manner in which we vindicate the "authority of the moral ideal" is stated at great length in the lecture on "Darwin's Theory of Conscience," to which we must simply refer. But we see how nobly Mr. Mills vindicates it in his own earnest, scrupulous, devoted pursuance of truth, and we acknowledge with admiration that it is impossible for science to offer a finer illustration of obedience to the high ethics of philosophical discussion than Transcendentalism offers to us all in the writings of this brave and single-minded man.

THE POINT.

The present writer received, a few days ago, a visit from a well-known French man of letters and reformer who was under concern in regard to the prospect of religious trouble in this country. He was, himself, a man of extremely radical views, had taken part in the social agitations of France, and suffered exile on account of his words and actions. He is still an exile, seeking employment for his pen. So strong is his antipathy to organized and State religion that, though a man of cultivated feeling, he would be willing to see the Church of Notre Dame in Paris destroyed, and in its place a great central railway-station built. It was his mature conviction that, sooner or later, there must be a religious war in Europe, which, he believed, would extend over England, and reach America. "Why should it not?" he asked; "has human nature changed its character by crossing the Atlantic Ocean? Has Romanism renounced here any of its old pretensions? Has ecclesiasticism abandoned its pride or its policy? Does not religion still, in the New World as in the Old, claim to be of supernatural origin, and therefore supreme over the State? Is not the Church of Rome making prodigious gains in this land? Has it not already gained a foothold in society? Is it not becoming rich with public plunder?"

Some of these questions were easily answered to the inquirer's perfect satisfaction. The numbers and apparent wealth of the Roman Church were explained on simple principles. But the only consideration that acted as a sedative on this excited mind, was that of the separation between religion and politics. In Europe, Church and State are so closely associated as to be identified; what disturbs the one unsettles the other. The political reformer confronts the Church as soon as he stirs. The priest is his immediate foe. The radical leaders of the first French Revolution went so far as to meditate the complete abolition of Christianity, the eradication of its tradition. Their failure to do this implied their failure to alter the political institutions of France. As yet, my French friend was assured that no such alliance was formed in America; at present, no such alliance seemed possible. In many parts of the country, particularly the West and South-west, there is a vehement determination to keep religion entirely out of politics; there is a strong anti-religious spirit, atheistical, materialistic, which detests religion under all forms, and will make no terms with it in case it intrudes into the province of practical affairs. The Europeans there associate religion with despotism, and regard it with distrust even in its mildest form. The Church, unless its reputation for sagacity has been greatly overrated, will be careful how it arouses the lion from its slumber, and will in common prudence, for its own sake, be contented with what it can acquire in the way of spiritual influence and wealth. The wise among its own members will counsel prudence, even though they may desire political sway. Their best men will sincerely resist any plans of encroachment contemplated by priestly or clerical fanatics, being honestly attached to republican institutions, and sufficiently well-read in history to dread every form of alliance between Church and State. The best men of our acquaintance in the Orthodox sects, editors, conductors of journals, lawyers, men of business, men of society, are, so we told M. Reclus, heartily and resolutely friends of democratic institutions, and in the event of an issue between the secular and the ecclesiastical systems would without hesitation hold to the former. Indeed, our only fear was from the over-confidence of these men, their scorn of the very suspicion of an ecclesiastical plot, their contempt of the movements initiated, and their indignation at the implied danger to free institutions in America from unecclesiastical religion. Romanism they do distrust and fear. But Protestant episcopacy is a harmless simulacrum, the real life whereof consists in the Protestant idea that lies at its centre; and evangelism in its various forms is, in their opinion, too much concerned with "spiritual" matters to engage in politics.

M. Reclus listened attentively and was much relieved at our presentation of the case. Still, there remained the ugly fact of over-confidence which had so many times in Europe wrecked disastrously the liberal cause. He had learned to dread over-confidence on the part of wise and good men as the most alarming indication of weakness and the surest presage of defeat. All might, and probably would, be safe, he admitted, if they who had eyes used them to see with; otherwise, the wily fiend of supernaturalism would, he felt sure, take advantage of the opportunity which free institutions offer, and work in America the same evils that had cursed Europe. There is no magic spell in republicanism to avert the calamity which supineness, aiding credulity, may bring down. The shadow was still on his countenance, therefore, when he went from the door.

THE FUNERAL OF MRS. STILES.

CHICAGO, May 7, 1877.

A recent event of interest, and one which may very properly form the subject of a letter to THE INDEX, is found in the death and funeral services of Mrs. Stiles, wife of Gen. I. N. Stiles, of this city, a prominent lawyer, and one of our most uncompromising radicals. Mrs. Stiles was a woman of rare mental ability; and when during the past few years her attention became directed to those life-questions of gravest import, the shadow of whose presence broods lovingly, though darkly, over us all, it was not surprising that one of her peculiar intellectual intrepidity should follow the line of investigation therein marked out to its farthest, and what seems to many its only legitimate, conclusion. Mrs. Stiles came therefore to share the opinion of her husband, that of complete uncertainty as to the beginning and end of things; and when she died, it was without any expression either of hope or dismay. As bravely and frankly as she had always stated her convictions, so bravely and serenely did she yield to the inevitable.

After her death, when the question was raised as to the character of the services to follow, Gen. Stiles, remembering that the coming of death is not only an occasion for mourning, but one for the justification of the life preceding it, wisely concluded to dispense with the customary funeral ceremonies, and substitute some brief and simple exercises more in accordance with the belief and practice of himself and his now dead wife. These exercises were conducted by himself and the members of the Athena, a small literary society of ladies, many of whose members were personal friends of the deceased. In a voice which only occasionally faltered, Gen. Stiles told the story of his wife's life, prefacing the account with a few explanatory remarks, the gist of which was that, if either Mrs. Stiles or himself had claimed among the clergy of the city a personal friend, there would have been no objection to such a one being present and publicly expressing his sympathy, not as a minister but as a friend. As such did not happen to be the case, there seemed no more reason for inviting a clergyman, as such, than a member of any other profession. The feeling on the part of the family and friends was, that those who knew Mrs. Stiles best were the ones to properly administer the last rites of love and respect.

For the past winter the principal work of the Athena has been a thorough study of Spencer's Synthetic Philosophy, a work which they were led to adopt as much through Mrs. Stiles' influence as that of any other one member. The President, Miss Richards, said in her address: "As a society we owe her a debt of gratitude, which we cannot now estimate, for the active influence which she exerted in leading us to adopt a course of modern philosophy and original thought in our work. The study of Spencer's First Principles this year has been more fruitful in interest and substantial results than that of any previous year of our organization. The mental grasp and reverent attitude of Herbert Spencer in the presence of universal law has been to many of us a new revelation, and our weekly reunions have furnished inspiration for grand conceptions of life. No one of our members brought to this study more enthusiasm, or a more just appreciation, and no member was more instructive than she." After the address followed music, and the reading of a few verses from Mrs. Browning's "De Profundis" by one of the members of the class.

The conventional funeral of the present day, with its publicity and stately gloom, is a feature of our civilization so horribly discordant with modern progressive thought, that rational people gladly welcome any innovation which, setting aside bare, comfortless ceremonies, shall reveal more plainly the sweet sacredness of the time and place. Gen. Stiles did what seemed to him the most and the only fitting thing to do; but so pointed a disregard of established customs did not of course pass without comment. The city press, for the most part, spoke of the affair respectfully, though with decorously expressed surprise. The Tribune dwelt at some length and rather plaintively on the anomaly always presented by faithlessness in women; but possibly the opinions of the Tribune and the world in general are destined to undergo some modification concerning the essential nature of both women and religion. Religion needs to be reinvigorated by the introduction of a more manly element, and the prevailing type of womanliness would not be injured by a slight infusion of scepticism.

Prof. Swing, in a late sermon on "Public Morals," referred to the circumstances of Mrs. Stiles' death in illustration of the principle he wished to establish, that atheism in belief tended inevitably towards immorality in conduct. Where an exception was manifest, as in the case of Mrs. Stiles, whose rigorous truthfulness and upright life none questioned, the cause was due to the age in which she lived, and no special merit need be given to the principles she professed. A noble character, in short, when accompanied by what the Church calls atheistic views, is to be accredited, not to the nearer, but the remoter influences which have surrounded it. Prof. Swing can see only disproportion and inharmoniousness between infidelity and morality; and if it were possible in these days of intelligent disbelief to narrow one's conceptions of infidelity to that blatant self-conceit which distinguishes itself by that name, and of which history has furnished us an example in the French Revolution, then we might share his wonder, and join with him in a plaint of pity over a distorted life. We have to remember that the majority of those irreconcilables we call atheists are such chiefly by our implication. "Atheist" is a term which the religious world applies to one who does not accept its dogmas; but it is not therefore one which the irreligious world accepts. The professed atheist, the man who construes a creed out of his unbelief, is too hopelessly imbecile to represent anything but his own folly; and with such a one it is vain to look for the blossom of a wise and gracious spirit to spring out of the refuse-heap of old and cast-off opinions. But the atheism which is so-called because it refuses to utter convictions concerning things it knows nothing about, is precisely that mental state which leads to and produces the purest and highest morals. Atheism frequently means nothing worse than modesty in arriving at conclusions, and strict truthfulness in the utterance of them. To dogmatize is to tyrannize; and a devout expression of ignorance is as good a sign as we need require of that meek and lowly spirit which our Christian friends are ever beseeching us to cultivate.

It is to be hoped that the lesson contained in this little episode I have so poorly described will not be lost, and that all liberals especially will lay it to heart. Not that all liberals need follow the example of Gen. Stiles and dispense with all religious exercises, but that each should resort to them as a final consolation, in exact proportion as he has depended on them for support in life. The Orthodox seize upon the funeral as the occasion to emphasize the meaning of their creeds and tenets, and the liberal and radical should be no less anxious to improve that grand and final opportunity wherein they may testify in life's supremest trial what life's supremest joy has been.

REV. MR. WASHBURN ON THE REVERE CHURCH CASE.

REVERE, May 14, 1877.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Mr. — told me that you would like to know the facts in regard to the controversy in our Unitarian Church here. You have passed through a similar trial, and therefore can appreciate the situation. . . . The truth is, I am no more radical now than when I began preaching here in 1874. I have always been independent, never joining any religious body or organization. I did not unite with the Unitarian Church or with the American Unitarian Association when I was admitted to the Unitarian denomination by ordination. I was ordained without council, refusing to answer questions in regard to my theological belief. I was accepted without my religious faith being known. But in Ipswich I was as radical as I have ever been. I may express my thoughts differently, but I have essentially the same belief, theologically, that I had when ordained in Ipswich in 1870. The words which are printed and circulated here and elsewhere in order to "expose" me are as follows:—

"I believe that the Christian doctrines are false and injurious, and that they should be disproved and cut from our civilization. They deform it. Let us rid the world of worship of Jesus; of worship of the Bible; of the silly and nonsensical performances witnessed in Christian churches."

You will agree with me that there is nothing that deserves special criticism in the above from a radical standpoint; but Unitarians care more for the Christian name than for the Christian doctrines, and I must take the penalty decreed for all those who touch this sacred (?) name.

On Sunday, April 1st, our annual parish-meeting was held. A standing committee was chosen by a vote of four to one in favor of me. The minority withdrew, and petitioned a Justice of the Peace to call a legal meeting for April 15th, at which meeting another set of parish officers was elected. The following Sabbath this committee voted to close the church for repairs, which was accordingly done. We made no attempt to enter Sunday, April 22d; but the next Sunday services were held, we gaining admittance to the church by means of a duplicate key. When I entered the church, there were fourteen or fifteen persons in the vestibule, four being ladies. I crossed to one of the fly-doors, where I was seized by the coat-collar by the Justice of the Peace—who called the spurious meeting—who attempted to put me out of the building. I was holding on to the handle of the fly-door when he assaulted me, and in the struggle the door was pulled down. I had a book, my sermon, and an umbrella in my left hand and under my left arm, and kept hold of the handle of the door with my right hand. I did not touch the man who assaulted me. I had him brought before the Police Court of Chelsea a week ago Friday. He continued the case one week, and last Friday Judge Bates sentenced him to pay $10 and costs for assault. So much for that.

Tuesday, May 1st, we had a hearing before Judge Gray of the Supreme Court, who ruled that neither Parish Committee was legally chosen (we neglected to have our call for a meeting signed by the standing committee), and that the old committee held over from the last valid election, ten members of which are in my favor. On Sunday, May 5, we found the church windows barred, the doors and scuttles barricaded, and the key-hole filled with chips; but we surmounted these slight obstacles and preached at the usual hour. Yesterday the church was not fastened, so I guess the battle is about over.

The feelings of the people here can only be imagined. Insults and abuse are freely given, but, as we are in the right, we can afford to submit to such things.

It is a persecution which every man has to bear who tries to help the world forward. So far, the radicals are victorious, and we "hold the fort." . . .

Yours truly, L. K. WASHBURN.

THE SCIENCE OF UNIVERSOLOGY.

No. XI.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

Before dismissing the consideration of the God-idea, let me observe that the seeming contradictoriness of the equality, in a sense, and of the inequality, in another sense, of the pivotal or central point and the circum-stantial or environing points of a group, makes it a difficult conception; or a complex idea, such as simplicity of mental constitution is apt to find difficult. Hence an illustration is needed. We have a similar complexity in the American theory of the political constitution of society, in which it is held that inherently every citizen is the equal of every other citizen, while yet the man elected to any office is recognized as officially the superior of the others. The President of the United States is the pivotal man, the highest in rank, the supreme man in this sphere of affairs, and is duly and spontaneously honored as such, in the face of the opposite theory that all men are equal. The Catholic Church makes a similar discrimination between the official infallibility of the Pope, and his fallibility, in common with all other men, as an individual; and so of the official and the merely personal conduct, morally, of the priesthood.

The idea which was propounded in the preceding article, then, is that the theology of Jesus was, and that the true scientific theology is, that there is inherent equality, and even identity of character between God and Man; with an official difference of rank merely, resulting from the central position assigned to that which is inmost—the God-position—in the ideal constitution of universal things.

We may now take a step farther on, and affirm that there is still a third sense, in which it is alike philosophically legitimate to affirm the superiority and supremacy of Man over God, of the Human over the Divine. It is a bold proposition, considering existing theological prejudices, to affirm that God and Man are in any sense equal; and a bolder one to affirm that the true Man-idea is higher than the God-idea. Yet this is distinctly what I mean—but only in a given sense which shall be presently defined. It is distinctive of the scientific method that it discriminates different points of view; and adjusts whole ranges of thought to the given point of view from which they take their departure, countervailing oftentimes whole ranges of thought which are equally legitimate, from another and opposite point of view. In this manner the whole heavens may be viewed as we naturally (naturally) view them from our standing-point on the earth; or we may view them along with the astronomer—inverting the whole order—from the sun, as the sciento-ideal standing-point of observation.

In what sense then can it be said that Man is higher than God? Legitimately, scientifically, demonstrably, and undeniably so said? In that sense—whatever it may come to mean, when the analogies shall all be carried out—in which the Divine is higher than the Unitive; in which the Perispheric is higher than the Centric; in which Heterogeneity is higher than Homogeneity; in which Two is higher than One.

God is the eternal unchangeable one, τὸ εἷς of the old Greek philosophy; him in whom "there is no variableness nor shadow of turning"—in the Hebrew conception. Man, as the contrasted pole of the conception, is the Many, essential Variableness, Infinite Diversity—and that Infinite Variety in Unity which is the higher and the highest conception, embraces God and Man in their joint relationship; and "the scientific method in theology" authorizes us to inquire into and establish all the phases of that relationship.

To recur to the American theory of the political constitution of society. There is here also this third idea, announced and made distinctly emphatic; that the common citizen, or rather the many-headed public, is the superior, the true sovereign in relation to all so-called governors whatsoever; the true source of power, the supreme lodgment of authority. Per contra, the governor or officer of whatsoever rank is, from this point of view, the servant of the people. Government exists only for the people. This is the American doctrine, the Occidental doctrine, the modern doctrine, the advanced or progressive doctrine, technically, the scientismal doctrine. The people exist only for the government. That was and is the Asiatic doctrine, the Oriental doctrine, the ancient doctrine, the retrogressive or conservative doctrine; technically, the naturalismal doctrine.

Let me repeat then, that we have in America (and in a less pronounced way in Europe also) a mixed condition of affairs, an Asiatic and traditional theology, with an Occidental and partially scientized system of politics.

We have never heretofore had the American system of theology. Theology is merely the theoretical, political system of the universe. It is the theory of God's government of mankind (in the enlarged sense, including all "subordinate" rational existences). Theology and politics are therefore identical in essence, differing only in the sphere or domain of their application. They should, therefore, be in some sort of theoretical harmony with each other. But by the Asiatic and despotic conception, which as yet absolutely dominates all theological conceptions, Man exists solely "for the glory of God"; whereas, if the analogy of our Western political conceptions holds good, then God exists only for the well-being and happiness of the rational universe.

There is, however, a fourth aspect of the analogy which restores to God his supremacy; only, however, still, in a modified sense. It is again Jesus who furnishes the key-word to this new aspect of the great subject of personal relationships in these beautiful words: "He that would be greatest among you let him serve." In the sphere of service or uses, the official and governmental function is magnified; and so the American finds the way of honoring and glorifying the presidential function, while at the same time boasting of "the sovereign people," and proclaiming that "the governors are merely the servants of the people." There is nothing shocking from this point of view, in the idea of the duties of God.

In all this treatment of the subject, I have made no unauthorized or surreptitious assumption of the existence of God. As I have defined the God-idea, God must exist, and inevitably, therefore, does exist: first as an abstractable aspect of Universal Being; and afterwards, personally, in all pivotal personality, whether as manifested in Buddha, in Jesus, or elsewhere. The concreting or incarnation of abstract aspects or principles of being in the real, and so of the God-idea in actual personality is as philosophical as it is Orthodox.

But the worship of a personal God, or of incarnated God-hood, is merely an enlarged hero-worship. It is the worship or worthship, or the recognition of the worthship of superior and pivotal manhood. In this transitional and emphatically scientismal age (incidentally so), the tonic or key-note of opinion is the more and more absolute denial of hero-worship. Hence the idea of the personality of God suffers likewise,—an idea which dominated without question during the naturalism of the evolution of human life on the planet. When abstract principles shall have been fully vindicated as fundamental, and more governing than personality, another revolution will occur; and in and during the artismal, the long stretch of the "Paradise Regained," or of the "High Harmony" of the human career on the planet, hero-worship, in a modified sense, on the higher, critical, and discriminating plane, will return, and will, more thoroughly than ever, permeate the whole social structure. Every kind and variety of merit will be sought out, distinguished and honored, as embodying some abstract principle already abstractly recognized and appreciated. Gods many and lords many will constitute the true and truly divine aristocracy of that more blessed day; because in that day the only title to honorable office will be the greater capacity and willingness truly to serve. The necessity in us to worship, is merely the spontaneous urge in us, first to divine and then to discriminate the genuine superiorities of individual being.

The intuition divines and the reflective or scientific intellect discriminates. Allow me for a moment to intervene in the very able, lucid, and important discussion just now occurring between Mr. Gannett and Mr. Abbot on this matter of the intuition and the scientific intellect. The intuition (so it seems to me from the analogies) coincides with and repeats the senses. The etymology of the word indicates this. It means perception by the eye, but, representatively, direct perception by all the senses. We should have the word extinction for the use of the outer senses, and intuition for that of the inner senses. What the testimony of the intuition is good for may therefore best be inquired about by inquiring what the use of the senses amounts to, and in how far they are to be relied upon. Undoubtedly they go for something. They give us, except in cases of disease, a true testimony as to appearances, from that, whatever it is, which is the object of them; and for ordinary purposes we accept their testimony. But we learn by reflection on our farther experiences, that there is (at least often) a truth of appearance, and a truth of inference which are exactly opposite to each other; as expressed in the universal formula: ANTI-THETICAL REFLECTION OF INHERENCE AND APPEARANCE.

For example, in running along a coast in a boat, the coast seems to fly back from us, while we seem to be at rest; while yet precisely the opposite is the inherency of the truth of the subject. So we seem to see the sun rise, whereas we learn by astronomical study that just the contrary has happened; namely, that the eastern horizon has sunk to precisely the extent to which the sun seemed to have risen. We may now discriminate three stages of knowledge in respect to these facts. First, there is the natural stage, in which the simple, childlike, trusting mind accepts in good faith the testimony of the senses; or, internally, of the intuition. Second, there is the scientific stage, in which the primal testimony of the senses, having become suspect, is submitted to tests and convicted of fallacy, and the opposite statement is enthroned. And finally, there is the third or artistic stage, in which it is perceived that there is a kind and portion of truth contained in the primitive testimony of the senses, and another and counter-parting kind and portion of truth contained in the revisional verdict of the scientific intellect, and that the totality of the truth embraces and reconciles them both, while yet discriminating them most sharply, and assigning to each only that kind and degree of validity to which its true nature entitles it.

But—and herein is the supreme or governing character of the Scientific Method—this work of discrimination, and assignment of relative values (its own included) is exerted by the revisional action of scientism. It is as certain as that our heads are at the tops of our bodies, and not worn under our arms, that the intellect is the supreme faculty in man; and the sooner the world wakes up to the full recognition of this great truth, the sooner humanity will graduate out of its non-age and enter upon its adult and manly and final development. The case is not cited here as a mere rhetorical illustration, but as a true scientific analogy, and as an instance of that which will guide us into the totality of solutions, or in the words of Jesus, "into the knowledge of all truth."

Some startling results arise out of these views. First, it would seem that the special and awe-struck worship of God, as the back-lying source of things, the undifferentiated mental unity, the protoplasmal stage of mental evolution, the ideal one person out of whose generative loins came all the visible creations, and preëminently man or the rational universe,—that the supreme and continuous special worship of this undifferentiated unitive being belongs characteristically and specially to the infancy or primitive stage of mental evolution,—quite as children appreciate personality before they can recognize principles; and that it falls, therefore, legitimately, at a certain period into relative unimportance. It would then seem that in a second stage of mental evolution the category of Plurality (and the inter-relationship of parts) becomes, in an orderly way, paramount over the category of mere primal undifferentiated Unity, and that the business of the race for a term of time is to become acquainted with Laws and Principles; to lay aside its childish veneration of paramount personality; to discover, announce, and celebrate its own individual and distributed values, and to proclaim the equality of man with man, and logically of man with God also,—an atheistic age from the point of view of the old theology,—a religion in its own eyes, of the abstract truth, lead where it may. It would then again seem, that in a third stage of the same grand career of rational unfoldment, the pivotal personality idea will be again called in, under modification; principles will be recognized as embodied in persons, in an ascending hierarchy of diverse excellences; society will gather around some supreme pivot or group of pivots themselves pivoted; and the grand orchestral harmony of all human affairs will be evolved, with the cordial and devout rededication of so much of the primitive God idea and mystical worship, as the intuitions chastened and sifted by the intellect may then retain.

The God-idea is the pivot idea of universal being, or the rational pivotation of the universe; but, primarily, it is, still, indefinite pivot. It is the general, or rather universalized idea of centre, which may still be any or everywhere; for God, while inmost and central relatively to the totality of being, is, at the same instant, and in contradiction of that idea, endowed with the attribute of omnipresence. The God-idea is not, therefore, the idea of any determinate or fixed centre.

The idea is, hence the homogenism, and the indeterminate homogenism of the universal rational conception. Man, on the other hand, that is to say, the multiplicity of individual beings, is the heterogenism and the determinate heterogenism of this same universal rational conception. Man is mathematically definite. A census of mankind is among the practical possibilities; but the census of the God-idea has proved to be impossible; hence Polytheism, Trinitarianism, Unitarianism, as different aspects of the homogenoid and indefinite truth in this behalf. The higher development of the God-idea tends, however, towards and ends upon the unit; as the higher development of the Man-idea tends toward multiplicity, or rich abundance of population, culminating in "the innumerable hosts of heaven." Fewness is the Divine, and Manyness is the Human pole of the Numerism (the universal domain of number). The struggle between the Triune and the Unit is the finality, as yet attained to, of the theological contest.

Now nothing is more familiar at our day among thinkers, than the Spencerian generalization of evolution, which I abridge, for the moment, into the formula of: A change from an indefinite homogeneity to a definite heterogeneity. We have only to glance at the connections to perceive that the true and necessary order of the evolution of the universal rational conception is from the predominance of the God-idea to the predominance of the Human idea in the unfoldment of social opinion and affairs. Another glance at the actual state of the world will show the same thing. There is, however, the ulterior third stage of reconvergence and reconciliation unnoted by Spencer, unless we find it implicitly contained in the meaning of the word "coherent" which I have omitted from the formula.

THE MOTTO "IN GOD WE TRUST."

Boston, May 9, 1877.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Can you tell who is responsible for the "In God we trust" found on our coins from the nickel five-cent piece, upwards? It is even found on the copper two-cent pieces.

Was it ordered by act of Congress, or is it the work of some Evangelical Secretary? "No Trust" used to be a good motto for monetary matters. Why is this thus? ANXIOUS INQUIRER.

[The Christian Statesman of July 22, 1876, is our authority for stating that Rev. Dr. H. A. Boardman, of Philadelphia, preached a sermon in that city on Sept. 14, 1862, in which he lamented that "the coinage of the United States is without a God"; that soon after Director Pollock, of the United States Mint, with the help of Secretary Chase, procured the passage of an act of Congress declaring that "the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may cause the motto 'In God we trust' to be inscribed upon such coins as shall admit of such motto"; and that this clause remains in the revised Mint laws of 1873. We are sorry to say that the Centennial Congress of Liberals, not being aware of these facts, passed a resolution condemning the Director of the Mint for exceeding his legal authority in this matter, and that its condemnation was so far unjust. It is due to the Congress to add that we are personally responsible for the presentation of this unjust resolution, which was founded on erroneous information sent to us from Washington by a government employé. It is needless to state that we greatly regret the injustice which we thus unwittingly helped to commit, but which we hope at some time to be able to repair at least to some extent. The danger of trusting to second-hand statements has been painfully illustrated in this matter, but we should be ashamed not to retract a charge which proves to have been unjust.—ED.]

A HINT.

Already Mr. Cook has spoken many times against Theodore Parker in his Monday course of lectures. He has an inalienable right, which no radical is likely to dispute, to choose his own subjects, and dead antagonists; but he forcibly reminds me of the old story of a man who was found vehemently beating a dead dog, and who, being asked why he was doing so, paused with the sweat rolling down his face and replied: "I want to let him know there's a punishment after death!"

Now Parker is dead, and cannot profit by or defend himself against Mr. Cook's criticisms; and moreover, he has left many friends and relatives who may be "deeply pained" by Mr. Cook's utterances, which seem therefore hardly magnanimous. But there is in this city an astute little editor who has some reputation in metaphysics—Mr. Cook's own forte,—and who, in spite of the hard winter, I believe, is not yet quite dead. Few care for him! Why could not a public controversy be arranged to be held between these two for the holy sake of truth? The writer (who takes on himself the sole responsibility of this hint) would be glad to subscribe according to his means. X.

HOW TO HELP.

PASSAIC, N. J., May 9, 1877.

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Sir,—May I suggest to the subscribers of THE INDEX, and especially to those who desire to see it constantly improved, that each one take sufficient interest in the matter to cut out and send to you any and all newspaper articles which he or she, if editor, would make use of, in whole or in part, in making up the paper from week to week? In this way all may help to keep the editor fully-informed about passing events interesting to freethinkers.

Yours truly,

F. A. ANGELL.

[This is a suggestion directly in the line of our own wishes. It is always a great favor to receive such extracts, especially when accompanied with the name and date of the paper. Mr. Angell himself has often rendered us the kind service he recommends, for which we seize this opportunity of cordially thanking him.—ED.]

A WELL-KNOWN bank president of Worcester, according to the Gazette, remarked on hearing of the bank robbery at Northampton: "I'm sick of this rascally world. Don't want to see or do business with anybody. I'd rather be an old farmer, living on a cross road, four miles from the sight of everybody, with a barrel of cider and two hogs, than to have anything to do with banks, money, or men."

EXTRACTS FROM "GERM THOUGHTS."

1. Whatever pain there may be in the performance of a duty, there will be more in the neglect of it.
2. When our interests lie in a certain direction, how ingenious we are in making our reasoning follow it!
3. Intemperance is alike injurious to the health, the understanding, and the fortune.
4. If half the pains and expense were bestowed to keep men out of jail that are bestowed to get and keep them in, what would society be?
5. In teaching, pay the most attention to the worst pupils. Then you will have no bad ones.
6. Knowledge is useful, because we cannot do without knowledge.
7. Think, know, and act.
8. Since women are the friends and companions of men, their education ought to be as similar as possible. Educate women and men in the same manner.
9. Whether it is better to estimate a man's merit by the number of his friends or enemies?
10. It is of the utmost consequence to educate children in simplicity of food. Early tastes can never be eradicated.
11. No man is qualified for an occupation when he commences it.
12. The secret of education is to know how children feel and think.
13. Is it not better that a nation should stand high in prudence, morals, courage, and honor, than that it should be eminent in sciences, arts, and letters?
14. We always think pleasure short, and pain long.
15. A good education is the sure and infallible step to happiness. A bad one must lead to misery.
16. Wisdom and virtue are habits, and folly and vice are nothing more.
17. Ignorant virtue is better than knowing vice.
18. I am convinced that many idiots are idiots by education, or rather by non-education, just as the use of many a limb is lost for want of exercise, or by improper treatment.
19. "An idiot," says Helvetius, "is a person without memory." And "the art of memory," says Johnson, "is the art of attention." Therefore to give a person observation is to make him not an idiot.
20. Can it be just to condemn an individual to death for a crime which is the certain result of a bad education?
21. A good education means good learning, good knowledge, good power of both body and mind.
22. I would not allow any man to teach my son who would not acknowledge that every cause produces an effect, which few school-masters do allow.
23. The resources of the nation, if the nation knew how to employ them, are sufficient to check crime, empty the jails, give employment to the poor, and put all things to rights in a few years. Our wise-men have been told and believe that all this crime and punishment are the necessary results of the "original depravity of human nature." They are the results of nothing but ignorance and apathy.
24. War is better than slavery.
25. The legislature is to the nation what a parent is to his family,—bound to protect, feed, and instruct every member of it.
26. We think our education begins only when we are sent to school. A fatal mistake this! But it saves a world of trouble to lazy parents.
27. A fop dresses as if the whole of his merit was in his outside.
28. Most men are such slaves to habit and circumstance, that they are compelled to remain in the road to misery. It is the philosopher alone who emancipates himself, turns round, and takes the direct road to happiness.
29. The science of morals is as exact as the science of geometry; otherwise it were a pity.
30. A man's real wants, like his real magnitude, are but little. Why should his desires be so boundless?
31. Man has no power over his birth nor over his death. Has he any over his life? But little.
32. The human mind is so constituted that it can make reasonable and pleasant progress with reasonable and pleasant instruction.
33. How can men who have passed their time in schools and colleges know the human mind, or institute judicious modes of discipline?
34. Teach your pupils obedience in action, and freedom in thought.
35. If an important truth is advanced, it is of no consequence to society who is the advancer.
36. Theologians maintain that the virtuous are miserable in this world in order to be happy in the next, and that the vicious are happy in this world to be punished in the next. These men are certainly very profound, but there is neither sense nor utility in this. Why not permit the virtuous to be rewarded here as well as hereafter? This life is at least as certain as the next. Besides, the whole doctrine is absurd,—an encouragement to knaves, and a discouragement to honest men.
37. Some men are merely reflective; others are merely exertive. The perfect character is both.
38. Wars are the lawsuits of nations; kings and statesmen are the lawyers, who always take care to exact large fees.
39. Men in every age have known more than they have practised.
40. The whole system of some theologians is a scheme of selfishness and injustice. An infinite reward for a finite merit, and for a finite offence, an infinite punishment.
41. Mind can no more be said to exist without body than motion can exist independent of matter.
42. Truth is a moral pressure to which error must yield, if the pressure be long enough continued.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " "
 " 26 " 51 " 6 " "
 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tarrytown, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.20 for one year, including postage, or 80 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. THEODORE PARKER:

A Biography. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. With Heliotype Portrait. 1 vol. 8vo. $3.00.

An exceedingly interesting memorial of a very remarkable man—one of the striking figures in American history. Mr. Frothingham has given a large number of Parker's letters and journals not previously published; he has written in the light reflected upon Parker's words and efforts by the momentous events of the last fifteen years, which have brought out in bold relief the sagacity, wisdom, and heroism of Theodore Parker's career; and he has written so candidly, and with so profound an appreciation of Parker's characteristic qualities, that his book is of surpassing interest.

The NEW YORK TRIBUNE closes a four and a half column review of this book by saying: "It holds up a remarkable specimen of robust manliness whose form and lineaments can be studied with equal advantage by friend and foe."

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

ATTRACTIVE ORNAMENT

In any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.

2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.

3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.

4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.

5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.

6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.

7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."

8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.

9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.

10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.

11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.

12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practicing the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.

13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental ideas on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT: PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

"AN OBSCURE INFIDEL SHEET" demurely suggests to His Lectureship that he petition the Legislature for a change of name, and hereafter advertise himself as the Rev. Joseph Cock; for of all the chanticleers that ever crowed, none croweth so "cockily" as he.

GAIL HAMILTON declares that Mrs. Grant was "as innocent of crimps" as Mrs. Hayes is, but "nobody ever founded a Young Women's Christian Association on it." Gail is saucy but shrewd. She sees the greedy avidity of the Evangelicals to turn Mrs. Hayes' weak fanaticisms to their own account.

THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT pays to the Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish clergy salaries amounting to over $10,000,000 annually. But the Ultramontanes take their orders from the Pope, and now threaten the destruction of the French Republic to gratify Jesuit ambition. No wonder that Gambetta has warned the nation against the "clerical policy."

SIGNATURES to the Religious Freedom Amendment Petition have been received as follows since our last acknowledgment: from Mr. Karl Schemann, Detroit, Mich., 217; from Mr. Werner Opes, Morrow, O., 74; from Mr. Seth N. Allen, Maple Rapids, Mich., 30; Dr. I. Kanla, New Ulm, Minn., 88; Mr. Almond Owen, Milwaukee, Wis., 68; Mr. Edw. Aschermann, Milwaukee, Wis., 114. Total thus far received—5,935.

THE ATTITUDE of the Russian government on the question of the freedom of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles strikingly resembles that of our own government on the emancipation question at the outbreak of the Civil war. Congress and President at first disavowed all intention of interfering with slavery, but ended by abolishing it; Russia disavows all intention of meddling with Constantinople, but (if she conquers) will end probably by seizing it.

LIBERALISM is evidently not unknown in Australia, since Brisbane has a "Freethought Association." Mr. Gavin Pettigrew not long since read before this society a very thoughtful and radical lecture on "The Divine Being"; but the Brisbane Telegraph, which published it in its issue of March 17, could not give it to the public except as an "advertisement," whence it may safely be inferred that Orthodoxy is so strong in Australia as to require propitiation.

THE PRESBYTERIAN General Assembly at Chicago has ventured to grapple with destiny so far as to condemn Sunday newspapers. But there is food for thought in the spectacle of Orthodoxy deliberately following the Pope in an aggressive warfare against modern civilization. Civilization will win in the end, but only because Evangelicalism is plotting a political Syllabus which will at last force Liberalism into organized political opposition. It is the bull and the locomotive over again.

CARDINAL McCLOSKEY recently confirmed 850 children at the New York Catholic Protectory,—to which, by the way, we believe the New York courts are in the habit of consigning vagrant or shelterless children, and where the fate that awaits them is sufficiently indicated by the above "850." After the confirmation, there was a dinner; and Colonel Frederick A. Conkling made a speech. Here it is, unabridged: "Born and bred in the Protestant faith, Mr. President, I wish to tender you my sincere thanks for the honor you have conferred upon me in inviting me to witness the solemn and beautiful rite which has just taken place in the chapel. I esteem it an especial honor to be present on an occasion graced by the ecclesiastical Prince. It has always seemed to me that Protestants and Roman Catholics ought to live together in perfect amity, especially in this country, built up by the blood and sweat of all races of men, belonging to no one and to all. It has always seemed to me that the great mission of our country was to teach the world that all men are brothers. The present seems a proper occasion for recalling the fact that in the organic law of our country the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without distinction shall be forever allowed to all mankind. It is not religious toleration, but religious equality. And this leads me to say that the first law ever enacted in America to confer religious freedom was enacted in the Roman Catholic colony of Maryland. And now, sir, Protestant as I am, I must say that this law was enacted when the Puritans were hanging or banishing Quakers and Baptists, or selling them into slavery in the West India islands. It was enacted in 1634 that 'no one in the province professing belief in Jesus Christ shall be in any way troubled, molested, or discountenanced for his or her religion, or in the free exercise thereof.' It seems to me, sir, that the time has arrived in this world's history when all men professing the name of Jesus Christ should unite in one great effort to put down infidelity. The danger is not from Protestantism or Romanism, but from infidelity. It has one class of philosophers teaching that God has no cognizance of us, and others that the highest state of spiritual and intellectual development interferes with the natural ties, or that we are half brothers to the monkeys and gorillas. I thank the Roman Catholic Church for setting its seal of condemnation upon these shameful utterances. Confessing one law, one baptism, and one faith, I stand here and will stand everywhere ready to extend the right hand of fellowship to every man of the Roman Catholic Church." The born-and-bred "Protestant" swells with pride at dining with an "ecclesiastical Prince," the legitimacy of whose title he recognizes and salutes; he concedes to Catholicism the glory of conferring religious freedom on his native land, and virtuously punishes the Puritans for their tyranny over men's consciences; he proclaims "not toleration, but religious equality," and straightway urges a combined crusade of Catholics and Protestants to "put down infidelity"! The utter absence of all toadyism, inconsistency, and cunning side-glances at Catholic votes, is a beautiful trait of this eloquent speech; it exhibits the Colonel's character in a most charming light, and shows us all how impossible it is for a politician to pay the least heed to ecclesiastical influences of a dangerous character.

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, undilatingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

The "Modern Symposium."

BY AN ENGLISH LADY.

"When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war."

In this "Modern Symposium," presented to us in the Nineteenth Century, Sir James Fitz-James Stephen leads the debate on "The Influence upon Morality of a Decline in Religious Belief." As the champion of the Aristotelian philosophy, "that virtue is the law of our nature under which we are born," Sir James proceeds to combat the theological view of morality,—the view held and expressed by Canon Farrar in his Life of Christ, that "atheism in belief is followed, as it always has been, by degradation of morals." With all due deference to the editor of the Nineteenth Century, "The Influence upon Morality of a Decline in Religious Belief" is a misleading basis on which to argue the question of the hour; namely, what Mr. W. H. Greg has called "the police influence of Christianity."

Religious belief is a very chameleon amongst nations; and, in order to prove its influence on morality, we must necessarily extend our researches far beyond what strikes us as the stand-point in this modern symposium; that is to say, "the influence upon morality of a decline in Christian belief." The influence upon morality exercised by religious belief can only be brought to the bar where a universal system of morality prevails, influenced by a universal religious belief. Judaism, Buddhism, Confucianism, Pantheism, Deism, Theism, Atheism, have each severally influenced the moral training of such as held these beliefs; hence they have moral codes as diverse as the creeds or theologies that influence them. Were we able to judge of the effect on the morality of mankind, say of the universal belief in demon worship, on its decline we should be able to pronounce as to the influence such decline exercised on morality.

Sir James Stephen opens the debate thus: "Many persons regard anything which tends to discredit theology with disapprobation because they think all such speculations must endanger morality as well. Others assert that morality has a basis of its own in human nature, and that, even if all theological belief were exploded, morality would remain unaffected." This is the Aristotelian theory, "that we are endowed with a moral sense or perception of moral beauty" irrespective of religious beliefs.

As a proof that different theological beliefs variously affect moral codes, Sir James Stephen instances the Hindoo and Christian variety of belief in the future fate of humanity,—"annihilation as the highest good; or that the earth is the Lord's and all that therein is,—the round world, and they that dwell therein."

Theology is, properly speaking, the scholasticism of religion,—religion which per se is a sentiment, a feeling, an inspiration,—as M. Renan calls it "the ideal." Under the influence of schoolmen, priests, and what are termed Christian philosophers, this aspiration of the soul towards an unknown perfection has been hardened into a set of dogmas, creeds, and rituals called theology, or the science of religion. But as religion is not a fact, but a feeling, it is not capable of being formulated into a science. It is the attempt so to formulate it which has resulted in this dreadful incubus, dogmatic theology, pressing down the glorious free instincts of the soul for liberty,—liberty to rise unfettered towards what M. Paul Janet calls "ce but supreme que nous devons toujours nous efforcer d'atteindre, en un mot La Perfection." This is also the key-note of the great Confucian code of morality, summed up in the "King of Books" as "the whole duty of man."

And on this understanding religion must influence morality; but only under this aspect can it worthily do so. In his fine eulogium on Spinoza, at the unveiling of his statue at the Hague, M. Renan thus addressed the Hollanders: "Here we have religion producing freethought as part of piety; religion in a system such as this is not a portion of life,—it is life itself. That which is seen to matter here is not the being in possession of some metaphysical phrases more or less correct; it is the giving to one's life a sure pole, a supreme direction,—the ideal." No doubt to all this there is a transcendental side, as when M. Renan says, "The ideal remains the soul of the world, the permanent God, the primordial, efficient, and final cause of this universe," we know he is Platonizing. This was the Greek Transcendentalism; but in such a mind as that of Spinoza extremes may safely meet; and this so-called "prince of atheists" was entirely Aristotelian when he said, "Whatever accords with reason is in my belief most favorable to the practice of virtue."

Sir James Stephen says, "Morality is good, if it is founded on a true estimate of the consequences of human action; but, if it is founded on a false theology, it is founded on a false estimate of the consequences of human action; and so far as that is the case it cannot be good; and the circumstance that it is supported by the theology to which it refers is an argument against and not in favor of that theology." It is on this account that all who are interested in the progress of the race launch the dart of criticism, keen and unflinching, against those beliefs and theologies which are likely to lead to a false estimate concerning morality, and so, in place of raising and strengthening the human soul, debase it, reduce its morale to that vacillating state of despicable cowardice described by the unscrupulous Lady Macbeth, when she likens her hesitating partner in guilt to "the poor cat" the adage, that lets I dare not wait upon I would."

To prove how dangerous a factor theology is as the groundwork of morality, we would point to The Bible and its Interpreters, by the Rev. Prebendary Irons, who thus refers to the tenet of "universalism" contra everlasting damnation. "This possibility of endless ruin for some is undeniable by a rational believer in God; the deniers of this doctrine must in reason and consistency deny the possibility of both virtue and vice, and overthrow the foundations of all morals." As "universalism" is a prevalent doctrine of the day, both with the Church and non-conformity, those who hold it will see how Prebendary Troun considers them as "irrational believers in God or in any morality, as those who would deny the possibility of virtue and overthrow the foundations of morality." All we can say is to the teaching of this religion of fear, so much the worse for the rational believer in God; though, with Dr. Irons, we quite maintain that Orthodox Christians cannot escape the necessity of accepting this gospel assertion of "endless ruin for some," which to set aside is, he says, "to affect very vitally all our interests in religious matters." Dr. Troun points out "that if the promise is for endless joy, the penalty must be endless misery." He quotes as "the great body of our teachers who consent to this doctrine, St. Paul to Augustine, Gregory, Anselm, Bernard, Bossuet, and Irons." All these were great and good men, with noble intellects much nobler than their creed, of whom Spinoza says, "that this manner of seeking heaven is contrary to reason, and that there is an absurdity in pretending to gain God's favor by avowing to him, that did one not dread him, one would not love him."

Lord Selborne follows our modern Aristotle; and though we cannot take him entirely as the Plato of the "symposium," still his philosophy is decidedly more Platonic than that of his adversary. He begins his paper with a postulate that at once challenges criticism; namely, "that morality has not flourished amongst civilized or uncivilized men when their religious belief has been generally lost or utterly debased." Lord Selborne cites the modern Hindoos and Chinese as races who are civilized but not moral,—not moral according to the Selbornian creed,—that is all. And here again is evidence that our philosophers are examining this question from the stand-point of Christian morals, not morality in the abstract. We need only refer to Sir John Lubbock to learn that the ethics of morality vary as much amongst nations as their outer man varies, as Africans from Saxons.

Hindoo morality is certainly not based on Christian theology, any more than is Lord Selborne's on Confucianism. If, as Aristotle holds, "virtue is based on the natural capacities of the human soul acting under the guidance of deliberate preference or moral principle, it is this power that should guide us in our religious beliefs rather than be guided by them. Lord Selborne claims as due to Christianity the principles of love, benevolence, humility, self-abnegation. Then how comes it that these so-called Christian virtues flourished in high perfection (to go no further back) more than four hundred years before Christ was heard of? How is it that amongst the philosophers of the Greek Symposium of that era we find amongst others Zeno inculcating such tenets as these?—"That virtue was the chief good of man and its own reward; that men should exercise the greatest kindness and benevolence to each other; that riches were not to be put in comparison with the attainments of the mind; like Aristotle, Zeno taught the necessity of entire command over the passions and feelings." This teaching was not the result of Christianity, any more than was that of Plato when he discoursed on the immutability of Providence, the necessity of piety, and the immortality of the soul. To what more sublime height of self-abnegation has any one ever attained than Plato's master, the immortal Socrates, who, with no hope of heavenly rewards, no assured glimpses of Paradise beyond, calmly accepted death at the hands of his countrymen as the reward for turning men from evil to good; and not only accepted death with resignation, but could thus reconcile to it his indignant and sorrowful friends and disciples,—"It may be that God through his goodness hath appointed for me not only that my life should terminate at a time which seems most reasonable, but the manner in which it seems most eligible." In this humility and self-abnegation of Socrates, not urged thereto by gospel promises of "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord,"—we have surely a case in point of the result of high moral training by the light of "that involuntary impulse of the soul,—virtue."

Lord Selborne, doubtless recalling to mind a remarkable article of last spring in the Fortnightly, "Agnosticism,"—refers to the "Agnostic Epicurean Materialism" as inducing a state of morals "described by St. Paul in the first chapters of the Epistle to the Romans, and which also prevailed all along the shores of the Mediterranean Sea where religion had equally lost its influence." Lord Selborne thinks this Epicurean Agnostic Materialism "hardly distinguishable from that sort of philosophy some people think designed to supplant religious belief in the present day." Now, though Epicurean has degenerated into a term for pleasure not of the highest order, Epicurus himself, the founder of the sect, was one of the Stoic philosophers of whom we read: "His sweetness of manner and great assiduity procured general reception for his philosophy, the principle of which was, that happiness or the sovereign good consisted in the pleasures of virtue and in health of body." So Mr. Leslie Stephen may take heart of grace that his "Agnosticism," low, if Epicurean, as Lord Selborne implies, is none the worse for that.

Spinoza mentions that "in his life Epicurus was truly exemplary, and that his disciples lived in great concord." What is there debasing, may we ask Lord Selborne, in the morality that teaches "happiness or the sovereign good consists in the pleasures of virtue"? This is the Aristotelian and also Socratic doctrine. Our modern utilitarian philosophers may be said to have made a step in advance of this, who consider as the chief good to be sought, "the happiness of the greatest number." But we cannot expect the champions of Christian theology to accept these Pagan views on "happiness," either as an individual good or a public good; for one evil amongst many resulting from its unnatural philosophy has been transcendental asceticism, stifling the natural healthy instincts of life under the cowl of the monk or the solemn garb of the Puritan.

All that is good in Christian ethics is borrowed and adapted from older and worthier sources; but for practical morality, the morality that shall conduce to the well-being and well-doing of the State and of the people, there is none. It is not the happiness but the misery of the greatest number, that has resulted from the propagation of a "religious belief," which, as its author said, would break up all social ties, would set children against parents, and brothers against sisters; a "religious belief" the very essence of which is selfishness, and its highest impulses prompted by the slavish fear of hell-fire, or the possible joys of an insipid heaven.

Nothing, we think, can better illustrate the contrasted effects of natural morality and theological morality than the pages of Miss Martineau's autobiography, lately given to the world. There we see the painful results of the morality of fear, not "founded on a true estimate of the consequences of human actions," which wrought upon her disposition like a malevolent influence, a morality founded on the religious belief which "represents God the predestinator of man to sin and perdition, and Christ as the rescuer from that doom, in which scheme perdition is made out to be justice, and redemption mercy," and that other moral light which came to her when, to use her own words, "casting off all the trammels of teaching and association, I went out a free rover on the breezy common of the universe."

Prof. Clifford is certainly the Lucretius of this modern Symposium. He boldly ignores all isms, and, indorsing the Aristotelian maxim that "virtue is a habit of the soul" and to be cultivated by the light of right reason, contends "that what really affects morality is not religious belief, but a practice which in some times and places is thought to be religious; namely, the practice of submitting human life to clerical control." Our Lucretius takes all religious beliefs as theories, and on the ground that no historical proof exists for the truth of any, surely theory is the only correct word to apply to these ignes fatui of the mind.

Dr. Martineau's theistic theory, to which Prof. Clifford replies, is "that the genesis of conscience, be it what it may, speaks with a voice before which our whole personality bows, and which equally gives laws to other men, and that it issues from a source transcending human life and infusing into it a moral order from a more comprehensive sphere. It postulates a will in common with ours, and administers this world as a school of character." Further we are told in support of the theistic theory, "that to believe in an ever-living and perfect mind supreme over the universe is to invest moral distinctions with immensity and eternity, and lift them from the provincial stage of human society to the imperishable theatre of all being."

Prof. Clifford, while cordially assenting that "the sense of duty in man, or what Dr. Martineau terms 'the genesis of conscience' is the prompting of a self other than his own," maintains "that the great majority of mankind, while acknowledging the existence of divine beings, and their influence in the government of the world, have yet sought the spring and sanction of duty in something above and beyond the gods." Referring to "that vast body of dissent, Brahminism, Buddhism, and the moral system of Confucianism," Lucretius asks, "If such a fact as this may not give us just reason to inquire if there is anything unsatisfactory in the theory which represents the voice of conscience as the voice of God?" According to Dr. Martineau, "though the decay of religious belief may leave the institutes of morality intact, it would draw off their inward power." In this case, the "inward power" of morality must, in direct opposition to the Aristotelian philosophy, depend on religious belief, and not on the natural capacity of the human soul for following the dictates of its best energy, virtue. To say, adds Prof. Clifford, "that theistic belief is a comfort and a solace, and to say it is the crown or coping-stone of morality, these are different things. For in what way shall belief in God strengthen my sense of duty? He is a great one, working for the right. But I already know so many, and I know these so well. The essence of their goodness is the losing of the individual self in another and a wider self." Yes, those other great ones, working for the right under other conditions than this all-powerful, all-knowing, self-centred Deity; those who, wanting in perfect righteousness, perfect knowledge, and perfect power, yet leap into the dim but glorious arena of perpetual strife against those unseen powers of darkness whose chief is Ignorance, there to combat not for the perfecting of self, but for that more noble and righteous end, the progress of humanity, on whose banner is inscribed, "Nature's sacred watchwords, Truth, Liberty, and Love,"—this view is expressed in the paper contributed by Mr. Frederick Harrison, the disciple of Comte, the believer in humanitarism versus theologism. In opposition to the modern theistic and certainly transcendental school, Mr. Harrison acknowledges a religion "of which the creed shall be science, of which the faith, hope, and charity shall be real and not transcendental, earthly and not heavenly,—a religion in a word which is entirely human in its evidences, in its sanctions, and appeals."

This is Mr. Harrison's view of the practical working out, for the good of humanity, of the religious sentiment or aspiration towards perfection with which he credits human nature, as opposed to the theory we are combating, that theology or religious belief is the root of morality. He says, "There is a spirit within us which will not believe that to know and to do the right we must wait until the mysteries of existence and the universe are solved,—its origin, its government, its future. To make right conduct a corollary of theological creed is not only contrary to fact, but shocking to our self-respect." As we are reminded by Mr. Holbeach, "there never was a time when the worm-like dread of punishment began to wriggle upwards into something like conscience. By no fire of the imagination can you lift that celestial jewel out of the crucible into which you have dropped only the fear of pain or desire of pleasure." That Christianity does make right conduct a corollary of its theology is evidently Lord Selborne's opinion when he says, "Notwithstanding all its drawbacks, Christianity is the great moral power of the world"; and Dr. Martineau, while arguing for the power of theism as the source of morality, declares that "on a decay of belief in the Christian religion, morality would lose not its base but its summit." Theism then, or belief in one God, is the basis of morality; and we have to seek its summit or perfect exposition in Christianity or belief in three Gods! For to this must the logic of Christian Utilitarianism come; it may be possible to this transcendental school to explain their ideal of Christianity as "the casket of all that is precious in our religious antecedents"; but if the casket does not contain the gem it is only a worthless deception, and valueless.

So far does Dr. Martineau idealize Christianity from his inner consciousness of what he would have it, that he tells us, "Christian ethics are true to human life and the expression of right reason; that the moral code that would emerge from the labors of a mere philosopher need not consequently differ from that recognized by a Christian. Perhaps not, if we take the Greek philosophy of Christianity, which we need not say is by Orthodox Christians totally ignored, and for having been tainted with which the learned Fathers of the Church, Origen, Justin Martyr, Clemens Alexandrinus, and others, were cited for heresy. No; that noble band of philosophical speculators even so theistic as Zenophanes, who said, "There is one mightiest God among gods and men, like to mortals neither in body nor in mind," with his successors, Parmenides and Zeno, down to the later school we have been considering, the Socratic, are once and all spoken of by Orthodox Christians as "godless heathen."

It is from its most logical and consistent exponent, the Church of Rome, that Christianity must be judged of as a moral power for good or evil. Dr. Martineau, who brackets the moral code of the philosopher with the Christian code, is surely doing injustice to both! When we read, "The moral characteristics of the Christian temper are nothing but the natural posture of the mind, standing face to face with the highest ideals of its conscience and its love," then occurs the question, What need of a revelation from God to induce mankind to adopt "the natural posture of the mind"? Prof. Clifford says, "If men learn the nature of God from the moral sense of man, they cannot long go on believing the doctrines of popular theology." Consequently, popular theology and the moral sense of man must to his thinking be strangely at variance on this vital point, "the highest ideals of its conscience and its love!"

Man's moral sense must be antagonistic to the nature of God, or popular theology is. That Prof. Clifford estimates to the full the moral power for good or evil of Orthodox sacerdotal Christianity is evident from his concluding remarks: "The system which sapped the foundation of patriotism in the Old World; which well nigh eradicated the sense of intellectual honesty, and seriously weakened the habit of truth-telling; which lowered men's reverence for the marriage bond, by placing its sanctities in a realm outside of Nature instead of in the common life of men, and by the institution of monasticism and a celibate clergy stunted the moral sense of the nations, by putting a priest between every man and his conscience,—this system, if it should ever return (and we may say in part it has always been with us), must be expected to produce worse evils than those which it has worked in the past."

We challenge those who hold that Christianity is "the highest moral power for good in the world" to demonstrate that the state here depicted as the outcome of Christian belief, is not founded on fact; that it is not the inevitable result of having given up what Aristotle and his school term the "highest faculty of the soul" in bondage to the supernatural; namely, our reason and our intellect, through which alone can moral excellence be perfected. In his "Hymn to Intellectual Beauty," Shelley says,—
"No voice from some sublimer world hath ever
To sage or poet these responses given;
Therefore the names of demon, ghost, and heaven
Remain the records of their vain endeavor;
Fairy spells, whose uttered charm might not avail to sever
From all we hear and all we see
Doubt, chance, and mutability.
Thy light alone, like mist o'er mountain driven,
Or music by the night wind sent
Through strings of some old instrument,
Or moonlight on a midnight stream,
Gives grace and truth to life's unquiet dream."

And not in vain does Shelley deify "Intellect" as our guide to those higher truths which religion fails to acquaint us with.

Prof. Ferrier, in his dissertation on "Truth Relative and Truth Absolute," maintains that, "In virtue of the faculty common to man, intelligence, he is capable of apprehending absolute truth; and that in virtue of the bond between supreme intelligence and human intelligence, if there is absolute truth, it is to be attained by human intelligence." According to this, what better can we do than cultivate this antagonist of creeds, our intellect? Who more likely to lead us in the right way than those bright intelligences of old, the sages of Greece and Rome, who made the search for "absolute truth" the rule of life, in pursuing that philosophy which has for its aim and end "truth as it exists for all intelligence"?

We are constantly reminded by religious teachers that the human mind and the supreme mind have nothing in common; that to attempt to find out the truth about God is impious. We cannot understand it; therefore we must be content to believe by faith all we are told,—faith, the essence of which consists in saying we believe something about which we know nothing. But Prof. Ferrier says that "even on religious grounds, this unity between supreme and human intelligence might be much more largely insisted on as constituting the very bond, the only bond between the Creator and the creature."

Moreover, Messieurs les philosophes Chrétiens, "deny the connection between the divine and human reason, and you destroy the very possibility of religion."

One of the chief of our transcendental philosophers of the day, Matthew Arnold, recognizes the perilous divorce between religious teaching and "the scientific sense in man,—that sense which seeks exact knowledge, and which has never asserted its claims so strongly as at the present time."

Whether Christianity, viewed by the light of "that sense in man which seeks exact knowledge," could bear the test of all truth, "philosophic research," is not to Christians only the most important of problems. By this test must it stand or fall as a revelation from supreme intelligence to the human intelligence; upon the result of that crucial question—Is Christianity the outcome of supreme intelligence?—rests man's belief in God as he is there represented. Whether it be the Christianity of Rome or England, au fond, both claim that it is the last, best revelation from God to man, a revelation that we have in these pages dared to question as having its source in divinity, or the "supreme intelligence," and to dispute with its champions its claim to be the "greatest moral power for good in the world."

[FOR THE INDEX.]

MORALS AND FREETHOUGHT.

BY J. L. STODDARD.

Has it never been your experience, fellow Radical, to find yourself or others exposed to the charge of immorality, for the simple reason that you and they are not believers in many of the Orthodox dogmas? Have you never been pained to hear breathed against the moral character of some noble man insinuations, the cause of which has proved upon inquiry to be nothing more than his disbelief in Jesus or in the inspiration of the Bible? If so, you have been more fortunate than I. This irrational style of speaking is, it is true, not commonly indulged in by the most intelligent and liberal of the Orthodox party; but among the majority of believers in Evangelical dogmas there certainly exists a strong prejudice against Freethinkers to the effect that they are actuated by no lofty, moral principles. The absurdity of this prejudice, when applied to the men and women who compose the Radicals of this and other countries, is seen from the fact that the facility with which the stigma of immorality is attached to their names, usually varies inversely as does the personal acquaintance between the maligners and maligned. That is to say, the less the private life and character of a Rationalist are known to his defamer, the more readily are they pronounced to be vicious. An upright Atheist may number among his acquaintances many Christian believers; but it will not be from these that a charge against his character will emanate. They know, love, and revere his purity of life. If such an accusation be made, it will ordinarily arise from those who are far less capable of estimating his moral qualities. There is certainly some comfort in this thought for those Radicals who have smarted under the insinuations of comparative strangers. But how can we explain the existence of this unfounded prejudice against Liberals which is shared by so many well-meaning Christians? The solution of the problem is not difficult to find. As a rule, people of Orthodox training identify church-membership with goodness; they think that belief in their particular creed is a guarantee of salvation; they cannot understand how a man can be strictly moral, unless he be at the same time a believer in the great tenets of Christian theology. Not a few members of Orthodox churches refuse to believe that a man can admire and obey the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount and at the same time disbelieve in the deity of Jesus. They think that the root of all scepticism is to be found in secret immorality. They smile incredulously when you speak of the noble and exemplary character of a Freethinker. Their thought, expressed in the form of a syllogism, is this: No man can be pure and upright without the aid of Jesus; the Radical has not the aid of Jesus; therefore the Radical is not a pure and upright man.

The flimsiness of this argument is apparent, on the one hand, from the unquestionable nobility of character shown by many disbelievers in Christian doctrine, and, on the other, from the glaring inconsistencies frequently seen in the lives of the believers themselves. The fact is that men can live and have lived the best of lives who have never heard of Jesus, or who, if his name has reached their ears, neither offer prayer to him nor supplicate his spiritual aid. What a pitiful and narrow view is that which restricts the possibility of true virtue to those who believe in, and rely upon, Jesus as a divine Redeemer! What! are there no sweet, noble, self-renouncing lives led to day among the followers of Confucius, Buddha, and Mohammed, or among the Radicals of the Occident? Or were there no such lives led before the Christian era in the Imperial city, within the shadow of the Acropolis, or on the banks of the old Nile? The race, it is true, owes much to Jesus of Nazareth as a teacher of morals, but the debt is far from being so great as is commonly imagined. The moral precepts of mankind have been drawn from more than one source. There have been many contributors to the science of ethics. One light, but not all the light of the world flashed from the hills of Palestine.

Now among the members of our Orthodox churches and those who come strongly under their influence, there is a large class of persons who believe that their "salvation" will depend not upon their conduct in life, but upon their intellectual acceptance of certain theological tenets. They have been taught that their eternal welfare is to be decided by their belief or disbelief in Jesus and the dogmas of his Church. As a practical consequence they lay great stress upon a man's creed, but comparatively little upon his life. Provided that they glibly give assent to the doctrines which are currently deemed Evangelical, they feel themselves entitled to sit in judgment upon disbelievers in those doctrines, no matter how superior the latter may be to them in the common moralities of daily life. That I may not seem to be making here unfounded statements, let me cite an example out of many which have come under my observation. Here is an individual (I am drawing no fancy sketch) who is constantly breaking more than one universally accepted principle of morality. Although an active member of the church, he yet daily violates his church covenant, and thus apparently plays the part of a hypocrite. But this same person, while in the very pursuit of unquestionable immorality, can bewail with evident sincerity the scepticism of a lady of irreproachable character, and urge her to "come to Jesus"! Now how shall we explain the conduct of this person whom I have selected as the type of many nominal Christians?

We see clearly that the doctrines to which he clings with superstitious fondness, do not in the least affect his practical life. They do not make him more honest, more truthful, or more chaste. They are cherished by him blindly like the mystic words, "Open sesame," in virtue of which he fondly dreams the doors of Paradise will one day fly open to receive him. Perhaps he has been told so often that "Jesus paid it all, all the debt he owes," that he suspects it makes little difference whether he keeps his moral account-books carefully or not. It has, perchance, been so frequently impressed upon his mind that all his righteousness is but "filthy rags," that he hardly considers his poor scraps worth washing and mending. Not that he would say in so many words: "I do not believe in the absolute necessity of a moral life. Jesus will save me in spite of any amount of backsliding"; but I fancy that something very akin to this is the secret spring of action which (often unconsciously) regulates his life and the lives of the large number whom he represents. Just here we see the evil result of one of the fatal weaknesses of the Orthodox system; viz., the doctrine of Vicarious Atonement and Imputed Righteousness. On account of the sufferings and death of an innocent man nineteen hundred years ago, the sinner of to-day is pronounced forgiven, provided he confesses his guilt and accepts the victim of Judea as his substitute. By believing in him as a divine Savior, the righteousness of the crucified Jesus is imputed to the transgressor, and he is regarded as holy in the sight of God. In the words of the wild chorus of the Tabernacle:—

"Ha'lelujah! 'tis done!
I believe on the Son,
And am saved by the blood
Of the crucified One!"

But this system of substitution of the innocent for the guilty, whatever names or rank we may give to the martyr Jesus, is in itself unjust, and the imputed righteousness to which it gives rise is a fiction. Whether the victim be a god or a man, innocence cannot really atone for guilt,—nor can any man be clothed in a character not his own. An awful individuality enwraps us all, which neither God nor man can infringe upon without destroying our free agency.

But what is the effect of a hearty acceptance of this doctrine in the case of the individual referred to? "Saved" by the blood of Jesus, assured by a rapture of excitement that he is in the way of life, and holding unbelief to be the deadliest of sins, it is most easy for him to lose sight of the paramount necessity of moral uprightness, and to commiserate the doom of the sceptic, no matter how sincere and moral the latter may be. Although he himself falls into sin, even deliberately and repeatedly, he yet does not intend to "wander far away from Jesus," and, above all, "will never be guilty of unbelief"! He is certain that Jesus will forgive him every time that he returns repenting; and therefore, with an under-consciousness of having his talisman of salvation beyond the possibility of loss, he allows himself to drift into a moral laxity, which is nourished by the very system of which he is a victim. The Orthodox Protestants frequently object to the Catholic confessional as encouraging moral obtuseness and a too great facility of obtaining forgiveness. But does not their own constant prayer to Jesus take the place of the convenient confessional? Jesus becomes their high priest, their confessor, their absolver. Having him constantly at hand to resort to, they are almost wholly deprived of the opportunity to develop that independent firmness of character, which stands erect in its integrity, takes upon itself the results of its misdeeds, and learns thus (by an experience not to be emotionally rolled off at an imaginary conference with Jesus) how to avoid such errors in the future. Indeed, in more than one respect the Catholic mode of confession seems to have some advantages over that of the Protestants. No doubt, the dread of subsequently confessing sin to the priest deters the Catholic from many a transgression. The Protestant, however, kneels before no human eye, his confession falls upon no ear save his own, and his shame is known only to himself. Then, too, the Catholic receives his absolution from a priest who is certainly in some measure qualified to pronounce his repentance sincere or hypocritical, and to absolve or to condemn him. But the Protestant must determine by his own state of feeling whether he has been absolved or not. No voice proclaims him forgiven.

The natural relief at having spoken out long pent-up feelings is thus no doubt frequently mistaken for the direct comfort of Jesus, and with a "solar look" upon his countenance the sinner drops his burden and is once more on good terms with his master. There may be times when he rises from his knees with a half-defined sense that all is not well, and a doubt whether Jesus has forgiven him; but this impression is soon removed by other more engrossing thoughts, and the affair speedily becomes forgotten, since "Jesus has paid it all"!

It is not my intention to draw here any general comparisons in point of morality between the Orthodox and Freethinkers. Both of these great parties number in their ranks individuals of very varied characters. Some very good men, some very bad men, and a large number of persons of average morality are to be found on either side. Men must be judged to be moral or immoral as individuals, not in masses. To stigmatize any body of men as immoral, because their intellectual opinions differ from ours, is to commit an act as contemptible as it is unjust. Moreover, to insinuate, without proper proof, that immorality is the source of their scepticism is a most flagrant violation of the rule of common charity and fairness. It is the life, the life, not the creed nor religion, which tells the story of a man's character! The great principles of morality would continue to exist, from the very needs of society, if every creed and every form of religion were to-morrow banished from the earth. Morality, however much it may be enhanced and beautified by religious aspirations, must always find its raison d'être not in religion, but in the need of society to protect itself and secure equal rights to all its members. Our characters are what we make them, not what Jesus makes them. The primitive meaning of the word, character—(derived from the Greek verb signifying to carve or engrave), gives an added significance to the lines:—

"Sculptors of life are we, as we stand
With our souls uncarved before us!"

Chiselling out thus, as it were, our characters by constantly repeated choices of good or evil, we gradually determine the decided lineaments of the soul, and make or mar our natures. If the Orthodox Christian thinks that he possesses influences which will enable him to form a more perfect character than those who do not believe with him, he has an undoubted right to that opinion, and I for one shall rejoice if he succeeds in his attempt. But let him not assert that no such character can be formed by the more independent and manlier course of the moral Freethinker. The test of a work is its fruit, and the opportunities for such testing are abundant. Above all, let no man, who cares little for the development of a noble character, but bases his expectations of "salvation" upon the blind acceptance of a Church-wrought creed, fling the charge of immorality at upright disbelievers in that creed, whether they be called Buddhists, Freethinkers, or Atheists.

PHYSICAL FORCE IN POLITICS.

The late discussion on the possibility or expediency of maintaining governments at the South which had no physical force at their disposal has not failed to attract the attention of the friends of woman's suffrage. They see readily what, indeed, most outsiders have seen all along, that the failure of the numerical majority in certain Southern States to hold the power to which the law entitled them simply because they were unable or unwilling to fight, has a very important bearing on the fitness of women to participate in the practical work of government, and a well-known writer, "T. W. H.," in a late number of the Woman's Journal, endeavors to show, partly by comment on our recent article on "Majority Government," that what has happened at the South is full of encouragement for the woman suffragists. His argument is in substance this: You (the opponents) have always maintained as the great objection to the admission of women to the franchise, that, if women voted, cases might arise in which the physical force of the community would be in the hands of one party and the legal authority in those of the other, and we should then witness the great scandal of a majority government unable to execute the laws. We have just seen at the South, however, that the possession of physical force is not always sufficient to put the majority, even of the male voters, in possession of the government. In South Carolina and Louisiana the government has been seized and successfully held by a minority, in virtue of their greater intelligence and self-confidence. To use his own language:—

"The present result in South Carolina is not a triumph of bodily strength over weakness, but, on the contrary, of brains over bodily strength. And however this reasoning affects the condition of South Carolina—which is not here my immediate question,—it certainly affects, in a very important degree, the argument for woman suffrage. If the ultimate source of political power is muscle, as is often maintained, then woman suffrage is illogical; but if the ultimate source of political power is, as the Nation implies, 'the intelligence, sagacity, and the social and political experience of the population,' then the claims of women are not impaired. For we rest our case on the ground that women equal men on these points, except in regard to political experience, which is a thing only to be acquired by practice.

"So the showing of the Nation is, on the whole, favorable to women. It looks in the direction of Mr. Bagehot's theory that brains now outweigh muscle in government. Just in proportion as man becomes civilized and comes to recognize laws as habitually binding, does the power of mere brute force weaken. In a savage state the ruler of a people must be physically as well as mentally the strongest; in a civilized state the commander-in-chief may be physically the weakest person in the army. The English military power is no less powerful for obeying the orders of a queen. The experience of South Carolina does not vindicate, but refutes, the theory that muscle is the ruling power. It shows that an educated minority is more than a match for an ignorant majority, even though this be physically stronger. Whether this forbodes good or evil to South Carolina is not now the question; but so far as woman suffrage is concerned, the moral is rather in its favor than against it."

What is singular in all this is, that the writer is evidently under the impression that the term "physical force" in politics means muscle; or, to put the matter plainly, that the fact that the South Carolina negroes, who unquestionably surpass the whites in lifting power, could not hold their own against them, shows that government has become a mere question of brains, and that as women have plenty of brains, though they can lift very little, they could perfectly well carry on, or help to carry on, a government which had only moral force on its side.

Now, as a matter of fact, there has been no recent change in the meaning attached to "physical force" in political nomenclature. It does not mean muscle or weight now, as we see in South Carolina; and it has never meant muscle or weight since the dawn of civilization. The races and nations which have made civilization and ruled the world have done so by virtue of their possessing the very superiority, in a greater or less degree, which the Carolina whites have shown in their late struggle with the blacks. The Greeks, the Romans, the Turks, the English, the French, and the Germans have all succeeded in government—that is, in seizing and keeping power,—not through superiority of physical force which consists in muscle, but through the superiority which consists in the ability to organize and bring into the field and reinforce large bodies of men, with the resolution to kill and be killed in order to have their own way in disputes. No matter how much intelligence a people may have, unless they are able and willing to apply their intelligence to the art of war, and have the personal courage necessary to carry out in action the plans of their leaders, they cannot succeed in politics. Brains are necessary for political success without doubt; but it must be brains applied, among other things, to the organization of physical force in fleets and armies. An "educated minority," as such, is no more a match for a "physically stronger ignorant majority" than a delicate minister for a pugilist in "condition," unless it can furnish well equipped and well led troops. The Greeks were better educated than the Romans, but this did not help them. The Romans of the Empire were vastly more intelligent and thoughtful than the Barbarians, but they could not save the Empire. The Italians of the Middle Ages were the superiors of the French and Germans in every branch of culture, and yet this did not prevent Italy being made the shuttlecock of Northern politicians and freebooters. The French overran Germany in the beginning of the present century, and the Germans have overrun France within the last ten years, not in either case owing to superiority in lifting or boxing, or in literary "culture," but to superiority in the art of fighting,—that is, of bringing together large bodies of armed men who will not flinch, and will advance when ordered on the battle-field.

It is skill in this art which is meant by the term "physical force" in politics, and it is this physical force which lies behind all successful government. The superiority of the North in numbers and wealth and machinery and literature and common schools would have profited it nothing, and the American Republic would have disappeared from the map if it had not been possible, fifteen years ago, to apply a vast amount of intelligence to the purposes of destruction, and to find large numbers of men willing to fight under orders. In quiet times, under a government in which the numerical majority and the intelligence and property of the community are on the same side, and take substantially the same views of public polity, and the display of coercive force, except for ordinary police purposes, is not called for, we not unnaturally slide readily into the pleasant belief that government is purely a moral agency, and that people obey the law through admiration of intellectual power and the dread of being "cornered" in argument, or of being exposed as selfish or lawless. Such occurrences as the late civil war and the recent dead-lock at the South are very useful in uncovering the secret springs of society, and reminding people of the tremendous uncertainties and responsibilities by which national as well as individual life is surrounded, reminding the voter, in short, that he may not always be able to discharge his duty to the country by depositing his ballot in the box; that he may have to make the result sure by putting everything he values in the world at stake. The poor negroes in South Carolina have not been deposed simply because they are ignorant; the Russian peasants who fought at Borodino were grossly ignorant. How many of the English hinds who stood rooted in the soil at Waterloo could read and write? The Carolinian majority failed because it did not contain men willing to fight or leaders capable of organization for military purposes; or, in other words, did not possess what has, since the dawn of civilization, been the first and greatest title to political power. The Carolinian minority did not drive their opponents out of the offices by simply offering the spectacle of superior intelligence or self-confidence, but by the creation of a moral certainty that, if driven to extremities, they would outdo the republicans in the marshalling, marching, provisioning, and manoeuvring of riflemen.

If this be true, it will be readily seen that the lesson of the South Carolina troubles, far from containing encouragement for the friends of female suffrage, is full of doubt and difficulty. Those who believe that women voters would constitute a new and valuable force in politics must recognize the possibility that they would at some time or other constitute the bulk of a majority claiming the government, and they must also recognize the probability that the male portion of this majority would be composed of the milder and less energetic class of men, people with much brains and but little physical courage, ready to go to the stake for a conviction, but not ready to shoulder a musket or assault a redoubt. If, under these circumstances, the minority, composed exclusively of men, inferior, if you will, to the majority in the purity of their motives, the breadth of their culture, and in capacity for drawing constitutions and laws and administering charities, should refuse to obey the majority, and should say that its government was a ridiculous "fancy" government, administered by crack-brained people, and likely to endanger property and the public credit, and that it must be abolished, what would the women and their "gentlemen friends" do? They would doubtless remonstrate with the recusants and show them the wickedness of their course; but then the recusants would be no more moved by this than Wade Hampton and his people by Mr. Chamberlain's eloquent and affecting inaugural address. They would tell the ladies that their intelligence was doubtless of a high order, and their aims noble; but that as they were apparently unable to supply policemen to arrest the persons who disobeyed their laws, their administration was a farce, and its disappearance called for in the interest of public safety. Accordingly it would be removed to the great garret of history, to lie side by side with innumerable other disused plans for human improvement. The cause of much of the misconception about the part played by physical force in modern society now current in reformatory circles is doubtless to be found in the disappearance of sporadic and lawless displays of it, such as, down to a very recent period, seriously disturbed even the most civilized communities. The change that has taken place, however, consists not in the total disuse of force as a social agency, but in the absorption of all force by the government, making it so plainly irresistible that the occasions are rare when anything approaching to organized resistance or defiance of it is attempted. When it lays its commands on a man he knows that obedience will, if necessary, be enforced by an agency of such tremendous power that he does not think of revolt. But it is not the high intelligence of those who carry it on that he bows to; it is to their ability to crush him like an egg-shell. Of course, it is not surprising that his submissiveness should at meetings of philanthropists be ascribed to the establishment of a consensus between his mind and the mind of the law-giver; or, in other words, the subjection of society to purely moral influences; but it is perhaps well that complications like those of South Carolina should now and then occur to infuse sobriety into speculation and explain the machinery of civilization.—New York Nation, May 17.

THE JEWS AND THE TURKS.

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION IN TURKEY AND RUSSIA.

Referring to the subjoined letter, the New York World of May 8 said: "Those of our readers who really desire to make up their minds intelligently about the 'humanitarian aspects' of the Eastern war will do well to read attentively the letter we print in another column, from a Hebrew gentleman of standing and character, about the treatment received by people of his faith from the Russian and the Turkish governments respectively. This letter is but one of many things which go to show that the questions at issue now in the East are much too complicated to be settled off-hand by dashing generalities about the Cross and the Crescent." The letter is as follows:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE WORLD:

Sir,—I observe in the papers this evening a communication from the Turkish Minister denying the truth of the reports which have been circulated regarding the persecution of Jews in Turkey. I take the opportunity which is afforded by this repudiation of the charge of Ottoman ill-treatment of my co-religionists in the East to address you a few words on the subject. As I have passed much of my life in the countries which are now the scene of warfare, and as the real merits of the question are very much misunderstood in America, I venture to think that the remarks I have to make may be of service in correcting erroneous impressions and placing matters in their true light. The Jews, as you are aware, are scattered in very large numbers throughout Turkey, the Danubian principalities, and Russia, and we have been surprised and pained to find that in the present struggle the sympathies of this free country are given largely to the despotism which is more oppressive and intolerant to the Jews than any other government in Europe. I shall not now discuss the question of what civilization may or may not be. For my own part, I would rather live in a country where the administration was just and tolerant to all races and religions, and where there were no railroads or operas, than in one which used the appliances of modern civilization more effectually to crush and grind to powder an alien and despised section of the population.

In order the more clearly to explain what I mean, I will endeavor to contrast the position of the Jews in Turkey with the treatment they receive from those Christian governments which are now, on the ground of a common religion, receiving the sympathy of the American people. In the communication which appears in the papers to which I have alluded, it is announced that the Sultan has named Davidchon Effendi a Senator of the empire. This fact alone speaks volumes. Davidchon Effendi is a highly respected member of the Hebrew persuasion, of Salonica, and his elevation to this high dignity is not only a striking evidence of the consideration in which he is personally held, but is a marked recognition of the claims of the people to whom he belongs, which it would be quite impossible to expect or hope for in Russia, or any country under the influence of the Greek Church. Bohor Effendi, also a Jew, has been for many years a Councillor of State; he is the youngest member of that council, and is celebrated for his learning, and more especially his literary talents in the Turkish language. I also observe the names of many Jews who have been elected as Deputies to the new Chamber. Excepting in England and France, I know of no country where such toleration is shown; indeed, it is not many years since Jews were excluded from the English House of Commons. But here we have Turkey manifesting a spirit of liberality which most of the civilized and Christian governments of Europe might well imitate. It is only natural that enjoying these political privileges the Jews in Constantinople should occupy a corresponding social position. Such men as Alatini, Fernandez, and, above all, Camondo, live in the best society. And the Grand Vizier, the Ministers, and other high functionaries of the empire are frequent visitors at their houses, dining with them and attending their receptions. In religious matters they are treated upon a footing of perfect equality with the other sects, the chief rabbis or Hacham Bashi of Constantinople, Salonica, and other localities receiving every respect and consideration. Thus the Porte corresponds directly with them; they are invited to all the assemblies which are attended by the heads of other religious sects; they assist at all ceremonies which take place at the Imperial Palace; they are the recipients of the highest grades of civil decorations, and in every respect are made to feel that no invidious distinction is allowed to exist between them and the members of other religions. When we turn to the position which the Jews occupy in the Christian countries adjacent to Turkey, how great is the contrast. Here they at once find themselves a people, despised, trampled upon, and subjected to the most odious persecutions. In Roumania their condition is so deplorable that it has been made the subject of frequent representations in the British House of Commons. From time to time there are uprisings of the population against them in Bucharest, Jassy, and other towns; their warehouses are plundered, their goods and money stolen; they are themselves scourged, driven out of house and home, with their beggarly wives and families, thankful to escape with their lives. When, as occasionally happens, they fall victims to the blind fury of the populace, and murders take place, the assassins are never punished,—it suffices that the murdered man is a Jew to excuse the murderer. There is no use in appealing to the law, for there is no justice for the hated race; they enjoy no civil rights, and are denied many commercial privileges possessed by the Christians, on the ground that they would become too rich if they were permitted to have them. This is, indeed, their sole fault. They are peaceable, industrious traders, harming no one, and only desiring to be allowed to pursue their avocations in peace. No sooner are they suspected of amassing too much wealth than they are brutally and violently robbed. Your excellent Consul-General at Bucharest, M. Pelxotto, can confirm the truth of this statement, for he on several occasions made energetic representations on the subject. The only effect was that the Roumanian government demanded his recall. Sir Moses Montefiore, the Messrs. Rothschild, Sergeant Simon, and many eminent gentlemen, together with the Jewish Alliance, are constantly working for an amelioration of their lot, and the result has been that the governments of England, France, Austria, and Italy have occasionally remonstrated diplomatically, but in vain; for the secret power at the back of these persecuting governments is Russia, which also denies to the Jews all civil rights, places them under commercial disabilities, and loses no opportunity of tyrannizing over and oppressing them. As a proof of this I would instance the late negotiation between Serbia and the Porte, when the latter put forward as one of the conditions of peace toleration for the Jews and their admission to the enjoyment of civil rights. This was peremptorily refused by Serbia at the instance of Russia, for she would never have dared to refuse it otherwise; and the Porte, for the sake of peace, reluctantly abandoned the point. I fear, sir, I have already trespassed upon your space at too great length; otherwise I could multiply special instances in proof of what I say. I refrain from doing so, however, in the hope that I have said enough to induce the American people to pause before pouring out so much of their generous sympathy in behalf of a government which does not deserve it, which is the greatest enemy to liberty in Europe, and whose rule wherever it is extended is synonymous with all that is corrupt, cruel, and intolerant. I am glad to see that some influential journals have already shown a tendency to resist the mistaken sentiment in regard to Russia which I regret to find so prevalent in America, and I can only assure my friends here that if they knew what the true civilization of that country was worth as well as I do, they would not be so eloquent in extolling its advantages. I enclose my card, and am, sir, yours respectfully,

A. B.

THE GRASSHOPPER PRAYER TEST IN MINNESOTA.

LETTER FROM HON. JOHN W. NORTH.

RIVERSIDE, Bernardino Co., Cal., }
May 8, 1877.

The proclamation of Governor Pillsbury, appointing the 26th of April last as a day of "humiliation, fasting, and prayer," to avert the grasshopper scourge, has been noticed here with interest. We have grasshoppers in this locality, and very naturally feel desirous of learning how they can best be disposed of. As the day of "fasting and prayer" is past, we are anxiously looking for results. The Governor will, of course, publish them as soon as reports come in. If it should be found that prayer is, after all, the most deadly weapon that can be employed for the destruction of grasshoppers, it will be a most interesting fact.

After the severe denunciations of Prof. Wyville Thompson and Prof. Tyndall, for the bare suggestion of a trial of prayer in certain afflicted localities, we had despaired of seeing the experiment fairly tried in a test case. But Governor Pillsbury has proved himself equal to the occasion, and has tried the experiment under circumstances exceptionally favorable. Three distinguished scientists were appointed by the United States government just in time to witness the trial and to note results. It is gratifying to know that Prof. Thomas was in St. Paul on the day appointed. He and the other professors who have the grasshopper question in charge, will not fail to notice an instrumentality publicly announced by the Governor of the State and the Bishop of the Diocese. We trust they will investigate the subject by "scientific methods," and publish at an early day the results of prayer in this case, as they find them.

The Bishop complicates the matter somewhat in his proclamation, but perhaps the professors can unravel it. He speaks of the "locusts" as "the Lord's great army" (as the prophet Joel spoke in his day), and leaves us in doubt whether it is admissible for Christians to seek to destroy the "army of the Lord." He also speaks of them as "a heavy judgment." Now, if the good Bishop would really have us believe that the Lord has raised up a "great army" of grasshoppers in the Rocky Mountains, and that he brings them down in "judgment" upon the poor farmers of the frontier, causing innocent women and children, as well as good men, to starve, he thinks much worse of the Heavenly Father than we are inclined to. But if his view be correct, is it not time the professors should stay their hand, and cease fighting the grasshoppers, "lest haply they be found fighting against God"? It is sad to think of the condition of the poor settlers, with the Lord and his "great army" against them, and only a Governor, a Bishop, and three professors, with a moderate amount of "science and religion," on their side. But let us hope that the case is not as desperate as the Bishop would make it.

We have found, here in Southern California, that the castor-oil bean is a very good defence against grasshoppers. The bean grows to a tree, and when the grasshoppers eat the leaves they soon die. The ground under these plants is sometimes covered with dead grasshoppers.

If the Governor's experiment should fail, and the good Bishop should conclude that it would not be sacrilege to attack the Lord's "great army," permit me to recommend a trial of the castor-oil bean. But if it should be found that the "little red ants" had really "sucked all the grasshopper eggs," some time before the day of "prayer" fixed by the Governor, I trust you will see to it that he does not claim the credit that belongs to the ants.

Yours very respectfully, J. W. NORTH.

The Index.

BOSTON, MAY 31, 1877.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 281 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 36 Monroe Street: J. T. FAY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

IN ORDER to attend the meeting of June 2 at Toledo, we shall necessarily be absent from Boston a week or so; and correspondents will please take notice.

THE DIVINE who shrewdly averred that "between the Scylla of affirmation and the Charybdis of negation the truth may perhaps be found in the mid-channel of no meaning at all," told the secret of more than one attempt to restate Christian theology in a modern form.

ONE OF THE most noticeable indications of the great break-up of Protestant Evangelical faith now going on (not permanently to be stayed by any conceivable increase of organized power) is a pamphlet entitled "Catholicity and Methodism: or the Relation of John Wesley to Modern Thought," by Rev. James Roy, of Montreal. It is a brave, noble, and able plea for modern ideas, albeit not reconcilable with Methodism in any form, as Mr. Roy fondly conceives. There is something pathetic in seeing a faithful, truthful mind forced away from the solid and stolid Orthodoxy in which alone social acceptance can be found, and yet disabled by inherited or acquired prejudices for the task of striking out boldly for absolute freedom. Rev. John Miller's fate, we fear, prefigures that of Mr. Roy. Persecution is already gathering blackly over his head. How long, how long will mankind keep spiritual tyranny in power?

IT IS with great pleasure that we are permitted to announce the name of Mr. J. L. Stoddard, whose occasional articles and poems in THE INDEX have attracted so much attention during the past year, as that of a future editorial contributor to these columns. Mr. Stoddard is a graduate of Williams College, has enjoyed great advantages of travel in Europe and the Orient, and had been pursuing his studies for some time in preparation for the Evangelical ministry, when he found himself obliged by his changing religious convictions to abandon this purpose in order to preserve his intellectual integrity and independence. Few young men of equally brilliant social prospects prove themselves capable of sacrificing so much as Mr. Stoddard has done through simple loyalty to truth; and we venture to add that from very few could we anticipate so much of brave, efficient, and unselfish service to its cause in the future. An article from his own pen on a preceding page will do him better justice than any remarks which we feel at liberty to make here.

THE Radical Review is out with its first number, and an excellent one it is. Mr. Potter's leading article on "The Two Traditions, Ecclesiastic and Scientific," is an extremely valuable addition to the discussion which has been carried on in these columns the past two months, and ought to be studied carefully by all whom this discussion has interested. Mr. Ernst's paper on "Practical Socialism in Germany" is full of instruction, especially for some who propagate ignorance in the name of labor-reform. Mr. Wasson's lecture on "Theodore Parker as Religious Reformer" is able and eloquent, as was to be expected. Mr. Ball's verses "To Benedict Spinoza," and Mr. Stedman's "The Discoverer," are artistically faultless. Further we have had no time to read—only to turn the pages. But the new quarterly is certainly very promising, and Mr. Tucker deserves great credit for it—though we trust the black-and-red cover is not to be permanent, as if the Radical Review were a pirate. Single copies, $1.50; per year $5.00. Address Benj. R. Tucker, New Bedford, Mass.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Sixth Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Index Association will be held at No. 35 Monroe Street, Toledo, Ohio, on Saturday, June 2, 1877, at half-past two o'clock, in accordance with the articles of incorporation.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Tenth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association is to be held in Boston as follows:—

Thursday evening, May 31st, at 7.45 P. M., business session in Horticultural Hall, for the election of officers, reading of reports, and consideration of the practical work of the Association. A special discussion is also invited on the proper interpretation of the word "scientific" in the first article of the Constitution of the Association.

Friday, June 1st, at 10.30 A. M. and 3 P. M., sessions in Beethoven Hall for Essays and Addresses. Morning subject: "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom." Essayist—Rev. Wm. R. Alger, of New York. Afternoon subject: "Internal Dangers of Free Thought." Essayist—C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, N. Y. Among the speakers invited whose attendance we have reason to expect are O. B. Frothingham and Prof. Felix Adler, of New York; Rabbi Lasker, of Boston; Wm. Henry Channing, of England; Rev. Dr. Dudley, of Boston; and Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, of Illinois. Further announcements hereafter, especially in the Boston dailies.

A Social Festival is to be held Friday evening at Horticultural Hall. Col. T. W. Higginson will preside. There will be brief speeches, music, conversation, refreshments, and a chance to contribute to the Treasury of the Association.

W. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

A LETTER FROM DR. BARTOL.

Just as we go to press, the following welcome letter, which needs no comment, comes to hand, and we insert it at once with thanks:—

The Free Religious Association.
TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

My dear Abbot,—My silence under your summons has arisen not from disrespect, nor even so much from aversion to strife, as from unconsciousness of crime or wrong. Against the Free Religious Association I have never made or meant to make any charge. Such a thought was not in my heart, or word on my tongue. If I do not, therefore, feel the tight logical box or coffer-dam hold me in prison, keep me out or in, or limit any way my motion, it is because I cannot, try all I may, quite get or be put into it. So I will not argue a case which I perceive is not my own. If anybody think consistency requires the incarceration, let him judge me inconsistent, or consider me actually confined.

To be clear of all doubt or dispute in this matter, shall I state the case positively thus? The Free Religious Association, as such, or as a body, has nowise, in the smallest degree, on any occasion, hindered or attempted to hinder my liberty of speech. I am glad it should exist. I sympathize with its object, admire its active method, and wish it well in every right effort, while in its organization I have no share; and it has, with every other corporation, the happiness of not being at all responsible for me. But I am, nevertheless, cordially your and its

C. A. BARTOL.

ARMIES AND ARGUMENTS.

A telegraphic dispatch from Washington, dated May 19, was as follows: "The recent speech of General Sherman in New York, in which he is reported as saying that 'without an army the American people would be a mob; that a government cannot subsist without an army, and a good one too,' etc., has caused a good deal of unfavorable comment here. There is a growing impression here that the military gentlemen in this country are placing entirely too high an estimate on their own importance. There is the best authority for saying that the President, although once a soldier himself, is not afflicted with any nonsense on the subject of a standing army. The Evening Star says of Sherman's speech: 'These utterances are so offensively disparaging to the American people and, in point of fact, so absurdly unfounded in view of the trifling figure made by our Lilliputian regular army in proportion to the great bulk of American citizenship, that it would seem scarcely possible that they could be made by an official of the standing of General Sherman. At the same time it is only an open expression of the opinions held in army circles and expressed in a thousand ways quite as effectively as if voice were given to them in the frank effusiveness of an after-dinner speech. If it has really come to this, that our army aristocracy hold that they occupy the same position in the United States that the French army holds in France, as the force to be conciliated by any Government that wants to retain power over the mobocracy of the people, then it is, seriously, time for us to consider whether on the whole it is worth while for the American people to allow themselves to be further taxed for the support of an institution like West Point to educate a privileged class in such unrepugnant ideas.'"

The meaning of General Sherman is very evidently misunderstood or misrepresented in the above comments upon it. Even the brief extract quoted from his letter (which has not chanced to come under our notice) shows on its face that the veteran commander did not intend to say that this American nation of forty-odd millions are actually governed by their "Lilliputian army" of only twenty or twenty-five thousands; or that these justly honored defenders of the flag constitute a social or political "aristocracy"; or that they must be "conciliated" like the enormous standing-armies of Europe, in order to prevent the establishment of a military despotism on the ruins of constitutional liberty. General Sherman is certainly not a fool. What he evidently meant to say is that all government rests at last on physical force, and that, in order to give the national government the degree of physical force necessary to maintain its just authority, a regular army must be sustained, as the school of practical training for a corps of thoroughly educated military officers and the nucleus of the vast army of volunteer citizen-soldiers which a great public emergency is certain to call into existence. There is altogether too much truth in this view of the matter to be met by the silly vaporing of the Evening Star. Have we so soon forgot the terrible experience of the civil war? War is in these days a science and an art, and requires a peculiar education in those who are to be intrusted with the direction of its operations. Thousands and thousands of the best lives in the nation were sacrificed fifteen years ago by the incompetency of "political generals"; and until war is outgrown with other inherited habits of primal barbarism, not only are institutions like the military academy at West Point and the naval academy at Annapolis indispensable to the national security, but also a regular army and navy, as the only means of disciplining and keeping together the educated soldiers who are willing, in this age of greedy money-making, to devote their lives in honorable poverty to the military defence of the country. General Sherman's assertion of the practical necessity of a small regular army will be approved by the common sense of the American people notwithstanding the buncombe objections paraded above.

It is possible, however, to approve this assertion of a practical necessity without also approving the political thesis that all government rests at last on physical force. General Sherman is not alone in this opinion (if he indeed holds it), as will appear from an article on "Physical Force in Politics" which we copy on another page from the New York Nation. Col. Higginson had argued that the success of the Hampton party should not be considered as "a triumph of bodily strength over weakness," but "of brains over bodily strength"; and that the final preponderance of an educated minority over an uneducated majority in South Carolina "refuted the theory that muscle is the ruling power." The writer in the Nation, on the other hand, argues that the educated minority triumphed over the uneducated majority, not because it was educated merely, but because it knew how to convert education into organization, and consolidate an otherwise inferior physical force into "fleets and armies,"—which is to make muscle, after all, the ruling power. Thus we find Col. Higginson seconding Mr. Bagehot's proposition that "mind without muscle has far greater force than muscle without mind" (Physics and Politics, p. 79), and the Nation writer seconding General Sherman's seemingly implied proposition that all government rests at last on muscle or physical force.

Now we are unable fully to agree with either of these views. We should say, on the one hand, that neither "mind without muscle" nor "muscle without mind" is a force at all; that it takes a conjunction of the two to constitute force in the political sense; and that, as a matter of fact, the two are never separated when political changes of magnitude are wrought. In the South Carolina case, the Nation is right in maintaining that both the mind and the muscle were on the side of the Hampton party, for organization is quite sufficient to throw the preponderance of physical power on the side of the minority. On the other hand, the Nation is wrong in inferring that all government rests on muscle or physical force at last; for there are different kinds of government. Any government which does indeed rest on physical force as its ultima ratio, no matter by what name it calls itself, is simply barbarous government; it has no right to call itself civilized. That is the trouble with the Hampton party; they were not civilized enough to achieve their ends by patient respect for equal rights, by frank fidelity to majority rule, by peaceful methods of converting their present minority into a future majority. They had both the mind and the muscle, and they used both, like the barbarians they are, to establish a barbarian government on the foundation of Hamburg and Ellenton massacres.

We deny emphatically, therefore, that all government rests on physical force. All barbarian governments, truly, rests on physical force, and tends to barbarize all who support or approve it; it may rest on combined mind and muscle, but it remains dyed in barbarism until it learns to combine them both with conscience. All civilized government rests, not on physical force, not on intelligence backed by physical force, but on conscience backed by both; it rests on moral principles and moral ideals, in defect of which there are neither personal nor property rights to defend; it is not possible anywhere, until the community has become sufficiently educated to reverence, as one man, the equal rights of the poorest, feeblest, blackest of its citizens, and to make his wrongs its own. Such government may never yet have been established anywhere on the face of the round globe; nevertheless, mankind will remain political barbarians until they can climb up to this low-water mark of civilization. When they have at last, in the far future perhaps, founded a civilized government in fact as well as in name, it will be discovered not to rest ultimately on physical force, but rather on a general knowledge of and obedience to those moral principles which are now so slightly regarded. When that distant day arrives, women will vote, the government will be secularized, and the Nation will no longer undertake to "explain the machinery" of a "civilization" which has not yet risen above the level of political barbarism.

THE "CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT" PLATFORM.

The following resolutions, adopted at the Convention of the National Reform Association at Chicago, April 10 and 11, furnish the latest statement of the principles and objects of that mischievous and indefatigable movement, as published in the Christian Statesman of April 26:—

Resolved, 1. That it is of the utmost importance, in the present stage of our national history, to emphasize the fact that this country was settled by Christians, who came hither with a free and open Bible, and founded free institutions of government on the basis of the principles of the Christian religion, and that we are unquestionably a Christian nation.

2. That the most vital national issues of to-day involve the relations of Christianity and the State; and that the truth which Christianity teaches concerning these relations never demanded clearer assertion than now; viz., That Almighty God is the ultimate source of all authority in civil government; that Jesus Christ as Ruler of Nations, has given a moral standard for their conduct; and that the standard of his Word is their supreme law.

3. That we perceive with grave apprehension, the determined and often successful attempts which are made to expel the Bible from our public schools, to abolish the oath, prayer in our National and State Legislatures, days of fasting and thanksgiving, and other Christian institutions of our States and nation, and so divorce the American government from all connection with Christianity.

4. That a written Constitution, as fundamental law, ought to provide an explicit and undeniable basis for the vital institutions of the nation for which it is framed; and the fact that the Constitution of the United States may be and is used against the existing institutions of our government constitutes the best of reasons for its religious amendment.

5. That such an amendment of our National Constitution, harmonizing as it would with all the precedents of our early history, and with religious acknowledgments in many of our State Constitutions, could not conflict with any individual rights of conscience, just as the establishment of State education does not conflict with the rights of citizens who believe that education belongs only to the family and the Church, or the constitutional authentication of the war-power does not conflict with the rights of those who denounce even defensive war as sin; and further, if there be any plea for rights of conscience, it must be entered against the Christian laws and institutions themselves rather than against a constitutional basis on which they might rest.

6. That the indifference of many professing

Christians, as well as the assaults of open enemies, calls imperatively on all who discern the dangers that threaten our Christian institutions of government to unite and labor earnestly for their maintenance; and that, taking courage from a review of the past, and pledging ourselves to God and to one another, we shall use all means in our power to uphold, perfect, and hand down to posterity the inheritance bequeathed to us by our fathers.

That the future of such a movement as this cannot be augured from the number of its professed adherents, or the size of its public meetings at the present time, is unhappily too evident from the nature of the case. These resolutions illustrate how the "Christian consciousness" of the Church is deliberately arraying itself against the secular consciousness of the Republic; and now, as ever, the Church demands political power in the name of its creed. Here is the "cloud no bigger than a man's hand" which is destined to cover the land with darkness. The issue now raised has never been consciously decided by the American people; but the hour of decision is steadily approaching, and the people still sleep.

THE SCHOOL AMENDMENT.

Reader, are you one of the few liberals who understand that the perpetuation of religious liberty in the United States depends upon the preservation of the absolutely secular character of the national Constitution? If so, you will need no hint of ours to appreciate the significance of the subjoined article from one of the most influential organs of the Republican party in New England, the Boston Journal of May 26:—

What does it Mean?

An Associated Press dispatch from Cleveland, Ohio, says:—

"The German Catholic Central Association adopted the report of the Committee on the School System. It does not actually oppose the system now in existence, but urges the establishment of free Catholic school funds therefor, to be provided by school societies, to be started in all Catholic communities."

A few days since we noticed in an exchange that the Catholics of a Western city had established a free school on the plan above suggested, and elsewhere commendations thereof by Catholic journals.

Under ordinary circumstances it would be scarcely worth while to call attention to such action on the part of any religious body. On general principles there can be little objection to religious denominations establishing free schools. If they choose to spend their money in supporting schools in cities and towns where the State system affords ample opportunities for the free education of all children, they can only be accused of defective judgment, unless they have some motive which is not disclosed, and which would apparently justify them in such an expenditure of money. The Church which has taken this action is not one whose communicants can afford to waste money in unnecessary schemes.

But in this case we apprehend that those who are engineering the scheme of organizing rival free schools have an ulterior purpose. They may refrain from expressing their opposition to the free school system of the several States of the Union, but the Catholic clergy, as a whole, are either unfriendly or hostile to the system. Within a brief period the highest authority in that Church has declared against the public schools of the United States, and has, in direct terms, declared that no Catholic can well maintain his standing in the Church who sends his children to the public schools where Church schools are in the vicinity. We are informed that Catholic communicants have been refused the Sacrament by priests in New England because they have insisted in sending their children to the public schools in cities where there were denominational schools. In spite, however, of the hostility of Church leaders, a large number of young and able men in the Catholic Church are friendly to the public school system because they have been educated therein. In many respects these men are more liberal in their views, and less willing to be controlled in matters of a political and public nature than suits the clergy.

The leaders of the Catholic Church have evidently become convinced that they cannot overthrow the free school policy of the States by direct assault. So far as their experience goes in attempting the vigorous policy, they have not only met with defeat, but have strengthened the cause of popular education. Of late they have advocated a division of the school funds among religious denominations, according to their respective numbers. They have also maintained that it is unjust to require the communicants of a Church, which relieves the State of the cost of educating their children by maintaining schools of their own, to pay taxes for the support of schools from which they receive no benefit, and to which they are, by conviction, hostile. The action of the association referred to, then, is simply an indication of the purpose of the Catholic leaders to put themselves in a position to demand, as a matter of justice, either a division of the school funds, or exemption from taxation for public schools, assured that the accomplishment of either object would result in the destruction of a system of non-sectarian schools supported by the State.

It is not our purpose to agitate this topic, but being convinced that this seemingly harmless action has its origin in a deep-seated hostility to the free school system of the country, it is our duty to call public attention to the designs of Church-leaders who would destroy the system upon which depends the stability of the Republic. The question need not be made a political one, and it may be settled at once and for all time by an amendment to the Federal Constitution, requiring the States to provide for an adequate system of free schools, and prohibiting any division of school revenues among religious sects, or direct or indirect appropriation of money raised by taxation to sectarian schools or educational institutions.

Once more read the last sentence of the above article. It is "seemingly harmless." But the reflective reader will certainly repeat the Journal's question: "What does it Mean?"

1. It means that the Republican party intend to secure a school amendment of the United States Constitution.

2. It means that the Republican party intend by Constitutional provisions to make the public school system "unsectarian"—that is, as they construe the word, neither Catholic nor secular, but Protestant Evangelical Christian.

3. It means that the amendment they design to secure will forbid the exclusion of the Bible from the public schools, and thereby, indirectly but effectually, recognize the Bible's inherent Divine Authority as the Word of God.

4. It means that the Republican party are about to take a step which will destroy the absolute secularity of the Constitution, and begin a religious strife in this nation which, if human nature remains human nature twenty-five years longer, will grow into a religious war, as certainly as the sun will rise to-morrow.

5. It means that the only way to prevent this beginning of measureless mischief is for those who know the necessity of secular government to religious liberty to disregard the cunning and deprecatory suggestion of the Journal that this question "need not be made a political one," and to insist on making it a "political one" without further delay.

In default of a public opinion which shall assert itself in organized form, at the polls if necessary, the Protestant Evangelical school amendment will be carried through Congress successfully, and probably next winter. If the liberals of this country possess brains and courage, they will act, and act promptly. We counsel them earnestly to form Liberal Leagues in every city and town without delay, that the first Annual Congress of the National Liberal League next autumn may give such emphasis to the demand for a secular school system as shall prevent a premature, and therefore most dangerous, settlement of this momentous question. If only a hundred local Leagues shall send delegates to that meeting, the National League can take such bold action as will defeat the secret attempt to revolutionize this government in the interest of Orthodoxy. There is no more time to waste, unless the American people have grown tired of religious freedom and pine for a practical restoration of ecclesiastical government.

PROFESSORSHIP FOR WOMEN.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE BOSTON JOURNAL:—

The attention of some of the authorities of Boston University having been called to the number of young women already studying in the College of Liberal Arts, and to the desirableness of securing to them, as also to the other members of the College, the influence of mature and cultivated women as instructors, assurances have been received that the trustees are disposed to appoint a woman to a professorship as soon as the means for its endowment shall be provided. It is also understood that all members of the faculty are in sympathy with the proposition, and ready to welcome such a colleague.

The importance of this opportunity must be apparent to all friends of the higher education of women. It appeals as strongly to those who with us believe that young ladies during no period of their education should be deprived of womanly counsel and care, as to those who merely seek for women ever new and more influential positions in society.

Hoping that among your many readers there may be some person who, under the circumstances, will esteem it a privilege to endow the first professorship for women in Boston University, the Executive Committee of the "Massachusetts Society for the University Education of Women" venture to ask you to insert this note. Any parties inclined personally to consider the proposition, and any friends who have information likely to be helpful to us in securing the object contemplated, are invited to address "The Executive Committee M. S. U. E. W., care Hannah E. Stevenson, Secretary pro tem., 32 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston, Mass."

THE LAST.—"What on earth am I do with that incorrigible son of mine?" inquired an anxious father of a friend. "Dress him in a suit of shepherd's plaid," was the reply. "Why, what possible benefit would that be?" demanded the wondering parent. "It would, at least, be a way of keeping him in check."

Communications.

A WORD FROM MINNESOTA-GRASSHOPPER AND COL. INGERSOLL.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

The Governor of this State (John S. Pillsbury) is a resident of this city. I am personally acquainted with him, and happen to know that he is not so consummate an imbecile as his now famous "Grasshopper Proclamation" would seem to indicate. But if Eastern (especially New England) culture desires to laugh in its dignified and eminently respectable manner at this idiosyncrasy of a "Western Governor," let it first remember that Governor Pillsbury is an importation direct from the world-famous educational institutions of that same New England. The general, every-day education and experience of the Western-born and reared man is against asking God to do anything that he has not exhausted every means in striving to do himself.

But I started, not to institute "odious comparisons," but to offer a few words in defence of our very worthy Governor. He is a New Englander by birth and education, took the advice of Horace Greeley and came West some years ago, acquired wealth slowly by shrewd and careful business management, still possesses the one talent of culture that he brought with him from the granite hills of New Hampshire, and has had greatness thrust upon him by an admiring constituency. Unlike Dogberry, he does not desire to be "writ down as an ass" by the intellectual critics of his native New England. Here was the trouble. He has a private secretary, and that unworthy official is, like Dickens' "wicked partner," entirely responsible for his remarkable faux pas. You know the kind of material of which private secretaries are usually made,—that is, you would know if you had ever mingled in Western politics to any great extent. In this locality it is the sworn duty of that official to sit in his Excellency's private sanctuary, prune and trim and mould and model the annual and occasional message, smile with ineffable benignity and sweetness,—a sweetness which concentrates all the benevolence of the entire Commonwealth into one focus, and beams it with prodigal extravagance upon the fortunate citizen who may have business with the Executive department.

That was what ailed our chief magistrate. A committee of the Young Men's Christian Association visited the Governor's office in St. Paul, while his Excellency was at home in this city (nine miles away), dutifully engaged in matters of domestic concern. This committee made known its business to the beaming, gushing, private secretary, and the work was done. Visions of the fall campaign and a re-election (followed by a re-appointment of the P. S., of course) pictured themselves upon the imagination of the happy official, while on the dim horizon of his hopes arose the exquisite mirage of an approaching United States Senatorship for his Excellency, with (Oh, joy unspeakable!) a possible post office—maybe a consulship—for the private secretary.

Thus it was that our very worthy Governor ceased to be the Chief Magistrate of Minnesota, and became only the Governor of the Evangelical Christians of the State. Thus it was that he ignored Catholics, Jews, Freethinkers, and Free Religionists, and set himself and the Commonwealth he governs before the world of thought and progress as a laughing-stock. But it was not he,—no, it was the wicked private secretary. It could not have been he, for was he not born, reared, and educated in New England,—New England, with Boston for a focus that never bows its "intellectual head"?

Now one word in truth and soberness. When will our civil rulers learn that the hour has arrived, as pointed by the clock of progress, when in republican America they rule by and with the consent of the whole people, Jew and Gentile, Christian and Atheist? When, in other words, will they learn that it is against the spirit of the age to insult the intelligence of one class of citizens by pandering to the silly superstitions of another? I give it on information and belief that Governor Pillsbury is not, at heart, a Christian; and if the rationalistic thought of Minnesota was a mass as compact as the Evangelical, no one believes for a moment that he would dare hold the entire Commonwealth up to the contempt of that portion of the enlightened world which has stricken from the limbs of its intellect the shackles of creeds and deposited them as a curiosity in the museum of history. But he is a politician. That he does not adorn his high position, all of us can see; but the position does adorn him. And so he loves it, and takes the politician's way of holding it, by pandering to the grossest superstition,—a superstition which makes the seventeenth century contemptible to the nineteenth, and will make the nineteenth ridiculous in the eyes of the twentieth. But enough for this time of Governor Pillsbury. Let me turn my attention for a brief moment to a full-grown man,—so entirely grown that he will never be governor (probably), and so will never have an opportunity of calling on the churches to fast and pray a comet away from the earth.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll delivered his lecture on "The Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," at three places in this State recently, including Minneapolis. I do not know whether or not he delivered this lecture in the Eastern cities. If not, then you have something yet in store for you. Any puny tribute of mine to Col. Ingersoll would be superfluous, when the united voice of America, press and people, regardless of creed or party, has pronounced him the greatest popular orator in the land.

But I want to point out to the rationalists of America the Herculean labor this one man is doing while they sleep. The thought came to me while I sat beneath the matchless witchery of his eloquence, that if young men could only see, as I thought I could see, the processes of growth through which he had reached his present eminence, the world would not long be in need of missionaries preaching the gospel of growth to every creature. And the process is very simple. He has only been true to himself. Like Socrates and Jesus and Shakespeare, he speaks his own inner thought regardless of praise or blame. That is true greatness wherever it exists; and any man who wears a seven and three-quarters hat, has good health, a conscience, courage, and square-toed honesty, can achieve greatness and make the next century remember him if he only says "I will." Col. Ingersoll will be remembered as one of the representative men of our time, if he lives twenty years longer,—and he will live more than that, or else all signs fail.

I am not a hero-worshipper. I hate any man who accepts ready-made opinions and wears them, like cheap clothing, whether they fit or not. But I love the memory of Thomas Paine and Voltaire and Martin Luther; and it seems to me that Nature would have dropped a stitch somewhere if Col. Ingersoll, John Weiss, R. W. Emerson, and Charles Bradlaugh had not been given to this generation. And we must have men to fill their places in a few years. Will not freethought mothers and fathers take this lesson home? First conscience, then courage, then absolute truth and honesty,—Nature will provide the brains. What a harvest, it seems to me, must be ripening for the twentieth century! Pardon length, and "scatter"!

Very truly your friend,

FRANK J. MEAD.

CIVIL RIGHTS AND POWERS OF WOMEN AND OTHER PEOPLE.

The existing socialism is a multimodal dynamism resultant from the interaction of a definite number of those detached groups of forces called persons. Every man, woman, and child fatally, inevitably, and fully exerts his or her due and proper influence in shaping the laws, creeds, social usages, art, literature, and science of the land. Each person is a greater or lesser power that has no choice but to operate,—modify, limit, and be modified and limited by other powers; the result, moulded in the embrace of envolving Nature, is all human facts that we see or do not see. Our greatest liability to err, in estimating the relations of individual energies, is in forgetting that the more bulky and obtrusive social phenomena are not always the weightiest.

If the number of those unitary sources of influence which we call persons remained the same, and if the degree and mode of power inherent in each remained the same, from the cradle to the grave, and from generation to generation, all our institutions might petrify and remain eternally unchanged save from natural or extra-human causes. But as the life of the individual consists wholly in movements of growth and decay, so the social organism exists only in continual change. The old are waning in energy and authority; the young are pouring into the grand current their novel disturbing personalities,—preparing to become in their turn the effete conservatism that must give way. These new factors that are continually thrusting themselves into the problem, are, it must be remembered, in some degree unlike all who have gone before; the latest generation has a more numerous ancestry than the generations before it, and differs from them necessarily in the sum and quality of its inheritance.

All, therefore, is a perpetual never-finished process of adjustment and readjustment of forces. The notion of a complete, lasting equilibrium of personal rights and powers is impracticable, for the rights and powers of persons are continually changing with their physical, intellectual, or moral growth or decay. The term "state" is much of a misnomer; although it may be for short periods static in form, yet its essential source is ever dynamic. The state exists not by any validity of its own, but by the continued operation of the forces that found through it their expression. Although civil stability is in some degree the interest of all, and although there is a powerful party who oppose all change, and would gladly see the state remain a cast-iron imprint of the charter of their peculiar privileges and advantages over their fellows, still the man or party that forgets that there is going on a continuous evolution of new forces, will sooner or later be found fighting against fate.

To the scientific view all human affairs are as completely the product of the play of necessitated forces as were the tremendous phenomena of plant and animal life that preceded man on this planet. This may seem a hard, cruel way of looking at things, as implying that we are but so many scaleless, discarnate dragons tearing each other with genuine dragonish intent only in a more conventional, refined, and covert manner than our homester prototypes. This implication has weight, but less than we might infer if we looked only at those self-constituted apostles of diabolism who disdain to speak to the people save with bayonet, or starvation wages, or lying promise of priest or politician. For it must be remembered that personal weight does not consist alone in physical and intellectual capacity for attack and defence. The most precious part of our possessions is the place we hold in the hearts of all good people. The universal good-will can be bought only with its like; assuredly not with any display of brutal athleticism; nor can the most tremendous physical and intellectual despotism compel it. The weakest have the strongest hold on our sympathies. The powerful, unscrupulous, cruel man shall be destroyed, root and branch, for he has isolated himself in his own selfish might, and repudiated the kinship of his fellows.

Fear not, weakest, obscurest, toiler, martyr, that thy inmost significance can in any wise be suppressed; imagine not, thou most aggressive, un pitying, fighter with whatever weapon—sword of soldier, cunning of priest, trader, or politician, artist's sense, or philosopher's thought—that thy hand can clutch more than thy desert can hold; achievements, reputes, wealth, empire, may be the most unsatisfactory and impotent of shams. The universe is unity and firm integrity of force; all thievish attempts to overbrim a selfish cup from the great ocean of human life and happiness are defeated and punished,—and the worst possible penal doom that befalls over-personalized aims may be in their fullest apparent success. This is the supreme irony of the world; all is granted to man save the knowledge to rightly apportion his desires.

"Sacrificed Nature, lawless, willing,
Chastens by its behests fulfilling;
'Tis past thy power to miss thy aim,
Or make it seem, when won, the same."

The experience of the African members of our Commonwealth is a good illustration of the truth that personal validity is a cause that cannot be detached from its effect, and that the despised left wing in the house of human relations always votes and cannot be ignored. On their advent into this country their individual and collective worth was rated little higher than that of the beasts of the field. But forced toil bred pain, pain bred thought, and thought is power; a stimulating climate and association with a superior race developed them fast. It became evident at last that the destiny of the greatest nation in the world hinged on the fact of the existence in its midst of those four million inoffensive non-voting blackamoors. The day came when, although unable to free themselves directly, they were able to do it indirectly, by their hold on political needs and popular sympathies. If any one thinks the negroes as slaves possessed no political rights or powers, let him suppose them—anywhere from 1840 to 1870—to have been in the twinkling of an eye annihilated, or in any way at once and entirely taken out of the game,—is it not plain how vastly different the problem of American civilization would have been? Without voice in the national councils; with little articulate voice of any sort; lying there dimly apprehended in the hopeless, silent darkness of oppression, nevertheless they were a tremendous force which made itself felt. The hour which brought them nominal freedom and the ballot created in them no new quality, but merely recognized and gave a name to that already existing; it was a tide-mark in the current of their development, that uncreated fatality which nothing can materially retard.

The negroes attained equal civil rights as soon as the great body of them earnestly desired them. Where there is a will there is a way; the main point is to be fully persuaded of what we want, even to the degree of being willing to fight for it,—or, what is harder, endure ridicule. Women will vote as soon as they unitedly wish to. A certain stage of progress is unavoidably accompanied by full republican citizenship. The ballot is not a finality nor a limit to the degree of influence which one may exert upon political and social affairs. If given into the hands of those who are not up to it, it confers on them no new power; it is a weapon, and is naught only to those who can use it. Like the use of gunpowder, it is an instrumentality through which the growing equalization of human rights and powers operates. All will come in time to the skilful wielding of the ballot; but many ere then will have passed onward to a stage where the counting of noses, the use of weapons of every sort, and the policy and necessity of balancing one class interest against another, will be obsolete ideas.

If woman desires equal civil rights and powers with man, she must accept even as man has done (?) the lesson that all experience teaches; namely, that freedom and priestly rule cannot consist together. In proportion as she relieves herself from priestly incubus—the voice of unreasoned authority in any and every shape,—in like proportion will she find herself becoming possessed of political rights and powers.

When we move altogether, leaving no weakest or most unfortunate one behind to be trampled under by the great host, then only can be revealed to us the full meaning of humanity and Nature; then shall the man-made wall between good and evil fall to the ground; then shall the self-luminous power in all being, eclipsed before by the dulness of our vision, burst forth and scatter from their last lurking-places the bloody shadows that self now casts.

G. E. TUFTS.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y.

ROBERT COLLYER recently said concerning the Methodists: "When a great church, whose power has been felt in every corner of the land, finds that her ministers have given up the noble austerity which made her great and good, and the self-sacrifice for the souls of men, which would send them gladly where the need was, and have taken to log-rolling for the choicest places as the time comes round for change, and can afford to let a bishop and a brotherhood pray for a third term with one eye on heaven and the other on traveling consulships, and other delectable pickings, and—I will not use the other word—you can make up your mind that there is a drift in that church from inwardness to outwardness, and from that again to selfishness, and that her days are numbered for any noble use except she repent and do her first works."—Liberal Christian.

A SCOTCHMAN asked an Irishman, "Why were half-farthings coined in England?" Pat's answer was, "To give Scotchmen an opportunity of subscribing to charitable institutions."

THE LONDON PULPIT.

BY MONCURE D. CONWAY.

LONDON, April 5, 1877.

The conferences which Dr. Parker, of the City Temple, has been calling together to discuss the subject of preaching excite various criticisms. The convener himself is regarded by nearly everybody outside of his denomination, except Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Cowper-Temple, as an ambitious and somewhat vapid orator. He aspires to be the Beecher of London, but he has by no means the talent of Beecher. Nevertheless, he has an endless flow of language and a congregation too uncultured to recognize his borrowings. His ordinary sensations are effected by startling and strained inventions of situations and incidents between the lines of Scripture. I do not think very highly of the London pulpit, but it might easily become worse by taking its cue from the fidgety Congregationalist of the City Temple. His own denomination—called here "Independents," a sort of de-Calvinized Presbyterians—have in London far better representatives of real pulpit eloquence. The Rev. J. Allanson Picton, for instance, is at once a scholar and an orator. He is, however, the latitudinarian of his denomination, as Dean Stanley is of the Church, though he finds far fewer supporters than the Dean, and has nearly preached his congregation away. Another very liberal and able minister of the same persuasion is the Rev. Dr. Raleigh, who is, however, more cautious in his utterances, and has his reward in having been recently called to the most aristocratic congregation which belongs to his connection. The Rev. Mark Wilkes is also latitudinarian, and preaches very interesting sermons. The Wesleyans are without any very eminent preachers in London. The Established Church gets hold of most of its talented youths when they become educated. The old Presbyterians are very thin, and their pulpits are chiefly occupied by Scotchmen, the Rev. Donald Fraser being, perhaps, their oldest man. There are some preachers whom it is hard to classify. For example, the Rev. Newman Hall has a service which allies him with the Established Church, while in doctrine he is all things to all men,—that is to say, he is nothing in particular. He is a rather windy and sensational man, somewhat of the City Temple type, though rather more Pecksniffian. The Baptists have no man of much power, and none of eminence, except Spurgeon. If he were to die I don't know where the Baptist Church could be found.

In the great swarming world of the tradespeople and the uneducated, Spurgeon appears to me the most effective preacher in London. He is more solidly in earnest, more simple and sympathetic than any man I have named, unless it be Picton; and yet his celebrity is largely due to his being in himself virtually the whole Baptist Church. The old Presbyterian churches have been mainly inherited by the Unitarians. Puritanism here, as in New England, became ultimately represented by negation and rationalism. But the Unitarian pulpit is certainly feeble in London. Its preachers are generally amiable and scholarly, but they lack the power of getting hold of the people. Even Martineau, who was so long their leading preacher, did not manage to reach the people, and his impressive discourses were delivered to a handful of cultivated gentlemen and ladies, who had to make up with their loving admiration for the paucity of their numbers. The most effective Unitarian preacher about London has for some years been an ex-Catholic priest, the Rev. R. Rodolphus Suffield, who brought into his new religious relations that fire which, it must be admitted, is characteristic of many English Catholic preachers, and which makes Cardinal Manning the successful rival of any man the sects around him can produce. "Father" Suffield is a Christian Theist. The Rev. Charles Voysey attracts still a good congregation from those who are emerging from the Church of England, and he is always popular and interesting. With Rabbi Marks and Dr. Adler the Jewish pulpit is well represented. However, the Broad Church of the Established Religion still holds its own in the London pulpit against all rivals, and, no doubt will continue to exceed the rest so long as the Church is so well able to outbid all others in the advantages that can be offered to young men with a turn for the ministry. The Broad Church offers the youth a freedom which he can hardly find elsewhere along with pecuniary support and social rank. The clergyman not only belongs to the upper classes ex officio, and however humble his birth, but he is appointed to his place by the individual owner of his "living," and so occupies an independent position towards his congregation. They may complain of his doctrines or his ways, but unless they can get a Bishop to interfere—and a Bishop's normal condition is to be motionless—they are helpless. They indulge in a large range of subjects,—these clergymen. The Rev. Mr. Haweis, for instance, recently preached a discourse on Mr. Whistler's decoration of Mr. Leyland's grand-room with picturesque peacocks, and a fine sermon it was, too. Mr. Haweis is an eloquent man, and it is wonderful after his tiny figure has limped into the pulpit to see how his stature rises, and how stately he becomes under his inspiration. Stopford Brooke has all the copious flow of metaphor and all the fire which his Irish blood can bestow, and he is bold and heretical; many a Unitarian sail flaps because of the breeze that fills his own. He preaches of the poets and philosophers, and pours invective on Orthodox dogmas—especially those of hell and damnation,—and is himself a poet. He has the advantage of a handsome face and form, too, and a flexible, pleasing voice. The Rev. Llewellyn Davies, on whom the mantle of Dr. Maurice has fallen; the Rev. Canon Farrar, who more than sustains the traditions of Canon Kingsley's ministrations; the Rev. Abbott Smith, of the city; the Dean of Westminster, of whom I have so often written, and others that might be named, give the Church of England a power which no other denomination can hope to attain so long as a State Church exists. I speak now only of London. Yet from outside of London, and especially from the great universities, there are continually coming reinforcements of the Church pulpit. There is one eminent preacher in particular whose occasional visits to London are welcomed by a large circle of admirers,—namely, Dr. Jowett, Head Master of Balliol College, Oxford. Dr. Jowett almost tops Dean Stanley in his independence. He doesn't owe the magnates of his Church much deference, and he doesn't pay them much; in fact, the gray-headed philosopher ignores the men who for so many years forced him to give his labors at Oxford for a pittance that could not support him for much more than a month in the year. He is now boss, so to speak, and follows his own mind. Some dismay was caused, as you may imagine, by his having Mr. and Mrs. Lewes (George Eliot) as his guests at Oxford; but dismay would be a feeble word to express the feeling aroused by an incident which occurred on the Sunday during which the two famous heretics staid there. On that Sunday Lewes and his wife went to hear their host preach. Jowett had gone on before them, and he was just ascending to the pulpit when he saw his guests enter the door. The church was crowded, and the guests were vainly looking for seats. Jowett beckoned them to advance, and they did so very timidly, not being much used to churches. They supposed seats would be found among the dons and solemn folk, but there were none; meanwhile Jowett still beckoned, they shyly advancing, when they were presently established on each side of the communion-table, in the large high-backed chairs usually reserved for Bishops, where they sat fronting the amazed congregation, and hardly able to conceal their sense of the novelty of the situation, until absorbed in the magnificent sermon. This may be safely regarded as the boldest thing ever done by an English clergyman.

I have mentioned all the specially able preachers I can think of in London, and there cannot be many more which could be included in the most liberal list of our pulpit powers. But what are these among these four millions? It would require a miracle equal to that of the loaves and fishes to feed this multitude with these few brains, and all the more since it is notorious that the great mass of ministers here are insupportably dull. There are not many, indeed, who can be called illiterate; but no one can pass many Sundays in London without seeing whence Charles Dickens drew his Stigginses and Chadbands. I feel quite certain that if other professions and the various branches of work in London had in them no higher average of ability than the pulpit has, "Ichabod" (the glory has departed) might be written on all the walls. The stupidities passively endured on Sunday would not be tolerated in the secular affairs of Monday. For the majority religion—in that narrow sense which excludes from it vast realms of nature and human interest—has a monopoly on Sunday. On Good Friday, when a Vicar complained that his church was emptied by the superior attractions of a neighboring circus, it might have occurred to him that it was a better plan than trying to suppress the circus to get up something in his church superior to the circus. If, on Sunday, every preacher in London had to compete with open art-galleries, museums, and scientific lectures, it would be the best thing possible for the pulpits. Monopoly means mediocrity. However, I do not intend to ascribe the phenomenon of clerical dullness to this cause, solely or even chiefly. The power of the pulpit has declined because the age of convictions has declined. The old sanctions are weakened or gone. The old dogmas that once filled men with terror and hope seem to survive only in perpetual apologies for their existence. Not one of them can awaken our most popular clergyman to so much enthusiasm as a room cunningly ornamented with peacocks.—Cincinnati Commercial.

PROTECT THE CHILDREN.

FORMATION OF A SOCIETY TO CARE FOR THE UNPROTECTED.

A well attended meeting of ladies and gentlemen interested in the formation of a Society for the Protection of Children was held last evening in the parlors of the Woman's Club, 4 Park Street, under a call signed by a large number of the prominent residents of the city. The meeting was called to order by the Rev. M. J. Savage.

The Rev. Geo. H. Vibbert was chosen to preside, and Mr. Loring Moody to serve as Secretary. Mr. Moody presented the report of the committee appointed at a previous meeting to consider the need of such a society. The report considered the questions whether or not the work proposed to be done ought to be, whether it is done by existing societies, and whether the new society would or could perform the work. The report considered, further, the scope of existing societies, and reached the conclusion that the new society was a necessity. In conclusion, the report recommended the appointment of another committee to draft a constitution and nominate a board of officers for the "Massachusetts Children's Protective Society," the committee to report at an adjourned meeting, which meeting Mr. John D. Wright, President of a similar society in New York, and Mrs. Mary A. Livermore should be invited to address.

Mr. Savage said it was proper to state that one member of the committee had not agreed that the new society was a necessity, and had not voted in favor of the report, though he made no opposition.

Mr. Moody stated further that it was the intention to organize this spring, make a codification of the laws under which the society could act, and then next winter secure any additional needed legislation. He said it was designed to make the society wholly secular in character, and to keep it free from political influences.

Mr. Crosby of the Children's Mission opposed the organization of the society, on the ground that the work was attended to by the societies already in existence.

Mr. Moody thought there was a pressing need for the new organization, and would say that it appeared to him that some of the existing societies for children's care had a cheap way of doing their work. The speaker had suggested the new project to Chief of Police Savage, and that official thanked God that the scheme was contemplated.

Mr. John Wetherbee said that the fact that so many poor and destitute children were on the street was an indication that there was something wanting in the present societies. They had been existing for years, and had not attended to their whole duty.

Dr. Wellington gave a sketch of the rise of similar movements in New York, and was certain that in Boston the work was not wholly done by the existing societies. He did not think legislative action was necessary so much as the influences of the loving heart and the energetic mind in this humanitarian work.

Mr. R. P. Halliwell moved that the report of the committee be adopted.

Col. Tufts thought that the difficulty in the way of the new undertaking would be in getting a legal enactment to enable the society to do the work. He thought going into the homes of the poor and taking their children away from them, no matter how wretched the home or how vicious the surrounding influences, would be an invasion of personal liberty which would not be tolerated. Children, too, would cling to their homes and need punishment to reform them. In concluding, the speaker said the Westboro Reform School was a kind and benevolent institution, notwithstanding what has been said of it. The reform he would advocate would take root in the family home and not elsewhere.

Mr. Savage said he had looked carefully over the ground, and, though reluctant to indorse new projects of this kind, had become thoroughly convinced of the necessity of a secular society for the protection of children in the city. The work had not been done, and it called for some one to do it, though the present societies had been in existence many years. Moreover, all the societies already flourishing were tinged with sectarianism, which seriously impeded their advance in thoroughly open and humanitarian work, and this surely was a calling in which creed should be ignored. He was fully in accord with the desire to make a secular society which would be controlled by no religious or irrational body, but be devoted to the alleviation of miseries and dangers of the city youth. He was willing to give his own hearty efforts in forwarding this plan.

Mr. Savage then retired, and the question was put and the report of the committee unanimously adopted.

Mr. Moody then moved the appointment of a Committee of Five on Organization. The motion prevailed, and Messrs. R. P. Halliwell, Alfred Childs, and Loring Moody, and Mrs. William Thorndike and Mrs. Sarah B. Otis were chosen. The committee retired at once.

Dr. Wellington again addressed the meeting, telling several sad circumstances in his experience in which children had suffered for want of such a society as the one proposed. He was sure he did not understate the difficulties attending the formation, however.

Mr. Chase Cole, chief of the truant officers, said there was a law in the State which enabled the authorities to take children from their parents under certain circumstances, and he told several instances in which children had suffered for want of better protection.

The Committee on Organization then reported, through Mr. Loring Moody, as follows:—

President, Abbott Lawrence, Boston. Vice-Presidents, Martin Brimmer, Boston; Amos A. Lawrence, Boston; Henry W. Longfellow, Cambridge; James Russell Lowell, Cambridge; Samuel E. Sewall, Boston; Phillips Brooks, Boston; James Freeman Clarke, Boston; Sarah S. Russell, Boston; Anna C. Lodge, Boston; Mary Hemmenway, Boston; S. Griffith Morgan, New Bedford; Rachel Howland, New Bedford; Isaac Davis, Warrenton; Mrs. P. S. Canfield, Warrenton. Secretary, Loring Moody. Treasurer, Charles F. Shimmie. Directors, Abbott Lawrence, Mrs. Fenno Tudor, Mrs. G. Howland Shaw, Theodore Lyman, Nathan Appleton, Mrs. Wm. Thorndike, Mrs. Sarah B. Otis, Mrs. James K. Mills, M. J. Savage, Charles F. Shimmie, R. P. Halliwell, Miss M. L. Putnam, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, Mrs. Quincy A. Shaw, Frederic Robbins, Loring Moody.

All of the above were elected subject to their acceptance, and the directors were voted the power to fill any vacancies. The constitution was also submitted by Mr. Moody, and the entire report of the committee was adopted. The meeting then adjourned, subject to the call of the officers.—Boston Journal, May 23.

TWO LITERARY LADIES were lately witnesses in a trial. One of them, upon hearing the usual questions asked, "What is your name?" and "How old are you?" turned to her companion and said, "I do not like to tell my age; not that I have any objection to its being known, but I don't want it published in all the newspapers." "Well," said the witty Mrs. —, "I will tell you how you can avoid it. You have heard the objection to all hearsay evidence; tell them you don't remember when you were born, and all you know of it is by hearsay." The ruse took, and the question was not pressed.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEBBINS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenafly, N.J.
 J. L. STODDARD, Boston.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with 'increasing interest.'"

 WM. J. POTTER Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyses the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of these several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order.
