II. The affirmation of impartial, universal salvation naturally follows the denial of everlasting punishment. This affirmation the Liberal Christians emphatically make, especially that denomination of them known as Universalists. But did Jesus make this affirmation? Do his words, fairly interpreted, allow any class of Christians to hold belief in universal salvation on his authority? He nowhere says, he nowhere intimates, that any will be saved who reject him and his gospel. On the contrary, he plainly intimates that only those will be saved who have been chosen and given to him by God (Mark xiii., 20, 27; John xvii., 2, et seq.). He is reported in one instance as saying (Matt. x., 32, 33), "Every one, therefore, who shall acknowledge me before men, him will I also acknowledge before my Father who is in heaven; but whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father who is in heaven." This appears, certainly, to be very explicit and frank. Does it mean anything else than that he will recommend to God for salvation such, and such only, as confess him to be the Christ? He says on another occasion (Matt. xxiv., 31) that at the end of the world he "will send forth his angels . . . and they will gather his chosen." To choose is to select from, and implies the rejection of some. But he was once asked the direct question (Luke xiii., 23), "Lord, are there few that are to be saved?" This gave him an excellent occasion to say, if he had wished to, that not a few, but all, are to be saved. And yet he did not say this; nor was he non-committal. Promptly he replied (v., 24) that the way to salvation is through a "narrow door," and that "many will seek to enter in and will not be able." This implies—does it not?—that there are many who will not be saved. It certainly does not hint at universal salvation. There are numerous other instances in the Gospels, where Jesus is reported as saying that only such as believe on him, and accept him, will be accepted and loved of God. And all along through the subsequent books of the New Testament it is with many repetitions declared that there is salvation only in Christ, the exceptions to this doctrine being rare and sporadic. If there be salvation only in Christ, then surely there be few and not many that are to be saved.

In these two doctrines of everlasting punishment and partial salvation, Christ and Christianity might well be corrected by Zoroaster and Parseism; for Zoroaster explicitly taught, and Parsees on his authority believe, that all punishment is intended to be disciplinary and remedial, and that all souls, even Ahriman himself, will finally be purged from evil and secured to the good.

III. All Liberal Christians rejoice in having well rid their faith of a personal devil. This frightful monster they have exorcised from their creed; his horrible shade they have laid low. But how they can claim to do this in consistency with the belief and teachings of Jesus and his Apostles, it passes my ability to understand. The Devil, in Jesus' time, was a notorious individual. He neither was nor cared to be concealed. He had thrown down his gauntlet at God's feet; he had rallied all his retainers and followers, and was fighting a desperate fight for the bodies and souls of men. All this was in the tradition, the belief, of Jesus' time; it was a part of the mental and moral atmosphere that all men breathed. And that he imbibed it, that he accepted the tradition of the Devil and of his moral warfare with God, is as plain on the pages of the New Testament as words can make it. Over and over Jesus speaks of the Devil, of Satan, of the Evil One; and never does he hint that he regards that being as a hero of fiction and not of fact; never does he hint that he had any other belief about the Devil than the popular one of his day,—which represented the Father of lies as having a kingdom and sceptre of his own, as lurking about in person and by proxy to invent, incite, and do all the evil possible, and against whom every one must be on his guard lest he should be seized and bound by him. Jesus' description of the traditional and popular Devil is so frequent and full that we should indeed be blind with prejudice not to recognize him. His allusions to the One whom he believed to be especially inimical to his own mission are copious and explicit. Jesus evidently believed that he was sent to defeat all Satan's designs, to wrest the world of man and Nature from his control, as well as to summon all to a better and more faithful service of God. And the followers of Jesus believed that their master did defeat the great Adversary; that he descended even into hell and warred with the Prince of the powers of darkness, and so broke his control over men that they could the more easily escape him.

IV. Another important particular wherein Liberal Christians differ from Orthodox is in the exaltation they give to this natural, earthly life. They say it is good, it is pleasant, it is desirable. They say it is not a vale of tears, a fleeting show, an illusive and sinful scene. They say this life ought to be made the most of; this world ought to be used and enjoyed, and dwelt in as long as possible. And they say that religion would best give its attention to the making this life long and happy, to the perfecting and perpetuating of all natural, social relations and institutions.

All this is eminently reasonable and right. But all this has not its best, its fullest, its most explicit authority from Jesus. I am impressed that he did not do justice to this life and this world. Religion in his view seems to be chiefly useful in helping us to get ready to go to heaven, not to dwell on this earth; in preparing us to die, not to live; in making us to be saints without bodies, rather than saints in bodies. Much of his teaching, I confess, if we are faithful to it, will help us to live well no less than die well. But this is the point I make,—that Jesus seemed to have heaven, not earth, in view, as the arena where his regenerated followers would most appropriately figure, and where they would find their true satisfaction and reward. It is true he said, "The kingdom of heaven is amongst you." But the kingdom to which he referred was that of the Son of Man,—the kingdom of the Messiah; and that kingdom he expressly said was "not of this world." It was a kingdom, if not in heaven, then heaven or the New Jerusalem come down, which was to abolish the existing order of things, and leave no trace of the present earthly life. Jesus treated that life with unconcealed disdain; he continually referred every high hope, every grand consummation, to the life to come. Commerce and trade were very dispensable in his eyes; he called men away from them, and in general from all secular concerns, to become devoted to his cause. Religion in his view was not to moralize business and practical life; it was the rather to abolish them, and make each man's occupation that of saving his own and others' souls. Thousands and millions of his followers have taken him at his word; have made religion, not the crown of every-day life, but something wholly apart from it; have despised this life and this world, libelling both with depreciating epithets; have poured contempt on riches and held up poverty as a virtue; have mortified and crucified everything pertaining to the physical and natural man. I am free to confess that in much of this they have exceeded the authority of Jesus' teaching and example; and yet from many things he said and did the suggestion and impulse of Christian asceticism and monasticism proceeded. The present sentiment and tone of Orthodox Christians, who so generally regard religion as a means not of living but of dying well; not of making this world heavenly, but of getting happily out of it into another; not of helping to be good for goodness' sake, but for the sake of being "saved," and obtaining the reward of heaven,—are, I believe, derived with much legitimacy from the teachings of Jesus and the Apostles. And here again is another opportunity for Christianity to be amended by one of the ethnic religions. Confucius made religion especially bear upon this life and this world, upon the making them orderly, pure, and beautiful, without so much reference to anything in the hereafter. If the religion of Confucius lacked spirituality, the religion of Jesus no less lacks practicality.

It is not necessary to pursue further the scrutiny of Jesus' teachings, to show that in some most important particulars there is a wide variance between them and the views held by certain Christians laying claim to his authority. Much more material is at hand for this purpose, but we believe we have already done enough to demonstrate the discrepancy between ideal and historical Christianity; between the beliefs of "Liberal Christians" and the teachings of him whom they own as master. We have done this in no other interests than those of truth. We would detract from nothing and nobody that which is their due; we only seek to secure justice to those all round the circle. We love Jesus and his religion more than we can tell; but we love the truth far better. And the truth will not be damaged by any such investigation and comparison as we have pursued; it can afford to have all facts brought to light, and everything subjected to scrutiny in the world's great exposition of historic religions.

For one, I look not to the past for perfection, but to the ever-dawning future. I look to no historic person for a perfect leader, to no historic religion for a perfect rule of faith. To the fulness of the Infinite, to the Spirit of Truth that can lead into all truth, I turn my expectant eyes. For what of good the past has given, or may give, I can feel nothing but gratitude; but of the future I have a hope, an expectation, which is well-nigh exultant. For the fuller light to be shed from that I look and long. May no eye be averted, no heart be cold, to see and welcome it!—The Radical, May, 1872.

NEW ENGLAND INDIANS.—THEIR ANCIENT CUSTOMS AND BELIEFS.

[The following particulars respecting the Aborigines of New England are given by Roger Williams (Historical Collections, vol. III. p. 203). They are full of interest to those who like to know what sort of notions and usages have prevailed outside of so-called Christian civilization. Inasmuch as they were reported by a Christian (though one who was persecuted by the "Orthodox" for his liberalism), we suppose they may be regarded as authentic.—A. W. S.]

The natives "constantly anoint their heads, as the Jews did;" they "gave dowries for their wives, as the Jews did." In accordance with "the Greeks and other nations," they call the seven stars "mosk or paukunnawaw," the bear. "They have many strange relations of one Wetucks, a man that wrought great miracles amongst them, walking upon the sea, etc." The "southwest, Sowwanu, is the great subject of their discourse; from thence their traditions; there" is "the court of their great god Cawtantowwit; at the southwest are their forefathers' souls;" and there "they go themselves, when they die: from the southwest came their corn and beans, out of the great god Cawtantowwit's field." Some connection is inferred with the Southwest wind being the "pleasingest" and most desired by the natives, "making fair weather ordinarily." They "are exceedingly delighted with salutations in their own language;" are "remarkably free and courteous to invite all strangers into their houses;" and he "acknowledged amongst them an heart sensible of kindnesses," having "reaped kindness again from many, seven years after, when" he himself "had forgotten." Their provision for a journey of three or four days is "nokehick," parched meal: of their other dishes, parched corn, "misick-quash" (succotash), boiled corn whole, "manu-squashedash," beans, and "nawsaum" (sawamp), a kind of meal pottage unparched, are mentioned. "They generally all take tobacco;" one of the causes alleged being "against the rheum, which causeth the tooth-ache." Howling "and shouting in their alarm, they having no drums nor trumpets." When "they have had a bad dream, which they conceive to be a threatening from God, they fall to prayer at all times of the night, especially early before day."

Having "no letters nor arts, it is admirable how quick they are in casting up great numbers, with the help of grains of corn, instead of Europe's pens or counters;" the names of numbers up to "nquitte-mittannug," thousand, are given; and even by combination, up to one hundred thousand. "They hold the band of brotherhood so dear, that when one had committed a murder and fled, they executed his brother; and it is common for a brother to pay the debt of a brother deceased;" their "virgins are distinguished by a bashful falling down of the hair over their eyes; there are no beggars among them, nor fatherless children unprovided for; their affections, especially to their children, are very strong;" and this, "together with want of learning, makes their children saucy, bold, and undutiful." "Nickquenum," I am going home, is a solemn word amongst them; and no man will offer any hindrance to him, who after some absence is going to visit his family, and use this word. Two "families will live comfortably and lovingly in a little round house, of some fourteen or sixteen feet over, and so more, and more families in proportion." They "are as full of business, and as impatient of hindrance, in their kind, as any merchant in Europe." They "have amongst them natural fools, either so born, or accidentally deprived of reason." They "are much delighted after battle, to hang up the hands and heads of their enemies." Their "desire of, and delight in news is great as the Athenians;" and "upon any tidings" I have "seen near a thousand in a round," and many "will deliver themselves" with "very emphatical speech and great action, commonly an hour, and sometimes two hours together;" in "time of war, he that is a messenger runs swiftly, and at every town the messenger comes, a fresh messenger is sent;" their word for letter is from "wussuckwhommin," to paint, "for having no letters their painting comes the nearest." They "have thirteen months, according to the several moons; and they give to each of them significant names." It "is admirable to see what paths their naked hardened feet have made in the wilderness, in most stony and rocky places." I have "known many of them run between fourscore or an hundred miles in a summer's day, and back within two days." They "are joyful in meeting of any in travel, and will strike fire either with stones or sticks, to take tobacco, and discourse a little together." I have travelled "many a hundred miles among them, without need of stick or staff, for any appearance of danger amongst them; yet it is a rule amongst them that it is not good for a man to travel without a weapon, nor alone." If justice be refused in case of robbery between persons of different states, "they grant a kind of letter of mart to take satisfaction themselves; yet they are careful not to exceed in taking from others beyond the proportion of their own loss: I could never hear that murders or robberies are comparably so frequent as in parts of Europe, amongst the English, French, etc." A certain small bird is called "sachim," from its "courage and command over greater birds" (the king-bird, Muscicapa tyrannus); a hawk, "wushowunan," is kept "tame about their houses, to keep the little birds from their corn" (compare origin of falconry).

They "are very exact and punctual in the bounds of their lands belonging to this or that" people, "even to a river, brook, etc.; and I have known them make bargain and sale among themselves for a small piece or quantity of ground;" when "a field is to be broken up," all "the neighbors, men and women, forty, fifty, a hundred, etc. join, and come in to help freely; with friendly joining they break up their fields, build their forts, hunt the woods, stop and kill fish in the rivers;" the "women to this day, notwithstanding our hoes, do use their natural hoes of shells and wood." The "variety of their dialects and proper speech, within thirty or forty miles of each other, is very great, as appears in" the word for dog.

"Paumpagussit" is the "name which they give that deity or god-head which they conceive to be in the sea." A sail is called "sepeakehig," and "their own reason hath taught them to pull off a coat or two, and set it up on a small pole, with which they will sail before the wind ten or twenty miles;" some of their canoes will carry "twenty, thirty, forty men;" and "I have known thirty or forty of their canoes filled with men, and near as many more of their enemies, in a sea fight." I have heard a native lamenting the loss of a child, "cry out, 'O God, thou hast taken away my child! thou art angry with me; O turn thine anger from me, and spare the rest of my children:' if they receive any good in hunting, fishing, harvest, etc., they acknowledge God in it; yea, if it be but an ordinary accident, a fall, etc., they will say, God was angry and did it: but" they "branch their godhead into many gods," and "have given me the names of thirty-seven, all which in their solemn worship they invoke," as the great southwest god Cawtantowwit, the eastern god, the western god, the northern god, the southern god, the house god, the woman's god, the children's god, "Muckquachuckquand,"—the last-named, believed by a dying native to have appeared to him "many years before, and bid him, when he was in distress, call upon him." They also worship created things, in which "they conceive doth rest some deity,"—as the sun god, the moon god, the sea god, the "fire god: 'Can it, say they, be but this fire must be a god, or divine power, that out of a stone will arise in a spark, and when a poor naked Indian is ready to starve with cold in the house, and especially in the woods, often saves his life, doth dress all our food for us, and if it be angry will burn the house about us, yea if a spark fall into the dry wood, burns up the country:' besides there is a general custom amongst them, at the apprehension of any excellency in men, women, birds, beasts, etc., to cry out, 'Manittoo,' that is, it is a god." And further, "they conceive that there are many gods, or divine powers, within the body of a man, in his pulse, his heart, his lungs, etc.;" in sickness, the "powwaw" or priest "comes close to the sick person, and performs many strange actions about him, and threatens and conjures out the sickness." They "have an exact form of king, priest, and prophet;" their "priests perform and manage their worship; their wise and old men, of which number the priests are also, make solemn speeches and orations, or lectures, to them concerning religion, peace, or war, and all things."

The word for soul "cowwewonck," is "derived from 'cowwene' to sleep; because, say they, it works and operates when the body sleeps: 'michachunch' the soul, is a higher notion, which is of affinity with a word signifying a looking glass or clear resemblance."

Besides "their general subjection to the highest sachims, to whom they carry presents, they have also particular protectors, under-sachims, to whom they also carry presents, and upon any injury received, and complaint made, these protectors will revenge it: the sachims, although they have an absolute monarchy over the people, yet they will not conclude of ought that concerns all, either laws, or subsidies, or wars, unto which the people are adverse, and by gentle persuasion cannot be brought;" the "most usual custom with them in executing punishments, is for the sachim either to beat, or whip, or put to death with his own hand; to which the common sort most quietly submit." Marriage "they solemnize by consent of parents and publick approbation, publicly;" the "number of wives is not stinted; yet the chief nation in the country, the Narragansets, generally have but one wife;" the "men put away frequently for other occasions beside adultery; yet I know many couples that have lived twenty, thirty, forty years together."

They have money: the white, called "wompam," made "of the stem or stock of the periwinkle, when all the shell is broken off;" and the black, called "suck-kaubock," made of the shell of the "poquaubock;" and for this money the natives "bring down all their sorts of furs, which they take in the country." They have great difference in their money; "some that will not pass without allowance; and some again, made of a counterfeit shell; and their very black, counterfeited by a stone and other materials; yet I never saw any of them much deceived."

Of their occupations, some "follow only making bows; some, arrows; some, dishes; and the women make all their earthen vessels; some follow fishing; some, hunting; most on the sea-side make money, and store up shells in summer against winter," and before obtaining awl-blades, "they made shift to bore their shell money with stone; they also felled their trees with stone set in a wooden staff." They have games, "private and publick;" one, "like unto the English cards, yet instead of cards, they play with strong rushes; secondly, they have a kind of dice, which are plumstones painted, which they cast" in a tray; "ntakesemin, I am telling or counting, for their play is a king of arithmetic;" their "publick games are solemnized with the meeting of hundreds, sometimes thousands;" the "chief gamblers amongst them much desire to make their gods side with them in their games; therefore I have seen them keep" a kind of stone "which is like unto a crystal, which they dig out of the ground, under some tree thunder-smitten, and from this stone they have an opinion of success." Besides gambling-houses, "puttuckqua-puonck, a playing arbour," on "which they hang great store of their stringed money; have great stakings town against town, and two chosen out of the rest by course to play the game;" they "have great meetings of foot-ball playing, only in summer, town against town," at "which they have great stakings, but seldom quarrel;" they "will sometimes stake and lose their money, clothes, house, corn, and themselves, if single persons; they then become weary of their lives, and ready to make away themselves."

The "mocking between their great ones is a great kindling of wars amongst them; yet I have known some of their chiefs say, 'What should I hazard the lives of my precious subjects, them and theirs, to kindle a fire which no man knows how far and how long it will burn, for the barking of a dog?' their wars are far less bloody than the cruel wars of Europe, and seldom twenty slain in a pitched battle;" and yet, "all that are slain are commonly slain with great valour and courage, for the conqueror ventures into the thickest, and brings away the head of his enemy."

They have sweating-houses, "pesuonck, a hot house;" into which, after being heated with fire on "a heap of stones in the middle," the men "ten, twelve, twenty, more or less, enter at once stark naked;" and "which doubtless is a great means of preserving them, and recovering them from diseases;" in sickness, "their only drink in all their extremities is a little boiled water." At "the first being sick, all the women and maids black their faces;" and "upon the death of the sick, the father, or husband, and all his neighbors, the men also,—as the English wear black mourning clothes,—wear black" faces: "sequatol, he is in black, that is, he hath some dead in his house." As "they abound in lamentations for the dead, so they abound in consolation to the living," using different expressions, "because they abhor to mention the dead by name; and therefore if any man bear the name of the dead, he changeth his name; and if any stranger accidentally name him, he is checked; and if any wilfully name him he is fined; and among states, the naming of their dead sachins is one ground of their wars": "mockutasuit, one of chief esteem, who winds up in mats and coats, and buries the dead; commonly some wise, grave, and well descended man hath that office."

ANECDOTE OF THOMAS PAINE.

[In the fifth volume of Walter Savage Landor's Imaginary Conversations, we find the following anecdote of Thomas Paine, illustrating his kindness and nobility of nature, which we do not remember ever to have seen printed elsewhere.—A. W. S.]

On the following day I went again to Mr. Paine's. "Never mind my face," said he; "water makes it blister—there are blisters now already,—and soap cracks the skin. I needed not have written that book [the Age of Reason]; they tell me the arguments are found in others; I had no money to buy, nor time to read, them. Gibbon was pensioned, I was prosecuted, for one and the same thing; but he was a member of Parliament, and wore powder."

"And if neither you nor he had written any such things, would you or the world have been the worse?"

"Certainly," said he, "the world would have been the worse, because the less wise."

"Ah! Mr. Paine, he is not over-rich in knowledge who cannot afford to let the greater part lie fallow, and to bring forward his produce according to the season and the demand. Wisdom is only a good as being an instrument of happiness. There have been great masses of it in the world, collected by experience and approved by experiment; we only survey the fragments, most of which are preserved by religion. The ancients had their sacred groves; pirates and philosophers laughed at them as they passed; they were cut down: pestilences followed. Experience had evinced their utility to simpler and calmer men. Whenever people meet—"

A grave, decent-looking man now entered, whom the general saluted in silence, giving him his hand; and Mr. Paine said, "Take a seat, Zachariah. This young man is as religious as you are, and you will hear him with as much pleasure as I do. There are two good things in the world, reason and sincerity. I am convinced he has the one; we will try him on the other. Go on, go on; let us lose no time."

I continued: "Wherever people meet and bring with them good intentions, they humanize more and more at the sight of common wants and common sufferings; they warm in sympathy, they strengthen in forbearance. You think no religion good; I think all are, from which cruelty, fraud, lucre, and domination are excluded. We mortals want supports; some require a crutch iron-cramped, some are contented if it is well-cushioned, others are kept up fearlessly by the weakest walking-stick. If there is only the probability that a man will be the happier or the honest by one belief than by another, would you hesitate to leave him in possession of it? Wisdom is not to be hazarded with the same levity or indifference as wit. We may acquire the name of deep thinkers at too high a price; which price, like the interest of money, is limited or illicit, rendering the transaction void, and subjecting us to the forfeit of the little we have been toiling to establish. Shall so acute a reasoner, so clear a writer, rub off his hide and canker his flesh to the bone against a tree, striving to push it down because some people sit beneath it on a Sunday, and return to their supper the more contented?"

"That is unfair," said he; "the motive is mis-stated."

"The fact remains," replied I, "under the parable; and I thank you for correcting me on the abuse of language. No man ever argued so fairly as he might have done. We pour in more or fewer words, and weaker or stronger, to gratify our organs, according to our warmth and excitement."

"Carry that home with you," said he, seizing my hand, "and tell the twelve judges, and the score or two of bishops, that they never have said anything so just. Eloquence is the varnish of falsehood; truth has none!"

"What?" said I, taking from my pocket and giving to him my Pascal and Epictetus, "are not these eloquent?"

"Neither of them," answered he; "they are only the best-written books in the world, being the plainest and fullest of ratiocination. That is eloquence which moves the reason by working on the passions. Burke is eloquent; I am not. If I write better than he does, it is because I have seen things more distinctly, and have had the courage to take them up, soft or hard, pretty or ugly, and to turn them on their backs in despite of tooth or claw. Plato would give as noble a description of a rhinoceros as Aristoteles could do; ninety-nine in a hundred would prefer it. The only difference is this: while the one has been confounding it with the camelopardalis, the other has been measuring its joints, counting its teeth, inspecting its belly, and anatomizing the whole animal."

"O Mr. Paine!" said I, earnestly, "let me bring you a few good books; let us open the New Testament together."

"What service will that do?"

"It is the plantain," cried I, "which the reptile man may creep to and chew with advantage while the venom is yet fresh in him."

He replied thus:—"Good books, as you call them, make you comfortable; good brandy makes me so. I have the twelve apostles in this bottle, and they never shall complain that I hold them long imprisoned."

I was discouraged.

"At least, Mr. Paine, leave others their habits while they are harmless, and think it equally so to love God as to love brandy."

"Ay, ay," said he; "jog on quietly, and let your neighbor be robbed and plundered by any rogue who may have the impudence to call him 'my son' or 'my brother' or 'my sheep.'"

"No, sir," answered I, indignantly; "there draw the pen and cry, Stand! For such let there be an Age of Reason and Common Sense. A branch of a fruit-tree may be so covered with insects, and these insects may have eaten into it so deeply, and have so sucked and blighted it, that the best gardener would cut it off totally."

The general left the room on business. Mr. Paine seemed as if he grew tired of the conversation; the gentleman who had entered, and who had taken no part in it, said he would (if I pleased) accompany me. When we were in the street, he thanked me for the defence I had made.

"I wonder," said he, "what motive Mr. Paine can have for his good actions, since he avoids society, and disbelieves (I am afraid) the pleasure God takes in virtue. As for conscience, if that alone were sufficient, and perhaps it might be, he deadens both the bad and the good of it with liquor."

"To speak plainly," answered I, "much as I have heard about him I never heard of his good actions. That he is strictly honest and just I have reason to believe."

"Sir," said he, "let me tell you what he did for me. My name is Zachariah Wilkes. I was arrested in Paris, and condemned to die. I had no friend here, and it was a time when no friend would have served me; Robespierre ruled. 'I am innocent!' I cried, in desperation. 'I am innocent, so help me God! I am condemned for the offence of another.' I wrote a statement of my case with a pencil, thinking at first of addressing it to my judge, then of directing it to the President of the Convention. The jailer, who had been kind to me, gave me a gazette, and told me not to mind seeing my name, so many were there before it."

"Oh!" said I, "though you would not lend me your ink, do transmit this paper to the president."

"No, my friend!" answered he gaily. "My head is as good as yours, and looks as well between the shoulders, to my liking. Why not send it (if you send it anywhere) to the deputy Paine here?" pointing to a column in the paper.

"O God! he must hate and detest the name of Englishman; pelted, insulted, persecuted, plundered—"

"I could give it to him," said the jailer.

"Do, then!" said I, wildly. "One man more shall know my innocence." He came within the half-hour. I told him my name; that my employers were Watt & Boulton, of Birmingham; that I had papers of the greatest consequence; that if I failed to transmit them, not only my life was in question, but my reputation. He replied, "I know your employers by report only; there are no two men less favorable to the principles I profess, but no two upon earth are honest. You have only one great man among you: it is Watt; for Priestley is gone to America. The church-and-king-men would have japed him. He left to these philosophers of the rival school his house to try experiments on; and you may know better than I do how much they found in it of carbon and calx, of silice and argilla."

"He examined me closer than my judge had done; he required my proofs. After a long time I satisfied him. He then said, 'The leaders of the Convention would rather have my life than yours.' If by any means I can obtain your release on my own security, will you promise me to return within twenty days?" I answered, "Sir, the security I can at present give you is trifling,—I should say a mere nothing."

"Then you do not give me your word?" said he.

"I give it, and will redeem it."

"He went away, and told me I should see him again when he could inform me whether he had succeeded. He returned in the earlier part of the evening, looking fixedly upon me, and said, 'Zachariah Wilkes, if you do not return in twenty-four days (four are added) you will be the most unhappy of men; for had you not been an honest one you could not be the agent of Watt & Boulton. I do not think I have hazarded much in offering to take your place on your failure; such is the condition.' I was speechless; he was unmoved. Silence was first broken by the jailer. 'He seems to get fond of the spot, now he must leave it!' I had thrown my arms upon the table toward my liberator, who sat opposite; and I rested my breast and head upon it, too, for my temples ached, and tears had not yet relieved them. He said, 'Zachariah, follow me to the carriage.' The soldiers paid the respect due to his scarf, presenting arms, and drawing up in file as we went along. The jailer called for a glass of wine, gave it me, poured out another, and drank to our next meeting."

"On the fourteenth day I returned to Calais in an American brig. Approaching to Montreuil I saw the girls begin to dance in the meadow; and party after party came tripping down the declivity that leads from the town to the bridge. Some were sitting on the parapet, and communicating a printed paper to many auditors, who, however, mostly quitted them when they heard of a private letter on the side opposite. Passing the arch and entering the town gate, I saw the ruined monastery on the left hand covered with garlands; and men and women were levelling the floor for the reception of several great tables that were standing on the outside. The youths were better-dressed than I had ever seen them, although their coats were old-fashioned. The moment my carriage stopped I cried, 'What festival is this to-day?' The answer was from fifty voices, 'The monster is dead! the Constitution forever!'"

"Robespierre had shot himself, was the intelligence brought by the postillions; a few lines to a few families and a few hand-bills announced the same. I hastened to the capital, to the house of my benefactor."

"You could not have heard it in England?"

"No," replied I, "I heard it at Montreuil; is it true?" He did not answer me, but, turning to the general, said, 'Tate, there is yet English blood in England, though it is run and contraband, and found among people who have no right to it. I wish it may do you no harm, Zachariah. Come; while we are well, let me give you joy.'"

"My son," said an old lady, "how must Jonah have felt when the whale swallowed him?" "Down in the mouth," was young hopeful's reply.

PAGE IMPLORES.

BY JOAQUIN MILLER.

Better it were to sit still by the sea,
Loving somebody and satisfied,—
Better it were to grow babes on the knee,
To anchor you down for all your days,—
Than wander and wander in all these ways,
Land forgotten and love denied.

Better sit still where born, I say,
Wed one sweet woman and love her well,
Laugh with your neighbors, live in their way,
Be it never so simple. The humbler the home,
The nobler, indeed, to bear your part.
Love and be loved with all your heart,
Drink sweet waters and dream in a spell,
Share your delights and divide your tears;
Love and be loved in the old east way,
Ere men knew madness, and came to roam
From the west to the east, and the whole world wide;
When they lived where their fathers lived and died,—
Lived and so loved for a thousand years.

Better it were for a man, I say,— Better, indeed, for a man's own good,—
That he should sit down where he was born,
Be it land of sands or of oil and corn,
Valley of poppies or bleak northland,
White sea border or great black wood,
Or bleak white Winter or bland sweet May,
Or city of smoke or plain of the sun,—
Than wander the world as I have done,
Breaking the heart into bits of clay,
And leaving it scattered on every hand.

The Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 22, 1878.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street; J. T. FAWCETT, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N.B.—The following resolution was adopted by the National Liberal League, at Philadelphia, July 3, 1876: "Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management."

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

F. E. A. REPORT.

The Eleventh Annual Report of the Free Religious Association, printed in pamphlet form, is now ready for distribution. It contains the reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer; essay by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., of New York, on "The Religion of Humanity, and How it may be Organized"; essay by Rev. W. H. Spencer, of Haverhill, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism, and How it is being Disorganized"; and addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George W. Curtis, Anna C. Garlin, Maurice Ellinger, and Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith (the latter including a poem).

Members of the Association who have paid the annual fee of $1.00 within the last twelve months will receive the report free, in all cases where their post-office addresses are known. To others the price is forty cents single copy; four or more in one package, twenty-five cents each.

Address "Free Religious Association," 231 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

IN MR. GILL'S Myths and Songs of the South Pacific, a clan of Hervey Islanders, when on a marauding or murdering expedition, are said to pray to their god as follows: "We are on a thieving expedition; be close to our left side to give aid. Let all be wrapped in sleep; be as a lofty cocoanut-tree to support us." In a very similar strain pray Christian nations at war with each other: each implores its god to help it in murdering and plundering the other.

"THE RELIGION of Jesus did not grow out of an institution," says the Christian Register. That depends, neighbor, upon what you mean by "the religion of Jesus." If you mean love towards God and man, then you are right; for that religion is natural and universal, but is no more the religion of Jesus than of Buddha, or Zoroaster, or Socrates. Jesus was only one among several who gave it a great impetus in the world. But if by "the religion of Jesus" you mean what is called Christianity, then you are wrong in saying that it "did not grow out of an institution;" for Christianity grew out of, and rests today on two institutions,—"Baptism" and the "Lord's Supper." These mean the Confession of Christ; and that is Christianity, as Paul preached it, and as every real Christian clergyman preaches it now. These two institutions, at least, are essential to every Christian Church and every Christian believer; and we have very little respect for anything that insists upon calling itself Christianity, in any historic sense, which does not observe and hold as binding these two Christian ordinances.

CONCERNING LIBERALISM.

Liberalism is a subject of evolution. It has its different stages of development, both in history and in individual experience.

In Christianity for instance,—which Dr. Hedge calls "the high-road of history,"—the historical development of Liberalism is very apparent. Jesus himself was one of the few conspicuous points of departure of Liberalism in history. He was a protestant against Judaism, which in his day had become intensely conservative. Jesus was for conserving nothing but the love of God and man; everything else—secular, religious, and political—he was more than willing should be smashed. But Paul made Christianity a dogma, and Christ a shibboleth. Perhaps he didn't intend to do so; but that was the effect of his preaching. For nearly fifteen centuries thereafter Christianity was the tomb of Liberty. She made a few unsuccessful attempts at resurrection meantime; but the stone wasn't rolled away for her until Martin Luther appeared: then Liberalism came forth and spoke again to her disciples. But it soon appeared that she had on swaddling clothes, and wasn't quite released from restraint. She went through various phases of evolutionary struggling, until at last the Puritans took her aboard the Mayflower and boldly pushed from the old continent to the new. Here Liberalism found an entirely new environment, and began to display remarkable transformations. The Puritans soon discovered that they had no exclusive ownership of her, for she passed to other and strange hands with the same alacrity that she had once come to theirs. Puritanism couldn't detain her; neither could the Quakers nor the Baptists. Orthodoxy in all its forms struggled hard to hold on to her; but she passed in spite of it to the Universalists and the Unitarians. In these two heretical denominations it seemed that Liberalism at last had found a home. They adopted her joyfully, and gave her a name which they thought she would willingly ever bear. They called her "Liberal Christianity," and flattered themselves they had "come full circle" and found at once their source and their goal in Christ. But did Liberalism know only "Christ and him crucified"? Not at all. She said, "Christ is no master for me. I am greater than he. He is my servant,—not I his." And so out of the last heresy Liberalism developed into a new. She passed on to Transcendentalism and Free Religion.

It remains to be seen whether in this last form Liberalism has come to historic maturity and found a permanent home. Certainly she has not, unless Free Religion has made her house of elastic materials, capable of indefinite expansion. Liberalism dwells not long anywhere where is fear, or where is prejudice. If Free Religion leans in any direction towards dogma,—whether of intuition or of science; whether of theism, pantheism, or atheism; or if she shows too great a devotion to any personal leadership, or too much regard for respectability,—then Liberalism will instantly start up afresh and say, "There is no limitation for me; transformation upon transformation must I have, until thought is utterly free to think, reason to venture, faith to climb, and imagination to soar!"

Historically speaking, Liberalism has no church, no altar, no school, no master, no form of thought, faith, or worship which she especially reverences. She creates no organization to endure; she establishes no institution to stand. Her only home is in the universe of mind; her only delight is in a grand symposium of all honest thinkers. Liberalism serenely replies to the sneering question so often flung at her by those who thought her high-road ended at their threshold, "Yes, my friends, I do live out-of-doors!"

In individual experience Liberalism undergoes the same process of evolution as in the experience of the race. What sincere and fearless thinker has ever found that he could stop anywhere for more than a night, to rest and refresh himself? On the morrow of his mind's new activity he must arise and go forth, ready to be led wheresoever the Spirit of Truth may take him. Yet how many times has he flattered himself, as he came in late at night weary from his quest, that here at last was a home where he might tarry and be satisfied! So comfortable was the easy-chair, so luxurious the couch of repose! "Here," he has said to himself, "I may surely abide. Here is room enough for all my hopes and my plans. I will go no farther, but establish and fortify myself here." But when vigor came to him once more, and he ventured to look out of the windows and doors of his dwelling, and saw how small a place he was in and how large a place was without, and realized from how much he shut himself off when he shut himself in,—he has resolutely taken his staff and bound on his sandals again, and said, "No, this is an inn, not a home. Truth has not stopped here with me; she has gone on. I will follow her."

As we in some cases look back on our past life, and see what a stretch of mental distance separates our present position from some former one, we scarcely can realize that we are the same individual now as then. We say, "How could I have believed that? How could I have accepted so credulously those teachings, and clung so tenaciously to those belongings?" And yet if we are wise enough to understand the causes and processes of our mental growth, we can clearly see how it was that even Truth herself led us to and defended us in those intrenchments; how she held her shield before our pale faces until they acquired the red hue of courage to march boldly on to new positions. The infallible sign that we have made any progress at all is the ability to analyze and appreciate the method of our advance, and to be sympathetic and patient with others while they are treading the same path. No man is truly liberal unless he is liberal towards those who are behind him and before him as well as towards those who are by his side. For the evolution of Liberalism in the individual depends upon two things,—temperament and circumstance. At a given point in their lives some men stop thinking, and live thenceforth on their former mental accumulations. This they do because their souls grow old as fast or faster than their bodies; the joints of their minds stiffen with or before the joints of their legs and arms. They lose their mental elasticity and acumen, their love of search and venture. Like the fossil animals that found their graves in the ancient rocky beds, these men are intellectual fossils buried in the strata of old creeds and forms. Other men, again, remain stationary, or seem to, because of their accidental relations to society. There is many a man in the Christian ministry to-day who thinks more than he speaks, who knows more than he tells; and who passes for a conservative, or semi-conservative, simply because his position restrains him. If some happy fortune would but come along and remove him from the ministry into some less artificial and more truly human relation, he would speedily chip the shell of his conservatism and emerge a full-fledged liberal. The change in his circumstance would couch his obstructed vision, and enable him to see more clearly and report more accurately.

One thing is certain: not every man is a liberal who thinks himself so. Self-deception is as easy in this matter as in any other. After all, the capacity to be liberal abides rather in the heart than in the head. Mere intellectual belief or disbelief doesn't make a man liberal or illiberal: it is the spirit in which he holds his belief or disbelief that makes him broad or narrow. We have known and communed with some most conscientious conservatives who were more truly liberal in their souls than some stalwart radicals we wot of. An intellectual change from Orthodoxy to Liberalism can't take the spirit of dogmatism, pugnacity, or egotism out of a man if it be in the grain and fibre of his mind. The spirit of Liberalism ever flies from him who has more capacity to make war than peace, to hate than love, to denounce than persuade, to repel than welcome. Sometimes what seems to be a growth in liberalism is rather a growth in individual self-conceit, causing a man to defer less humbly and modestly to the judgment of others perhaps quite as wise, and less to that infinite source of all finite reason. It is no advantage to a man to get rid of Christ or of God, if thereby he is led to make his own opinions a dogma and an authority to others, or himself the object of his idolatry.

In order to be liberal we must have in us the spirit of modesty, charity, and love. We must have no fear for the truth, either intellectual or moral. We must be incapable of being shocked by the expression of any man's sincere opinions, whether they be concerning belief or conduct. To be liberal requires more faith, not less. It requires faith in the absolute soundness of things, filling us with the noble courage to look all evil in the face and believe that good is its master. It requires that at any time we confess ourselves fools for the sake of wisdom; that at any time we deny what before we have affirmed, when Truth requires a larger statement.

To conclude, the spirit of liberalism is incompatible with the spirit of proselytism. The moment we become committed to any belief so as to feel bound to defend and propagate it, that moment the shadow of illiberality begins to darken our minds. Truth protects herself and us; not we her. All she asks of us is to confess her in our own word and deed. So much must we do in order to have the clear vision to discern her from error. But it is moral and spiritual disaster to us to assume to be the guardians of truth. The Devil smiles when we take that rôle, for he knows that we shall soon serve him more than God. Every honest persecutor set out in the first place with only the intention to defend religion and morality. It will never do. They need no defence from us other than our steadfast characters. This undertaking to do the business which God has reserved to himself ends always in making us moral nuisances. The truth goes ahead of our fastest running: where can we carry her that she will not go herself? She rides not in the cunningest or stoutest vehicle that we can make; but wherever our sweet and sincere personalities go, there she has witnesses that establish her in credit. Let us not then be guilty of the impudence of trying to "push" Truth, or of adopting the vulgar method of "putting her through." In seeking to convert we oftener convert. True liberalism fills us with the great patience of faith,—faith in the law of evolution that works slow but sure, with eternal purposes to eternal ends.

CHRISTIAN WEAPONS.

The recent Congress of Berlin missed an opportunity, not often given to so distinguished a body of diplomats, of making an important contribution to theological discussion, and on no less a question than that which is in the forefront of debate among modern theologians and ecclesiasts,—the meaning of Christianity. Toward the close of the Congress an incident occurred which has not attracted so much attention as it deserves, but which is full of significance as indicating the drift of Christian sentiment, and as the possible seed of a new missionary movement in behalf of the unity and dominion of the Christian Church. Count Schouvaloff, one of the representatives of the Russian Empire, called the attention of the Congress to the fact that the very flower of the Russian army had been kept at bay and frightfully slaughtered in the Balkans by the improved rifles with which the Turkish soldiers had been armed by Christian manufacturers and merchants, especially in the United States of America. Had the Turks been left to themselves, and had not thus had the benefit of Christian weapons of warfare devised by the greater skill and enterprise of Christian nations, the war would have been much shortened and much less destructive,—at least to Christian Russia. He desired, therefore, to propose as a question worthy of the consideration of the representatives of the Christian governments there assembled, whether the time had not come for the formation of a league of Christian nations for the purpose of keeping among themselves all those arms of precision and sure death which make modern wars so effective and which are due to Christian invention, and of preventing their being obtained, as far as possible, whether by sale or otherwise, by the non-Christian and Pagan populations, especially of Asia. Christian civilization, he argued, would be endangered, if these advantages derived from its own superior skill should be surrendered by any mercenary cupidity to heathen and barbarian nations. Evidently he considered all these specially death-dealing devices of modern warfare as peculiarly Christian property; as providentially invented by Christian brains, to be used only by Christian hands, for the spread and sway of the Christian Church and Christian culture: and it was a kind of treason to Christianity to let Mohammedan and Pagan governments get hold of them.

It was reported that Lord Beaconsfield replied "lightly" to Count Schouvaloff's speech, that it was a matter that did not come within the province of the Congress, however important it might be; "lightly," because he remembered that at that moment a division of native Pagan soldiers from India were in the Mediterranean under the British flag, and armed probably with the newest of Christian weapons: a fact which Count Schouvaloff doubtless remembered too, though he was too diplomatically polite to speak of it. But the Count's plea for keeping Christian "arms of precision" in Christian hands, it was said, made more impression upon Prince Bismarck, who of course saw with Christian satisfaction that the Imperial and invincible German army would draw recruits only from pure Christian sources, and could therefore be equipped with the best of Christian arms; and also upon M. Waddington, one of the French diplomats, who must have temporarily forgotten that the Algerian Zouaves in the French army, though not very Christian in their religion, were armed with very deadly Christian weapons, or else he was reflecting on possible future complications of France with Great Britain in the East, and on the power of the Pagan hordes of India with Christian arms in their hands. At least, whatever the reason, Messrs. Bismarck and Waddington appear to have thought the subject of sufficient importance to be brought before Christian governments, with a view to the question of calling a special Congress upon it.

It is to be hoped that such a Congress will soon be held, and that it will be constituted of no less eminent men than those who made the Congress at Berlin. Its deliberations and decisions would doubtless throw much light on the new meaning of the word "Christian" which modern civilization is developing. This word once had a very definite meaning in the Christian Church; but now, under modern innovations, it has become so vague that many worthy people do not know whether they are Christians or not, simply because they do not know what in common parlance the word means. The application of it to military arms of precision will doubtless tend to more "precision" in its use. Perhaps we shall have a military definition of it, with possibly a military penalty for violating it. That would be a great gain, and a decision worthy of any Congress of Christian nations: a Christian soldier, for instance, armed with a weapon of the latest Christian precision, and ready to shoot down any one who does not use the word with precision. But whether such an extreme measure were to be at once adopted or not, the deliberations of the Congress could not but be valuable. It would be very interesting to note to just what degree of precision a military weapon must be brought to entitle it to be called "Christian." The Congress, of course, would determine how many persons a rifle must be capable of killing at one discharge in order to be worthy to be kept in the exclusive service of Christianity; and at how long range, and at what standard of slaughter and maiming of the enemy, a cannon should have the like honor; and what kind of torpedoes could most effectually destroy a ship with all on board, and thus be classed among fit weapons of the Christian gospel. And, of course, in thus determining positively what kinds of military arms are sufficiently effective in the art of murder to be called "Christian" and to be kept in Christian hands, it would also determine negatively what sort of weapons are so ineffectual, so entirely old-fashioned and behind the age in dealing out death and destruction, that they may be defined as "Pagan," and safely left to the use of non-Christian and barbarian countries; and probably also, as a measure of economy, and for the sake of strengthening the financial sinews of Christian nations in their warfare against Paganism, such a Congress would decide at what time and on what conditions the old weapons of Christian invention, which are being constantly superseded by the Christian discovery of arms of nicer precision, might be sold to Pagan nations, as having become in fact essentially non-Christian and barbarian in their slight power to hurt one's enemies.

To be sure, there might possibly be in such a congress some delegate who would recall that the New Testament says that the weapons of Christian warfare "are not carnal but spiritual," and that it enjoins forgiving one's enemies, and talks about "the breastplate of righteousness," and "the sword of the spirit," and "the helmet of salvation," and "the girdle of truth." But, then, very likely the congress would decide that these are old-fashioned and obsolete weapons, which may be safely given over to the heathen races,—which, indeed, they already possess in considerable measure. At any rate, it would be easy to overthrow any such objection by the argument that the word "Christian" is not to-day to be defined by any such narrow and antiquated notions. Have not Christian preachers of eminence and authority declared that every new truth discovered is a part of Christ's truth? That every scientific fact and every useful invention of modern times become part and parcel of Christianity, and are to be reckoned among the glories of the Christian Church? And what invention, fact, or truth of modern times is more potent than the military weapon of precision, which is the triumph of Christian civilization, and through which the Christian Church may make itself secure against all its heathen foes? Let it therefore define the new Christianity!

W. J. P.

There is no sound science without philosophy; as there is no pure reasoning possible without an element of intuition.

RELIGION TO-DAY.

The religious effort of this age is independent of established religious opinions. The characteristic feature of modern thought in religion is the elevation of ideas above persons. The world is advancing from the authority of individuals to the authority of principles. We desire not men to lean upon, but truths.

The world's prophets do not speak of coming Messiahs, but of better conditions for humanity. The world's seers do not tell of visions of heavenly splendor for the elected few, but of possibilities of earthly happiness for all. Blessings, to enlist human sympathy, must be universal, not partial. The attention of man is directed to ends of justice.

The line of our religious thought to-day must be straight. The sinuosities of theology the soul cannot follow. Theological speculations are labyrinths in which the spirit is lost.

We must write our definitions of religious things all over again. Our duty is not beside the altar, but beside the sufferer. We are not to raise our hands for God's blessings: blessings fall upon the hands that bless. Human love is the angel that we are watching and waiting to see at our doors; but he comes in only at that door where he goes out. We must give what we would receive.

The religion of saving one's self must be given up for the religion of saving others. No matter how you dress up selfishness, it is ugly. You may put the mask of piety over it, but the mask cannot hide the face. "Saving one's soul" is the meanest kind of selfishness that I know of. Better that man's peace who brings back life and hope to some poor heart of earth than the satisfaction of some sanctimonious deacon who brags of his faith in Jesus.

There is so much religion in this world that we do not need! There is so little religion in this world that we do need! Do not profess to be religious, but when you know that you can make anybody happier, or lessen the suffering of man or woman, do not miss the opportunity.

We cannot rise to a higher spiritual realm by neglecting our duties on earth. The only true elevation is attained by good desires and noble actions. Do not let us sigh for wings until we have exhausted our feet. Misery is not in the clouds, but in the cellars.

Religion is natural love and common-sense charity. We are not to learn to repeat somebody's prayers, but to find out somebody's wants and satisfy them, in order to get religion. The giving of bread and wine to a few over-fed human beings is no token of righteousness, but rather the taking some bread and meat to the hungry.

The appurtenances of religion are nothing too sacred for common use. Virtues are values. Justice is true judgment. Right is the only righteousness. To be reliable is to be religious. Truth can be trusted. Be good and do good: what more can man be or do?

L. K. WASHBURN.

GARDEN-SCHOOLS in this country are a suggestion of the New York Academy of Sciences, a member of which, Dr. Edward Seguin, has lately returned from Europe, where his errand in part was the study of similar institutions there. The idea in general seems to be to convert into academic groves, somewhat after the ancient Grecian pattern, portions of public parks, for the instruction of the multitude. Aristotle picked up the natural history with which his weighty tomes abound in Alexander's Nymphæum, and thousands of students became minutely acquainted with the anatomy and physiology of animals and plants at the garden-schools of Athens, Pergamus, and Alexandria. In later times the garden-schools founded by Alfonso d'Est and Como di Medici in Italy were instrumental in the renaissance of science, and the Jardins de Montpellier of Henry of Navarre instituted the processes of investigation out of which grew the inductive method as formulated by Bacon. Last October the Paris authorities converted the park of Montsouris into a garden-school, and connected it with the public schools of the city. Kensington, Sydenham, and Kew in England are illustrations of what the doctor would approximate in this country. Particular attention should be paid to the acclimatization of foreign trees and plants, and the instruction of public school-children in natural history. He would convert all the public squares into botanical gardens, each presenting a tolerably complete cycle of floral botany, with a classification obvious to the eye. Medicinal and poisonous plants and plants and vines yielding food and drink should be planted in juxtaposition, that they might be studied together; and designers in the industrial arts would find, in the flowers and plants most prolific in beautiful forms of leaf or tendril grouped for their convenience, inspiration to higher attainment in artistic decoration. Next fall the members of the New York Academy, it is said, will attempt to impress the legislature with the benefits to be derived from garden-schools, and try to have them introduced by special statute.—Springfield Republican.

MORE FAITH IN FREEDOM.

MR. EDITOR:—

Allow me space for a few remarks upon Mr. Heywood's imprisonment.

It is said, by my friend J. Villa Blake, that "if the sentence be wrong it must be either because it is too severe, or because there should be no punishment at all." I answer decidedly, it is wrong for this latter reason and for no other.

Why should Mr. Heywood be punished? What has he done?

What more has he done than Mr. Blake has done and is doing constantly; namely, publishing to the world his own opinions?

There is this difference: the one treats religious topics mainly; the other is dealing principally with a social or moral question.

Mr. Blake's religious opinions are extremely heterodox to most people. Mr. Heywood's social views are extremely heterodox to Mr. Blake. Why should one be "punished" more than the other?

But, says my friend, "Mr. Heywood has treated a topic of extreme delicacy, and of the first moment to public morals, with a recklessness of expression and manner tending to confuse, or even obliterate, moral distinctions in the minds of the young and unprotected." And therefore he should be "punished;" or rather, as I understand Mr. Blake, it would be right to punish him, though he thinks, as a matter of expediency, it is "unwise" to do so.

Is it right? That is the question.

Suppose the same or a similar charge should be brought against Mr. Blake. Suppose that the majority in the town where he resides are very sensitive and Orthodox. Now if they could not say of Mr. Blake that he is "reckless in expression," that he treats that most delicate (or sacred) question of religion in a manner "tending to confuse or obliterate all religious perception," it might not be so difficult for them to affirm this concerning, for instance, such a man as Robert Ingersoll. Were they to do so, would it follow therefore that Ingersoll should be "punished"? They would have no trouble, I think, in making it manifest to their own minds that both his doctrines and his manner of presenting them were "corrupting."

Mr. Blake may contend that what he at least is striving to do is to make true religion more apparent, and not by any means to efface all religious distinctions. Just so does Mr. Heywood assert his mission. It is, he contends, to make true morality more conspicuous; not by any means to obliterate moral distinctions in the minds of young or old.

Mr. Blake fears the influence of Heywood's doctrine on the "young and unprotected." Many a good Orthodox mother has a kindred fear of the influence of the "irreligion" and "blasphemy" her boy may chance to hear on "free platforms" and in "liberal churches" even.

Now I ask how is a moral Orthodoxy that punishes heresy different from or better than the religious Orthodoxy that by punishing thinks it puts an end to heresy? I see no distinction between the two that will bear scrutiny. If you are to punish all expression of opinions that in your judgment is "corrupting," you will enter on a task that will baffle you at every step.

I can understand how atheism—the preaching disbelief in God—may be regarded by the Orthodox world as even more "corrupting" than any denunciation, however "gross," of the institution of marriage. I do not speak unadvisedly. I once had such assurance from the lips of a clergyman, an intelligent and earnest man. In his judgment "no vulgarity, no low immoral story or conversation, would do half as much to undermine the moral nature as the denial of the existence of Deity." It was his opinion that "society, cut loose from the feeling that it was in the hands of the Almighty, would go to the devil straightway." He would have "God put in the Constitution, and make the utterance or publication of atheistical doctrines a punishable offence." It was the duty of government "to protect society," to shield the "young and unprotected" against whatsoever was "corrupting."

This was said to me while I was a boy; and when I timidly struggled to make a little plea for freedom of speech, he quickly replied: "Ah! when freedom reaches atheism it has degenerated into license." This retort silenced me for a season, for at that time I had seen but one live atheist, and his snapping gray eyes, freckled face, and flaming red hair quite confirmed me in my clergyman's faith that such a man teaching such doctrines must be a monster, however honest or well-meaning. I agreed that he ought to be suppressed,—"punished."

But this was only for a season. I have since grown to be very jealous of the word "license," and use it never. Touching whatever subject, I believe only in the saving power of the one word—Freedom! If I speak this word at all, I say it extends to all opinions on whatever topic.

I want no half-way belief. To give liberty for all doctrines which we approve, or which we have been schooled to think not too harmful, is nothing. Who are we that we "give"? We may neither give nor withhold. We may mind our own affairs, which is not putting padlocks on other lips than our own. Unless we go so far that we defend liberty for the utterance of opinions and doctrines that wholly upset all our ideas of right and truth, religiously and morally and every way, we are no true apostles of it. There is where faith comes in. We distinguish our free society from despotic by the defiance we give all we suppose to be error left free to defeat the ends of the highest and noblest civilization. A new thing in the world, but it is the world's new religion. It is building strong, if slow. Leaving the human intellect the largest liberty to look on all sides and correct itself in all ways,—that is our American privilege. We must be brave and fearless to maintain this.

For myself, I wish to think that I can listen to Mr. Heywood, or any other man or woman, and not be disturbed by even the shadow of a thought that the world can be upset. More than that, I believe absolute freedom of thought and expression are necessary to the world's growth in intelligence and in morals. There must be no Orthodoxy that punishes!

If I may add a word more, I will say in reference to Mr. Heywood's "style" that I do not for a moment think he studies so to write as to make his books "sell," or to make them "take" with the "uneducated and exposed." A reformer brought up in the Anti-Slavery school, he learned to state things boldly and (as I think) with some exaggeration. His object is not to make his ideas "sell," but to "wake people up." I am confident of this. No one of my acquaintance cares less for mere money-getting than Mr. Heywood. He is wedded to his ideas, and would dwell in a dungeon the rest of his days sooner than give them up. He thinks that the subject he treats has all along been handled with so much delicacy the truth has not been spoken. He means to speak it. For one, I say, "Let him. It is his right." In this, as in every such case, I "fear nothing so much as fear."

SOCIETY TALK.

It is rather small, juiceless, and puckery, like a green apple. To find topics of conversation which will interest as many as can participate, say fewer than the digitals of one hand, is one of the constant difficulties of the drawing-room and dinner-table. An Atlantic Monthly writer reports that even in New York "society," where everybody has "been to Europe" and the opportunities of acquisition and development have been great, conversation is not only not "of an improving order," but not interesting "to a notable extent." In fact, "to be particularly well-read and interested in intellectual matters is thought not quite in good form." Is this true everywhere? Are we all degenerating into, or can we never get above, the everlasting tinkle-tinkle-tinkle of society small talk? It seems to be invading the magazines, too,—a kind of plimire culture, which values the subject-matter of thought inversely to its real importance and interest.

The first business of society, we suppose, is entertainment. Walking books in men's and women's clothing are not always entertaining, unless the human element is masterly. Neither are walking shops; and "talking shop" has been put under ban. Unfortunately there is a good deal of "shop" talk which doesn't get properly discredited. The woes of the kitchen and the shortcomings of Bridget are dreary "shop" to housewives, and drearier still to house-husbands.

The assertion of inequalities between men and women is among the most benumbing influences of social intercourse. Perhaps it may be imagined that this is rare, and that utter social equality reigns between the sexes. But men's conversation, however interesting and absorbing, almost always takes a different turn on the approach and participation of ladies. There is a certain condescension to the supposed lighter gear of the feminine mind, and vital topics are deferentially tossed off behind the bushes with the cigar-stumps. There are not a few women to whom this is an annoyance, as well as a deprivation. Woman is not necessarily so differently constituted from man that she always prefers the stale sweetmeats of male compliment and persiflage to the more stimulating diet of sober realities. Take, for instance, that most forbidding of all topics,—politics. Is there any reason why it should not interest women as well as men, if it happens for the moment to interest either? In fact, the highest types of society inform the ladies well upon this topic. In England, where the absurd deference of journalism renders society the only channel for the dissemination of much personal and political news, the women of the ruling classes take a warm interest in public affairs, and are ready to discuss the qualities of political leaders or the prospects of parties. The same was true of the women of the southern aristocracy before the war, though the political culture in that case took on a depth of party feeling which under high excitement often characterizes woman. When it comes to the pitch of civil war, in fact, women scarcely need advice to participate fully in the rage of the hour. At Washington, politics, or rather political fortune, makes up a considerable share of society intercourse, as is always natural where office-holders and office-seekers constitute a large part of society itself; but the study of politics in a broader or juster sense is not above the attention and comprehension of the best social circles of Boston and New York, both men and women. If it be not so, the fault is certainly not all woman's. There is a sharp point to the satire of a recent novelist whose heroine attempts to count up with her girl companions all the young men who could converse upon any scientific, literary, or political subject, and they don't get above two!

Social intercourse is a failure if it does not recreate life, and give some relief from the humdrum of its cares. It is shallow to assume that this relief is always best afforded by a conventional round of topics, supposed to be kindly attuned to the unequal capacities of men and women. It is ignorance, dullness, and narrowness which make bores. It is intelligence, activity, and breadth of thought with some serious basis which afford entertainment.—Springfield Republican.

WHAT MACHINERY HAS DONE.

It is a very shallow consideration of human economy which reckons labor-saving machinery among the evils of the time. What we see before us unquestionably is, or rather was (for the lack of employment has been mostly met and supplied), a great development of labor-saving machinery, and consequently a superfluity of laborers in certain employments. It is a short-sighted conclusion that labor-saving machinery is therefore an evil. The truth is that for every person thrown out of employment, there are ten or twenty persons for whom all the necessities and conditions of life are immensely cheapened, or whose range of comforts is greatly increased by this introduction of labor-saving machinery. This latter fact seems to be generally overlooked,—that the great benefit of labor-saving is in the cheapening of the conditions of life and the increase of the enjoyments of the great mass of people.

Let us examine one, and perhaps the most remarkable, invention for the saving of labor,—the modern system of steam transportation, by land and sea. From the experiment of Watts with his mother's tea-kettle down to the application of the air-brake and the invention of the Vanderbilt pooling-system, it is one of the greatest triumphs of invention yet achieved in its effect on human life and industry. The telegraph is more marvellous, but the application of steam to transportation is the most revolutionary in its effects on human industry. Now what are these effects? Are they evil or are they good? First, as to the demand for labor, is it less or greater on account of this great development of steam transportation? We contend it is vastly greater. The answer might be doubtful, if we were to consider merely the numbers engaged in transportation. But consider for a moment the physical limitations upon the use of animal power and other agencies for this purpose. How far west could this country have been settled, if the produce of the prairies had all been obliged to seek an outlet, by draft animals or by water channels, without steam? The Mississippi Valley, fifty miles from the navigable streams, would have been as thinly settled as the highlands of Asia east of the Caspian Sea, from which the camel is laden with cotton for a journey of a thousand miles to the Russian market. Has not the opportunity for profitable labor been vastly increased by this agency? For every person out of employment in the country from this cause, twenty persons, and probably fifty, are in the enjoyment of happy homes by its help.

Second, the application of steam to transportation has not only greatly extended the habitable portion of the earth, and therefore the field of labor, but it has greatly cheapened the conditions of life in the old fields of labor. This generation scarcely remembers, but the last one might, the great fluctuations which formerly characterized the prices of food. Flour used to reach prices extraordinarily high at times, while at other times a full harvest plunged the farmers in bankruptcy. The cheapness of modern transportation has rendered these extremes impossible, and saved the laboring classes from the loss always inflicted upon them by fluctuation. All the great staples of merchandise now hold about the same value from year to year, since the facility of transportation insures the ready filling up of a deficit at one point or the distribution of a surplus at another. It used frequently to be the case in England that wheat, after a poor harvest, would command double the price that it did after a fair one, inflicting the greatest distress and misery upon the laboring class. Now the steady American supply of breadstuffs, reaped and bound by McCormick reapers, threshed by threshing machines, loaded upon the cars by steam elevators, transported to the sea-board fifteen hundred miles for ten cents per bushel, shipped to Liverpool by steamship, ground into flour by patent and economizing processes, raised by a patent yeast, and cooked by a patent American "Home Comfort" stove, assures plenty from year to year. This is but one article. Go into any laborer's home, no matter how low, and see how he owes the necessities and comforts of life to the application of labor-saving invention. The very house over his head is cheapened by the circular saw, the planing machine, and, above all, by the cheap railroad, which makes him indifferent whether the lumber grew in Florida, Michigan, or Massachusetts. His table-cloth, and he probably has one, is from Ireland or Germany, his bread from St. Louis, his meat from Kansas, his tea from Japan, his coffee from Brazil, his sugar from Cuba. The sewing-machine, which has thrown so many seamstresses out of work, clothes his children, and the precise division of labor of the manufacturer of ready-made clothing enables him to buy a whole suit of substantial apparel at marvellously low figures. If he chooses to indulge so far, he has strawberries from the Middle States at fifteen cents a box, and the canning process supplies his table in winter with wholesome fruit, annihilating distinctions of season.

But, third, there is another important favor which steam transportation has done for labor. It makes it more mobile and independent of the local market. Never before has the world gone through a business depression so severe as this, with so little suffering among the laboring class. There has been no starvation and, comparatively speaking, not much lack of employment. The railroad enables the laborer to shift from the over-crowded community or avocation to the less crowded. Compare our condition with that of China, whence the railroad and all other labor-saving inventions have been excluded. A short harvest there makes the people die like flies and by the million. Food they might have, but it is eaten up two or three times over by the mere cost of distribution, while they have no means of seeking provinces where there is an abundance. The Chi-ness, says a recent despatch, are still opposed to the introduction of railroads.

The New York Graphic proposes that we "regulate the introduction of machinery," and that to leave the problem to right itself is "more suitable to Asia than to America." Precisely the reverse is true. To regulate the introduction of machinery would be a thoroughly Chinese policy. To give it freedom is the only policy consistent with free institutions and with American progress. Why is this question now raised so prominently? Where are the laborers "compelled to starve" whose condition excites the Graphic's sympathies and benumbs its sense? Are they the saloon-keepers and lazy outcasts of the Old World, who are attempting to get a living out of popular agitation in New York? Or are they the ruffians who are frightening the Ohio farmers? The fact is, there is less ground for a labor agitation at this moment than there has been for three years. The labor of New England is well employed, notwithstanding the condescending tone with which other portions of the country regard us. Our mills are in full operation, our manufactures have regained a moderate and reasonable prosperity, our savings bank deposits are steadily rising, our mortgages are being steadily liquidated, public and private economy is general, taxes are falling, paupers diminishing, and labor is content to abide the developments of the future under free institutions. It does not propose to emulate the ignorance and brutality of the frame-breakers who destroyed the lace industry at Nottingham early in the century, and spread alarm throughout England. American laborers know the goose that lays the golden egg, and will regard with suspicion the efforts of demagogues to turn the country back toward decrepit and starving barbarism.—Springfield Republican.

THE ARISTOCRACY OF CULTURE.

The question of social privilege with us is not settled by personal prestige. There is no landed aristocracy to confer a hereditary position upon the select few. The decay of the old colonial mansions is a significant comment upon the attempt to localize an American aristocracy. We are compelled to look elsewhere for the social rank which gives the proper and natural balance of power between different classes. It is found not in birth, not in wealth alone, not in education simply, but in culture. This point was happily stated by Dr. Zabriske, of Wollaston, in his recent address before the alumni of the University of New York: "We want a cultured class; men and women in whom the processes of civilization have done their perfect work in capacity to think, in felicity of expression, in breadth and accuracy of knowledge, in firmness of manners, in the sense of beauty, in the art of living, in wisdom alike to use or dispense with riches. It is not enough to have specimens of such among our people. We must multiply them so they shall cease to be phenomena, and become a recognized and familiar element in common life."

This is the key-note for a true aristocracy. It is based upon what people are in themselves, and comes as near as is possible to bringing the higher education into close relations with the greatest number of the people. It makes an aristocracy of culture, but not an aristocracy which is removed from the stir and progress of present life or of current thought. Matthew Arnold, with his exquisite sense of the fitness of things, defines culture as "the study and pursuit of perfection," with "sweetness and light" as its main characteristics; but his people of culture are chiefly engaged in trying to perfect themselves and their minds as part of themselves, with no ulterior aim. He does not seize upon the broad and human uses of culture as a means of developing and purifying free institutions. Mr. Francis Parkman sees much more clearly than Mr. Arnold what liberal studies ought to do. In treating "The Failure of Universal Suffrage," in the July North American Review, he says: "What we need most is a broad and masculine education, bearing on questions of society and government; not repelling from active life, but preparing for it and impelling toward it. The discipline of the university should be the training for the arena." At the recent Harvard Commencement dinner, Lord Dufferin threw out the same idea. "Since I have been in Canada it has been brought home to me more perceptibly than ever," said he, "what incalculable service institutions such as these render to this continent." It has probably occurred to many in attendance upon our literary festivals that the educated men, the graduates of our colleges, had some characteristics of the class of social privilege and extended usefulness; and when a thousand graduates, as at Harvard and Yale, have assembled together, the electric thrill of literary brotherhood and common sympathies must have been widely felt.

Yet, true and genuine as is the power which men of the higher education feel in dealing with large questions and in caring for the interests of the community, it is unfair to say that college-bred men alone possess the culture which makes them leaders in society and in affairs. It is a constant surprise that so many of the men who stand high in the professions, in political life, and in general society have never been trained in the university. They may not always be self-made men, but they have somehow obtained essentially the same results by that social attrition and keen common-sense which make a college-bred man a great leader, and make a man who steps out from the ranks to make good in part what he must always feel to be defects more or less in his training. The truth is that our ideas of culture need to be broader than the university, which, in fact, is only the stepping-stone to something else. The close contact with men, the ambitious spirit which is infused into American youth as a part of their social environment, the idea of making one's way to something more than he was born to, is quite as powerful an incentive to general culture as the college; and, while it will never do to say that learning can be dispensed with, it is a constant surprise to find how abundantly quick-witted men make up for its loss in the actual work of life. It is the peculiar experience of American society that its leaders come from all the walks of life, and not more from one quarter or circle than from another. We are all born to possible greatness, if the conditions are favorable by which we march out from boyhood. If in one generation a family steps into the first rank, it is by no means certain that it will retain its position in the second or third. Everything is shifting, and a coat of arms with us practically goes for nothing.

The aristocracy which we can maintain, and which alone has the elements of permanence and power, is that of culture, and broad culture, too,—not of necessity derived from the schools; quite as likely picked up in a rough struggle for fortune or fame, but still seasoning and ripening the whole man, and placing him in proper relation with his fellows. If this is also the aristocracy of practical usefulness, no one need quarrel with such a definition of culture. No one feels like disparaging our institutions of learning because some men can do without them. The greater number cannot reach the tone and grace and finish which give to society its irresistible attraction without such an agency; and so long as they are so thoroughly practised in their course of study, and seek so earnestly to foster the elements which make the republic permanent, they are equally worthy of the benefactions which men of wealth feel it right to bestow upon them, and the benedictions which graduates yearly invoke upon Alma Mater at the recurring anniversaries. If our culture makes comparatively few men who incarnate, as Goethe did, the highest forces of social life in personal development, the general average is not far already from reaching, in some quarters, the point mentioned by Dr. Zabriske, where cultivated people "become a recognized and familiar element in common life." In this general average, increasing every year, there is great and wholesome influence. Our education, whether by college or by affairs, is too practical to make men snobbish, and quite large enough to give the best of them some intellectual vision. It is the start for the education of after-life which gives even the best university training its true value. What the youthful and excellent society to encourage studies at home does for its hundreds of women pupils in all parts of the country, that the spirit created and fostered by university life uses to advance the wide-spread social culture which is a characteristic and general feature of American life. It is here that we find the proper basis for an aristocracy which does not arouse the jealousy of the other orders of society, because it constantly ministers to them, and is not at all alienated from the best elements in the nation's future. It is this aristocracy of culture which our literary institutions are chiefly called on to maintain, and which many agencies in our somewhat complex social life help to develop.—Boston Advertiser.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH DINNERS.

The following is an extract from the very pleasant letter of George W. Smalley to the New York Tribune, describing the banquet given to the delegates in attendance at the recent Literary Congress in Paris:

At an English dinner every guest has his assigned seat; and a plan of the hall, submitted to his inspection in the ante-room, enables the dullest to find his place without too much hunting. The arrangement is often purely arbitrary and gives you queer neighbors, but it is better than none. If you are planted between two strangers, and their names on their cards in front of the plates tell you nothing, you are at liberty to amuse yourself by guessing at their identity or revealing your own, or not revealing it if you prefer. I have seldom found the Englishman thus thrown into contact with foreigners so silent or so savage as the Continental European believes him to be. He will sometimes impart his opinions to you with a quite astonishing freedom. I think I did not tell you at the time, of an incident which befell me at the geographical dinner to Mr. Stanley; perhaps because I should have had to tell the story at my own expense. My neighbor on the left was an Englishman; we were perfectly unknown to each other, and as I had been talking all the evening to an acquaintance on the other side, he—the left—had not even found out that an American was next him. He did not like Mr. Stanley's speech, and he opened a conversation with me by remarking that Stanley was a good fellow, but with too much bounce. Then, after a pause, "But that, you know, is due partly to his nationality and partly to his profession."

No such casualty occurred on Monday. A few places at the top of the table were awarded to distinguished people. The great majority were allowed to sit where they liked, or where they could find places. The American colony, including even President White, marshalled its forces on the road, and took up a position in a solid body about half way down; an arrangement which was thought to promote the flow of conversation.

No English public dinner is complete without a toast-master,—a functionary who bears to a grand banquet about the same relation that a drum-major bears to a brass band. I might reverse the comparison, and liken the toast-master to the band. The drum-major is only the cause of noise in others; the toast-master has the lungs of Stentor, and uses them. He is a human trombone. He appears to have a kind of authority over the waiters and the company. When he cries, "Pray, silence, my lords and gentlemen, for your chairman," the clatter of plates and all voices is hushed. When the chairman has risen, and the toast-master roars out "ch-a-a-a-i-r," the boldest holds his breath for a time. There is a routine which is never broken into. The Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the rest of the royal family are invariably toasted; sometimes with speeches, sometimes without. If the chairman happens to be a particularly incapable orator, he is sure to run into a discourse on the domestic virtues of "Her Majesty." I heard such an one lately in London. He could not get from one end of a sentence to another without losing his way, and his substitutes and verbs were seldom on good terms with each other. So he rambled on endlessly, where a clever man would have been content with, "The Queen, God bless her."

But here in Paris the toast-master seems to be unknown; and long may it be before they invent or import him. There is no grace before dinner, and nobody proposed the health of the President after. There was a chairman, no less a chairman than Victor Hugo, with Edmond About on one side and Jules Simon on the other. But he made no speech and gave no toasts. He never once rose from his chair. After dinner he took a paper in his hand whereon were inscribed the names of certain speakers, and from time to time he called on one of these gentlemen. But it happened more than once that other orators, not inscribed but big with speeches, were too quick for him, and were on their legs and delivering themselves before they could be stopped. Some men even pulled manuscripts out and read them,—a ghastly feature which I never saw in England. Most of the speakers were foreigners. The programme, so far as there was a programme, appeared to be drawn up on the theory that some representative of each foreign country which had sent delegates to the Congress should make a speech and propose a toast. The speakers invariably expressed their admiration of France, and their gratitude for the welcome and hospitality (at fifteen francs) offered them, and generally found time to declare their conviction that Victor Hugo was a very remarkable man. I asked Mr. White when he was to speak, and for a moment was surprised to hear that he had not been asked to say anything. As he was, both by official position as head of the American Bureau in the Congress and by his position at home, the most distinguished American present, I inferred that the Western Continent had been forgotten,—as it had been at the Chatelet in the afternoon. But I was wrong. It had not been forgotten. Presently up rose a coffee-colored young man with thick black hair, and began an oration. I asked a Frenchman near by who he was. The Frenchman answered, "He is an American from Brazil!" It seemed to me a pity to disturb this French view of political geography; but some more ardent patriot than I, who could not stand seeing the United States suddenly annexed to a South American Empire, made his way to the head of the table and explained to M. About that we did not look on the Brazilian as a satisfactory American. So Mr. White, much against his will, had to get up. He spoke briefly and well in French, and with his speech the formal proceedings came to an end. Victor Hugo sat bravely through the whole. The hour named for the dinner was seven; we actually sat down at eight, and it was past eleven before the company adjourned to the drawing-room for coffee. Hugo had previously spent the afternoon at the Chatelet, made a speech there of thirty-five minutes, and listened to a good many others. You see how jauntily the poet carries his eighty years.

VERBATIM REPORT OF A MISSISSIPPI COLORED PREACHER'S PRAYER.—O Lord God of de glorious universe: wilt thou look down in de omnipresence of dy eyes upon dese dy collar'd chil'n, bowed upon de knuckle-bone, dis night? Take a solemn peep upon us and let a heap o' light in. Don knowest what dese dy poor darkies need. On every side, don knowest, O Lord, is de evidence of de dislocation and destruction of de human family. Dere be fightin' among 'one another and natural disease. CO-OPERATION in the matter of buying provisions for family use has been attempted in Washington on a scale that, if only moderately successful, will ruin the retail provision business there. The city is to be divided into quarters, with a chief for each quarter and an assistant for each square, and the duty of the assistant will be to go from house to house in his square, soliciting orders and setting forth the advantages of the system. The company expects to have twenty thousand members and patrons within a year, and will sell everything a man and his family require at from fifteen to twenty per cent. less than the prices ruling at present.—Boston Advertiser.

A NOTED CHARACTER, Miss Dr. Bradley, formerly of Nantucket, has recently died at Philadelphia, aged forty. Twenty years ago, when she was refused admission to various medical colleges, she cut her hair short, donned male attire, and was soon attending lectures at the college of physicians and surgeons in Philadelphia. After graduating with high honors, she astonished the professors of the institution by appearing to them in woman's clothes, and proving her identity. Since then she has practiced her profession with flattering success.—Springfield Republican.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " " "
 " 26 " 51 " 6 " " "
 " 52 " " 5 " " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STERNBERG.
 Special arrangements will be made in reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address THE INDEX, No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, Boston.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.
 The Index Association,
 OFFICE, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON, publish
THE INDEX,
 A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.
 It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

 W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
 BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.
 ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Sonnenschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Calthrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. Wm. R. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion"; Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, Wm. Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fifth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—
To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

THE SECULAR REVIEW.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The SECULAR REVIEW is the leading organ of Secularism, and each week has special articles on Theological, Social, Scientific, and Political Subjects. Its distinctive features are the advocacy of Constructive Secularism, and the dissemination of useful information on all questions which affect the welfare of the people. Letters are inserted in its "OPEN COLUMN" from all who are courteous in the expression of their views; while a special department is allotted for "NOTES AND QUERIES."

The Contributors to the SECULAR REVIEW comprise the principal advocates of Secularism, including its founder, G. J. Holyoake.

THE AMERICAN PAT- TERNS OF CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine, from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact facsimile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is from England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on the most important subjects of the day. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers. The following are a few of the contributors:—

AND NUMEROUS OTHERS.

Subscription Price, $5.00 per Year.

MISS DEVEREUX' BOARD- ING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES AND CHILDREN, at Irvington-on- Hudson, will re-open on Monday, Sept. 17, 1877. Miss Devereux refers, among others, to the following gentlemen: Rev. Orville Dewey, Sheffield, Mass.; Mr. A. O. Richards, Irvington, N.Y.; Mr. H. R. Bishop, Irving- ton, N.Y.; Mr. Wm. H. Orton, Pres. W. U. Telegraph Co., N.Y.

Attention is specially called to a change in the advertisement of the publications of the Free Religious Association. By a recent vote of the Executive Committee the Annual Reports of the Association, from the year 1872 to the year 1877 inclusive, are now offered at five cents each (and at the same rate for any larger number) to any body who will take the trouble to send for them, enclosing five cents in postage stamps. They will also be sold at the office for the same sum to any one calling for them there.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIA- TION REPORTS.

The Committee have put the pamphlets at this low rate, which hardly more than covers the cost of sending them by mail, with the hope that they may thereby be more extensively circulated. By referring to the advertisement describing their contents, it will be seen that they contain much matter of special interest on the most vital religious problems of the age. It is not too much to say that some of the most valuable contributions of the last five years to religious discussion may be found in these pamphlets. Let any one who wants to know what the Free Religious Association means, send for these Reports. And will not the members and friends of this Association take this opportunity to extend the knowledge of its principles?

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

GREAT THROUGH LINE

AND UNITED STATES MAIL ROUTE.

The attention of the travelling public is respectfully invited to some of the merits of this great highway, in the confident assertion and belief that no other line can offer equal inducements as a route of through travel. In stands confessedly at the head of American railways. The track is double the entire length of the line, of steel rails laid on heavy oak ties, which are embedded in a foundation of rock ballast eighteen inches in depth. All bridges are of iron or stone, and built upon the most approved plans. Its passenger cars, while eminently safe and substantial, are at the same time models of comfort and elegance.

CONSTRUCTION AND EQUIPMENT

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD

THE SAFETY APPLIANCES

in use on this line well illustrate the far-seeing and liberal policy of its management, in accordance with which the utility only of an improvement and not its cost has been the question of consideration. Among many may be noticed

The Block System of Safety Signals,
Janney Coupler, Buffer, and Platform,
The Wharton Patent Switch, and the Westinghouse Air-Brake, forming in conjunction with a perfect double track and road-bed a combination of safeguards against accidents which have rendered them practically impossible.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE. For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application, signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

PLATFORM

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE
FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of office, or as a qualification for any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BE INTOLERANT of nothing but intolerance.

IF YOU ARE AFRAID of anything but fear, you are a coward indeed.

A DEEP SENSE of life destroys the fear and almost the idea of death.

SUPERFICIALLY men differ; fundamentally, all the best thinkers agree.

ONE OF the very best aims of the Christian Register is the editor (Ames) himself.

MATERIALISM may be defined as a lack of poetic imagination and spiritual insight.

NO MAN can be a great saint, unless he have the capacity in him to be a great sinner.

UNLESS you understand the man who differs from you, you do not understand yourself.

BEWARE of knowing only one thing: such concentration cramps and belittles the mind.

WHEN life is full of meaning to us, we are not troubled with doubts as to its continuance.

THERE is no disgust so disgusting as self-disgust. There is no respect so respectful as self-respect.

A VISION of God is better than a thought of him; and a thought of him is better than an argument for him.

THERE is no merit in being good, any more than in being happy. Both are something to be thankful for.

A MAN cannot be said to have any faith, unless he believes in something more than his senses reveal to him.

ANY ONE who has ever felt immortal knows that he is so better than any one can possibly know that he is not.

GEORGE WASHINGTON couldn't tell a lie; but it seems he did gamble, and would occasionally swear. Oh, George! George!

IT IS NATURAL for egotists and dogmatists to believe in free-will: it requires modesty and the courage of faith not to believe in it.

WE LEARN from the London National Reformer, of August 4, that Mrs. Annie Besant was at that time seriously ill from "overwork and worry."

WHAT A PITY that we could not die down when the bleak winter comes, even as the flowers do; and like them awaken to a beautiful new life in the sunny springtime!

NO GREAT civilization is possible to a race, nor spiritual progress to an individual, where the power of death to dissolve life is not conquered in thought and feeling.

THE THOUGHT of public writers in all times is too extense. A man should think at least a year on any important subject, before he invites the world to listen to him one hour.

SCIENCE, in the common acceptance of the word, deals with the external and material, not with the internal and spiritual. Hence its authority is with the first, not with the last.

THE INFLUENCE of the life of Jesus on the life of the world is not more wonderful or more unaccountable, than the influence of the thought of Plato on subsequent ages of philosophy and belief.

IT TAKES more greatness to be good than goodness to be great. Therefore he is the greater man who lives wisely every day in private than he who dazzles the world with some one conspicuous virtue.

THERE ARE some days when it is impossible to think, and when it is unwise to try to do so. The mind, like the maid, has whimsical spells of wishing to be let alone and to have its own way. Only on certain days are the Oracles to be consulted.

WHO IS TO BE our next President? This question is always in the air in America. Were it not better that each man should ask, Am I fit to be my own president? What a saving of political fuss and soiled plumage, if every citizen were king of himself, and carried the seat of government in his own breast!

NEITHER pure athelism on the one hand, nor pure theism on the other, is a satisfactory explanation of the universe. The one fails to meet the demands of the heart; the other those of the intellect. Each lacks the wit to account for the other's facts. What then? The spiritual-intellectual man takes refuge in pantheism.

NATURE reflects her moods on us. When she is happy, we are; when she is dull and heavy, we are apt to be so. Her temperament affects ours; to her mercury our spirits respond. She and we are isomeric. What does this fine sympathy between Nature and ourselves indicate?—that both are material, or both spiritual?

IN FRIENDSHIP, character must be allowed to explain conduct. Between friends there must not be the frequent twitching of the skirt, with the whining or petulant intimation of doubt and misunderstanding. Friend should believe in friend, and lover in lover, as the old saint believed in God: "though thou slay me, yet will I trust in thee."

PROF. SWINE says of the Christian outcry against the paganism of Bryant's "Thanatopsis": "It was not rhetoric or logic which complained at the paganism of the great poem. It was only that Christian prejudice and semi-fanaticism which once demanded that even the sports of children should be evangelical, and that the clothing of adults should be cut out in the light of prophecy."

A CASE similar to Mrs. Besant's was that of the poet Shelley, whose custody of his children by his first wife was taken out of his hands by Lord Chancellor Eldon, in 1817. The petition against Shelley alleged his atheistical views and arguments set forth in "Queen Mab" and the notes on that poem; but Lord Eldon in his decision ignored the atheistical charges altogether, and took Shelley's children from him on the ground that he had deserted his first wife and lived with another woman.

BENJAMIN R. TUCKER, formerly editor of the Radical Review, and at present editor of The Word, has been engaged by the Boston Globe as one of its editors. Mr. Tucker, as we understand it, will have nothing to do with the politics of the Globe, which are Democratic, but will give his attention to another department of the paper. He is a forcible writer, a man of unbounded energy in what he puts his hand to, and of integrity unquestioned. He has our heartiest wishes for his success in the new position he has taken.

THE VERSES which we print on another page of this paper are a most curious and unique performance by a printer in the office of John Wilson & Son, who occupies his leisure hours in extraordinary literary ventures of one kind and another. This unparalleled piece of versification is one of them. He has spent years and years in its ingenious construction, and has probably taken as much satisfaction in perfecting it as Dr. Johnson did in making his dictionary. He has submitted it to various literary gentlemen of eminence,—such as Dr. Holmes, George W. Curtis, R. C. Winthrop, Earl Dufferin, Prof. Child, Sterry Hunt, and others,—and all have expressed their admiration of the wonderfully ingenious lines. The author is a conscientious believer in the Orthodox religion, and meant that his description of the "model newspaper" should have no taint of heresy in it. We venture no criticism of his verses, being content to lay them before the readers of THE INDEX with the remark that they are not likely to be equalled, if imitated, by any other writer.

Modern Religious Sentiment.

AN ESSAY READ AT THE LAST MEETING OF THE SECOND LADY-LOCAL CLUB.

BY SIDNEY H. MORSE.

Dr. Johnson once said, "Every man who can ride four horses at a time, or balance a straw on his nose, increases the wealth of mankind. In that he adds to the scope of human powers." Perhaps this is the explanation of the interest we feel in the reports that fill the newspapers. Thousands of dollars are staked on O'Leary. In the presence of vast crowds of lords and ladies and people of all classes (so we hear across the broad Atlantic), he has distanced all competitors, and holds the prize. Bertha Von Hillern also wins once more. The enthusiasm is described as "immense and long-continued." Hundreds of ladies remain in the hall ten hours without food to witness her success. So, all round the horizon there are flashing rumors of a like dexterity. These fine sports and trials of power are spreading through the country, to be enjoyed ere long by both sexes. What we witness in this as in every direction is a new and vigorous effort to increase the sum of human capacities, controlled by a democratic bias that admits all capacity, without raising the question of Jew or Gentile, bond or free, male or female, to the competing arena. This time it is the whole human race that is to enlarge the scope of its powers.

One is no longer surprised at almost any report. Achievement is in the air. The natural abilities of man are past finding out. The supernatural is everywhere at a discount. Heller gives a vigorous blow to "mediumistic" pretensions. If he does not convict of perjury, he renders all that pertains to the miraculous absolutely profitless. When the magicians threw down their rods, and they also like Aaron's became serpents, the serpent of Aaron is said to have eaten up its competitors. So Heller's wonders destroy all the enterprises of "the spirits." That is, human powers resident in the flesh successfully rival the most brilliant of the performances we are invited to regard as the work of immaterial citizens visiting us from the "Summer Land."

It is our own globe and the life that is here resident we are called to celebrate and heartily believe in. Whatever power, whatever intelligence, whatever might, this universe can boast, belongs as much to our earth as to the remotest or most favored realm. There is, indeed, no favored point in space; there can be none. Where there is mind, there the whole is found,—all that is or can be. It was a foolish person who wrote of the little star,—

"How I wonder what you are!"

Distance makes the enchantment. Were he to go to that "twinkling little star," he would undoubtedly have to plough and blast, sow and reap, abolish yellow fever and diphtheria, even as he must help to do here. My friend longs to visit the moon. A fool's errand. Some barren rocks in some desolate sheep-pasture here on the bosom of our own mother earth will serve as well. 'Tis all the same. The processes of Nature everywhere correspond. Wherever one may go, 'tis himself he carries,—himself, outlet of infinite mind, greater than sun, moon, or star.

Napoleon asked, pointing to the deep heaven full of stars, "Who made all that?" We have all been puzzled with the immensity of space and the multiplicity of worlds. But space is nothing, and few or many worlds are nothing. Who made all that? Wipe all that out: whence came the ground you stand on, and you yourself standing there? The worlds are kept in their places by the simplest of laws. 'Tis the A B C of creation. Man alone is the mystery; the complex presentation of evolving mind. Who shall fathom him is master of all.

These two thoughts,—the equality of our planet with all planets, and the inexhaustible resources of the creative mind, manifest here as everywhere, with ability organically to express itself in outward form or symbol,—make very good starting-points.

Content with our goodly globe, and self-poised, we will stay here while we can, go hence when we must; but staying or going we cast out all fear, and keep our faith that the Spiritual Universe from which all things flow is sound and sweet at heart, and is ceaselessly working to make perfect all its manifestation. Doubt of this is insanity. The form of our faith we reconsider, but the faith itself abides, the inseparable life of our being; the never-dying Belief, from which proceeds all human activity; the endeavor of all the generations; the aspiring, struggling, and the patient demeanor of each private soul. Without its history itself were impossible; for every step is one of faith that each new problem is solvable; no obstacle but can be overcome. In short, human nature following the lead of the divine laws is omnipotent. The Universe promises so much: believe this; 'tis all the homage the Universe asks. I know there are those who think they believe in satanic supremacy. But I am not much disturbed by this announcement, since they smile while making it. I have known some such to confront new questions with as great zeal and as much expectancy as the devoutest believers. These show their faith by their works, if they deny with their lips.

At the present time the question confronts us, whether we shall keep our religion in whole or in part, or dispense with it altogether. Confusion arises as to what religion may be. New definitions are volunteered, or the word is cast out as incompatible with the new intelligence. Knowledge, we are told, casteth out religion as well as fear. "I have no more need for it," says one; "I get on better without it." With much wit, as with a broom, he sweeps the heavens clean of all ghosts. The throne of God, and the God himself, disappear. And now that we are rid of these unseen powers of the air, we are rid also of religion. No more necessity for it. The gods, if there are any, may look out for themselves, and we will take care of ourselves.

A very good and necessary work this new liberal apostle is doing. But, one must after confessing this much say, but—I apprehend the problem of life is not thus readily disposed of. Much to clear the sky of imagined obstacles; much to remind us to ourselves; but so are we only brought nearer, driven closer, to deeper realities. If we dissipate the false shows, we seek substance. It is the privilege of all error perhaps to be fulfilled, not abandoned utterly; for error, pure and simple, is of so dubious a quality the human heart cannot retain it, nor the human mind long defend it; much less can the human soul grow and thrive upon it. I have no respect for that philosophy which ascribes all the world's follies or misbeliefs to the inventive genius of bad men, either in Church or State. Priests did not invent religion; they did not fashion the gods out of pure air; out of wanton ambition and lust of power they have not constructed our enslaving theologies. According to Mr. Conway, even the Devil has a natural history; and, I may add, a certain real parentage in fact. The whole question always being how to interpret the universe, how to explain to ourselves our being's end and aim,—the answers we give from time to time, from age to age, are such as correspond to our actual state of intellectual development. Great masses of people, however ignorant, cannot be imposed on wholly. The truth undoubtedly is that the beliefs of the world have been the honest expression of the times in which they grew into shape. Moreover, the world has never been without its streaks of good wit. It has made from earliest times some pretty good guesses. Every age stammers; it can't express itself; its sight is not clear. There in the twilight, or mist of the morning, it sees somewhat it fails to explain well. Wiser grown, the new generation may add something of clearness. Denial serves but a little way; correction alone gives satisfaction. If that is not so, what is so? By dint of experience we learn to hold our corrections tentatively, at arm's length, for successive peaceful surveys, letting them of their own accord fall into their place of permanence, if the Universe be so minded. Foolish every desire to force them; foolish every fear that they if truthful will fail.

What I wish to emphasize is the fact of this world's sanity from the beginning; its absolute integrity according to the measure of its intelligence. I would be reconciled not only to the world as it is, but to the world as it has been, as well as to the world that is to be. I would say to the old times: "I hear you. Your guesses and your insights were not all wrong. As honest of thought as we of to-day. But we stand upon the thoughts you raised as on a pedestal; our horizon is broadened, and we see much you did not see." And thus speaking, we are put into harmony with Nature, with the natural evolution of human nature. Much stress is laid upon science. But there can be no science of a thing that is not itself scientific. There can be no knowledge of that which is not itself knowable. Mind can understand only mind. It is our felicity that we can see and interpret the processes of our mental growth. Often we say: "Well, that was what I meant, what I was struggling for." It took time to develop and, as we say, mature the thought. But the last word was in the first. Omega was in Alpha. Our most modern science was long ago sung by the poets. Our newest discoveries may be reinforced by the most ancient prophecy. Some one striving to draw lines of beauty, baffled again and again, at length exclaims, "There! that's it." From the beginning that was what he intended. He knows when he hits the mark. So is it with the race. Pascal was right when he said, "The human race is as one man, ever advancing toward perfection." History is the development of one mind.

It was more than a score that made the early ages say "God." A very genuine though crude attempt was theirs to explain this God. I think it was Mr. Jackson Davis who first said, "An honest God is the noblest work of man." God has been man fashioned large. In the rude ages he was, of course, masculine; the greatest pagist the universe could boast; full of hot temper, with wrath that must be appeased. But as men grew mellow with kinder feelings toward each other, the fashion of the God-countenance changed, and beamed with increasing intelligence. As neighborhoods enlarge their boundaries until they meet and fraternize the world around, taking in also their poorer dumb relation, the God keeps pace, and becomes the universal father.

I listened to one whom I have already quoted, as he brushed away the infinite individual whose throne was said to be in the heavens. Both the awful Jehovah full of thunder and vengeance, and the bountiful, all-loving, and all-protecting Father, were shown to have no real foundation in our experience. If the paternal care of this supposed being let not even a sparrow fall without notice, such notice had no practical result so far as that sparrow was concerned; it fell all the same, though the infinite eyes were looking on. A man and a stone tumbling down a precipice fare alike. Prayer to such a being was of no avail. From his throne he looked with calm eyes, and saw all mankind's sorrow and suffering, putting forth no effort to turn it aside. Belief in such a God is impossible. If he exist, then have we enthroned in the universe none other than a monster. The only way people reconcile themselves to his conduct is by supplementing this life with another, in which all the wrongs here endured are to be there righted, unto such as love him (spite of all appearances) and keep his commandments.

I do not hesitate to acquiesce entirely in this disbelief in the existence of such a God. No; the picture, though faithful to ancient conception, is no true likeness. The mistake to be corrected is the putting on the throne a being that represents only the idealization and enlargement of our finiteness. Carried to his best, such a God is still impotent. The largest finite is not almighty. Think how you are at once baffled if you would conceive of a great being of like good intentions with yourself, to whom you assign power to interfere arbitrarily in this world's life,—putting things to rights. Human nature stands at bay; either it must be wiped out utterly, and reconstructed as pliable clay in the potter's hands, or your God is of no effect. I think we should prefer our misery with our freedom, to such a flattening out. But it is sufficient answer to all such speculation to say that the world's whole experience contradicts it. We are not so governed. From the rising of the sun to the going down of the same no such manifestation can you chronicle. So far as interference for good or ill from such a being is concerned, we are indeed left to ourselves, and have ever been.

What then? Shall we cease saying God? Is there no Supreme? One whom I reverend said in his discourse the other Sunday, "A dangerous step has been reached when atheism is welcomed." But I see no cause for alarm. The atheism that is welcomed is in substance but the denial of an impossible God. It is really the voice of God we hear protesting against our calumny of him. God has no better defender than the human soul asserting the omnipotence of justice and love's supremacy.

I find two declarations that to my mind equally fail to cover the ground. The one that asserts a being all-wise and all-powerful, cognizant of our human affairs in the sense that we are acquainted with them, knowing for instance that we are met here this evening, and busy even now numbering the very hairs of our heads; and that other that, denying this portraiture, inclines further to say, because this old conception fails, none is possible.

Our dependence is on such facts as we have at hand. The God cannot emerge at the end of a process of reasoning. We are to believe in God as we believe in each other, if at all. I have only a limited respect for any man's logic. If one must find a friend not by sight, but by some syllogistic agility of demonstration, I should say you would go mourning for that friend all your days. Must I depend on my pastor's proving it, to know that my dearest friend is in existence? No; the God is not provable: the demand for proof begins by ignoring the God plainly visible.

The trouble is we begin with looking away and far, and not within and near. I call up the natural, common experience of any and all. Is it all we are that thinks, and acts, and goes about the streets; merged in the whirl of business, the successive rounds of what you call life? I think no one says this. There are depths and heights in our experience never sounded. A double self we seem to find: the one supreme, infinite, ever the same; the other finite and variable, often lost. Shall we hesitate to say we are both God and man? The Christian world has done well in declaring Jesus was God. The mistake has been in not affirming the same of all souls,—of Judas no less than Jesus. The difference was in their manhood; Jesus did not feel he ought to hang himself; Judas did. Why did he so feel? Not because he had been told of a God afar in the heaven, nor because he saw the God in Jesus. Had he been desolate and alone as mere man, he would have seen no more than the mere ox. Solely because he was also divine he knew of his infamy. The oft-quoted lines Goethe sung are full of this meaning:—

"Were not the eye itself a sun, no sun for it could ever shine;
By nothing noble could the heart be won, were not the heart divine."

I aver, then, that we know God; and challenge so-called atheist or blindest materialist to say he does not. Without this God there were no unity; no common bond among men. It is in this oneness of our permanent nature that the ages are linked together, and our whole social structure is fashioned and made to endure.

I find, then, God present with us, as substance of our nature; the very self, so to speak, out of which we grow. In adopting this view, and dismissing the old idea of a being separate and afar, acting upon us from without, the same question remains to disturb our sense of security; namely, Does this God know of our calamities when they arise, and is he able to save? My thought is this: God as substance has only that knowledge of finite relations and conditions which is gained by finite experience. We have the doctrine of the divine incarnation. Now, ceasing to limit that to Jesus, seeing in all men, in all manifestation whatsoever, this incarnating process,—in flower, shrub, tree, beast, universe, the same as in man,—and looking simply at the case rationally, what shall we say? Why, our experience is that what we term intelligence, knowledge, wisdom, the whole intellectual strength of finite man, is gained only by this incarnation carried toward its perfection. In other words, God, self-moved to know finitely, must achieve that felicity by or through finite organic development: he must become man to know man. We might say that, from his side, it is God moved to become man. From our side, it is the man moved to become God. The union of infinite desire and finite achievement constitute salvation.

Suppose there were a bridge to build across Niagara. Our friends who think that prayer may move the God to action may as well ask this favor as any other. If the God should hear the petition, and feel a desire to grant it, what would be his mode of procedure? Why, says my friend, he would either put it into the heart of some one to build this bridge; or, by miracle, he would span the cataract from shore to shore himself, laying buttress and all, before our very eyes, and in the twinkling of an eye. In these latter days, however, our faith is not equal to any very serious expectation of this last-named sort. There is hardly any credulity extant that will stand on Niagara's bank a moment, hoping to be eye-witness of such a consummation. God must, then, do the other thing, and put it into the heart and the intelligence of some one or more human instruments to do the work for him. But how shall even this be done? I do not see that experience or reasonable expectation justifies other reply than this: It must be done by creating such heart and intelligence. Well, now, is not that precisely the significance of all the ages? What else do they mean but the creation of this ability and disposition to care for all finite concerns? Now a bridge, for one thing, implies a hand that can hold a hammer. The hand is the consummation of long epochs of evolution; and there must be many more to get the brain that will vouchsafe it that cunning it will never forget. There are sewers to the sea to be built. When? When man arrives and his necessity becomes the mother of the invention? New land on our back bay is to be made. When? When the needs of the city suggest and explore the possibility. Mind, then, is developed in that direction; but never before knows it of sewer or new-made land.

The creative process is going on. The God is ever busy. "My Father worketh hitherto" was a good saying. Why pray the ever-busy God to do more? No; bridges are your business, not the God's. What can the infinite know about your bridge except through finite experience? And that finite experience is you, with brain and heart developed to your emergency. Moreover, how can the infinite hear without an ear? Again, your finite voice must find a finite ear, or its words do mock the air that carries them. All that concerns finite needs, the achievement of finite salvation, must come through finite development.

Hence it was that I reminded you in the beginning of the modern impulse to enlarge all the boundaries of the powers of man. It is that we ourselves must achieve what we have called on the gods in vain to do, and which the gods have been impotent to perform. The dependence is at least mutual. Luther said, "God cannot do without strong men." In some latter day Scriptures I find these lines:—

"Unto men belong the desires of the Most High; Providence is revealed in the wisdom and virtue of men."

"The dignity of God is upon the shoulders of men. His dependence is upon them forever."

"He waiteth their will."

"His delight is in their progress."

"Their steps are down in the valley."

"He alone is on the mountain, and men must go up to his help."

"His cry is to the children of men."

"No good thing can be performed until it passeth through the thought of man, is accepted of their hearts and wrought by their cunning and powerful hand."

Explore for yourselves. In your own natures find the God-substance; the all-creating Reason that opens into knowledge; the universal Love that ever goes forth to all creatures; the eternal Beauty that holds you by its spell. Not articulate, not conscious as you finitely are conscious; but none the less, all the more real and abiding. In this God, I reiterate, we are not believers, but knowers.

If we cannot surrender the idea of God, but must interpret it more and more in harmony with experience, what is there to say concerning religion? (I dismiss the idea of immortality as having taught to do with religious sentiment. One moment is as good for its expression as a million; one life as another. Mortal or immortal does nothing signify.) If mortal, then so much; if immortal, all that implies.

Here too, I think, we find ground for more and more rational interpretation, but none for delivering the word up to the executioner.

Always in some sort this word has stood for fealty. Homage, trust, dependence, rest in that supreme somewhat we know,—I see not why this shall not be counted as our religion. Not moral action,—as St. James seemed to say in his famous injunction, "visit the fatherless and afflicted,"—but that which inspires it. Truth, love, beauty,—the divine impulses in our God-nature,—invite our aid. The bestowal of our lives to these, in service loving and not self-seeking, is religion. He who is over-solicitous for his own soul, ever watching and working to save it, turns religion as it were inside out. I do not incline to that form of statement which shows religion to be "the effort of man to perfect himself." I would rather say it is man's free service to the God; man's longing to perfect the divine incarnation. I is, too, a spontaneity rather than effort. I like to let my thought run on somewhat as follows, and think when I have done that I have defined religion: I pass a man in the street. What have I done? With no thought of self, with no thought of the man I met, I have graciously given him the right of way. It was the spontaneity of my manners that lent them their charm. I did it not to perfect myself nor my neighbor. It was my salute to the Universe. Unpremeditated, 'twas a right thing to do. No praise for me. I was not there for blame or praise. I did it not to escape hell or enter heaven. Our meeting and passing was the rhythm and music of life. Neither of us thrust self in the way. With no thought of the act, we waived self and permitted the tryst of God.

When we come to analyze the act, we find it moral as well as religious. The inspiration religious; the result moral. The difference between the religious and the moral sentiment is, the one is the service of the ideal,—of truth and beauty and righteousness for their own sake; the other implies some private consideration either for self, family, or race. There may be morality without religion, but there can be no true religion without conserving all that morality enjoins. There is a fault with "mere morality,"—to use a phrase made familiar to our ears by our Orthodox friends,—so that it becomes a sort of mechanism of manners; doing to others as you would be done by, for instance. I suppose the Pharisees of old were all scrupulously moral, painfully so; it was their moralism, with a dash of hypocrisy, that made them so distasteful to the Nazarene. One must act from within, unconsciously sending forth love to neighbor, even as birds sing and children play. Except ye become as little children ye do not enter into religion. Childhood is not moral. A calculating, precise, prim, wise, old child is a moral phenomenon that will distress a whole neighborhood. What we cannot do cheerfully is never done gracefully. And, you know, we are "saved by grace."

Shall we have this religion in America,—this religion that blends our lives in joyful union with indwelling Deity? No grim Mechanic executing a work; no omnipotent Will driving heedlessly on to self-glorification; but a divine Soul incarnating truth, beauty, and blessedness? Not a job, but an immortal poem. Let America be a fulfilment of this desire!

As we do not despise mechanical work, but seek to have it improved and uplifted into the light of an ideal aim, so in taking our continent, and reclaiming it from waste and wilderness, and developing all its manifold resources as aids, we seek also that these shall serve the incarnations of the Soul. There is work to do, but it should be the work of gladness. We should sing as we work, chanting the new births of the beautiful and the true. So do we liberate the God. It was a good saying that we should "come up to the help of the Lord." God is a paradox; almighty, and yet how weak! utterly unable to do aught without you; therefore are you created. The God will never, indeed, be baffled; rest assured of that. If you do not serve, others will follow that will. But that nothing can be accomplished save through human cooperation attests the God's utter dependence.

See how this service of the God who is the impulse of all beauty, truth, and goodness puts on universal consideration. We not only consider the lilies, but mankind everywhere, and the brute world, as we say, also. It all—the whole globe—means something: everywhere the ground is sacred. Life everywhere signifies the God's endeavor. Wherever in man the spark of freedom glows, it shall in no wise be smothered. Wherever sorrow, suffering, ignorance, poverty, appeal for succor, we are the agents to fly with God's relief. Only let us remember that, as religionists, we are to do nothing arbitrarily or mechanically, but creatively. So shall we write a new line of the immortal poem.

There are three words, much abused, that seem to me freighted with the divine life:—

Equality, Freedom, Fraternity.

Leave out the God, and equality is indeed a term of mockery. But, every soul, plus God, is the equal of every other. Whenever I see my brother, be he however fallen, however weak, however degraded, I may say, "That is as far as God has got along in him." He is God's signal of distress; that is the God's summons for help. There are to be no outcasts, male or female. Of all people, let not those who have abolished hell for the world to come think it must be perpetuated here. Have no such faithless religion. I have all faith in America that her only creed can be the sacredness of all human rights, the equality of all human souls in the God.

As to freedom, I think we are well set with our sails toward that. Yet our faith in it may still be increased, and we shall not lose the approving smile of the God. It is the God that cries, "I must have free course to be glorified!" Freedom of speech, freedom of life: it is a very serious interruption of the God's endeavor when these are checked and denied. It is no part of our business to wait till everybody shall speak right and act right before we grant their freedom. Ourselves should also then be dumb. Think if such an edict had ever gone forth to all people from the heavens, and power also to enforce it: why, the life of this world would have been wound up from that moment. No, our freedom is in the God. 'Tis the God's say, not ours. Not by measuring each other with the measuring rods of majorities are we to regulate freedom.

'Tis not that I am doomed, but God is hindered when I become your slave. Pure and unbelly egotism is it when you set your wit up, mighty though it be, as censor and establisher of what the God through me shall say and do. America has grand problems, political, moral, social, religious. Discussion—free and welcomed—is the sole method of their evolution. Error is not only to be tolerated, it is to be expected. Let it come; the sooner it is out the sooner it will be over with. Error works in and works out. Give it play. The God knows his business. Why, from error we must liberate truth. How do it, if error be crushed? 'Tis a great delusion to do so. 'Twill rise again as well as truth. In my judgment the Devil never flourishes save when he is persecuted. No; every suppression of freethinking is at our cost. We don't know what we lose. America must delight in perfect freedom. Remember, 'tis the God that is to write the poem, and not we. Give the God democratic opportunity; and, good friends, absolutely cast fear from your hearts.

A word more of a complementing sort. I say we must give the God free utterance through all individuals. It is also for the individual to consider how he may and does hinder the God. It is a question that arises very naturally out of the other. Establish the expectation that every one must account, not to society, but to the God within him, and each begins at once to assume a new attitude. I may deceive you, but I cannot deceive this indwelling God. I know very well when my word or my deed is framed to the beauty and the truth that are within me. Fix responsibility there, and one must begin to slough off all enshrouding hypocrisy. I may hide from my human neighbors, and so feel at ease; but the sense of right that is the supreme part of me is not escaped. Though I go down into the depths of hell, lo! the God is there with me also.

Teach, then, one's duty to the God, to the highest and best he and she knows, and you teach the true and only all-embracing gospel. The right of each to render first and always this homage to the Supreme is the only safeguard to the rights of all. Duties to each other are so taught, and only so. I can ask no one to violate his conscience for my benefit, or to serve my egotism. Let, now, the individual accept this obligation to the highest in good faith; putting away all self-seeking, vain spirit, personal pride; be the humble servant of the truth, the adorer of beauty, the quiet medium of all the goodness the God can pour through him to a needy world,—and the perfect providence is established.

This also is the bond of fraternity; the true, abiding friendship of the world. The God is one. We are many,—the varying expressions of the same mind. Were we all alike, we should not much care for each other. Indeed, murder then would be of very little consequence. If but one were left, it would be enough for a sample; the God would be satisfied with that. But no; as are the sands on the sea-shore, so in number are the varieties of Divine incarnation. 'Tis the God in each suggesting relation, and prompting love for each other. Fraternity means peace and good-will on earth; not necessarily intimate friendships with all mankind. Each to his sort. Some people accord better apart. Others accord more and more as they more and more come to know each other. 'Tis a matter of temperament largely. Let that pass; let it be so. Fraternity—the fraternity of the race—is not thereby disturbed. Let Nature have her way; accord with whom you can accord for daily intercourse; and keep also for the God's sake charity and kindness for all souls else, with willingness to serve them.

Should I now stop to say anything of results in America, I should pass, I fear, far by the limit of your patience. And perhaps it would be much like the boy's piling up the little wood he had cut, to show how big was the pile, when all the forest he and others had been sent to attack still remained standing. Again, it really makes very little difference where we are in our work, if still the Ideal shines before or within us. With the times and the seasons, with the measure of present success or failure, whose hath heard the God's whisper of assurance hath no deep concern.

Be it more or less, much has been done, and much remains. What can't be done to-day shall be done to-morrow, or the day after. There is no hurry. Nature has but one way. Her only resource is growth,—growth that cannot be forced: we must abide her time. Since the Saurian ages, has not the God been patient? Let us emulate the example. We cherish great purposes and good ones. On all who would make haste beyond what is meet, let the poet's admonition fall:—

"'Tis all in vain to hurry so!
They're roses, and will surely blow."

LITERATURE AND BREADTH.

The domain of Literature is the only place wherein one can draw a long, deep, pure, free breath. Everywhere else one is bound to think and speak and act in conformity with the prevailing ideas and opinions of the set or company to which he "belongs." If our reverence for things divine and sacred; if our interest in the welfare and integrity of our country; if our deep sympathy with the unfortunate and suffering part of our race,—lead us to ally ourselves with any sect in religion, any party in politics, any movement in reform, then straightway we find that we have to hitch our free spirit to some machine of institution or organization, some private conceit or pet scheme of an imperious leader or manager. Directly we do this, we come upon some intellectual or moral scruple which we cannot alienate, without doing violence to our constantly uprising loyalty to truth and duty.

But in literature all this is different. Here our reverence for God, our love of country, our philanthropic sentiment toward mankind, may have free scope and exercise. Here are no sects, no parties, no schools, which can command our thought or sowen within narrow limits. Here we can look around the whole circle of the world, and take note of, and feel the liveliest interest in, all the intellectual, religious, moral, and secular life of humanity. Here we can think and feel and live with the noblest and best of our race; and here, also, we can approach and enter into the joys and sorrows, the common lot, of all our kind. The far and near, the ancient and modern, the Christian and Pagan, the wise and less wise, here draw near and speak with us, and invite us to become acquainted with experiences which are as universal as life itself. Here our minds and hearts are not narrowed, but broadened; and here our sympathies are challenged, not by a portion, but by all of our fellow-men.

The thoughtful and just man feels lonely everywhere but in literature. He desires relations with his kind, and would not be solitary or cynical, but large-minded and large-hearted. Yet in the ordinary walks, pursuits, and ambitions of men, his constant experience is of being thrust back upon himself, repelled by the aims and animus of the company he tries to keep. In scrambling and competing crowds men never think their best thoughts, never breathe their noblest aspirations, never perform their highest deeds: it is when they are alone with themselves, alone with God, alone with those sweet, pure, true souls that ever have been set in life and history to shine as the stars with tranquil and unfading lustre,—it is then that they best can listen to and obey those voices which prompt to divinest things, and grow and ripen in the privacy of their heart and spirit.

We plead, then, for the greater and more common study of literature. Let our youth be trained to reading,—to the reading of those books which the best minds and souls have produced, and which stand the test of time. Let those who are forced to live in the midst of secular activities,—in the market, the court, the public place, the scene of labor and strife and competition,—let all such, as they value the right development of intellect, conscience, and heart, cultivate a taste for literature; cultivate the capacity of enjoyment in "breathing the still air of delightful studies." We sincerely believe that we can render no truer service to our countrymen, in these intense and noisy times, than to urge them to the acquirement of literary tastes and habits; to the securing of that "sweetness and light" which are to be found in the calm walks and ways of literature.—A. W. Stevens in the Literary World.

CHIVALROUS DEED BY THE COLORED SENATOR.

Bruce, the Senator from Mississippi, is a very fine-looking mulatto, tall, stout, and handsome. He is said to be a Virginian by birth, and was owned in early youth by the wealthy Bruce family of Halifax County. He seemed very popular with his colleagues, and was frequently seen on the avenue, walking with the white brethren and evidently on pleasant terms with them. From what I could hear of him he must be a man of uncommon intelligence, who has studied diligently, since the emancipation, to improve himself and make up for his early disadvantages. A young lady who holds a clerkship in one of the departments told me an incident connected with Senator Bruce, which illustrates both the wonderful changes wrought by the whirligig of time, and the amiability which is ever the characteristic of the long-suffering African. While the carpet-bag government existed in Mississippi very heavy municipal taxes were levied in the towns, and some dispute arose between a gentleman who had been one of the wealthy citizens of Bruce's district and the "Yankee mayor" of the town in which he lived, in regard to the collection thereof. The Mississippian refused to pay his quota, because the city had failed to make repairs necessary to the preservation of the wall surrounding his grounds. The controversy continued for some time, until at last, in the absence of the owner of the property, deputies appointed by the mayor entered the house, and without ceremony carried off the piano and other pieces of property, which were at once sold for taxes. The family had suffered many losses from the war, and this act, when related to him by his wife, so exasperated the hot-headed Southerner that he went at once to the mayor's office and shot him dead. He was tried by the authorities, and being released on bail at once left the State, by the advice of his bondsmen. The family moved to Baltimore, where they lived in great poverty for a while, and the unhappy Mississippian sunk under his many cares and died.

All this occurred some years ago; and the widow had undergone many trials and privations, when she reached Washington, some months since, with her two little children, and attempted to get an office under the government. She took board at the house where my young friend was living, and after vainly appealing for aid to sundry Democratic friends in high position, having nearly exhausted her slender means, was advised by my informant to ask the assistance of the negro Senator from her own State. The high-born Southern lady, who is described as very handsome and refined in bearing, at first shrank from the thought. But her board-bill was nearly due, her purse was nearly empty, and, deeming her cup of sorrow full to overflowing, she accepted the offer of her new friend to accompany her to the dreaded interview, and the two specimens of the old noblesse went to the door of the Senate-chamber and sent in a card to Mr. Bruce. The negro Senator appeared at once, and my informant assured me that the respect and courtesy of his manner could not have been surpassed. In response to the faltering request of the unhappy lady for aid for herself and her starving children, Bruce answered quickly in tones of much feeling: "Certainly, madam, I will do all in my power to aid you. When I was a slave, working on my master's plantation, you were known as one of the richest and most elegant ladies of the country; and now that times have so greatly changed for us both, I shall be glad of an opportunity to serve you." The ex-slave went at once to the departments, and his efforts were so successful that a few hours later the desolate widow was rejoicing in her appointment to a clerkship.—Washington letter to Springfield Republican.

WOMAN'S HOUSEHOLD DUTIES.

There is much said, and some of it very justly, upon the propriety of our girls accustoming themselves to perform the various branches of household labor, thus acquiring such a practical knowledge of the operations involved as to enable them to carry them on with ease whenever circumstances require them to do so. Yet in this, as in most good advice, there is danger of going to an extreme, thereby inducing the neglect of other claims. There are few things in the ordinary life of a woman that are in greater need of remodeling than the sudden and entire changes of occupation which seem at certain times to await her. During her school life, intellectual progress is thought to be the one thing needful. Either by her own ambition or the urgency of friends, she is induced to devote most of her time to study, and if she succeed in retaining health under the pressure she may consider herself fortunate. Suddenly, upon the completion of a prescribed course, all this ceases. The incentives to study, lately so intense, are removed, the influences changed, and too often the mental development, which had but just fairly started, is arrested. Her time is now given up either to society or household duties, and the taste for intellectual pleasures gradually declines for want of stimulus. It is not strange, then, that when the care of a family comes to devolve wholly upon her she should devote herself to its details too exclusively for her own best good, or for her greatest efficiency in the world.

Of course, when the question of means comes in to decide the occupation, no true and noble woman will hesitate to do whatever presents itself as immediate duty, or promises to secure the necessary comfort of the family. But this is not the point upon which it usually hinges. Many of those who can and do afford to have the household work done by other hands still occupy themselves almost wholly with elaborate needle-work and other artificial and unessential luxuries of living. They are indefatigably industrious, and would be greatly hurt by the suggestion that they were wasting time. Indeed, the common cry of the great importance of all women becoming proficient in domestic duties strengthens them in this course, and induces a supreme satisfaction at their own success. Meantime, the mind must suffer from neglect. There is no time for reading or study, no taste for thoughtful subjects, no desire to increase the stock of knowledge, which is fast waning away. May not one potent cause of this state of things be found in the general stress laid upon the propriety of household labor for woman, and the very small emphasis laid upon her need and duty of self-culture?

There is so much in the life of every wife and mother that demands rare intelligence, deep and extensive knowledge, wisdom, discretion, and judgment, that wherever it is possible, after providing for the more pressing wants of the household, to devote a regular amount of time to her own culture and self-development, she may rest assured that by so doing she is most truly blessing and benefiting those who are under her daily influence. What faithful mother has not been perplexed to know how to answer the eager questions of her little child, and wished for more knowledge and clearer ideas, that she might guide its young mind wisely? How can she ever be to it what its thirsting spirit craves or its awakening faculties demand, if her entire time and thoughts are consumed by the preparation of elaborate apparel and the care of costly furniture? The judgment needed to appertain expenses, to guide domestics, and to exercise hospitality, is not to be gained by incessant manual labor, but rather by habits of thought and the ability to reason, which must depend greatly upon the mental nutriment which is afforded. So also the outside claims of social life and of benevolent enterprise equally demand intelligent appreciation for their right fulfillment; so that even considering woman only in the relations of wife, mother, and the head of a household, it is far more important that she keep her mind thoroughly alive and growing, than her hands momentarily busy.

In truth, there should be no break in her mental culture. The education of school ought to be only a foundation on which to base a self-education to be continued through life. System and management will enable most women to secure at least a portion of each day for mental cultivation, and the result both in increased happiness and value to the world will richly reward the effort. It would be well if the advice so plentifully given to women, to learn and practice every species of household work, were at least supplemented by the advice, which is generally more needed, to keep up habits of intelligent thought, reading, and general self-culture.—Phila. Ledger.

A LITERARY CURIOSITY.

DESCRIPTION OF A MODEL NEWSPAPER.

DAILY, SEMI-WEEKLY, AND WEEKLY:

Which paper should be owned and conducted by good men, and sold at the lowest paying rate.

[As will be seen, this piece of metrical prose is in 8-and-7 trochees. The lines, however, contain several peculiarities, all but the first of which need to be pointed out. (1) Each stanza is without rhyme, and (2) no rhyme is found in any two contiguous stanzas taken as one. (3) In every stanza the vowel or diphthongal sound in the last accented syllable of each line and that in the final (unaccented) syllable of each of the first and third lines are all different; (4) neither of the two final syllables of the first line of any stanza contains the same vowel or diphthongal sound as that in the terminal syllable of the last line of the preceding stanza; and (5) the same vowel or diphthongal sound does not occur in the last syllable of any two contiguous stanzas, nor (6) in the last syllable of the second line of any two such stanzas, nor (7), as already half-stated in (3), in the last syllable of the second line of any two contiguous pairs of lines or half-stanzas. Moreover, no emphatic monosyllable is admitted where incompatible with the rhythm; no unemphatic monosyllable is employed in an accented place; no second or fourth line—all which of course end on the accent—terminates on a secondary emphatic syllable of a word; no word beginning with a vowel sound comes immediately after one ending in a vowel sound; no word beginning with a consonant sound comes immediately after one ending in the same consonant sound; and, excepting nineteen necessary but simple monosyllables and one echoed trisyllable, no word in the piece is used more than once.

The rigorous application of rules so minute and complex must sometimes, obviously, necessitate a recourse to forms of expression such as would scarcely be chosen in writing freely,—a consideration to be kept in mind in reading these verses].

I.—NEGATIVE.

It rejecteth contributions*

Fav'ring wrong, untruth, or guile,
Or that countenance or wink at Route, the stage, or harmful sports.

It from things announced to happen
Weedeth such as fall of worth;
And from gleanings past, historic,
Purgeeth matters, lines, unsafe.

It admitteth nothing vulgar;
Doth not jest at sacred thoughts;
And ignoreth outrage, swearing,
Hazards, drink, nicotine leaf.

It inserteth not nor hints of Spiteful or injurious words;
But, when glaring vice it noteth,
Claims for guilty pains condign.

And it barreth fiction vapid,
Frivolous, corrupt, or low;
Shutting out the same as hurtful
Both to wise and saintly walk.

II.—POSITIVE.

'Tis a sheet octavoed,—handy;
Fit in paper; impress clear;
And, regarding type arrangement,
Excellent, attractive, spruce.

'Tis a journal prudent, sober,
Courtly, sensible, concise;
With, anon, a buoyant outbreak,
Hum'rous turn, or spice of wit.

'Tis a guest esteemed by fathers,
Matrons, children, misses, youth;
Plenteous in gainful reading,
Fire-side problems, wholesome tales.

'Tis a record prized of ranchmen,
Shepherds, tillers of the soil;
And, amongst the social topics,
Giveth all the farm-hints new.

'Tis a bulletin for merchants,
Proxies, holders, bond or share;
Trusty, full, on stocks and money,
Commerce, trade, exchange, and gold.

'Tis a chronicle for workers,
Whether using head or hands,—
For collegians philosophic,
As for navvies on the rail.

'Tis a news-collector, valued
For its manifold accounts;
Gath'ring in, from thousand sources,
Numberless occurrences, deeds.

'Tis a chart of useful knowledge,
And of sound affairs of taste;
With alacrity producing
All essential fancy, fact.

'Tis a leader ardent, stalworth,
In the total-abst'nanee league,—
Abstinance for self-security,
And for sake of friend or foe.

'Tis, concerning views of statecraft,
Independent, dauntless, firm;
First, though, weighing ev'ry question
In the scales of Truth and Right.

'Tis at feud with error, falsehood,
Fraud, injustice, aught unclean;
For the common weal contending,
Vold of all intent unfair.

'Tis a guardian constant, helpful,
Of the lower creatures dumb;
Judging that Immanuel's dictates
Loud condemneth ill to these.

'Tis a Mentor to the Christian,— Middle-aged or young or old;
Urgent for unceasing progress
And a faith which acts by love.

And, in chief, it has the sinner's
Highest welfare deep at heart;
Making known, as fleet his life-days,
What should bring eternal good.

‡The Golden Rule.

THE CHANCES FOR GAMBLERS AND INSURANCE COMPANIES.—It is an indubitable result of the theory of probabilities that every gambler, if he continues long enough, must ultimately be ruined. Suppose he tries the martingale, which some believe infallible, and which is, as I am informed, disallowed in the gambling-houses. In this method of playing he first bets say $1; if he loses it he bets $2; if he loses that he bets $4; if he loses that he bets $8; if he then gains he has lost 1+2+4=7, and he has gained $1 more; and no matter how many bets he loses, the first one he gains will make him $1 richer than he was in the beginning. In that way he will probably gain at first; but, at last, the time will come when the run of luck is so against him that he will not have money enough to double, and must, therefore, let his bet go. This will probably happen before he has won as much as he had in the first place, so that this run against him will leave him poorer than he began; some time or other it will be sure to happen. It is true that there is always a possibility of his winning any sum the bank can pay, and we thus come upon a celebrated paradox that, though he is certain to be ruined, the value of his expectation calculated according to the usual rules (which omit this consideration) is large. But, whether a gambler plays in this way or any other, the same thing is true; namely, that if he plays long enough he will be sure some time to have such a run against him as to exhaust his entire fortune. The same thing is true of an insurance company. Let the directors take the utmost pains to be independent of great conflagrations and pestilences, their actuaries can tell them that, according to the doctrine of chances, the time must come, at last, when their losses will bring them to a stop. They may tide over such a crisis by extraordinary means, but then they will start again in a weakened state, and the same thing will happen again all the sooner. An actuary might be inclined to deny this, because he knows that the expectation of his company is large, or, perhaps (neglecting the interest upon money), is infinite. But calculations of expectations leave out of account the circumstance now under consideration, which reverses the whole thing. However, I must not be understood as saying that insurance is on this account unsound, more than other kinds of business. All human affairs rest upon probabilities, and the same thing is true everywhere. If man were immortal, he could be perfectly sure of seeing the day when everything in which he had trusted should betray his trust, and, in short, of coming eventually to hopeless misery. He would break down, at last, as every great fortune, as every dynasty, as every civilization does. In place of this we have death.—Prof. C. S. Peirce, in Popular Science Monthly for March.

It is a curious fact, which ought to have its proper weight, that the man whose duty it is to know most about crime (the head of the police in London) has been heard to say that he finds more and more to excuse in men, and thinks better of human nature, even after tracking it through its most perverse and intolerable courses. It is the man who has seen nothing of life who is intolerant of his fellow-men. Misanthropic people have, in most cases, been made misanthropes by hoping too much. But go on thinking the best you can of mankind, working the most you can for them, never scolding them because they will not be wise your way; and even then being sure that, think as gently and lovingly as you can, you have dealt but a scant measure of tolerance to your fellow-man.—Arthur Helps.

A LITTLE IRISH boy fell down and bit his tongue. He arose from the ground, crying and sobbing, and said to his brother: "O Stephen! think will I ever spake again?"

SO MANY CITIES claimed Homer as a resident and a citizen that we incline to the opinion that he was a Methodist preacher.—Burlington Hawkeye.

REPUTATION is but the synonym of popularity, dependent on suffrage, to be increased or diminished at the will of the voters.—Washington Allston.

NO MAN CAN be brave who considers pain to be the greatest evil of life; nor temperate who considers pleasure to be the highest good.—Chicoro.

MODESTY IS the appendage of sobriety, and is to chastity, to temperance, and to humility as the fringes are to a garment.—Jeremy Taylor.

"HOW GREEDY you are!" said one little girl to another, who had taken the best apple in the dish; "I was going to take that."

N.B.—Orders for Tracts or single numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N.B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

The Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 29, 1878.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. Tolendo Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N.B.—The following resolution was adopted by the National Liberal League, at Philadelphia, July 3, 1876: "Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management."

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, WILLIAM J. POTTER, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHERNEY, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), DAVID H. CLARK, MRS. ELIZABETH CARY STANTON, J. L. STODDARD, ELIZABETH WRIGHT, C. D. B. MILLS, W. D. LE SUEUR, BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, Editorial Contributors.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Until September 1, the editorial charge of THE INDEX will be wholly in the hands of Mr. A. W. Stevens, who has kindly consented to relieve me of all literary responsibility for it during the present month. F. E. ABBOT.

Boston, Aug. 1.

F. E. A. REPORT.

The Eleventh Annual Report of the Free Religious Association, printed in pamphlet form, is now ready for distribution. It contains the reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer; essay by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., of New York, on "The Religion of Humanity, and How it may be Organized"; essay by Rev. W. H. Spencer, of Haverhill, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism, and How it is being Disorganized"; and addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George W. Curtis, Anna C. Garlin, Maurice Ellinger, and Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith (the latter including a poem).

Members of the Association who have paid the annual fee of $1.00 within the last twelve months will receive the report free, in all cases where their post-office addresses are known. To others the price is forty cents single copy; four or more in one package, twenty-five cents each.

Address "Free Religious Association," 231 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

IN CLOSING our month's engagement on THE INDEX, we cordially salute its readers with a "good-by."

THE WORLD'S civilization depends neither on the "hard" dollar nor the "soft" dollar. When men live so as to inspire real confidence in each other, either "hard" or "soft" will serve their purpose.

BEN BUTLER, with lawyer-like discrimination, tells Dennis Kearney that under the treaty stipulations with China we have no right to prevent the Chinese coming here, but that after they have come we have the legal right to treat them so badly that they can't stay! Wise Butler! Happy Kearney!

WE DESIRE to call attention to the article in another column from "Orthodox." He is a gentleman of the very highest standing in the denomination to which he belongs, and kindly furnished us this communication in response to our request that he would write something for THE INDEX while we were temporarily conducting it.

IN A NOTICE of Mrs. Child's Aspirations of the World, the Independent thinks it is "almost amusing" to see that lady trying to preserve a "judicial fairness" in judging between "the claims of Christ and of Buddha." It is certainly to us quite saddening to see Christians ignoring every sort of fairness in judging between the claims of Christianity and those of the other great world-religions.

MR. BRADLAUGH has been publishing in his paper a series of articles having for their burden the inquiry, "Has man a soul?" Mr. Bradlaugh finally concludes not, and fortifies his conclusion with coplous extracts from various scientific authorities. It is vain, however, for these gentlemen, or any others, to think that they can settle this question in the negative. So long as mankind continue to think, love, and aspire, they will persevere to hope for, if not to believe in, the immortality of the soul.

THE INDEX READERS will gladly welcome their permanent editor back to his post next week, and will we are sure heartily unite with us in hoping that he may return with renewed strength and augmented vital energy. It has been granted to few men in this or any other country to give such able and useful service to the cause of Free Thought as he has given, especially during the eight years that he has been the editor-in-chief of this paper. The millions of free-thinkers throughout the world owe to him a deep debt of gratitude, and cannot fall ever to cherish and honor his name.

THE SOUTHERN NEGROES, the New York Nation says, "are growing in wealth, in intelligence, and in self-respect all over the South. They are in the enjoyment, for the first time, of security of person and property; and with the growth of wealth and intelligence political weight must come." It is certainly something to be thankful for that the "negro question" is at last out of our national politics in a manner that is so gratifying to all lovers of justice. We remember that Fred Douglass once said his real fear for the negro was when he should become a free man, and thus have the civilizing capacity in him put to a thorough test. But experience so far shows that the negro is prepared to enter into his birthright with a fair measure of ability to advance with other races in the path of true progress.

MR. T. P. HOWES, of Dennis, Mass., writes to thank us for printing Mrs. Child's essay. He says: "With her other writings I have been familiar for many years, and I hold her character in high veneration. It is impossible to estimate the value of such a mind and spirit as her's to our civilization. For myself, I can say that after visiting many foreign countries, seeing many different modes of living, and having to do with Mohammedans and Buddhists, I entirely agree with Mrs. Child in her opinion that the fundamental laws of morality and the religious aspirations of mankind are strikingly similar always and everywhere. In all my dealings with Eastern people, whether Mohammedans or Buddhists, I could never discover any standard of business morality different from ours." Mr. Howes is an old reader of THE INDEX, and says he has learned to "look to its columns for guidance and inspiration in all intellectual religious matters." We are very glad to receive this second assurance that Mrs. Child's excellent essay was appreciated, as we have no doubt that it generally was, by the intelligent readers of THE INDEX.

THE LIBERAL CONFERENCE which was held at South-Place Chapel, London, June 13 and 14, sent circulars of invitation to Mrs. Besant and Mr. Bradlaugh; but the National Reformer (Bradlaugh's paper) of August 4 tells us that each "declined to attend, on the ground that the circular limited the Conference to 'matters pertaining to the religious needs of our time,' and that the invitation was addressed to those interested in the 'tendency to universal religion.'" The Reformer charges Rev. Charles Voysey with "extremely illiberal conduct" at the Conference; and says that he "positively left the Conference in a fit of ill-temper, because Miss Downing had respectfully argued 'that they must either give up all belief in supernatural religion or become members of the Roman Catholic Church,' and because Mrs. E. L. Ross objected that the word religion was 'indefinite and indefinable.'" The Reformer also adds, in the course of its criticisms on the Conference, that South-Place Chapel (which all INDEX readers probably know is the place where Rev. M. D. Conway preaches) "cannot be let for atheistic advocacy, as the deed limits its use to the worship of the one true God."

A HANDSOME PAMPHLET (printed by John Wilson & Son) has been sent to our hand entitled, "Proceedings of the Indignation Meeting held in Faneuil Hall, Thursday evening, August 1, 1878, to protest against the injury done to the freedom of the Press by the conviction and imprisonment of Ezra H. Heywood." Benj. R. Tucker is the publisher. The pamphlet contains all the speeches made on that occasion, and all the letters of sympathy received by the committee. Some of the speeches are marked by ability and eloquence. The one by the President of the meeting, Elizer Wright, we have already presented to the readers of THE INDEX. The shortest speech in the pamphlet is that made by Laura Kendrick; but for terseness of statement, fervor of tone, and grace of diction it is not excelled by any. "Vice, my friends, can never be legislated out of the world: our only remedy is education." In saying this, Mrs. Kendrick stated, in our opinion, the true philosophy of the reform movement. In one or two of the speeches we regret to see an altogether unnecessary severity of accusation, and the exhibition of a spirit really akin to that which was so fiercely denounced by the speakers. We presume this pamphlet can be obtained by sending to Benj. R. Tucker, Globe Office, Boston, Mass. The price is not stated.

FROM a private letter we take the following very clear and full statement, by a Quaker, of the Quaker doctrine as to inspiration and preaching of the word: "Our greatest and most vital principle is that God by his holy spirit will, if rightly sought, inspire the hearts of every one, whether Quaker or not, to do his will. All our religious meetings are supposed to be held under the guidance of that spirit. Hence, when we come together, we have no knowledge as to what will be required of any of us, either minister or layman; but we sit before God in silence, until by his spirit he calls upon some one to speak or to offer prayer. We believe, further, that this spirit will be so distinctly manifest to the person called upon to speak, as to make known to him or her the substance of what they are to say; and that if they speak according to the right direction, this same spirit will so inspire or touch the heart of the hearer that he will be quickened to heed and obey the preacher's word. The minister comes to the meeting on an equal footing with all the rest. Indeed, all that makes a 'minister' is an acknowledgment on the part of the Society, and a record of the same, that the person appearing has a gift to preach. We believe that there are various gifts,—that of preaching, teaching, exhorting, advising, etc.; and we record such as ministers as seem to have a special calling and guidance of the Spirit to preach. We also hold that all preaching is vain, unless called for and put forth by the Spirit; and that the silence of our meeting is as acceptable worship to God as the vocal portion. We have had abundant evidence of this, by some very marked and wonderful conversions during the silence of the meeting." In corroboration of this, we will say that we have certainly attended religious meetings,—not of the Quaker stamp,—where what little silence was allowed was far more impressive to us than the "vocal portions."

THIS NATION has shown a great capacity for meanness in the matter of race-hatred. It has just recovered from its long hatred and abuse of the negro, being purged of it by a bloody baptism. Against the Indians—who formerly possessed this entire continent, and who were never rightfully dispossessed of it—our nation is still accumulating its awful mountain of sin. It has always had spells of hating all foreigners, especially the Irish. And to-day it seems to be fast getting ready for a mighty transgression against the Chinese. We hated the negro because he was black and defenceless; we hate the Indian because he has always resisted our robbing, deceiving, and cheating him; we hate the Irish because they are Catholics and rapidly accumulating in numbers; and we are preparing to hate the Chinese because they are cheap servants, economical, "heathen," and wear their shirts outside! What better reasons could we possibly have for our meanness, dishonor, and injustice! After stealing our country from one race, and pretending to make it an asylum for the oppressed of every other race, we have exhibited unparalleled hypocrisy and treachery towards every race but our own. The negroes are happily emancipated by war from the slavery we cursed them with for seventy-five years; the Indians we are fast murdering and killing off; the Irish are at last equal to the taking care of themselves; but the Chinese, we fear,—in spite of our treaty stipulations with them,—are yet doomed to suffer immensely at our hands. Our politicians are selfish enough to connive at, if not actually to aid in, the injustice we contemplate to the Mongols,—as they did in that we inflicted so long on the Africans, and that we are still inflicting on the Indians; and no new Sumner yet appears in our national councils to champion the cause of the race we now propose to outrage. But one thing is certain: no nation, as no individual, can sin with impunity. If we sow again to the wind, again we must reap the whirlwind. We shall wrong the Chinese at our peril. They are here at our invitation and by our treaty permission; and we are bound by every consideration of fairness and honor to treat them with justice and kindness.

THE WOMAN QUESTION.

We are in favor of woman's rights because we are in favor of human rights. But what are woman's rights? We have asked, and now we will venture to answer, the question. The right of every woman is like that of every man; namely, to have the freest and fullest opportunity to make the most of herself: in other words, to develop and perfect those faculties which make the worth and the beauty of her womanly nature.

So far as the individual woman is concerned, we are in favor of granting every claim which she makes at the hands of society, for the amplest cultivation and exercise of her powers. If she wishes to be a teacher, a lawyer, a doctor, a minister, a lecturer, a merchant, a sailor, a manufacturer, a farmer, or what not, in God's name let her! Whatsoever she wishes to be or do, give her not only a chance, but the best chance possible, to try it. Let her have free course to glorify herself. If she prefer a public life to a private one, she has a right to have it. If instead of being a wife and mother she chooses, or is necessitated for any reason, to strike out into an independent career and try her fortune among the competing fortunes of men, it is her unquestionable right to do so, and to receive honorable recognition according to her ability. If she desire the highest education in our schools and colleges,—as good as that which we give to any of our men,—why should she not have it? It is her right as one of the members of society; as one of the children of the State. To the individual woman—as to the individual man—nothing is to be denied, nothing withheld from her, which she thinks to be worthy of or necessary to her. So far as individual rights are concerned, woman is to be treated in all respects as on an equality with man. This is rapidly coming to be the conviction and the concession of society in general, as every year bears added testimony in the increasing opportunities given for the individual woman's culture and development.

But when we come to speak of woman in the aggregate, of woman as a sex, something more if not something different is to be said. Nature has drawn her own unmistakable line between the sex-capacities of woman and man, which neither can ignore without peril. It is plain that Nature intended that woman's sphere and woman's work should be different from those of man; and they who try to argue to the contrary only show their ignorance and their folly. Generically speaking, Nature's distinct purpose was that woman should live a private and man a public life; that woman should be the nourisher and man the creator; that woman should find her sphere in the home, and man his abroad in the world. If Nature didn't intend this as to the two sexes, then we don't know anything about Nature, and are utterly incapable to understand and interpret her in any respect. If Nature didn't intend this, then human society has been standing topsy-turvy from the beginning, and our entire civilization is a complete and ridiculous blunder.

If Nature, however, did mean to make, and actually has made, this distinction between the sex-capacities of men and women, then it is clear that whatever the individual woman may exceptionally undertake, women as a whole cannot with propriety attempt to go out of their sphere. If, for instance, the sex should universally deny their natural obligations to be wives and mothers; should refuse their natural duties to nurse, comfort, and inspire the generations; should scorn or neglect their natural gifts of grace, winsomeness, and beauty; should, in short, turn themselves out of doors and go in pursuit of men's vocations,—by so doing they would go as far as they could towards unsexing themselves, inverting the order of Nature, and forfeiting that respect and deference which men as a rule so instinctively render to women. For, allow as we may and must, that the individual woman has the right—exceptional as we insist it is—to forego marriage and devote herself to external, worldly pursuits, it still remains true of woman as a sex that her natural destiny is to be a wife and mother, to fill the sphere of home, and to find her principal function in the discharge of domestic concerns. It is under this destiny and in the fulfilment of this calling that woman wins that love and homage from man which she naturally desires, and without which she would not be either permanently happy or useful. It follows, then, that whatever in woman's training would tend to divert her from her true vocation and unprepare her for her legitimate function would, as a rule, result in defeating her life's end and entailing upon her perpetual sorrow and disappointment. While, therefore, we should not close the doors of our higher seminaries and colleges against such individuals of the sex as deliberately choose an exceptional career, it would seem far from desirable to encourage women in general to seek throughout an identical education with men, or to enter on the same pursuits.

The truth is, there was a deal of good sense and instinctive propriety in the old Oriental notion that the privacy of women should be carefully protected, and that they should not be exposed to public gaze and comment. Of course they carried this notion to absurd extremes, and were often very inconsistent in their observance of it. But it is just as true that in these days we are tending to the other extreme of demanding and allowing every publicity for women. Women are now eagerly competing with men for all public positions, and are even clamoring to enter the political arena and scramble with men for the loaves and fishes of partisan politics. The right of representation in government, we are prepared to admit, belongs equally to women as to men. But how that representation shall be had needs the wisest and coolest judgment to decide. Not all men are fit to be intrusted with the suffrage, and a fortiori not all women. It by no means follows, however, that because some classes of citizens do not vote they therefore are not represented in the government, have no influence in forming it, or fail to have their interests considered by it. All classes of citizens are protected by the government, and all are legislated for according to their needs, whether they vote or not. This at least is the theory of our republican government, and this too is its practice to a large extent. Women have never voted in Massachusetts; and yet we have the authority of one of the best legal writers in the State for the assertion that women are more favored by the laws of Massachusetts than men. The mere right of voting is not worth half so much as some people fancy, especially in a country where speech and press are free. Public opinion is the real government in America; and this is affected by the life and character and utterance of every intelligent and virtuous citizen, male or female.

We are well convinced that a large majority of the refined and educated men in this country do not wish to see our women mixing in public politics; and this, not because they are in any wise inimical to the true rights and interests of women, but because they are more than friendly to them. If there is any one thing more than another that men fear to see in women, it is an approach to masculinity,—just as women hate to see in men a sign of effeminacy. It is a mutual instinct in the two sexes, that each demands of the other just what naturally belongs to it; and this natural belonging cannot be maintained, if either sex rushes from its heaven-appointed sphere. There is a well-grounded apprehension on the part of men that the womanly name, if not the womanly nature, will be cheapened and coarsened by too much publicity; and what some public women treat us to, in the matter of masculine manners and gestures and fierce invective, does not tend to allay that apprehension. We are by no means prepared to say that women may not speak and act in public without violating either their own or man's sense of propriety. We certainly believe that they may; especially when we remember the sweet and pure presence of a Lucretia Mott on the platform, or that of the dignified Mary Eastman, with her flowing and elegant diction. But such as these (and there are others like them) are the few exceptions among the many. The point we make is this: as a rule, habitual publicity lowers the tone and quality of the feminine character,—as, indeed, it too often does the masculine. Moreover, the alternative is not presented to women of entering on public life, or of having no voice in nor influence on public opinion. Even if they should be intrusted with the right of suffrage,—as we little doubt they will be to some extent before long, if the ill-advised methods of certain "women's-rights" people do not defeat it,—there is no occasion for them to rush into publicity; as many thousands of men do not, who quietly visit the polls and then go about their private business. The pen belongs to woman as well as to man. We are not aware that Margaret Fuller ever stepped upon a public platform; and yet in her Woman in the Nineteenth Century she has written wiser things for and about woman than we are in the habit of hearing in modern "women's-rights" meetings. In her private conversations, also, she instructed and inspired scores of men and women, and sent them forth as apostles of that higher culture which helps on the best civilization for all.

And this leads us to say at the close of all we have written, that what women need, as what men need, is a higher inspiration, that shall enter into their private living, bringing them nobler motives, more unselfish aims, richer thoughts and feelings, and in short a loftier ideal by which to live. If this nation is to be saved from utter political and social demoralization, it must have introduced into the private lives of its men and women higher political and social ideals; its best citizens must set up a superior standard of living, and hold themselves and all others to it as strictly as may be. In love and friendship, no less than in learning, we must have a new culture; for a higher education, either for men or women, does not mean more Greek and Latin and mathematics, but a deepening and broadening sense of that social justice and that personal integrity which constitute the genius of character in the individual and the true foundation of a permanent State.

WAFER.

—It is clear that hell cannot yet be dispensed with; for what then would become of Kearney's rhetoric?

—It is beginning to be seen that Benjamin wants to be Governor. And that is the Kearney of the whole matter.

—The new Pope and his newer secretary seem to be trying to mend the papal crockery-ware which their predecessor carelessly allowed to get broken.

—Charles Burleigh (son of the late C. C. Burleigh), with his young wife, sails in a few days to spend several years abroad, to perfect himself in art studies.

—David H. Clark, who has been resident speaker of the Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass., for the last three years, has resigned the position.

—It is announced that Mrs. Sara Andrews Spencer has purchased a half interest in Woman's Words, and will hereafter be one of its editors. The paper is published jointly in Philadelphia and Washington.

—Imperialism appears to be "getting its mad up" since the late attempts at assassination; and Russia and Germany especially are laying a rough hand upon socialism. But popular convictions and movements cannot be stamped out as one would some burning rags or paper.

—Dyer D. Lum, who was last year the candidate of the Greenback party for Lieutenant-Governor of this State, and who has been a valuable contributor to THE INDEX (now a resident of Washington), is passing his vacation in New England in the interest of the Labor and Greenback movement.

—It will cause sincere sadness to many to hear that Stephen H. Foster, one of the bravest of the brave captains of the Anti-Slavery struggle, is in feeble health. Mr. and Mrs. Foster—and both are entitled to equal honor—live on a handsome and well-cultivated farm of their own, just outside of Worcester.

—"It is not well for man to live alone." The Rev. W. H. Spencer, of Haverhill, Mass., one of the associate editors of THE INDEX, has wisely come to this conclusion. And hence Miss Anna C. Garlin, of Providence, R.I., whose earnest and pleasant voice has been heard on reform and liberal platforms, and whose graceful pen is winning her a good place in literature, will hereafter be known as "Mrs. Spencer." We congratulate the Haverhill society, and we congratulate each and all.

—The recent triumph of suffrage in New Hampshire drew forth the following announcement of the event to the Woman's Journal: "Concord, N.H., Aug. 9, 1878. To our surprise and delight, the bill allowing women to vote in school-district meetings passed the House yesterday afternoon at half-past four o'clock, amid much cheering and clapping of hands, the ladies in the gallery joining in the manifestations of satisfaction. Conservative New Hampshire leads New England in this branch of reform. A. S. WHITE." Mrs. White is President of the New Hampshire Woman Suffrage Association.

—Rev. J. B. Thomson of the Free Congregational Church of Bloomington, Ill., is one of the ministers who look forward and not back. Though nominally in fellowship with Unitarianism, he is on its outermost rim. He was born and educated in England, and has been but a few years in this country. Excommunicated from the Methodist denomination for what was deemed heretical opinions, while the minister of a small church of that order in Pennsylvania, to which he drew a large support of liberals from the country all about, he became the preacher to the society over which he is now settled. Mr. Thomson spoke one or two Sundays ago before the Society of Cosmian Hall, Florence, where he left an excellent impression. He will breathe the salt air of the rock-bound coast of New England for a few weeks before resuming work on the prairies. D. H. C.

A NOTE ABOUT TYPES AND HIGHER LAW.

The Boston Globe, in printing from his manuscript Eliza Wright's opening remarks at the Heywood Indignation Meeting, made him write Bonris where he read (and meant to write) Boccaccio. If there is any such author as Bonris, he will have to blame bad chirography and the Globe for placing him between Babelais and the Bible, and thus exposing him to ignominious punishment by the Courts of the United States. This error THE INDEX of last week, in reprinting the remarks, inadvertently copied, and also omitted the following sentence:—

"Fellow citizens, whatever the Supreme Court of the United States may have decided in some other case, a law which would justify the arrest by Anthony Comstock and the subsequent sentence of Heywood proves itself not only unconstitutional but contrary to the higher law, as laid down in a book which the supporters of Comstock profess to reverence without seeming to be familiar with it."

This may require a word of explanation from the writer. He certainly did not mean to say that the Constitution of the United States, correctly interpreted, is contrary to "higher law," or that everything in the Bible is agreeable to it. But he did mean to say that the Comstock law, as applied to Heywood, whatever the Supreme Court may have said or decided, is not only unconstitutional but contrary to whatever of "higher law" is contained in the Bible. Doing evil that good may come is contrary to a law higher than any such opinion or decision of a court,—not because Paul said the damnation of those who attributed it to Christians was just, nor because Isaiah rejoiced over the downfall of those who practised it in his day, but because its effect is not favorable to good morals or good order in society. If the conduct of the righteous in administering the government does not commend itself to the consciences of the wicked, government is a failure. If the wicked administer the government, and in punishing one offence are allowed to commit another, it is a still worse failure.

Bad as the offence of transmitting indecent works through the mail is, the Constitution, in giving Congress the power to establish post-offices, does not appear to have given it any power over that subject; and if not, it belongs wholly to the people, as States or municipalities. But, however that may be, when the law is used to punish and suppress opinions that happen to be unpopular, it comes in collision with the only bulwark of human liberty which the Constitution contains.

The details, the superstructure of our boasted free government, are nothing after the bed-rock of its foundation is disintegrated. If this sapping and mining goes on,—with liars for miners, and political judges to apply the match,—by-and-by there will be nothing beneath us but sand and insincerity. E. W.

RUNNING NOTES.

BY L. K. W.

—Col. Ingersoll received $30,000 for lecturing last season. Does Free Religion pay?

—It is said that the sacred books of the Chinese Buddhists weigh half a ton. But they have no weight with us.

—Truth has to be told a thousand times before it is accepted; but people will believe a lie as soon as they hear it.

—Every soul has inherited a part of the divine estate. The gift of God is not "salvation by faith," but the power to think, to feel, to act, to live.

—It is easy to be kind to the dead, but hard to be just to the living. We can speak well of those who are gone: can we not treat well those who are left?

—When a Unitarian minister is allowed the privilege of speaking from a Methodist pulpit, are we to infer that Methodists have embraced the tenets of Unitarianism, or that the Unitarian minister has embraced Methodism?

—The cause of liberty is best advanced by its advocates not abusing the privileges of liberty. Mr. Heywood might be enjoying the blessings of home and family, instead of suffering the humiliation of prison-life, had he recognized this truth. He might have written within the limits of good taste without any sacrifice of principle. His work may not be obscene, but it is hardly up to the heights of good morals.

—A young man advertises in the Boston Herald of a recent date for a situation as salesman or accountant, and says "he has never preached or prayed in public, neither has been treasurer or superintendent of a Sabbath-school, or betrayed any confidence reposed in him; but relies for worldly success on the old-fashioned qualities of integrity, intelligence, good health, and good nature." Such a young man deserves to be employed by a person with as clean a record as he shows.

—The magic word of Christendom is "Jesus." This is the word that the Church conjures with. It is preached; it is prayed; it is sung. We have heard it until we are tired of hearing it. It is alike in oath and in hymn; in the saint's mouth and in the sinner's. The pride of another man's goodness that fills the hearts of Christians is no virtue. This eternal boasting of the greatness of Jesus is but the sign of our own littleness. We want the power that we praise in him, else are we but silly adulators and not men.

—The blessings of freedom are no less valuable and no less dear to the human heart for any man's injudicious exercise of his freedom. If a man says what is foolish or unwise, let us condemn his folly, not deprive him of his liberty. While we cannot say that his sentence was just, it seems to us that Mr. Heywood is more the victim of his own foolhardiness than a martyr to the cause of freedom. It is to be regretted that Mr. Heywood did not know that laws are designed to protect the morals of society as well as to secure the rights of individuals. We hope, however, that pardon will follow close upon imprisonment.

—Rev. Dr. Newman, of Washington, D.C., in a recent address said: "Mr. Chairman, the Church of God needs one thing. She needs an addition to her creed,—'I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints, the forgiveness of sins, total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, the resurrection of the dead, and life everlasting.'" It needs a subtraction from her creed also. It wants the falsehood and nonsense taken out of it. What the Rev. Dr. added (in italics) is about the only sensible thing in it. Why repeat this string of absurdities in an age like this? We do not want faith in a ghost, but faith in the actual living facts around us. We do not want a God who can die and come to life again, but one that cannot die.

—The public mind does not need to be agitated; it needs to be settled. If any one can speak wise words, let us hear them. We do not deny that the "times are out of joint;" but they cannot be righted by using bad language. The country will get no help from the shirt-sleeve oratory and sanguinary eloquence to which our senses have been treated of late. If Mr. Kearney expects to convert the common-sense of New England to his opinions, he has got to use different arguments from what he has yet employed. Is a man a murderer, a thief, because he is fortunate enough to be able to have a hundred-dollar government bond in his pocket-book? What sort of moral logic is this? We do not need a King of idlers; a Ruler of rioters; a Lord of tramps. The elements are not in this section of the country to which Mr. Kearney can appeal with any success. We cannot remedy the working-man's wrongs by depriving the rich of their rights.

—Some newspapers are fond of quoting evidences of growing liberality among the many Christian denominations. It is true that modern investigation has forced the Christian pulpit into assuming a less offensive attitude on some religious questions, and that what is flatteringly called the "spirit of the age" has manifested serious objection to certain old theological dogmas; but that any essential doctrine of Christianity has been abandoned, or any important change made in the creed of Christendom, we cannot see. Some of the postulates of the Christian theology are not pushed to their logical conclusions as they once were; but this fact merely shows that the preachers of Christianity have adopted different methods of interpreting their assumptions. The vital doctrines of the Christian Church have not undergone any real change, and the liberality that is so apparent to many is only the forced pleasantness of the physician in administering a disagreeable potion. We shall recognize the liberality of Christians when they give up their illiberal doctrines; but as long as they teach that "faith in Christ is the only way of salvation," they are in no immediate danger of becoming liberal.

WHEN HE CEASES to be an advocate and speaks judicially, Mr. Phillips is a sage; and his table-talk would be as good as Selden's, if anybody chose to report it. It is a pity somebody should not, and also that the golden arrows of eloquence that he has been shooting from his easy bow for more than forty years should not be collected, austere revised, and edited for the generations that will not have the pleasure of hearing his voice. If I were President Eliot and could do as I pleased at Harvard, I would instantly appoint Mr. Phillips Professor of Oratory there, and thus do something to retrieve the years that have been wasted in that university without training its graduates to public eloquence. Harvard should long ago have made Mr. Emerson a professor, and now it should lose no more time in attracting Mr. Phillips thither.—F. B. Sanborn.

"ROVER," beloved dog of Good Will Fire Company of Haverburg, Pa., died recently. He was a white Newfoundland, above the average size of the breed, and had greatly endeared himself to the members of the company by his faithful attendance at fires and parades, and his affectionate disposition. After death he lay in state for several hours in the engine-house. He was placed in a neat pine box upon a bed of fresh myrtle leaves. Flowers and geranium leaves were strewn over the body, and small flags were placed about the box. At nightfall, when nearly two-thousand persons had visited the engine-house, the dog was buried in the yard surrounding the building, and the fire-bell was tolled in his honor.—Exchange.

LETTER FROM MRS. DENTON.

WELLESLEY, Mass., July 26, 1878.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

The question, as I understand it, is not whether Congress has a right to "regulate the entire postal system of the country," but whether Congress has a right so to regulate that system that, while you may be permitted the use of the mails for sending certain documents safely to their destination, I may be refused their use for sending the same documents, or may be subjected to fine and imprisonment for having sent them. No one will complain when the so-called obscenity-law shall have been made sufficiently definite and impartial, and shall be impartially administered. But it is time to speak (and we have a right to be heard), whenever we find on the statute-books any law that discriminates in favor of theories, or that may be used for silencing discussion of any of the more important questions before the attention of this thoughtful age.

The necessity for the utmost care in the use of the language employed in this discussion I very freely admit, and believe it should be most strenuously insisted upon. I nevertheless see the necessity (and I think you will admit it) for calling things by their right names, whenever this is essential to their proper characterization, or to a correct understanding of the author's ideas. That Mr. Heywood would be as ready to avow these sentiments as either you or I, I have not a shadow of doubt. That it was his purpose to trespass upon the rights of good taste, or of a cultivated sense of propriety, I do not for a moment believe. What I do believe is that, seeing the apathy, the inexcusable indifference of the community, radical as well as conservative, to a subject which must be regarded as of the very first importance in any effort for the regeneration of the race, he attempted to arouse attention to that subject by showing us a measure of the degradation in which we are involved. It may be easy to criticize his choice of language in the attempt to do this. It is not easy to answer his arguments. And with the terrible facts to which he refers everywhere staring us in the face, it is difficult to understand by what method any thinking person can maintain his or her integrity and still ignore the pressing need for this discussion.

Whatever may be said of the remedy proposed by Mr. Heywood, it is sufficiently evident that where the monogamic system of marriage prevails, there exists a class of evils that for thousands of years has defied the wisest legislative efforts of the nations adopting it. And it still defies them. Shall we then be forbidden all inquiry as to the why and wherefore of its existence? It is also evident that in our own time, and in its present form, marriage as a system falls of the high purposes for which it is ostensibly perpetuated. Shall we also be forbidden all inquiry as to the cause or causes of such failure? And can we hope to make such inquiry successful without studying the natural relations of the sexes, their needs, and the conditions of their mutual dependence?

Whether it be true, as intimated in Cupid's Yokes, that the marriage system, in its present form and with its existing methods, is neither more nor less than a system of gambling supported by law, and as such demoralizing in its immediate tendencies, and ruinous in its prospective results,—it is true that so long as it may compel one unloving pair to live a lie, its morality should be questioned and its tendencies discussed as fearlessly as we would question the morality and discuss the tendencies of any other system that may subject us to wrong and outrage. Humanity is above all its institutions, and the rights of society are secondary to those of the individual.

Truly yours, ELIZABETH M. F. DENTON.

WANTED—WHAT?

DEAR MR. STEVENS:—

I have been reading the advertisement for a new religion, which appears in a late number of the North American Review. The writer, who signs himself "Evolutionist," has apparently some good feeling, with a smattering of knowledge and a scattering of intelligence; but it is plain that he is far from deep in that "science" of which he talks, having learned the little he knows of it from some few treatises designed for general reading, together with the Popular Science Monthly and similar periodical publications; and the ignorant, implicit confidence with which he assumes as proven fact the most extreme conclusions, or rather guesses, of its more speculative professors would be amusing if it were not pitiable. As a writer, in short, "Evolutionist" does not merit notice. Unhappily, he has claims to attention on another score. He represents a state of feeling which, as every good observer must be aware, is prevalent and growing in our time, and which is to be reckoned among its most ominous features. No man with an eye in the head can fail to see that great numbers share more or less,—and that, to judge from existing tendencies, greater numbers are likely soon to share,—the impressions to which he has surrendered his mind, what mind he has. Great and growing numbers look upon the old religion as antiquated, and are persuaded that we must ere long have either a new one or none at all. You yourself, I suppose, are of that opinion. You have not arrived at the raw naturalism of "Evolutionist;" but you agree with him in thinking that the alternative for the future is a new religion or none; and it is obvious that an impression to such effect spreads daily.

A Christian believer, like myself, can but regard this as a portentous delusion, and cry in anguish of heart, "How long, O Lord, how long?" That it is but for a time, I know full well. Spread as this dreadful delusion may, its progress will surely be arrested. Endure as the mysterious dispensations of Providence may permit it to do, its term is appointed: it can endure but for a season. There is one religion that out of question was true once. Revealed by God in Jesus Christ, it proved itself true by bringing newness of life to a death-stricken world. This is a style of evidence that verifies itself. Truth alone has life-giving power. You may doubt the resurrection of Lazarus: you cannot doubt the moral resurrection of the ancient world at the call of the Christian Gospel. Was such power in a lie? You dare not say it; you cannot think it. But what was true once is so now. Truth is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. Therefore, with whatever griefs a contemplation of existing tendencies may afflict my soul, I am unshakenly sure that the old religion will abide and triumph. From the Eternal it came, and with the Eternal it will live. Death is not for it, but for those who fall away from it. For them, and not for the Christian faith, I fear.

Nevertheless, on the side of this true and indestructible faith there is somewhat to be desired. It is not now proving itself true by power such as it once had. In the churches there is a too frequent declension from its moral standards, as out of them there is a falling away from it altogether. Had it power as of old, no such evils would appear. Why is it enfeebled? What has made the everlasting truth seem doubtful to so many? The answer is, it is now under a disguise, and not showing its face clearly. The doctrines of revealed religion are true, but I admit that they do not appear so. Truth is reasonable; and not a few of these doctrines seem far from reasonable. Truth consists with all fact; and many of these doctrines seem rather to be expressly contradicted by facts which, if of recent discovery, are unquestionable. Accordingly, apparent fact and reason are on one side, and truth on the other. This is the calamity. Hence it is that unbelief spreads. And while that lamentable discrepancy continues, unbelief will go on spreading.

Our want in this emergency is a new philosophy which shall enable us to prevent the old and everlasting religion to ourselves first, and then to others, as in harmony with all reason and all fact. At this point it is that we who still uphold the Orthodox Christian faith have made our great mistake. We have decried reason as carnal, when we should have been seeking its aid. We have impotently questioned the facts of science, when we should have been building a philosophical stairway from them to the heights of revealed truth. Perhaps it would be better, certainly it would seem to be safer, if men were not inclined to reason about religion, or if they would unanimously forbear to compare its sacred truth with facts ascertained by science, by Biblical and historical criticism, or by the restless investigation of our age in whatever province. Let me honestly confess, though I excite your derision by doing so, that I myself cannot help looking back with a certain envy to times when men went quite unscientifically to heaven, innocent alike of our knowledge and our doubts. They knew little, but they knew the way to the blest abodes. We who have learned so much of which they were ignorant, and in learning it have lost the way,—are we happier? Have we really gained? It is a vain question I am aware; and perhaps Providence is accused by the regret which asks it. At any rate the past is past, and its mental states irrecoverable. Men will think and study, and will apply their thought and study to religion, as to all else. That is the existing fact, which it is vain to wish away. And it is a fact which we Orthodox—I own it—are not prepared to encounter. It has been our fearful blunder to make "freethinking" a term of reproach. We have looked coldly upon philosophy, and jealously upon science. Devoted not more to our religion than to the explanation of it made in other times, we have spent our labor in defending the indefensible and resisting the irresistible. The consequence is that on the one hand the rationalizing tendency (of which "Evolutionism" is a cheap representative) is completely in the ascendant, while on the other hand our divine religion seems irrational.

Make the most of the confession you will, there it is! I have long made it to myself; I now make it to you, and put the burden of it off my heart. The fact is,—and I will no longer be a party to its concealment,—that while our religion rests upon immovable foundations, not one of its leading doctrines consists apparently with what men spontaneously think, or with a great body of facts which are becoming known to all. Now it is easy to cast ridicule upon an enlightened dunce like "Evolutionism," of whom it might seem easy to believe that he is descended from a line of well-disposed monkeys! What would it avail, however? It is not by thinking him a concealed simpleton that souls are to be saved from death. The world is to be saved, now as of old, through faith in the divine Redeemer. From that faith, in which alone is healing, many have wandered; and how are they to be brought back? How, unless we can convince them that our religion is rational; that is, consistent with all the facts, moral, historical, and physical, of whose reality none can doubt? But the sad truth is that at present we do not and cannot present it in that light. So far infidelity, absurd as it is, has us at a helpless disadvantage. Its positive doctrine—if it has any—is sorry stuff; its strength lies only in the weakness of the Orthodox position: but in this it finds strength enough, and too much.

Let me give an example. Death is in the world, with rage and cruelty and horror. Countless creatures live only by inflicting pain upon others. Murder, that man punishes, is for them the appointed means of existence. Hunger goads them on, and they perish if they do not kill. All over the earth it goes on,—in the sea, on the land, in the air; every moment the crack of crunched bones, the spurt of hot blood, the quivering of torn flesh. I shudder to think how many creatures are expiring in agony while I write this line. A strange world, with so much that is lovely in it, and so much also that is hateful and horrible! And when we add that millions of our own kind, after the storms of this life, are to find rest only in everlasting perdition, the mystery becomes awful indeed! For nevertheless this world was made, and is momentarily ruled and ordered, by an Omnipotent Goodness, and not a sparrow falls to the ground without his notice. Almighty Goodness is in the teeth of the shark, the fang of the cobra, and the changeless woe of so many immortal souls. I say it and believe it: but how can I do it? Oh, for a clearer light! Could one but see through this terrible mystery! Now, the time was that Christian men thought they could and did see through it very clearly. Sin had brought death into the world; all was explained by Adam's transgression. To be sure, there were those who could not well understand why the whole human race should suffer because one man had done wrong. We were able, however, to dispose of their objections, perhaps by the aid of a little casuistry. It was not so clear how the brute creation could justly be made to suffer for the sin of man. The lamb that the wolf rends,—has it also a share in the transgression of Adam? We called it a mystery, and got comfortably past the matter. But now comes science, with its prying eye, and shows that death was in the world myriads of ages before man existed. And now what have we to say? The good President Hitchcock suggested that in this case, for a wonder, the consequence came first, and the antecedent followed! Adam was going to sin when he should get into existence some millions of years later, and the scheme of Nature was ordered in anticipation of the fault he would commit! It was a tempting suggestion, considering the strait we were in; and I confess that I once made use of it myself, in order to quell an obstreperous infidel, whose yawn became too annoying. But I was soon ashamed of the act, and confess it with shame now. It is strange that the brute world should suffer as an after consequence of Adam's fault; but that it should thus suffer as a preceding consequence is utterly confounding. Yet there is the fact. It is so; therefore is so by Divine appointment. And that endless perdition of souls, to which all the utmost darkness of Nature is as the brightness of noonday,—this, too, was contemplated from the beginning. The loving kindness of a beneficent Creator is in it all; and no less in what is most dreadful than in that which most pleases and attracts: no less in the agonies of the torn lamb than in its innocent gambols an hour before; and no less in the everlasting death of one than in the life everlasting of another. Such is the truth; but how can it be the truth? How can we present it as reasonable to a world that must believe it or perish? I, for one, cannot so present it to myself. My mind revolts against it; and the more I think about it, the more I am troubled. I almost fear that should I think of it too much I would be forced into infidelity, blind and foolish and—I would spare you the word if I could do so honestly—wicked as infidelity seems to me. Therefore I say the great desideratum now is a new philosophy, which shall show us that what seems reasonable is precisely that which is not so, and that what seems wholly unreasonable is in fact true reason.

It were easy to multiply examples; for from the doctrine of infallible inspiration, with which revealed religion necessarily begins, to the last article of the creed, the case is much the same: we know that the doctrine is substantially true, if perhaps faulty in form; and we know also that it is at present irreconcilable with reason, with morals, or with facts observed. Under these circumstances, I am indisposed to fall upon evolutionists, or upon any class of decent unbelievers, and to treat them with either railing or railing. Their position is easily accounted for. They are constitutionally incapable of believing that which seems plainly contradictory to reason and evidence. The doctrines of revealed religion do seem thus to them, and, as I freely confess, must seem thus under present conditions. They strike off, and endeavor to frame a religion for themselves. The notions in which they take refuge are indeed always groundless and often ridiculous; but it is in the nature of man to escape if possible from an old pain, even though it be but exchanged for a new and worse one. These aimless and fruitless excursions—alternating with an abandonment of the search and a disgust at all religion—will, I am persuaded, continue and increase until the Church shall be qualified to present its doctrine in a different aspect. And for this purpose a quite new philosophy is imperatively demanded.

What this philosophy should be I am ill prepared to say. In the attempt to anticipate its features, I might make an even more ludicrous figure than "Evolutionism" exhibits, when he undertakes to describe the worship that is to be. But two points must be established by it: first, that the highest real evidence consists in the want of apparent evidence; secondly, that divine truth is best confirmed by that which seems and ever must seem, to contradict it.

This may sound paradoxical; perhaps it is so, as thus stated. But take a case. There is no evidence that the books of the Bible were written by men infallibly inspired, or inspired at all. They are mostly anonymous, and the unknown writers did not even profess themselves inspired, or intimate that they wrote under unusual conditions. Even as human compositions, few of them claim a distinguished place in the world's literature, while not a few bear more than the customary marks of human limitation, ignorance, and error. But consider, on the other hand, the power of the Bible in history. How do you account for this effect? I say that the want of reason to think it an inspired book itself constitutes the reason (in a higher sense) for believing that God is in it and working through it to produce conviction of divine truth.

Again, the doctrine of vicarious atonement is absurd, you will say. I agree with you. It is indeed absurd; a rational vindication of it, if it is looked at directly, and considered simply in itself, is impossible. Nevertheless, all the incomparable power of Christianity has been connected with it and inseparable from it. Who would for a moment put the effect of Aristotle's philosophy, vast as was the compass of the Stagyrte's understanding, on a par with that which has been wrought by this absurdity? Therefore, I say, the more contradictory to reason it is, the more reason in a higher sense to believe that God's truth is in it.

Now, I am incapable of expanding these suggestions into a systematic philosophy, for I am only an humble preacher of the Word, not a philosopher. But I have glimmerings of such a system. It must begin with a new logic, which shall enable us, somewhat in the manner just exemplified, to draw conclusion by way of opposition, or a partial opposition, to the premises. Conclusion by repulsion from the premise, I call it. And though the gospel will remain forever true, yet I do not see how men—that is, the more cultivated and thinking part of them—are to be convinced of its truth, unless this method of reasoning by way of repulsion from apparent facts and reasons shall be philosophically established. Till this is done, how are we who preach to speak the word with the eloquence of a perfect simplicity? At present, even while I am speaking what I know must be true, and the only saving truth, some little Satan squeaks out of a corner of my mind, "Between ourselves you are lying, you know." Must it always be the exclusive privilege of ignorant and thick-headed Christians, like Brother Moody, to speak evangelical truth with that unforced assurance of belief which makes belief in the hearer?

Why will not you radicals cease assailing Christianity; and, instead of wasting, and worse than wasting, your power in that mad way, aid us in devising and developing that philosophy, with its logic of contradiction or repulsion, which shall present the Orthodox Christian faith as utterly reasonable? You are somewhat fond, I suspect, of new things: here is a field for you. This philosophy will have the charm of novelty far beyond the guesses, already somewhat hackneyed, of Darwin and Huxley. I am asking aid of the enemy, I know; but the need is so great, and the sluggishness on our side so extreme, that at the risk of betraying weakness to one who will but exult over it, I am constrained to invite your assistance.

SOCIALISM AND MARRIAGE.

An entertaining writer in the Parisian Revue des Deux Mondes, treating of German socialism, touches upon one phase of it which is worth considering,—the relation of its brilliant apostle, Ferdinand Lassalle, with women. This man, who was a scholar and a politician, seems to have been as great a libertine as Aaron Burr or Lord Byron. The French writer calls him "the profound commentator on Heraclitus and the paramour of the Countess Hatzfeldt," and adds that he boasted "he had never met a woman capable of resisting him." Now laxity of morals is, unfortunately, not confined to men of dangerous political opinions; but there does seem to be a natural and close connection between the doctrines of communism and the practice of free love. The Anabaptists of Germany in Luther's time were examples of this; the disciples of Fourier were shipwrecked on this rock; and many of the American communists have set their faces in the same direction. Even those who, like the Shakers, preserve themselves pure from vice do so at the cost of renouncing marriage altogether.

In fact, there is hardly an argument in favor of a compulsory community of goods which does not hold equally true in favor of a community of women. What right has a monopolist to claim for himself the exclusive control of his wife? What claim has any woman to the sole companionship of her husband? Are not the gifts of Nature free, and can anything be more the gift of Nature than companionship between the sexes? This is the way the rascals argue, when they have convinced you that land and water, capital and labor, and all that they have produced, should be used as a common fund for the whole human race,—to be distributed according to laws and votes, and not by the toil and frugality of individuals. And it is by appealing to the passions, as well as to the necessities and sympathies of mankind, that the communists make converts to their doctrine.

An old and injurious proverb declares that two out of every three physicians are atheists. The proportion of sexual libertines among outright communists is probably quite as great as this. And this is one reason why these men never can become a majority, or even a respectable minority, of any people among the Teutonic races. The family tradition and the family instinct are too strong among men, and still more among women, to permit such opinions to prevail. Even among the Mormons, where the powerful aid of religion has been called in to support a modified form of communism and a system of polygamy, the whole political and social structure is now giving way under the natural influences of Anglo-Saxon traditions and habits of thought. But it is well to remember that the philanthropic outside of the socialist system of government often conceals the iniquities of free love, as well as the nonsense of agrarianism.—Springfield Republican.

EVERY ONE is as God made him,—and oftentimes a great deal worse.—Don Quixote.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:

To THE INDEX Assn., Toledo, O., Sept. 20, 1878.

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEPHENS.
 Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address publish

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Cheney, and extracts from Addresses by Ralph Waldo Emerson, Lucretia Mott, Robert Dale Owen, Dr. Bartol, Wendell Phillips, Rabbi Wise, Horace Seaver, A. B. Alcott, Lucy Stone, Charles H. Malcom, Julia Ward Howe, and others,—all given on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Price (reduced) $1.50.

"One purpose of this volume is to give an answer to the question, What is the meaning of the Free Religious Association?"

Proceedings of Fifth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by J. W. Chadwick on "Liberty and the Church in America," by O. D. B. Mills on "Religion as the Expression of a Permanent Sentiment of the Human Mind," and by O. B. Frothingham on "The Religion of Humanity," with addresses by Rowland Connor, Celia Burleigh, Lucretia Mott, A. B. Alcott, C. A. Bartol, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loe, and others.

Proceedings of Sixth Annual Meeting, 1873. Contains essays by Samuel Johnson on "Freedom in Religion," and by John Weiss on "Religion in Freedom," with addresses by Wm. C. Gannett, Robert Dale Owen, T. W. Higginson, Samuel Longfellow, J. B. Thomson, F. E. Abbot, and Lucretia Mott.

Proceedings of Seventh Annual Meeting, 1874. Contains verbatim reports of President Frothingham's address on "The Validity of the Free Religious Platform," of Dr. Bartol's essay on "The Religious Signs of the Times," of Rabbi Bonneschein's speech on "Reformed Judaism," and of the statements by Messrs. Oathrop, Abbot, and Higginson of their respective attitudes towards Christianity,—as "Christian," "Anti-Christian," and "Extra-Christian,"—together with the Secretary's Annual Report, and letters from Keeshub Chunder Sen, Frederick Douglass, and D. A. Wasson.

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wilson and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fifth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—
 To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;
 To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 30 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

THE SECULAR REVIEW.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

THE SECULAR REVIEW is the leading organ of Secularism, and each week has Special Articles on Theological, Social, Scientific, and Political Subjects. Its distinctive features are the advocacy of Constructive Secularism, and the dissemination of useful information on all questions which affect the welfare of the people. Letters are inserted in its "OPEN COLUMN" from all who are courteous in the expression of their views; while a special department is allotted for "NOTES AND QUERIES."

The Contributors to the SECULAR REVIEW comprise the principal advocates of Secularism, including its founder, G. J. Holyoake.

TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine, from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact facsimile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is from England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on New Issues with a promptitude unequalled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers. The following are a few of the contributors:—

Matthew Arnold, Herbert Spencer, Goldwin Smith, Right Hon. Lyon Playfair, Right Hon. W. N. Gladstone, Lionel A. Tollenmach, H. B. Grant Duff, M.P., Hon. Robert Lowe, Leslie Stephen, John Morley (the Editor), G. H. Lewes, Alfred R. Wallace, Frederick Harrison, Prof. Tyndall, Prof. Huxley, Prof. Darwin, Prof. Clifford, Author of Supernatural Religion, Sir John Lubbock, Anthony Trollope, T. Adolphus Trollope, Sir H. S. Maine, Sir David Wedderburn,

AND NUMEROUS OTHERS.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION REPORTS.

Attention is specially called to a change in the advertisement of the publications of the Free Religious Association. By a recent vote of the Executive Committee the Annual Reports of the Association, from the year 1872 to the year 1877 inclusive, are now offered at five cents each (and at the same rate for any larger number) to any body who will take the trouble to send for them, enclosing five cents in postage stamps. They will also be sold at the office for the same sum to any one calling for them there.

The Committee have put the pamphlets at this low rate, which hardly more than covers the cost of sending them by mail, with the hope that they may thereby be more extensively circulated. By referring to the advertisement describing their contents, it will be seen that they contain much matter of special interest on the most vital religious problems of the age. It is not too much to say that some of the most valuable contributions of the last five years to religious discussion may be found in these pamphlets. Let any one who wants to know what the Free Religious Association means, send for these Reports. And will not the members and friends of this Association take this opportunity to extend the knowledge of its principles?

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD. GREAT THROUGH LINE AND UNITED STATES MAIL ROUTE.

The attention of the travelling public is respectfully invited to some of the merits of this great highway, in the confident assertion and belief that no other line can offer equal inducements as a route of through travel. In CONSTRUCTION AND EQUIPMENT THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD stands confessedly at the head of American railways. The track is double the entire length of the line, of steel rails laid on heavy oak ties, which are embedded in a foundation of rock ballast eighteen inches in depth. All bridges are of iron or stone, and built upon the most approved plans. Its passenger cars, while eminently safe and substantial, are at the same time models of comfort and elegance.

THE SAFETY APPLIANCES in use on this line well illustrate the far-seeing and liberal policy of its management, in accordance with which the utility only of an improvement and not its cost has been the question of consideration. Among many may be noticed

The Block System of Safety Signals, Janney Coupler, Buffer, and Platform, The Wharton Patent Switch, and the Westinghouse Air-Brake, forming in conjunction with a perfect double track and road-bed a combination of safeguards against accidents which have rendered them practically impossible.

Pullman Palace Cars are run on all Express Trains from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, to Chicago, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, and St. Louis.

WITHOUT CHANGE, and to all the principal points in the far West and South with but one change of cars. Connections are made in Union Depots, and are assured to all important points. The scenery of the Pennsylvania Route is admitted to be unsurpassed in the world for grandeur, beauty, and variety. Superior refreshment facilities are provided. Employees are courteous and attentive, and it is an inevitable result that a trip by the Pennsylvania Railroad must form

A Pleasing and Memorable Experience. Tickets for sale at the lowest rates at the Ticket Offices of the Company in all important cities and towns.

231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an Annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a Life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and Life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

ORGANIZE! CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

PLATFORM

For the Presidential Election of 1880,

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

GLIMPSES.

THE ALBANY Argus shows that there are $2,570,000 of untaxed church property in that city.

THE Independent defends its doctrine that Comstock has a right to lie and cheat in order to entrap the "rats" he pursues, but admits that it is "strong meat, which is good for men if not for babes." Aye, it is indeed strong meat—so strong that "its offence is rank, and smells to heaven." The Independent furnishes another instance of the corrupting influence of Christianity on natural morality. If the Independent is right, so are the Jesuits in declaring that "the end justifies the means." Generalize your argument, good Independent, and it comes down to that. Can you deny it?

THIS ARGUMENT for the redemption of greenbacks, published in the Tribune, only makes a good cause ridiculous: "Sir,—Some of the greenback men say they do not want the greenbacks redeemed. To compare small things with great, what would the human race be without a Redeemer? God in vindication of the justice of his holy law, was compelled to sacrifice his only Son, in order to redeem man; and can man stamp any amount on a piece of paper and make it worth that amount, without anything of intrinsic value to redeem it? What God could not do with justice, man cannot do with justice."

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, in his annual address before the National Secular Society of London, said: "One hundred and ten years ago, John Wilkes destroyed general warrants; in 1878, Mrs. Besant and myself have destroyed general indictments. No person can in future be put in peril of criminal trial for spoken or written words unless those words be clearly and distinctly stated. This is, at least, one solid advantage gained out of all that wearying litigation. Another thing we have shown is that the highest Courts of Judicature in our land will listen patiently while unpopular defendants plead even against the highest legal talent. The trial is remarkable in this country as the first effort of a woman's successful pleading in banco, and the first instance of uninterrupted speech by a woman à nisi prius, defending her own case."

THE Advertiser gives a good argument in the form of a good joke: "A correspondent of the Portland Argus, a Democrat who does not intend to be sold out to the greenbackers, tells of an answer he gave the other day to a soft-money man who had declared that no paper currency ever was redeemable in gold and silver. Said this greenhorn: 'You start a bank and issue $100,000 in bills and keep on hand only $10,000 in coin to redeem your bills; how can you call that redemption?' To which the sensible Democrat replied that 'there are over forty thousand people in Portland, all of whom will need coffins some time; but we have no need of forty thousand coffins constantly on hand.' The retort was one of the best that has been made in the long and weary discussion with persons who set all experience at defiance in their arguments for paper money."

THIS is the kind of "morality" for which the churches display the most concern: "Something in the form of an ecclesiastical judgment seems to have been rendered in Dover, Del., by Chancellor Saulebury, of the Court of Chancery. The case under consideration was one in which J. B. Quigg, a stockholder in the Rehoboth Beach Camp-meeting Association, sought for a writ of injunction to restrain the proprietor of the Bright House, at that place, from permitting dancing, card-playing, and other amusements to take place in the house, on the ground that such things were contrary to morality as taught by the discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and therefore in violation of the charter of the place. In the course of argument the chancellor gave emphatic expression to the opinion that dancing was in violation of the morality of the Methodist Episcopal Church. When counsel ventured to dissent from this idea, the chancellor reiterated it, adding that there was no doubt in his mind that the practice of dancing was prohibited by the discipline of the Methodist Church, and that arguments on this point would be useless."

CANON FARRAR, in Social Notes (London), speaks of the need of arousing attention in the student, and relates some amusing anecdotes of mistakes that pupils have made for want of it. "When a boy," he declares, "said that algebra was a sort of wild donkey all over stripes, it did not show that the boy was stupid or ignorant, but only that nobody had ever told him what algebra was." When he was a teacher at Harrow and Marlborough, Canon Farrar says he used often in joke to tell his pupils that no answer, however ignorant, could possibly amaze him, because "they had ossified the power of astonishment." He further relates that "one of the most powerful and lucid lecturers who ever lived told me that on one occasion he had been delivering a lecture upon 'the brain,' which seemed to him to be as clear as human words could make it; but at the end of the lecture a lady came smiling up to him, complimenting him on the interest and value of his lecture; 'but,' she said, 'Professor Huxley, I never knew before that we had some of our brains outside our skulls!' I have heard that at one of the universities, a student being asked to describe the chief source of revenue in the Shetland Isles, remarked that the inhabitants 'acquired a precarious subsistence by washing one another's clothes,' without its ever having occurred to him how very precarious a revenue obtained from washing one another's clothes would be!"

HERE is an instance of the perverse and disingenuous trickery by which Orthodoxy habitually seeks to get the authority of every great name in favor of its own superstition. We quote from the Sunday School Times of August 24: "Ralph Waldo Emerson has never been suspected of narrowness or bigotry in his religious convictions; but he is too close an observer and too strong a thinker and too honest a man not to recognize and to rejoice in the fact of an over-ruling Providence shaping and directing the affairs of life,—the life of nations and the life of individuals. In his last published lecture, 'Fortune of the Republic,' he expresses his rest in this conviction with an explicitness which would do credit to a class-room in Princeton Theological Seminary. 'Our helm,' he says, 'is given up to a better guidance than our own; the course of events is quite too strong for any helmsman, and our little wherry is taken in tow by the ship of the great Admiral [the Captain of our salvation, as the Bible phrases it], which knows the way, and has the force to draw men and States and planets to their good. Such and so potent is this method by which the divine providence sends the chiefest benefits under the mask of calamities, that I do not think we shall by any perverse ingenuity prevent the blessing.' This is a hyper-Calvinistic statement of the truth; an assertion of what was called in 'Old School' parlance 'irresistible grace'; but the broadest Arminian would admit that it is a doctrine vastly preferable to bald materialism or to blind fatalism. Emerson also may now be ranked 'among the prophets.' Observe the sly interpretation of Mr. Emerson's phrase, 'the great Admiral,' slipped in between brackets, as if Mr. Emerson meant to allude to Jesus Christ; whereas the Times knows perfectly well that he meant no such thing. Nothing is implied in Mr. Emerson's phrase except the pantheistic or semi-pantheistic optimism which has characterized his thought from the beginning; but the great swindle of claiming him as a devout believer in the 'Captain of our salvation' has already begun to be executed, and Mr. Emerson can hardly expect to fare better than Abraham Lincoln, Charles Sumner, Gerrit Smith, or a host of others equally belied in this respect."

Victor Hugo's Oration on Voltaire.

TRANSLATED BY CHARLES ELLERSHAW.

It is an hundred years to-day that a man died. He died immortal. He went charged with years, charged with labors, charged with responsibilities the most illustrious and the most redoubtable,—the responsibility of the human conscience informed and rectified. He is gone cursed and blessed,—cursed by the past, blessed by the future: and these, messieurs, are the two superb forms of glory. He had beside his death-bed on the one side the acclamations of contemporaries and posterity; on the other that triumph of hissing and of hate wherewith the implacable past assails those who combat it. He was more than a man; he was an age. He had exercised a function and fulfilled a mission. He had evidently been elected for the work which he had made, by the Supreme Will which is manifested as visibly in the laws of destiny as in the laws of Nature. The eighty-four years which this man lived occupied the interval which separates the monarchy at its apogee from the Revolution in its dawning. When he was born, Louis XIV. yet reigned; when he died, Louis XVI. was already reigning. Thus his cradle saw the last rays of the grand throne, and his coffin felt the first heavings of the grand abyss.

Before proceeding further, let us reflect, messieurs, on this word abyss. There are good abysses; these are the abysses where evil is engulfed.

Messieurs, since I have interrupted myself, suffer me to complete my thought. No word imprudent or mischievous shall be uttered here. We are here to perform an act of civilization. We are here to make affirmation of progress; to display to the philosophers the good fruits of philosophy; to bring to the eighteenth century the witness of the nineteenth; to honor the generous combatants and the good servants; to felicitate the noble effort of peoples,—industry, science, the brave march forward, the work; to cement human concord; in a word, to glorify peace, that sublime universal will. Peace is civilization's virtue. War is for it the crime. We are here, in this great moment, in this solemn hour, to bow religiously before the moral law, and to tell the world which is listening to France, There is but one power,—conscience serving justice; and only one glory,—genius serving truth.

That said, I continue.
Before the Revolution, messieurs, the structure of society was this:—

The people at the bottom.
Above the people, religion represented by the clergy.
At the side of religion, justice represented by the magistracy.

And at that moment in human society, what was the people? It was ignorance. What was religion? It was intolerance. And what was justice? It was injustice.

Do my words go too far? Judge of it.
[The orator records the harsh acts of justice against faith to denounce which Voltaire had so eloquently raised his voice. The writer whose centenary they celebrated had always taken on him the defence of the oppressed, and denounced the excessive rigor of the criminal laws which promulgated cruelties as atrocious as useless. M. Victor Hugo adds:]

In presence of that society, frivolous and lugubrious, Voltaire, alone having under his eyes all these forces assembled,—the court, the nobility, finance; that unconscious power, the blind people; that dreadful magistracy, so docile to the master, so hard upon the subjects, crushing and flattering, on its knees upon the people before the king; that sinister clergy compounded of hypocrisy and fanaticism,—Voltaire alone, I repeat it, declared war on this coalition of all the social iniquities—to that world enormous and terrible; and he accepted the battle. And what was his weapon? That which is light as the wind and powerful as thunder—a pen.

With this arm he fought; with it he conquered.
Messieurs, let us salute this recollection.

Voltaire has conquered. Voltaire has made the war of illumination, the war of one against all; that is to say the grand war,—the war of thought against material power; the war of reason against prejudice; the war of justice against injustice; the war for the oppressed against the oppressor; the war for beneficence; the war for sweetness. He had the tenderness of a woman and the furor of an hero. He had a great spirit and an immense heart.

He has conquered the old code and the old dogma. He has conquered the feudal seignor, the Gothic judge, the Roman priest. He has raised the populace to the dignity of a people. He has taught, pacified, and civilized. He has accepted every menace, every outrage, every persecution, calumny, exile. He has been indefatigable and irresistible. He has conquered violence by the smile, despotism by sarcasm, infallibility by irony, obstinacy by perseverance, ignorance by truth.

I came to pronounce that word,—the smile. I stop myself. The smile,—that is Voltaire.

Let us say it, messieurs,—for forbearance is the great side of the philosopher,—in Voltaire the suavity ends always by being reestablished. However just may be his anger it passes, and Voltaire irritated always gives place to Voltaire cool. Then in that deep eye the smile appears.

This smile,—it is wisdom. This smile, I repeat it,—it is Voltaire. The smile sometimes becomes a laugh, but the philosophic sadness tempers it. For the side of strength it is mockery; for the side of weakness it is gentleness. It disquiets the oppressor and reassures the oppressed. Ah! be touched by this smile. It has had in it the brightness of the morning. It has illuminated truth, justice, goodness, and whatever is honest in the useful; it has lighted up the interior of superstitions,—those shades are good to see; it has changed them. Being light, it has been fertile. The new society,—the desire of equality and of concession,—and that beginning of fraternity which calls itself tolerance, good-will reciprocated, the placing in proportion of men and of rights, reason recognizing supreme law, the effacement of obstructive prejudice, the serenity of souls, the spirit of indulgence and of pardon, harmony, peace,—behold what has come of this great smile!

The day is undoubtedly approaching when will be recognized the identity of wisdom and of clemency; the day when the amnesty will be proclaimed. I affirm it, up yonder in the stars, Voltaire will smile.

Messieurs, there is between two servants of humanity, who have appeared at an interval of eighteen hundred years, a mysterious sympathy, a mysterious connection.

To combat pharisaism; to unmask imposture; to denounce tyrannies, usurpations, prejudices, lies, superstitions; to demolish the temple in order to rebuild it,—that is to say, to replace the false by the true; to attack the ferocious magistrature; to attack the sanguinary priesthood; to take a whip and chase the sellers from the sanctuary; to reclaim the heritage of the disinherited; to protect the feeble, the poor, the suffering, the exhausted; to fight for the persecuted and oppressed,—this is the war of Jesus Christ; and what man has fought this war? It is Voltaire.

The gospel work has for complement the work of philosophy; the spirit of mildness has commenced, the spirit of tolerance has continued. Let us say it with a sentiment of profound respect,—Jesus has wept, Voltaire has smiled. It is that divine tear and that human smile which make the sweetness of civilization actual.

Did Voltaire always smile? No; he often was indignant. You have seen it in our first words.

Certainly, messieurs, measure, reserve, proportion, that is the supreme law of reason. We may even say that moderation is the very respiration of philosophy. The effort of the wise man should be to condense into a kind, placid certitude all the little doubts of which philosophy is composed. Yet at certain moments the enthusiasm of truth arises strong and violent; and it is its right, like the great winds which purify. Never, I insist on it, will the wise man disturb those two majestic pillars for the support of social labor,—justice and hope; and all will respect the judge if he incarnates justice, and all will reverence the priest if he represents hope. But if the magistrature is called the torture, if the Church is called the Inquisition, then humanity will look them in the face, and say to the judge, "I will none of thy law!" and say to the priest, "I will none of thy dogma! I will none of thy prison on earth nor of thy hell in heaven!" Then the philosopher arises angered, and denounces the judge to justice, and denounces the priest to God.

This is what Voltaire has done. He is grand. What Voltaire has been, I have said. What his century was, I come to tell.

Messieurs, the great men rarely are alone. The great trees seem greater when they dominate a forest; they are there at home. There is a forest of spirits round Voltaire; this forest is the eighteenth century. Amidst these spirits there are summits,—Montesquieu, Buffon, Beaumarchais; and two others, after Voltaire the highest,—Rousseau and Diderot. These thinkers have taught men how to reason. To reason well leads to doing well; justice in the spirit becomes justice in the heart. These workmen of progress have labored usefully. Buffon has founded naturalism; Beaumarchais has discovered, beyond Molière, an unknown comedy, almost the social comedy; Montesquieu has made so deep researches in the law as to succeed in bringing up the right. As for Rousseau, as for Diderot, let us speak of these two names apart. Diderot—vast, inquiring intellect, tender heart, thirsty for justice—wished to furnish certain notions for the basis of true ideas, and has created the Encyclopædia. Rousseau has rendered woman an admirable service; has completed the mother by the wet nurse; has put the one near to the other,—those two majesties of the cradle. Rousseau—writer eloquent and pathetic, orator reflective and profound—has often divined and declared political truth: his ideal contains the real. The civic fibre vibrates in Rousseau; that which vibrates in Voltaire is the fibre universal. One can only say that in this prolific eighteenth century Rousseau represents the people; Voltaire, vaster still, represents man.

These cogent writers have disappeared; but they have left to us their soul,—the Revolution.

Yes, the French Revolution is their soul. She is their shining emanation. She comes from them. We discover them everywhere in this beneficent and superb catastrophe which has made the closing of the past and the opening of the future. In that transparency which is proper to revolutions, and which through the senses leaves the effects apparent, and through the first plan the second,—in that transparency we see behind Diderot Danton, behind Rousseau Robespierre, and behind Voltaire Mirabeau. These have created these.

Messieurs, to recall epochs in the names of men, to name the centuries by the kind of human persons produced in each,—this has been given to three peoples only: Greece, Italy, France. We say the age of Pericles, the age of Augustus, the age of Leo X., the age of Louis XIV., the age of Voltaire. These appellations have a grand meaning. This privilege—to give names to eras, exclusively proper to Greece, Italy, and France—is the highest mark of civilization. Until Voltaire, there are the names of chiefs of States: Voltaire is more than a chief of a State; he is a chief of ideas. With Voltaire a new cycle commences. People feel that hereafter the highest ruling power of the human race will be thought. Civilization obeyed force; it will obey the ideal. It is the breaking of the sceptre and the sword to replace them by the ray of light; that is to say, authority transfigured into liberty. No other sovereign for the people but the law, and conscience for the individual. For each of us these two aspects of progress clearly disengage themselves: to exercise one's right, that is to say, to be a man; to accomplish one's duty, that is to say, to be a citizen.

Such is the signification of this word, the age of Voltaire; such is the meaning of this supreme event, the French Revolution.

The two memorable centuries which preceded the eighteenth prepared it. Rabelais warned royalty in Gargantua, and Molière warned the Church in Tartuffe. The hatred of force and the respect for right are visible in these two illustrious spirits.

Whoever says to-day "Force is before right," does an act proper to the Middle Age, and speaks to the men of three centuries ago.

Messieurs, the nineteenth century glorifies the eighteenth. The eighteenth proposes, the nineteenth achieves. And my last word will be the declaration, calm but inflexible, of progress.

The time is come. The right has found its formula,—the federation of humanity.

To-day force is called violence, and begins to be judged. Civilization, on the complaint of humanity, instructs the process, and prepares the great criminal indictment of conquerors and captains. This testimony is called history. The severe reality appears. The false lights are dissipating. In many cases the hero is found to be a variety of the assassin. Peoples come to understand that the magnitude of guilt is not its diminution; that if to kill is a crime, to kill much is not an extenuating circumstance; that if to steal is a shame, to invade cannot be a glory; that a Te Deum, after all, is no great thing; that homicide is homicide; that blood shed is blood shed; that it counts for nothing to be called Cæsar or Napoleon; and that in the eyes of the Eternal God it changes not the nature of a murderer whether we make him wear a felon's cap or set upon his head an emperor's crown.

Ah! proclaim we then these verities as absolute. Let us dishonor war. No, the bloody glory does not exist. No, it is not good, it is not useful, to make corpses. No, it cannot be that life works for death. No, O mothers who surround me! It must not be that war—that robber—shall continue to prey upon your children. No, it cannot be that woman brings forth in travail, that men are born, that peoples labor and produce, that the peasant tills the fields and workmen enrich the cities, that the thinkers meditate, that industry does marvels, that genius produces prodigies, that the vast human activity multiplies, in presence of the starry heavens, efforts and creations, only to end in that frightful international exposition which they call a field of battle.

The true field of battle,—see it! It is the exhibition of the best fruits of human labor which Paris offers to the world just now!

The true victory,—it is the victory of Paris!

Alas! we must not deceive ourselves. The actual hour, worthy as it is of admiration and respect, has yet dark sides; there are still clouds on the horizon; the tragedy of peoples is not finished. War, scoundrel war, is yet there, and it has the insolence to raise its head over this august feast of peace. The princes since two years persist fatally on the wrong side; their discord is an obstacle to our concord, and they are evilly inspired to condemn us because we make the contrast.

Let this contrast remind us of Voltaire. In presence of the most menacing eventualities, let us be more peaceful than ever. Turn we towards the great dead, towards the great living, towards the grand spirit. Incline we before the memorable sepulchres. Demand we counsel at that one whose life, useful to man, has been extinguished for an hundred years, but whose work is immortal. Demand we counsel from the other puissant thinkers, from the auxiliaries of this glorious Voltaire,—from Jean Jacque, from Diderot, from Montesquieu. Give we the word to these grand voices. Let us arrest the effusion of human blood. Enough! Enough! despots! Ah! the barbarity persists; well, let philosophy protest. The sword is unsheathed; let civilization be indignant. Let the eighteenth century come to the succor of the nineteenth. The philosophers, our predecessors, are the apostles of truth. Invoke we these illustrious phantoms! They proclaim the right of man to life, the right of conscience to liberty, the sovereignty of reason, the sanctity of labor, the beneficence of peace; and, since night comes from the thrones, let light come from the tombs!

[FOR THE INDEX.]

LIBERAL CONFERENCE AT SOUTH PLACE CHAPEL, LONDON.

REPORTED IN ABSTRACT BY L. E. WASHBURN.

"At the annual meeting of the members of South Place Chapel on Jan. 27, 1878, it was suggested that further use might be made of the Society and its organization by inviting to a General Conference all those liberal thinkers in the country who could unite for unsectarian work, and assist in the promotion of truth wherever it might be found."

Acting upon this suggestion and in accordance with a resolution offered to the same effect, a circular of invitation was issued in the month of April, soliciting the attendance of those who were in sympathy with the movement at a General Conference to be held on June 13 and 14, from 12 o'clock to 5 P.M. each day, for the "discussion of matters pertaining to the religious needs of our time and the methods of meeting them." From the report of the Conference we learn that about four hundred persons attended the sessions, representatives from different parts of the kingdom being present.

Mr. M. D. Conway, in behalf of the Committee of the South Place Society, welcomed the attendants, and announced Dr. George J. Wyld as chairman of the meeting. Dr. Wyld, upon taking the chair, spoke as follows:—

He felt that the great want among liberal religionists at the present time was unity and visible combination. Liberals had been "playing for their own bat" and "beating their own drum" long enough. It was time that this state of disintegration should end, and that the various bodies of freethinkers and individual freethinkers should be brought more within hailing distance of each other. He thought it trite to remark upon the benefits of combination, declaring that everything at the present day showed that co-operation and organization were the secrets of success. He deprecated the grounds for discouragement of growth and development of free thought, and said if free religion is ever to do any permanent good in the world it must attract and hold the younger generation. He thought if we did not increase our force before the next generation, that a reaction might set in,—all those under the influence of mutual fright being ready to combine for the purpose of crushing the rational thinker; and these would include not only the lovers of traditional faiths and those who tremble for the security of rank and property, but all those who are for quiet at any price. He dealt some severe blows at the make-shift liberalism of some Orthodox preachers, and warned the people not to be deceived by such attempts to "take the wind out of the genuine free-thinkers' sails." The common notion among liberal thinkers that there is no ground for combination among those who have no specified system of doctrine he denied; and affirmed that science afforded through its revelations the workings of a system, and an irreversible law, grander and more to be revered than the popular supernaturalism. There was room within the faith which was founded on science for a very high and real religion. He showed the evils of the priestly religion, claiming that it only served to stop the progress of sound education and to fill the world with bugbears. In concluding his wise and interesting remarks, he urged the importance of uniting the forces of liberal religion, and declared it to be the duty of every enlightened man to aid, as far as he can, those organizations which aim at counteracting the influence of the ecclesiastical systems.

At the conclusion of the address, Mr. Conway read several letters from distinguished persons who could not attend the Conference, but who sympathized with its object. Notably among these were Dr. James Martineau, Matthew Arnold, the Duke of Somerset, Lord Houghton, Prof. Max Müller, and "the veteran general of liberal thought, Thomas Scott." Rev. C. Voysey then read a paper on "Religious Needs," of which we make the following abstract:—

The religious needs of our time are extremely various. They are divided into the intellectual, the emotional, and the æsthetic. The intellectual needs of religion at one time hardly existed. Men and women were content with faith and worship, without any demand on the part of their reason for a share in the control of religious thought. This is now changed. To-day a rational foundation for their faith is demanded, and forms of worship that shall not do outrage to their convictions. Theology, to exist at all, must be based on science. Religion must be in harmony with known facts, or it will cease to occupy the hearts of people of common-sense. The growing demand is for a reasonable creed. For want of such a creed thousands are secretly atheistical, and tens of thousands are unsettled in their religious convictions. All the denominations of Christian believers maintain with obstinate pertinacity the old dogmas. The separation of Church and State will not answer our religious needs; it would put off the day of enlightenment further than ever. What is wanted is the disestablishment of the Creeds and Articles, and the repeal of the Act of Uniformity, so as to leave all clergymen free to speak their honest minds. The real need of the hour is to give freedom to those who have something reasonable to say about religion. The laity would heartily greet the endowment of the pulpit with absolute liberty. In brief, intellectual religion can only come by calm and perfectly independent thought. The chief religious need of our time is the getting hold of what is reasonable.

Discussion followed the reading of the essay, which was participated in by several persons. Mr. G. J. Holyoake said he cared nothing for unity of action. The old Orthodox questions are dead in men's minds,—dead as the cities of Zuyder Zee. It is impossible to have any discussion upon them. A conference which seeks to reconcile opinion is delusive. What we want is a congress which shall recognize opinion. He favored a union for work; a unity of action for moral objects. True union will not come by giving up opinion, but by forming an organization that shall recognize all who care for the truth, and who desire to act together for the common ends of humanity.

Mrs. Ernestine Rose said free discussion is like the air we breathe: if we have it not we die. Religion is a term too indefinite and misleading, and is calculated to divide the human family instead of uniting it. We ought to form a society for work, and give it a practical name. She suggested that the name "Friends of Progress" would more truly represent their organization than any title with the word religion in it. None would be excluded from the association, no matter what they believed. We want laws that stand upon rational knowledge.

Colonel T. W. Higginson spoke of his connection with the Free Religious Association in the United States; and then upon the subject under discussion. He said that if we are to have a place where people of different opinions can stand, and also a platform large enough for all to walk upon and do everything that ought to be done, we shall do what is demanded by the times. To accomplish our object we must limit our aims. He thought the objection to the word religion was not real. The freethinkers of the United States saved themselves by the use of that word. He thought the platform of the Association should have but few planks, and should be used for but few things. We can never get an organization out of radicals in which men must suppress themselves. The strength of radicals is their individuality, their enthusiasm, their ardor, their willingness for self-sacrifice. To have this preserved, you must drive a radical with a very loose rein, and leave him much untied. Radicals must exert their strength in their own way, and without being disturbed.

Mr. Conway "moved that a committee be appointed which could lay before the meeting something like a practical suggestion as to whether they think it possible or feasible that any kind of result may come, or an association be formed, from our deliberations." The motion was carried, and a committee appointed by the Conference.

Prof. Garrison, of Chicago, spoke at some length, criticising the common Orthodox beliefs, and showing the changes which have taken place in men's thoughts in regard to religious matters in the last century.

At the close of his speech the Congress adjourned for the day.

On Friday, June 14, Mr. Alexander J. Ellis, F. R. S., presided. He opened the session by reading a stirring essay in which he alluded to the injustice done to Mrs. Besant in taking from her care her child, and also to the work on Population recently published by this brave lady, and proved that the persecution which she had borne sprung from religious prejudice. He declared that all present in the meeting were liable to the same injustice from the same cause, and said that the only hope of escape was in enlightened education. He thought it a great triumph that Prof. Max Müller had spoken in defence of atheism in Westminster Abbey,—he defining atheism as "the denial of the gods that be, in obedience to nobler aspirations." He said we are not to be "merely insects in thought, passing a long apprenticeship of creeping caterpillar and sleeping grub before our wings of freedom grow"; nor are we "to use our wings like a painted butterfly." We must learn to do, to bear, to suffer. He defined liberal religion as "a profound sense of duty; that is, a profound sense of the relations of ourselves to every part of the universe which comes within our ken, together with an invincible determination consciously to act in harmony with these relations as far as we are able to perceive them." He concluded his remarks by expressing the hope that they would organize an association of liberal thinkers.

Mr. Conway then read several communications from sympathizers abroad. The following extract is from a letter from Mr. Fix, of Belgium:—

"Let us not confound belief and religion. A belief may be a faith particular to a people; religion includes the belief common to all men and all nations. A belief may kindle the faggots of inquisition; religion proclaims all men brothers. A belief leads to the triumph of an idea, of a man, or of a party; religion wishes only the triumph of truth. A belief raises a caste to rule over a country; religion requires free consciences and men equal by their rights. A belief tries to establish some kind of hierarchy over humanity; religion dreams only of the universal fraternity. A belief lasts only by egotism; religion means universal solidarity."

In a communication from M. Emile de Harven, of Antwerp, we find this truth: "In our days the struggle is no longer upon dogmatical grounds; it is only carried on between the torch of truth and the clerical extinguisher. It is circumscribed between thinkers, on the one hand, and on the other the clergy dragging in their train the crowd of simple and timid minds, with those who are, or think they are, interested in the maintenance of the sacerdotal power."

A debate upon the subjects which had been brought up followed. The first speaker, Mr. Johnston Russell, advocated national theism, and spoke with large sympathy for the inquiring doubts of the intelligent mind. He wanted some of the speakers on the previous day answered. He thought the lady who said she wanted a path to follow, something to do for humanity, voiced one of the greatest religious needs of the age. Some one ought to be wise enough to point out this path. Sects will neither lead nor follow. We need a new Reformation.

Mrs. Law spoke for practical work. We want a free platform where we can state our opinions and hear others. She believed that it was possible to found and form a union independent and separate from the belief of the Church.

The last speaker, Rev. J. D. Hirst Smyth, thought that the distinction between atheism and theism was a vanishing one. When a man says he is an atheist, he says it because something higher than himself binds him to say it; in that he represents all the elements of religion. He declared that the interests of one living man were greater than the interests of all existing churches, and said our work is to care for man, not for any church.

The afternoon session of the Conference was devoted to hearing the report of the Committee on Organization and the discussion of its articles.

Mr. Conway read the report of the Committee:—

I. This organization shall be called the Association of Liberal Thinkers.

Its objects shall be (1) the scientific study of religious phenomena; (2) the collection and diffusion of information concerning world-wide religious developments; (3) the emancipation of mankind from superstition; (4) fellowship among liberal thinkers of all races; (5) promotion of the pure and universal religion,—the culture, progress, and moral welfare of man.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and in no degree affect his relations with other associations.

Mr. Conway then delivered a characteristic address. We can give only a few of the many true and beautiful things he said. The great movements in the world have been the times of magnificent negation. The great eras of religion have not been when Constantine was building up, but when Jesus was pulling down. Along with emancipation must go fellowship. What we want is the true heart, the earnest religion,—the warm and hearty devotion to the right and true. That I call religion. He told of a negro in Liberia who wished to become religious. A sceptic said to him, "If you want to be a good man, you had better be a Mohammedan in this neighborhood; if you want to make money, be a Christian." Christianity has come to be a fashionable and wealthy thing. The name Christian is a phrase by which a person may deceive everybody as to what he really thinks.

Mr. Stuart-Glennie moved the adoption of the Committee's report, and gave intelligent reasons for so doing.

Colonel Higginson, a member of the Committee, next addressed the meeting on the report. He wished it might be adopted. He said there was probably not a body of people in all London of the same size so bristling with individuality as this meeting is. We cannot find anything to suit us all. We have drawn up a basis for this Association to go upon. It is not a creed. It is a basis for creedless people to come together upon.

A debate upon the separate clauses of the report resulted in making some slight alterations in its phraseology; but the platform, with these few changes, was finally voted upon by the Conference and unanimously adopted. The subject of the formal organization of the Association was then taken up, and a Committee consisting of twenty-two persons was appointed for that purpose.

A resolution of thanks to Mr. Conway and his congregation, and to the two gentlemen who conducted the meetings, was carried by loud acclamation. The Conference was then adjourned.

RELIGIOUS BELIEF OF THE SOUTHERN NEGROES.

RICHMOND, Va., Aug. 7, 1878.

The negroes of the Southern States, if not religious, are emphatically religious. The mystery of religion takes strong hold upon their excitable temperaments and vivid imaginations, and a species of religious insanity is common among them. During the recent revival in the colored churches, so general throughout the South, men and women went into trances, fell in the streets in convulsions, and in some instances were so wild in their frenzies that they were arrested and locked in the station-houses by the police. What they believe they believe, and argument does not easily shake that belief. Negro converts dream dreams and see visions, and are realists in the fullest sense of the word. For them the devil literally goes about "seeking whom he may devour," ready at any moment to pounce upon the heedless sinner and carry him off bodily to the bottomless pit. Angels go to and fro upon earthly errands, visible sometimes to the "eye of faith"—a power granted always to the true believer,—and the supernatural is one of the elements of their daily lives. Of ghosts—disembodied spirits—and of hobgoblins they are much afraid; and he is a bold negro who dares pass a graveyard at night, alone. A genuine negro meeting, with a favorite orator in the pulpit—one who spares not the horrible, and who preaches freely of the wrath to come, the terrors of the law, and the tortures of hell,—is a scene to be remembered by those who witness it. Wild with religious excitement as with strong drink, men and women—women especially—shriek and moan, shout and leap, until the spectator is reminded of the tales told by travellers of dancing dervishes, or of the wilder performances of fetish worshippers in Africa. In such a meeting, held in Georgia and reported for a religious paper in that State, a whining voice rung out, "I'm gwine to hebbun pun a white hoes." Another sprung up and shouted, "I see a pore sister agwine to hell pun a black mule!" A woman raised her hands, and, staring upwards, screamed, "I sees Jesus! I sees Jesus a lookin' right at me!" "I sees Him, too!" yelled another; "I sees him lookin' outer de winder ob hebbun!" "Bress de Lord," groaned a brother in the amen corner; "tell Him to let down a rope, and we'll clime up to hebbun." This idea seemed to strike a number with force, and they jumped up and down shouting, "Let's down de rope and we'll clime up to glory!"

Statistics show that a large majority of the colored race South are nominally Baptists; and in immersion, at least, they have implicit faith, regarding it as a mystic rite,—a sort of talismanic ceremony cleansing from all sin, past, present, and future. "Ef you want to git clean," said one of their preachers in a discourse on the subject, "you is got to wash all ober; dis here sprinkling," with scornful emphasis, "ain' gwine do you no good; you don't go and stan' in de rain when you wants to wash ya hams, duz yer?" Once under the water they are safe for all eternity, and henceforth may lie, steal, and commit all the cardinal sins except murder. To dance or to sing worldly songs, however, are sins for which there is no remission; and the church-member who alopes with his neighbor's wife will, in most congregations, be less severely disciplined than his brother who has danced a reel or sung a corn song. At country neighborhoods, at the corn-shucking frolics so dear to the negro's heart, the company are usually divided into two groups—"Christian and sinner,"—singing, for the negro is always musical, the one hymns, the other corn songs; and one may, on such occasions, hear

"Do, Johnny Booker, help dat nigger, Do, Johnny Booker, do!"

mingling in strange discord with, "Whar, oh whar, is de good ole Daniel?" or "Ole dog Bow-wow, stan'nin' at de gate, smell de meat a fryin' and can't git a taste," drowning with its outburst the lower notes of "Fisherman Peter on de sea,

Climin' up Zion's hill,
Drop yo' nets and foller me,
Climin' up Zion's hill."

The history of these spiritual struggles must be narrated in full class-meeting, and has much weight, in their opinion, as to the piety of the candidate. One of these experiences, considered first-class by the jury to which it was submitted and of which the convert was so proud that he rehearsed it for the edification of the "white folks," will serve as an example. He was an old man, and his term of probation had been long and tedious. For months he had worn the longest of faces, had groaned at prayer-meetings, and wrestled in spirit out on lonely hill-sides; he had even gone to the graveyard at night, hoping that there, if nowhere else, a vision might be vouchsafed to him: At last he had triumphed over sin and the devil, had come safely through, and this is his story of the final throes: "I had done seek and seek, and I was mos' ready to gib up; but somethin' insider me say, 'Charles, git up en go down de hill en pray.' So I went down de hill, en I got down on my knees, en I say, 'Marse Jesus, oh! Marse Jesus, hab mercy 'pon dis po' ole sinner.' En I looked up, en de hebbens war ez black ez de back [i.e., of the chimney], en all on a sudden I hurd a roarin', en I turn roun', en dar war somethin' jes' like a big black cow, with eyes like two balls of fire, en smoke en brimstone er comin' outen his mouf. En somethin' insider me say, 'Charles, dat am de debbil.' But my tongue felt jis' like a chip, en I couldn't say nuthin' to save my life. En de debbil he kep' on a-comin' en roarin'; en when he got mos' ter me I hollered out, 'Marse Jesus! Marse Jesus! jes es loud es I could; en de debbil he gin a loud ro' en runt off; en I seed a bright angel shinin' jes like a star, jest come down from hebbun, stannin' right fo' me. En de angel put his han' pun my eyes and gin me de eye ob faith; en I seed intu hebbun, and dar was Bruders Peter and Paul, and Brudder Moses, en all de 'posses settin' long side de Lord. En dey all had gole crowns pun their heads and gole harps in thar hans. En I seed intu torment, en thar was a heap ov folks a strung up like de meat in the smoke-house, wid the ole debbil en his angels a-pilin brush under dem, ter keep up de fire. En one old ooman was hung up by de tip eend of her tongue en burnt to a coal, but she kep' on a burnin'. Den I knowed I had 'ligion, en I comed along home."

The colored folks have little confidence in the piety of the "white folks." They cannot comprehend conversions unattended by visions, and they are at a loss to understand how people can be Christians and not shout. To this skepticism is owing much of the spiritual darkness of the race, for it defeated the pains frequently taken by slave owners who wished to impart religious instruction to their slaves. In an instance known to the writer, a Pennsylvania elder—a wealthy slaveholder—used all means short of compulsion, which he wisely argued would be construed into religious persecution, and so do more harm than good, to induce his slaves to attend family prayers. The attendance, always scanty, grew smaller and smaller, until only the "head man" came, and he at last ceased his attendance also. Mortified and grieved, his master asked why this was, and, after much hesitation, was told that their colored class-leader had forbidden them to attend,—"white folks' prars and preachin' warn't a-gwine do um no good; dey didn't read de Bible straight nohow."

They have singular ideas on some other points. A young lady missionary was teaching a class of pickaninies the old catechism,—"Who made you?" "Who redeemed you?" etc. Drilling this one Sunday into the brain of a rather bright boy, she was horrified on the next to hear him give in answer to "Who sanctified you?" "De debbil." "Tom," she asked, "what makes you say that? Don't you remember what I taught you last Sunday?" "Oh, yes, marm, I knows you say de Holy Ghos'; but mammy she say de debbil." Seeking his mother and demanding her reason for such heresy, the reply was "Lor', Missy, you know dat boy ain' sanctify. All de sanctify he got the debbil giv him." This was her theory, which no argument could shake, and henceforth that question was omitted in Tom's catechism. Negro theology is heterodox also on the doctrine of the forgiveness of sins. A gentleman one Sunday morning caught one of their preachers with the bag holding his ill-gotten booty, in the very act of robbing his cornfield. Taken thus there was no loophole for denial, but the thief was ready with an answer, when the gentleman expressed his surprise that a minister should steal corn, and steal corn on Sunday. "Marse Phil," he said, "ain' all time de same wid de Lord? ain' yistiddy de same ez terday, and terday ez termorra?" "Marse Phil" assented without in the least perceiving the drift of the question. "Den ef God forgiv my sin yistiddy, or las' year, or las' week, he done forgiv um once for all, en de sin I do is done forgibben, en ain' no sin." A mistress caught her cook in an open falsehood, and, in charging her with it, condemned such conduct as especially wrong in a church-member. "Lor, Misses," was the unabashed answer, "I reckon de Lord kin forgive me, ef I does tell a lie."

The negro passion for funerals is well known. "Is you gwine t' set up wid de corpse to-night?" asked one colored woman of another. "Naw; my husband 'on't le' me." "Lor now; nebber see sich a husband ez you got! don' man 'low you no plejure (pleasure) 'tall?" Sitting up with a corpse is by no means as sad a ceremony as the uninitiated Northern reader may imagine. When a negro dies, his church and society members—for every colored man or woman belongs to one or more secret societies—unite to hold what they call a "settlin' up." All the friends of the deceased assemble, and, from dusk until dawn, all night long they sing and pray, the object being to keep away the devil, and to pray the departed spirit safely into heaven. These meetings are strictly religious gatherings, and have none of the characteristics of the Irish wake. "Marching out of Egypt" is another of their strange modes of worship. In this the congregation, male and female, march round and round through the aisles, until strength is exhausted, and he with the stoutest legs is accounted most pious.

It is difficult to enumerate or to account for all the vagaries of their faith. Vestiges of fetishism linger still among them, but these form no part of their religion; and the voodoo man or woman is always held accursed,—a witch outside of the pale of salvation.—Boston Herald.

SOUL IN LABOR.

With all our justly-felt respect for labor, and our universal participation in it, there is yet a general and well-grounded dissatisfaction with its quality and results. We are all criticising our neighbor's industries, and those of us who are not blinded by conceit are passing a still more severe judgment upon our own. There is a want of thoroughness and soundness very noticeable in the work of to-day, and the feeling of fear and distrust that creeps involuntarily into the minds of those who purchase it, in any form, speaks only too loudly of the lack of competence or fidelity in those who perform it.

There are two elements that belong to all labor, and must combine in harmonious proportions to ensure its real excellence. One is the external form into which the worker moulds it to adapt it to its purpose in the world; the other the internal spirit which he breathes into it from his own being, and which gives it life. The one is its body, the other its soul. Every piece of work, from the humblest to the highest, depends upon this dual nature for its worthiness, and doubtless the chief cause of the inferiority of so much human labor is that these two elements are not properly blended. Take the work of the mechanic, for example. He has been taught certain processes, which he performs with more or less exactness. He fashions the wood or the metal to suit the house he is building or the tool he is constructing. After the operations become familiar to him he can carry them on almost without thinking. If he continue to do this, and only this, his work may have form, but cannot have life. It may be fair in quality, correct in proportion, and accurate in detail, but it cannot grow, for it has no vital power; it will show no signs of increasing excellence; it will bear no marks of fresh thought or new energy. Another, following the same branch of labor, works not only from without but from within. He, too, observes rules, and becomes expert in the mechanical routine, but he does not stop there. He thinks as well as toils. He studies the points of his labor, that he may discover how to improve them. He revolves new methods by which he may accomplish more in a given time. He reflects on the ends which are to be met, and adopts those measures which are likely to be most efficient. Thus he breathes his own mental life into his labor, and what was dull, dry, and mechanical becomes a vital and growing existence.

The student, in like manner, may be an empty receptacle to contain the information that is poured into him. He may study according to the prescribed methods, and acquire stores of knowledge, which his memory may retain; and yet all his work may be only a cold and lifeless form. But let him throw himself into it, let his curiosity be awakened, his mental appetite be sharpened, his thoughts engaged in fresh and original explorations, and study at once becomes real and vital, its body is animated by a soul, and the true work of education has begun.

So in every employment it is not enough that painstaking industry shapes the form; mind and heart must also infuse their own vitality into it, and make it glow with warm and earnest life. The best that is in us must enter into our work, if it is to be truly excellent. Not only mental power, but moral earnestness, must permeate it. Not only thought courage, patience, and zeal, but fidelity, must animate it; not only fidelity to petty details, but that fidelity of soul to its ideal which in itself contains the essence of all superior labor. Whatever be the work, let an image of its highest excellence be cherished in the heart, and made the mark at which all the powers are to aim.

This will preserve labor from that deterioration which so frequently takes place in routine work. Labor, like character, cannot stand still; if it is not rising, it is falling; if it is not growing, it is withering. He who puts not his soul into his work; who cares only to get it done, that he may reap some external benefit; who cherishes no image of it as it should be; who feels no shame if it be inferior, no joy if it be excellent, cannot even keep it up to its present standard. Not caring to do more than will make it pass, he will gradually sink into doing less; not actuated by pure and high motives, he will become more and more a slave to low and sordid ones.

It is this want of soul that pulls down the character of work; that makes labor done by the day slow; and that done by the piece poor; that adulterates manufactures, puts deception into trade, and dishonor into politics; that substitutes trickery for art, and superficiality for culture. If we would avoid these deep disgraces to our national and individual character, we must not only shape our labor into an external form, well adapted to its immediate purposes, but also keep it vital, fresh, and growing, by infusing into it deep resolves, high purposes, noble aims, and lofty ideas.—Philadelphia Ledger.

PUBLIC CAUTION AGAINST ADULTERATIONS.

At a special meeting of the "Massachusetts" Grange, P. of H. No. 33, held at their headquarters in Boston, June 20, 1878, it was unanimously voted that the Master of the Massachusetts State Grange be requested to send the following Cautionary Circular to the local Granges of Massachusetts and to the State Granges of the United States:—

Brothers: We think it our duty to caution Granges against the increasing sale of poisonous articles in our markets.

Arsenic is now sold at wholesale at about five cents a pound.

There has been imported into this country in a single year two millions three hundred and twenty-seven thousand seven hundred and forty-two pounds. A single pound contains a fatal dose for about twenty-eight hundred adult persons. What becomes of it?

We answer, a considerable portion goes into our wall-papers, figured and plain, glazed and unglazed, the cheapest as well as the more expensive. It is found in white, blue, red, yellow, green, and other colors. The pale colors frequently contain more than the most brilliant.

The editor of a leading Boston paper has recently stated that about eighty-five per cent. of all wall-papers now manufactured contain arsenic, and advises his readers to abandon their use, and paint their walls. The Boston Journal of Chemistry states that the manufacture of these papers is increasing. Arsenic is also used in tickets, paper curtains, covers of boxes, papers containing confectionery, and other papers.

Arsenic and other poisons are also now used in the coloring matter of ladies' dresses, gentlemen's under-clothing, socks, hat-linings, linings of boots and shoes. They are found in woolens, silks, cottons, and leather.

Prof. Nichols of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology found eight grains of arsenic in each square foot of a dress.

Another of our chemists found ten grains of arsenic in a single artificial flower.

A child recently died in Troy, N. Y., by taking arsenic from a veil thrown over its crib to keep off flies.

The Boston Journal of Chemistry states that they are now putting arsenic into toilet powders used in nurseries and by ladies, it being cheaper than starch, of which they were formerly made.

It would be well, also, for farmers to be careful in buying new kinds of cooking utensils. It was discovered last year that "marbleized iron ware," which had come into extensive use, was, in the words of the Harvard University chemist, who analyzed it, "alloyed with poison," the enamel being largely composed of oxide of lead in soluble form. We are assured that other poisonous ware is still sold.

Let Grangers refuse to buy new ware unless guaranteed harmless.

Many flavoring oils and syrups contain poisons. It is well to avoid them so far as possible.

Tea, coffee, cocoa, and chocolate are all liable to be adulterated, and to some extent with dangerous articles.

It is well to buy only of the best and most experienced dealers.

Drugs are largely adulterated. It is well to buy only of the most experienced and reliable druggists.

Sewing silks and threads are made heavy with lead, and poison those who use them.

Thousands of barrels of "terra alba," or white earth, are every year mixed in various forms with our sugars and other white substances. Its use tends to produce stone, kidney complaints, and various diseases of the stomach. A large part of our cream of tartar used in cooking contains fifty per cent. or more of "terra alba."

It is also used extensively in confectionery, and various poisons are used in coloring confectionery.

Mills in various parts of the country are now grinding white stone into a fine powder. It is stated that they grind at some of these mills three grades, soda grade, sugar grade, and flour grade.

We think it would be a paying investment for the Grangers of each State to employ a competent chemist to detect and publish adulterations, and then withdraw all patronage from those who manufacture or sell such articles.

We think there is quite as much need of organizations in all our States to enforce laws for the protection of public health as there is for organizations to catch and punish horse-thieves.

In conclusion we can congratulate the Granges that farmers are exempted from some of the dangers to which other classes are subject.

We make our own vinegar. It is stated in the Scientific American that probably half the vinegar now sold in our cities is "rank poison."

We make our own pickles. A Massachusetts chemist, who analyzed twelve packages of pickles put up by twelve different wholesale dealers, found copper in ten of them.

We have pure milk and genuine cream, and not the manufactured material which so largely supplies our cities and populous towns.

It was estimated by a medical commission of the Boston Board of Health, in 1874, that nearly $500,000 was paid in that city, in that year, for what purported to be, but was not, milk.

In a similar period of time there were four hundred and eighty-seven deaths of "cholera infantum" in Suffolk county, while in the same population outside the city there were less than one hundred.

And lastly, we are not compelled to eat oleomargarine cheese, or any part of the ninety million pounds of oleomargarine butter which it is estimated will be made in this country this year, in which, as we are told by the Chicago Live Stock Journal, Professor Church has found horse fat, fat from bones, and fat such as is principally used for the making of candles, and in the preparation of which, as has been recently widely published, upon what seems to be reliable authority, not sufficient heat is used to kill the parasites which enter and breed in human bodies.

BENJAMIN P. WARE,

Master of the State Grange of Massachusetts.

The above paper was prepared by brother Geo. T. Angell, chaplain of the "Massachusetts" Grange, of Boston, and who is also a director of the American Social Science Association, and President of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.—Circular.

Poetry.

ON RECEIVING A DAISY FROM SCOTLAND.

BY "A. M.,"—A LADY NEARLY EIGHTY YEARS OLD.

I.

Hail! "modest crimson-tipped flow'r,"
A wandering waif from Scotia's shore,
Immortalized by Scotland's bard
When his rude ploughshare turned thee o'er,

II.

As carefully he raised thee up,
Thy tender rootlets torn and bare,
And mourned the fate that wooed thee forth
So early in the frosty air.

III.

Had it but been some hardy flower,
With roots fast anchored in the mould,
My ruthless coulter turned aside,
It might ha' braved the blasty cold;

IV.

But thee, thou modest little flower,
Just lifting up thy snowy head
To greet me at this early hour,
And I, alas! ha' laid thee dead.

V.

If I could right thy cruel wrong,
My little, faded, bonnie gem,
The flower should live in simple song,
That wears the crimson diadem;

VI.

And you and I no more would part
While wave the broom and purple heather;
Our home should be the Scottish heart,
And we would dwell for a' together.

VII.

Then when the merry lasses came
To gather flowers fresh and fair,
The mountain daisy should be first
To nestle in their sunny hair.

VIII.

And when the May-pole for the dance
Was twined with garlands fresh and green,
Each lad and lassie should advance
To hail thee as their fairy queen.

IX.

But, Scotland's loved and cherished bard
Has touched thee with his magic power,
And dear to every Scottish heart
Is his "wee, crimson-tipped flow'r."

The Index.

BOSTON, SEPT. 5, 1878.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FAWC, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N.B.—The following resolution was adopted by the National Liberal League, at Philadelphia, July 3, 1876: "Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management."

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, WILLIAM J. POTTER, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHERRY, GEORGE JACOB HOLTOAKS (England), DAVID H. CLARE, MRS. ELIZABETH CODY STANTON, J. L. STODDARD, ELIZUR WRIGHT, C. D. B. MILLS, W. D. LE SUEUR, BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, Editorial Contributors.

F. R. A. REPORT.

The Eleventh Annual Report of the Free Religious Association, printed in pamphlet form, is now ready for distribution. It contains the reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer; essay by T. B. Wakemad, Esq., of New York, on "The Religion of Humanity, and How it may be Organized"; essay by Rev. W. H. Spencer, of Haverhill, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism, and How it is being Disorganized"; and addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George W. Curtis, Anna C. Garlin, Maurice Ellinger, and Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith (the latter including a poem).

Members of the Association who have paid the annual fee of $1.00 within the last twelve months will receive the report free, in all cases where their post-office addresses are known. To others the price is forty cents single copy; four or more in one package, twenty-five cents each.

Address "Free Religious Association," 231 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

IN RESUMING our editorial duties, we cannot forbear to express our hearty thanks to Mr. Stevens for the faithful and successful manner in which he has discharged them during our recent absence. It was a pleasure to know that our place was so well supplied, and that our readers would be equally pleased to hear from their and our old friend once more. The many earnest words he spoke in THE INDEX in former years found a warm response, to our certain knowledge, in many hearts; and his fresh utterances in its columns, so full of cheerful optimism, serious thought, and abidingly high aims, must have been peculiarly grateful to them all. The undeserved generosity of his allusion to us last week embarrasses us not a little in acknowledging our gratitude to him for his assistance this summer, since nothing is so "flat, stale, and unprofitable" as mutual-admirationism; but we must leave here at least one little word of cordial and sincere thanks for the friendly labors which enabled us to secure a short release from wearing responsibilities.

IT APPEARS that Mr. Wright was unable to get this pungent and forcible note printed in the Boston Transcript except as an advertisement—a fact which is only reluctant testimony on the Transcript's part to its incisive truthfulness:—

A Case for the Courts.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRANSCRIPT:—

Quoting from my remarks in Faneuil Hall, as reported in full in the Globe of yesterday, you kindly commend my motives, but condemn my logic. Bad logic is dangerous. It brings men to beggary and nations to the dust. Yours seems to assume that courts never make mistakes, and, therefore, the Comstock law is constitutional and Cupid's Yokes is an obscene book. Let that be true, and what follows? By chapter 105, section 15, of the General Statutes, the possession of an obscene book is an offence, punishable by imprisonment and fine. I possess Cupid's Yokes, and mean to do so, whatever the courts have decided or other people think. If the district attorney of Middlesex, knowing all these facts, does not prosecute me as soon as possible, he will violate his oath of office. Will you show your readers where the flaw is in this logic and oblige,

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

MEDFORD, Aug. 3, 1878.

CATHOLICISM IN CANADA.

It would be very instructive to those who think of the Catholic Church as a mere transatlantic institution, incapable of acquiring great power or influence in the United States, if they were to visit the Province of Quebec and observe for themselves what a tremendous hold this Church has obtained in a country contiguous to our own. They would discover that there is no magical charm or spell, in the mere fact of distance from the original seat and source of this formidable religious despotism, by which its stealthy advance can be checked or its activity for evil paralyzed. They would learn to appreciate the danger of encouraging, through exemption from taxation, the growth of a vast and consolidated money-power directed by ecclesiastics whose ideas and purposes are irreconcilably hostile to the existence of free thought and progressive institutions. They would learn to understand the necessary connection between popular ignorance and superstition, on the one hand, and insecurity of the most precious individual rights, on the other. They would learn to understand the deadly antagonism between the Church and the Republic in their respective ideas, tendencies, interests, objects, and destinies,—the absolute impossibility of these rival institutions continuing to grow and flourish side by side in the same community without coming at last to a bitter and perhaps frightful collision. They would learn to understand that the Republic, aiming to protect the equal individual rights of the whole people as its one supreme duty, cannot without suicide yield to the Church, which aims to establish an omnipotent ecclesiastical theocracy on extinction of the equal individual rights of the whole people. They would learn that the final and decisive battle between these two great rival institutions has got to be fought out on the field of education,—that the Republic, conscious of its own independent right to exist and to govern itself according to the laws of its own being, must insist on educating the rising generation thoroughly in all that concerns the intelligent discharge of the duties of citizenship, in utter disregard of all claims of the Church to interfere in this matter. They would learn to understand that secular education is the foundation of the Republic, just as ecclesiastical education is the foundation of the Church; and that if the Republic fails to exercise the right of requiring all children born within its limits to be thoroughly instructed in all the secular knowledge necessary to render them good citizens, then it endangers its own existence and paves the way for its own practical absorption in the Church. All this, and much more of the same sort, they would learn to understand, if to observant eyes they added penetration into the causes of what they observed.

Through the cordial invitation of friends of THE INDEX in Montreal, to whose exceeding hospitality and kindness we owe a delightful week's visit to that city and its environs, we have recently enjoyed the opportunity of seeing something of Catholicism in Canada. Its pomp and wealth are visible on every hand; its power is exercised and felt throughout the whole social fabric. It would be too long a story to describe in detail all that we saw and heard, but it may not be uninteresting to our readers to mention a few of the things which were most prominently presented to our attention.

The public buildings belonging to the Catholic Church in Montreal are very numerous, costly, and imposing. The new Cathedral of St. Peter's, of which as yet only the outer walls have been erected, is to be of enormous proportions, being three hundred feet long and in the transept two hundred and twenty-five feet wide,—the whole to be surmounted by five domes, of which the largest and central one is to rise two hundred and fifty feet into the air. A magnificent portico, two hundred and ten feet long by thirty feet wide, is to be erected in front of the cathedral, which will cost many millions of dollars and take many years in completing.

The old Parish Church of Notre Dame (sometimes called the "French Cathedral") is at present the largest and most splendid of all the Montreal churches. Standing on the Place d'Armes, it presents to view two massive square towers of over two hundred feet in height, behind which lies the main body of the church, two hundred and twenty-five feet by one hundred and thirty-four. In one of these stately towers hangs an enormous bell known as the Gros Bourdon, weighing over eleven tons, and giving forth, when rung (which is not very often), the richest, deepest, and most ponderous sound we ever heard from any bell. From the top of this tower one can obtain an extremely fine view of the city, which lies below and around it in all directions. Inside, the church is gorgeously painted, frescoed, and ornamented, and fairly glitters with gilding in all its parts. Here, on Sunday forenoon, we witnessed the dazzling theatrical pageant of High Mass, with three officiating priests at the altar clad in magnificent garments and flanked by crowds of inferior clergy, choristers, and acolytes. The church is said to contain ten thousand persons, if crowded to its full capacity; probably not far from half that number were actually present on this occasion. During the services, officials passed through the entire audience, exacting fees of five cents each from all who occupied "free (?) seats" and contributions from all who sat in rented pews. The money-side of religion, it was evident, is never here forgotten; though we confess to having had the weakness of supposing that Catholic churches did not tax all present at their services in this rigorously universal way. But it must have cost not a few five-cent pieces to pay for all this show, the spectacle was cheap at the price, and there is Scriptural warrant for "spoiling the Egyptians."

Still more interesting to us than this High Mass was the noonday service at the little chapel of the Convent of the Gray Nuns, or Foundling Hospital. Thirty or forty visitors had assembled, to be shown over this very large establishment; and this noon-service was the first thing in order. For fully ten minutes before it began, one of the nuns was busily employed in trying to adjust with sufficient nicety and exactitude a great gilt crown on the head of a white statue of the Virgin, in front of the audience. When this important object had at length been effected, a noise of chanting voices was heard approaching the door of the chapel through the corridor; and presently a procession of women slowly entered and passed down the aisle. The novices came first with their white vells, followed by the black-veiled nuns themselves, marching two by two, and kneeling down four abreast in the aisle when they reached the altar rail. The aisle was at last filled with them, all kneeling in rows of four till the service was ended, and then executing with all the skill of military evolutions a manoeuvre by which the procession passed out at the door two by two as they entered, the novices still in front. During the whole time, with loud, harsh, and monotonous voices, and with all the unity of a machine, they chanted prayers at regular intervals, in response to the nun who read the service at a desk near the door, in the rear of her kneeling sisters. Not an eye in the whole procession was raised during the performance; all gazed down fixedly before them, all held their hands pressed together, all wore on their faces the same look of stern self-repression and fanaticism, varied only here and there by a sadness which irresistibly excited the compassion of the beholder. Some of the faces were rather pleasing, but by far the greater part were heavy, ugly, unintellectual, and uninteresting. The effect of the scene was, at least on one mind, that of a wreck—a wreck of sweet humanity on the fatal reefs of superstition. The entire spectacle was one of human sacrifice—not the bloody, brief sacrifice of human bodies, but rather the bloodless and life-long sacrifice of human souls, with all their natural affections, all their natural hopes and thoughts and desires and ambitions, passed through the fire to Moloch. A dreary, profitless, pathetic crime against human nature itself!

But the blighting influence of Catholicism has other ways of manifesting itself. Not content with extinguishing all freedom and spontaneity in the souls of its own devotees, it must needs seek to crush out all that tends to foster freedom, science, progress, in the community at large; and the only limit of its activity in this direction is the limit of its power. Especially is its hostility aroused by all educational projects and institutions which are not submitted to the guidance, oversight, and control of the Church authorities. The Church arrogates to itself the right of educating the world, and enforces this right to the utmost limit of its ability, knowing well that control of education is the key to all permanent empire. Hence its inveterate hatred of all secular and scientific institutions which it cannot manipulate to suit its own purposes. An instance of this came under our own observation in the Canadian Institute (L'Institut Canadien), which we visited and were very politely shown. This is simply a reading-room and library managed by a literary and scientific society, which allows all thoughtful and valuable works equal privileges on its shelves, without regard to their theological bias. This broad toleration is the head and front of its offending. Being a centre of honest mental enlightenment in a city where Catholics and Protestants alike abhor all that smacks of "infidelity," no matter in how feeble a degree, the Institute long since excited the bitterest hatred of the Catholic hierarchy in Montreal. Whoever is known to be a member of it must face the extremest and most unscrupulous opposition to his success in every conceivable direction; he cannot hope to rise to any public position, to any social distinction, nay, even to any lucrative employment. Many a young man has come with tears to the Librarian, and declared that he must take off his name from the books, because he found it impossible to get work while he remained a member. Many of the best friends of the Institute stand aloof from it before the public, because, as they say, they could not otherwise attain any position in which they could aid it. It may be that, by all rallying together and boldly fighting out the battle for equal rights, they might command so much respect by their courage as to increase gradually the number of their supporters and at last establish a recognized place for themselves in the community. Be this as it may, there is not in Canada a more useful institution in its way; and it ought to receive the sympathy of all liberals, as a gallant little outpost, maintaining itself with difficulty against overwhelming odds in the struggle for spiritual freedom. If any one should be moved to send a contribution, large or small, in its support, it may be addressed to "M. A. Boisseau, Supt. L'Institut Canadien, Montreal, P.Q."

The animosity with which the Catholic Church pursues this benevolent and harmless Institute, simply because it is a little fountain of liberalizing educational influences in the midst of an arid waste of superstition, gave rise, as will be remembered, to the famous Guibord litigation a few years since. Joseph Guibord, of whom a fine portrait hangs in the reading-room, was a member of the Institute, and owned a lot in the Catholic cemetery. When he died, Nov. 18, 1869, his body was refused burial in his own lot, because he had died a member of the Institute, the "principal ground" for condemning which, as the Bishop himself declared, was that it "establishes the principle of religious toleration." The case was carried from court to court, until the Queen's Privy Council, Nov. 21, 1874, overruled the adverse decisions of the Canadian courts, and ordered the interment of Guibord in his own lot. This was not effected without delay and public rioting at the funeral; the Catholic roughs forced a postponement of it, but nevertheless, poor Guibord was laid finally at rest, in November, 1875, in a grave protected by thick walls of cement and covered above with an immense block of limestone weighing several tons. The Bishop, however, solemnly revoked the blessing which consecrated his last resting-place, carefully circumscribing the territorial limits of his curse, that it might not penetrate to Madame Guibord, who had died a good Catholic and whose remains were buried beneath those of her husband! We visited Guibord's grave, and found that the marble tablet inserted in the huge stone block above mentioned, and bearing a simple memorial inscription, had been wantonly defaced; the entire inscription had been daubed with black paint, and the tablet itself had been evidently pounded and partly broken with cobble-stones. Such is the blind and insensate fury with which religious fanaticism pursues the objects of its hatred.

The village of Oka, on the bank of the Ottawa River about forty miles from Montreal, is another illustration of the bitter persecution with which Catholicism punishes all heretics within her power. Oka is a settlement of a few hundreds of Iroquois and Algonquin Indians. Those of the former tribe having become Methodists, they have been relentlessly persecuted by the Seminary of St. Sulpice, which has defrauded them out of the title to their land, is endeavoring to drive them away, and at this very time is attempting to lodge them in the penitentiary on the false charge of having burned the Catholic church, which the best-informed believe to have been burned by the Catholics themselves in order to crush these helpless victims by perjured testimony. The case is still in the courts. This modest little village we viewed with great interest and sympathy, for the Indians have conducted themselves with great moderation and self-restraint, and deserve to be efficiently protected from their enemies.

But Montreal furnishes more melancholy evidences still of the violence and cruelty with which Catholicism fills the mind. The large and solid doorway of a dry-goods store on Victoria Square, near the statue of Queen Victoria herself, bears witness to the powerlessness of Canada to protect her own subjects against the fury of Catholic fanaticism. Here, on the twelfth of July, 1877, young Hackett fell pierced in a shower of pistol balls for the heinous crime of wearing an orange-colored ribbon; and we saw with a shudder the marks of these balls in the numerous blackened indentations of the solid stone. Nobody has ever been punished for the dastardly murder, or probably ever will be. In the sight of such terrible mementos of her crimes let not the Catholic Church boast of her care for the public morals; it is she that demoralizes the people till even the murder of an unarmed boy appears service to God!

We do not forget the brighter side of Catholicism—still less would we refuse to give it the praise that is its due. But an indictment for crime is not the place for panegyric, however well deserved in some respects it may be; and our recent observations have convinced us more than ever that, despite all the real services to mankind in some directions which this Church has rendered and still renders, she more than offsets these benefits by mischiefs so enormous that truth, striking the balance, writes "Public Enemy" on her brow.

ABNER KNEELAND.

It is well known to all who are conversant with the course of freethought in America, that the person whose name appears above was a notable example in the long list of those who have suffered for opinion's sake. Forty years ago, Abner Kneeland was consigned to prison, in Boston, because of his offence to Christian bigotry and intolerance through the utterance of his convictions in respect to prevailing religious conceptions.

On July 4, 1838,—the day on which we are accustomed to glorify our peculiar birthright and national liberties,—this brave, honest, truth-loving confessor passed in close confinement in a cell appointed for felons.

The anniversary of his release from that incarceration occurs on the 17th of August. It is the custom at Paine Hall, in this city, every year, to commemorate the event in a public way. It is a most fitting observance. It is well to keep the memory green of those who have thus suffered and sacrificed for intellectual freedom.

The exercises of last Sunday, just referred to, were introduced with an interesting and lucid account of the circumstances of Abner Kneeland's trial, and an eloquent and appreciative delineation of the prominent traits of his character, by Mr. Horace Seaver, the venerable editor of the Boston Investigator.

Mr. Kneeland was in the sixty-fifth year of his age at the time of his sentence. A few years before this occurrence, while a Universalist clergyman, and settled over a church of this sect in Charlestown, Mass. (the church with which Dr. E. H. Chapin and Starr King were afterwards connected), he underwent a radical change of thought in respect to religion, and was compelled, as a consequence, to abandon the pulpit and ministerial profession.

Mr. Kneeland was a person of great mental vigor,—a rare dialectician. He saw clearly the road he was travelling. He had not jumped at his conclusions, but patiently thought them out; they were sincere convictions, and he was conscious of ability to defend them,—certainly, at least, with any disputant that he was then likely to meet. That he might even more effectually do this, he felt the need of a paper; no movement or cause can prosper in this age of reading and inquiry without its representative journal. Accordingly he founded the Investigator, which we rejoice still lives, in the forty-eighth year of its age, to fight it out on the line which he so courageously initiated.

The step which he had taken involved him in a controversy with the Rev. Thomas Whittemore, editor of the Trumpet, a paper devoted to the interests of the Universalists. Mr. Kneeland was charged with not believing in a God, or with atheism. This he denied, and made the following answer to the imputation: "The Universalists believe in a God, which I do not." The answer was construed into a different meaning from that intended. He rejected the name of atheist, and claimed to be what he defined as a pantheist, a believer in all Nature as God,—the being and expression of conscious intelligence.

The turning-point of the judgment against him was the comma after the word God, in the statement above given, which Mr. Kneeland maintained had been inadvertently inserted, and hence should be left out, as it admitted an interpretation of his views which misrepresented them. But his plea was unavailing. His accusers and prosecutors would not yield the vantage-ground thus possessed. He was arrested, tried, and ultimately convicted on this as the principal indictment. There were other counts against him, but these were thrown out. The charge was blasphemy; and under a statute which imposed a penalty for the offence, and which we believe, to our shame, has never been expunged here in Massachusetts, whose wild waves have sung "the anthem of the free," he was convicted and sentenced to Leverett Street Jail, in this city, where William Lloyd Garrison, a few years later, found a refuge from the mob thirsting for his blood.

The final conviction of Mr. Kneeland was made on his third trial. On the first, all the jury but one were against him. This person who voted for his acquittal was Charles G. Greene, for many years editor of the Boston Post. On the second trial, Loring Dunbar cast the solitary vote in his favor. Mr. Greene and Mr. Dunbar are entitled to grateful remembrance for their noble firmness and persistence under such circumstances.

An effort was made to carry the case to a fourth trial before the Supreme Court, but without success. The term of imprisonment was sixty days. For two months of midsummer weather, from the 17th of June to the 17th of August, 1838, this aged man, whose life had always been blameless and unstained, was doomed to the discomfort and gloom of a criminal's lot, for his fidelity to what appeared to his mind the truth. And this in the name of a religion of professed forbearance, charity, and sincerity!

There were on the bench of the court that convicted Abner Kneeland, it is recorded, four judges. Three of these were Unitarians, the other Orthodox. By a strange though not entirely surprising inconsistency, in view of similar coincidences sometime since, the Orthodox judge favored the acquittal of the prisoner, while the Unitarians were decided for conviction. This anomalous position of the judges became more reconcilable subsequently by the two petitions which were put in circulation. The one drawn up for the release of Mr. Kneeland was headed by the eminent Dr. Channing, one of the truest representatives of humanity and freedom which the Church of Unitarianism has produced. A counter-petition, the emanation of outraged Orthodox piety, was circulated for the infliction of the full severity of the law.

Abner Kneeland was in every respect a remarkable personage. He was of large physical proportions and commanding presence, with a face, as the portrait of him displayed at Paine Hall bore evidence, expressive of ruddy health, firmness, conscientiousness, and benevolence.

The cast of his mind was serious rather than vivacious. He was a scholar and student by nature. Though he had but small advantages of education in youth, he eventually attained acknowledged proficiency in eight or nine languages, enabling him to make telling use of his knowledge of Hebrew upon his trial.

He also invented a system of orthography which won him great praise from persons of learning. It was submitted to the president and professors of Harvard College. The president expressed great admiration of it, but frankly told the author that it would never succeed with the name of Abner Kneeland attached to it.

Mr. Seaver concluded his address with the recitation of a well-known poem by Charles Mackay, from which we subjoin a stanza as an appropriate close to this imperfect report:—

"The man is thought a knave or fool,
Or bigot, plotting crime,
Who, for the advancement of his kind
Is wiser than his time.
For him the hemlock shall distill;
For him the axe be bared;
For him the gibbet shall be built;
For him the stake prepared;
Him shall the scorn and wrath of men
Pursue with deadly aim;
And malice, envy, spite, and lies,
Shall desecrate his name.
But truth shall conquer at the last;
For round and round we run,
And ever the right comes uppermost
And ever is justice done."

FOREIGN NOTES.

Bishop Caldwell, of the Anglican Church in India, does not appear to be good at figures.

At a missionary meeting held recently in London, he announced that upwards of seventeen thousand converts were made in Tinnevely last year. Whereupon a European gentleman, who has been a resident of the Ramnad and Madura districts, and is a staunch member of the Church of England, corrects, in the Madras Mail, his ciphering as follows:—

"It is not true there has been a large addition to the number of the Propagation Society's converts in this district. I have seen some hundreds of poor ryōts obtaining famine-relief rice from the missionaries. They, of course, received also religious instruction; but the moment the congee was finished, these rice converts disappeared. I wish the missions every success; but these absurd conversion stories only do the cause permanent injury. I can honestly say that, after my long experience of the mission work done in these districts, I regard it as a failure."

"The Mail also discusses the matter editorially, and gives figures to show that such wholesale gains as the Bishop reported could scarcely be possible, as the entire Brahmin population of the district is but fifty-six thousand eight hundred and sixty-six."

Public benefactors are not the exclusive product of any special people or faith, as this notable instance of munificence shows:—

The Duchess of Galliera is about to lay out a beautiful public square in Avenue du Trocadero, Paris. She will build in this square a museum in which she will place all her pictures and curiosities. The museum will bear her name. It will be a street thirty-six feet wide on its eastern and western side. One of these streets will be called Rue Galliera, the other Rue Brignolles (her maiden name). The Duchess and her late husband made other munificent donations. They gave Brignolles Palace at Genoa to the city for a public museum. They also gave to Genoa (their birth-place) $4,000,000 to improve the port.

A brilliant light in the literature and politics of Italy has gone out in the person of Count Alesandro Aleardi, who has just died at Verona, his native city, at sixty-five years of age. He was senator of the United Kingdom, and is described as "the purest and most finished of contemporary Italian poets." It is said of him that he was the embodiment of "Young Italy" in its feverish impatience of the Austrian; and, as a youth, at the University of Padua, his political lampoons and odes to liberty procured him the constant attention of the police.

In 1848 he represented Verona in the Venetian Republic, and went to Paris as diplomatic envoy. Upon the fall of the Republic he was made a political prisoner, and occupied a dungeon which sparingly admitted daylight for but five hours out of the twenty-four. After his release he underwent two other terms of imprisonment at Verona and Josephstadt. He represented the constituency of Lonato and Rezzato in the first parliament of United Italy and subsequently in the senate. He held the chair of æsthetics at Florence, and was noted for his genial presence, vivacious and versatile discourse, and happy judgments on contemporary art.

The empire of the Czar, which assumed to be the champion of Christianity in the late war, has need, it will be seen below, of putting its good professions into practice at home by the exercise of a better spirit of humanity and brotherhood:—

RUSSIA.—In an address delivered by Captain Burnaby at Birmingham, on Tuesday he said, "Now let us look upon Russia in another light, as 'the torch-bearer of civilization,'—an epithet that has been applied to her by Mr. Gladstone. Let us see how she treats one of the most industrious and orderly peoples in the world,—I allude to the Jews. There are three million Jews in the Russian Empire. They are only allowed to inhabit certain provinces of European Russia. The officials whose duty it is to carry out these restrictive measures are like most other of the Czar's officials,—corrupt. They tyrannize over the poor Jews, often force them to pay large sums of money, or otherwise turn them out of their houses and homes. A small Jewish trader cannot reside in St. Petersburg without paying the highest tax imposed by law on commercial houses. Finally, the Jews are prohibited by law from becoming proprietors of land."

Communications.

OPEN LETTER TO MR. BLAKE.

MR. J. VILA BLAKE:

My Esteemed Friend,—When I read your communication in THE INDEX of July 18, on "Heywood's Sentence," my first impulse was to give immediate expression to my surprise and grief that you could lend your influence in justification of the disregard and violation of the principle of freedom of opinion which has become established at a cost for which there is no measure. But sober second thought bade me remember that you were a true man, who would wantonly infringe no man's right, who would sacrifice much in any good cause, who would approach any subject worthy of your thought in the true thoughtful spirit; with a disciplined mind, but not wanting in a culture more complete than mental training alone can give; and therefore to hastily criticize would be unbecoming and unwise.

So I have waited until now, studied your communication with care, pondered the subject as well as I am able, and am compelled to the conclusion that the ground you take would, in practice, result in great injustice, and, if impartially and rigorously applied, would make you and me Mr. Heywood's companions in ignorance. You say the sentence was unwise, though not wrong. I too think it was unwise, but mainly because it was wrong. It is usually wise to do right, and always unwise to do wrong. Many publications which you and I endorse, and which have perfect freedom of circulation with our assistance, are believed by many people, perhaps a majority, to be bad in their influence, subversive of the best interests of the individual and of society, and are excluded from their families with jealous care, as something to be guarded against like an infectious disease.

Their abhorrence of these is quite as honest and intense as can be excited in any mind by the social theories advocated in Mr. Heywood's pamphlet. Millions of people of excellent character and average intelligence, upon reading even the title-page of books which receive our approbation, would treat them as you did the pamphlet in question, "throw them into the fire." This they would have a perfect right to do; but that does not carry with it the right to treat the author in the same way. That is just the distinction which I insist upon, and which I think you fail to make,—between the right to burn the book and the right to burn the author.

Your illustration of the toy-dealer using poisonous paints to beautify his wares has no proper application to this case. Poisonous pigments have been identified by scientific tests, so that it is a matter of exact knowledge; but by what analysis shall we know of the poisonousness of opinions? Or who shall be our accepted authority in such matters? Who shall be the infallible standard of decency or of doctrine? We may all hold most positive opinions, but while those opinions are so divergent, none may claim that his shall stand unquestioned.

With all that you say in favor of decency and purity of thought and expression I cordially agree. I have my opinion of decency and purity; you have yours. Doubtless your opinion and mine would very nearly, if not exactly, coincide; but others would differ from us, with equal right to an opinion. As you say yourself, "This is a matter upon which persons will differ, according to the bias of their minds, or the influence of circumstances." Who shall be the autocrat to decide in any special instance? With your knowledge of history I hardly think that you will consider a preponderance of public sentiment a safe rule. If so, yourself would quickly come under condemnation.

You say, "Intent to commit injury is not always necessary to the idea of crime"; and you assume that Mr. Heywood is criminal because he has committed injury, though perhaps heedlessly, and without intent. But the fact of injury is neither self-evident nor proven, and remains a matter of opinion, people of thought and culture and earnest desire for the prevalence of the highest morality taking opposite sides with equal honesty and ardor of conviction.

If you had been present at the trial, you would realize and acknowledge the outrage which was perpetrated. There were two prosecuting attorneys, the judge on the bench being the more active of the two. I venture to say that no one occupying that high position has acquitted himself so disgracefully since the time of Jeffries. Conviction was a foregone conclusion. The charge of indecency and obscenity was the flimsiest pretence. In the trial, passages which might be considered indecent were scarcely noticed, while all the stress was laid on such passages as most forcibly expressed the doctrine of the treatise, although the language was unexceptionable.

You say, "Not with the feeling that Heywood was a bad man, or that he intended to corrupt young persons, but that he had treated a subject of the first moment to public morals in a manner tending to confuse, and even to obliterate moral distinctions in the minds of the young and unprotected." Granted, if you please. So we believe that thousands of public teachers of recognized respectability and high social position treat equally important subjects in equally confusing ways, and with much greater mischievous effects from their prestige of position and broader field of influence. They must also be sent to prison. And doubtless you and I, in the minds of these same thousands, would fall under the same accusation. We too must go to prison.

One subject upon which the teaching, as I think, is almost uniformly of a confusing and practically pernicious tendency, is this very matter of the rights of majorities, including the right of society to enact a moral code for the individual, its acceptance to be enforced.

You say, "I do not hesitate to lay down the principle that society may claim rightfully, not only that the writer or teacher shall be responsible for what he intends to teach, so that he shall not inculcate lewdness, but that he shall be responsible also for the collateral tendencies of his style and manner of teaching, so that it shall be incumbent on him to use the language, illustrations, etc., the least likely to work injuriously on the imaginations of the young, the untought, and the passionate."

That passage, I believe, contains the true and the false most confusingly commingled, for which I do not propose to hold you responsible to the extent of bolts and bars and prison fare and labor, but only in the way of free discussion; and I hope to be treated as justly for what I have here said, with which I know you cannot agree. Yours very sincerely,

J. A. J. WILCOX.

A WORD ON THE OBSCENE LITERATURE QUESTION.

For some time I have seen what I considered a dangerous tendency in liberalism, and have attempted to point out that danger in a few brief comments. These criticisms have been dictated by an earnest desire to see liberalism stand before the world as one of the great moral factors of the age. The recent conduct of many liberals in reference to the law prohibiting the sending of obscene literature through the mails confirms my fears that liberalism is in danger of becoming too lax in its moral code.

The readiness with which so many liberals embrace anything that claims to be for more liberty is of itself a dangerous sign. This unthinking demand for such absolute freedom as many liberals are clamoring for is the road to anarchy and ruin. Constitutional restrictions are just as necessary to the existence of true liberty as constitutional permissions; and those who lose sight of the right of society to protect the common welfare by wholesome legislative restraint are as much the enemies of equitable freedom as the advocates of arbitrary despotism. Obscene literature is an enemy to society, and is as much within the sphere of legislative prohibition as theft or murder. The doctrine which some liberals advocate that the State has no right to legislate in the interest of morality because there is a difference of opinion among men as to what constitutes morality is as absurd as to maintain that no legislation of any kind should be attempted because some persons would be opposed to any such exercise of power. In fact, the liberals who deny the right of the State to thus protect itself from the worst enemies of society assume premises that lead to the destruction of all social compacts. Obscene literature is an enemy to that morality which the State is bound to protect, and the mails of the United States are not more sacred than the rights invaded by those vile publications, sent out to corrupt the youths of our country.

A more untenable position could not be taken than that of those liberals who demand an absolute repeal of the law prohibiting the sending of vile literature through the mails; and a few more such blunders on the part of many prominent persons in the party will give liberalism a bad odor to the friends of decency.

THE SCIENCE OF UNIVERSOLOGY.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

NO. XXIX.

It is the ORDINAL TRIO of fundamental ideas—first, second, third—which has been hitherto considered. It remains to consider the corresponding cardinal trio,—one, two, three. This elevates us into a higher metaphysical, speculative, and apiritistic realm. The cardinal trio holds a relation to ideal space, and, so, to the invisible universe, and, within the visible universe, to real space and to ether and air (breath, spirit), as infilling and occupying space; like that which the ordinal trio holds to time, with its water-current character, to matter at large (temporalities), to generation, as a chain or current succession of beings, and to the creative and practical relations of God to the world and to man; as an on-going, the grandis ordo eventorum. The ordinary, or temporal, sphere of being is related to ordinality, among numbers; and the cardinal or spiritual sphere of being to cardinality, among numbers (see Basic Outline of Universology).

At this transition from the ordinal numbers to the cardinal numbers, and, so, from what is analogous with one to what is analogous with the other, we transcend all popular religious conceptions, and ascend to Hindu philosophy, Zoroastrianism, Hebrew Monotheism, and Hermetica; the aristocracy of theosophies or theological ideas; in other words to mysteries and occultism, the basis of that wide-spread older world-religion which preceded ordinary theological and ecclesiastical history.

From this point of view, and as now understood by the aid of the results of modern scholarship and discovery, the claims of the Catholic Church to authority, on the ground of its antiquity, are greatly diminished. Judaism has become almost modern, and Christianity altogether so. Eighteen hundred years is now no more to us than a century was, half a century ago. Abraham is just a little remote, and on the hither border of our present antiquity; while Jesus, Peter, and Paul are almost our fellows.

From this transcendent point of view; that of magic, of initiates and adepts; of Hermetica and Kabala; of a back lying and profound metaphysic, originally the philosophy of ancient India,—from this point of view, allied with the cardinal number trio (one, two, three), the whole other trio—ordinal (first, second, third)—was esoteric, public, popular, plebeian, womanish, and predominantly false and evil (devilish or satanic); while only the secret wisdom was deemed esoteric, manly, and divine; or really worthy, true, and good. It will be shown presently how the ordinality and temporality series—the lower series—became permanently allied with Satan or the Devil.

From this pretentious, but reserved and really lofty, point of view—that of the older and quasi-universal philosophy and religion, communicated to learned Initiates—God is not, now, the First (Cause), in any work of creation, in time, or in any historic sense whatever; but THE ONE (To Hen) in the logical or purely metaphysical sense; not implying, but denying all action or change,—without "variableness or shadow of turning" (James I., 17). Still more rigorously, and somewhat otherwise conceived of, God in his absoluteness is the zero, back of one, out of which all number emerges; and hence the Nirvana, or Not-being, of Brahminism and Buddhism; and, again, the unknowable, of Spencer. It is with the Neo-Platonists, perhaps, that we find THE ONE, abstractly conceived of, most distinctly defined and insisted on as the supreme and absolute God,—hyper and hypostatic, or the source of all emanations (hypostases); but, concretely, it was the Jewish nation which embodied this idea as the one true God, and gave it practical authority. This absolute unity of God has descended from the Jews to the Mohammedans, and is subsumed by modern Unitarianism. The Jewish ceremonial of the synagogue of to day has this formula of credo:—

"I believe in one God, whose unity is perfect, and who can never be understood as distinct in different persons and personifications. There are no limits, either of time or of space, to his being and existence. He has never been, nor never will be, known unto man in any shape or form of bodily or physical appearance."

The Hindu and the Jew are reconciled in the philosophy of Hegel, who demonstrates, as his point of departure, the virtual identity of zero and unity; or of not-being and being; or of negation and reality. This farthest back point of philosophy, this identification of opposites, was, however, conceived of by the old Hindus, and is their Aum or An; the ineffable or unpronounceable, the supremely sacred and unutterable, name; for a farther explanation of which, see farther on. In a less transcendental sense, however, making the transition to the more popular (vulgar) class of ideas (related to time, creation, and change), THE ONE may be taken as the type of the supreme God-idea.

THE TWO, as the opposite or "adversary" of ONE, is then, logically, the devil, or the embodiment of evil; and the THREE should, by the same logic be the representative of an integration or higher unity of good and evil, or of God and the devil, in a supreme harmony of some kind; but this ultimate reconciliation required a bolder stretch of reasoning than any of the old philosophies or religions seemed competent to. The TWO hardly appears as a distinct individual embodiment; but instead of it we have, interposed between Brahminism and Judaism, the old Persian theology (Zoroastrianism or Zaratrustianism), which recognizes two opposite and coeternal principles, that of good and that of evil, as constituting the divinoid supremacy. This doctrine came into Judea from Persia, as the Hindu trinities came thither from India. It occupies, logically, the middle ground, in one direction between Hinduism, with its Three-God-idea, and Judaism with its One-God-idea; and in another direction between this last and Christianity, which readopted the Three-God-idea within the One-God-idea.

We can now see that Christianity was a blending and smelting of the oriental philosophic theosophies with the indigenous theology of Judea. From the point of view of the initiates in Hermeticism it was a disastrous vulgarizing of "the secret wisdom"; from that of religious integration and evolution it was a prodigious lifting of the common mass of mind, immersed still in Polytheism,—many-god-ism; while from the point of view of Judaism itself it was a wicked defection from a higher and purer doctrine. Its great moral feature was that it introduced the truly human element—the heart of flesh—into the God-head, and so laid a powerful hold upon the sympathies and affectional sentiment of mankind.

The distinct representation of the evil principle was not then so consistently made by the single number two as that of the supreme good principle was by the number one. The reason seems to have been: That the whole cardinal trio (one, two, three) was, by another aspect of the symbolism, taken, as we have seen, to be relatively good, as compared with the whole ordinal trio (first, second, third), which was then taken to be bad. This ordinal series, representing temporalities, and, more primitively still, time (as the cardinal series represented spiritualities of the out-spreading heavens, and, primitively, space), and also being successional and currential, or elongated and broken into segments, coincided in character with the body of a serpent,—each fold of his body representing a successive age. So it came that the serpent completing a circle (with his tail in his mouth) was the universally accepted symbol of eternity or endless time; and (it would seem)—when the two ends were not so connected—of time merely, and especially of past or historical time; and, so, finally, of tradition or ancient habits and popular unphilosophic belief. At the same time, devotion to temporalities is practical wisdom; whence it happened that the serpent was both a symbol of the wicked or profane aspect of things and of wisdom; and was sometimes worshipped as divine. Thus the serpent, or the old serpent, or the old red serpent or dragon (a modified form of the serpent), was the symbol of evil, and of time or tradition; and exceptionally of wisdom. (Red is symbolic of the past, green of the present, and blue of the future.) The woman as inferior to man was also relatively evil, and was closely connected with the serpent. The sea, with its current of successive waves, its stream-like character, was again a special analogue of time, and so of historical tradition.

The symbolism of the third chapter of Genesis can be readily understood by the aid of these Hermetic solutions; but at present we are concerned rather with the origins of Christianity. We, with whom Christianity has now become in a great measure traditional, have difficulty in realizing that the great struggle of Jesus and the Christian apostles was with tradition,—the traditions of the elders. The devils over which he gave to them power were, especially, bad spiritual influences and false doctrines; and when he said "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven," (Luke x., 18) it was, in the symbolic oriental phrase of his day, only what a reformer of our day would express by saying, in plain, unfigurative speech: "I see, as certain, the extinction of the traditional authority of the past." To really translate from the literature of an early people, we must be familiar with their habitual methods of thought, and especially avoid first rendering our habitual methods of thought into their language; and the greatest extremes in this respect are between the ancient oriental and the modern western orders and states of mind; so that it may be said, with no little propriety, that "the Scriptures have never yet been translated. The same idea is rendered in Luke as follows: "Now is the judgment of this world; now shall the prince of this world be cast out" (Luke xii., 31); that is to say, the dominant opinion, descended from the past, shall be utterly subverted.

The two specific enemies of nascent Christianity, in the first century after Christ, were the diffusive Hindu "Secret Wisdom," which either had taken or soon afterwards did take a modified specific form in the Jewish Kabbala, as we have it still in the Zohar; and the more rational Persian form of the same doctrine, which came somewhat later than the more primitive Hinduism. This modified Jewish Hinduism we may for convenience refer to as the Kabbala, and the other as the old Persian philosophy. The old Jewish theosophy had had idolatry (Polytheism, many-god-ism), as its enemy to be overcome, and had thoroughly accomplished its task. Jesus and the apostles came most immediately in conflict with this common and triumphant Jewish doctrine (as Phariseeism, Sadduceeism, etc.). And the new movement either vanquished it, or separated itself from it. One or a few generations later, when the Apocalypse was written, the Kabbala and the old Persian philosophy were the remaining forms of tradition, with which young Christianity found itself arrayed in direct hostility. All this appears inferentially in the Apocalypse itself. It was still later that the new faith had its great battle with Neo-Platonism.

The Kabbala was already, at that day, traditional; its very name signifies virtually tradition (Kitto, Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature, word Kabbala); and the revelator returns upon the old doctrine, "the secret wisdom," the complement of calling it that very old serpent, which it, in its palmy days, had pronounced all merely temporal or historical affairs to be, teaching the world to treat time-lore, or tradition with depreciation and contempt. The characteristic schema of the Kabbala was the propounding of ten Sephiroth, a sort of divine attributes and emanations, virtually ten fundamental points of doctrine. Of these ten Sephiroth, the first three belonged to the essence of God, and the remaining seven were merely crowned heads, an expression equivalent to cardinal principles (Kitto, Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature, word Kabbala, p. 100). Among the ten, the first was also called the crown, as prominent or cardinal among themselves. The old Persian philosophy had its two fundamental principles merely, good and evil; and, being more philosophical and less traditional, had more ground to stand upon. There must have been recognized, also, three stages of the Kabbalistic tradition, an older one, the serpent (of the sea), more purely traditional, a later one, more philosophic, represented by the dragon, a lizard type of animal transitional to the land beast or true animal, and finally the beast, as the finally constituted philosophy.

Let us now quote from John, the revelator: "And there appeared a great wonder in heaven, a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars. And she, being with child, cried, travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered. And there appeared another wonder in heaven: and behold, a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, . . . and the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born. And she brought forth a man-child who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron; and her child was caught up unto God and to his throne. . . . And there was war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon, and the dragon fought, and his angels, and prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent called the devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world (Rev. xii). And I stood upon the sand of the sea and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns. . . . And I saw one of his heads, as it were, wounded to death, and his deadly wound was healed; and all the world wondered after the beast. And they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast; and they worshipped the beast, saying, Who is like unto the beast who is able to make war with him? . . . And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth, and he had two horns like a lamb, and [but] he spake as a dragon. And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, and causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed (Rev. xiii). And I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand, full of abominations and filthiness of her fornications. And upon her forehead was a name written, mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations of earth. And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus; and when I saw her I wondered with great admiration" (Rev. xvii).

For the fuller exposition, really the true translation of this, for us, mystical literature, in the light of the principles stated in what precedes in this article, the reader is referred to the article which will follow this.

JEFFERSON'S CUP OF TEA.

In the anecdote of Washington in THE INDEX for Aug. 1, Jefferson finds his tea too hot and cools it in his saucer; whereupon Washington suggests an analogy to illustrate the necessity of a second chamber. But suppose Jefferson's tea had been already of the desired temperature, or even, say, too tepid? Unfortunately for Washington's argument, tepidity is the usual condition of our worthy congressmen; and some may agree with J. S. Mill in thinking that a single chamber (especially if it be composed of Anglo-Saxons) is more in need of the spur than of the bridle. Besides, too, with the cheap press and the telegraph, the public answers all the purposes of a first chamber, being yet free from the attendant dangers of tyranny and obstruction of the bicameral system.

The unicameral system brings the power as close as can be to the people; and that is where it should be; not because a man of the people is wiser or purer than a senator, but because the people is the people, and hath its own interest at heart.

WOMAN AND CHRISTIANITY.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Aug. 2, 1878.

FRIEND GREEN:—

I have waited until after our Rochester anniversary before replying to your note of invitation to attend the Watkins Free Thought Convention. I enclose you our resolutions,—the most liberal ever going forth from a woman's rights convention. The press has attacked them, and the clergy, which is pretty sure evidence not only that they are right, but that they are needed. The very underlying principle of woman's demands is the right to self-development. Without this right and this power there can be no freedom. The more deeply I examine history, the more fully I see the influence ecclesiasticism has had upon law. As far as woman is concerned, she has not only been debarred from the right of private interpretation of the Scriptures, but in her case there is already a union of Church and State. After the Norman Conquest canon law had a very powerful influence in modifying and changing common law, especially upon all points where woman was most interested, as marriage, children, inheritance, etc. In taking English common law, with all its restrictions upon woman, as the basis of American law, this country has already, as far as woman is concerned, that union of Church and State against which all thoughtful persons are arrayed. So woman, if she but knew it, has far more at stake than man, not only in prevention of greater union, but in the breaking up of that already fastened upon us.

Writers upon law have been very blind in discovering the influence of ecclesiasticism upon legislation. Not until the seventh edition of his famous Criminal Law did even Wharton discover its bearing upon the law for crimes. Amos has not yet recognized its effects upon civil law, although closely interwoven with it; and I know of but two writers who have at all noted the especially restrictive influence of Christian legislation upon woman. These two are, Maine in his Ancient Law, and Canon Charles Kingsley in a letter to John Stuart Mill. A little thought and a little study bring these effects clearly to light.

The time has fully come for woman to think for herself in religious matters; and, deeming your association for free religious thought one of great importance and benefit to woman, I shall gladly avail myself of your invitation to be present and take part in the Watkins Convention.

Truly yours, MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE.

CANADA IN WANT OF A LIBERAL LEAGUE PARTY.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Aug. 5, 1878.

EDITOR INDEX:—

I take the following from the Albany Law Journal of August 3, which shows that a Liberal League party is wanted in Canada:—

"Held, That Christianity is a part of the recognized law of this Province (Ontario), and, therefore, that to an action for breach of contract to let a public hall, a plea setting up that the purpose for which said hall was intended to be used, was for the delivery of certain lectures containing an attack upon Christianity was a good defence, and plaintiff was not entitled to recover.—Ct. Queen's Bench, Ontario, Easter Term, 1878."

Therefore a "Christian government" sustains its "Christian" subjects in deliberately violating their contracts with "infidels." In Canada it seems "infidels" have no rights that Christians are bound to respect in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. It seems the "Queen's Bench" is a bench of superstitious idiots, and they may learn that by such decisions they make an "attack upon Christianity" far more effective than Mr. B. F. Underwood, with all his learning, could have done in the hall for six months. "Whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad." H. M. GREEN.

SCHOOL MEETINGS.

In each school district there will be held in a few weeks the regular annual school meeting. It is important that friends of education, and especially those who are in favor of the separation of the Church and State, should be sure to attend these school meetings, where not only the general questions in regard to the school for the coming year are decided, but the officers are elected who are to hire the teachers and transact the business of the district. Let every liberal remember to be present at the annual meeting, and, when there, in the election of school officers to vote only for men who are free from the yoke of the priesthood, to vote only for men who will conduct the school in the interest of education, and not to build up the Church. This occasion, the election of school officers, will be one of the best opportunities for secularists to resist the union of Church and State.

CYRUS LEE.

MAPLE RAPIDS, Mich., Aug. 11, A. R. 103.

ONE CANNOT but reflect on the striking contrast between Imperialist Germany and republican France at this moment. Seven years ago Germany seemed more democratic than France. The constitutional empire had just entered upon what promised to be an era of self-government, national growth, and cultivation of the arts of peace. France was republican, but who did not tremble for the republicanism of a people just liberated from Bonapartism? Seven years have passed, and behold the blighting influence of the empire and the tranquillizing and elevating effect of the republic. Germany has retrograded and drifted back into arbitrary assaults on personal liberty, press prosecutions, and assassination. France has steadily advanced to the greatest and most real exercise and enjoyment of democracy ever witnessed on so large a scale on the continent of Europe.—Springfield Republican.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quick advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " "
 " 26 " 51 " 6 " "
 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON, publish

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenafly, N.J.

J. L. STODDARD, Boston.

ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.

C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.

W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.

BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.

ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fifth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

THE SECULAR REVIEW.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

THE SECULAR REVIEW is the leading organ of Secularism, and each week has Special Articles on Theological, Social, Scientific, and Political Subjects. Its distinctive features are the advocacy of Constructive Secularism, and the dissemination of useful information on all questions which affect the welfare of the people. Letters are inserted in its "OPEN COLUMN" from all who are courteous in the expression of their views; while a special department is allotted for "NOTES AND QUERIES."

The Contributors to the SECULAR REVIEW comprise the principal advocates of Secularism, including its founder, G. J. Holyoake.

TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY.

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine, from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact facsimile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is from England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on the issues with a promptitude unequalled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers. The following are a few of the contributors:—

Attention is specially called to a change in the advertisement of the publications of the Free Religious Association. By a recent vote of the Executive Committee the Annual Reports of the Association, from the year 1872 to the year 1877 inclusive, are now offered at five cents each (and at the same rate for any larger number) to any body who will take the trouble to send for them, enclosing five cents in postage stamps. They will also be sold at the office for the same sum to any one calling for them there.

The Committee have put the pamphlets at this low rate, which hardly more than covers the cost of sending them by mail, with the hope that they may thereby be more extensively circulated. By referring to the advertisement describing their contents, it will be seen that they contain much matter of special interest on the most vital religious problems of the age. It is not too much to say that some of the most valuable contributions of the last five years to religious discussion may be found in these pamphlets. Let any one who wants to know what the Free Religious Association means, send for these Reports. And will not the members and friends of this Association take this opportunity to extend the knowledge of its principles?

stands confessedly at the head of American railways. The track is double the entire length of the line, of steel rails laid on heavy oak ties, which are embedded in a foundation of rock ballast eighteen inches in depth. All bridges are of iron or stone, and built upon the most approved plans. Its passenger cars, while eminently safe and substantial, are at the same time models of comfort and elegance.

THE SAFETY APPLIANCES

in use on this line well illustrate the far-seeing and liberal policy of its management, in accordance with which the utility only of an improvement and not its cost has been the question of consideration. Among many may be noticed

The Block System of Safety Signals, Janney Coupler, Buffer, and Platform, The Wharton Patent Switch, and the Westinghouse Air-Brake, forming in conjunction with a perfect double track and road-bed a combination of safeguards against accidents which have rendered them practically impossible.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

PLATFORM

For the Presidential Election of 1880,

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution; including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

4. E. — The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE
FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification for any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

GLIMPSES.

A SUBSCRIBER in Bristol, England, has just sent us this little message: "You are right as to the Comstock business. How is it acute American people do not see with you? Best wishes!"

GOVERNOR BISHOP, of Ohio, has issued a proclamation calling "all Christian people in the State of Ohio" to assemble in their churches on Friday, September 13, to pray for the cessation of the plague at the South.

THE EPISCOPAL House of Bishops have unanimously deposed Bishop McCoskrey, of Michigan, on account of his scandalous misconduct and his flight from the country. Similar energy would win for other churches a respect they do not always receive.

BISMARCK'S coquetry with the Papal Nuncio at Kissingen is explained as possibly arising out of the necessity of making peace with the Church in order to render the Imperial Exchequer independent of Parliamentary grants. One thing is at least certain: no military despotism can be trusted as a sincere friend to intellectual liberty. Despite their mutual rivalries, all despotisms have a profound sympathy with each at bottom, and are ever ready to make coalitions against the common enemy—freedom.

THE RAVAGES of the yellow fever at the South, terrible as they have been, have revealed afresh the kindness of the human heart in a most touching manner. There is something very impressive in the spontaneity and heartiness with which contributions for the sufferers have been poured in from every part of the North. Sectional animosity cannot long survive when the people thus demonstrate the warmth of their sympathies for each other. The black cloud of pestilence itself is gilded with light by the radiance of humanity.

THE Advertiser of last Monday published this curious item of news from Lynn, Massachusetts, which will interest many of our readers: "The Oxford Street Chapel is advertised to be sold on account of non-payment of taxes. The chapel is owned by the Free Religious Society, and the Hon. H. W. Paine, of Boston, has given it as his opinion that the chapel, being church property, is not liable to taxation, and therefore cannot be sold. City Solicitor Harmon is of opinion that it is not church property." This is the chapel in which Rev. Samuel Johnson formerly preached. If churches must be exempted from taxation at all, let us at least have impartiality and exempt all alike.

THE ARREST of several persons at Watkins for retailing Mr. Heywood's pamphlet is a repetition of the wrong committed in his imprisonment. Poor in substance and style as the pamphlet is, it cannot be suppressed without violating freedom of discussion; and no greater folly could be committed than that of giving factitious importance to a work of this character by attempting to suppress it. Nothing remains but to insist that thought and discussion shall be free, and to vindicate the general rights trampled upon in the persons of these arrested parties. The question is unfortunately a mixed one, and liberty cannot be effectually protected if passion rather than reason controls the action of the liberal party.

LAST FRIDAY NIGHT Denis Kearney made a speech to eight thousand people on Union Square, New York. The Tribune said in its report: "The speaker raised great applause by saying: 'The honest workmen will run this country if they have to walk through blood up to their knees, and die in the pool.' The place for holding the meeting was praised, and Providence was declared to have favored the meeting with a favorable night for holding it in the open air. 'In fact,' said Kearney, 'God has followed me all over the country.' Three cheers were given for Butler at the speaker's request. A reference perhaps to a premeditated attack upon the Chinese was made in this sentence: 'There may be trouble in California soon, and some of you may be sent there in a regiment of soldiers. My advice is that you shoot the first man that commands you to shoot your brother.' The President of the Third Avenue Railroad was denounced for receiving a large salary. This denunciation brought forth cries of 'hang him.'"

THERE WAS A CURIOUS EPISODE at the Kearney meeting of last Friday, in New York city, which is worth noting. Denis Kearney mounted the railing, and "nominated for chairman Patrick Ford, and said that no one should be elected chairman who was not honest. A man in the crowd said: 'How do we know that Ford is honest?' Ford was elected by a show of hands, but when called for by Kearney did not answer. Kearney then said: 'I nominate George Blair for the position.' Justus Schwab waved his hand excitedly at the chairman and said, 'He betrayed us in '74.' A large number of persons in the crowd echoed Schwab's assertion, while Kearney was putting the motion whether Blair should or should not be chairman. Kearney declaring that the show of hands indicated the election of Blair, Schwab called out, 'He is a traitor.' Kearney, pointing at Schwab, said, threateningly: 'You will be put in prison.' Schwab's face flushed, and he fiercely replied: 'You threaten me with a prison! So, you talk prison, too, do you?' Kearney answered: 'You will have to submit to the will of the majority.' Kearney then put the vote over again. There was a great show of hands against Blair, but he was declared elected. As Blair mounted the railing he was soundly hissed. He repudiated the charge of being a traitor, and then made a short speech of the usual labor reform pattern." Here was an exhibition of character which tells volumes to those who can understand it.

THE CYNICAL REMARKS of the New York World on the arrests at Watkins have just enough truth to make them uncomfortable reading for liberals of cool-headedness and good sense: "No less than four members of the convention contrived to get arrested for selling a book to which one of the good citizens of the town invoked the attention of a magistrate as indecent literature, and the three men and the girl who had distinguished themselves as active agents in behalf of scientific impurity are now martyrs, if not in the cause of truth, at least in the cause of free discussion. It is plain that these amateur book-peddlers went to work deliberately in the hope of making themselves conspicuous through suffering, persecution, and prosecution; after the manner of Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant; and, indeed, the secretary of the convention did not hesitate to say in his exultation over the affair that he hoped all the freethinkers would be arrested. Such an alacrity in seeking martyrdom is beyond anything in story except Gibbon's account of the zeal of the early Christians, who, according to that freethinking historian, went about making themselves generally obnoxious by their profession of faith and their denunciation of paganism until they irritated the tolerant Romans into crucifying and burning a few of the most urgent of them. It is a pitiable thing, however, that the martyrdom of freethinkers is commonly incurred for the circulation of an indecent book. What necessary connection is there between freethinking and peddling indecent writing upon delicate topics? Why do these reformers always come in contact with society upon this topic of the relation of the sexes? It cannot be that they choose this theme deliberately as their best battle-ground, and we must conclude that they drift towards such discussion in obedience to some prurient propensity inherent in the freethinking mind. Certainly if there be any cause in which martyrdom is not heroic, it is in the assertion of the right to peddle an indecent fifteen-cent pamphlet, with the indecent passages carefully marked to draw the attention of the reader."

Creed Religions as Cultivators of Political Hypocrisy.

A PAPER READ AT THE CONVENTION OF FREETHINKERS,
AT WATKINS, N.Y., AUG. 25, 1878.

BY HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT.

By political hypocrisy I mean professing to be a Republican or a Democrat without regarding the rights of other people as equal to one's own—not doing as one would be done by. And by creed religions I mean associations of people who undertake, by pains and penalties, to compel belief in regard to supernatural persons and a state of existence after death. With creed in itself I have no quarrel. A man who believes nothing, is good for nothing. Faith is not a matter of will, still less a thing to be enforced by fear; it naturally follows after evidence, and often it takes, and must take, its evidence at second hand; that is, believe on authority. Every political system must have some creed. If it had none there would be no such persons as political hypocrites. Every religion must have some creed, or it would not be represented by any association or organization. The difference between politics and religion as to creed is, that the former regards only natural men in this world, where evidence is attainable at first hand. The latter regards beings and things above or beyond the senses, of which the evidence, at least for common mortals, is at second hand or resting on authority, and which is often beyond comprehension. To say that one shall believe on authority, without questioning the title of that authority, is to say that one shall not reason, shall not think. One cannot well help thinking sometimes.

I have no quarrel with religion, any more than with the human imagination. Religion, as the term is generally understood, includes a system of morals along with a theory of supersensual beings and a future existence. But really the system of morals cannot be considered as part and parcel of the religion, for the two may be inconsistent or conflictive. Religion, distinctly considered, is one of two things. It is either purely an exercise of the human imagination, or it is a miraculous, supernatural impartation of knowledge, otherwise unattainable by the human faculties. Whichever it is, let the individual freely indulge his imagination or cling to his faith in revelation, and freely declare it, in poetry or prose. If he is sincere, it will do him good and hurt no one else. But if he puts it on paper and with a bludgeon compels another to sign it, that is another matter. Not to go into other religions, but to take the Christian as an example of all, as long as the Christian said, "Believe Jesus is the Christ or you shall be damned in the next world," he was to be tolerated, whatever might be thought of the moral tendency of his doctrine. But when he got political power and began to damn people in this world for not believing it, he became an intolerable nuisance himself. It took a millennium or more of deep woe and degradation to abate him, even tolerably.

Though Christianity professes to be founded on Jesus, there is no evidence that Jesus held its creed, but much to the contrary. Many sayings are attributed to Jesus which he cannot have said. He is said to have commanded his disciples, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." Whether we are to believe he ever said this depends not only upon the character of the man as exhibited in other parts of his brief biography, and the veracity of the writer, but on the question of fact whether he lived after being crucified. This fact is assumed, but by no means proved. I cannot believe it. The most reasonable conclusion seems to me to be, that Jesus never said such a thing, and consequently was not himself a Christian.

Considering that the moral teaching of Jesus was not wholly rejected by the Christian dogmatists, it is conceivable that Christianity may have been useful to mankind, rather than otherwise, while it abstained from wilful falsehood and temporal penalties to compel faith. But this would be due altogether to its moral side, which it has in common with many other religions, and by no means to its dogmatic side.

Both history and observation of human nature teach us that uniformity of faith in the Christian creed as laid down in its studied formulas is simply impossible. Uniformity of belief in regard to natural laws is hardly possible. But when we come to the supernatural, when we undertake conceptions of the infinite, the unbeginning past and the unending future, how is agreement possible? The misfortune of Christianity, or perhaps I ought to say its crime, was, that it did not content itself with other-world penalties for unbelief, but the moment it acquired political power it resorted to temporal penalties. When and where the promise of intolerable evils in the world to come did not command faith, Christianity set itself at work to make this world intolerable. It succeeded wonderfully in the means, but failed in the end. It far worse than failed; for to every mind capable of reasoning at all, the attempt to enforce belief otherwise than by facts and arguments, went to disprove the truth of the Christian creed. Temporal penalties, from the very nature of the human mind, could produce only the semblance of faith, not the substance. For ages and ages, from the days of Constantine to the present day, the semblance has been largely produced; but just in proportion to the prevalence of outside worldly pressure has been the tendency in the minds of the intelligent to accept Christianity only with the lips. And as human reason is always struggling to develop itself, eyes are always open to the stars, and ears to the voices of birds and running waters, what an enormous crop of insincerity has been raised by the ploughing and harrowing of the Christian priesthood with the great political teams at its command! Not only science but common-sense has always been specially opposed to Christianity, not only from the inherent incredibility of its creed, or difficulty of believing it, if you please, but from the propensity of its disciples to inflict temporal penalties for unbelief.

Now political power, under whatever form of government, must necessarily be exercised by men, to say nothing of women, who belong to the intelligent classes,—whose intelligence is above the average. It is the intelligent classes that Christian ecclesiasticism has been training for at least fifteen centuries to insincerity in religion. If this insincerity could be strictly confined to religion, it would damage only the individual himself. But this is impossible. Every man, and especially every intelligent man, is a significant factor in society. He is eminently political. If his religion is insincere, so may we expect his politics to be.

Why, politics is both a science and an art. As a science, it is the science of society, of man as gregarious. As an art, it regards the practical methods of government, which may be divided into two classes: one of which regards men simply as machines, and perhaps totally depraved machines at that, and the other as immaterial personalities, normally capable of harmonious self-government.

Now, it hardly needs to be said that all science, or accumulation of the knowledge of the true relations of things—for the essence of things we are incapable of knowing—rests on absolute sincerity. Of course a man who is capable of stating as a fact what he knows to be false, can add nothing to science, or the common stock of known relations or natural laws. But science enacts more than this. She excommunicates the man who is capable of stating as a fact what he does not know to be a fact; and she even disclaims the man who does not rigidly discriminate between theory and law. She does not assume to visit with the pains and penalties of either this world or the next the exercise of the imagination as disclavive of law, but she sternly excludes it from that function. The sine qua non, the absolutely indispensable qualification of the scientist is, readiness to give up any theory whatever when the facts require it. You may hold it as a theory till then; but if you profess to hold it at all afterwards you are either a blockhead or a scientific hypocrite. Science, if possible, owes less to its hypocrites than religion does. And as it punishes them only with scorn, and never with faggots, it is not much afflicted with them.

Since there is such a thing as political science, it is quite manifest that like all other science it must be founded on sincerity, absolute scientific truthfulness. And if political science, since its birth, whenever that may have been, has discovered and settled anything, whether inductively or deductively, by history, observation, or experiment, it is that man is capable of harmonious self-government. In other words, that the art of governing produces the best results—the happiest development of society—when it proceeds on the theory that man is not a mere machine, but a living personality inhabiting a machine, who, as an average fact, will govern himself, when left to himself, better than he can be governed. Government on this theory deals with exceptional cases, abnormalities; relies on the honesty and competency of the many to live happily and harmoniously, provided they are protected from the greed and disorderly violence of the few. On this theory of the science of government the art of government leaves entirely without law many subjects, which, under the other, are loaded with penal statutes. The difference of proceeding constitutes the difference between political liberty and political vassalage. The form of government has really nothing essential to do with it. Any form is capable of adopting the demonstrated theory of political science, and any form is capable of rejecting it, or in other words, of being run by political hypocrites, who, professing the truth, or at least not denying it, act on the falsehood that the mass of mankind are mere machines to be governed for the benefit of the governors.

It hardly need be said that some of the leading minds who laid the foundations of our independent federal republic accepted the truth of political science and intended the practical government should, as far as possible, proceed according to it. They expected to secure this end by adopting the form most favorable to it. But it still less needs to be said that the success has not been complete. And the question arises, Why? Why have persons exercising a perfectly innocuous liberty of thought, speech, and act, been persecuted by pains and penalties? Why have persons living honestly and industriously, on their own labor, been over-reached, cheated, and ruined by privileged corporations, or the interference of laws professing to protect industry? In saying that it is because our government has been largely run by political hypocrisy, if not the direct and necessary offspring of religious hypocrisy, yet as nearly related to it as a nephew to an uncle, I may be saying what needs proof; and as far as I think your patience will bear it, I will give what I presume to think proof.

There is everywhere throughout Christendom ecclesiastical as well as civil government, whatever ligature may exist between the two. Temporally as well as spiritually the Christian Church, more or less, governs itself, and attempts to govern the outside world. There is nowhere a church having a creed which does not to some extent use temporal or present-world coercion in its governing. It is either a kingdom or a republic of this world as well as of another. And in spite of that great principle of human brotherhood, the Golden Rule adopted from the previous ages and anterior religions, which makes governors servants of the people and not masters, which assumes as the true theory of political science that men are not machines, the practical government of the Church, from the loftiest Catholic to the humblest sect, has proceeded and proceeds mainly on the other theory that they are machines. Not that the practice as well as the preaching of service and self-sacrifice is not to be found in the lower stratum of ecclesiastical government as well as in civil. It is found there largely in both, to the infinite credit of human nature and the overwhelming confirmation of political science. But among the principalities and powers of the Church, nothing is less at home than the Golden Rule. It dwells there only in a restricted sense, as honor does among thieves. Possibly this is a necessity of the case, and that without it ecclesiastical government could not exist. And why might it not as well be allowed to non-exist, provided we could have political government conducted with a good degree of regard to the Golden Rule? What I wish to direct particular attention to, is the hypocrisy by which the Church falls of being governed according to the Golden Rule. This hypocrisy is the fruit not of the Golden Rule, which is not original with the Church, but of the creed, which is. If not the creed itself, the enforcement of it, is the natural and inevitable nurse of the very hypocrisy which always assumes and maintains the government of the Church itself. Do we not here see a reason why hypocrisy has largely invaded and pervaded civil government? Christian morality, as distinct from its creed, is not at fault, but its creed is. In every powerful church in Christendom its creed is held by men capable of reasoning against the dictates of their reason, on the pretence that society would go to wreck if the masses should lose their faith, but truly because, by a confession of their real thoughts, they would forfeit power. But whoever mounts to power on the stepping-stone of a lie, must keep standing on that lie after he gets up; and how can he be depended on not to add other lies to his platform?

It is time now to look at two grand peculiarities of the Christian creed (I mean what is called Orthodox) which make it the nurse of insincerity, especially in this age. These are: 1. The natural depravity of man, or, technically, the dogma of "total depravity." 2. The dogma of atonement for sin by vicarious suffering. The truth of these dogmas rests in no degree on any scientific method of proof, inductive or deductive. They are said to be revealed. But the revelation is a pure assumption; hence so are the dogmas. Granting that the first human pair was created morally pure and virtuous, and fell from that estate, it does not deductively follow that all their descendants must be born totally depraved. And the induction of facts goes everywhere to contradict such a conclusion. Here theology is more irreconcilably at war with modern science than even in the cosmogony of the planet, and with even the Founder of Christianity against it, who admits the maxim that the tree is to be known by its fruit. Theology, when utterly unable to deny the goodness of the fruit, persists in pronouncing the tree bad, till it is regenerated through faith in the atonement. Here is a downright falsehood, in the light of common sense and reason to begin with. Nothing under heaven can be more certain than the character, as good or bad, of certain human actions. For example, suppose a Christian finds an infidel and an enemy in distress, and relieves his wants without asking any remuneration. There can be no dispute that the act is a good one, whether we account for it as a fruit of Christianity, native goodness of heart, or any other motive. Suppose the case reversed, and it is the infidel who relieves the Christian. The character of the act is the same, and as a fact it is fatal to the doctrine of depravity; for from a nature totally corrupt no good action could proceed. Partial depravity nobody denies. But while it is partial, there exists a moral vitality which may grow into a prevailing virtue, of its own force, as society in all ages and countries testifies. A creed so utterly false and contradictory to patent facts as the Christian, in this point, and yet held by men in possession of wealth and power, cannot but make an abundance of hypocrisy. If total depravity were possible to the human race, such a creed would be the thing most likely to bring it about.

If human salvation means anything worth having, it means the acquisition of a noble character, a union of the highest powers with perfect rectitude. Now, self-evidently, this cannot be bestowed from without. It must spring from an effort of the personal, conscious will of the man himself. All the metaphysical hair-splitting of theologians, and tragedies contrived for dramatic effect upon the feelings, cannot change this truth. They can no more create goodness on a subject of total depravity than manure can create corn by being applied to deadly nightshade.

So much for the dogma of total depravity. The dogma of the atonement, or vicarious suffering for sin and imputed righteousness on the condition of faith and repentance, has two sides to it. One may be called the human, and the other the super-human. On the human side it is a mere tragedy, in which an earnest and good man encounters pain and death to benefit his fellow-men, in vindication of the right, and resistance to the wrong. Of its moral force and value there can be no doubt. It is only because the Christian dogma of atonement shows this human side, with all the pathos that poetry and art can give to a tragedy, that it can subsist for a moment in this age of the world without the utter execration of all cultured minds. But on its super-human or divine side, whatever it may have been or may now be to human reason in its twilight, to the reason which begins to read the bible of Nature, with or without glasses, it is sheer blasphemy, derogatory alike to the justice, the moral power, and the intellect of God. That God should insist on one being suffering for the sins of another, makes him a tyrant. That he should be obliged to admit of its being done in order to secure any degree of obedience to his laws, makes him an incompetent. That he should impute the virtue, obedience, or righteousness of one person to another, makes him an idiot. How can blasphemy go any further? Is it any wonder that free human thought denies the existence of such a God? Is it any wonder that before such a creed a man should be willing to be called an atheist? To such an atheist the crucified man, Jesus, may be as dear and precious as Socrates, or Giordano Bruno, or John Howard, or John Brown, while he regards neither of them as a Christ or Lord of Conscience.

An "atheist" may be a very religious man. Perhaps no man was ever more religious than Spinoza, and he was called an atheist. But his religion had absolutely no creed that extended beyond his knowledge,—no creed, either positive or negative in that outside region. Beyond the limits of reason he neither affirmed nor denied. But instead of being really an atheist and having no God, he had more God than any other man. He felt himself immersed in God, as a swimmer is immersed in the ocean. He is called by Novalis the "God-drunken man." Always too near to God to pray. Doubtless there are infidels who have a negative creed, and deny beyond their possibility of knowledge. And this is a bigotry about as unreasonable as any other.

What human society wants above all things is sincerity. Christianity which started with an incredible creed, threatening damnation to unbelievers, however sincere its apostles may have been, had no sooner gained ascendancy over the effete religion which it encountered, than it madly organized itself with instruments of torture to crush out dissent. It not only set itself against theological dissent, but against all scientific thought which happened to contest its dogmas. Modern science was born in spite of it. It had its martyrs,—men who wrote and spoke quietly, let what would come. Their thinking sapped the faith of all men of culture in the old creed. But the government of the Church madly persevered, and does to this day, in anathematizing all who dispute its dogmas, little as it now dares to persecute. Where it cannot browbeat it bribes. But what cape the climax of the infamy is, that Christianity, Catholic as well as Protestant, now claims to have been the nursing mother of science and civilization! We are not indebted to Christianity for the morals of Jesus, which are also the morals of Confucius and of Socrates. We are only indebted to it for the doctrine of eternal damnation in the next world, for the conception of a God without either justice or sense, in other words an immoral God, for the ineffectual faggots and fires of persecution, and, what is probably the worst of all, a dominant brood of political hypocrites.

Now this same Christianity pretends that it is indispensable to human welfare. That without it, virtue, honor, order, government would cease from among men. That its dogmas are all that stand between us and hell upon earth. A Protestant doctor of divinity charging Anthony Froude with having published "an affront to Christendom," says: "Well, Mr. Froude, what are you going to give us in their place? Before we consent to abandon the Rock of Ages, which now underlies all true civilization, and on which rest all the greatness, the goodness, the heroism, the moral beauty, and the social order and well-being of past ages and of the present, we must see something before us besides the quagmire of utter agnosticism, which you are pleased to spread out before us as if you deemed it an abyssum."

Considering the facts, the impudence of this is truly sublime. As if science, with its great departments of astronomy, chemistry, geology, and zoology, born against the will of the "Rock of Ages" represented by the Christian Church, as much as Moses was against that of Pharaoh, had contributed nothing to make the world better than it was when that church had undisputed sway! As if what science has added to our knowledge of force, heat, light, electricity, worlds, animals, men, over what the Bible teaches, is a "quagmire of utter agnosticism"! Pray, what do the Rev. Ray Palmer and the other reverend gnostics who write for the religious press know about God? Nothing whatever which is creditable to Him, unless they have learned it from science. Their tri-personal, theological God is simply an inconceivable monster, clothed with attributes which make him really responsible for all the sin and evil in the world. He is impossible. The men who, being saved by his grace, could be happy looking over into his hell, would be the meanest sinners in his universe. The man who has once opened his eyes to what science has revealed of the world, must have every atom of "greatness, goodness, heroism, and moral beauty" perish out of him before he can believe in such a God. No, no; all the hope of society is in the sincerity of science. It is science that reveals the only effective, ennobling rewards, and the only useful punishments. It is here on earth that one must win heaven, if he would expect it anywhere. And surely there is hell enough to shun here. As old Lucretius says:—

"For all the dismal tales that poets tell
Are verified on earth, and not in hell."

THE SCIENCE OF GOVERNMENT FOUNDED ON NATURAL LAW.

BY HON. CLINTON ROOSEVELT.

The foundation of all science is in the fact established by experience that like causes always must induce like consequences.

The higher law is necessity in the nature of things. Truth consists in the nature of things.

The evidence of truth must be consistency under the higher law necessity, because the witness who contradicts himself or Nature nullifies his own testimony.

The chief good is happiness. The happiness of man results from reason based upon his instincts of self-preservation, as too near a fire we feel the pain of burning and shrink away instinctively; while too far from even source of heat we feel the pain of cold, and then shrink back, and thus discover genial warmth which we consider good as being best adapted to our constitutions to effect long life and happiness.

Vice and folly alike consist in seizing little present pleasures, regardless of the greater good or evil in the future.

The one great law by which the All-wise rules the universe is that from which an intermediate action is produced, all good being made of evil by this law,—one force acting alone invariably producing chaos by accidents and death of being; as in astronomy the counter action of centripetal and centrifugal forces producing the orbital motions of the planets, and in chemistry, which is the science of creation, the poisonous, suffocating gas—chlorine—united with another poison—sodium—produces the healthy salt of our daily food.

As all things in Nature are balanced, the mind of man becomes insane if not balanced in accordance with all nature.

The doctrine of the coexistence in the civilizing order of mankind of a selfish, "carnal mind" and spiritual mind" is based on a sound and universal principle. For as amongst the lower orders of creation there are beasts and birds of prey and poisonous reptiles, so also with the genus homo some are cannibals and lower in moral sense than any other mammal.

There is no truth in the assumption that all mankind have been created either free or equal.

The distinction to be made between civilizing men and men of prey is simply this: the man of prey is purely selfish, and cares not how the man of genius and industry may suffer if he only may enjoy the forbidden fruits of others' toil or ingenuity without yielding in return a just reward for labors of the mind or body.

Whoever will not admit these first principles cannot be held to account as a reasonable being, but must be met upon his own false ground, that might or cunning makes all rights.

Thus with what measure he metes, so may it be measured unto him again. This is the first instinct of the sense of justice. Let us repeat:—

The science of government is founded on natural law.

Laws are known to exist in Nature by the experience of mankind in the uniformity of sequences; and all true science is founded on the fact that like causes always induce like consequences in like circumstances.

The higher law is necessity in the nature of things.

The rule of faith in evidence of truth must be consistency under the higher law; the witness contradicting himself, or the nature of things charging himself with falsehood.

The chief good being happiness.

The highest wisdom possible consists in actions to produce the greatest happiness of all sentient beings possible in the nature of things.

All order in creation from which happiness may be created is the resultant of opposing forces.

All knowledge of the difference between good and evil in creation in mankind is the resultant of fear as the repellant of all causes of pain or premature decay and death on the one part, and hope of life and happiness upon the other, when from any accident or lack of due development of organs all if any subject is not properly presented to the understanding. Hence the mere specialist is generally idiotic or insane.

The affections of mankind are balanced scientifically only when due weight is given to both the social and the selfish instincts.

By natural law no rewards are offered to either indolence or ignorance. Want of all the means of happiness being the result of indolence and superstitious fears, the consequence of ignorance in terrified imaginations.

The pains of superstitions to indolent, cowardly minds, and the pains of hunger, cold, and nakedness, the results of indolence of bodies, are equally necessary to arouse to seek for the true means of happiness. In nature without action, all being dank and cold and still.

It is true in science that if there ever was a time in all eternity when all was dank and cold and still, in chaos the first act of intelligence was the command,

"Let there be light." Light being the result of motions or vibrations of the one omnipresent element by which we discover worlds in spaces infinite, and chemistry the science of creation, we discover the true means of creating something out of nothing, or good out of evil.

While all beyond the reach of man has been created perfect, all within our reach is made improvable by genius and industry. On the other part, all things in nature are created to punish indolence and ignorance, as the offal of cities creates malaria, disease, and death; if let alone produces flowers, fruits, and cereals for the support of life and happiness if transported to the country, and covered in the soil with proper seeds according to the art of agriculture. So also in the country, barren sand must be transported to the barren clay and tempered to overcome sterility; so also in hygiene the medicine which is best to one in the asthenic condition, becomes the worst for him as his constitution changes to the asthenic state; nor is there any one panacea but wisdom in adaptation to conditions.

The true reason why all empirical systems to overcome want and superstition have failed hitherto to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and make peace on earth and good-will to all mankind, is that while in the mind of man, as naturally constituted, there are co-existing two opposing forces termed the selfish and the social instincts, so also certain species of the genus homo are cannibals and lower in the scale of nature than any other mammal. Such civilizing men destroy. But in society termed civilized, an intermediate class exists who hold that might or cunning makes all right, and such unite in clans or corporations to overcome just laws. Hence even in religion's corporations we discover men of prey described as follows by Lord Coke:—

"The Established Church of England is much to be applauded that they always had of their counsel men of the most astute and subtle judgment who, however the legislature might enact laws against them, always found means to circumvent and destroy their force."

They reap that they do not sow, and gather that they do not strew. They are purely selfish, and care not how much others may suffer if they only may enjoy the forbidden fruits of others' toil or ingenuity without yielding in return a just equivalent.

But in the country boasting most of its intelligence and freedom, the worst dispositions of the Old World have been adopted. Its credit systems and contempt of honest industry and genius—from which alone all good on earth must arise if ever,—unjust force and cunning, making nothing but destruction to themselves and the indifferent.

False creeds and false measures of values and falsehoods are all equally destructive. The man holding that heaven is like a corrupt legislature granting monopolies and special privileges to an select and precious few of chief of sinners least any one should boast of his own righteousness, is most inclined to say unto himself, when he has made his calling and election sure by his grimaces and negation of all human reason as mere foolishness, and believing that good morals are disgusting, is naturally led to the belief—since imitation is sincerest worship,—that it is all right to persecute those he holds as non-elect and fitted for destruction for the glory of the God of his diseased imagination.

But Providence provides that when their interests clash they shall be ever ready to destroy each other, as two pairs of lions will not live at peace in the same forest.

The good of beasts and birds and men of prey and poisonous reptiles is to destroy the halt, the lame, and blind, who if preserved perpetuate inferior and indifferent creations, and all such as are suffering from accidents resulting from sheer carelessness of all natural laws. The government and religion of Great Britain is thus shown in poisoning and slaying the old and worn-out Asiatic nations, while it hoards up the plunder of the earth.

But of all the imitations of Great Britain, said Thomas Jefferson, the bank mania is the most threatening. It has raised up a moneyed aristocracy among us which has already set the government at defiance. Nor is this rebellious disposition confined entirely to any party. For there are men of prey in all, and all such seek alike to flourish without any useful social instincts. As ex-Representative Landers, in a speech before a Democratic meeting in Indiana, last Saturday, said: "There is little or no profit to the government in coining gold or silver, because of the cost of the bullion; but paper money is made of an article of but little value. Hence the government or bank issuing it makes a great profit out of it, because they never part with a dollar of it unless they receive one hundred cents in return. Therefore, when these facts are considered, you will readily understand why there is a contest as to who shall issue the paper money."

But the ex representative has told only half the history of paper money; for infidel and Christians who agree upon no other ground, agree in this. Some workmen and some men also of capital without so much as a single thought of any measures to prevent it when in power to tax the multitude, exhort the simple to give them the power and they will show the world what they will do. But said their apostle to Gentiles, while residing at Ferney, Voltaire, here am I living in a way suited to my habits and caring little for to-morrow. For I have a friend, a director in the Bank of France, who writes to me whenever money is to be made in the public funds. Sometimes he writes to me desiring me to sell, because the bank is going to withdraw its notes. At other times he bids me to buy for we are going to issue a quantity of notes. And so through the kindness of my friend I always make money, though living two hundred miles from Paris.

This is a system of indirect taxation without representation, worse in its effects than any other ever yet devised, as it gives an appearance of excessive production and excessive population where neither actually exist. It extends over the whole earth, and makes the Rothschild Jew of the kings rather than king of the Jews; so that now it is difficult to discover the difference in principle between the free-trader in money and free-booter.

To correct this crying wrong a kind of labor bill of exchange and a new monetary system is indispensable. But it can only be established on a scientific order in a society of honest citizens, for the dishonest will never yield up a false system of finance voluntarily.

But in the order of nature a great folly can be met most directly only by a greater folly, since idiots are not open to sound reasons. The cure must be homoeopathic. So also with superstitions; they should be allowed to fight them out amongst themselves without involving the whole commonwealth. Hence the Scotch paper-money banking system has been found hitherto the best,—wherein every director and stockholder is bound to the public equally for every fraud committed by their corporations. Such banks seldom fail. But when the whole government is rotten at the core, there is no possible redress but in revolution. That no worse results have followed than we have experienced in the United States may be esteemed a providential miracle. Why there has not been a civil war in every State individually is the mystery, as great as any other miracle.

But the experience of some men proves that in some cases there are actually direct interpositions of an overruling and benevolent Providence; and the experimental form of the government of the United States of America is an example of the possibility of a vast number of individuals living in one country with the worst principles possible to be conceived rampant; the worst being that men have only to be let alone, to buy cheap and sell dear, and things will regulate themselves; selfishness and avarice being the source of countless vices, while cheapness and dearneess being made by many at the will of the most avaricious and most selfish, and affording no criterion by which to judge of things to nations. The very means pretended to be used in order to protect domestic industry in connection with the American credit system, raising prices in America and throwing her own citizens out of employment to starve while importing excessively and pledging the national securities to pay for balances of trade against America, and thus rendering the people tributary to foreign nations by an enormous pledge of bonds, ready to be thrown back upon the market should the nation's honor require war for its defence. But the projectors of the American system have only one opponent worthy of his opposition; namely, the free-trader, who has bought the votes of tariff-men in Congress on the free-trade principle and sustained free trade in slaves. We are required therefore to begin again at the beginning in order to finish at the end.

Thus endeth the first lesson.

The science of government.

The science of government is the science of motive powers.

Motive powers are of two kinds.

First, metaphysical, as mind, governs matter.

Second, physical, as matter, reacts on mind, sustaining or deranging, as when more or less consistent with all nature, action and reaction being equal between mind and matter, and whereas in physics motive powers act directly as the substance, and inversely as the squares of the distances in space, so also by the law ruling the will of man motives operate, not in direct proportion to the greatness of rewards or punishments, men really believing in everlasting punishment still yielding to the most trifling of temptations present.

Wherefore society should be so organized and conducted as that it shall be to the direct self-interest of every individual to act in accordance with the greater interests of all; as in an army in action every blow the soldier strikes is as much to the benefit of the whole army of which he is a member as to his own self-interest. In the mean time each has his own pay and share of spoils to use as best may suit himself without injury to others. And this is a grand desideratum.

The cause of every evil being want, all the wants of man must be supplied in that order in which wants arise in nature.

The first want of man is for subsistence. The acquisition of property by industry and genius invites aggression from the careless and necessitous and beasts of prey in human form; wherefore, the second want of man is for defence.

When men are secured in their possessions the third want of man is for refinement and true glory, if benevolent.

The means of subsistence first are, agriculture manufactures, commerce.

The means of defence are, war, jurisprudence, hygiene.

Third. The means of refinement and true glory are education in physics, metaphysics, politics.

It should be understood that almost every man has his peculiar excellences and defects, so that the defects of each naturally tend to union and coöperation for the greater good of all.

Officers should be chosen at first from those who have shown hitherto the most proficiency in every art and science, by those versed in the arts and sciences required to be practised.

In general officers should be chosen only for the lower grades, and thereafter rise by degrees, as in the army and navy now is practised, and thus learn the art and science of government as other arts and sciences are taught and practised.

When officers have passed through all the grades they should retire to a high court for the correction of errors and trial of impeachments, and there serve until disqualified by age or resignation.

In cases of unfitness for positions, any citizen should have leave to make application for some other place to which he or his friends might imagine him better qualified.

In cases of crime or misdemeanor, any citizen should be impeached and tried, and if convicted, punished, on his own principles. In crimes against the person by corporal punishment, and in crimes against property, the thief or robber should be forced to labor as a slave for the party injured until his earnings shall remunerate the party robbed.

The first principle of justice should be taught by punishment that with what measure one may mete, so shall it be measured unto him again; and all rewards and punishments should be immediate and certain to result.

By the division of labor experience has proved that the result may be increased a thousand-fold above the fruits of all lonely, selfish labors; and selfishness and that necessity which knows no law may thus be overcome,—the hungry being fed, and naked clothed, good will to all may result, and an esprit du corps created as an artificial virtue.

REPLY TO "ORTHODOX."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I am moved to say a word or two in reply to the very candid and suggestive remarks of "Orthodox," in your paper of August 29.

The first remarkable thing about his article seems to be the series of very frank admissions, relinquishing much that his clerical brethren commonly insist upon as positively certain, and also sufficient as a basis for the demonstration of their body of doctrine. But the real wonder is that so few among the ranks of the Orthodox have shown equal candor, and (if he had given his name I should have added) equal boldness. For the frank utterance of such concessions among his own people would certainly have brought upon him as much persecution from the Church as the State now permits it to exercise.

The concessions to which I refer are the following, which I find in various parts of the article entitled—"WANTED—WHAT?"

"This faith [the Orthodox] is not now proving itself true by power such as it once had."

"We who still uphold the Orthodox Christian faith have decried reason as carnal, when we should have been seeking its aid."

"Men will think and study, and will apply their thought and study to religion as to all else. That is the existing fact, and it is a fact which we Orthodox are not prepared to encounter. It has been our fearful blunder to make 'freethinking' a term of reproach."

"How [are wanderers to be brought back to the fold] unless we can convince them that our religion is rational? But the sad truth is that at present we do not and cannot present it in that light."

"There is no evidence that the books of the Bible were written by men infallibly inspired, or inspired at all. They are mostly anonymous, and the unknown writers did not even profess themselves inspired, or intimate that they wrote under unusual conditions. Even as human compositions—not a few bear more than the customary marks of human limitation, ignorance, and error."

"Again, the doctrine of vicarious atonement is indeed absurd; a rational vindication of it, if it is looked at directly and considered simply in itself, is impossible."

These are the concessions which, frankly made by "Orthodox," make it seem strange to me that he should continue to hold as absolutely certain those points of the Orthodox system which his clerical brethren hold because (as they say) the arguments which "Orthodox" has abandoned as unsound are not only sound, but sufficient as a demonstration of the truth of their system.

Before going further, it seems fair to give "Orthodox" an idea of my stand-point. I am not an infidel, but a believer. I believe in God, in immortality, in inspiration, in duty, in responsibility, and in retribution. The degree in which I accept the doctrine called "Evolution" does not in the least interfere with my acceptance of the above ideas. And I accept these, not as demonstrated truths, but because they seem to me the most natural and probable of all the suppositions that can be made regarding those matters. Thus I am at rest upon the important points in question. Far more at rest than when I blindly accepted the whole doctrine of the Orthodox Church. Sundry points of that doctrine I gave up, by slow degrees, because examination assured me that truth and reason were against them. I do not understand how you can continue to hold so much, after giving up so much. And I will now touch upon some points in your defence which seem to me either unsound, or at least as having far less force than you ascribe to them.

When you say of Christianity that "it proved itself true by bringing newness of life to a death-stricken world," and when you say just afterwards that we "cannot doubt the moral resurrection of the ancient world at the call of the Christian gospel," you seem to me extravagantly to overstate the matter. The ancient world was not death-stricken, but passing through the slow process of education from wrong to right, from error to truth, from evil to good, just as we have all been going on ever since. Great and good teachers in various nations had preceded Jesus by centuries of years, teaching substantially a morality not unlike his, and pointing men, as he did, to a Heavenly Father who was to be revered and obeyed. You will ask me whether present results among their living followers bear honorable testimony to the teachings of Confucius, Sakya-muni, Zarathustra, and the rest. I ask you in return, What one nation of all that call themselves "Christian" nations can be cited as being, in its government, its manners and customs at home, or its influence upon the nations with which it has commercial or other intercourse abroad, a true representative of the method of living which Jesus taught? Nay, more: What one of the sects calling itself Christian, either the Roman, the Greek, or the scores of Protestant sects, can show more than a small percentage of those who bear its name, who are justly entitled, by its own standards, to the full credit of the Christian name?

To give an instance: Jesus was announced by angels (according to the legend) as intending to bring peace on earth; and his followers still call him "The Prince of Peace." In spite of this, most of the wars that have been waged since his time have been provoked and declared by governments called Christian, advocated and consecrated by a clergy called Christian, and actually fought by people called Christian. Do any practices of Chinese or Indians or Persians depart further from the teachings of their masters than this?

The fact is, as I believe, that civilization is to be credited with a great deal which is ordinarily ascribed to Christianity. But their combined achievements do not afford much cause for boasting. The intelligent people who visit us from foreign lands, as from China and Japan, are surprised, and very justly surprised, that, with such instructions and opportunities, we are not better.

Christianity, I think, has had comparatively little influence on the world. The peoples called Christian have had a good deal of influence, and have for the most part used it very ill. Nevertheless, the professional and paid advocates of Christianity, by assuming civilization to be its child and product, have succeeded in making out a plausible case to those who accept their assertion as fact.

But you further suggest, as if the question were unanswerable, "Consider the power of the Bible in history. How do you account for this effect?" I answer, Very easily, by natural causes. In the first place, there is a great deal of merit in the Bible, both Old and New Testaments. However mixed with incredible legend, superstition, and triviality, and however proved unhistorical by a comparison of its parts with each other and with other contemporaneous literature, it yet contains the best information we have in regard to the origin and progress of two great religions, details of the words, actions, and character of some of the most remarkable men that have ever lived, and a body of moral and religious precepts superior, on the whole, to those found in the sacred writings of other nations.

But there is another cause, far more effective than the one just mentioned, for such acceptance and such influence as the Bible has attained; namely, the fact that for twelve hundred years, more or less, an order of men established as authoritative religious teachers of the people, and generally in alliance with the State governments, have been periodically declaring to the people that they must receive and believe what this book contains, under penalty of damnation. Thus, among the peoples called Christian, the Bible has always received a certain lip-reverence, and a tacit allowance of its right to their allegiance, even by persons whose lives are passed in general violation of its letter as well as its spirit.

The "power" which "Orthodox" claims for the early gospel, when confronted with fact, reduces itself to this: the conversion of a few thousands in the few years next following the death of Jesus; and of a few hundred thousands in the centuries preceding the reign of Constantine; and then, when the Church became allied with the State, the corruption of the system increased with the increase of its professors, so that in no long time the reform by Mohammed, in favor of the unity of God, was needed as much by the Christians as by the heathen polytheists of Arabia.

Even this amount of the diffusion of Christianity in a few hundred years, in opposition to existing religions, implies a good deal of power; and "Orthodox" asks, in a tone very like that of the prevaricating brethren whose faults he has been exposing, "Was such power in a lie?" By no means. The power was in the truth, taught by people who sincerely believed it true, and operating successfully to this extent in spite of the mass of error mixed with it.

But what puzzles me is that while vindicating "freethinking," and insisting, with the rationalist, that "reason" must help us to work out the problems of religion, "Orthodox" should still hold to the "absurd" doctrine of vicarious atonement, and to the monstrous doctrine of everlasting perdition, just as those of his clerical brethren do who still depend, as the sufficient basis of their conviction, upon the grounds which he has abandoned as insufficient. Perhaps he will enlighten us further upon that matter.

CONTEMPLATION OF DEATH.

[Arranged from fragments of MS. found in the portmanteau of a young traveller who died suddenly at a wayside inn in Idaho, in the year 1850.]

When toward me bends the shade of death,
And friends deplore my waning breath,
Let woman, flushed in vernal charms,
Support me in her tender arms,
And kindly let her bosom swell
For one who loved her sex too well.

And when the solemn change has come,
Should sorrow hold my angel dumb,
And dim her eyes with humid veil,
And fix them on my features pale,
My spirit, raised on wing to go,
Will hover o'er her breast of snow,
And on her saddened lips impress
The seal of love's farewell caress.
Then, if a tear-drop chance to roll
Adown her cheek, my flying soul
Will snatch the gem,—for earth too bright,—
And bear it to the realms of light;
Nor there the sparkling pledge resign,
But hoard it as a thing divine,
And smile to see its feeble ray
Blend with thy beams, Eternity!

And now, dear spirit, gently press
Those lids that claim thy tenderness,
And hide those faded orbs of blue
That oft in rapture rolled on you,
And through the silent hours of night
Cradled your image in their light.
Now let thy loving fingers close
Those lips above their ivory rows,
And think, while you the task fulfil,
How oft thine own have made them thrill;
How oft, with youthful passion warm,
Their kisses told my heart's alarm.
Enough; retire, forever blest;
Let meaner hands perform the rest.

Next, let nor clown nor knave presume
To bear my relics to the tomb;
Let bards and sages, men of mind,
Convey it thence with bosoms kind,
And think, along the solemn way,
"We bear a brother's weight to-day,"
Let no grim priest of narrow view
My spirit's mystic flight pursue,
And o'er my corpse his terrors sound
To awe his trembling dupes around,
And stupidly profane the end
Of slandered Truth's devoted friend.

Now place me in my rayless bed,
And carve these lines above my head:

"This simple mound conceals from sight
A brother of poetic light.
His heart was Love's volcanic throne,
Love, the sole king he e'er would own;
All men of every hue of skin
He reckoned as his nearest kin;
He looked where'er oppression trod,
And felt the inward flash of God,
And prayed with an immortal hope
For Freedom's universal scope.
Titles and power by outrage won,
And handed down from sire to son,
He ever held in utter scorn,
And honored most the lowly born.
His follies, oh, the vast amount!—
Forgive them ere you stop to count,
And let oblivion's velvet pall
In charity conceal them all.

"Inquirest thou the poet's creed?
'Twas brief, but served his utmost need:
'Truth is divine wherever found,
On Christian or on Pagan ground;
Engraven on the hearts of men
Are God's commandments, more than ten;
The universe his laws proclaim,
To learn them be my constant aim;
Goodness and mercy, holy these
In Jesus or in Socrates;
The glory of an earthly span
Is service to our fellow-man.'
'Twas thus with chastened heart he thought,
Nor cared what theologians taught;
And if he erred to an excess
In not believing more, or less,
Ye who accuse, depart in fear,
And spare his bones your censure here.
If your own merits far excel
The poet's troubled life, 'tis well.
If in a truer light you live,
Go! learn to pity and forgive."

The Index.

BOSTON, SEPT. 12, 1878.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N.B.—The following resolution was adopted by the National Liberal League, at Philadelphia, July 3, 1878: "Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management."

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

F. R. A. REPORT.

The Eleventh Annual Report of the Free Religious Association, printed in pamphlet form, is now ready for distribution. It contains the reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer; essay by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., of New York, on "The Religion of Humanity, and How it may be Organized"; essay by Rev. W. H. Spencer, of Haverhill, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism, and How it is being Disorganized"; and addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George W. Curtis, Anna C. Garlin, Maurice Ellinger, and Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith (the latter including a poem).

Members of the Association who have paid the annual fee of $1.00 within the last twelve months will receive the report free, in all cases where their post-office addresses are known. To others the price is forty cents single copy; four or more in one package, twenty-five cents each.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

A CONVENTION of clergymen and others was held at San Francisco, August 26, in favor of securing a State Constitutional provision for the "religious observance of the Sabbath."

MR. EMERSON'S lecture on the "Fortune of the Republic," delivered in the Old South Church last March, has been published by Houghton, Osgood & Co., and will be read with as much interest as it was heard with delight.

NOW AND THEN a brave, intelligent, and conscientious clergyman follows out his thought unflinchingly, even to the sacrifice of his profession. The Canadian papers of September 2 state that "Rev. John R. Jones, pastor of Christ Church, Belleville, in the Province of Ontario, published his resignation Saturday, saying that he had come to the conclusion that the teachings of science, and not those of the Church, are true." Mr. Jones perceives the true issue; science is itself Antichrist and the maker of Antichrists.

THE National Reformer of July 28 had this among its "Rough Notes": "The correspondence in the Manchester Examiner on our recent lectures at Manchester still continues. The Rev. E. C. Towne, presumably a Nonconformist, writes: 'I was extremely desirous to leave my own service the other morning to attend Mr. Bradlaugh's lecture on what he calls "Atheism." Had I been able to do so, and liberty to speak given me, I should have maintained four propositions against Mr. Bradlaugh: 1st. That he does not know what Christianity is. 2d. That he does not know what Theism is. 3d. That he does not know what Atheism is. And 4th. That he is not an Atheist. Of course, by "does not know" I mean does not take a view of these things which can be proved by free and sound learning and thought to be the true view.' We have not the pleasure of any acquaintance with Mr. Towne, but are inclined to think that there would be no great difficulty in even now affording the reverend gentleman a full opportunity for maintaining his four propositions. Can our Manchester friends tell us anything of Mr. Towne?"

MAJORITIES IN RELIGION.

The present Constitution of California contains the following just and admirable provisions:—

"The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be allowed in this State; and no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness or justify practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the State."

This may be properly considered the characteristic American doctrine on the subject of religious liberty, though several of the States fail to carry it out so faithfully as to permit atheists to give testimony in the courts. Stated in other words, the American principle is that religious belief is purely an individual affair, and should be entirely beyond the cognizance of the State unless it leads to overt acts against the rights of other individuals or the public peace. All that the National Liberal League aims to secure, in agitating for the "Total Separation of Church and State," is the application of this principle to certain cases in which the European theory of the "Union of Church and State," supposed erroneously to have been wholly discarded here, still causes the retention of practices which really establish a State Religion to that extent. These practices are mere survivals of the European theory, which is obsolescent rather than obsolete. The entire tendency of American civilization, the obvious demand of its underlying political principles, the logical continuance of the process by which a vast secular republic, grounded on the recognition of equal individual rights among all its citizens, has been evolved on this continent out of preëxistent sectarian commonwealths, alike require the removal of those anomalies in our political system; and it can hardly be doubted that in the end they will necessarily disappear. Either that, or else the whole course of national development will be reversed, and the secular Constitution under which we now live will be finally undermined by ecclesiastical bigotry and ambition. The National Liberal League is nothing but the nobler destiny of the republic struggling into self-consciousness in the minds of its citizens.

The American doctrine, then, is that the State, as such, has nothing to do with religious opinions, bodies, or institutions, but must treat all these as the private affairs of individuals. This is not to oppose them; it is simply to ignore them. The State has its own positive destiny and duty, deals solely with the secular interests of the people, and declines to assume any responsibility for any other interests they may have. Its secular policy is no more atheistic than it is theistic; to accuse it of atheism is irrational or perverse. Such a public policy is the only possible means of securing to all individuals their private religious rights, and emancipating them from the hard necessity of being taxed for the support of religious opinions not their own. The right of the majority to control the action of the State in all secular matters does not extend to the sphere of religious belief or worship; the right of each individual in this sphere is complete and wholly reserved, just so long as he forbears to overstep the limit himself by trespassing on his neighbor's equal right. In other words, majorities in political questions, from the nature of the case, possess the right of directing public action; in religious questions they possess no rights at all, for the reason that religious questions do not come within the province of the State. This, at least, is the American doctrine; and if it is set aside, the only alternative doctrine is that of the Catholic Church.

THE INDEX quotes at length some recent comments of ours on the incapacity of unbelief to beget generosity or self-sacrifice, or to unite its adherents into effective organizations, and adds:—

"Is it really true that the liberals, as a great class in the community, are incapable of forgetting themselves sufficiently to enter into combined action in behalf of their own common principles—in capable of that generous self-devotion and public-spirited coöperation in a great cause which are the loftiest traits of humanity? . . . We do not know how to answer these questions. What we do know is that the Christian party display that 'capacity for organization and for self-sacrifice' which the Christian Statesman claims for them, and which gives to them the easily maintained control of all public affairs. The Christians govern the liberals; and the latter either do not know the fact or are indifferent to it. The National Liberal League aims to emancipate the liberals from this political and social subjection; yet they take comparatively slight interest in the matter, and wear the yoke of their masters without manifesting any 'noble discontent' with their own serfdom. Such a phenomenon perplexes and confounds us. We do not know how to explain it. Is the explanation of the Christian Statesman the true one?"

We are not willing even to quote in our columns, without protest, the affirmation contained in the above quotation from THE INDEX that Christians maintain over liberals a "political and social subjection," or that the maintenance of a Christian government, in a land where the people are preëminently Christian, is inconsistent with the principles of liberty and a violation of the rights of the minority. So long as men differ in opinions, it will be impossible to shape social institutions in accordance with the preferences of all. Those who find themselves in the minority must rest content with the rejection of their schemes so long as no attempt is made to punish them for disagreeing with their fellow-citizens, or to force them to profess different opinions. For example, a portion of our citizens believe that war is always, and in its own nature, sinful. The nation, however, believes that war is sometimes necessary, and so maintains a military establishment, and taxes all the people for its support. The Constitution makes the President Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy, and requires of him certain military functions, so that no Quaker can consistently accept the office. No wrong or injustice is thereby done to the members of the Society of Friends. They are left free to hold and to disseminate their views, and to convert the whole nation if possible to their opinions. And they leave the nation free to act on its convictions. Never in our history have they complained that the maintenance of an army, by taxes which they bear in common with others, is a violation of their liberties and rights. So if the majority of a people believe that there is a God who is the Author, Preserver, and Judge of nations, that he has given the government of the world into the hand of his Son, Jesus Christ, and that his will revealed in the Holy Scriptures is supreme law for nations, by what right does a minority of unbelievers prohibit the nation from acting in accordance with these convictions? The secular programme is not neutral ground on which these two parties may fairly compromise their differences, for it is simply a proposal that, inasmuch as the being of God and the accountability of nations to him are disputed, the nation shall act meanwhile as if there were no God. It proposes that, pending the controversy over the truth of religion, God and religion shall be ignored by the government; in other words, that the atheistic scheme of government shall be adopted by the nation before atheism is accepted by the majority of the people. A more unfair, and we may add impudent, proposal falls not within the memory of living men.

Here we see the natural consequences of the assumption that political majorities have the right to settle religious questions. The Statesman holds that "the maintenance of a Christian government" is entirely consistent with the "principles of liberty" and the "rights of the minority,"—that the majority have a right to recognize by law the sovereignty of God, the authority of Jesus Christ as his viceroy, and the authority of the Bible as his "supreme law for nations," and to administer the government accordingly. What follows? That no public officer should be appointed, and no citizen should be allowed to vote, who rejects these doctrines; since it would be absurd to commit the direction of a "Christian government" into any but "Christian" hands. To stop short of these inevitable logical consequences of the theory,—to pretend that a Christian majority which should make Christianity a part of the fundamental law of the land could or would forbear to punish dissidents by disfranchisement and disqualification for office,—is to insult public intelligence. Make the government Christian, and you cannot help making the governors Christians.

What surprises us in this whole matter is that the Statesman, a really able journal, should not perceive that it in fact adopts the Roman Catholic theory of Church and State, and leaves itself not an inch of standing-ground to oppose the establishment of Romanism as the State Religion, if ever the Romanists become the majority. We put this question directly to the Statesman: "On what ground would you deny the right of the Catholics, on becoming the majority, to make Catholicism the State Religion and to administer the government accordingly? Would you concede the right of the majority, in such a case as that, to treat you as you would now treat freethinkers? And if not, 'by what right' would you Protestants, a 'minority of unbelievers' if judged by the Catholic standard, 'prohibit the nation from acting in accordance with these [Catholic] convictions'?"

We beg the favor of a full and frank answer to these queries.

The case of the Quakers is not in point. The question of "maintaining a military establishment" is not a religious question at all, nor does the majority now decide it as a religious question; they decide it as purely a secular question, and on this ground alone expect Quakers to acquiesce in their decision. The State acts strictly within its own province, and deals with secular affairs by its own positive secular standard. It claims no jurisdiction over religious belief as such, but simply maintains its own right to provide for its own existence and safety by efficient self-defence against its enemies. That is all. What we insist upon is the positive character of the secular conception of government; what we deny is the right of the Church, or of any majority of religionists, to interfere with its positive secular functions. It is at this point that the assumed parallelism totally fails. To establish a "Christian government" is to overthrow the State's right to manage its own secular affairs by secular principles, and to establish a theocracy (no matter how cunningly disguised) upon its ruins. The State is for all, not for a "Christian" or "Infidel" majority; and to conduct its own business irrespective both of "Christianity" and of "Infidelity" is simply equal justice to both. To maintain the contrary is to accept the theory of government by which the Catholic Church annexes the State to itself as a mere adjunct and dependent of the Papacy; and we confess to no little curiosity to learn how the Statesman would try to evade this self-evident corollary from its own argument. Shall this curiosity be gratified?

THE ATONEMENT A BAIT FOR CRIME.

The Christian Church is standing aghast at the successive appearance of prominent defaulters within her sacred enclosure. The Winslows, the Taffes, the Gilmans, the Chaces, and the Tappans, whose crimes have affrighted the community with a sickening feeling of distrust, and whose fraudulent dealings have occasioned so much suffering, are men whose names have been synonyms of sterling Orthodoxy, and who have for years labored to "bring souls to Christ." One of the above-mentioned criminals, for example, was a contributor to Zion's Herald, and has written in the most bitter personal invective against the "blasphemous INDEX" and its honorable editor, Mr. Abbot. Another was most successful in conducting revivals. A third was an exemplary Sunday-school superintendent and cared for the "lamb of the fold"; while the fourth was regarded as a shining light and noble defender of the faith in the church wherein he made himself conspicuous. The list might be enlarged, but this suffices. Now how shall we account for this increasing scandal in the Church, which is justly leading men to exclaim: "Give us the morality of infidels rather than the immorality of Christians?" Shall we say of these men that they were all thorough hypocrites?

In some instances this would seem to be true. But there is probably a better explanation. It is hard to believe that some, at least, of these defaulters, whom men pronounce pleasant friends and kind neighbors in private life, are such double-faced knaves as to pray and exhort in public, while all the time laughing in their sleeves at their pious dupes, and lining their pockets with ill-gotten gains. No doubt there are such hypocrites, even among those few whose names have been already mentioned; but they cannot all be so depraved.

Another explanation of their conduct may be found in the very doctrinal system which they profess. The Orthodox Church teaches that the Son of God made atonement for man's sins. If the sinner only "believes on him" his sins are forgiven, his "debt is paid," and his salvation is sure; for there is no chance of his being "plucked from his Father's hand." After conversion, therefore, the future defaulter walks the street with the proud consciousness that he is one of the elect; it is "well with his soul"; he has "made his peace with God"; if he sins he has only to whisper a prayer to Jesus, and it will be forgiven him. At first, with the warm gush of emotion excited by his religious profession, his conscience may be tender. He then confesses his slightest "wandering from his Master." Gradually the emotion passes away. He still retains, however, the belief that Jesus has paid his debt for him, and that, however far he may "stray into by and forbidden paths," he is yet certain of coming out all right, for he has been accepted of God. What now is the motive to induce him to lead a thoroughly noble life? He believes in heaven and hell, but now no longer fears the latter since he is sure of the former. He has no great incentive to build up for himself a character upon whose substantial principles he may stand with a pardonable exultation of success, because he is taught that this would be not his doing, but another's; that his own righteousness is but filthy rags; that he is a worm of the dust; that if he does a good action it is because God prompted it; that he is "nothing"; "clad only in the robe of Christ's righteousness"! The only strong inducement left for him to strive ardently to lead a pure life would seem to be gratitude to the person who thus had saved him and made him "something" by proxy. The mere feeling of gratitude, however, is not one which in the roar and rush of this busy life can ordinarily be of long duration. Accordingly, as this sentiment becomes enfeebled, the Christian, even when entering upon a course of known transgression, may still continue in it, finding some palliation with which to drug his conscience, and all the while promising himself and Jesus to have a fair understanding about the matter soon. None are then so strenuous about doctrine as he. No one sings with more fervor than the defaulter—

"Jesus paid it all,
All the debt I owe."

Heaven is secure to him, he fancies, because he has once repented and "believed on Christ." That was the "one thing needful." These present transgressions are perhaps grieving Jesus; but then Jesus loves him, will pardon him at any moment; and must meanwhile appreciate his services as Sunday-school superintendent or defender of the faith.

It is this underlying consciousness of indubitable safety which induces moral laxity on the part of so many Christians. With them the great duty is belief on Christ, acceptance of him as Savior and Master. This having been fulfilled they sing:—

"'Tis done, the great transaction's done;
I am the Lord's, and he is mine";

whereas a life of blameless, upright conduct should be the "great transaction" to be "done" only when the last breath is drawn. Here, then, in the doctrine of substituted righteousness, is the fatal weakness in the Christian system. Commencing with the precept that man is doomed to eternal woe unless he believes on Christ, and ending with the declaration that having believed he is forever saved, what can be more natural than the conclusion (not avowed so much as felt) that his life subsequent to his conversion is of comparatively little importance? There is a nobler faith than this. It teaches man to no longer grovel in the dust, but to stand erect. It assures him that he has within him all that is needful to lift him to heights of moral sublimity and usefulness. It bids him to no longer weakly depend upon some imagined Jesus near him, whose love and forgiveness he can tamper with, much as a child will see how far he can venture to disobey its parent, but rather to rely upon himself, feeling that his work depends upon his own individual character, unaffected by the death of Jesus, the blood of Calvary, or the belief of dogmas, but established only by the reiterated choice of good rather than evil.

THE WATKINS CONVENTION.

This noteworthy occasion, which has been to a very considerable number of radicals the great prospective event of the season, and looked forward to with a fervid anticipation, if not impatience, akin to that a Mohammedan feels in view of a journey to Mecca, a Jew to Jerusalem, or a New England Christian to the Boston anniversaries, is now a thing of the past. Most happily chosen and beautiful for situation, in its natural surroundings, was the spot of this assembling of American rationalism. Its projector, and the person to whom, more than to any other, it was indebted for the measure of success which attended it, was Mr. H. L. Green, of Salamanca, N.Y., whose zeal and energy in this kind of good work merit great praise.

It occupied four whole days of three sessions each, and though the attendance was somewhat less than was expected, it averaged, probably, five or six hundred at each session,—a sufficient number to be considered very satisfactory. Some of the meetings were held in a pleasant and well-shaded grove; others in convenient halls of the place.

The Convention was called to order on Thursday morning, Aug. 22, by Dr. T. L. Brown, President of the Freethinkers' Association of Western New York, who delivered the opening address. The theme was a very appropriate introductory one. It was an uncompromising and forcible defence of free thought as the all-sufficient and only safe dependence for the welfare and happiness both of society and the individual. Interesting and able addresses, followed by short speeches at the close, filled up the other sessions.

Among the most notable of the participants were Dr. J. M. Peebles, Rev. T. B. Taylor, Hon. Geo. M. Julian, James Parton, Horace Seaver, Rev. A. E. Copeland, D. M. Bennett, T. B. Wakeman, Giles B. Stebbins, G. L. Henderson, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Matilda Joselyn Gage, Rev. W. B. Bell, Mrs. Laura Kendrick, Hon. Elizur Wright. The Rev. Mr. Abby, a clergyman of Watkins, and one or two others, moved by the free spirit of the occasion, were induced to attempt to controvert the principles of the Convention, and were granted a respectful hearing and courteously answered.

The sessions were enlivened by inspiring music, including the charming melodies of the famous Hutchinsons, Prof. Hudson, and other accomplished vocalists. Pleasant excursions to the Glen and on the Lake, and other points of interest, which Nature, at Watkins, offers for the entertainment of the visitor in great variety and number, served as restful interludes to the graver employment of the gliding hours.

The only unpleasant occurrence in connection with this interesting gathering that we have to record was the arrest of D. M. Bennett, editor of the Truth-Seeker, W. S. Bell, and Miss Josephine Tilton, on the charge of vending obscene publications.

While we sympathize deeply with these persons in the annoyance and sense of injury which they are thus made to experience (believing, as we are inclined to, in the purity of their motives), we frankly confess we question the wisdom of their course, and whether there is not equally good service that they may do their day and generation without exposure to such disagreeable consequences, or entailing upon themselves and the cause they represent so foul imputation and suspicion. Believe us, dear friends, you are recklessly expending your valuable energies, and needlessly soiling your good name.

A series of fifteen resolutions were drawn up and presented to the Convention by Mr. G. L. Henderson, which were adopted. Among the points upon which special stress was laid were the following: Condemnation of the sentence of E. H. Heywood; also of the arrests just mentioned, and the right of opening the mails delegated to Anthony Comstock; sympathy with the laboring classes, woman suffrage, with Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Annie Besant for "the noble stand taken" "in favor of the emancipation of the common people from theology," and to "advance sexual purity."

The following resolution we regard as one of the wisest and most important in its suggestions: "We urge upon all liberals the duty of organization in every city, town, and village, so that a general coöperation of all for general liberal, or, if need be, political purposes may be had; and also for the reason that it is evident that liberalism is no longer simply negative, but constructive, and that it has social, educational, and political duties that require every emancipated man and woman to become a member of some liberal society."

The Liberal League and the liberal press were also cordially commended in the resolutions.

The committee on arrangements for the next annual session consists of Horace Seaver, G. L. Henderson, J. M. Peebles, D. M. Bennett, H. L. Green, Mrs. L. K. Coleman, Mrs. Amy Post, Mrs. Laura Kendrick, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Mrs. and Mr. F. W. Titus, and President T. L. Brown, M.D. At a subsequent meeting of the Business Committee, the Association was enlarged so as to embrace the whole State, and the officers of last year were reelected.

It was voted to hold the next meeting at Watkins.

The Convention may be regarded as significant of the growing disposition of radicals to make less account of their differences, and to emphasize more their points of agreement; to thaw out of their individual isolations into warmer sympathy and more cordial association with their fellow-workers; and to realize that in "unity there is strength." There are few who possess in a high degree mental equilibrium who are capable of recognizing all the considerations essential to a sound conclusion.

Rev. O. B. Frothingham has been summering at Manchester, Mass., where he has had for neighbors Rev. Dr. Bartol, James T. Fields, and the like select fellowship.

Louis Prang, a generous friend of THE INDEX, whose chromo-lithographs and various products of beauty and artistic taste have made him famous, has gone abroad for a short vacation.

The friends and neighbors of Mrs. Mary A. Livermore gave her a public "welcome home" from Europe, a few evenings since, at Melrose, Mass., where she has resided for the last ten years.

The Catholic Total Abstinence Union received, amid "great enthusiasm," at its late session, at Indianapolis, the "apostolic benediction" from Pope Leo XIII. What more does it need for its felicity?

Col. T. W. Higginson and Mrs. Mary W. Livermore were both attracted to Mr. Conway's South Place Chapel, on their visit to London, where each addressed, on different Sundays, large and deeply interested audiences.

Miss Amanda Deyo, of Salt Point, Dutchess Co., N.Y., is a new lecturer upon peace, temperance, and woman suffrage. She draws large audiences, and is highly commended by the local papers of New York and Pennsylvania, where she has spoken.

One of the latest suggestions of philanthropy is lunch-closets in schools, as a special provision for poor and underfed children. It is doubtless a good one. It is the first requisite to mental and moral vigor that the creature comforts should be cared for.

A school for art needle-work is one of the newest educational enterprises in this city. Similar schools already exist in Europe, from which the idea is borrowed. It is thought it will do much to advance the progress of decorative art in this country, beside opening a profitable occupation to woman.

Fra Bartolomeo, "the painter of devotion," as he was called, was induced by Savonarola to renounce his profession and burn up his pictures, because of the supposed perilous influence of such interests to his soul's salvation. After the martyrdom of Savonarola he entered the convent of San Marco.

The semi-annual Convention of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists were to hold a four days' session at Luce's Hall, Grand Rapids, beginning Thursday morning, Aug. 29th, ult. The programme provides for three meetings each day, and appears well planned and attractive. The increasing number of such gatherings is an encouraging sign of the times.

Lucretia Mott, now in the eighty-fifth year of her age, lent interest to the recent Woman's Suffrage Convention at Rochester, N.Y., by her benignant presence and sympathetic greeting from its platform. It is now upwards of fifty years since her voice was first heard in an anti-slavery meeting, and in her advanced years she still retains unabated zeal in the same great principles of humanity and freedom in their application to the reform of the day.

There have been for the last twenty-five years Sunday meetings of freethinkers, for free discussion, at Hoptallier Hall in this city. As the building is about to be converted to business purposes, the last of these meetings at this place was held last Sunday. They will not, however, be abandoned, but continued at new Hoptallier Hall, Odd Fellows building, corner of Washington and Kneeland Streets. Such meetings are certainly a more profitable use of Sunday than the misuse that is often made of it in the name of piety. If properly conducted they must afford in no small degree a mental and moral stimulus.

The Hon. Carroll Wright made some very sensible remarks before the Congressional Labor Committee the other day. This is his view of some of the unemployed who herd in our large cities: "There is a class in all large cities who, even if you stocked farms and presented them to them, would not occupy them, provided they had to till the soil. They want what they call 'society,' and they will have it at all hazards." Contrary to the common notion of unthinking people, he maintains that machinery tends to the improvement of the laborer's condition as well as the general welfare: "The condition of the workmen has been much improved by machinery. If all machinery were stopped and the work done by manual labor, the whole wealth of Massachusetts would be eaten up in less than a year, and the condition of the people would be as bad as that of the Chinese or the people of the East Indies. It would take four thousand horses and four hundred thousand men to do the work; and the work now done for $20,000,000 would cost $400,000,000. Machinery enables a much larger number to subsist on a smaller area than they possibly could subsist on without it." He did not believe the population of the world would become so dense as that even with machinery it could not exist.

Communications.

OPEN LETTER TO MR. JOHNSON.

TO OLIVER JOHNSON, ESQ., Orange, N.J.:

I have read in THE INDEX of the 8th August your letter to Mr. Abbot criticising his course as an editor in regard to the "National Reformers," as they call themselves, who seek to interpolate the United States Constitution with a set of religious dogmas that would make it a national confession of faith, and the government under it a persecuting power.

I like the tone of your criticism. It is offered in good temper, and tends to free discussion, which, sooner or later, brings the truth to light. I don't see why all good men who are engaged in the same good cause, and have confidence in each others' devotion to it, cannot criticise each others' views without giving or taking offence. But, in opposition to what you say, let me direct your attention to two considerations which you seem to have overlooked.

1. It is true that the Covenanter Church is the parent of this movement for revolutionizing and Europeanizing the government. It is a remnant—according to the election of grace—of the Covenanters, who, in the times of the Stuarts, originated the Solemn League and Covenant which declared the religion of England, Scotland, and Ireland to be Presbyterian, and, by forcing the Westminster Confession of Faith upon the unwilling credence of the people, put a yoke upon their necks as grievous to be borne as any ever imposed by the Pope and his myrmidons. When the battle of the Boyne drove James from the English throne, and placed William III. permanently on it, the vast majority of the Scotch Church, who had all been Covenanters, swore allegiance to his house. But a small minority held out against him, and maintained their adherence to the Solemn League, declaring that it bound not only their fathers, who signed it, but all their posterity to the end of time. A number of these Covenanters migrated to this country, bringing their principles with them, and have steadily refused to acknowledge the government of the United States, to vote, or hold office of any kind, because the government was not in league and covenant with Almighty God. They moreover refuse to hold communion with any of the other sects of Christendom, believing that they, and they only, are God's witnesses for the truth, and that all the rest are heretical and unfaithful to such a degree that they are barred from their communion. These are the men who, with a zeal and policy rivaling the Jesuits, have gotten up this movement for making the nation "Christian." It would be really contemptible, were it confined to the Covenanters themselves, for they are in point of numbers a mere handful. But they have succeeded in winning to their enterprise Episcopal bishops, Methodist bishops, Presbyterian ministers, presidents of colleges, governors and ex-governors of States, judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, judges of State courts, members of Congress, and a long array of other distinguished names which command respect and attention. When we see how a handful of capitalists in 1873 succeeded in demoralizing the silver dollar by the votes of Congress; when we remember how another handful of slave-holders in Congress ruled the nation, and dictated its foreign and domestic policy through its whole history up to 1861,—he is not a wise man who shuts his eyes to the danger arising from this quarter. Our people are not so enlightened but that they may be made the blind tools of cunning and persevering men. The theory is that the majority rules; but the fact is that a few men rule the majority.

2. But the most alarming consideration in the case is the logical character of the claims of the Church. It is never safe to trifle with principles, either good or bad. When they are incorporated into a system, either of Church or State, they will show their formative power in time. One dead fly in the pot of the apothecary's ointment will cause it to send forth a stinking savor. The principle of slavery got into the United States Constitution, and it cost half a million of lives, and two thousand millions of dollars to get it out. Now the churches, one and all, Catholic and Protestant, claim that Jesus Christ is the King of nations, by virtue of the eternal covenant of grace,—that he is head over all things to the Church,—that the world and all it contains were made for the Church,—that ministers of the Gospel are ambassadors of the Lord Jesus Christ the King, to the guilty rebels of mankind,—and that they are commissioned to open or shut the doors of heaven to all comers, to remit or retain sins, with the divine assurance that what they bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and that what they loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven,—that all the powers and principalities of the earth are, de jure, subject to Christ as Mediator, and under law to his will as contained in the Bible,—that the Church is the expounder of this will, being the light of the world, and the salt of the earth, and the State the executor of this will thus expounded.

These are the principles of the Church organization. These are her claims, and these claims have always been enforced by fine, imprisonment, and death, whenever she has had the power to do so. See what the Episcopalians in England did under Archbishop Laud. See what the Presbyterians did in Scotland under the Solemn League. See what the Congregationalists did in Massachusetts under Puritan rule. As the love of blood is in the tiger's cub latent, even when it laps milk, so the animus of persecution is in every man and every church, who hold that a belief in their creed is necessary to salvation. It is the natural and legitimate outcome of the principles or claims enumerated above, and held by every honest churchman.

You say "the drift of thought and opinion in the churches is away from this project" of the Covenant-ers, and therefore there is no danger that it will be carried out. That is to say, that the Church is infidel to her mission, and infidel to all her leading principles and claims; that she has degenerated into a mere association for giving employment to a class of men called clergymen, who amuse the people a few hours every Sunday with good music and poor preaching. You were bred a Quaker, and you know nothing of the pertinacity with which the clergy hold on to their dignity and authority as ambassadors of Jesus Christ. You seem content as a citizen of the United States to hold your liberties of free thought and free worship on the presumption that the infidelity of Christians will never enforce the Church's claims. But suppose there should come a universal revival, and the Church and clergy should wake up, under the quickening of their dying and dead faith, and enter with new and fiery zeal upon the work of fulfilling the Church's mission, would you not like to have a secular Constitution and government to stand between you and them? I hate the idea that my liberty, and that of my children, must depend on the secret infidelity of the Church to her own vital principles. I want my countrymen to feel now, and in all time to come, that the divorce between Church and State is in this land so complete and eternal that every soul is and will be safe from the encroachments of those who would interfere with their right to believe and worship as they please. This safety can only be secured by secularizing the general and State governments. History teaches us that religious faith may languish and die, and that it may be revived again; and that when kindled into fiery zeal it may sweep all before it into destruction. I wish to keep myself and posterity out of the sweep of so mighty and blind a power, and therefore coöperate with Mr. Abbot in his efforts to thwart the project of the "National Reformers," and preserve and strengthen the secularity of the Constitution. You remember that when, forty years ago, the abolitionists, through press and platform, and in opposition to the almost entire Church, exposed the projects of the slaveholders, their words seemed to their countrymen as idle tales, and they believed them not. So, when Mr. Abbot, as a keen-eyed watchman, stands upon the walls of the republic, and sounds the alarm that a traitorous principle and party are at work undermining the Constitution, you cannot wonder if, in the language of the prophet he should repiningly say, "All day long have I stretched forth my hands to a disobedient and gainsaying people."

THE ROCHESTER RESOLUTIONS.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

As a member of the Committee on Resolutions at Rochester, allow me to take this opportunity to disclaim my share in the praise you so generously accord to the women who passed them at the Convention of July. I opposed in committee the (so-called) religious resolutions, because I thought them both unjust and inexpedient. It is not wholly true that the doctrines taught woman by the Christian Church have been "fatal to her own highest interest and through her have dwarfed and degraded the race." The Christian Church, or religion, is no more to blame for the present social condition of woman than the Jewish, the Mormon, the Buddhist, or the religion of the followers of Confucius.

It cannot be said that the Christian Church as a body is now against the interests of woman. True, there are narrow denominations in it who do not follow the example of the great Teacher in their treatment of the woman question; but there are others who deserve praise rather than condemnation. The Quaker, the Methodist, and notably the Unitarian Church, are invariably on the side of woman's advancement. More than one great question affecting woman's social condition has been started by societies connected with the Unitarian denomination; and two or three of these church organizations (in Massachusetts) have gone so far in this direction that they have come to be known (or called) "woman suffrage churches." In my own labors for the cause of equal rights, I have received help many times from this quarter. Though I have no desire to uphold the Church any farther than she deserves, for I am a liberal in religious matters, and belong to that wing of the suffrage party, I am willing to do her justice, and to receive any farther help she may be disposed to give. The suffragists, as a party, cannot afford to make war upon the Church, because by so doing they will array against them a large class of women whom they desire to convert. These women believe in their Church; to them it is daily bread and comfort and a guarantee of something better beyond this life. It is the dearest thing they have. In attacking it the suffragists rouse every feeling of disgust and animosity against themselves and their cause. They can no more win these women to their own way of thinking by striking a blow at their church than they could win a mother's love by striking her infant child. The aim of the suffragist should be not to frighten but to convert, and, without regard to difference of opinion on religious matters, meet the women of the churches on their own plane of thought, and convert them as they are. Religious belief is of small importance compared to the belief in human or individual rights.

Many elements of society, as well as the religious, have helped to dwarf and degrade woman. Law, medicine, politics, and education, all deserve condemnation. Woman herself is to blame in that she has tacitly consented so long to her own degraded condition, and that she has never until this generation struck a blow for liberty. Why not attack all these causes individually? It would be the old story of the mouse and the elephant. What is the use?

The demand of the woman suffragist is for equality of rights with man; and they should stand on the firm ground of this principle. They have the greatest fight of the century on their hands, and they cannot afford to spend their strength or weaken their forces in making onsets upon every windmill of doctrine that lies in their way.

Let the Free Religionists make war upon the Church and demolish Christianity if they can. It is not (as a party) the fight of the woman suffragist. They should not lower the standard of equal rights to the level of common causes. They need all the help they can get honorably, from every known source, and it is inexpedient and unwise for them to put themselves in a hostile attitude toward the Church or any other existing institution. "Make your enemy serve you" is a good rule,—at least, until such time as you can get the proper weapon in your hands with which to fight him.

I fully agree with you as to the courageousness of the resolutions, and in your admiration of the brave women, with whom on this point only I have ventured to differ. As some of the newspapers which have noticed the matter have expressed the desire to know how different wings of the suffrage party view the question, I hope you will permit me through the columns of THE INDEX to express my opinion on the subject as one of the minority.

THE WATKINS CONVENTION.

NEW YORK, Aug. 29, 1878.

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Mr. Abbot,—You have received probably various reports of the Watkins Convention. Your absence was much regretted by many friends, who hope to meet you soon at the yearly meeting of the Liberal League.

There were a great many things said and done which would have been better unsaid and undone; but some excellent speeches were made, and the spirit of the meeting was throughout friendly and cordial. Though the Convention was not what we might have wished it to be, we consider it a success and of great benefit to the liberals who were there assembled. The different shades and grades of freethinkers must have felt what an incongruous, diversified, incoherent aggregate of parts they are. A few more such meetings, where no business and no practical work is attempted, must convince them of the impossibility of accomplishing any real good until they can unite and organize under one common principle. Until our Liberal friends have learned to subordinate their eccentricities, hobbies, and untimely theories under some general principles upon which organization is possible, the Orthodox need have no apprehension of their gatherings. Mr. H. L. Green, who is liked and respected by all, and who has proved an indefatigable worker in the cause of liberalism, deserves much credit and thanks for his labors.

The social feature of the Convention was its most interesting and important aspect. It facilitated the exchange and interchange of ideas among liberals, so beneficial and pleasant in itself. Those who had never seen or heard from each other became friends, and many fruitful and lasting acquaintances were formed. If we were only more and better acquainted with each other, we should gain much in mutual appreciation, and derive a juster estimation of each other.

The purposes and aims of most of our liberals are good and honest; if they err, it is much more the fault of the understanding than of the heart. Nothing, however, is so apt to produce a better understanding and a true appreciation as a free discussion among those who hold opposite views. Well, the occasion was most favorable to those who knew how to profit by the given opportunities. We returned home richer in thought, fuller in experience, and withal more hopeful for the future of American liberalism.

The beautiful glen, the charming lake, the many attractions of the place, the friendly gatherings on the piazza of the Glen Park Hotel,—from which a most beautiful view upon the park before the house and the surrounding hills and mountains was obtained,—added to the enjoyment of the Convention. Nature wore her most beautiful attire; the sun smiled upon us, not in burning rays, but in all the softness, sweetness, and brightness of autumn days.

The arrest of Mr. Bennett and Mr. Bell (who had only handed over the books to the purchaser from their adjoining stand), and the arrest of Miss Tilton, sister-in-law to Mr. Heywood, for the sale of Cupid's Fokes, was the dark and sad feature of the Convention. While most of those who were present thought that it would have been much wiser not to offer the book at present for sale, and at such an occasion, as having given so much offence recently, and upon which the decision and action of the public is by no means closed, every one was indignant at the outrageous and malignant attacks aimed at free thought and free expression. Such attacks and such arrests are sure to arouse the indignation of the American people; they strike a severe blow upon the liberty of the press, which it is our duty to defend and force upon all liberals the necessity of decided action. While our foremost and ablest liberal thinkers would have preferred to fix their attention upon more general and more vital issues, the questions of "What is obscene literature?" and "How far is its suppression a benefit or a detriment to public morality?" are forced upon us. If we will or not, we have to take our stand and give our decision.

The question of the postal laws, the freedom of the press, and questions connected with these, will probably find expression at the next yearly meeting of the National Liberal League. May all those who attend—and we hope that every true liberal will make it his duty to be there—come prepared for the issue. The better the different delegates are prepared and posted, the easier will be the final action and decision. May all those who come forget personal offences and grievances! May the unkind and ungenerous attacks which have circulated through some of our liberal papers, upon the character and integrity of veteran reformers, give way to the spirit of kindness and good-will. Let us be forbearing with each other's mistakes; let us employ sneering irony, cutting satire, and sharp words for the denunciation of wilful enemies of freedom; but let us be liberal, truly humane, and cordial towards those who are engaged in the arduous and thankless task of reform work. The reformer's task is severe and bitter enough; it is an unpleasant, cheerless duty to fight against our own kind. The reformer needs sympathy and warm and hearty assistance upon his cold, lonely path. Sympathy and a recognition from the few is his only reward here and elsewhere; let us give it fully and with grace!

Yours truly, CLARA NEYMANN.

EXCLUDING ATHEISTS FROM THE WITNESS-STAND.

SABETHA, Kan., Aug. 5, 1878.

EDITOR INDEX:—

The New York Observer of Aug. 1 makes a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio the text for a column of the most daring and intolerant attacks upon the constitutional rights of citizens that bigotry has for a long time promulgated. It quotes a portion of the language of the court, and, with the lip-smacking unction of bigotry, construes it as the righteous denial of the right of an atheist to be sworn as a witness in a court of justice. It says: "Thus, for example, we suppose that Robert Ingersoll, who is understood to deny the existence of a Supreme Being, could not be a witness in a court where the property or the life of another was at stake."

Then this editor, whom Robert J. Ingersoll publicly convicted of being a garbler of authorities, and a puritanical slanderer of the dead, goes on to say that "this exclusion is not an impeachment of his veracity." What, then, does he base the justness of this exclusion upon? Not on a difference of religious belief, because the quotation which he makes from the Ohio decision negatives that idea in the opening sentence. Further than that, it is presumable that even this hide-bound pharisee, who in his prospectus makes a virtue of his non-progressiveness, has an inkling of constitutional guarantees that protect the rights even of atheists. Let him speak for himself, that the measure of his infamy may be fully understood: "In other words, the idea underlying the whole framework of human society is that men must have faith in God, or no confidence can be had between man and man. It is important to keep this judicial decision in mind at the present moment, when the whole tendency of modern unbelief is to the construction of a system that excludes the existence of a personal God, and substitutes law and force, whatever they may be, in the place of an intelligent cause. The pseudo-scientist, or the sciolist, who aims at accounting for the existence of the world of matter about him without introducing the agency of a thinking Creator, does not stop to reflect that he is undermining the foundations of society, and making a race of beings who are already pronounced to be unworthy of belief when put under oath."

The irreconcilable positions taken are sufficiently apparent. The affirmation that the exclusion of a man as a witness is not an impeachment of that man's veracity exhibits the sickly quality of the logic of a self-stultified religionist. Nobody with an ounce of sense would argue that a man should be incompetent to testify except for reasons that affect his credibility. The last sentence italicized shows that the Observer man gets back to this ground of exclusion, and attempts to show that atheism disqualifies, because it renders men "unworthy of belief." I have italicized the first sentence because I agree with the Observer so far that, if such a decision has been made, it ought to be kept in mind. It ought to be printed in the blackest type and in the most conspicuous places in the columns of liberal journals.

I have not the decision before me, and have some doubt as to whether it would, when examined, sustain the construction put upon it by the Observer. Every lawyer knows from experience that it is not safe to quote the mere dictum of a judge, and rely upon it as authority. Language used in reference to things outside of the point expressly considered and decided is not regarded as a judicial determination of those matters. The decision so far as quoted, merely says that "every one offered as a witness in a Court must take an oath or affirmation before giving testimony. A person who believes in the existence of a Supreme Being who will either in this life or the life to come inflict punishment for false swearing, may be sworn as a witness." It is an altogether unwarranted construction of the language quoted to claim that it holds that a person not believing in a personal God may not affirm as a witness in court. Such may have been the decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio; but such is not the necessary meaning of the part quoted.

At present I have only to do with the Observer's eager approval of its own construction of the decision. If this would be persecutor for opinion's sake knew, what is a matter of common observation to lawyers constantly in court, that a profession of belief in a personal God is as frequently accompanied with a faculty for false swearing as non-belief, he would perceive how little force there is in this plea for the exclusion of atheists. Does he suppose that, if he were a witness in court where the rights of property were at stake, that his belief, or the mere announcement thereof, would add one jot to his credibility in the estimation of court or jury? Does he suppose that the Orthodox lawyer opposed to the party in whose behalf he testified would relax his vigilance, or neglect to employ the usual means of ascertaining whether his testimony was true or false? If he does, he greatly overrates the weight which court and bar attach to Orthodoxy as a test of the veracity of witnesses. There is one thing that the Observer should know: and that is, that a just and upright life,—that manhood,—has more weight with juries than mere "faith in God," and that Robert Ingersoll, who has no belief in God, but believes in the "liberty of men, women, and children," would be believed by a jury before some man-enaving bigot who believes in God, but not in the equality of all before the law.

By advocating this doctrine, worthy only of a religious knave ready to light a fagot or forge a chain, the editor of the New York Observer has placed himself outside the pale of courteous discussion or criticism. He deserves to have his infamous doctrines cut from his paper and pasted upon his back, that the world may know him as the Judas Iscariot that would betray humanity, out of no greed for money, but from "pure cussedness," as Josh Billings would term it.

It is time that judges upon the bench should be taught that the precedents of dark ages are not to be blindly followed in our time; and if they are to be the servile tools of the priesthood for the destruction of civil rights, then let every vestige of that judicial discretion that is always dangerous to the interests of litigants be taken from them by the mandatory force of positive statutory enactments.

We have abandoned a multitude of fictions in law which the enlightenment of the age has outgrown; but it seems that somehow we have engrafted upon our laws the old notions of the witch-burning days. The dangerous spirit of proscription lurks invisible in the land until brought out by weak subservency of courts that seem to have undergone a Rip Van Winkle sleep ever since the formation and adoption of our Constitutional Amendment and bills of right.

TRINITY CHURCH.

NEW YORK, Aug. 15, 1878.

F. E. ABBOT, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—The offer made through your paper to have the title to the property of Trinity Church of this city fairly and honorably settled has not been accepted.

There is now being published the following article: "The original conveyance of the estate, now Trinity Church property, was in 1671. It was the Roel van Jans farm, of sixty-two acres, a grant confirmed to the heirs of Roel van Jans' widow, who sold it in 1671 to Colonel Lovelace. It was afterwards incorporated into the King's farm, and in 1703 was presented by Queen Anne to Trinity. Eight years after the sale to Colonel Lovelace we read of Mr. Wolley, chaplain of the British forces, hunting bears in John Robinson's orchard, between what are now Cedar Street and Maiden Lane. Before Trinity held its present property the graveyard must have been begun where it is to-day; for just north of the church and but fifteen yards from Broadway are two stones, one over Richard Churches, buried in 1681; the other tells us: 'Here lies the body of Anne Churches, aged 17 years and 3 quarters. 1691.'"

I would here state that Trinity Church Corporation has no legal title to the property in question. They have been and are now only holding the said property as trustees.

I further state, they never could legally acquire a title, and am prepared to meet them on this issue, if they will meet it fairly and squarely without evasion or quibbling.

If their title is good, they cannot honorably decline this offer, which will forever place the subject at rest.

Yours respectfully, D. GROESBECK.

O. A. PHELPS.

Mr. Phelps is a new freethought champion who has recently entered the lecture-field. He spoke at this place on Friday evening, Aug. 23, upon the subject of immortality. He handled this old-time subject with rare skill and ability, and advanced many ideas new to those present. Mr. Phelps is an enthusiastic worker in the cause of freethought, and should be kept constantly employed. He has recently spoken at West Liberty, Cedar Rapids, and other points in this State, and has given excellent satisfaction. He has a superb lecture upon the relations of State and Church, which he will be at all times ready to deliver before Liberal Leagues or other freethought societies. Mr. Phelps is a lawyer by profession, but has determined to devote his entire time and talents to the cause of mental freedom. He is a clear, analytical reasoner, very careful in his statements, but merciless in his logic. We need scores and hundreds of such lecturers; and if the liberal world would but do its duty in the way of encouragement and support, the old decaying citadel of superstition would soon totter and fall before the vigorous assaults of these brave young champions of rationalism.

E. C. WALKER.

FLORENCE, Iowa, Aug. 28.

A BOY OF FIVE years was "playing railroad" with his sister of two and a half years. Having her upon a footstool, he imagined himself both the engine and conductor. After imitating the puffing noise of the steam, he stopped and called out, "New York," and in a moment after "Patterson," and then "Philadelphia." His knowledge of towns was now exhausted, and at the next place he cried, "Heaven." His little sister said eagerly, "Top! I des I'll dit out here."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " "
 " 26 " 51 " 6 " "
 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON, publish

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.Y.
 J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
 ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
 C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
 W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
 BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.
 ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

TO THE AMERICAN PAT-BONS OF CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,
Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine, from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact facsimile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is from England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on the issues with a promptitude unequalled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers. The following are a few of the contributors:—

Matthew Arnold,	Alfred R. Wallace,
Herbert Spencer,	Frederick Harrison,

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD. GREAT THROUGH LINE AND UNITED STATES MAIL ROUTE.

The attention of the travelling public is respectfully invited to some of the merits of this great highway, in the confident assertion and belief that no other line can offer equal inducements as a route of through travel. In stands confessedly at the head of American railways. The track is double the entire length of the line, of steel rails laid on heavy oak ties, which are embedded in a foundation of rock ballast eighteen inches in depth. All bridges are of iron or stone, and built upon the most approved plans. Its passenger cars, while eminently safe and substantial, are at the same time models of comfort and elegance.

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD

THE SAFETY APPLIANCES
in use on this line well illustrate the far-seeing and liberal policy of its management, in accordance with which the utility only of an improvement and not its cost has been the question of consideration. Among many may be noticed

The Block System of Safety Signals,

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE
231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE! CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

PLATFORM

For the Presidential Election of 1880,
ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

SECOND ANNUAL CONGRESS

OF THE

National Liberal League.

CALL.

Boston, Sept. 13, 1878.

The Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July 1-4, 1876, will be held at Syracuse, N.Y., on Saturday and Sunday, Oct. 26 and 27, 1878. Further particulars as to hall, speakers, etc., will be announced hereafter.

In addition to the hearing of reports, election of officers for the ensuing year, and other ordinary business, questions of the utmost practical importance to the liberal cause will come up for decision at this Congress. Among them the following may be specified:—

1. What efficient measures can be adopted for securing a great increase in the number of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, and thereby winning for liberal ideas the public influence to which they are justly entitled?

2. Shall the National Liberal League nominate candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States at the present time?

3. How can the National Liberal League most effectively promote the cause of State Secularization, and foil the schemes of those who are seeking to pervert the government to sectarian purposes? What action shall it take with reference to the Constitutional Amendment already twice reported to the United States Senate by the Judiciary Committee, the practical effect of which, if adopted, will be to recognize in the Constitution the right of the Bible to be read in the public schools as a book of divine authority, and the right of church property to be exempted from taxation?

4. How can the rights of free mails and a free press be most effectively defended, and how can the wrongs of persons unjustly punished under the so-called Comstock laws be most effectively righted?

5. Shall the National Liberal League abandon the stand it originally took on the "obscene literature" question at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, or shall it continue to defend equally the cause of public morality and the cause of free mails and a free press? Shall it now demand the total repeal of the existing laws on this subject, and thereby practically protect and foster the circulation of obscene literature? Or shall it continue to demand the radical reform of those laws, in such manner as shall protect freedom of thought to the uttermost without protecting obscenity in the least?

The last two of these questions are peculiarly important at this time, and will inevitably come up for settlement by the approaching Congress. The resolutions adopted at Philadelphia were as follows:—

"Resolved, That this League, while it recognizes the great importance and the absolute necessity of guarding by proper legislation against obscene and indecent publications, whatever sect, party, order, or class such publications claim to favor, disapproves and protests against all laws which, by reason of indefiniteness or ambiguity, shall permit the prosecution and punishment of honest and conscientious men for presenting to the public what they deem essential to the public welfare, when the views thus presented do not violate in thought or language the acknowledged rules of decency; and that we demand that all laws against obscenity and indecency shall be so clear and explicit that none but actual offenders against the recognized principles of purity shall be liable to suffer therefrom.

"Resolved, That we cannot but regard the appointment and authorization by the government of a single individual to inspect our mails, with power to exclude therefrom whatever he deems objectionable, as a delegation of authority dangerous to public and personal liberty, and utterly inconsistent with the genius of free institutions."

The future growth, prosperity, and influence of the Liberal League movement will depend largely on the action to be taken by the Congress on these two questions. Any weakening of the stand taken at Philadelphia will work great and perhaps fatal disaster to the National Liberal League.

In order, therefore, that these vital questions may be fairly and wisely decided, it is recommended that all Local Leagues elect their delegates with special reference to it. The Congress will not be an irresponsible mass meeting, but a convention composed of delegates and members duly accredited, and seats for them will be reserved. Delegates from Local Leagues will receive Certificates of Membership of the Second Annual Congress by forwarding at once the proper credentials, signed by their own local officers, to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston"; charter, life, and annual members who intend to be present will receive theirs by simply forwarding their names and present addresses. These Certificates must be presented at the door and exchanged for Tickets of Admission to the reserved seats, the rest of the hall being open to the public at large. By this arrangement all confusion will be obviated. The Congress will be composed of accredited members, who alone ought to vote on questions of business affecting the League; every member will be admitted to the reserved seats; and the Committee on Membership will be enabled to make an accurate report to the Congress.

Liberals are urged everywhere to organize themselves into Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues and elect good delegates, in order to give this Congress a large local constituency and an influential delegation, and thereby to increase the weight of its decisions with the general public. The questions to be acted upon are of the gravest consequence to the whole liberal cause, and ought to be dealt with by a responsible representative body. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay, if addressed to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston."

By order of the Board of Directors:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.

WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

GLIMPSSES.

ALL LIBERAL journals are respectfully requested to publish the "Call" for the Syracuse Congress and the Directors' "Card," in full.

WHAT CRUEL IRONY there is in superstition! New York city has a Sunday-Sabbath ordinance which prevented the proprietors of the Grand Opera House from giving a performance for the benefit of the yellow-fever sufferers. Will the people endure such idiocy forever?

LET ALL Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues hasten to elect at once their delegates to the Syracuse Congress, and secure for them in season the certificates of membership necessary to admit them to the reserved seats. Every League ought to send a full delegation; all liberals are interested in the questions to be acted upon. Let us have a large body of delegates, and prove that the liberals have as much business sagacity as any other class of the community.

READ CAREFULLY the debate concerning the freedom of the press and the mails which we republish this week from the report of the Centennial Congress of Liberals. It is timely reading now. The position on this question assumed by the National Liberal League at its birth was wisely taken; it was the result of full and frank debate, and will be the result of similar debates everywhere and always. Shall the League now be dragged backwards to take the foolish attitude of fighting a windmill? It must answer for itself at Syracuse.

THE DECISION of the United States Supreme Court respecting the power of Congress over the mails, which we reprint this week from the Albany Law Journal, is a paper of permanent value. Do not omit to read it. Is it worth while to knock one's head uselessly against fixed facts? If editors and authors are to be left in jail till the Supreme Court can be induced to reverse its decision, what becomes of liberty meanwhile? The triumph of "repeal" has become an empty "point of honor"; the cause of absolute mental freedom needs nothing but "reform." Shall this cause be sacrificed to whims or crochets?

HERE IS a new and most striking proof of the strength at the polls of the party which favors "Christian government" and opposes "secular government": "NEW HAVEN, Conn., Sept. 16.—At the school district election to-day, the issue being an attempt to re-establish devotional exercises in the public schools, the ticket favoring reestablishment was elected by 2,900 majority. The Catholics united with the Protestants to bring about the success of the Bible ticket." Observe that Christians, whether Protestants or Catholics, vote solidly together to arrogate dominion over the schools of the whole people, and force the Bible upon all tax-payers. The National Liberal League is a demonstrated necessity. The people must be educated to understand the principles which alone secure Equal Rights in Religion, or the Constitution will yet be Christianized and its glorious secularity destroyed.

IT IS STATED by the Boston Advertiser of September 13 that "Mr. Justice Clifford, of the United States Supreme Court, who sentenced Ezra H. Heywood in May last to imprisonment in Dedham jail for two years for sending obscene literature through the mails, having looked into the matter further and modified his opinions somewhat concerning the law on this subject, has signed a petition to the President of the United States asking for Mr. Heywood's pardon." We hope that this statement is true. If so, the fact is very significant. If people would only keep their heads clear on this question, it would be easy to convince the entire public that no opinions as such ought to be suppressed as "obscene," and that Mr. Heywood is wrongfully imprisoned. But when one-sided partisans wildly insist that freedom of thought cannot be protected without a wholesale repeal of all restrictions on vile literature, what wonder that the public say no to so absurd a demand? The opening of Judge Clifford's eyes is a very hopeful sign; though the Advertiser ought to feel pretty cheap at being obliged to record the fact. In spite of all blunders, the truth will make headway; but it would advance so much faster without the blunders that its friends cannot but regret them.

Debate on Freedom of the Press

BY THE

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

AT THE

CENTENNIAL CONGRESS OF LIBERALS, HELD AT PHILADELPHIA,
 July 1 to July 4, 1878.

EXTRACTS FROM THE REPORT.

Seventh Session, Monday Evening, July 3.

The second resolution was then read and offered by Mr. Andrews as follows:—

"WHEREAS, There are many symptoms of a growing intention on the part of the religious power to re-establish a virtual censorship over the press and the post-office, by influence exerted over the several legislative bodies, under the pretence of zeal for the public morals, but really in behalf of religious and ecclesiastical despotism; as for instance, in procuring a body of loose, dangerous, and oppressive legislation against the circulation of 'obscene literature' under which, it is believed, some of the purest and best men of the land are at this hour suffering in prison, or stand in danger of their liberties; therefore,

"Resolved, That we recommend to the members of the League and to the public the utmost vigilance and the closest scrutiny, in detecting and unweaving any such conspiracy or conspiracies against the liberties of the people; and that they should thus commence the accumulation of facts upon which the League may, if found requisite, act specifically to procure the entire repeal or righteous modification of all such laws."

MR. MCARTHUR.—There is a statement of fact embodied in this resolution. I am not aware of any such fact.

MR. ANDREWS.—I will make a statement in regard to that.

THE PRESIDENT.—There is no motion before the house.

MR. UNDERWOOD.—I will make a motion for the adoption of that resolution.

MR. MCARTHUR.—I would ask the mover of the resolution to furnish us, if he can, the exact facts in reference to the case. He makes an assumption of certain things being in existence of which I am not aware.

MR. ANDREWS.—It is because, Mr. President, I believe that this audience and the public at large are not aware of the silent and continuous efforts made to bring the post-office and the literature of the country under the control and censorship of certain persons, that I wish this resolution to be brought forward.

MR. MCARTHUR.—I would ask the mover of that resolution to furnish the facts he alleges.

MR. ANDREWS.—I am coming to this. Certain acts have been passed by the Congress of the United States, under the influence of the Young Men's Christian Association, by which an agent or inspector has introduced a system of opening mail matter. This is complained of; it tends to that for which a minister in England was driven out of office. This agent, Mr. Comstock, has prosecuted and procured the conviction of some six hundred men, and sent them to the several penitentiaries in this country within the last two years; and the radical men of the country know nothing of it. One of the best friends I have on earth is lying in a penitentiary,—John Lant. They have established a system of espionage. Another gentleman, Dr. E. B. Foote, the editor of Medical Common Sense, a work that has done as much to reform medical ideas and practice as any published in this country, has been on his trial, and been convicted, and will be sent to the penitentiary unless the courts interfere. The medical profession in New York State is becoming alarmed at this, and Hon. Mr. Hoar, of Massachusetts, has given his opinion that these facts are scandalous. I want the resolution not framed especially for the cases I have mentioned, but only so as to turn attention to the subject.

MR. MCARTHUR.—I would like to ask further. I do not yet understand Mr. Andrews to give the substance of the law cases, under which conviction has been obtained, specifically enough to warrant adoption of this resolution. I am aware that convictions have been made very properly for passing obscene matters through the mail. That does not come within the scope of the objects for which this Congress was assembled. We come here to secure the separation of the Church from the State, to secure the absolute and total separation of the two. It seems to me we are travelling away from the objects for which we come together. I intended to have made some similar remarks on the first resolution, but I was not recognized at the time. As a point of order, I raise that question first. If it should be decided that the resolution is in order, I should like to know something more about it. Before adopting a resolution so sweeping, the Congress ought to know all about that which it is asked to indorse.

THE PRESIDENT.—What is the point of order? The Chair did not understand it.

MR. MCARTHUR.—It is that the resolution does not come within the scope of the objects for which this Congress is convened.

THE PRESIDENT.—That is for the Congress itself to decide. It would be improper for the Chair to rule any resolution out of order on that ground.

MR. MCARTHUR.—The Congress decided, before they adjourned this afternoon, that it was not within its scope to decide a question of Indian policy. It seems to me that this is a parallel case.

THE PRESIDENT.—The first question is on the point of order, and the Chair feels obliged not to sustain it technically. The resolutions are entirely in the hands of the National Liberal League. The Chair does not possess authority to rule any resolution to be out of order, if the League sees fit to admit it, as has been done in this case.

MR. MCARTHUR.—I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The resolution was seconded, and stated by the Chair.

MR. UNDERWOOD.—I hope the resolution will not be laid on the table. I think the resolution is not only relevant as it now stands, but appropriate. I should be sorry to have this Congress fail to pass a resolution so well defined, and appropriate as that. There is not a word in it in approval of any wrong act, or of any obscene work. It does not make the least reference to John A. Lant or to E. B. Foote; but it does recognize that there is an influence of an ecclesiastical character at work, exerted by the Young Men's Christian Association, to inspect our mails unjustly, and to subject everything in them to the supervision of a special agent. It does recognize that fact, and therefore suggests and urges upon members of this Congress to be vigilant in watching the efforts made in this direction, and, if they should see anything requiring their definite action, to proceed accordingly. While I myself believe that some of these six hundred persons richly deserve their punishment, I nevertheless believe, nay, I know, that some of those parties were convicted when there was no real offence deserving punishment,—when the prosecution was instituted largely out of spite and bad feelings—cases in which these men are just as much entitled to their liberty as we are. I think it our duty, under the circumstances, to sustain this resolution, and I hope it will pass.

THE PRESIDENT.—The question is, shall the preamble and resolution of Mr. Andrews lie on the table?

The question being put, it was decided in the negative.

THE PRESIDENT.—The question is still before the house on the adoption of Mr. Andrews' resolution.

MR. KILGORE.—I do not think that resolution is quite germane to the business of the League. At the same time I do think there is a tendency of the "religious power" to search too carefully into the private correspondence of the citizens. I think the time has come for them to be vigilant. I do not see any objection to the citizen's exercising eternal vigilance on every approach of tyranny, and we must do that, or they will soon have the law in regard to the mails so stringent that there will be no safety for free men in this country.

MR. COLEMAN.—I think the difficulty rests right here. The first observation of this gentleman was substantially that Mr. Andrews failed to put forward his "facts" before us with sufficient plainness. He put emphasis upon the fact that the publication of certain medical facts had been interfered with. Probably the most recent case was that where Dr. Foote's work was objected to, not so much upon the ground that Dr. Foote sent out medical works as that he made use of them for the dissemination of notions and opinions which were considered to be against religion. I think that was the main reason. Then, again, Mr. Andrews referred to attempts to exclude from the railroads in the State of New York works which were liberal in their character and opposed to the popular theology. He forgot to discriminate between two things that should be distinguished,—suppression of obscene literature and violation of religious liberty. So far as this resolution bears upon the latter, I think it is relevant. I think it is time the League should take action in the matter; and I think it will be well done in this way.

DR. BROWN.—I have only a word to say, and that is to ask—after you have passed these resolutions, and others,—what influence have you had upon the community? My idea is: we are attempting to do exactly what Christian men are attempting to do,—fly our own kite in their faces. I am in favor of letting the Constitution entirely alone. They are trying to change it and put God in the Constitution.

MR. ANDREWS.—I call the gentleman to order; he is not speaking to the question.

THE PRESIDENT.—The Chair decides that the point of order is well taken. Dr. Brown should speak to the resolution.

Dr. Brown continued to speak.

MRS. KILGORE.—I rise to a point of order. The gentleman has not said one word germane to this question. He is out of order. When the Chair decides him out of order, he forfeits the floor.

THE PRESIDENT.—Dr. Brown is not entitled to the floor, unless he confines himself to the question.

DR. BROWN.—Will you read the resolution again? The President then read the resolution.

DR. BROWN.—Well, sir, I will admit it does not say anything about the Constitution; but I beg to say it will have little influence upon the public. I will say nothing more at present.

MR. FRASER.—I will say one word in reference to the passage of obscene matter through the mails. I certainly think it is a great wrong, and I think this Congress ought to pass a resolution against it. It is true that there has been a large quantity of obscene literature sent through the mails, which has done a great deal of harm. At the same time the great Bible societies are sending it broadcast all over the land through the mails, and there is not one word said about it. It is the most obscene literature ever published.

MR. ANDREWS.—George Francis Train was confined in prison seven months simply for publishing obscene extracts from the Bible.

MR. MCARTHUR.—I move that this resolution be referred to the Directors of the National Liberal League to be reported upon at the next Annual Congress.

MR. UNDERWOOD.—I hope that will also be lost.

THE PRESIDENT.—Is the motion seconded?

It was seconded by several.

The motion was then stated by the Chair.

MR. CLARK.—I do not think we have specific information enough to act on this matter as a League. I do not think the facts are clearly proved. If they were clearly proved, there would be a general feeling of dissatisfaction at such a law. The question is whether this condemned matter was really what it is claimed to be, medical publications for the purpose of advancing medical knowledge, or whether it was really obscene literature published under the pretence of advancing medical knowledge; in short, whether it did or did not really possess the objectionable character which the law properly condemns. That is the question; and I think we are not able to decide it. I cannot vote intelligibly upon that question myself, because I do not know enough about the books. I really believe that there are books circulated through the mails, professing to be books written as scientific medical books, which are written merely for the profit of the circulators, and to corrupt the imaginations of young people rather than for the purpose of doing good. I think it would be very well to refer this matter to the Directors. There are, perhaps, attractions in the street, on this evening of the Centennial Fourth of July, that some of us would be interested in; and, as we have had a good deal of discussion, and as it is not specially relevant to the main object of our gathering, it seems to me it would be well to lay it aside on this occasion.

MR. WHEELER.—We can afford a great many things; we can afford to go out into the street; but we are fighting for life for our opinions and ideas. I think we should take action upon this very resolution, and take favorable action. It is not a question, Mr. President, as to whether certain books circulating through the mails are obscene or not; it is a question whether the mails themselves should be violated by an authorized agent of the government. I hope this resolution will pass, and pass unanimously.

MR. POTTER.—I have only a word to say on the main resolution. I had hoped that it would be brought before the convention directly on its merits, and be voted down. Yet I would favor the motion now before the house as a compromise; that is, that it be referred to the Directors to report upon at the next Annual Congress. The reason why I oppose the main resolution is that it is a mixed question, as has been said here. I think that there is something in the resolution that properly might come under the consideration of this Liberal League; but it appears to me that, if this Liberal League is to have any great success, that success is to come from its keeping very closely to the line of objects marked out in its Constitution. This afternoon, I think very properly, the convention voted that the subject of the general Indian policy of the government was not germane to the objects of the Liberal League; and therefore with a great deal of unanimity that portion of the resolutions was voted down. Now I think that this resolution also contains something that does not come within the sphere of this League. There is a class of literature sent through the mails, as I am informed, not circulated at all because the works are scientific or medical, but because they are obscene works, emanating from centres of most corrupting influences, and issued by men who probably would not dare to have their names made known anywhere, least of all in this Liberal League. I have never seen any of these books, but I understand they are constantly mailed—little works, pamphlets, and circulars,—sent into the public schools of America for our children to read, and fitted only to corrupt the minds of the boys and girls. Now that is something which our laws, if we are to do anything by way of law, certainly ought to suppress. To suppress vice and crime, certainly our laws have their appropriate sphere there, on the ground not of religion, not of theology, but of morality. Just where we should place the abstract limits of government may be doubtful; but so far as the resolution tends to protect the circulation of this vile literature (and it does seem to tend to protect that, though it may not be intended so to do)—but so far as it does tend to protect that kind of literature,—this convention would certainly not wish to do anything in opposition to any movement or to any law that would suppress that crime against the innocence of our children. Under cover of this general desire for the security of virtue, religious bigots may be attempting to influence the law-makers so as to secure entrance for their theology, and to strike at the circulation of the liberal literature which they must be opposed to.

So far as anything of that kind is attempted, I think it is certainly to be watched most carefully; therefore I shall vote decidedly against the passage of such a resolution as this, and shall for the same reason vote in favor of referring it, as the next best thing, to the Board of Directors for a report at the next meeting.

MR. MILLS.—I hope Mr. President, that the resolution to refer will prevail. I can see plainly that there may be work for the Liberal League in the manner suggested in the resolution of Mr. Andrews. I see also, as I think, that it is necessary, whatever we may say or do in that matter, that our actions should be so carefully guarded that there will be no room for suspicion, even, that we fall ourselves to promote jealousy the preservation of the public morals, and whatever pertains to that preservation, as my friend Mr. Potter has pointed out. I think that, as members of the Liberal League, we have a deep interest in this whole question, and we should place ourselves in that position; against anything that looks like ecclesiastical dictation or interference with free discussion, or the free dissemination through the mails of all decent treatises on the vital problems that belong to human welfare and human life, we should always set our faces like a flint. But the maintenance and protection in all fitting ways of the public morals,—that is our chief concern.

MR. WHEELER.—I never knew that morality was corrected by crime. It is a crime for anybody to open a letter or package which has been sealed and deposited in the mail. It is the business of the parents and guardians, and of those who are put to look after the young children, to see what their correspondence is after it is opened, and not to send a minion of the Young Men's Christian Association to search through the mail-bags of the United States. Now if any obscene letter is received by a young man or young woman, if they will only show that letter to their guardian, then the authorities can take that open letter, and trace it back to its nefarious origin, and set the law at work to bring down condign punishment upon the offender. But just so long as any excuse is made for the violation of the mails, just so long will there be a searching among the private papers of the people. The plea of the protection of the morality of the public is what they base their action upon. And this is why we ask you to pass this resolution now, and not defer it to another year and another century.

MR. POTTER.—If the resolution pointed very clearly to one thing that this gentleman refers to as occurring, the opening of the mail-bags, I think everybody here would agree to it; but let him bring forward the facts. He tells us here that there is a man in the post-office department who does this thing.

MR. WHEELER.—The gentleman's name is Comstock.

MR. POTTER.—Will you tell us some facts in relation to this matter that we can act upon, before we pass a resolution of this kind? It seems to me that we have not the facts; and, further, the resolution does not point emphatically to that clear statement. Let us have an investigation of that, if necessary; but I think that underneath the resolution there is something else,—something with which the laws are not connected, and with which we here, as a Liberal League organized for the purpose of the secularization of the State and the school, are not concerned,—something that concerns social morality,—something that concerns the purity of our homes; and I should stand by my friend, and say that, whatever else we do in this Liberal League, let us by no means do anything that will corrupt the purity of our children. Whatever else we do, let us stand by society in its integrity; let us stand by the right of society to protect itself against the criminal class and the right of the government to protect itself against the criminal class. I agree perfectly with those who have spoken here upon the criminality of this examination of the mails by the government. I will go the farthest in protesting against the assumption by anybody of the right in the United States to open the private mails of citizens. That was done in the pro-slavery times, when they did not allow "abolition" papers to go down South. But there is another question here, and a question which ought to be decided seriously. Let us have this matter referred to the Directors, that they may investigate and bring forward the facts, and have this matter presented in a somewhat clearer manner at the next Annual Congress.

MR. KILGORE.—I perfectly agree with the last speaker. I think there should be an investigation, and a thorough one. Let us pass upon this by a vote; we shall not do any good by further discussion. It is now eleven o'clock, and there are notices to be given, and we want to do a little more business. I hope that investigations will be made, and, if the Board of Directors are not the proper persons to do it, I would move the appointment of a special committee. I now call for the previous question.

THE PRESIDENT.—The previous question is called for and seconded. Shall the main question be now put?

Agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT.—The question is now on the motion to refer Mr. Andrews' preamble and resolution to the Board of Directors, to be reported on at the next Annual Congress.

The vote being taken on this question, the motion prevailed.

Eighth Session, Tuesday Morning, July 4.

MR. UNDERWOOD.—I have now another resolution to submit on behalf of the committee:—

"Resolved, That this League, while it recognizes the great importance and the absolute necessity of guarding by proper legislation against obscene and indecent publications, whatever sect, party, order, or class such publications claim to favor, disapprove and protests against all laws which, by reason of indefinite-ness or ambiguity, shall permit the prosecution and punishment of honest and conscientious men for presenting to the public what they deem essential to the public welfare, when the views thus presented do not violate in thought or language the acknowledged rules of decency; and that we demand that all laws against obscenity and indecency shall be so clear and explicit that none but actual offenders against the recognized principles of purity shall be liable to suffer therefrom.

"Resolved, That we cannot but regard the appointment and authorization by the government of a single individual to inspect our mails, with power to exclude therefrom whatever he deems objectionable, as a delegation of authority dangerous to public and personal liberty, and utterly inconsistent with the genius of free institutions."

With regard to these resolutions, I would say that many members regret the non-passage last evening of Mr. Andrews' resolution. Some action of the sort ought to be taken at this time, and these resolutions have been so framed as to obviate the objections then expressed. They seem to embrace everything that is desired. As the time is very short before we must adjourn, I hope there will be little or no discussion upon them, and that we shall act upon them at once.

MR. ANDREWS.—I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The President then stated the question on the resolutions.

MR. POTTER.—I supposed that this whole subject had been referred to the Directors by the resolution instructing them to report on this subject at the next annual Congress. This resolution is somewhat similar to the one then rejected; I think it is much better than that, but still it is objectionable. I think the whole matter should be referred to the next Congress.

MR. MCARTHUR.—I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered. The main question being then put, the resolutions were adopted.

POWER OF CONGRESS OVER THE MAILS.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, OCTOBER TERM, 1877.

MATTER OF JACKSON.

1. The power vested in Congress to establish "post-offices and post-roads" embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country. Under it Congress may designate what shall be carried in the mail, and what shall be excluded.
2. In the enforcement of regulations excluding matter from the mail, a distinction is to be made between different kinds of mail-matter; between what is intended to be kept free from inspection, such as letters and sealed packages subject to letter postage; and what is open to inspection, such as newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and other printed matter, purposely left in a condition to be examined.
3. Letters and sealed packages subject to letter postage in the mail can only be opened and examined under like warrant, issued upon similar oath or affirmation, particularly describing the thing to be seized, as is required when papers are subjected to search in one's own household. The constitutional guaranty of the right of the people to be secure in their papers against unreasonable searches and seizures extends to their papers thus closed against inspection wherever they may be.
4. Regulations against the transportation in the mail of printed matter, which is open to examination, cannot be enforced so as to interfere in any manner with the freedom of the press. Liberty of circulating is essential to that freedom. When, therefore, printed matter is excluded from the mail, its transportation in any other way cannot be forbidden by Congress.
5. Regulations excluding matter from the mail may be enforced through the courts, upon competent evidence of their violation obtained in other ways than by the unlawful inspection of letters and sealed packages; and with respect to objectionable printed matter, open to examination, they may in some cases also be enforced by the direct action of the officers of the postal service upon their own inspection, as where the object is exposed and shows unmistakably that it is prohibited, as in the case of an obscene picture or print.
6. When a party is convicted of an offence, and sentenced to pay a fine, it is within the discretion of the court to order his imprisonment until the fine is paid.

On petition for writs of habeas corpus and certiorari.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court. Section 3,894 of the Revised Statutes provides that "No letter or circular concerning (illegal) lotteries, so-called gift-concerts, or other similar enterprises offering prizes, or concerning schemes devised and intended to deceive and defraud the public for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences, shall be carried in the mail"; and that "any person who shall knowingly deposit or send anything to be conveyed by mail, in violation of this section, shall be punishable by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars nor less than one hundred dollars, with costs of prosecution." By an act passed in July, 1876, the word "illegal" was stricken out of the section. Under the law as thus amended the petitioner was indicted, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, for knowingly and unlawfully depositing, on the 23d of February, 1877, at that district, in the mail of the United States, to be conveyed in it, a circular concerning a lottery offering prizes, inclosed in an envelope addressed to one J. Ketcham, at Gloversville, New York. The indictment sets forth the offence in separate counts, so as to cover every form in which it could be stated under the act. Upon being arraigned the petitioner stood mute, refusing to plead, and thereupon a plea of not guilty was entered in his behalf by order of the court (Rev. Stat., § 1,032). He was subsequently tried, convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of one hundred dollars, with the costs of the prosecution, and to be committed to the county jail until the fine and costs were paid. Upon his commitment, which followed, he presented to this court a petition alleging that he was imprisoned and restrained of his liberty by the marshal of the Southern District of New York, under the conviction; that such conviction was illegal, and that the illegality consisted in this: that the court had no jurisdiction to punish him for the acts charged in the indictment; that the act under which the indictment was drawn was unconstitutional and void; and that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in committing him until the fine was paid. He therefore prayed for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the marshal to bring him before the court, and a writ of certiorari to be directed to the clerk of the Circuit Court to send up the record of his conviction, that this court might inquire into the cause and legality of his imprisonment. Accompanying the petition as exhibits were copies of the indictment and of the record of conviction. The court, instead of ordering that the writs issue at once, entered a rule, the counsel of the petitioner consenting thereto, that cause be shown, on a day designated, why the writs should not issue as prayed, and that a copy of the rule be served on the Attorney-General of the United States, the marshal of the Southern District of New York, and the clerk of the Circuit Court. The attorney-general, for himself and others, answered the rule by averring that the petition and exhibits do not make out a case in which this court has jurisdiction to order the writs to issue, and that the petitioner is in lawful custody by virtue of the proceedings and sentence mentioned in the exhibits, and the commitment issued thereon.

The power vested in Congress "to establish post-offices and post-roads" has been practically construed, since the foundation of the government, to authorize not merely the designation of the routes over which the mail shall be carried, and the offices where letters and other documents shall be received to be distributed or forwarded, but the carriage of the mail, and all measures necessary to secure its safe and speedy transit and the prompt delivery of its contents. The validity of legislation prescribing what should be carried, and its weight and form, and the charges to which it should be subjected, has never been questioned. What should be mailable has varied at different times, changing with the facility of transportation over the post-roads. At one time only letters, newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and other printed matter, not exceeding eight ounces in weight, were carried; afterward books were added to the list, and now small packages of merchandise, not exceeding a prescribed weight, as well as books and printed matter of all kinds, are transported in the mail. The power possessed by Congress embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country. The right to designate what shall be carried necessarily involves the right to determine what shall be excluded. The difficulty attending the subject arises, not from the want of power in Congress to prescribe regulations as to what shall constitute mail-matter, but from the necessity of enforcing them consistently with rights reserved to the people, of far greater importance than the transportation of the mail. In their enforcement a distinction is to be made between different kinds of mail-matter; between what is intended to be kept free from inspection, such as letters and sealed packages subject to letter postage; and what is open to inspection, such as newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and other printed matter, purposely left in a condition to be examined. Letters and sealed packages of this kind in the mail are as fully guarded from examination and inspection, except as to their outward form and weight, as if they were retained by the parties forwarding them in their own domiciles. The constitutional guaranty of the right of the people to be secure in their papers against unreasonable searches and seizures extends to their papers, thus closed against inspection, wherever they may be; whilst in the mail they can only be opened and examined under like warrant, issued upon similar oath or affirmation, particularly describing the thing to be seized, as is required when papers are subjected to search in one's own household. No law of Congress can place in the hands of officials connected with the postal service any authority to invade the secrecy of letters and such sealed packages in the mail; and all regulations adopted as to mail-matter of this kind must be in subordination to the great principle embodied in the fourth amendment of the Constitution.

Nor can any regulations be enforced against the transportation of printed matter in the mail, which is open to examination, so as to interfere in any manner with the freedom of the press. Liberty of circulating is as essential to that freedom as liberty of publishing; indeed, without the circulation the publication would be of little value. If, therefore, printed matter be excluded from the mails, its transportation in any other way cannot be forbidden by Congress.

In 1838, the question as to the power of Congress to exclude publications from the mail was discussed in the Senate, and the prevailing opinion of its members, as expressed in debate, was against the existence of the power. President Jackson, in his annual message of the previous year, had referred to the attempted circulation through the mail of inflammatory appeals addressed to the passions of the slaves, in prints, and in various publications, tending to stimulate them to insurrection, and suggested to Congress the propriety of passing a law prohibiting, under severe penalties, such circulation of "incendiary publications" in the Southern States. In the Senate, that portion of the message was referred to a select committee, of which Mr. Calhoun was chairman; and he made an elaborate report on the subject, in which he contended that it belonged to the States, and not to Congress, to determine what is and what is not calculated to disturb their security, and that to hold otherwise would be fatal to the States; for if Congress might determine what papers were incendiary, and as such prohibit their circulation through the mail, it might also determine what were not incendiary and enforce their circulation. Whilst, therefore, condemning in the strongest terms the circulation of the publications, he insisted that Congress had not the power to pass a law prohibiting their transmission through the mail, on the ground that it would abridge the liberty of the press. "To understand," he said, "more fully the extent of the control which the right of prohibiting circulation through the mail would give to the government over the press, it must be borne in mind that the power of Congress over the post-office and the mail is an exclusive power. It must also be remembered that Congress, in the exercise of this power, may declare any road or navigable water to be a post road; and that, by the act of 1825, it is provided 'that no stage, or other vehicle which regularly performs trips on a post-road, or on a road parallel to it, shall carry letters.' The same provision extends to packets, boats, or other vessels on navigable waters. Like provision may be extended to newspapers and pamphlets, which, if it be admitted that Congress has the right to discriminate in reference to their character, what papers shall or what shall not be transmitted by the mail, would subject the freedom of the press, on all subjects, political, moral, and religious, completely to its will and pleasure. It would, in fact, in some respects, more effectually control the freedom of the press than any seditious law, however severe its penalties." Mr. Calhoun, at the same time, contended that when a State had pronounced certain publications to be dangerous to its peace and prohibited their circulation, it was the duty of Congress to respect its laws and cooperate in their enforcement; and whilst, therefore, Congress could not prohibit the transmission of the incendiary documents through the mails, it could prevent their delivery by the postmasters in the States where their circulation was forbidden. In the discussion upon the bill reported by him, similar views against the power of Congress were expressed by other Senators, who did not concur in the opinion that the delivery of papers could be prevented when their transmission was permitted.

Great reliance is placed by the petitioner upon these views, coming as they did, in many instances, from men alike distinguished as jurists and statesmen. But it is evident that they were founded upon the assumption that it was competent for Congress to prohibit the transportation of newspapers and pamphlets over postal routes in any other way than by mail; and of course it would follow that if, with such a prohibition, the transportation in the mail could also be forbidden, the circulation of the documents would be destroyed, and a fatal blow given to the freedom of the press. But we do not think that Congress possesses the power to prevent the transportation in other ways, as merchandise, of matter which it excludes from the mails. To give efficiency to its regulations and prevent rival postal systems, it may perhaps prohibit the carriage by others for hire over postal routes of articles which legitimately constitute mail-matter, in the sense in which those terms were used when the Constitution was adopted,—consisting of letters, and of newspapers and pamphlets when not sent as merchandise; but further than this its power of prohibition cannot extend.

Whilst regulations excluding matter from the mail cannot be enforced in a way which would require or permit an examination into letters or sealed packages subject to letter postage, without warrant issued upon oath or affirmation, in the search for prohibited matter, they may be enforced upon competent evidence of their violation obtained in other ways, as from the parties receiving the letters or packages, or from agents depositing them in the post-office, or others cognizant of the facts. And as to objectionable printed matter, which is open to examination, the regulations may be enforced in a similar way, by the imposition of penalties for their violation through the courts, and, in some cases, by the direct action of the officers of the postal service. In many instances those officers can act upon their own inspection, and from the nature of the case must act without other proof, as where the postage is not prepaid, or where there is an excess of weight over the amount prescribed, or where the object is exposed and shows unmistakably that it is prohibited, as in the case of an obscene picture or print. In such cases no difficulty arises, and no principle is violated in excluding the prohibited articles, or refusing to forward them. The evidence respecting them is seen by every one and is in its nature conclusive.

In excluding various articles from the mail the object of Congress has not been to interfere with the freedom of the press, or with any other rights of the people, but to refuse its facilities for the distribution of matter deemed injurious to the public morals. Thus, by the act of March 3, 1873, Congress declared "that no obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, print, or other publication of an indecent character, or any article or thing designed or intended for the prevention of conception or procuring of abortion, nor any article or thing intended or adapted for any indecent or immoral use or nature, nor any written or printed card, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where, or how, or of whom, or by what means either of the things before mentioned may be obtained or made, nor any letter upon the envelope of which, or postal-card upon which, indecent or scurrilous epithets may be written or printed, shall be carried in the mail, and any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, any of the hereinbefore mentioned articles or things... shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall, for every offence, be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, or imprisoned at hard labor not less than one year nor more than ten years, or both, in the discretion of the judge."

All that Congress meant by this act was, that the mail should not be used to transport such corrupting publications and articles, and that any one who attempted to use it for that purpose should be punished. The same inhibition has been extended to circulars concerning lotteries, institutions which are supposed to have a demoralizing influence upon the people. There is no question before us as to the evidence upon which the conviction of the petitioner was had; nor does it appear whether the envelope in which the prohibited circular was deposited in the mail was sealed or left open for examination. The only question for our determination relates to the constitutionality of the act, and of that we have no doubt.

The commitment of the petitioner to the county jail until his fine is paid was within the discretion of the court under the statute.

As there is an exemplified copy of the record of the petitioner's indictment and conviction accompanying the petition, the merits of his case have been considered at his request upon this application; and as we are of opinion that his imprisonment is legal, no object would be subserved by issuing the writs; they are, therefore, denied.—Albany Law Journal, June 8.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK—HIS WORK AND WAYS.

The fourth annual report of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, or rather the report of Anthony Comstock, who is the society for all practical purposes, gives the record of a very energetic raid upon the panders of the meanest vices which sap the virtue and strength of human kind. The vignette of the report indicates in very unmistakable terms the spirit and purpose of the crusade which Mr. Comstock is leading. Two scenes appear. In one, Comstock is handing over to the flames the tons of corrupt literature which he has seized. In the other, the manufacturer or vender of the same, with hands pinioned behind his back, fronts a prison cell, into which he is pushed by a vigorous policeman. Grim punishments for vile offences constitute in brief the policy of the society. The report of matter seized during the last year shows that the traffic has been reduced or driven into more secret places than it occupied before, and that there is some possibility of making the world too hot for any open attempt to debauch the young.

There is nothing pleasant in the subject. However necessary it may be to uncover the hideous secrets, which are always to be found if one will go deep enough after them, there is nothing agreeable in the process by which they are brought out to infect the sweet air breathed by the innocent, and to make even the sunshine seem to lose its purity. To some extent, it is necessary to probe society to its most sore and unclean recesses, in order that those who will may cooperate in taking away the causes of disease. To some extent, it is necessary to expose in all their hideous deformity the wretches who, without passion or scruple, in cold-blooded covetousness, put lures to catch the innocent, and through the power of wholesome natural impulses lead them on to pernicious indulgences.

The work is unpleasant, but it is necessary; and we hope that Mr. Comstock may be sustained in doing the legitimate part of his work. We say the legitimate part, because we see a danger which has already threatened his influence. No one can see him, and note his manner of speech, without marking the intense, dogged determination, and the instinct which rejoices in battle, that make him so formidable an enemy of these wretched creatures. He hates them and their works, and is in danger of hating those who do not come to his help against them. But he not only hates these men who are guilty of criminal practices, but he also regards with abhorrence those who differ from him in opinion on matters of morality and religion. The danger is that he will attempt to carry on his crusade against all manner of delusions and vagaries of opinion; and, by confounding erroneous beliefs and vicious practices, alienate the sympathies of those who believe in liberty of thought and speech in all matters of opinion. We quote a few lines from the report to show what we mean:—

"Another class of publications issued by free lovers and free thinkers is in a fair way of being stamped out. The public generally can scarcely be aware of the extent that blasphemy and filth commingled have found vent through these varied channels. Under a plausible pretence, men who raise a howl about 'free press,' 'free speech,' etc., ruthlessly trample under feet the most sacred things, breaking down the altars of religion, bursting asunder the ties of home, and seeking to overthrow every social restraint."

When the agent of a society for the suppression of vice begins to put into the same list of things to be suppressed, not only obscene literature and other vile matter which is made and sold with direct intent to debauch the young, but also whatever he considers to be pernicious in tendency or blasphemous in expression among the works of free thinkers, he may, if he be a bigot, very easily slip into a course of action which would, in the end, rob him of all power, even in his legitimate calling.

Objection is made to his work or manner of working for various reasons; namely, and for example:—

1. They object who do not believe in prohibiting any sin by law, excepting in cases where the evil effects of it cannot be warded off by the free will of the people. They believe the evil is exaggerated by the efforts to suppress it, and would rely upon education to make temptation powerless.

The answer to this might be that if the devils who do this vile work addressed themselves only to adults, there would be force in the objection. But so long as they deal with children who have not reached the age of discretion, their victims are as defenceless as if force were used.

2. It is objected that Mr. Comstock uses deceptions, lies, and stratagems,—traps to catch vermin,—that he commits a crime to catch a criminal.

Our comment upon this must be that the informer is always in danger of becoming a liar, but that it is better to let the vicious escape than to catch them by lies. Caution, secrecy, wariness, craftiness even, are essential to the work of a good detective. But better that the infamous Madams Restell should be alive now than that she should have been snared and driven to suicide by a lie told by a Christian.

3. Objection is made that Mr. Comstock is excited by sectarian rancor, and that his real object is to drive out of the mails all the literature of infidelity or free religion. We do not believe this is anything but an incidental danger; and we think Mr. Abbot in THE INDEX has nobly met the issue, showing that liberals of every sort will serve their own cause best by making it clear that they can have no sympathy with vice or its agents, while they will resist any encroachments upon the liberty of speaking, writing, publishing, or circulating any honest opinions, however erroneous they may be.

We find in this work what is always the case: those who from a higher level of culture and purity go down to the depths of any sinful practice, to investigate and to redeem, are likely to become impressed with the idea that it is a growing and well-nigh fatal disease. We believe the fact to be that there is with each generation, taking civilized society at large, less wickedness, open or secret; and that in time good education will drive corruption out of the secret places of literature, as it has already cleaned its high places and public shrines. Rightly used, Mr. Comstock may be one of the efficient agents of such good education; and we heartily wish that he may have vigor, discretion, and justice sufficient to give him a lasting and shining success.—Christian Register.

BISMARCK AND THE PAPAL NUNCIO.

It has not been easy to understand the change in the attitude of Germany toward the Papacy. From a position of antagonism so positive that Germany has come to be looked upon as the European champion of social and civil liberty against Papal encroachment, the scene shifts of a sudden, and we find Bismarck coquetting at Klessengen with the Papal Nuncio. There is talk of compromises, demands, concessions, conferences, arrangements, and what not, with statements of what the Pope insists upon, and what he will or will not accept. All this is apparently as much of a surprise to the Germans themselves as to people who view what is going on at a greater remove of interest and distance. The comments of the German press reflect something of curiosity and something of indignation at the unwonted spectacle of Bismarck negotiating with the Ultramontanes. The principles involved are the same as formerly; there is just as much reason for opposing the control of the Church in affairs of State as when the Falk laws were passed; the spirit of the Papacy has not essentially changed; and the popular regard for liberty has certainly grown no less. Why, then, has there been a change in the attitude of Bismarck toward the Vatican?

The answer is to be found in the difficulties—political and financial—which the necessity of maintaining an immense war-establishment has entailed upon Germany. These difficulties are very clearly stated in the Berlin correspondence of the London Times. The cost of the military and naval departments is defrayed by the Empire, and by the Federal arrangement the entire income from customs and excise was surrendered to the Imperial authorities. At the same time the empire was denied the right to raise direct taxes, and it was provided that in case the revenue proved insufficient to cover the military expenses, the extras required should be contributed by the individual States. Military expenses have been steadily increasing, and the extras which had to be claimed of the individual States rose from 70,000,000 marks in 1872 to 81,000,000 marks in 1877; and if it had not been for the expenditure of the remainder of the French indemnity, they would have been 109,000,000 marks in the latter year. This led, of course, to an annually recurring debate in each of the State Parliaments, with a certain amount of hostile criticism against the policy which entailed such an enormous expenditure upon a people suffering under industrial depression. The aggregate expenditures for the army and navy have risen from 263,000,000 marks in 1874 to 323,000,000 in 1878, and the volume of popular and parliamentary complaint has swollen in direct ratio.

Bismarck has therefore sought for devices to make the imperial exchequer independent of parliamentary grants. The transfer of private railways to the government, the imposition of a petroleum tax, and the establishment of a tobacco monopoly are measures which have been persistently urged, in turn, only to be abandoned when it appeared that it was impossible to secure their adoption. Next came the suggestion of a general increase of the tariff. The dissolution of Parliament was resolved upon in order to secure a conservative majority for the government's support; but the liberals, though losing thirty seats, remain the dominant party. The present negotiations with the Papal Nuncio appear to have for their object the arrangement of a coalition between the Conservatives and the Ultramontanes,—the government to make certain concessions to the Catholic interests and to receive in return the Ultramontane vote for army and navy supplies. In other words, the maintenance of the existing war establishment is recognized as the first necessity, by which alone the dominant position of Germany in European politics can be maintained, and the religious question is to be put in the background as of secondary importance.

This interpretation of the Klessengen conference may be incorrect, but it at least serves to explain what otherwise would be almost inexplicable. The scheme is a bold one and involves many contingencies. There is a question how far the crown will go in ratifying concessions to the Vatican; and there is a further question how long or how firmly the Ultramontanes could be held together in voting grants to cement a power which they have learned to hate. There is at least a good chance that the projected coalition may drop to pieces before it is once fairly formed.—Boston Journal.

THE GERMAN MUSE vs. THE ENGLISH.

FROM THE GERMAN OF KLOPSTOCK.*

Glowing with rivalry, I saw the Muse
Of German-land with Britain's Muse contend.
Two goals of emulation dimly rose
Afar erected at the arena's end.

One goal with orient palms o'ershadowed stood,
While Druid boughs above the other sighed;
Inured to conflict, and of haughty mood,
The Britoness her crownless rival eyed.

Over the lists had oft careered her feet,
For 'gainst the Muse of Hellas she had run,
And with Rome's loftiest genius dared compete,
And in the contest bays immortal won.

Her rival there before her trembling stood
With eagerness, not fear, for she was bold.
The rose of victory on her flushed cheek glowed,
And o'er her shoulders waved her locks of gold.

Her breath scarce in her heaving breast she held;
She thought the herald's trumpet pealing rung;
Glistened her eyes with joy; her bosom swelled,
As towards the goal she bending forward hung.

Proud of her rival, of herself more proud,
With haughty glance the Britoness surveyed
Tulaco's glorious daughter; then aloud,
Ah! yes, we grew together in the forest's shade.

Old bards about our cradles darkling sang;
Their boughs above us waved the oak-groves hoar;
But in mine ears an idle rumor rang
Long since, that thou, my sister, wast no more.

Pardon, if thou art an immortal too;
At yonder barrier I the truth shall learn.
It standeth there, the goal of oaks in view;
And, farther on, canst thou the goal of palms discern?

Thou standest mute; but ah, full well I know
That daring scarce repressed, that silence proud,
Those looks of fire, which, darting earthward, glow,
Are each more eloquent than utterance loud.

Yet ere his perilous note the herald sound—
And ere thy breast the trumpet's signal thrills,
Bethink thee; I invincible was found
By Her of Hellas and the Seven Hills!

She spake; the herald with his trump drew near
The signal of the struggle dread to peal;
Daughter of Albion to me most dear,—
For thee profoundest loyalty I feel.

Warily I love thee; but e'en more than thee
The imperishable bay, the conqueror's meed;
Seize, if thou wilt, the wreath of victory;
A moiety of renown at least to me concede.

How throb; my pulse! hark! hark! the goal sublime,
Ye powers immortal, I may first attain!
Feeling thy breath, O Britoness, meantime
Stirring my locks, as I the triumph gain!

Madden the trumpet sounded, and they flew,
As flies an eagle o'er the vast career;
But dust-clouds rising wrapt them from the view,
As they unto the goal of oaks drew near.

B. W. BALL.

*The above almost forgotten ode of the German Milton, as Klopstock was called, was written in the eighteenth century before the great German poets and philosophers had been universally recognized, before Goethe was acknowledged as the peer of Shakespeare, and Kant as the supreme thinker of the modern world and the vindicator of human reason against dogma and authority. The German Muse did not enter the lists till late, until after her English rival had won triumph after triumph, from Chaucer to Milton; but she at length showed herself to be the peer of her elder sister of Albion. Germany was stigmatized as the land of learned stupidity till the last part of the eighteenth century, when Madame De Staël showed that the intellectual primacy of Europe belonged to her. Her supremacy now in the domain of thought is unquestioned.

The Index.

BOSTON, SEPT. 19, 1878.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FARM, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

N. B.—The following resolution was adopted by the National Liberal League, at Philadelphia, July 3, 1876: "Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management."

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

F. R. A. REPORT.

The Eleventh Annual Report of the Free Religious Association, printed in pamphlet form, is now ready for distribution. It contains the reports of the Executive Committee and Treasurer; essay by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., of New York, on "The Religion of Humanity, and How it may be Organized"; essay by Rev. W. H. Spencer, of Haverhill, on "The Religion of Supernaturalism, and How it is being Disorganized"; and addresses by O. B. Frothingham, George W. Curtis, Anna C. Garlin, Maurice Ellinger, and Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith (the latter including a poem).

Members of the Association who have paid the annual fee of $1.00 within the last twelve months will receive the report free, in all cases where their post-office addresses are known. To others the price is forty cents single copy; four or more in one package, twenty-five cents each.

Address "Free Religious Association," 231 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD will lecture next Sunday at Paine Hall, on "A View of the Situation."

"REFORM, to be successful, must be impartial and complete." So says the Tribune. That is precisely the purpose of the National Liberal League, which gathers up all the "Demands of Liberalism" in the one comprehensive principle, "Total Separation of Church and State."

MR. STEVENS' tribute to the memory of Rev. W. H. Knapp is exceedingly just. Though not intimately acquainted with Mr. Knapp, we never met him without great pleasure, nor left him without having heard something worth remembering. A good man has gone to his rest; he will not be forgotten.

PROFESSOR JAMES E. OLIVER, of Ithaca, N. Y., kindly permits us to add his name to our list of editorial contributors, and will send such articles as his time and strength allow. His fine letter to the Watkins Convention, published this week, will make our readers wish for frequent messages from him.

GOVERNOR BISHOP, of Ohio, whose proclamation summoning all Christian people in that State to pray for the stay of the pestilence at the South has already been referred to in these columns, was called upon by Messrs. D. Wolf and B. Simon, Israelites of Cincinnati, to explain whether he meant to leave out all but "Christians" in his exhortation. The governor replied (and the correspondence is published) in a way which will exasperate the theologians to a pitch of fury—for he includes Jews under that word! This is what he says: "The word 'Christian' was used by me only as a general term, intended to embrace all who recognized and relied upon divine protection in the hour of need, and was by no means intended to exclude any of any sect, creed, belief, or school who would give a prayer for the alleviation of a plague, and, least of all, to exclude a people of whom you are members, who are recognized and illustrious for deeds of mercy and charity." The governor ought to get a patent on his new definition of Christianity.

A CARD.

We, the undersigned, Directors of the National Liberal League, offer ourselves as candidates for reelection at the Second Annual Congress of the League, on the following platform of principles:—

1. The right of absolute individual freedom of thought, of speech, and of the press, on all political, religious, social, or other questions, and the right of being wholly uninterfered with by the courts, no matter what opinions as such may be advocated or promulgated.

2. The right and duty of Congress and State Legislatures to pass, and the right and duty of the National and State courts to enforce, laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails; provided, that the offence known as "obscenity" shall be so strictly defined in the statutes as to render impossible the prosecution or punishment of any one for the expression of his honest opinions on any subject.

3. The flagrant wrong of intrusting the execution of the laws for the suppression of obscene literature to any official or officials who shall not scrupulously confine their action within the limits here clearly defined.

And we decline to be candidates for reelection if the principles of the above platform shall fail to be approved by the National Liberal League at this Congress.

PUBLIC DISCUSSION vs. SECRET PLOTS.

From numerous independent sources during the past few months, we have received information that a secret movement is on foot to surprise and capture the National Liberal League at its next Annual Congress for the purpose of making it reverse its record, and come out in favor of the total repeal of the obscene literature laws as opposed to their radical reform. A private letter, dated September 7, conjectures the following programme of operations:—

I think we ought all to make one resolute stand, and strive to our utmost to save the League from falling into disaster and utter wreck. Let me tell you what I think. First, there will be an attempt made to seize the organization of the convention, displacing yourself from the Presidency of the League, and putting in that position either Bennett or some one in affiliation with him. With their own man in the Chair, they will have, as they did at Watkins, a Business Committee, so far as the majority is concerned, of their own sort and kind. Falling in the first step, if they should, they will endeavor to secure the Business Committee on Resolutions, and should they perchance fail there, they will resolutely seek to have a large enough representation on hand in the convention to vote down the resolutions they do not want and to vote up those they do. I apprehend that the delegates from New York city may vote solidly one way; and the danger is that from New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, in all which cities, as I think, the Free Love doctrine has obtained among liberals a considerable foothold, the convention may be overborne and swamped. Then there is more or less of an infusion of this virus all through the country. But I believe that, if the people at large were fully posted in regard to what is up, and would send in their delegates, we should find the declaration would be on the right side.

The success of this secret movement would be the utter perversion of the National Liberal League from its original objects, and the certain destruction of its growing influence. At the time of its birth, the League assumed a firm and wise position on this "obscene literature" question; and it needs now to maintain this position with increased clearness, vigor, and emphasis. If it should now abandon or in any degree weaken this position—if it should consent to parley or compromise with the "free-love" folly, or surrender itself to the management of those who are deluded by its feeble sophistries,—the National Liberal League will simply commit suicide. Those of its members whose character, ability, and reputation have commanded for the League no small measure of public respect will speedily retire from its membership. The organization will soon tumble to pieces, and one more monument will be erected to the executive incapacity of liberals as a class.

The Directors of the League have, therefore, felt it their duty to act with boldness and promptitude. Instead of stooping to tricks or opposing plots by counter-plots, they have resolved to lay the whole case candidly before the liberal public, and abide by their deliberate, well-considered decision. The success of every plot depends on its secrecy; and the Directors have put it within the power of the League, by informing them fully of the vital issues at stake and providing effectually against any attempt to pack the convention, to defeat the present plot utterly, and to settle these issues with freedom, wisdom, and dignity.

In addition to the "Call" for the Second Annual Congress of the League, the Directors also publish this week a "Card," to both of which we invite special attention. Persistent attempts have been made to obscure and cloud the real issues at stake, and to convince the liberals that they must either surrender their liberties altogether or else demand the total repeal of the "obscene literature" laws. To scatter this fog and to bring out the real issues with clearness, the Directors have announced in their "Card" a platform of principles identical in substance with those proclaimed by the League at Philadelphia. Further, in order to concentrate public attention upon these principles, and ensure a careful and deliberate public judgment of their real value, the present Directors offer themselves as candidates for reelection, to stand or fall with the principles thus put forward. It is needless to say that they are not at all anxious for reelection; they will be glad to be released from public service, if a new and well-chosen Board of Directors shall be elected on the same platform; they will cordially and earnestly unite in sustaining such new officers to the best of their power. But meanwhile they feel it their duty to represent these principles before the public, and to bear the standard till it can be put into better hands; they despise the affectation of coyness and false modesty, and say publicly that these principles are too vitally important to the welfare and progress of the liberal cause not to be represented for the time being by candidates who will avowedly share their fate. For this reason alone they take the somewhat unusual, though not unprecedented, step of volunteering their own candidature; and they know that their motives will be misconstrued by no generous or just mind.

Now let the platform and candidates of the "repeal" party be presented to the public with equal frankness. If it possesses better principles than those of the "Card," let it not hide its candlestick under a bushel. Let there be no miserable personalities, but a strong, fair, frank discussion of both sides of this subject. We call upon the advocates of "repeal" of the laws in question to show by argument, without distortion or misrepresentation, wherein the principles set forth in the "Card" are either false, or inadequate, or to be improved; and to state without verbiage or ambiguity exactly what principles they themselves propose instead. If they are unable to do this, the public will find it out and act accordingly.

We "take the bull by the horns." We propose to fight darkness with light,—secret plots with public discussion; and if the "repeal" party expect to carry their point at the Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, we give them warning that they must do it by fair, open, and honorable means, and by these alone. If by such means they can convince the League that "repeal," and not "reform," is the measure needed to protect freedom of the press and the mails, well and good; the only object of the Directors is to secure for the Congress the conditions of a fair debate and vote on the merits of the question, and to prevent any underhanded operations by which such a fair debate and vote would be cut off. Let the Local Leagues understand that the delegates they send will be called upon to act on this question; and let them therefore choose such delegates as shall best represent their views. The fate of the National Liberal League is in its own hands; it may commit suicide, if it chooses to do so; its present officers have no object whatever but to protect it from being waylaid and assassinated. Meanwhile, they boldly and frankly state the principles of "reform" by which they themselves propose to stand or fall in this Congress; and they call upon the advocates of "repeal," if they have any principles which they dare set forth in opposition to these, to give them to the public with equal frankness, and to name the candidates who are to represent them. The liberal public will think none the worse of them, if they abandon the tricks of intrigue, misrepresentation, and abuse, manifest a little courage, and rely henceforth on the power of truth to win her own way in a fair field. Come, gentlemen who insist on "repeal" and scout "reform" as insufficient for the protection of freedom, publish your platform and your candidates to an anxious world!

IN MEMORIAM.

Rev. W. H. Knapp died in Cambridge, Saturday morning, September 7, after a protracted and distressing illness of nearly six months. He was born in Norton, Mass., September 19, 1811.

This death closes a most eventful and interesting life, stretching through a period of nearly seventy years; and yet a life passed almost wholly in New England, and indeed within a radius of less than one hundred miles of Boston. Those who have read Mr. Knapp's Autobiography, published anonymously about five years ago, a little book very characteristic of him in every way, so full of natural humor, combined with as great natural seriousness, abounding enthusiasm, and most charming candor, are already in possession of the leading facts and incidents of his noble and useful life. He commenced his manhood career as a minister of the Universalist denomination, being assisted and introduced to that ministry by Rev. Hosea Ballou, who was greatly impressed with the young man's hopeful promises. Mr. Knapp had been educated in the strictest Calvinism, but his naturally radical mind resisted the claims of that stern theology, and with manful struggles and pains he fought his way out of it into what was then the glorious light of Universalism. He remained with the Universalists only about three years, advancing from that denomination into what seemed to him the more philosophical and comprehensive one of the Unitarians. But Mr. Knapp was a born independent,—one who never stopped thinking and growing; and he soon found himself at variance with all fixed formulas of faith, even this last most rational one of Unitarianism, in which he discovered as many things to dissent from as to agree to. He however persisted in remaining in the Unitarian ministry until the last year of his life, yet maintaining at all times the most independent relations toward that body; his philosophy being so broad, and his spirit so truly liberal, that he always could include in his cordial fellowship genuine and honest men of the most diverse ways of thinking.

Mr. Knapp's robust individualism and independence in the ministry cost him the usual price demanded for such intellectual virtues. During his professional life of nearly fifty years he was probably the most itinerant clergyman that the Unitarian denomination ever tried to hold in its leashes. In the first thirty years of his ministry he "moved twenty-nine times; six times in four years." Not every one of these removals, however, was identical with a change of pastoral relations; and yet these changes run up into astonishingly large numbers. The longest settlement he had was that in Nantucket, which lasted seven years; and this, as he testifies, was the happiest part of his long ministerial service. Here he found an audience suited to his capacity,—intelligent, cultivated, and liberal.

Mr. Knapp was far more than an ordinary preacher. Without much grace, he had unusual strength as a thinker and speaker. Very thoughtful and thorough himself, his preaching made others think (if they were capable of it), and think thoroughly. While he was copious in illustrations from history, he did not go back into history for the subjects of his sermons. He did not preach about the sins of the Jews, and neglect to preach at the sins of Yankees. He spoke out of the living present, all affairs with the intellectual and moral issues of his own time. Slavery, Temperance, Transcendentalism, Parkerism,—none of these escaped his trenchant logic, his keen spiritual insight. He was every way a live preacher; and live people could not comfortably doze under his clear, ringing sermons: they either were made mad or made inspired by them. Fortunately, the Nantucket society liked just such a preacher; and with them Mr. Knapp might have remained for an indefinite time, had not reverses come upon the business of the place and ruined the prosperity of his parishioners.

His professional life before and after this delightful Nantucket period was full of bitter and painful vicissitudes. Few men could have held out through them all with such undaunted faith, such indomitable courage, such hopeful and even exulting spirits. But Mr. Knapp persevered with the gospel in his hand,—his gospel, not somebody else's; the gospel that the living God inspired him to preach, not that fixed up for him by some semi-defunct ecclesiasticism. And in the preaching of this gospel he had great joy as well as great trial; he never "went back on it" for fear of any sacrifice or for hope of any worldly gain. We do not say that the bitterness which entered into the cup of our friend's experience did not at all enter into his spirit. This perhaps would be saying too much. A tender and faithful lover he surely was; if a vigorous hater sometimes, what wonder? He could denounce as well as extol; and why not? He met a good many things in his life that seemed to him despicable, and he was a man always to say what he thought, not somewhat else. But much as he may have despised and denounced some human actions, he had never anything but humble and adoring gratitude and praise for the great Friend in whose integrity he ever trusted, and on whose strong arm he ever leaned. No sentimentalist in his piety was our friend; but his faith in God was ruddy and robust enough to include all the facts of this life. Where he could not see with outward eye, his inner vision climbed above all doubt and despair, and found sure footing on the antecedent probability. An optimist he was,—an optimist of reason and of faith.

During the last few years of his life Mr. Knapp has lived in Cambridge, in retirement, peace, and comfort, where the writer of this has known him well as a friend and neighbor. He was ever an ardent lover of Nature, a keen observer of her ways, and a most intelligent and careful cultivator of flowers, plants, and fruits. Children and youth, too, were his delight, and he had bestowed not a little of wise thought to the subject of their right education and training. Mr. Knapp altogether was a man only to be appreciated by those who knew him most intimately. Social, generous, sympathetic, and faithful in his nature, he was a man warmly to be valued and loved by his family and friends. His life, sickness, and death have given a signal triumph for that religious philosophy which is gaining ground in our modern thought, and which is full of intelligent and rational faith.

PROFESSOR OLIVER'S LETTER.

TO THE FREETHINKERS' CONVENTION, HELD AT WATKINS, N. Y., August, 1878:

Dear Friends,—Will you receive a written "testimony" from one who is unable to be present with you?

As freethinkers, our mission is twofold. First, we must maintain the right and duty of absolute freedom in thought and in discussion; provided always that what we say be truthful, courteous, and decent, appealing to the intellect and not to the passions, and that each of us endeavor to be kind and noble in his thoughts. And, secondly, we must use this freedom for the discovery and spread of truth; and especially of such truth as pertains to religious, political, or social science, and is likely to benefit mankind.

Upon each of these two topics I would submit a few ideas for your consideration.

I.

Thought and speech should be free. But are they free? If any one, whether Atheist, Calvinist, or Romanist, whether Communist or Tory, is ostracized, or even unkindly ridiculed, for opinions which he thoughtfully and conscientiously holds, then in the name of free thought let us protest against this offence, whether it happens to be committed against ourselves or against our opponents.

Distinct from, yet in spirit akin to, free thought and free speech, is the complete secularity of the State. The fundamental law, the levying of taxes, the precious weekly holiday, the yet more precious public schools, should be utterly without bias for or against any combination of religious sects. The State cannot undertake to bolster up a slowly-dying faith; and a live faith is better without its corrupting patronage. The State will best promote the highest interests of mankind by not prejudging questions upon which the best and wisest cannot as yet agree, and which hitherto have been treated chiefly by mere appeals to emotion and to conflicting authorities. In several ways this principle is now habitually violated in the interest of those who regard the Church, the Sabbath, and the Bible with almost superstitious reverence, and who cannot see that independently of these there can and should be high moral influence, moral teaching, moral enthusiasm,—and nowhere more than in the public schools.

This, as it seems to me, completes the liberal creed. Whoever earnestly and practically believes in "freedom, fellowship, and character," in every one's duty of fearlessly seeking and uttering the truth, and in holding the State to a policy of strict non-interference in religious matters,—he is a liberal and freethinker, and belongs with us, no matter what may be his faith concerning God or Christianity. If we stand consistently upon this broad ground, good men and women from all sects will at last unite with us, and the battle of free thought will be won. But the battle is not yet won. As long as good men say to us confidentially, "Your demands are just; but if I join you in urging them I shall grieve or alienate my friends and injure my worldly prospects," so long have Liberal Leagues and Free Thought Associations a work to do. With cheerfulness and dignity let us accept and live down the odium which others are afraid to share with us.

II.

Our second great duty as freethinkers is earnestly, fearlessly, yet carefully, to seek for truth; and to make known to others whatever truths we think are most needed and most certain. This duty rests directly upon us as individuals, and we are not committed by one another's utterances.

Great problems are before us. Let every one of us contribute his mite toward the solution of some problem, though it be but a single fact or suggestion; and let us be content to "hasten slowly," and to test and retest our work in every way until a doubt of its soundness is no longer possible. That is the method of science, and it succeeds.

Perhaps never in the world's history till now could the same method be well applied to religion; for thought cannot be scientific until it is free. The overshadowing authority of Church and Bible, the fear of hell, the notion that credulity is a virtue and scepticism a sin, have for centuries made religious science in America and Europe almost impossible. Its very foundations may be hardly recognized, lying underneath the rubbish, deep in the permanent needs and adaptations of the human soul.

Besides, religious science has had to wait for the emancipation of woman. Many of its data are connected with the affections and with moral idealism, and therefore can best be studied by her; but her mind must first be freed from superstition and accustomed to scientific methods.

Even now these studies must be slow, partly because one cannot well pursue them except in connection with his own maturing character; for the materials which we are to sift by scientific methods must be largely gathered from within ourselves.

Nor can the results be as yet foreseen. They may confirm whatever is most consoling and inspiring in the old religions. Some of the deeper analogies of science seem to me to point in this direction; while the popular notion that science has already answered the questions of God and the future life in a materialistic sense, I think is quite unfounded. It is true, however, that science has in three ways helped to discredit certain narrow creeds; namely: by disproving the Bible cosmology and enlarging our ideas of the universe; by raising a strong presumption against what are called "miracles"; and, above all, by teaching us to examine all things in a candid and impartial spirit. But however this may be, these studies will at least conduce to truth, and truth is better than error.

All this will come in time; but, first, let us deal with the urgent problems of to-day, such as: how to rescue men from drunkenness and vice, and lead them to a higher life; how to purify trade, politics, and the civil service, and stop the success of fraud and demagogism; how to raise the condition of the laborer; how best to educate our children; and how to inspire woman with so intelligent an interest in all that concerns the public welfare, that her advent into politics, instead of being feared as a new danger, shall be hailed as a deliverance.

Nor are we, meanwhile, without a religion. We have, or may have, the religion of unselfish devotion to others and to our own highest ideals,—the religion of character, of abiding and intelligent enthusiasm for humanity, and of complete intellectual honesty. Into our little human lives it will bring something of the grandeur of those infinite surroundings and high purposes amid which, and for which, we live. This religion the world needs now; and it may be providential that, until its lessons are learned, no certain knowledge of any future life is given us to divert our thoughts from the duties of this.

Friends, the night is passing. May all our lives and efforts be worthy of the coming day!

J. E. OLIVER.

AT THE weekly conference meetings, the Rev. Dr. Blank was a good deal pestered by a zealous brother who was very much edified by his own exhortations, and it was often deemed necessary to "head him off," by calling on somebody else to speak or pray just as he was about to begin. On one occasion, as he rose to speak, the pastor gently interrupted him by saying, "Brother, will you lead us in prayer?" The brother hesitated but a moment, and made answer: "I was about to offer a few remarks; but perhaps I can throw them into the form of a prayer."

MILWAUKEE LIBERAL NOTES.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

There are no positive movements of liberal thought to report from Milwaukee. The Liberal League is making no advance,—is seemingly self-satisfied to exist. The fact that the mere existence of men and women is in these times of financial depression an exhaustive struggle, will account largely for the lack of energy in the League movements. A business revival might induce a revival of radicalism; at least in this hope we must abide.

Liberal sentiment found a somewhat free expression at a Conference of Unitarian and Independent Societies held in this city, beginning August 23, and continuing over Sunday. Several of the essays read upon the occasion were of a higher order of merit than usual at these Conferences. They indicated an advance in keeping with the progressive thought of the day, but were rather strictly confined to subjects with which Unitarians, as such, could readily sympathize, and did not broaden out to take in other of the vital issues with which the time is fraught, and which need the coöperation of all liberal thinkers.

The Conference on the whole was indicative of a growing interest in the development of free religious ideas. Its social influence was helpful and inspiring to the circle of people immediately interested, and in some degree to those outside of it.

Among the most pleasing features of the Conference programme was a discourse by Rev. J. L. Dudley, of Boston, formerly pastor of Plymouth Church, Milwaukee, and now working with the society once under the care of Theodore Parker. Nothing could more plainly prove the fact that environment makes the individual than did this sermon of Mr. Dudley's. In the old place, Plymouth Church, the individuality of the man, although at all times marked, was not complete. There was a plain case, in the one instance, of a catering to prejudices, a policy as pastor of Plymouth society; at least, this was the pretty generally expressed public opinion. There was at the same time a plain case of chafing at this position. In the present instance there is manifest evidence of an escape from all this, and a growth in freedom of expression in consequence. Mr. Dudley made, indeed, an acknowledgment amounting to this effect, in presence of a large audience made up mostly of his old parishioners and hearers.

The entire discourse of Dr. Dudley was characterized by a frankness which was a matter of rejoicing to those friends who had always admired his fine, poetic nature, his cultured expression of free thought, and his genial, healthy atmosphere; who at the same time deplored that he could not be more loyal to the convictions which he was known to hold. This recent discourse was a source of great satisfaction to this class of admirers, who were pleased to find that the new environment was not at all cramping, but allowed the most outspoken freedom. The quality of Dr. Dudley's thought is of the finest, and, when united to liberty of expression, and lofty motives for the good of men and women, cannot fail to be productive of great good.

The Milwaukee Sunday Lecture Society has entered upon the third season of its work with an enthusiasm born of courage and former success. A fine programme of lectures and entertainments has been arranged, including the best talent in the country. The efforts of this society have been very creditable. It is altogether an unselfish undertaking. No profit accrues to any one, save the public and those who are engaged to appear upon their platform. The benefit is entirely a public one. The highest order of talent, both musical and literary, is afforded at the low price of twenty cents the single admission, and somewhat less than this by the purchase of season tickets. The attendance is usually large, and any special attraction fills the Academy of Music to overflowing. It gives an opportunity to a large class of persons, who would on any other day and at any higher price be denied it, to hear the best lecturers and the finest musical performers in the entertainment field.

The past summer has been remarkable for the lack of the ordinary Sabbath observances. The streets of our city are alive on each Sunday with pleasure-seekers. Unusual advantages have been afforded for these in the way of cheap excursions by rail and steamer. The river is also a scene of animation on Sunday afternoon and evening. Barges, steamers, and row-boats are constantly plying between the city and the summer resorts situated on its banks. The parks—such as we have—are filled with promenaders, and the lake shore boulevard is lined with equipages of every variety. All this, of course, runs counter to the notions of Christian churches; but the sympathy with Sunday pleasure-seeking is so universal that it may almost claim to be endorsed even by church-members, for many of the latter participate in the pleasures to a certain extent. Still, as they say, "they must stop somewhere." One lady of high standing in the church said, the past week, "she did not think it at all wicked to take a boat-ride up the river on a Sunday afternoon, with a party of friends, but thought it decidedly wrong to go on a regularly advertised excursion." This is a sample of the average consistency of the average church-member. Sabbatarian prejudices are rapidly disappearing under this new régime of Sunday recreation. The coming religion is to be not of deeds as related to days, but of deeds as related to the general good of mankind. A healthier sentiment is rapidly evolving, the Mosaic law being superseded by one the object of which is to enhance the worth of a man or a woman by whatever means can be made available for this purpose. "Happiness is virtue," said the father of modern ethics; and we are testing the truth of this to a degree, when to all alike, the poor as well as the rich, is given the chance to obtain restful recreations at a cheap rate. It is high time that religionists should cease to impose their particular methods of being or becoming good upon the world at large. Religion aims at results. The wisest plan, it seems, would be to say to men and women, "Worship in your way, provided that way leads toward individual improvement, and inflicts no real injury upon any other man or woman." It is but a fancied injury which differences of opinions and methods inflict. It is safe, I for one should say, to allow to the individual complete liberty of thought and action in matters of religion, for I am assured that, sooner or later, every man and woman will, out of their own experiences, evolve the knowledge that goodness is the goal to strive after,—"the only investment," as Thoreau has said, "that pays."

AMELIA W. BATE.

"UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE."

The "Failure of Universal Suffrage," by Francis Parkman, in THE INDEX of Aug. 15, if not written to provoke criticism, is a criticism on itself, showing that a person of the educated class has no clearer idea of suffrage than the workingman whom he denounces, and also that he draws his inspiration from prejudice rather than from reason. It is calculated to discourage where encouragement is needed. It is headed "The Failure of Universal Suffrage." How can a thing fail until tried, and when was universal suffrage ever tried? Throughout the article, however, he calls it "indiscriminate suffrage," which is an entirely different thing, and is what he really means. To attribute the present political chaos to indiscriminate suffrage, or to attach blame to the workingman when his adversary has had it all his own way, is, as before intimated, the prompting of prejudice.

In his long article, female suffrage is not mentioned. As it is one-half of universal suffrage, and as it is also the antidote always brought forward for the ill of which he complains, it should have been mentioned. The refining influences so much talked of in connection with female suffrage will cause the abolition of the "ward room, the pipe, and the tobacco juice." This of itself ought to insure its success. But one reform always brings another, and this will do away with "dropping that piece of paper called the ballot in the box, and with it the illusion, or superstition," and make registered voting necessary, so that every person can sit at home and vote; and this in its turn removes the fraud connected with the box and the crowd. The time when woman will vote will be when she makes herself necessary. This she can best do now by solving some of the political problems of the day which have baffled the other sex.

But to go back to the cause of the present political troubles which he "wildly attributes" to indiscriminate suffrage: the cause, the one cause, unassisted by any side issue, is the fatal mistake of the Republican party in causing the collapse of the Democratic party. There are two ends to every stick, and every inside has an outside; and when the Republican party got the inside, and then kicked away the outside, they should have foreseen there would no longer be any inside. The business of life on this planet in every department of Nature is to create. For this purpose every thing that is created is dual. The union of two opposites produces a third unlike either. This is not only the law of matter, but of mind. Thoughts are created in this way. Whoever can unite his thought with that of another, so that it shall suggest to them an entirely new thought, is an intelligent person, whether educated from books or from Nature.

This law preserves the balance of the universe; not only keeps the planet in its place, but the exact balance of everything on it. So long as we keep ourselves in harmony with this law, everything runs smoothly; but when we attempt to defy it, then we are in trouble; so that in politics, if we run the government by party we must have two healthy, honest, well-balanced parties, so evenly balanced that either can be made to kick the beam at the first lapse of political integrity; but neither must be allowed to destroy the other. A republic is supposed to have a democratic form of government. When the democratic party failed, democracy was not dead; only a few men who tried to represent it had failed,—went out of sight. The principle remains. It was best expressed by Theodore Parker as—"A government over all the people, for all the people, by all the people." Other issues are identified with democracy, such as free trade, direct taxation, rotation in office, and everything that tends to take the government in among the people.

In a republic we must have a Democratic party, and must have it healthy and honest. So, too, we must have an opposition party to prevent the other from overdoing and destroying itself. It must be composed of the conservative element,—the aristocrat, if you will. Some people object to aristocracy in a republic; but a community without it would be a one-sided place to live in. Here, then, is the disease and where the cure must be applied. To-day the honest man seldom votes; he has nothing to vote for. The only question presented to him is, Who shall divide the spoil? Literally he "don't care." Let two new parties be organized by honest men not at present identified with office, and put forth a set of principles that take hold on the times, and they can turn the tables and lift politics so high that the bummer and rough will find nothing to vote for and lose all interest, especially if put to the test of the register. In this way "the better part of the community is able to outweigh the worse." Intellectual development and high civilization are not favorable to fecundity." As creation is both the cause and effect of our brief existence on this sphere, and as intelligence and civilization are aids to the same, if they produce no fruit, then is your intelligence a fraud and your civilization a humbug.

Speaking of the young Irish voter, Mr. Parkman says: "He reads nothing but sensation stories and scandalous picture papers." Some twenty years ago two disgustingly obscene papers were published in Boston, of the eight or ten that fell in my way. Each and all were taken by the gray-haired sires of respectable families, some of them with the full knowledge of grown-up daughters. Vice is your genuine communist, the great leveller of all classes, and claims the royal prince, the noted divine, and— Well, the harlot of the North End often came of respectability, and not poverty or ignorance. The virtue of the poor may have none of the prudishness of the higher classes, but is necessarily made of stronger material by rougher surroundings.

"Those who bray the loudest for inalienable rights extol the ballot as an education in itself." When two new parties are formed they will be found to be schools, the graduates from which will be the independent voter, who will hold the balance of power at the price of holding no office, sinking all prejudice, and standing firmly for political integrity. When we talk of cutting down the suffrage, there immediately arises the delicate question of which of us two goes. This was settled in the beginning in the only way that it could be settled, and the government was launched on a sea of equality, and trusted to the average selfishness of the people, or rather to that eternal law of balance that every wrong would produce a right to balance it.

The proposition that is sometimes made to take the ballot from the Catholic, on the ground of allegiance to another sovereign, is illogical until we get God in the Constitution and Church and State united. To-day the government has no right to know that such a thing as a religious sovereign exists. If the time shall ever come when universal suffrage shall be no longer compatible with republican institutions, when the mighty Niagara of freethought and open discussion shall roll back on itself, seek a level, and become a dead sea, then, if ever, may we try voters with the plumb and square of conceit and prejudice.

DORCHESTER, Mass.

THE CAUSE OF WOMAN.

CANASTOTA, N.Y., Aug. 30, 1878.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Soon after the adjournment of the Woman's Suffrage Convention which met in Rochester in July last, the Rev. Dr. Strong preached a sermon in which he criticized the ground assumed on that occasion, and proceeded to demonstrate on Scripture grounds the natural and accepted position of the (I must call it) accursed sex.

The discourse was evidently kindly and judiciously meant, and is worthy of comment as representing the Church or Orthodox party upon this position assumed by the women of the country in making their plea for suffrage. The reverend doctor bases his argument entirely upon the Bible as the foundation of any possible view entitled to acceptance or respect. This would seem to be natural from the profession of the speaker.

It would occupy too much space to go deeply into the theological points of the question, and I may as well say briefly, that we do not base our claim for equality of human rights upon any Scriptures, either Jewish, Christian, or Pagan, though we profess to find endorsement for it more or less in all, wherever and however may be found embodied in them the principles of justice, beneficence, goodness, truth.

In the Jewish cosmogony we find the genesis of our world divided into six eras, progressive eras, in which the more perfect is evolved or created from the less perfect. On the sixth day, it is recorded in Genesis i., beginning at the twenty-sixth verse, that God, well pleased with these gradual advances towards the more beautiful and more intelligent, be thought him to create a being who should, still better than any others, reflect the power and majesty of the creative element. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness"; and farther on it is said, "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him" (the genus homo, including man and woman); "male and female created he them."

In the twenty-eighth verse we find a pleasant endorsement, a sublime content following this last day of work. Man and woman were here crowned with the beauty of the divine image, majestic as the incarnated power of God himself over all inferior developments. "And God blessed them." No curse on the woman here; no man to be "head"; no subordination of office; nothing more than a sweet acceptance of their existence; an injunction to be fruitful; and a final declaration, "And God saw everything that he had made, and behold it was very good."

Now whatever may be the conclusions of science, whatever may be the dicta of theology, this Bible cosmogony is full of fine suggestiveness. The scientist may say that the first product of this pair was a diminutive, flaccid, helpless little lump, which the anxious parents proceeded forthwith to lay upon a board, covered with moss, and bind down with ligaments to keep it from utterly falling to pieces; the uncivilized woman still does this. On the contrary the theologian will tell you that the first product was a vicious boy, accepted as a curse, whose first act was to take the life of a brother somewhat younger than himself. These points we leave to science and theology.

Now, if the Bible is to be literally interpreted, why do our theologians ignore the genesis of the first chapter, which completes the creative work from the lowest upward, and leaves the man and woman to the great onwardness of the race with a divine benediction sweetening all their career? Why do they from the time of that beautiful episode of the Garden of Eden (whenever it was written, and by whomsoever), down to the era of St. Paul, through all the consolidations of churchly power, Catholic or Protestant,—why do they persist in fixing the status of woman from a period indexed by a curse upon her head?

I will yield to no one in admiration of this poem, this myth, this attempt at solving the question of how evil was introduced into the world; this subtlety of the serpent as the agent from some preëxistent state of evil-doing, and this impeachment of woman, as the dupe of this serpent principle, misled by no beastly appetite, but only by a desire of wisdom natural to her intelligence. The Scriptures of no other people present so poetical an attempt at reaching this incomprehensible subject; but why is it cited to the neglect of the six days' genesis of creation as the one in which our theologians find such a field for their dogmas, and such fruitful authority for belittling and subordinating woman?

The story of the Garden of Eden is evidently an afterthought,—the speculations of a theorist swamped under a sense of the enormity of evil in the world; some poet, some Miltonic mind of thousands of years ago, replete with masculine assumption, piqued, perhaps, by feminine superiority, exasperated by the absence of this very subordination in his wife, which the reverend doctor so strenuously insists upon as the normal condition of the sex; and hence the curse given with such fearful unction is the natural language of an agonized theorizer, and the natural expression of baffled despotism.

The woman suffragists make no war upon the religious sentiment of mankind. They insist upon it that their claim is altogether a secular claim; but if, in making this claim, we find any book, any class of writings, any body of men arraying themselves against us upon any religious stand-point, and using these writings as weapons against us,—if the Bible is to be the prime weapon to be hurled against us,—we say then, emphatically, that we must go outside of its teachings, outside of all the dogmas of the Church, and plant ourselves upon that "higher law," which Sophocles, thousands of years ago, affirmed to be "written in the hearts of men," and not to be annulled by any human legislation.

Strange, in this enlightened and progressive age, that men should search the Scriptures, not for the seeds of eternal truth, but to find arguments by which they may subordinate their wives and mothers. They call themselves Christians; and yet in all the teachings of the divine Master there is not one word affirming this subordination, not one word re-declaring the curse, not one word questioning the entire equality of the sexes. Many a woman has held herself in the background, and forborne to demand her right to entire equality before the law, out of sheer shame that husbands and fathers and legislators should be found so blindly unjust to the authors of their being and the partners of their love. It would seem as if the boasted magnanimity, to say nothing of the chivalry, of man would at once have prompted them to yield the ground to a question of such import; and the simplest expressed desire on the part of woman to be accepted in the republic on the basis of her citizenship, would have been her "open sesame" to the ballot-box. It is too late to talk about the sphere in which we ought to move; God himself marks out the sphere in which his creature shall move by the amount of capacity he bestows upon him. The measure of capacity is the measure of sphere, and all the talk in the world will not subordinate the greater to the less, the superior to the inferior.

The reverend doctor implies and fears that our doctrines will overthrow the relation of marriage and impair the sanctities of the household. Every woman who is toiling for the enfranchisement and elevation of her sex will feel the hot glow of pride cover her cheek at such imputation. We are, almost to a unit, wives and mothers of honorable households, whose husbands, brothers, and sons take worthy rank in the community. It is because we respect the relations of the family that we would find some help for the wife of a brutal husband, some protection to the mother in the sacredness of her maternity, some enlightened public opinion that shall compel men, as well as women, to social purity.

Again, it is well known that the leaders in this suffrage question are not fanatics, are not ignorant, embittered women, outlaws in society; those into whose soul the iron of wrong has entered, and they come forth rasped, degraded, pitiless, because of injury that has been inflicted upon them, because of the pain of the fiery furnace through which they have been compelled to pass (though God knows if it were thus with them, every manly heart ought to go forth with awe, and every manly ear be opened to this human wail). But it is not so; these women are cultured women, well-to-do women, upon whose faces is the impress of benevolence as well as thought, and they make their claim to be heard because of the myriads of the sex who have no way of finding redress for inflicted wrongs,—the wives who toil for drunken husbands; the mothers robbed of their children by unjust litigation; the helpless victims of social sins, where the conditions of society allow the one sex to escape even blame, while the other is crushed and branded, and driven to ruin and death.

It is for equal remuneration for equal amount and quality of work; it is for the protection and representation of the property of widows and spinsters, who are taxed and not recognized in the body politic; it is for education commensurate with our intelligence; it is to give to man the test opportunity to show that he is not afraid of the woman beside him,—is not afraid of being eclipsed or subordinated by her.

If these claims that we make were only for ourselves, I fear little effort would be made; but we feel the imbecility, the selfishness, and meanness of resting content in our superior favorable condition, while the thousands and millions of our sex are borne down under disabilities and oppressions which can be, and ought to be, relieved.

Respectfully, ELIZABETH OAKES SMITH.

WHAT AND WHY.

Let us try to get at the core of the matter. What is it that makes an act, a thought, or a thing obscene? There is no clear and sufficient dictionary or legal definition. It is plain to start with, that obscenity in some way is connected with sex. We do not think or speak of any thing or act not relating to sex as obscene. Either sex itself is obscene, or in some way leads to obscene acts. Surely no free-thinker, no thinker, will say that the natural acts of sex are obscene; or that to think, or speak, or write of them is obscene. If natural manifestations of sex are pure and good, as who will deny? It must be that it is unnatural or abnormal acts which are obscene.

To think of sex as low and unclean, and of sex actions as vile and degrading, and to represent them so by word or pen, is to be obscene.

All sex actions or manifestations which are abnormal, or contrary to the natural laws of sex, are obscene; and it is only when we discover these laws that we can surely know what is and what is not obscene. It is only through study and discussion that we can discover these laws; and it is for a brave and manly attempt to do this that Ezra H. Heywood is now suffering imprisonment in Dedham Jail.

Disguise or dodge it as we may, the Christian Church has taught that sex is obscene in itself; that woman, as the representative of sex, is, and ought to be, degraded,—the only redemption or sanctification coming from the sacramental offices of the Church. We have been taught that clothes are not firstly for warmth and ornament, but primarily to conceal the obscenity of sex; and only secondarily for use and pleasure, not having been required or used before the fall.

These old superstitions die hard. The Church, through the Young Men's Christian Associations and their worthy agent, Anthony Comstock, is doing their very worst to maintain the old darkness, to exclude the light, to retain the degradation of woman as the basis of their institutions; and, most mortifying of all to us, they have, with some success, induced liberals to play into their hands.

They are playing the old trick of the Indians to draw the enemy's fire by putting a cap on top of a stick, while they aim directly at "stamping out free-lovers and free-thinkers." The pretence of putting down what liberals regard as obscene literature, that class of books which represents sex and its acts to be as low and vile as the Church has taught that they are, books addressed, like the teachings of the Young Men's Christian Association, to the emotions and sentiments and not to the reason, is so mere an empty cap on the end of a stick that it should deceive nobody.

There is but one radical and permanent cure for any evil, and that is "the absorbent substitution of the opposite good." Whatever danger there is to our children from really obscene literature and ideas, either in the street or the Church, can only be met by teaching them the truth that they ought to know about sex, and by so filling their lives with labor and love, that dirt and disease could find no place therein.

THE ENGLISH INQUISITION.

The editor of the London Times approves the decision in the Besant vs. Besant case, upon the ground that to be educated, not as an heretic, but simply without prejudice (as J. S. Mill was educated), that is, without a bias in favor of Christianity, is a clear and considerable disadvantage to an English child, and, more especially, for a girl. Perhaps it were too much to expect the editor of the (well-named) Times to consider that a mind cultured, imbued with the enthusiasm of justice, and free from trammels of superstition, might not be too dearly bought by the loss of wealth and luxury, or even by the much severer hardship of a too confined circle of acquaintance; but, at least, it is not difficult to understand that a delicate girl, not yet past childhood, is likely to fare better under a tender mother's care (she, too, being a woman of elegance and knowledge), than in the hands of a young man in a dangerously anomalous situation, and whose society conspires principally of a crowd of bores whose ideas extend not beyond their turnip-fields. However, notwithstanding the protestations of some liberals to the contrary, I am afraid that the influential personage whose opinion I am quoting is so far right as this: that the good, kind people, of whom he is an excellent representative, do really practice the one form of cruelty which they are now pleading in justification of another. In a second particular, also, the Times' gentleman deserves credit for acumen. He is evidently not so absurd as to suppose that Christianity would have any chance to hold its own if fair play were the rule.

By the deed of separation the reverend plaintiff in this case was allowed to have his daughter with him for one month in each year; but he would not wait. He dragged his child from her sick-bed, reckless of consequences. A notable instance of his fond affection! Certainly he could not suppose that a few months of her mother's nursing in the period of infancy could endanger the girl's prospects. Therefore this circumstance proves to demonstration that this zealous pillar of the holy faith (who has sold his birthright for a mess of pottage by signing away his liberty of thought and speech) was not actuated by honest motives, but by spleen and malice. Here have we the prosecutor's animus exposed, and this is quite a point in the defendant's case.

However the private interests involved in this suit may move us, it is in its public aspect that it concerns us chiefly. The doctrine which Mrs. Besant teaches, and for which she suffers, was first propounded by an Anglican priest of sober habits and conservative, and a man of a very domestic disposition. It is now held by nearly the whole school of the Manchester politicians, and also by a majority of those who have given their attention to the human system and the social fabric. But the fault is that Mrs. Besant has not confined herself to the bare enunciation of the doctrine. Well, neither have physicians and economists confined themselves within the narrowest bounds. Neither did Malthus himself. Although not exempt from the prejudices of his cloth or of his caste, he yet spoke brave words which did him credit as a clergyman.

If Sir George Jessel's decision is quietly suffered to pass into a precedent, agreements like that by which Mrs. Besant has been pricked (not to use rougher language) will no longer be worth the paper they are written on. The law, as it now appears to stand, is more ridiculous than the famous et cetera oath. It ought, of course, to be as precise as language will allow of. Is a mother's peace of mind to be accounted a matter of so little moment as to be left at the mercy of any dozen blockheads whom the sheriff may drive into the jury-box? Admit that the child's interests are to be held supreme; but are we to assume a supremacy of wisdom in twelve Englishmen picked at hazard from the multitude, or even in the learned judge himself? If not, upon what principles, except those of the inquisition, can we deprive a woman of her child merely on account of her speculative opinions, her life's conduct being far above suspicion of reproach?

Judge Jessel thought fit to heap wanton insult on the lady who stood before him at his mercy; yet, after all, the meeter object for our pity was his lordship rather than the defendant in the suit; for her character can well defend itself; but of all men the most pitiable is he by whom those sentiments which most enrich our nature are unknown or unregarded.

CHARLES ELLERSHAW.

WAS IT A BURLESQUE?

A correspondent in THE INDEX of August 29, who signs himself "Orthodox," says of a certain doctrine: "Therefore, I say, the more contradictory to reason it is, the more reason in a higher sense to believe God's truth is in it." And he favors what he calls "conclusion by repulsion from the premises."

Now reason is the only faculty by which men can arrive at any truth of any kind; and whatever truth reason cannot grasp is utterly unattainable by man unless it be intuitive; therefore, whatever is the proper exercise of consciousness, common sense, the nature of things, legitimate definition and obvious meaning of language, utility, indispensability, and demonstration, the human reason is able to establish as truth. For example: take the heliocentric doctrine of our planetary system, the globular form of the earth, or the law of gravitation, and establish them to be true by this test; then according to "Orthodox," by "conclusion from repulsion," they are proved false by proving them true, and vice versa.

I am not surprised that "Orthodox" says that he is "incapable of expanding these suggestions into a system of philosophy." We should think so. Had not the temporary editor endorsed the writer as a man of candor and one who occupies "the highest standing in the denomination to which he belongs," it would be hard for any reader of common sense to believe his communication was not intended as a burlesque upon Orthodoxy, self-styled, which, as a matter of fact, it really is.

UPPER GLOUCESTER, Me.

MISS DEVEREUX'S SCHOOL.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Some of your readers who have children to place at school may be much obliged to me for calling their attention to an advertisement which appears in this number of THE INDEX, announcing that the Newbury Street School, which was closing on account of the departure of its former principal, Mr. Badger, has been reopened, and they may be glad to be assured that it is under excellent and efficient management. The new principal is a lady of rare qualifications for her chosen work in life, and has already had much success in inspiring young minds with the love of knowledge; and her assistants are admirably fitted to sustain her in making the school and home a place of culture, virtue, and refinement. The kindergarten will be taught by a pupil of Mrs. Kraus-Boelte, and will be an important feature in the school, laying gently and surely the foundations of accurate intelligence and skilful manipulation and loving companionship in the little ones who, in a few years, will carry these advantages into the upper grades.

Very truly yours, M. E. DEWEY.

SHEFFIELD, Mass., September, 1878.

NOTICE.

CHARLOTTE, Mich., Sept. 11, 1878.

EDITOR INDEX:—

The Michigan Unitarian Conference will meet at Charlotte, Eaton Co., Mich., Tuesday, Oct. 8, and continue until Thursday, the 10th. George Stickney, of Grand Haven, will read an essay on "Taxation"; Rev. Calvin Stebbins, of Detroit, an essay on "Communism"; and other essays will be read by Rev. J. T. Sunderland, of Chicago, Charles Fluhrer, of Grand Rapids, and others.

Friends of a rational religion are cordially invited.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
" 13 " 25 "	8 " "
" 26 " 51 "	5 " "
" 52 " " "	5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON, publish

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

- O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
- WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
- WILLIAM R. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
- Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
- GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
- DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
- Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tennesse, N.Y.
- J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
- ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
- O. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
- W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
- BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.
- ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.
- JAMES E. OLIVER, Ithaca, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

At least every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of our country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fifth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern sciences upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine, from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact facsimile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is from England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on the issues with a promptitude unequalled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers. The following are a few of the contributors:—

AND NUMEROUS OTHERS.

Subscription Price, $5.00 per Year.

Published every month by the ROSE-BELFORD PUBLISHING CO., 60 York Street, Toronto, Ont.

THE SECULAR REVIEW.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The SECULAR REVIEW is the leading organ of Secularism, and each week has Special Articles on Theological, Social, Scientific, and Political Subjects. Its distinctive features are the advocacy of Constructive Secularism, and the dissemination of useful information on all questions which affect the welfare of the people. Letters are inserted in its "OPEN COLUMN" from all who are courteous in the expression of their views; while a special department is allotted for "NOTES AND QUERIES." The Contributors to the SECULAR REVIEW comprise the principal advocates of Secularism, including its founder, G. J. Holyoake.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD. GREAT THROUGH LINE AND UNITED STATES MAIL ROUTE.

The attention of the travelling public is respectfully invited to some of the merits of this great highway, in the confident assertion and belief that no other line can offer equal inducements as a route of through travel. In

CONSTRUCTION AND EQUIPMENT

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD stands confessedly at the head of American railways. The track is double the entire length of the line, of steel rails laid on heavy oak ties, which are embedded in a foundation of rock ballast eighteen inches in depth. All bridges are of iron or stone, and built upon the most approved plans. Its passenger cars, while eminently safe and substantial, are at the same time models of comfort and elegance.

THE SAFETY APPLIANCES

In use on this line well illustrate the far-seeing and liberal policy of its management, in accordance with which the utility only of an improvement and not its cost has been the question of consideration. Among many may be noticed

The Block System of Safety Signals, Janney Coupler, Buffer, and Platform, The Wharton Patent Switch, and the Westinghouse Air-Brake, forming in conjunction with a perfect double track and road-bed a combination of safeguards against accidents which have rendered them practically impossible.

Pullman Palace Cars

are run on all Express Trains from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, to Chicago, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, and St. Louis.

WITHOUT CHANGE,

and to all the principal points in the far West and South with but one change of cars. Connections are made in Union Depots, and are assured to all important points. The Scenery of the Pennsylvania Route is admitted to be unsurpassed in the world for grandeur, beauty, and variety. Superior refreshment facilities are provided. SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE! CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

PLATFORM

For the Presidential Election of 1880,
ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N.B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

SECOND ANNUAL CONGRESS

OF THE

National Liberal League.

CALL.

Boston, Sept. 18, 1878.

The Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July 1-4, 1876, will be held at Wisting Opera House, Syracuse, N.Y., on Saturday and Sunday, Oct. 26 and 27, 1878. Further particulars as to speakers, etc., will be announced hereafter.

In addition to the hearing of reports, election of officers for the ensuing year, and other ordinary business, questions of the utmost practical importance to the liberal cause will come up for decision at this Congress. Among them the following may be specified:—

1. What efficient measures can be adopted for securing a great increase in the number of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, and thereby winning for liberal ideas the public influence to which they are justly entitled?

2. Shall the National Liberal League nominate candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States at the present time?

3. How can the National Liberal League most effectively promote the cause of State Secularization, and foil the schemes of those who are seeking to pervert the government to sectarian purposes? What action shall it take with reference to the Constitutional Amendment already twice reported to the United States Senate by the Judiciary Committee, the practical effect of which, if adopted, will be to recognize in the Constitution the right of the Bible to be read in the public schools as a book of divine authority, and the right of church property to be exempted from taxation?

4. How can the rights of free mails and a free press be most effectively defended, and how can the wrongs of persons unjustly punished under the so-called Comstock laws be most effectively righted?

5. Shall the National Liberal League abandon the stand it originally took on the "obscene literature" question at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, or shall it continue to defend equally the cause of public morality and the cause of free mails and a free press? Shall it now demand the total repeal of the existing laws on this subject, and thereby practically protect and foster the circulation of obscene literature? Or shall it continue to demand the radical reform of those laws, in such manner as shall protect freedom of thought to the uttermost without protecting obscenity in the least?

The last two of these questions are peculiarly important at this time, and will inevitably come up for settlement by the approaching Congress. The resolutions adopted at Philadelphia were as follows:—

"Resolved, That this League, while it recognizes the great importance and the absolute necessity of guarding by proper legislation against obscene and indecent publications, whatever sect, party, order, or class such publications claim to favor, disapproves and protests against all laws which, by reason of indefiniteness or ambiguity, shall permit the prosecution and punishment of honest and conscientious men for presenting to the public what they deem essential to the public welfare, when the views thus presented do not violate in thought or language the acknowledged rules of decency; and that we demand that all laws against obscenity and indecency shall be so clear and explicit that none but actual offenders against the recognized principles of purity shall be liable to suffer therefrom.

"Resolved, That we cannot but regard the appointment and authorization by the government of a single individual to inspect our mails, with power to exclude therefrom whatever he deems objectionable, as a delegation of authority dangerous to public and personal liberty, and utterly inconsistent with the genius of free institutions."

The future growth, prosperity, and influence of the Liberal League movement will depend largely on the action to be taken by the Congress on these two questions. Any weakening of the stand taken at Philadelphia will work great and perhaps fatal disaster to the National Liberal League.

In order, therefore, that these vital questions may be fairly and wisely decided, it is recommended that all Local Leagues elect their delegates with special reference to it. The Congress will not be an irresponsible mass meeting, but a convention composed of delegates and members duly accredited, and seats for them will be reserved. Delegates from Local Leagues will receive Certificates of Membership of the Second Annual Congress by forwarding at once the proper credentials, signed by their own local officers, to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston"; charter, life, and annual members who intend to be present will receive theirs by simply forwarding their names and present addresses. These Certificates must be presented at the door and exchanged for Tickets of Admission to the reserved seats, the rest of the hall being open to the public at large. By this arrangement all confusion will be obviated. The Congress will be composed of accredited members, who alone ought to vote on questions of business affecting the League; every member will be admitted to the reserved seats; and the Committee on Membership will be enabled to make an accurate report to the Congress.

Liberals are urged everywhere to organize themselves into Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues and elect good delegates, in order to give this Congress a large local constituency and an influential delegation, and thereby to increase the weight of its decisions with the general public. The questions to be acted upon are of the gravest consequence to the whole liberal cause, and ought to be dealt with by a responsible representative body. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay, if addressed to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston."

By order of the Board of Directors:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.

WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

GLIMPSES.

A new Liberal League has just been formed at Syracuse, New York, in affiliation with the National League.

THE ESTATE of James Lick, of California, is still in litigation between the Trustees and the Academy of Sciences, one of the residuary legatees.

LOCAL LIBERAL LEAGUES should elect their delegates and secure certificates of membership for them without delay. These are necessary to obtain admission to the seats reserved for members of the Congress.

THE CHINESE of San Francisco contributed $1200 to the relief of the yellow fever sufferers. What a withering rebuke to the persecutors of those poor people, who return good for evil in this touching manner!

WISTING OPERA HOUSE has been engaged at Syracuse for the Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League. It is the best hall in the city, will seat fifteen or sixteen hundred persons, and is excellently provided with conveniences for such a convention.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD has engagements to lecture at Chagrin Falls, O., Sept. 28 and 29; at Parkman, O., Sept. 30 and Oct. 1 and 2; at Cambridge, Pa., Oct. 4 and 5; at Meadville, Pa., Oct. 6. He will be present at the Syracuse Congress, Oct. 26 and 27, where he will give an address.

IN ORDER to remove all possible ground of misunderstanding, let us say explicitly that the "approval" referred to in the last paragraph of the "Card" of the Directors of the National Liberal League means simply a majority vote. The League must adopt some positive policy, either for "repeal" or "reform," and this will depend simply on the vote of the majority. There is not the slightest wish anywhere to change the Constitution or to exclude anybody from the League.

THE CHURCH needs nothing so much as a conscience for truth. Dr. Döllinger has addressed the following letter to one of his friends with reference to a report that he had made his peace with Rome: "The reports in the paper sent to me are malicious lies, both as regards me and Professor Friedrich. It is now the fourteenth time that Ultramontane papers have announced my submission, and this will happen still oftener. I shall not dishonor my age with a lie before God and men,—of this you may be sure."

IT IS SUGGESTED that the regulation respecting "certificates of membership" at the Syracuse Congress may have its origin in an "intention to throw obstacles in the way of the admission of delegates"! Not in the least. The certificates must be issued by the National Liberal League to whatever delegates the Local Leagues may elect. There is no discretion on this point. Proper credentials from Local Leagues will ensure certificates to the parties named. It is superfluous to say that the directors are not scoundrels, and will resort to no trickery on behalf of their principles.

SAYS THE Springfield (Massachusetts) Republican of September 21: "The National Liberal League holds its second annual convention at Syracuse, N.Y., Saturday and Sunday, October 26 and 27. President F. E. Abbot has been warned that there is a plot to capture the convention, depose him, and put into the chair D. M. Bennett, editor of the Truth-Seeker, or some other of that wing of the League which wants the law against circulating obscene literature in the mails repealed. Mr. Abbot and the other principal officers of the League face the conspiracy with exposure, and offer themselves for reflection on a platform which, while claiming the right to free expression of opinion, also upholds the right of government to suppress obscene literature, 'provided that the offence known as "obscenity" shall be so strictly defined in the statutes as to render impossible the prosecution or punishment of any one for the expression of his honest opinions on any subject.' This is perfectly just ground, and the Liberal League will be tested by the answer they make to Mr. Abbot's manly challenge. The convention (the call for which is published in this week's INDEX) will discuss the above question, among others; and may perhaps nominate candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States in 1880."

Religion.

A DISCOURSE.

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

We ought to make religion a larger word. When we hitch it on to some sectarian enterprise or some ecclesiastical attempt, we dwarf its true dimensions. To limit religion to Christianity or Mohammedanism is to cut down its real proportions. There is something in this word that exceeds all of our definitions. It is not a little, mean, bigoted word that is no larger than a denominational piety; it has a colossal meaning. There is about it a splendor which attaches only to what is regal. It stands for a superlative relation. It is the word that connects us with God. I know that religion has a catechism definition, but we are not obliged to accept it. We have tried to put religion into a creed, but it overflows in its grand import all of our efforts in that direction, and in its large, divine sense remains free and unrestricted.

Religion must be given its pure meaning, and be shorn of the superstitions and impertinences that have dimmed its natural lustre. There are tints in this word which we have not caught in our attempts to define it. It is like those rare stones that seem possessed with new light and beauty every time we look at them. It has infinite depths. Some think religion is only a finer poetry, a sort of rhythmic motion of the spirit whose harmony is seen in the life lived at the feet of that Supreme Existence which is light in the sun, beauty in the flower, and virtue in the heart of man. We cannot go back to this spot or that and say religion started there. The first idea of God did not take the form of trinity or unity. The first religious emotion that stirred the depths of human nature did not clothe itself with praise or prayer. The original of religion would be found in a long-forgotten feeling, as the source of humanity is buried in extinct species. The fine, beautiful meaning which robes religion to-day, when detached from all ecclesiastical import, is the flower of a thousand centuries, and the roots, which have gathered the elements that are united in this wondrous production, run through unnumbered and unknown generations. The relation which exists between man and God has not been established by any human act. It is one of our many natural ties which centuries have been revealing. Our connection with God is not an arbitrary union; We are not joined to the Deity by any visible bond. It is not our body that hints the divine likeness, but that mysterious something which we call our soul. I would not try to make religion other than it is. We can add nothing to truth. It seems to me that religion is not a question of churches and priests and worship, but of right thinking, right living, and right acting. Religion as between man and God needs no third party. It is surprising how far what is called worship has been substituted for religion. The importance of church-services has been magnified to such an extent that many have come to think that religion is only speaking God's name with a pious accent. Thousands, whose knees have callous grown beneath their holy duty, show their piety in kneeling to their God. The devout worshipper, in tracing the outlines of the cross upon his breast, answers the demands of reverence as far as he has been taught. The strict sabbatarian, who makes his religious duty consist in rigid observance of the fourth commandment in the decalogue, pleads this performance as a sufficient excuse for not observing so scrupulously the remaining commandments. Religion has become little more than offering an apology to the Lord for not living as we ought. People want religion put into prayers and sermons and hymns; into forms and ceremonies and signs, because it is easier to put it into such things than to put it into good lives and good deeds. Human suffering and want seem to be of little account in this Christian world. God must be worshipped properly if men and women starve.

I would not have the churches closed, and the minister forbidden to preach in the pulpit. I believe we need preaching, and that we shall need it for ages to come; but if what is done in churches is to stand for religion, and brotherly love is only to be chanted and sung, and not go out a living fact into the world, then had we better shut every church-building in the land, and write over it the word deceit, for it would be a lie and a sham. If we were to choose one of two things, and could have but one, our churches, with their present style of worshipping, or our charity with its large, open hand, it would be better to say let the churches go; save the God-like feeling that seeks to sweeten and soften the hardships of life. The holy purpose which goes with our hands in their deeds of love is what consecrates human acts. What I want to say is, that religion is not anything else, and that nothing can be substituted for love of God and man. Some persons think religion is merely taking off one's hat to the Almighty, politely acknowledging his presence. It is treating Deity with the courtesy and deference due from one gentleman to another. It is remarkable how high up certain people can get in their pious conceit. They act as though God must feel flattered to see them come into church to worship him. When they bow or kneel it is with an air which seems to say, I hope that God can appreciate my performance. They assume a manner of condescension in their attitudes as though it manifested their superiority to treat God with a show of respect. They acknowledge the Deity as a sort of poor relation whom they are bound to visit occasionally for look's sake, and because they are related; but they cannot help showing that they are ashamed of the kinship. A man can no more hide his religion than he can hide his person. It is a part of him, and the most prominent part. It is proclaimed in every deed he does. A man does not need to profess his religion; it is the one thing he cannot conceal. Our religion is shown in our dealings with men; it is not such a fine feeling that it cannot find expression in this world. A great many use their religion as though they were afraid they should get out if they did not economize closely; they have not enough to let their neighbors have any, so they expend it all on themselves. These people usually are very pious. They talk about God and the blessed kingdom, and go into ecstasies over the beauties of the redeeming grace whereby men may be saved, but not a finger will they move to lift the burden from the world. They will pray for the salvation of a man's soul, but do nothing towards making it easier for him to get a living. There has been so much sanctimoniousness passed for sanctity, so much hypocrisy for holiness, so much cant for goodness, that the world has become sick of everything called religious. Religion has become so associated with superstitions and nonsense that men cry out, "Let us get rid of the word." But I believe that the word is a good one, and that we should only get rid of the associations,—of the superstition and nonsense. There is nothing diviner that man has learned than how to give happiness to the human heart; and I would make religion into the bright and beautiful image of tender feelings and kindly action. When man is hungry, religion is giving him something to eat; when he is naked, giving him something to wear; when he is homeless, giving him a shelter.

Religion is too great to be represented by any ecclesiastical art,—too great to set traps for men, too great to be the usher of sectarianism. Popular piety is only a pious masquerade. There is no righteousness in crossing one's self, in kneeling, or in any devout posture. It is not the attitude of the body, but the condition of the soul that reveals religion. It is not observing the ordinances of the Church that makes one religious. The meanest man alive may say the contents of the Book of Common Prayer from one end to the other, may attend church weekly, say amen to sermon and prayer, know all the tricks of piety, and make every gesture in the right place and at the right time. The best man in the village may spend his Sabbath at home, or in the woods and fields, may never enter a church, never read a Bible, never talk religion. A man's piety is not worn on the sleeve. When religion sticks out of a man in every place, when it is seen in look, manner, and speech, it is that revival kind that works only on the skin. Religion, like everything else, is often exaggerated. It is not easily worn at first, so we have to make up what the world requires; and as it is believed to be something that is recognized on the street by its pious manner, we soon learn to look religion; something to be discovered in conversation by its saintly expression, we soon learn to talk religion; and something to be seen in church by obedience to rites and ceremonies, we soon learn to act religion; and it is acted, talked, and looked until it has become a name without the thing. Religion is silent, true, holy; it does not brawl; it is not great in its splendor, but in its humility.

We must make religion great enough for every human soul in its own life. It must be something that one heart can do for another. It must be the saving word spoken when the word will save; the helping hand offered when the hand will help; the service which one man can do another.

The common notion is that religion is a very easy kind of virtue; that it looks well and pays well. It is regarded as rather beneficial to a man, and a commodity of earth quite as much as of heaven. The value of religion is variously estimated. In some neighborhoods it is convenient; in others, necessary; while there are some that hold it merely respectable and genteel. The religion of most people is their regard for so-called holy things,—for the Bible, the Sabbath, the Church. A man may be honest, truthful, chaste, and "all that is lovely and of good report"; but unless he belongs to the Church he is regarded by pious people as a mere moralist, quite without God and the hope of divine things. This opinion is held by the larger and less intelligent portion of every town and city in the United States. It has become the implied conviction of too many ministers who should know better and preach better. This base understanding of religion comes from a base desire. People want religion an easy thing,—a show before the world though a lie behind it. If we only wear the dress of piety we pass for righteous. The religion that is only preached and prayed is a very poor article; it is shoddy piety,—an imitation of religion. We judge a man by the house he lives in, by the horse he drives, the clothes he wears. We judge a religion in the same way. Man is stultified by his belief, dead in his faith. He has sold himself for a theological promise and counts one in a parish rôle. He believes in religious selfishness, and acts a pious indifference. Piety has no large meaning when it is confined to the Church; it is only a kind of you-help-me and I'll-help-you religion,—an exchange of good favors within its own circle. It makes God say, "Love me, love my dog-mas." It is the notion with the churches that religion is not good works, doing something, but good faith, believing something. They consider it, or prefer to consider it, a great exhibition of piety to stand up and tell how you feel; but self-degradation is not humility, and making a fool of one's self is not being religious. This degrading practice in our Christian churches cannot be too severely condemned. Pious profession is the counterfeit currency of religion, but a good deed is a check on the bank of God for happiness and peace. Religion has no claim upon the world unless it better mankind. Its object is to improve,—not abase; to teach man to be independent, self-reliant, and to "stand erect,—not to be kept erect by others." It is a false idea that hangs about the neck of society the virtue-jewels of some great and good man to show its regard for right. Such charms merely reveal what church we attend. This artificial habit of reverence is an index of that cheap religion which is got by profession, and kept by hypocrisy. It makes piety the mark of meanness, falsehood, and fraud, and stands only for moral inability. We have the idea that the nature in man must be defeated; that some miracle must be wrought to make him good, fit for heaven. The right purpose in the soul, the right conduct will be in life. It is but a move from wish to deed. It is thought acted that makes action. The behavior of a man is the principle of his life carried into effect. There is a notion among religious denominations, not discovered so much in their words as in the tendency of their expressions, that God is pleased with the magnificence of worship which is shown in ceremonial grandeur, in formal prayers, in uniform kneeling, in response, and in that silent awe which such performances usually inspire. The heart does not throb its natural sympathy surrounded with these trappings of worship. The one idea impressed upon the mind is that religion is an awful thing, that reverence consists in holding the breath, and that God is a being accessible only through solemn music and wonder-creating forms.

Religion is not church parade. When pomp comes in at the door piety goes out at the window. Church fashions are not religious examples. There is no particular piety in gowns and prayer-books. Goodness is not dependent upon costumes. You can bless a man without striking a pious attitude, and benedictions are best said where people do not look for them. Churches should not be set apart from the world. They should be built out of man's wants and wishes.

They should be made to show human aspiration. There are churches in which one can never think of the goodness of God, only of the terrible images of his wrath and cruelty which the Bible contains. They seem to whisper of dark deeds. The stained light which comes through the windows seems to look guilty of some crime. It has the color of blood. The whole space within the church appears haunted with martyr forms. Ghost-like figures rise before the imagination, and the walls around echo the dying words of those brave men whom Christians put to death for trying to bring more light into the world. This style of churches is common to that religion which mistakes gloom and darkness for piety and devotion. There are some churches that look like a man on his knees.

They appear to have done something for which they are ashamed, and are kneeling for man's pardon. This endeavor to build piety into a meeting-house is a parody on what is too holy to be travestied by art. A high steeple on a building makes it look like a Pharisee saying, "I thank thee, God, that I am not as other buildings are." We want all kinds of a church in one, not a church where one religion is let in and all others kept out. There is no great goodness in a religion that sees not goodness in all religions. Christianity does not monopolize the Deity, and though its ministers try to make mankind believe that they are on the very best terms with the Almighty, and that they are in his confidence more than anybody else, we find great men and good men who do not hold the Christian faith.

The soul wants room to go out of itself and grasp a brother-hand of feeling, without asking if it believe thirty-nine things about the universe or everything in heaven and earth. Religion needs no ornaments to make it beautiful. When unadorned it is adorned the most. The robes of priest, the mitre and mace, are the rags and straw of religion, the very ends of her authority. The parade of holiness calls up a doubt of its purity. Advertising piety is offering heaven at a discount. We do not want a longer confession of faith, but longer hours of feeling and love, when all the world comes within our horizon of sympathy. We do not want to prolong our worship with prayer and praise, but we want to prolong those moments of true religion when man is seen as a moral being, as a soul of divine destiny, as humanity, brotherly love, and all the noble sentiments which human life in its truest and holiest hours has made divine.

We do not wish to be good by obeying ten commandments, but by obeying all the commandments of our nature; not by making public speeches to God, but by doing private deeds to man. We do not care to imitate the piety of some brave and hopeful heart that loved mankind well enough to tell it of its faults and how to correct them; but we want to learn the religion of nature which inspires every soul with its own justice and mercy.

It is obedience to God, to the laws of their beings, that makes the creatures of earth happy and perfect. We must find our law within us, or forever go wrong. We look at the stars and their bright paths and long for the freedom of the sky, for a being not hooped in with laws, for a life not hedged with moral duties; but it is the morality of the sky that we long for; it is obedience to right that we admire; it is the rectitude of the stars that excites our wonder.

It is when we love right well enough to do right, when we love man well enough to be a man, when we quit the low life by living higher, that we do what religion requires. The enthusiasm of worship which is common to most religious systems is not a symptom of piety. There is a frenzy of religion, a pious madness, which confounds noise and excitement with religious fervor. I believe no man, woman, or child was ever benefited by conjurations.

The real estate of the soul is not changed by any black art. Revivals are relics of heathenism. They are the witchcraft of all ages. Religion makes no noise. When the heart is moved deeply it is silent. Words are less than sighs. We speak in tears truer than in words. What welcome like a smile! What sarcasm like a look! What grief that does not break down in speech and take to weeping! The soul but half speaks when it utters its thoughts aloud—

"The silent organ loudest chants
The Master's requiem."

We pray without speaking; we condemn without words; we approve with a gesture or a nod. Many creeds are used when little is felt. We make up in seeming what we lack in being. The pretender of piety is louder than the great man of piety. Peter made more noise than his Master, and all his disciples clamored when Jesus was arrested; but he himself was silent.

Religion is yet mostly of the senses. We still talk of seeing God. The soul is not as large as the body. Mankind stands for little more than moral ugliness. Most of our saints dream of celestial pots and kettles. They think the millennium will be announced by a dinner-horn. God is known as the butcher and baker of the world. Food enters largely into man's idea of heaven. Most men pray to-day, "Give me my daily bread, and my neighbors, too." This religion is born of the sensuality of mankind which still holds the spirit bound to earthly things. Religion is not all great moments or heroic deeds. It is always natural, and Nature must have her rest as well as her action. The boy's complaint, that there is no fun in religion, is a reproach which we would do well to consider. We must have a religion with some fun in it.

The prince of jesters is next to the prince of peace. Everybody will trust the man who has fun in him; and the religion that has faith in wholesome mirth is a good religion. Religion is not making a "joyful noise unto the Lord" so much as making the life of man joyful and free from bitterness and pain. The Church has adopted religion and baptized it with its forms and meanings; but a careful observation reveals the fact that many of our best men and women do not seek it there. When intelligent men and women shun the Church it behooves us to ask what ails it? It is not uncommon to hear a man say, "I prefer to stay at home on Sunday and read some interesting book rather than go to church and hear a theology preached which I do not believe is true."

This criticism of the Church is not to be lightly passed over. There is a great deal of religion in not going to church in this age. The man who refuses to support or sanction the preaching of a theology which he believes to be false and pernicious is to be praised. There is honesty in his act. Such a man sets a good example to the world, which is the utmost of human action. This kind of independence is needed to-day in society.

There is a servility which is shown by certain persons that is not to be honored. I have the greatest reverence for whatever is true, and for everything that is holy in man's nature. But I have no respect for mere outward formality, and no regard for forms that are sacred only in their relation to a special theology. If the Church is a help to the world, we do a great injury to mankind when we neglect to aid it; but when a theology is preached in the Church that makes God unworthy our reverence and undeserving our worship, and when a morality is inculcated by the minister that we cannot practice without violence to our moral sense, we serve mankind far more by refusing our aid than we could by granting it.

I believe in all the religion there is in the world, and believe that we should do everything within our power to make men and women religious. But I do not believe in sustaining and perpetuating a lie even though the Church has baptized it sacred. There is falsehood in the Church's creed, and they who have any high regard for truth will not repeat it. The cardinal difficulty with the Church lies in its false theology. There is one universe, and there is one spirit that animates it all. The doctrine of a triune God is a theological fiction. There is but one person in the Godhead. The Father is the only part of the trinity that has any existence. A Holy Ghost is a holy absurdity.

It is a monstrous invention and is unworthy serious consideration. The common notion of Christ makes virtue unessential, and in this respect is a dangerous doctrine. When we tell man that his salvation depends upon his own manhood, we shall have a higher humanity on earth. But as long as ministers preach the false and injurious doctrine that believing a theological dogma will save man, we shall not elevate human life nor reform human society.

This crawling behind another man's goodness for salvation is cowardly and contemptible. If there is one thing needed in this age it is a manly acknowledgment of our faults, and a willingness to abide by the consequences of our deeds. We cannot shift the responsibility of our actions upon another. No man's life or death can remove the just penalty of our acts. We are held to the fate of our own deeds, and there is no getting away from justice. The whole system of religion founded upon the crucifixion of Jesus is pure manufacture. No one can accept it without rejecting facts and stifling reason and conscience. It is a priestly invention, and is outside of truth and morality. Religion must appeal to the common-sense of man. The Church has called man infidel for denying its dogmas; it has called him irreligious for deserting its altar; and a Sabbath-breaker for not going to its meeting on Sunday, or for going somewhere else. Little good is done by calling names, and priestly condemnation in this age is harmless.

There are more ways to heaven than there are churches. There are more preachers of truth than there are ministers. The world needs something besides theology to make it good. We must be entertained and amused as well as fed. The way to heaven is not all toil and sweat. There are some flowers along the road. Let us not make religion too cold and dreary. I believe that man should enjoy all that God has made. Human nature must not be overlooked in our dealings with men. There is a laugh in the soul, and to stifle it is to put out the sun in the sky of human life.

The religion of the Church has had nothing in it that men could enjoy. God has been pictured with no kind look in his face. I believe in people who enjoy themselves and who try to get the good out of life. There is something wholesome and cheering in a man or woman who says life has brought more pleasure than pain; more joy than sorrow; more good than ill. There is a better idea of God in the heart of a happy person than in the Church's creed. It was once thought that a man was not religious unless he was solemn and ugly. But there is usually more hypocrisy than religion in a long face. There is no religion in what makes men sour and gloomy. Those persons are religious whose sunny faces make the pathways of life brighter and sweeter, not those who make you shiver when they go by. The Church teaches that they who give up the enjoyments of this life which are called earthly vanities shall wear the crown of glory hereafter. There is little in the picture of the Church's saint to encourage an ordinary mortal in the way of saintliness. I know of no one more to be pitied than an Orthodox saint. Most people would prefer to be a little bit bad if that would make them more attractive and agreeable. We need to drive away the pain from human faces. Fear of God should never have crept into the heart.

The gloomy gospel of Christianity is being displaced. Brightness is entering the human heart. We have learned that God does not frown when man smiles, and that happiness is founded upon virtues and not vices. A better day hangs in the skies of the future, and the coming man will dare be joyous before the Lord.

If there is one thing needed to-day it is a sensible idea of religion. The many substitutes for right-doing which are put upon the world in the name of piety should be called by their proper names. There is too much humbug passed for religion. The idea that anything short of telling the truth, dealing honestly with the world, living an upright life, being clean inside and outside makes a man a religious man, is a pious speculation which is preached to build up a denomination.

It is with impatience that one waits for the coming of that era in religion when the substance of piety shall be more honored than the form. The body conceals the spirit rather than reveals it to most of mankind. And the world without an outward symbol of worship would be unable to trace a sacred emotion in the feelings of the heart or the deeds of the hand. So readily does custom produce conviction, that an argument framed upon existing habits is almost impregnable to the stoutest logic and firmest proof; and the presence of a church-building in a town or city is taken as evidence of the piety of the place, even though a righteous man be not within its territorial limits. The mind, trained to ways of thought and fixed in habits of judgment, is not assailable by reason or truth. The crust of bigotry on a man shuts him in from all influence of conduct or persuasion of character. Nothing is more wanted than to free the spirit from superstitious regard, and leave it to those inculcations of divinity which in good moments possess the soul. Religion must rest upon a general education of the human faculties, and not upon the feelings alone.

A more serious way of looking at what is useful to mankind would divest many things of the fictitious holiness that surrounds them. Human relations are to be kept sacred; and when there is a true appreciation of each other's rights and duties, and a willingness on the part of each to do what is right and best, we shall have nearly solved the religious problem, and put the seal of sacredness upon what God made holy. I would prefer to see the homes of America improved instead of the churches. Domestic comforts tend to conserve religious forces more than costly and richly-furnished places of worship.

Let us no longer confound the doing of a thing with the manner of doing it. Form has so long been taken for substance that the world has set that religious value on ways of worshipping which belongs to deeds of kindness and love. Religion is a word that stands for something so deep down in man's nature, that we can hardly touch it with our definitions. It is that beautiful passion that binds spirit to spirit; that fine obedience that yields itself to the embrace of God. Could we surrender ourselves to this inner faith, that commands as though it had fast hold of truth; could we respond when this quick part of us receives a communication from on high,—we would walk the earth with a halo around our heads. Religion is a kind of outside feeling, sensitive to the finest influence. In its pure sense religion is emotion; but it must be emotion in action to bless the world.

When religion rises to the lips it speaks the beatitudes; when it touches the hand it is laid in forgiveness upon the head of sin. Religion is the sweetness of a smile, the sympathy of a tear. It is that blessed kindness that goes on its unpaid errand of mercy. It is that quiet service that offers its love and charity without reward. Religion is that fine doing of the human soul which is ordered by the inner voice. It is the feeling of the heart that lies nearest to God. It is that deep living whence the finer harmonies flow. It is the soul of life.

BENEDICTION.

Now may hope, faith, and charity, the bud, the blossom, and the fruit of true righteousness, be in our hearts and lives forevermore.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

ÆSTHETIC SENSE OF ANIMALS.

Until recent times it was the almost universal opinion, and dogmatic opinion too, of men, educated as well as uneducated, that animals, all below the genus homo, were not endowed with intelligence, memory, reason, and will; but that these attributes were distinctive of the human species alone. It was also believed that all those actions of animals, which had the appearance of emanating from a conscious, intelligent, and reasoning being, were really not intelligent, but instinctive. Nor did the word instinct have a very clear and definite meaning, when a rational explanation of the various mental phenomena of animals was desired. It was thought, also, that because animals do not have an articulate language they were not endowed with what we understand by intelligence and reason.

Before men were in the habit of basing their conclusions as to the truth or falsity of the propositions of any given subject upon the results of careful investigation and generalized experience; and before they understood much about the nature and growth of intelligence, of reflex action, of instinct, of memory, of reason, of will, and of mental phenomena in general, it is hardly surprising that they should have held the multitudinous, inconsistent, and untenable ideas about the mental phenomena of animals which were current. Now, however, we are beginning to understand that reflex action, instinct, memory, reason, and will all insensibly shade off into each other, so that it is impossible to draw any absolute line of demarcation between them. But in the discussion of mental phenomena, each of these terms has a distinct and definite meaning, which cannot be lost sight of without confusion. An animal may perform an act which most would probably agree in calling instinctive; and another act which most would probably agree in calling intelligent; and yet another about which there would be doubt as to whether it should be called instinctive or intelligent. And the same remark would apply to many of the actions of human beings. No one who has carefully studied mental phenomena, will likely contend that all the actions of human beings in the possession of their normal faculties can be called intelligent, for there can be scarcely a doubt that many of them are reflex, instinctive, or automatic.

That animals are intelligent, remember, reason, and communicate to each other their desires and aversions, is, I think, too well established to require here any illustrative arguments. Mr. Darwin, who has made a life-long study of the mental phenomena of animals, and of animal life under its various phases, and who has had the amplest opportunities of forming correct conclusions on the subject, has, in his recent works on the Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals and Descent of Man, brought together a great number of facts of the highest importance to those pursuing this line of thought. Some animals display, in my opinion, well-marked traces of the egoistic and perhaps ego-altruistic sentiments. The dog, after an achievement of some difficulty, shows a greater degree of self-satisfaction than if failure ensued. Again, the dog that guards an object, and shows some self-gratulation in guarding it until his master returns, certainly displays a spirit of altruism whether the mental state which prompts him to act thus is instinctive or representative. It seems probable, however, that it is representative, for there can be scarcely a doubt that dogs and many other species of animals learn by constant experience that certain kinds of their actions result in their receiving from their masters kind attentions; and that certain other kinds of their actions result in their receiving pain, and in producing in their masters manifestations of displeasure, harsh sounds and gestures or motions, such as usually accompany the infliction of pain. One animal not only quickly interprets the language or expression of the emotions as manifested by another animal of the same or a different species, but also as manifested by human beings. Nearly every field sportsman could probably relate how well the young pointer remembers his chastisement for disobedience in flushing the game when first taken afield.

Now if those actions of the dog which cause displeasure in his master become representative, or are remembered, will not those actions which cause pleasurable states of consciousness in his master, followed by acts of kindness, also become representative, or be remembered? Most assuredly. And the tendency must gradually be more and more to cease from those actions which cause painful states of consciousness to others and, by reaction, to self; and to strive more and more to do those things which cause sunny expressions and pleasurable states of consciousness to others and, by reaction, to self. Much evidence could be presented showing that animals are endowed with feelings of sympathy and revenge and various mental attributes not generally conceded as belonging to them; but perhaps a sufficient number of illustrations have been brought forward to indicate that there is no absolute line of demarcation between animal psychology and human psychology. And this is all that is required for our present purpose. If animals are endowed with intelligence, memory, reason, and will, and various other mental attributes common to the human species, as is now generally admitted by the best and safest authorities, we may next properly inquire whether they show any evidences of the æsthetic sense,—any appreciation of the beautiful.

It is contended by some writers of great ability, and who are well acquainted with the literature of modern science, that the æsthetic sense does not belong to animals, nor even the uncivilized man; but to the civilized man alone. But most of those thinkers who believe in the evolution of life and mind, I suppose do not deny the æsthetic sense to animals. To those whose intellectual training has led them into the habit of pursuing questions of this nature either backwards or forwards, until they elude the mental grasp, I think that there must arise insurmountable difficulties in establishing a line, on one side of which should be placed all sentient creatures of given species and orders as being entirely without a sense of the beautiful; and on the other side of which should be placed all sentient creatures of other given species and orders as possessing a sense of the beautiful from zero to the nth power.

For if we say that the æsthetic sense belongs to the civilized man alone, then it is at once required to show just at what point in civilization the æsthetic sense makes its appearance first; just how much a man must be civilized before he has an æsthetic sense,—questions upon which I think it is utterly hopeless to expect any general agreement. Nor does the difficulty end here. We would also require an infallible judge to point out to us at what stage of intellectual development, between the man who can count only as high as the fingers on one hand, and surrounded with the rudest implements of art, and the man of science of to-day, with his highly complex instruments and appliances, civilization commences. If we examine the matter closely, it will be found that we arrange, for convenience' sake only, peoples into groups of civilized, semi-civilized, and barbarous, meaning by these terms merely the stage of social evolution reached, and not that one group possesses faculties, emotions, and mental attributes absolutely distinct in kind, but only in degree, from the other groups. No one now doubts, and it should be strongly impressed upon the mind, that uncivilized as well as civilized man is endowed with all those senses through which sensations and perceptions are translated into æsthetic emotions and other emotions, as sympathy, pity, etc. So also are the higher orders of animals endowed with these senses, but of course in their ensemble, in a far less developed state than in man. Unless a creature has such an organization as will enable it to receive numerous and complex tactical impressions, the impressions received through the other senses will never enable it to adjust its actions extending very far in space or time, or to very complex environmental conditions. Hence being deficient in good tactical and manipulatory organs, in the appreciation of complex relations and conditions, neither of the senses can ever become very highly developed in animals.

One of the senses much used, through a great many generations, for a specialized purpose and highly beneficial to an animal in its struggle for existence, may be unusually developed in a given direction. The sense of sight in an animal, for instance, may be so developed that it will see as far or even farther than a human being; yet its power of appreciating differences of color, of forms, of motions, etc., is quite rudimentary as contrasted with ours. So an animal's sense of hearing may enable it to get impressions from sounds inaudible to us; yet it will not appreciate, as we do, those complex combinations of sounds in music of the higher order. After a little reflection it will be seen that nearly all our æsthetic emotions are excited by sensations and impressions received through the senses of sight, smell, and hearing,—gustatory and tactual impressions playing no important part. Every one knows that animals discriminate creatures that are friends or enemies, by their color, forms, motions, etc., and by their sounds and odors. Does any one believe that a harsh sound at a very low or very high pitch will produce in an individual of the higher orders of animals a state of consciousness just like a soft, liquid sound at a medium pitch, or that one kind of odor is as pleasant to it as another? It seems incredible.

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, D.C.

THEORIZING NOT CRIMINAL.

BY OLIVER JOHNSON.

When the Christian Union takes time to consider a question we always expect it will treat it fairly and candidly, and that above all it will be careful not to pervert the words or sentiments of those from whom it differs. We were therefore not a little surprised by its comments upon a resolution adopted recently by a meeting in Faneuil Hall, Boston, called to protest against the imprisonment of Mr. Ezra H. Heywood through what is deemed a false construction of the law forbidding the transmission of obscene publications through the mails. The resolution, as quoted by the Christian Union, and which has not elsewhere fallen under our notice, is as follows:—

"That the right to think and to publicly express, by tongue or pen, the results of thinking, is the dearest right which American citizens possess; and to deny its exercise is subversive of natural justice, contrary to constitutional provision, dangerous to public welfare, and corrupting to public morals."

Is not this a resolution that should command the hearty assent of every American citizen? Does the principle it embodies involve the right to libel anybody's character, or to corrupt society by obscenity in any form? Can that principle be fairly refuted without an utter denial of the American doctrine of the freedom of the press? Misrepresented, perverted, consciously or unconsciously, it may be, as the commentary of the Christian Union shows:—

"To which [the resolution above quoted] we have simply to say that no principle is more absurd than that which is apparently claimed here, that no man may be called to account for his words. The right of free speech is a right to say and write what one will without censorship beforehand; it is not a right to say and write what one will without giving account afterwards to society for what he has spoken. Every man takes his own risk. Liberty makes him his own censor. But if he slanders his fellow-citizen he is liable to answer to him in damages. If he libels him he is responsible in a criminal prosecution. And if he uses his pen or his press to defile society and to disrupt the family, he is liable to answer to the society which he is endeavoring to destroy for his crime against it. The notion that a man cannot commit an offence against an individual or the commonwealth by voice or pen is only equalled in absurdity by the notion that he ought not to be punished for it if he does."

Of course, as any one may see upon a moment's reflection, the resolution neither asserts nor implies any such foolish "notion" as that "a man cannot commit an offence against the individual or the commonwealth by voice or pen"; and when the Christian Union demolishes that "notion" it simply strikes at a creature of straw set up by itself, and misleads and confuses its readers upon a subject in respect to which they need light, and does a cruel injustice to men whose aims and purposes are as pure as its own. To say that men have the right to think, and to express publicly the results of their thinking, is that to claim a right to libel men and to debauch society?

What is the point at issue in this case? Is it claimed that Mr. Heywood or any one else has a right to corrupt society by the circulation of obscenity? Not at all, if we understand the matter. It is denied that Mr. Heywood's pamphlet is obscene within the true meaning of the statute under which he was convicted. In other words, it is affirmed that the law has been erroneously interpreted, so as to impose a dangerous restriction upon the freedom of speech; and it was for this reason that the Faneuil Hall meeting was held. Even if those who made the protest are mistaken upon this point, justice requires that their position should not be misrepresented, but fairly and justly stated.

Having read Mr. Heywood's pamphlet, we are prepared to say that while its doctrine of "free love" is unspeakably revolting, and while there are in it phrases of an indelicate and vulgar character, it does not, in our humble judgment, properly come within the true definition of obscenity. We believe in the family as a divine institution, and abhor any doctrine subversive of it; but we cannot deny the right of men to "think" about that institution and to "express the results of their thinking," however contrary to our own belief. So long as they simply seek, by appeals to the reason of men, to show that the family relation, as it exists at present, is contrary to the laws of Nature and subversive of human welfare, we do not think the government has any right to interfere with them; but if they proceed to carry their theories into practice, to live in immoral relations, or to disseminate obscenity, set Mr. Comstock to catch them as quick as you please. We believe in man's birthright of liberty, and that to enslave a human being is a crime. But we do not deny the right of men to "think" on the subject of liberty and to "express the results of their thinking," even though they came to the shocking conclusion that slavery is a divine institution. It is not long since some of the most eminent divines of the country held that very doctrine, and "tortured the pages of the hallowed Bible" to defend it; but nobody thought of sending them to prison on that account. So long as they contented themselves with asserting and maintaining an immoral theory, there was no suggestion that they ought to be punished. True, slavery was a very Sodom of uncleanness, and practically far more subversive of the family relation than the modern doctrine of "free love"; but its champions were allowed to rave on, because it was believed that any attempt to silence them by law would be an infraction of the right of free speech. But if "Southside" Adams, or Moses Stuart, or Dr. Nathan Lord had put their hateful doctrine in practice on the soil of New England by reducing men to slavery and selling them on the auction-block, the Abolitionists would have found a Comstock to hunt them down and hale them to prison. A Mormon apostle may come to New York, hire the best hall in the city, and proceed to unfold and defend by argument the doctrine of polygamy, and not even the editor of the Christian Union would think of molesting him. He would simply laugh at the idea that a system so revolting could make headway in such a community by argument, and would see instinctively that any attempt to put the speaker down by law would do great mischief by enabling him to appeal to popular sympathy as a persecuted man. But if his speech were obscene, appealing not to reason but to the lowest passions of human nature; or, if he should bring his harem with him and set it up in New York in defiance of law, everybody would say, let him be arrested and punished.

The distinction here drawn is palpable as a mountain, and as important as it is palpable. Dr. Channing understood it when, though shocked as much as any Christian could be by Abner Kneeland's cool denial of God's existence, he yet stood forth to denounce his imprisonment and to maintain the infli-del's "right to think and to express the results of his thinking." Milton understood it when he declared that truth could not be worsted in the "open encounter" of argument with argument. Jefferson understood it when he wrote, "Error of opinion may be safely tolerated where reason is left free to combat it." Paul virtually recognized it when he said, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." John had a glimpse of it when he wrote, "Try the spirits, whether they be of God." The freedom of the press, won for us by martyr blood and by the sublime courage of men who, for the sake of a great principle, were willing to endure reproach and persecution, is too rich a legacy to be surrendered on any pretence of temporary advantage to be thereby gained. There is no middle ground between the freedom which permits the utterance of the most pernicious error and the audacious assumption of divine authority and power which led Calvin to stain his otherwise honorable name by conspiring with the civil authority to burn Servetus at the stake,—all because that "heretic," while saying with all his heart, "Jesus is the Son of the Eternal God," could not conscientiously assent to the postulate, that Jesus was "the Eternal Son of God."

It is a poor tribute that men pay the truth when they yield to the fear that it may be overturned by the breath of free speech; a poor compliment to the Bible, the Church and the family, when at the very moment that they assert them to be divine, they betray a fear lest they should be upset if infidels are allowed to assail them. Every Protestant sees how ridiculous the Catholic makes himself who in one breath affirms the infallibility of his Church, and in the next would fine and imprison men for denying it. The desire to stop by force the mouths of those who deny our faith reveals the scepticism that lurks in our own hearts,—an atheism that is treacherous alike to truth and God. The zeal that makes us willing to persecute or disown men on account of their opinions is not of God, though often cloaked under that pretence. When Abraham, according to the Persian story, entertained the aged fire-worshipper, and the stranger refused to join in saying grace according to the Hebrew custom, the patriarch arose in wrath and drove him from his house. But a swift-winged spirit stood before him and said, "Abraham! for a hundred years the divine bounty has flowed out in sunshine and rain, in bread and life, to this man; is it for thee to withhold thy hand from him because his worship is not thine?" There is a lesson here which shows how tolerant we should be of the erroneous opinions of our fellow-men,—how willing that they should enjoy the utmost liberty of thought and speech. Of course this liberty does not imply immunity for men who outrage every principle of good morals and decency in their daily practices. Against such sin, open or concealed, we have a right to wage unceasing war, and to appeal for its suppression to the civil power. It is not for the State, however, to make inquisition into men's opinions, or to concern itself with their theories. They may set up any doctrine, however absurd, and support it by any line of argument that to them may seem good. They may even question the foundations on which the State itself rests; they may frame arguments in favor of vice and crime; they may plead for polygamy or the unbridled license of "free love"; but so long as they confine themselves to talk and respect the decencies of debate, they cannot be rightfully molested. But, the moment they proceed to incorporate their vile theories into their lives, they bring themselves within the legitimate grasp of the law. Of this freedom of debate we need have no fear in the long run. Many will perhaps be deceived and misled for a time; but the evils on this side are as nothing to those which would follow any attempt to prevent the expression of opinions by force. The tares of error must be left to grow in the same field with the wheat of truth "until the harvest"—that is until they bear their natural fruits, and their true character reveals itself in actual deeds,—when they may be rooted up, in the persons of those who illustrate them, and cast into the fiery furnace of the law!—Orange (N.J.) Journal, Aug. 24.

FETICHISM.

In Macmillan's Magazine for July, Professor Max Müller discusses vigorously the question, "Is Fetichism a Primitive Form of Religion?" Herbert Spencer and his disciples, who explain all religion as the evolution of fear, wonder, and awe excited by the sun and stars, by trees, animals, and inanimate objects, will positively dissent from the conclusion the professor reaches. Yet the reasoning is valid, and shows the logical weakness of bringing a lofty sentiment from a low one with nothing but material elements at work. Mr. Müller clears away at the entrance of his theme the obloquy which has rested upon the word "fetich." Too much ignorance and depravity has been charged upon the negroes of Africa in comparison with the Christianized whites. By repeated illustration he establishes two positions: "That there is hardly any religion without something which we may call fetich-worship, and that there is no religion which consists entirely of fetichism." Fetich means, in common speech, some visible object of worship. Professor Müller shows that the African negroes have the clear idea that their fetiches are only symbols, and that there is an invisible, omniscient, omnipotent spirit behind the representation. He says: "Though our knowledge of the religion of the negroes is still very important, yet I believe I may say that, wherever there has been an opportunity of ascertaining the religious sentiments even of the lowest savage tribes, no tribe has ever been found without something beyond mere worship of so-called fetiches. . . . What I maintain is, that fetichism was a corruption of religion; that the negro is capable of higher religious ideas than the worship of stocks and stones; and that the same people who believed in fetiches cherished at the same time very pure, very exalted, very true sentiments of the Deity. . . . The more I study heathen religions, the more I feel convinced that, if we want to form a true judgment of their purpose, we must measure them as we measure the Alps, by the highest point which they have reached."

Many African tribes believe in a Supreme Being, though in several cases his name is the same word as that used for "sky" or "clouds." In such cases the view can be well supported that the idea was transferred from the Supreme Being to the greatest boons which he gives to his children in a thirsty land. It is not certain that the word was first used to mean "sky" or "clouds." On the gold-coast the negroes believe in spirits, or "wongs," which inhabit the many objects which are worshipped as fetiches. After a review of many varying forms of fetich-worship, the writer asks: "Is there the slightest evidence to show that there ever was a time when these negroes were fetich-worshippers only and nothing else? Does not all our evidence point rather in the opposite direction, viz., that fetichism was a parasitical development, intelligible with certain antecedents, but never as an original impulse of the human heart?" It is of moment in the discussion to see how pertinently Professor Müller puts upon ancient and modern civilization the charge of fetich-worship; and we must plead guilty if reverence for an object and religious care for the emblems of the unseen is to be labelled and advertised as superficially as the manifestation of like sentiments by the blacks of Africa. Pictures, altars, and images may be fetiches as truly as trees, snakes, and stones. The necessity of the second commandment, "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image," and so on, is seen in this warning generalization of the learned professor: "One of the lessons which the history of religions certainly teaches is this: that the curse pronounced against those who would change the invisible into the visible, the spiritual into the material, the divine into the human, the infinite into the finite, has come true in every nation on earth. We may consider ourselves safe against the fetich-worship of the poor negroes; but there are few of us, if any, who have not their own fetiches, or their own idols, whether in their churches or in their hearts."

The end of the study of fetichism in its development in Africa is thus clearly set forth: "Fetichism, then, far from being, as we are told by almost every writer on the history of religions, a primitive form of faith, is, on the contrary, so far as facts enable us to judge, a secondary or tertiary formation, nay, a decided corruption of an earlier and simpler religion. If we want to find the true springs of religious ideas we must mount higher. Stocks and stones were not the first to reveal the infinite before the wondering eyes of men."

To leave no stronghold of the enemy untaken behind him, the professor, as he advances into the opposing theories, meets the argument that at greater or less antiquity the growth of belief in supernatural power was evolved from physical objects. His position is, that the evolution theory utterly fails to account for the predicate "God," which the savage puts into the sun, stars, or other things. From the ideas furnished by the five senses no concept "God" could ever arise. Whence, then, comes the tendency to predicate divinity of natural objects of unusual power? The discussion is thorough and logical. It reveals again the ever-recurring truth that man, with only his senses for aid, could never have reached the moral conceptions and development he now has. Higher than the visible is the invisible, which both the Christian and heathen, philosopher and savage, agree in calling "God."

"TRUE LOVE CASTETH OUT FEAR."

LINES BY YSOLDE DE QUELSE.

What matter that, when life is o'er,
And all our joy and all our pain
Is ended, we but fall asleep
And never wake again.
I am content since I have loved,
And I can feel that with my latest breath,
When over me shall fall the shade of death,
My thoughts shall be of thee, as thine of me;
And through eternity we two shall rest,
Sharing the same long sleep.

N.B.—Orders for Tracts or single numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N.B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

The Index.

BOSTON, SEPT. 26, 1878.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street; J. T. FARR, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

N. B.—The following resolution was adopted by the National Liberal League, at Philadelphia, July 3, 1876: "Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management."

REFERRING to the Watkins convention, the Norfolk (Va.) Landmark painfully illustrates what an injury to the liberal cause is done by anything which tends to confirm the popular misconception that free thought and indecency are inseparably allied: "These people are not to be judged by the utterances of Mr. Parton; for their 'principles' seem to involve anything but morality—that is, if some others of the assemblage are to be deemed true exponents of the free-thinkers' doctrines. Unfortunately three free-thinking men and one free-thinking girl have got into trouble, having been arrested for selling a book characterized as 'indecent literature.' The general belief is, that such people compose the vast majority of these free-thinking philosophers, whose reputation for the vilest immorality is, we have no doubt, most justly deserved."

THE NEW YORK Graphic sees both sides of the shield: "While all good citizens desire a vigorous suppression of impure literature, the Society for the Suppression of Vice would do well to move cautiously in suppressing works which are merely expressions of opinion. Touch upon the right of free publication, and hundreds and thousands of people become interested at once upon the side of the accused. The prosecution and imprisonment of Heywood was, in this sense, seemingly a grave mistake. It has given him and his pamphlets a notoriety and his views a circulation which would otherwise never have been obtained. The trouble is, that when an organization is once formed the superintendents and agents are under a constant spur to call attention to themselves and their work, and after they have successfully attacked really objectionable publications they are very apt to proceed against persons who only hold objectionable opinions. Then, too, the methods by which Comstock gets his evidence are not such as commend themselves to public morality. Tempting people to do wrong and then arresting them is not the kind of business any law-abiding community can countenance. It inevitably leads to abuse. The Society for the Suppression of Vice would do well hereafter to be more discreet in the prosecution of cases which bring up the right of free discussion, for by straining the law they only injure the cause they have at heart." Such comments as these show how easy it will be to arouse a powerful public opinion in favor of vindicating the imperilled freedom of the press, if its friends are only wise enough not to outrage the moral sense of the community by demanding total repeal of the Comstock laws. With common discretion on the part of liberals, those laws can easily be reformed; but they can never be repealed.

THE BAPTIST Watchman thinks that there is "A Cat under the Meal": "The papers a few days ago told us that Father Somebody had been appointed to do Catholic service at the new State Prison in Concord. We presume this action is taken without any State authority, and is a little step in the line of papal progress. It is evident that the Catholics mean to control our penal institutions, to thrust their priests into prisons, forts, and naval vessels as chaplains. The quiet way in which these things are done shows that they know how to do it. It may be that a large proportion of the criminals in the State Prison are Romanists, but certainly other sects are represented there. And if they are not represented there they are in the tax-paying and the voting outside. But it does not follow that every sect should appoint a chaplain for the prison. Confusion confounded would be the result. The Catholics have appointed a chaplain. Now suppose the Methodist Conference appoints another. And then the Baptist State Convention appoints a third. And then the Unitarians designate a man. And then the Congregationalists, who certainly are very respectably, if not numerous, represented within those walls of stone should send one. What would the result be? The theology of the State Prison would be as heterogeneous, conglomerate, nondescript, Babel-like, as Mr. Murray's church of the future. Why, after all, would it not be a good thing, as Mr. Murray has this same idea, to elect him bishop of the prison, and let him try his experiment there, before he launches his theological monstrosity on the outside public? But, seriously, unless Protestants are awake, the Catholic Church will have its chaplains, authorized or unauthorized, in all our penal institutions. The Catholic Church is an institution that will bear watching. Its aggressive spirit pushes its plans into every possible avenue, and while Protestantism is asleep it does its work. The appointment of a chaplain for the State Prison means the entire control of the religious instruction there in the end. If there is any principle involved worth contending for, it is time we were looking out for it. There are some things you can never mend after they are broken; some things you can never find after they are lost."

THE VINELAND (N.J.) Independent forcibly exposes the attacks on free thought which have been covertly made under the dangerous Comstock laws, and will continue to be made until those laws are radically reformed: "The Freethinkers' Convention, which closed at Watkins, N.Y., on Tuesday, broke up in the arrest of D. M. Bennett, of the New York Truth-Seeker, and several other persons, for selling a book which it is claimed was obscene. The free-thinkers, on the other hand, say it is mainly composed of extracts from the Bible. We have but little sympathy for that radicalism which will spend days and weeks hunting for some paragraph in the Hebrew Scriptures which will be offensive to delicate and refined ears, while they pass by the better things in the Bible. A thousand years of this negative kind of teaching will never convert the world to a tolerant liberalism; and those who are converted by this method will, in all probability, be tenfold more the child of hellish bigotry after their conversion than they were before. A man who can find nothing better to do than to hunt for crude and obscene passages in the Bible has a good deal of dirt about his own moral constitution which will require but little searching to find out. But, despite all this, the Orthodox people of Watkins showed themselves possessed of a considerable amount of the old inquisition spirit, when, in order to vent their spite against the freethinkers for the radical utterances made in their meetings, they aimed this blow at freedom of speech. The Church people ought to know by this time that the 'blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church,' and they only help augment the forces which they seek to destroy by this exhibition of intolerance. The freethinkers have a right to hold meetings and express their radical sentiments; and to attempt to infringe upon that right is a blow at our free institutions which every citizen who is truly an American must loudly condemn. Crawling behind ever so many claims about 'obscene literature' will not hide the fact that the real end aimed at is the liberty of opinion vouchsafed by the Constitution. When the Orthodox power seeks the arrest of the numerous parties who are circulating the most vile and obscene literature and pictures, for the express purpose of demoralizing the youth of the land, then we may believe that it is real obscenity they wish to 'destroy,' instead of liberty of conscience. But as long as they confine their arrests to some indiscreet radical who foolishly thinks he is serving his cause by publishing 'picked' paragraphs from the Bible, or some radical scientist who publishes a book that had better be guardedly handled, then the public has the right to presume that it is the opponents of Orthodox theology which these intolerant enthusiasts are trying to exterminate, and not obscene literature."

A CARD.

We, the undersigned, Directors of the National Liberal League, offer ourselves as candidates for reelection at the Second Annual Congress of the League, on the following platform of principles:—

1. The right of absolute individual freedom of thought, of speech, and of the press, on all political, religious, social, or other questions, and the right of being wholly uninterfered with by the courts, no matter what opinions as such may be advocated or promulgated.

2. The right and duty of Congress and State Legislatures to pass, and the right and duty of the National and State courts to enforce, laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails; provided, that the offence known as "obscenity" shall be so strictly defined in the statutes as to render impossible the prosecution or punishment of any one for the expression of his honest opinions on any subject.

3. The flagrant wrong of intrusting the execution of the laws for the suppression of obscene literature to any official or officials who shall not scrupulously confine their action within the limits here clearly defined.

And we decline to be candidates for reelection if the principles of the above platform shall fail to be approved by the National Liberal League at this Congress.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.
WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.
J. A. J. WILCOX, Treasurer.
D. G. CRANDON, Chas. Fin. Comm.

TWO PHASES OF "REPEAL."

We solicit the most candid and dispassionate attention of the liberal public to a consideration, in a series of articles, of the grave issue to be submitted to the approaching Syracuse Congress: namely, shall the National Liberal League declare itself in favor of the repeal or the reform of the United States laws prohibiting the transmission of obscene literature through the mails? It is true that on this exceedingly important subject the League has already declared its mind and taken its position; but this fact for the present we will altogether waive. Since the Centennial Fourth of July, when the League adopted the resolutions which still express its sober and deliberate judgment, new occasion has arisen for the exercise of that vigilance which is the price of liberty. Let us suppose, then, that the whole question is opened afresh, and inquire whether any better position can be taken now than was taken at Philadelphia two years ago.

It will be found on examination that three main positions are held on this general subject. One of these is represented by Messrs. E. H. Heywood and Benjamin R. Tucker, another by Mr. Thaddeus B. Wakeman, and a third by THE INDEX. What are those positions? How far do they agree, and how far do they differ?

I.

Mr. Tucker is "editor pro tem." of the Word, a monthly journal formerly published by Mr. E. H. Heywood at Princeton, but now, during Mr. Heywood's imprisonment, published by Mr. Tucker at Cambridge. At the top of his editorial columns, Mr. Tucker raises this flag:—

"Our Present Platform."

"Immediate, unconditional, and permanent repeal of all laws against obscenity, whether Municipal, State, or National."

We do not imagine that Mr. Tucker is any more in favor of obscenity than anybody else; he is only inexorably and fearlessly true to the logic which alone justifies the demand for "repeal." He follows out unflinchingly the principle of Mr. Heywood himself, who wrote in the Word for last January:—

"Since there is no half-way house between Comstock and Liberty, we demand the immediate and unconditional REPEAL of all Federal and State laws to force love or purity."

Now we entertain great respect for logical consistency, which is far more closely allied to moral courage than is generally believed. Messrs. Heywood and Tucker are simply faithful to the logic of "repeal," and scorn to evade or shirk the inevitable corollaries of that position. They clearly see that the very same protest which they make against the Comstock laws must lie against all State or municipal laws on this subject; they see clearly that, if national laws to suppress obscene literature necessarily violate the freedom of the press, State and municipal laws against it must be exactly as obnoxious for the very same reason. Hence they alone, of the whole party of "repeal," take the intellectual lead; they alone follow out the principle of that party with an admirable valor; they alone stand before the public as the exponents of a clear, self-consistent, and positive idea; they alone have a logical right to protest against the Comstock laws in the name of freedom. For this we must respect them, however irrational their fundamental position appears to us; and, if the agitation continues long enough, they will yet behold their associates compelled, by the sheer stress of reason and the logic of events, to come forward and stand at their side.

Nevertheless, we hold it little less than absurd to affirm that to punish the vendors of really obscene literature involves a violation of the freedom of the press. The "freedom of the press" must share the limitations of all other freedom: namely, that no man shall use his freedom so as to infringe upon the equal rights of others. Hence libel is forbidden by law, without any violation of the freedom of the press, because libel is a crime against the personal rights of the person libelled. We hold it to be no less a crime to mail really obscene literature to school-children—a crime at once against the children, their parents, and society itself; and we therefore hold that to punish criminals of this disgusting class involves not the slightest violation of the freedom of the press. Messrs. Heywood and Tucker must disprove the criminality of this hideous offence before they can succeed in proving that just regard for the freedom of the press demands the total repeal of all laws against obscenity. Mere wholesale assumption is no proof; we suggest to them the necessity of strengthening their position at this, its weakest point. We wait for proof.

II.

Mr. Wakeman is an able and respected member of the New York bar, and made one of the chief speeches at the "Indignation Meeting" at Faneuil Hall on the first of August. Full of an eloquent enthusiasm in the cause of liberty, this speech was mainly an argument against the constitutionality of the Comstock laws, and a criticism of the Supreme Court, which has recently decided those laws to be constitutional. The pith of his argument is that the Constitution simply confers on Congress the power "to establish post-offices and post-roads," together with the incidental powers "necessary and proper" to execute this purpose; that, rightly construed, this grant only empowers Congress to make such regulations as are necessary for the mere safety, efficiency, and convenience of the postal system, but no such regulations as establish distinctions between mailable and non-mailable matter on any other ground; that to prohibit the mailing of obscene publications as such, or to exclude anything else from the mails "for non-postal purposes and reasons" is a "sheer usurpation" on the part of Congress; and that the supposed power of Congress to exclude for non-postal purposes cannot be reconciled with those clauses of the Constitution which guarantee the freedom of speech and of the press, and which protect the people from unreasonable searches and seizures of their persons, papers, and effects. On these grounds Mr. Wakeman demands the total repeal of the Comstock laws, or such modifications of them as shall strip Congress of all power over the mails except for postal purposes only—which would be equivalent to their total repeal.

Now this argument is partly technical and partly substantial. Nobody but political theorists would care what powers Congress exercised over the mails, provided the substantial rights of the people were not affected or prejudiced thereby. By its recent decision, the Supreme Court has unanimously declared: "The power possessed by Congress embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country. The right to designate what shall be carried necessarily involves the right to determine what shall be excluded." By the construction of the Constitution contended for by Mr. Wakeman, Congress has no right to exclude anything except for strictly postal purposes and reasons. This question is purely one of theoretical constitutional law. The Supreme Court may be right, or Mr. Wakeman may be right; opinions may differ on this point, though, unfortunately for Mr. Wakeman, the authority of the Supreme Court will have a preponderant weight on a question of interpretation, not only with the legal profession, but also with the general public.

But, besides this merely technical point of Congressional jurisdiction, Mr. Wakeman urges that the Comstock laws are unconstitutional because they violate the freedom of the press; and this point is substantial. The Constitution provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press"; and it contains no provision more precious than this. We entirely agree with Mr. Wakeman that the Comstock laws as they have been administered,—nay, more, as they can scarcely fall to be administered, so long as they retain their present dangerous vagueness and indefiniteness,—flagrantly violate the freedom of the press, and are certainly for that reason unconstitutional. His argument is powerful and unanswerable, so far as it relates to these laws in their present form.

But it would be neither powerful nor unanswerable, if these laws should be so amended as to be jealously restricted, in the scope of their operation, to really obscene literature. If they could not be interpreted so as to punish any one, nominally or really, for the publication or dissemination of his honest opinions, no matter how obnoxious or unpopular these might be,—if they were made wholly inoperative except for the punishment of the human hyenas who prey on helpless childhood,—then they would not in the least infringe upon the just freedom of the press, or violate the constitutional guarantees of that freedom. Mr. Wakeman proceeds throughout on the assumption (and this is the fatal flaw which runs through the whole of his otherwise very able and admirable paper) that the issue lies between the existing laws against obscene literature and none at all,—between national laws which can easily be made to exclude from the mails publications devoted to the advocacy of men's honest convictions on great questions, and the repeal of all national laws against that vile traffic in moral poison which seeks the mails as its chief channel. Mr. Wakeman expresses this assumption very clearly in his letter to the Third Liberal League of New York city, dated August 8:—

"We are told that, if you dare to oppose these laws, you will 'fall into the trap' of allying yourselves and all Liberalism with 'obscenity.' But suppose you do not oppose them? Do you not then ally Liberalism with bigotry and fatal betrayal of liberty? Is not the latter 'trap' the worst of the two?"

It is evident here that Mr. Wakeman has only two alternatives before his eyes—those of opposing, or not opposing, the Comstock laws as they are. From a writer of his ability one might fairly expect a nicer discrimination. We are not shut down to the necessity of either opposing or refusing to oppose those laws as they are; it is perfectly possible to approve the good they do and yet to oppose the evil—in a word, to amend them. Is not that the dictate of common sense? Is not that what wise men do with all other imperfect legislation? When a tariff is too high, is there no mean between leaving it as it is or abolishing it altogether? Why not make it what it ought to be? It looks very much like losing one's intellectual equipoise to jump at conclusions in this rash and illogical way.

We warmly sympathize with Mr. Wakeman's zeal for liberty, but cannot possibly go with him when he declares: "In the true point of view, this is not a question of obscenity, but of liberty." Unfortunately, it is a question of both; and all the special pleading in the world will fail to get rid of either side of this question. The problem is, how to protect the young by efficient legislation against really obscene literature without violating the freedom of the press. No philosopher, certainly, will wilfully shut his eyes to either of those two sides; he will leave to the shallow and thoughtless the childish expedient of rubbing out the figures which "will not add."

But let us concede to Mr. Wakeman that there is no question here but one of liberty,—that it is a violation of freedom of the press for Congress to exclude any class of publications, on any grounds whatever, from the United States mails. This either means something or nothing. If it means anything, it means that it is just as much a violation of that freedom for a State to interfere with obscene literature as it is for Congress. When Mr. Wakeman declares that the "public protection from actual obscenity" is "reserved by the Constitution to the people and the States,"—that "as to grown people and public decency, the matter will be taken care of, as now, by the State and municipal regulations,"—that we "have long-standing and sufficient laws on the whole subject in Massachusetts," and that, "if Mr. Heywood had been found guilty under them," he "would never have come here to enter a protest,"—he overthrows and demolishes absolutely everything in his own argument except its purely technical part. What does Mr. Heywood care, or what does any friend of liberty care, whether he is imprisoned under national or State laws, if he is imprisoned for no offence except pleading his dearest convictions before the public? The wrong is in the fact of imprisonment for such a cause,—not in the technical authority by which the wrong is wrought. This sort of inconsistency, this playing at fast-and-loose with the freedom of the press, is not going to satisfy anybody. Those whose demand for repeal of the Comstock laws rests on a principle, and not on a mere legal technicality, will insist that the State has no more right than the nation to curtail the freedom of the press,—that it is no more a violation of that freedom for Congress to exclude obscene publications from the mails than it is for a State Legislature to prohibit their sale in the shops. Mr. Wakeman concedes either too much or too little; he must go to school to Messrs. Heywood and Tucker to learn what the logic of "repeal" really and rigorously demands. He must make a new argument, and plant himself on broader principles, if he expects to sustain himself against the logic of "reform"; for those who accept his own position that a State may rightfully suppress really obscene literature, and in no degree infringe thereby upon the freedom of the press, will put to him this unanswerable question: "How does Congress any more infringe upon freedom when it does precisely the same thing?"

The fact is that Mr. Wakeman has not thoroughly thought out his subject in all its bearings; he has treated it in too narrow and technical a manner. The powers of Congress are nothing but the powers of the people itself, as a whole; for Congress is only a representative body, deriving all its powers from the people it represents. To limit its powers, therefore, is to limit those of the people. Now the postal system is and can be subject to no control except that of Congress; the States have no control over it whatever, and the people have control over it only through Congress. Any construction of the Constitution which forbids Congress to exclude really obscene literature from the mails lays the people at the mercy of individual malefactors, bound hand and foot. In the very act of denying power over the mails to Congress, Mr. Wakeman confers it upon unscrupulous and villainous individuals, who would be rejoiced to accept his unintended assistance in compelling the nation to become the tool and accomplice of their own crime. He will discover that this is a question of "obscenity," no less than it is of "liberty." It must be decided by the American people whether or not they will treat the mailing of infamous circulars, books, and rubber goods to unsuspecting children as a crime. If they decide that it is (and they have already done so), then Congress alone can have power to prohibit and punish this crime; and the Supreme Court has only accepted the necessities of the case in construing the Constitution accordingly. If they have stretched the Constitution in this construction (which we do not believe), they have only done so in the interest of the people; they have only protected the people from being made the helpless and unwilling tools of social depredators in committing a hideous crime against the people's own children. Mr. Wakeman hugs a delusion to his bosom, if he fancies that the Supreme Court will ever substantially reverse their decision, or that the majority of the people will ever wish them to do so; his argument is altogether too narrow in its scope, too technical in its treatment, too oblivious of the great leading considerations which compel the opposite conclusion. If he had only seen and understood that this is a question both of "obscenity" and "liberty," and had devoted his talents to showing how liberty may be absolutely protected without giving the smallest encouragement or protection to obscenity, he would indeed have risen to the height of the occasion. As it is, he has consented to look only at one side of the shield. In consequence, he neither does justice to the side of "reform" nor to his own side of "repeal." For a strong and unflinchingly logical statement of the "repeal" position, the public must look to Messrs. Heywood and Tucker, not to Mr. Wakeman.

Next week we shall present the "reform" side of this subject, in comparison and contrast with that above presented. We only add that Messrs. Tucker, Heywood, and Wakeman are cordially invited to reply in these columns to our criticisms, if they choose to do so and will grapple earnestly with their real substance. Let us have no more "men of straw."

IF THERE IS ANY WAY of dodging the moral law, human depravity will find it out. "Edward, don't you go out of that gate." He was found thirty minutes after forty rods off playing marbles, and winning another boy's last agate. "Didn't I tell you not to go out of that gate?" said the irate parent. "Well," was the reply, "I didn't go out of the gate; I climbed over the fence." That kind of logic is circulating pretty freely nowadays.—N. Y. Herald.

THERE is infinite pathos in unsuccessful authorship. The book that perishes unread is the deaf-mute of literature.—Holmes.

PRINCIPLES, METHODS, MEN; OR, THE SCIENTIFIC FORMULA OF ORDERLY SOCIAL PROGRESS.

III.

Methods.

Everything is involved in method. If one thing can be said to be most important where three are indispensable, it is method. Method determines and fixes results more immediately than either principles or personal character: for if methods do not always represent the principles and character of their projectors, they do, and of necessity must, determine the nature, form, and quality of manifestation; in other words, results. Method is the middle term or pivot on which rests the right solution of every problem in social science. It is the haunting genius or fate which decides all the issues of life.

The so-called bad man, acting by methods of justice, though devoid of the sentiment, does the will of God; while the good man, acting by false and unjust methods, is an offence to God and man alike. Methods should be adapted to ends, and be homogeneous with them, as the mechanism of the body to the uses of the mind.

It is here, precisely, where theologians, statesmen, and philanthropists have altogether blundered. They have been quarrelling with the soul, man's passionate nature, as being corrupt, rather than the conditions under which those passions should find their true manifestation. They have tried to reform the individual without reforming the institutions of society which dominate him and demonize him in spite of the protestations of those very passions against which they have waged their ceaseless but impotent war. They forget that the individual is to society but as a speck of granite to the eternal hills; that he is the sport of laws, customs, prescriptions, relations, associations, and institutions, both governmental and ecclesiastical, which, individually, he is as powerless to control, as is a grain of sand to sway the solar system. They fail to see that he is weak and without real character save as he is harmoniously related to society. They have not conceived that humanity has a collective destiny, to achieve which can be accomplished only by the friendly cooperation of all its members. They tell us this life was intended for warfare; and we have been going on as if we believed them, fighting our way into heaven as other legions are said to have fought their way out. But for ourselves we do not admit that society is plunged into its existing miseries because mankind have not an instinctive love of right. No; the soul goes out to the good spontaneously as to every other form of beauty. We have not seen that our proper part in the solution of the social problem is to devise a social system in which the free play of individual character will be made to subserve necessarily the social welfare.

The relation of institutions to individual character and their influence upon it has not been properly estimated. The Church is busy converting persons, but has not a word about a conversion of the systems of industry, trade, finance, or any other instituted social obliquity as a necessary element in the real conversion of individual men and women. It has forgotten to teach that social regeneration has anything to do with individual regeneration, and vice versa. Hence men may be and are converted to the faith and fellowship of sects, and are at the same time slave-holders, monopolists, usurers, or other extortioners, and may steal the fruit of other men's toil under the name of profit, interest, or dividends, without disparagement to their church-fellowship or social standing.

The Church makes it no part of its concern to look after the social or collective regeneration, the rectification of the social relations and institutions, our systems of production and distribution, legislative and judicial administration. Indeed it has no conception of such work as any part of its duty. It is forever inculcating the necessity of a conversion of individuals as the all-important end to be sought; averring that a community of regenerated men will necessarily form the regenerated social state. Every existing institution contradicts this assumption. Either there are no regenerate men, or else the regeneration of the individual has not extended to the social institutions. There is not a single religious sect which does not allow that its most pious communicant may, without hurt to his moral character, be an active participant in a system of trade the instinct and first principle of which are, to get profit without an equivalent; and whose primary maxims are, "Every man for himself"; "Look out for number one"; "There is no friendship in trade." If one were to steal a dime from his neighbor's pocket he would find himself in the lock-up. But he may steal a fortune in the way of trade—by stock-gambling, the plundering of investments and franchises, or by the unjust exploiting of labor through the wages system,—without interfering with his chance of being elected to the first deaconship. There is not a single sect or class of religionists, from the oldest and most conservative to the latest and professedly most liberal, of which this declaration is not equally true. Catholic and Protestant, Orthodox and Unitarian, Free Religionist, Spiritualist, and Infidel, are each and all either openly or silently the advocates of laissez faire.

Not one of these has ever done or said the first thing to indicate that they have any idea that the regeneration of the individual necessarily involves that of his social relations. Hence not one of them has ever announced the reconstruction of society in accordance with equity as any part of the work to which the Church as a teacher of morals should address itself. They are all alike ignorant or contemptuous of METHOD, if not of PRINCIPLES.

Hence the work of reformation, from that of Luther to the last revival spasm, born of that teeming mother, Protestantism, with all of our anti-slavery, temperance, peace, moral reform, woman's rights, and labor reform agitations, though prompted by right instinct, is but a repetition of the struggles of the giant with the hydra: for every head lopped off, a score or more hideous ones rise up. It is like cutting in a noxious tree in early autumn, which hardens the fibres against the rigor of winter, and sends the sap back to the roots to increase their vigor. Thus the nuisance we would gladly be rid of is prolonged by the methods intended to effect its destruction. There is a parable of the gardener who cut at the twigs of the evil tree, instead of laying the axe at its roots.

What rational hope of reform so long as our evil tree, a false social system, transforms to hatred the love of upright souls, making that love not less baneful than the malice of the ungodly? Why attempt the cure of intemperance while men and women are subjected to brutal toll on the one hand, and the only way to wealth or competency is through selfish gain-getting at the neighbor's expense on the other? The stupendous robberies of the stock-exchange; the plundering of public treasures; the vile arts of the political tricksters and lobby thieves; and the perjuries of office-holders,—could never be perpetrated and men retain their sanity without resort to rum and tobacco. So long as rascality is the road to wealth and social position, while honesty leads to the poor-house; so long as idleness can roll in luxury, while industry stifles amidst the filth and malaria of tenement-houses,—rum and tobacco will continue to solace and inspire more souls than religion or love.

There was never a greater puerility than to fancy that prostitution will ever be remedied while woman, as to property, political and social rights, is man's inferior. So long as she is excluded from the most lucrative employments and professions, or is unequally paid with men, for such as are open to her; while corrupt and licentious men make the laws, regulating love, marriage, parentage, and divorce; and while only men sit in the judges' seats and in jury boxes, and plead as lawyers in the courts,—the degradation and debasement of woman are inevitable. Until woman is accorded every right which man has; nay, until she is vested with powers which man can never rightfully exercise, her complete emancipation is impossible.

The whole question of love and maternity ought to come under her jurisdiction. It belongs to her because she is woman. Here she should be supreme. She feels and endures what man does not, and what from his organization he cannot know. But she can never attain this position under the existing social system.

What will the abolition of negro slavery have done for us or for the negro himself if we go no farther? Already the enfranchised negro man opposes the enfranchisement of the very women who have broken his own chains. We shall at least have exchanged iron chains for deluding silver ones. The hiredling is still a slave, whether in the pulpit, the cotton-mill or field, in the globe or in the editorial chair. Thomas Carlyle's famous epic of our great civil war, though it stirred our national bile to nausea, comprised in a dozen words the story of antagonizing capital and labor, of manhood cowering on the one hand, and of tyranny rampant on the other. That was the story of the war.

What signifies the eight-hour law agitation? It is a boy's game at cricket. It amuses the boys who play and the politicians who turn the game to their own account. It settles no question of principle. It ameliorates the condition of no class. It is only cutting a piece off one end of the string to tie it upon the other. What the laborer is to save in time will be deducted from his already insufficient pay, while reduced production enhances the cost of living. Employers in States where there is no such law, will drive to the wall those in States where the law exists and is enforced; and the latter must suspend business. Their laborers thrown out of employment must find it elsewhere, if they can, by competing with others of their craft who deem themselves fortunate in having to work eleven hours a day. The effect will be to depress wages everywhere while enhancing the cost of living.

But if labor is rightly a barterable commodity, both purchaser and seller should be equally free parties to the contract. What signifies this useless tangle about a matter which might be conceded by every legislature under the sun, without lifting a single burden from the backs of the working-classes, or adding an iota in their emancipation, from a system under which degradation must be permanent and hopeless?

The real question for the working-man to consider is, not the number of hours he works, but how he works. If he works as a free man, is neither a chattel nor a hiredling; if he works by right and from choice, not by compulsion or permission; if the work is agreeable and the worker gets all he earns instead of having a third or a tithe of his earnings absorbed by another or others who do nothing but boss him; if his work is education, and education is work,—what matters it whether he works four hours a day, or fourteen? Such labor is free, joyous, compensative, honorable, and there is no danger of there being too much of it. And one hour of any other labor is too much.

If labor reform is ever to succeed, we must have done with quackery in ideas and methods. There is no adjustment of antagonisms. They must be neutralized. Therefore we have no time to palter with eight-hour laws, but we attack the whole system of wages as at bottom a fraud and a crime. We demand that labor shall be obligatory upon everybody from the nature and form of our social arrangements; that it shall be adapted to aptitudes; made lucrative, honorable, and thereby, a thing to be desired, not shunned; that every laborer shall be a capitalist and every capitalist a laborer; and that faithful service and capacity shall be the ground of all promotion, social and political.

Do we therefore oppose these partial reforms as without any use? By no means. We fail to see in them what their advocates think they see. We hail them as symptoms of awakening life. They are so many voices in the wilderness, proclaiming the need of the true integral reform, which is to come. They are steps in the process of education into true methods. They are not the method, but will lead towards it.

IV.

The failure of past religions and civilizations, to establish the reign of justice and order, and thereby of love, comes from blunders in methods; the adoption of partial instead of integral methods; or those which are generated in selfishness, instead of those homogeneous with love, and normal to the spirit of justice. We have attempted to pluck the golden fruit of love from trees of discord,—grapes from thorns, figs from thistles. Is it likely that we shall get the genuine fruit? Had we not better take a lesson in comparative physiology?

Coöperation reveals the gamut of social harmony,—is the clew which leads from the labyrinth of our miseries. The existing social system rests upon the isolated family, and is characterized by general incoherence, antagonism, and competitive interests. The results are industrial feudalism, commercial monopoly, and stock-jobbing, by means of a vicious system of finance, which enables a middle class to live without labor by exploiting,—robbing both the producer and consumer.

The isolated family, with its exclusive interests and sympathies, is the first or basic form of social selfishness; and while the social structure rests wholly upon that basis, any permanent social improvement is impossible. You might as well expect that the rattlesnake will not secrete venom under his fangs as to suppose that the isolated interests will not generate selfishness. So long as the physiological structure remains intact in the snake venom will distill; and though the reptile's heart be converted to the original guilelessness of his fabled great progenitor, his bite will be as fatal as if inspired by the most fiery malignity.

Science tells us that the primordial cell determines the nature of every organic structure. The law is as true in the structure of society as in all things else. The isolated family, nursing its exclusive, petty interests, is a nest of selfishness; and our social system is a vast bundle of such nests or cells,—the centres of perpetual antagonisms, strife, and conflict in themselves and with one another. They are the glands in our social system which do and ever must, from their organic structure, secrete the adder's poison; and all the waters of the sweet skies would be turned to deadly bane distilled through this serpent's fangs.

No principle or fact in science or comparative physiology is better understood, or rather known, than that of the power of organic forms or structures to transform the nature of substances. The same juice or sap, which passing through a homogeneous structure of roots, trunk, branches, and leaves, becomes a quince; rising through those of the pear-tree becomes a pear. The simple difference of atomic arrangement or structural organization, in trees of the same family, creates the infinite variety of fruits, as regards form, flavor, odor, color, and texture. The white, milky substance in the stomach known as chyle, which is perfectly homogeneous, becomes scarlet blood in the lungs and arteries, and crimson blood in the veins, nervous fluid in the brain, bile in the liver, and gastric juice in the glands of the stomach. Such is the transforming power over substance of structural arrangements,—the magic of method in phenomenal manifestation.

It is then a philosophical necessity that an order of society which is the normal form of selfishness should yield as its fruit ignorance, injustice, and crime, and could not produce intelligence, honor, justice, and truth.

Our method then is plain. To produce the peaceable fruits of righteousness, society itself must undergo regeneration or reconstruction; and that, too, integrally, not partially. We have got to see that there are holier ties than those of blood; that being born of the same parents does not necessarily make us of one family, or kindred even; but that we become truly kindred and of one family by doing the will of God,—which is to establish in the structure of society itself, as well as in the hearts of its members, the reign of justice and love.

Can we fail to see that the method of love and wisdom is coöperation, not antagonism? Would one be likely to arrive at the truth in an equation in algebra if he were to add when he should subtract, and divide when he should multiply?

Love seeketh not her own, but another's good; gives all things, and thereby gets all things. Coöperation in production and exchange is the way of redemption for the working-classes and all classes,—white and black, bond and free, male and female. It leads to the ennobling of labor and the laborer. It gives him a direct interest in his labor; awards to him his whole earnings; guarantees the right to employment adapted to his tastes and aptitudes; multiplies the means of making his labor easy, agreeable, and ten-fold more remunerative. It will make labor attractive by making it social instead of solitary, as now; and by making it the sphere of practical education and of all honorable promotion. It will be a source of honor and truth because it will open to men and women alike all spheres of industry, emolument, and preferment; and will dispense with, or absorb into the ranks of industry all the idle, speculative, and other vicious classes, who are now the lice and locusts, the frogs and flies of our social Egypt.

Exchange will then be easy and economical, and will be made directly between one body of producers and another; and thus will be ended the senseless cackle we are now crazed with about resumption of specie payment and the greenback panacea. The currency will not be the shameful fraud it now is in every civilized nation. It will be neither gold nor a sham in the shape of a bank-note "based on gold," in the phrase of the bullionists; nor the 3.85 interchangeable greenback; nor that shadow of nothing, the national bank-note, redeemable in greenbacks, which are themselves redeemable "nowhere, never, and in nothing." But it will be a certificate of deposit representing any and every kind of labor products, deposited in a public warehouse, under the management of capable and responsible persons and the strict supervision of the people; each certificate of deposit being redeemable in the specific commodity which it represents: if wool, redeemable in wool; if hides, in hides; if corn, in corn; if iron, in iron; if gold or silver, then in one of those metals. The currency will then be under the immediate control of the people instead of a patented monopoly; and every man can have as much money as he has goods to make it good withal, and no more. The potholes and noise about inflation will end; and the trade of the usurer, banker, or extortioner, as you will, will come to a righteous end,—an event which will be hailed with joy by every toiler on the globe.

Society so organized, with such a medium of credit or exchange no class could live without work or useful service. Whatever one would enjoy, that must he earn. All agitation about rum-selling, prostitution, woman's rights, and eight-hour laws would be settled by the spontaneous consent and concurrent interests of the people.

Is it said that such a method presents so broad an issue, with existing facts, that it cannot be successfully adopted? Is there any other method which can give success, and which if adopted will prove a salvation? Is there any other method but the selfish one, which we have been trying through all the rising and falling civilizations of the past? There is none. Give up cooperation as the basis, form, and method of our social life, adopt anything else as a substitute, and you will continue in the future, as in the past, to contend with heaven and fate alike. If our aim be that of ideal justice, we shall come short enough of it, with our best methods and doings; and we shall be fools if we expect grapes from a pumpkin-vine.

Cooperation is the divine way or method of social harmony. It coordinates interest with duty, the love of self to the love of others. It demonstrates how a life of justice and honor is possible for men; and that it is more profitable for all than a life of injustice and falsehood. Is it not clear that principles are barren until conjoined with true methods, and that there is a science of methods by which alone the growth and conservation of the social welfare can be insured, and that universal cooperation is that method, the only complete method satisfactory alike to faith and reason, and meeting alike the demands of science and religion? JOHN ORVIS.

A WORD FOR KEARNEY.

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Sir,—In this week's INDEX I have read several scraps in relation to D. Kearney.

I find that every paper in the country that I am in the habit of reading (with the exception of the Investigator and Evolution) are continually vilifying this man. Of course I could form no decided opinion about him, having never seen or heard him previous to last Wednesday; but I was confident that every Democratic and Republican sheet in the country would vilify any man that dared to lay bare the racialities of his employers. Consequently I paid no attention to their shrieks. But when I see a liberal paper like THE INDEX quoting from J. Gould's Tribune, then I must say something, particularly after listening to this Kearney for fully two hours last Wednesday in an address on "Labor and the Rights of Man."

This lecture—I can call it nothing else—was given in the presence of fully fifteen thousand persons, in an open field four miles from this city. The Democratic and Republican press of this city never alluded to it. They dare not lie about him, knowing the lie could be nailed on their foreheads; consequently they were dumb. And it's no use for Tribunes, Heralds, and Times to waste printers' ink in vilifying him any more. Very soon the whole American people will have their eyes open. They have been blind, deaf, and dumb long enough; and I consider that Kearney came to this section none too soon to strike terror into the "parasites of the human race" in this miserably-governed nation.

They say he uses "bad grammar"! Well, whose fault is that? Were the heroes of Bunker Hill thorough grammarians? Were the men who boarded the ships in Boston Harbor and destroyed the tea,—or those who fell at Lexington,—were they grammarians? In State prisons you can find hundreds of splendid grammarians, college and university-bred at that.

They also say that he uses coarse and disgusting language. In the two hours that I was listening to him I heard nothing of the kind. Every word was proper, and placed in its proper place, and he struck the target every time.

He called a thief, a thief; a robber, a robber; a hypocrite, a hypocrite; a liar, a liar. This was all proper; it was calling things by their right names. If men will be only just and fair in their dealings with one another, they will escape being called these vile names.

Christ, the Christian's God, but in my opinion a mere monk or ascetic,—what did he call those whom he came in contact with? Why, I consider that he outdid Kearney in calling names.

However, he is doing his allotted task. The times require just such a man; and, in my opinion, the time will come when he will be considered the savior of his race.

In speaking of gold, he said: "I hate a coward! The rankest coward I ever knew is gold! Whenever danger menaces a country, it runs away; when all danger is past, it comes sneaking back, like a nasty cur as it is; but when danger comes again, away it flies again." This I give merely from memory; and I never listened to truer words.

If Kearney, in color, were as black as ink, I would respect him after listening to him last Wednesday. And if I had his brains, I would assuredly take the field myself in the cause he is engaged in; for, in my opinion, it is a holy cause.

The people now cannot be hoodwinked any longer. Prejudice and bigotry cannot divide men any longer; at certain periods man takes a long stride forward. That is, "necessity," or natural law, compels them to progress, in spite of all opposition.

A mere insignificant tax on a cup of tea gave mental and political liberty to man a hundred years ago, and only from that date can we say that tyranny received its first repulse. Now there is a greater grievance still. It's not "tea" this time: it's bonds; it's monopolies; it's ruination; it's liberty or death. But liberty will win; it won before, and it will again.

The American people sacrificed a million of men to free an African, and they are prepared to do better to liberate themselves.

No doubt you will find this letter "ungrammatical," for I have no more education than Kearney. But if so it is not my fault, but the fault of others.

Respectfully, THOS. DUGAN.

ALBANY, Sept. 14, 1878.

[The Cambridge Word, in its issue for September, takes another view of Kearney, though itself a radical "Labor Reform" journal: "Seldom do we read so sensible an article as that which we copy from the Boston Pilot, in rebuke of Dennis Kearney, the brainless demagogue who comes from California to advise Massachusetts workingmen to 'pool their issues,' forgetting that men can be permanently and effectively united only by ideas, and that to abandon ideas is to commit suicide. Kearney's opposition to the Chinese long ago branded him as a know-nothing in policy; his incoherent utterances on Massachusetts platforms show him to be a know-nothing in fact. We do not object to hard names, and nowhere can they be applied more deservedly than to American capitalists; but indiscriminate and unintelligent abuse, founded on neither sense nor reason, is a weapon that is dangerous only to those who use it. In the name of 'Labor Reform,' we protest most earnestly against its friends connecting themselves with, or in any manner countenancing, a man who can see no connection between ideas and the workingman's stomach, and denounces all reasoning beings as Utopian contractors with the man in the moon."—ED.]

THE WOMAN QUESTION.

EDITOR INDEX:

Mr. Stevens, in THE INDEX of August 20, speaking of the woman question, says much that is true; but I must dissent from what seems almost a sneer at the "exceptional" women who have so violated Nature's purposes as to lead a public life.

Probably, if all men were good and able to provide quiet, secluded homes, and each woman could be supplied for life with a protector, Nature's plan, as indicated by Mr. Stevens, might be carried out. But the reverse of this is so obvious, that it seems cruel to put the stigma of "exceptional" or "strong-minded" on women who are necessitated (and they are not the few but the many) to labor for themselves and others. Would Mr. Stevens kindly define what he means by masculine manners? Many men, probably the majority, and many women, too, think it is masculine for a woman to talk on any other subject than dress, or the immediate worries of housekeeping. To be interested in the "Eastern Question," the "Silver Question," or the "Woman Question," is to be considered, in their estimation, a masculine woman, and much to be condemned for departing from her "heaven-appointed sphere."

Mr. Stevens rather implies that to be "exceptional" destroys the tender, domestic feelings; but it cannot be said with truth that the "strong-minded" women of this age have neglected their motherly, wifely, or sisterly duties. Miss Anthony, who has received so large a share of abuse for her ideas, certainly proved herself a womanly woman when she went to Leavenworth, several years ago, to nurse her brother through a severe and protracted illness, and edited his paper at the same time! Was she any the less sympathetic or kind because of her ability to edit the paper, as well as care for the invalid?

Nature's plans and forces are not to be so easily eradicated. More knowledge and more individual freedom for women will not do away with the institution of marriage; but, if the ideas of Herbert Spencer and his school on that subject are to prevail, the best women will hardly like to try such a dangerous experiment.

In the Popular Science Monthly for September, 1877, Mr. Herbert Spencer says, in an article on "Domestic Retrospect and Prospect," page 521: "In respect of domestic power, the relative position of women will doubtless rise; but it seems improbable that absolute equality with men will be reached. Legal decisions from time to time demanded by marital differences, involving the question which shall yield, are not likely to reverse all past decisions. Even though law may balance claims, it will, as the least evil, continue to give, in case of need, supremacy to the husband, as being the more judicially minded. And, similarly, in the moral relations of married life, the preponderance of power, resulting from greater massiveness of nature, must, however unobtrusive it become, continue with the man."

Again "F." in the Popular Science Monthly for March, 1873, on page 559, says, in discussing the marriage contract: "Take the following set of questions: 'Shall we live on this scale or that? Shall we associate with such and such persons? Shall I, the husband, embark in such an undertaking, and shall we change our place of residence in order that I may do so? Shall we send our daughters to school or have a governess? For what profession shall we train our sons?' On these, and a thousand other such questions, the wisest and the most affectionate people might arrive at opposite conclusions. What is to be done in such a case?—for something must be done. I say the wife ought to give way. She ought to obey her husband, and carry out the view at which he deliberately arrives, just as, when the captain gives the word to cut away the masts, the lieutenant carries out his orders at once, though he may be a better seaman and disapprove them. I also say that, to regard this as a humiliation, as a wrong, or as an evil in itself, is a mark not of spirit and courage, but of a base, unworthy, mutinous disposition,—a disposition utterly subversive of all that is most worth having in life." And more to the same effect.

I am afraid "F." would regard poor Mrs. Besant as of a "base, unworthy, mutinous disposition" for daring to appeal against one of the "more judicially-minded"—namely, her husband,—to regain her child! For the recent decision in that famous case is the logical outcome of the doctrine that justice is to be a question of sex. Yours respectfully, ENON, Pa., Sept. 8, 1878. M. R. B.

A "RATIONAL CHURCH."

EDITOR OF INDEX:

I heartily endorse the views of H. Clay Neville that appeared in THE INDEX of the 6th of June, in reference to a rational Church. Liberals are greatly in need of an organization for the cultivation of their moral and ethical nature, and the encouragement of practical righteousness.

I have no doubt but there can be found among the liberals plenty of talent and earnestness to found such an organization upon sound principles.

A church wisely constructed so as to meet the needs of the nineteenth century would be a grand asylum, a refreshing and religious home for all liberals who are socially inclined.

It might be somewhat difficult to formulate a set of principles that all could accept and endorse. They could safely allow a great deal of latitude about things not absolutely demonstrable, assert the positive importance of the chief pillars of society, and make their organization a great highway of natural help to all parties journeying from old foggy ideas to the elevated plains of free thought and substantial enjoyments.

In a later number of THE INDEX, Mr. Walker, in commenting upon Mr. Neville's position, seems to think that the whole ground is covered by endeavoring to secure justice between man and man. To this we would say, there can be no question as to the importance of meting out exact justice. To enable mankind to do this most desirable thing, there are a great many auxiliary matters to be looked after; and an important one is to build up a strong character that can stand up and defiantly demand that justice be dispensed with an impartial hand.

We readily admit that all great geniuses and some strong men with cold natures can do this, and also get along very well without the aid of church organizations; but such is not the case with the great mass of men and women, who feel the need of an abundance of social encouragement.

If all the timid and faint-hearted liberals of our land could have a church where they could go and realize that it was a real home, large additions would be made to the valiant warriors for the truth, and this class would no longer be seen wending their way on Sunday to some Orthodox church (in whose creed they have no confidence) in search of social fellowship.

A few strong-minded men and women of high culture may answer as an effective entering wedge in liberating the human mind from the thralldom of superstition; but, to make a work of that kind effective, there will need to be provided suitable machinery for the mass of us to work in companies. For this reason I second the motion of Mr. Neville, and hope that at no distant day we shall realize the fulfilment of our hopes. Yours for the right, E. G. THOMAS.

IT ALWAYS PAYS to be polite. As the steamer "Magenta" was descending the Hudson River recently, being crowded with passengers, an old gentleman was unable to find a seat. A young man, noticing this, gave the old gentleman his chair and went forward. Two minutes afterward the boiler blew up and the old gentleman was killed, while the man who had given up his seat escaped unhurt.

LET PLEASURE be ever so innocent, the excess is always criminal.—St. Evremont.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10¢ per line.
" 13 " 25 " "	8 " "
" 26 " 51 " "	6 " "
" 52 " " " "	5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1873.
To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON, publish

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tena-ly, N.Y.
J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
O. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
W. D. L. SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.
ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.
JAMES E. OLIVER, Ithaca, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.20 for one year, including postage, or 80 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fifth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

GREAT THROUGH LINE AND UNITED STATES MAIL ROUTE.

The attention of the travelling public is respectfully invited to some of the merits of this great highway, in the confident assertion and belief that no other line can offer equal inducements as a route of through travel. In

CONSTRUCTION AND EQUIPMENT

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD stands confessedly at the head of American railways. The track is double the entire length of the line, of steel rails laid on heavy oak ties, which are embedded in a foundation of rock ballast eighteen inches in depth. All bridges are of iron or stone, and built upon the most approved plans. Its passenger cars, while eminently safe and substantial, are at the same time models of comfort and elegance.

THE SAFETY APPLIANCES

In use on this line well illustrate the far-seeing and liberal policy of its management, in accordance with which the utility only of an improvement and not its cost has been the question of consideration. Among many may be noticed

The Block System of Safety Signals, Janney Coupler, Buffer, and Platform, The Wharton Patent Switch, and the Westinghouse Air-Brake, forming in conjunction with a perfect double track and road-bed a combination of safeguards against accidents which have rendered them practically impossible.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to vote, in the Annual Congress.

ORGANIZE CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charter shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

PLATFORM

For the Presidential Election of 1880,
ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N.B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

SECOND ANNUAL CONGRESS

OF THE

National Liberal League.

CALL.

Boston, Sept. 13, 1878.

The Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July 1-4, 1876, will be held at Wisting Opera House, Syracuse, N.Y., on Saturday and Sunday, Oct. 26 and 27, 1878. Further particulars as to speakers, etc., will be announced hereafter.

In addition to the hearing of reports, election of officers for the ensuing year, and other ordinary business, questions of the utmost practical importance to the liberal cause will come up for decision at this Congress. Among them the following may be specified:—

1. What efficient measures can be adopted for securing a great increase in the number of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, and thereby winning for liberal ideas the public influence to which they are justly entitled?

2. Shall the National Liberal League nominate candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States at the present time?

3. How can the National Liberal League most effectively promote the cause of State Secularization, and foil the schemes of those who are seeking to pervert the government to sectarian purposes? What action shall it take with reference to the Constitutional Amendment already twice reported to the United States Senate by the Judiciary Committee, the practical effect of which, if adopted, will be to recognize in the Constitution the right of the Bible to be read in the public schools as a book of divine authority, and the right of church property to be exempted from taxation?

4. How can the rights of free mails and a free press be most effectively defended, and how can the wrongs of persons unjustly punished under the so-called Comstock laws be most effectively righted?

5. Shall the National Liberal League abandon the stand it originally took on the "obscene literature" question at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, or shall it continue to defend equally the cause of public morality and the cause of free mails and a free press? Shall it now demand the total repeal of the existing laws on this subject, and thereby practically protect and foster the circulation of obscene literature? Or shall it continue to demand the radical reform of those laws, in such manner as shall protect freedom of thought to the uttermost without protecting obscenity in the least?

The last two of these questions are peculiarly important at this time, and will inevitably come up for settlement by the approaching Congress. The resolutions adopted at Philadelphia were as follows:—

"Resolved, That this League, while it recognizes the great importance and the absolute necessity of guarding by proper legislation against obscene and indecent publications, whatever sect, party, order, or class such publications claim to favor, disapproves and protests against all laws which, by reason of indefiniteness or ambiguity, shall permit the prosecution and punishment of honest and conscientious men for presenting to the public what they deem essential to the public welfare, when the views thus presented do not violate in thought or language the acknowledged rules of decency; and that we demand that all laws against obscenity and indecency shall be so clear and explicit that none but actual offenders against the recognized principles of purity shall be liable to suffer therefrom.

"Resolved, That we cannot but regard the appointment and authorization by the government of a single individual to inspect our mails, with power to exclude therefrom whatever he deems objectionable, as a delegation of authority dangerous to public and personal liberty, and utterly inconsistent with the genius of free institutions."

The future growth, prosperity, and influence of the Liberal League movement will depend largely on the action to be taken by the Congress on these two questions. Any weakening of the stand taken at Philadelphia will work great and perhaps fatal disaster to the National Liberal League.

In order, therefore, that these vital questions may be fairly and wisely decided, it is recommended that all Local Leagues elect their delegates with special reference to it. The Congress will not be an irresponsible mass meeting, but a convention composed of delegates and members duly accredited, and seats for them will be reserved. Delegates from Local Leagues will receive Certificates of Membership of the Second Annual Congress by forwarding at once the proper credentials, signed by their own local officers, to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston"; charter, life, and annual members who intend to be present will receive theirs by simply forwarding their names and present addresses. These Certificates must be presented at the door and exchanged for Tickets of Admission to the reserved seats, the rest of the hall being open to the public at large. By this arrangement all confusion will be obviated. The Congress will be composed of accredited members, who alone ought to vote on questions of business affecting the League; every member will be admitted to the reserved seats; and the Committee on Membership will be enabled to make an accurate report to the Congress.

Liberals are urged everywhere to organize themselves into Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues and elect good delegates, in order to give this Congress a large local constituency and an influential delegation, and thereby to increase the weight of its decisions with the general public. The questions to be acted upon are of the gravest consequence to the whole liberal cause, and ought to be dealt with by a responsible representative body. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay, if addressed to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston."

By order of the Board of Directors:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.

WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

GLIMPSES.

A NEW Liberal League has just been chartered at East Dennis, on Cape Cod. It embraces many of the most influential persons of the place. Captain D. S. Chapman is President, and Mr. R. Chapman is Secretary.

WE DECLINE to be drawn into any personal controversy over the Syracuse Congress. Measures and methods are one thing: personal assaults are a very different thing. This is no personal issue at all; it is an issue of principle, and he who resorts to personalities proves that he has no case in reason.

WE ARE CHARGED by the plotters with attempting to "capture the convention." We confess it. The plotters are doing the same thing. But the difference between them and us is this: they are trying to "capture the convention" by a conspiracy of calumnies, tricks, and shameless falsehoods; while we are trying to capture it by fair, open, and honest argument on the issues at stake, addressed to the intellects and consciences of the members, and submitted to the decision of the majority in free and public debate. Let the right prevail!

A NEW YORK correspondent writes: "Let me express now my satisfaction that you and other officers of the League have so earnestly declined to be candidates for reelection, except the Congress take a pure and manly course regarding the question of freedom of thought, speech, and the press, as it affects the suppression of obscene literature in the mails. As liberals, we owe it to ourselves to take no step which leads not in the direction of purity, and we must be sure our every weapon is untarnished. We seek liberty, but not at the expense of honesty or purity. With sincere hopes that the Congress may be wise and courageous," etc.

THE BOSTON Advertiser of Sept. 30 had this editorial paragraph: "The second annual congress of the National Liberal League, whose object is 'to secularize the republic,'—that is, to remove from the laws and the Constitution all recognition of religious obligation,—is to be held in Syracuse late in October. The congress is threatened with a schism; the conservative wing now holding the organization, Mr. Francis E. Abbot of Boston, president, desiring a great modification of the laws relating to obscene literature, and a stricter definition of what constitutes 'obscenity'; the radical, or extreme free-love wing, seeking the immediate and total repeal of all laws restraining the publication and distribution of obscene books. Mr. Abbot and his friends charge the free-lovers with a purpose to Butlerize the league, by means of a secret movement to surprise and capture it. And the summons has gone forth to all the members who wish to save the 'liberal cause' from such a suicidal fate to be ready for the contest."

THE PUBLIC ought to understand the spirit of the men who are trying to force the National Liberal League to abandon its former position in favor of "reform" and take a new departure in favor of "repeal." The Truth Seeker unblushingly accuses us of "fabricating" and "concocting" the private letter we quoted in our issue of September 19,—of making deliberately "false" statements on the same subject,—of "threatening" the League,—of intending to refuse certificates of membership to all delegates except those who will vote for us,—of being about to "steal an office,"—of meaning to "pack the convention" and "put it in our pocket,"—of "forestalling its action,"—of "dictating," etc., etc. It declares explicitly that our position on the Comstock laws "unfits" us for the office we now hold, and nominates Hon. Eliza Wright for our successor—as if, forsooth, our faithful and honored friend did not take substantially the same position! Such absurd slanders, considering their source, are simply beneath contempt. We only refer to them as transparent proofs of the plot which we have exposed, and proofs of the rage into which exposure has thrown the plotters. They remind us of what Mazzini wrote, in reference to similar slanders against himself: "It was a terrible revelation to me of the future of base suspicion, distrust, and calumny, reserved for those who, in all purity of soul and faith in others, consecrate their lives to any great undertaking."

"The Free-Religious Movement: ITS PAST AND FUTURE."

AN ADDRESS BEFORE THE TWENTY-EIGHTH CONGREGA TIONAL SOCIETY OF BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 8, 1878.

BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

It is a very interesting fact when you think of it, friends, that the great ocean steamers, and even those of smaller make, which ply along our shores, never mark their courses by objects external to themselves, but carry within, in their charts and compasses, the internal evidences of their position. That chart and compass—the latter originally invented outside Christianity—what important things they are! On the voyage from New York to Liverpool the question is not, Where is this place, or that place? the question is, What does the chart say? what does the compass say? Without these, navigation would be aimless drifting; with them, it is intelligent progress.

I think the time has come when we may do well to take our bearings in the free-religious movement; to look into the internal evidences of our condition; to ask not, Where is Orthodoxy, where Unitarianism? but Where are we? What are we doing to enable man to perfect himself? What to enable humanity to perfect itself? In other words, I ask you to consider the past and future of free religion.

First, of the past: What has our movement done? Of course the causes which produced what is called free religion are very subtle, and extend very far back. In the evolution of ideas always going on, never sudden, but logical and sure, the time always comes when some upheaval, some outward convulsion, seems to challenge public attention. Such challenge is usually considered the beginning, the birth of the idea. In reality it is only the occasion which called it forth. Now the occasion which summoned the free-religious idea to the front, and gave to it an organized form, was a certain drawing-in of the more liberal sects, and especially the adoption by the Unitarian body at Syracuse, in the year 1868, of an article of faith affirming the Lordship of Jesus Christ. This article or preamble was as follows:—

"Whereas the great opportunities and demands for Christian labor and consecration at this time increase our sense of the obligations of all disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ to prove their faith by self-denial, and by the devotion of their lives and possessions to the service of God and the building up of the kingdom of his Son; therefore," etc.

The latent fire of religious liberty slumbering in many a bosom needed only such an act to fan it into a brisk flame; and, whatever may have been the quiet, unnoticed tendencies before, from that time on the work of disintegration was apparent to all eyes.

Mr. Frothingham, in his opening speech as president of the meeting held in Boston, May 30, 1867, at which the Free Religious Association was organized, in voicing the prevailing sentiment, used these words: "It has been said lately that the time for a new religious departure has come; that the old parties in Christendom have drawn within their lines; that the doors are open by which people from the outside can come in; but they are not doors by which people from the inside can go out; and that the time has come, therefore, for a new departure." Mr. Weiss, at a more recent meeting of the association, said: "I felt perfectly free in Unitarianism up to a certain point. That fatal point came with the National Convention of Unitarians at Syracuse. I do not believe there is a man on this platform who would not, to-day, be a zealous inmate of the Unitarian church if it had not been for that one thing." But the one thing took place, and the Unitarian body was rent in twain. From that hour on it lost some of its ablest thinkers, and a large and constantly increasing number of its rank and file. The same process was going on in Spiritualism, Universalism, among the Quakers,—in fact, everywhere,—and free religion has received large contributions from all quarters, not excluding Orthodoxy, although Unitarianism was originally, and is still, its chief source of supply; so that, whether looking back to its first and silent causes, or to the occasion which gave them public exhibition, free religion is seen to have been primarily a protest against ecclesiasticism and dogma. So long as it was the revolt of isolated individuals, and for some time after there was a degree of concert of action, it kept this form. But there was that in its nature which went beyond mere negation. The men who dissented when the church issued its decrees were positive men, with positive ideals and positive everyday lives. It was not enough for them, the throwing off the yoke of sectarian tyranny; they were more than ready to become willing servants of the free spirit; and so the constructive work began. Seeing the pulpit in chains, free religion said, We must have a free platform. That of itself meant a revolution. Church government had permitted a certain degree of freedom, but had always set somewhere a limit. You must recognize the divinity of Christ, said one creed. You must recognize his Lordship, said another. You must preach total depravity, said one. You must preach religion, not politics or reform, said another. The popular minister had come to be one who could talk learnedly of the past without troubling the present; mumble over the old phrases without much regard to their significance; and "compound for sins his congregation were inclined to by damning those they had no mind to." Of course the more polished such a pulpit, the better it reflected the sins of the pews. The expounding of Scripture texts, the creation of the world, the original fall of man, and all the suggestive topics, under the preaching of which many a good old soul slept away a comfortable half-hour—or the stern berating of dead men for sins supposed to have died with them—were, perhaps, equally harmless and prolific subjects of discourse; and if now and then some brave man ventured to hold a conviction, or to express a sentiment, inconsistent with the business of one brother, or the prejudices of another, he was speedily turned upon the world with neither food nor shelter. But following the brave lead of Theodore Parker, and in some respects bettering his teaching, as coming later in the history of thought it was bound to do, free religion started on a new basis. It threw away all the gags; it recognized but one leader, the spirit of truth; it insisted upon the right of private judgment; it taught each man to say, The only supreme authority, the court of final appeal for me, is my conscience. Uniformity of belief is of no consequence, it said; individual liberty of thought and respectful toleration for all,—these are of the first importance. So when it puts a man upon its platform, wherever that platform may be, he stands there, not the representative of a creed nor of any kind of church organization; he is simply his own representative, and speaks with the authority of his own conscientious convictions—that is all. He stands there for the moment God's mouthpiece, and shame upon him if he refuses to give the truth struggling for utterance! Of course there has always been, there will in the nature of things always be, dissent. Some incline to metaphysics, some to art, some to science, some to charity, some to reform. Free religion, at its best, has aimed to minister to all these; it has said all will be better for having a share of each than for being overloaded with any one, even though it be the best. Its ideal has been as broad as the universe, as comprehensive as human needs. Let no man complain; let all rejoice, rather, if its best friends have endeavored to make its platform so broad that it could speak one day of thought, another of deeds; one day of nature, another of art; one day of the aspiring spirit, another of the practical life. It would have been false to its mission, it would have been an imitator rather than a reformer of pulpits, had it refused to any question, coming with an honest thought and a decent respect for good morals, a respectful hearing. It has been more than Christian; that is to say, it has not limited itself to the Christian name or to Christian ideas, but I verily believe that if Jesus Christ were to come upon the earth to-day and preach as he preached when here, it would be, with only one or two exceptions (and these outside the church), the only platform where he would be welcomed. In this essential it is in a marked degree the platform of universal religion; for it would not only welcome Jesus,—it would welcome Zoroaster and Confucius and Buddha. It has revealed the world to itself. Why it never entered the heads of our fathers, it enters but a small minority of Christian heads to-day, that there can be anything worthy outside Christianity,—a system entirely unknown to a large majority of the earth's inhabitants. At this late hour it has been discovered that there really are points of merit in the old civilizations, and that three-fourths of the human race have not been left, as was at one time supposed, without some witness to the truth which has given life to all systems, and is greater than all. One man discovers that modern civilization is not exclusively, or even chiefly, the product of Christianity, but that Mohammedanism has had much more to do with it. Another finds that in Japan there is, in some respects, absolute superiority as compared with us. One after another of the points on which Christianity has been made to appear superior are shown to be errors. No one can tell where the process will stop, but it has already gone far enough to show that many other religions are worthy to stand by its side. The spiritual element in Brahmanism, the golden rule of Confucianism, the commandments of Buddhism, the sense of justice in Zoroastrianism,—these are not the darkness of a heathen night, they are the clear light of an aspiring noonday. But for free religion we might have gone on to this day in blissful ignorance of the impertinence of our missionary enterprises. We have been startled out of our egotism and self-conceit by finding that "the heathen" can teach us some things in return for what we may teach them; and we shall henceforth speak with greater respect and greater truth of the honest beliefs of people who can worship purely and live nobly without ever having heard of us or our system. Still, free religion does not necessarily reject Christianity. It only takes out of it its exclusiveness; it only places it side by side with its sister systems; it recognizes the weaknesses and evils in all systems, but it especially seeks the good in all. No pulpit ever did that; no pulpit ever did justice to the elder brothers of the great Nazarene. But free religion, with its free platform and its spirit of free inquiry, has done that. It has sent its divers into the ocean of history, and they have brought up to the astonished gaze of mankind the pearls of centuries. When the human mind conceives for the first time that instead of one system of religion we have a dozen, instead of one Christ we have nobody can tell how many, its horizon recedes, its vision broadens; it makes one feel that he is living in a greater world, and is himself a sublimer fact in the universe. Every additional great soul forms a new link in the chain of humanity which binds all souls together, and all souls to the soul of things.

It has been said that free religion destroys worship. I think, on the contrary, it has in this very way opened to us the only true worship possible. Does a man stand before the Unknown with less of awe and reverence because he finds that truth and love have had ten times as many prophets and forms as he had supposed? Verily, he must be cold indeed who could worship less because there was a Socrates and a Buddha as well as a Jesus. That free religion has broken in upon the old idea of worship is unquestionably true. It has taught us to dislike the Church's forms, its stated prayers, its meaningless recital of phrases, its crude symbolisms; but it has never denied that there was a good idea prompting them. And so it has tried to do, and to some extent has succeeded in doing, in its way, what Church religion has done for man in its way. It has undertaken to substitute, for the Church's superstitious and formal worship, a rational and spontaneous worship. In regard to prayer, it says, if I mistake not, with substantial unanimity, that one person cannot, at a stated moment, express rationally and spontaneously in prayer the mood of a congregation. It further says that there can be no propriety in addressing prayer to a particular source; for if the one addressed have a real existence, it is certain he will not give simply for the asking, because that is not the way in which things come in this world. Prayer, rightly understood, is—is it not?—the human feeling after the divine—the human everywhere feeling after the divine everywhere. My religion wants to do its own praying,—wants me to pray for myself; not in words, but in ceaseless aspiration after all that is true and beautiful and good. So, to me, it rules out public prayer as ordinarily understood, and considers the putting of prayer into words often an impossibility. Prayer may be put into deeds, it says; rarely into words. This, I apprehend, is largely the free-religious view, also. But it does not follow, because prayer in its usual acceptance be rejected, that sentiment and devotion must be rejected too; and free religion can, and it seems to me does, elevate these into their proper places, and so really makes them easier and more natural than before. There is a reaching out of the soul, a feeling after something higher and better than it has known. It may or may not recognize a God, but it recognizes a divine ideal toward which it would ever tend; it longs to be true, to be noble, to be itself divine. Lowell has beautifully expressed it:

Of all the myriad moods of mind
That through the soul come thronging,
Which one was e'er so dear, so kind,
So beautiful as longing?
The thing we long for, that we are,
For one transcendent moment,
Before the present, poor and bare,
Can make its sneering comment.

Still, through our paltry stir and strife,
Glow down the wished ideal,
And longing moulds in clay what life
Carves in the marble real;
To let the new life in, we know
Desire must open the portal;
Perhaps the longing to be so
Helps make the soul immortal.

Longing is God's fresh, heavenward will
With our poor earthward striving;
We quench it that we may be still Content with merely living;
But would we learn that heart's full scope
Which we are hourly wronging,
Our lives must climb from hope to hope,
And realize our longing.

Ah! let us hope that to our praise
Good God not only reckons
The moments when we tread his ways,
But when the spirit beckons;
That some slight good is also wrought,
Beyond self-satisfaction,
When we are simply good in thought,
Howe'er we fall in action.

That's the attitude of the devout spirit; that is true prayer: not a mumbling of meaningless words, not empty phrases thrown into space, but the outpouring of a sincere, earnest soul, which would lift itself to the level of its own purest conceptions. So far from this kind of prayer, or aspiration, if you prefer so to call it, being in any way inconsistent with free religion, it seems to me free religion has made it possible, by pointing from the outward form to the inward spirit; by substituting for the false gods of the old faiths an intelligent, just, and loving Creator, or First-Cause. Evangelical prophets say free religion cannot worship. It can worship better than Orthodoxy. It cannot sing Moody and Sankey hymns, I admit; indeed, it can sing but few Unitarian hymns without some mental reservation; but, thanks to its poetic spirits, it bids fair, sooner or later, to have hymns which it can sing with the understanding. Its ideal is not to sing itself away to everlasting bliss; but it finds much bliss in singing. It will be hard work, while it has an aspiring soul to deal with, while it has among its adherents reverent minds and warm hearts for its materialistic friends, or its not less materialistic though more pretentious enemies, to show that it has not the elements which need worship, and will find it in a healthy, rational way.

But free religion has not only given us a free platform, and shown us the way to true worship, it has also enlarged—not completed, but enlarged—the application of the idea of universal brotherhood. The spirit in which it has investigated the several systems of religion has done more towards binding mankind together in an all-embracing love than the preaching of doctrine and dogma could ever do. Its discovery of the underlying principles of life in nearly all of them has created a bond of sympathy which will grow in strength and beauty as the years roll on. "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them," said Jesus. To the astonished gaze of the Church, free religion answers, We match that with a saying of his elder brother, Confucius: "What ye do not wish done to yourself, do not do to others." Jesus said again, "Ye have heard that it hath been said thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you." And free religion calls upon another elder brother, Buddha, so-called, who answers in the same spirit: "Let a man overcome anger by love; let him overcome evil by good. Hatred ceases by love." Yes, echoes Confucius again, "Benevolence is to love all men."

What a world of wealth has thus been revealed outside Christendom! "The good man loves all men; all within the four seas are his brothers."—That is Chinese. "To the noble the whole world is a family."—That is Hindu. "O blessed God! pardon my offences against thee, even as I pardon those done against myself."—That is Persian. Let Jesus and Buddha meet, says one. Let all men, regardless of religious differences, meet, says free religion, in the spirit of brotherhood. America has abolished all distinctions of color; free religion has abolished all distinctions of theology; and, so far as these go, mankind are brought into more harmonious relations with each other. Nothing could be more exclusive than the old idea that the saints were all inside Christianity, and the heathen all outside. It was a clique right in the midst of the family. But free religion has taken the scales from our eyes. Behold, she says, your brothers, your peers—human as you are, divine as you are! Extend the brotherly grasp to India, to Japan, to China, to Egypt, to Greece, to Persia, all round the globe; for, as a Roman brother has said, "We are all members of one great body, and Nature has implanted in us mutual love." That sounds more like a breath of the pure air of heaven than the murky atmosphere of tabernacles can furnish. Imagine Seneca, imagine any one of the world's real leaders, imagine Jesus himself, condemning as sinners all who would not accept not only their own form of religion, but some special interpretation of it. They had better employment. They were contemplating truth; and, whatever may have been their practices, they announced principles that were universal in their application. "What a fall was there, my countrymen!" down to the narrowness of modern evangelical teaching. The brotherhood of the saints (and we the saints at that) was all Orthodoxy ever saw.

Think of Jesus, the man who mingled with fallen women, urging them as a brother to rise to a higher standard of virtue, but recognizing always that they were sinned against as well as sinning—think of him, giving over one hundred lectures, with preludes, in the city of Boston, and, after having passed the one-hundredth, denouncing the efforts of several honest women to have illegitimate children considered legitimate in the eye of the law, to the end that they and their mothers might, if they chose, have some recognized legal claim upon the fathers!

This idea of crushing sinners, so popular in certain quarters—why, one would think to hear it talked that we were not all sinners! Where is the immaculate man? "Let him who is without sin cast the first stone." Who has ever seen even an Orthodox saint free from sin? Who has ever seen the most denounced of sinners without some hidden virtue? In that idea is born and nourished the principle of universal brotherhood. We don't half see it yet, but free religion has taken down the worse than Chinese wall which had been built about Christianity, and has shown us the outside heathen; and, lo, they are men and women much like ourselves, with many faults and many virtues like us, but quite worthy to stand by our side as members of a common family.

All honor to the mother who has given us, her children, such an inheritance of freedom to think, to worship, and to love. Even when we criticize her and recognize her weaknesses, we must not, cannot, forget the work she has done. Her past is as secure as Webster said the past of Massachusetts was. But has she a future? That depends entirely upon whether she can perform the duties of the future. She can go on, she will go on, opening more and more of religious history to us. There is much which she may still do in developing rational methods of worship. All this will be but completing the work which she has largely done. But there is an imperative call for something more than that; can she answer it in such a way as to justify her continued existence?

There are, it seems to me, two signs of weakness in the free-religious movement which may prove fatal to its highest future usefulness. They are fear of organization and fear of unpopular causes.

There is a class of thinkers who feel that there is infinite danger in any organized effort; that the most and the best we can do is to retire within the chambers of our own souls, and make, each one himself, clean. They say to do anything else is to imply a lack of faith in God's ability to run this world. It places each of us in the immensely egotistic position of supposing that our little efforts are in some way essential to the well-being of mankind. Why be so impatient? they cry. Have faith in the integrity of things, and wait the slow but sure processes of evolution. Have faith? I confess I haven't faith enough to do nothing and wait. I believe, let me say it reverently, I believe I am necessary to the running of this universe. You and I are placed here, not as lookers on; we are a part of the great plan. If we fail, the humblest of us, to do the duty with which we are charged, if we fail to utter the truth coming to us for expression, or to personify the principle which would take possession of our lives, the universe suffers. No, we are not irresponsible spectators at a great show; we are delineators and actors on a stage where the curtain never falls and the duties never cease. Besides, talk about trusting to evolution! Evolution is not an isolated fact; it includes all facts. Revolution is a part of evolution. Volcanic eruptions, earthquakes, thunder-storms,—these are as necessary parts of evolution as the quiet growth of rocks, the unseen changes in ocean-beds, and the calm shining of the sun. And who shall dare say, when some volcano of pent-up moral force bursts forth, when some great upheaval of corrupt institutions takes place, or the thunder and lightning of some righteous indignation descends to clear a foul atmosphere of sin and shame,—who shall dare say that these, too, are not parts of that system of evolution by which ideas are developing in all ages, and truth and justice and love are taking on new and more beautiful forms? I have no fear of being a little aggressive. I do not think I shall lose all modesty if I stand before the world in such a way that it may see what manner of man I am. Emerson says: "It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinion; it is easy in solitude to live after our own; but the great man is he who, in the midst of the crowd, keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude." Ought we not all of us to aim at such greatness as that? I confess, therefore, I do not share the fear entertained by some, that if free-religion organizes it will meet the fate of all its predecessors. It will be unworthy to meet their fate if it remains simply an abstract thought. First spirit, then form; first purpose, then a deed; first thought, then a life. Such seems to be the ever-present, never-varying law. The battle of ideas precedes the battle of arms; but ideas naturally clothe themselves in customs, institutions, laws. It is not enough that the truth be proclaimed; it must be carried into every department of life, or rather every department of life must be lifted up to it. It is folly for the man of deeds to say, I will have nothing to do with dreaming and idealizing; it is equal folly for the man of ideas to say, I fear to have my thought organized. The thought which cannot stand organization is worthless. "By their fruits," said Jesus, "ye shall know them." The fruit of free thought and pure love is organized justice, integrity, equity. And suppose the free religious movement should prove like other sects and systems of the earth, earthly, and in time be succeeded by something higher and better than itself, what harm would come? Orthodoxy was once the body in which the spirit of liberty manifested itself; Unitarianism followed it; and now comes free religion. So liberty lives and grows, as live and grow it must, what matters it whether this or that form lives or dies? As I read history, each of these forms proves its right to be by the fidelity with which it practicalizes the highest ideals of liberty and love. When they cease to do that, they die. And if free religion shall think to sit cozily in the tapestried halls of metaphysics, leaving all the other departments in the human dwelling unacquainted with its presence, it will only the sooner pass away, for its work will be the sooner done. Even so if it shall strive to save its life for its own sake, it shall lose it; but if it shall lose its life for justice and the rights of man, it shall find it in an assured immortality. So after its years of magnificent thinking, and now that it has done nearly all it can to proclaim religious liberty to the world, it seems to me that the time has come for it to do more. So I welcome organized free-religious effort; I welcome it as the logical, inevitable result of clear, earnest thought, as the fruit which shows the worth of the vitalizing sap within the tree's trunk and branches.

The other danger, and more disastrous in its results than the fear of organization, though in some respects growing out of it, is the fear of, or disinclination to deal with, crude and unpopular questions. Has free religion anything to do with the facts of every-day life right about us? Has it any conceivable connection with the evils mankind suffer, and the better conditions to which all aspire? If so, pray tell me upon what subject can it be silent? Can it see political injustice and corruption and say nothing? Can it close its eyes to the suffering and wrong surrounding it on every hand? Can it acquiesce, even by its silence, in mercantile knavery and the triumph of iniquity at the polls? Has it no word, no deed of sympathy for the great, perishing classes, begotten in sin, surrounded by sin, destined, many of them, to die in sin? Can it not hear Oliver Twist asking for more? Has it no heart to respond to the good in Nancy Sykes? Is it not ready to make the cause of justice and mercy its own? If not, its name belies it. If its virtue is such as "turns from dirty stockings" and joins hands with "vice married to ribbons and a little gay attire," I know not why we should call it religion. I know not why it is much superior to the spurious article the churches have been dealing out to us in the years which have gone.

Mr. Phillips says the philosophy of free religion is like some great machine which, though beautiful to look upon, won't work. When he renders this judgment he has in mind parlor-clubs of a select few, dreaming of metaphysics, of art, and sometimes of technical science, and a platform which guards itself somewhat tenderly from what it considers crude and unpopular questions; and if he judged from sufficient data his conclusion would be correct. But I sincerely believe that free religion is infinitely broader and more inclusive than its leaders. That is to say, the principle of free religion reaches deeper, extends farther, and lifts itself higher than any one man or set of men can interpret it. While our people are talking of the survival of the fittest, they often forget to consider how they may make all fit to survive. Let me not be misunderstood. I don't believe that free religion is, or ever will be, a special reformer. I believe it is naturally a universal reformer; in other words, that its principles, thoroughly and practically applied, would give us universal reform. Every sin committed, and every wrong suffered is in violation of the fundamental truths of religion as promulgated by the free-religious movement. Take Mr. Abbot's definition of religion, which most of us accept: Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself. To perfect himself, the individual needs the freest possible use of all educational advantages; but the laboring classes, so-called, don't get that. Woman is debarred from very many such influences, and the criminal classes are thrown almost entirely outside of them. Now the world is full of specialists—labor-reformers, woman-suffragists, prison-reformers, educational reformers; they are all doing a good work, all honor to them, but so far as they are specialists they see but their one pet idea. I do not criticize them; if they cannot see any more, let us be thankful that they see so much. But the free religionist, accepting as a fundamental principle that religion is the effort of man to perfect himself, and applying his principle fearlessly, must be in favor of removing any obstacle from the path of labor which prevents the laborer's perfecting himself; any obstacle from the path of woman which prevents her perfecting herself; and so on through the whole list of impediments. So that, in a broad, philosophical sense, reaching down to the roots of things, and looking up and on to the eternal verities, free religion is prison-reform, woman's-rights reform, etc., all in one.

The time was when men accepted the disappointments, the sins, the inequalities of life as inevitable, as being the work of an inscrutable Providence, beyond human control and without human sympathy and love. Happily, that time has gone by. It has dawned upon the human mind that there are great laws ever present and ceaselessly operative; obedience to which establishes individual and national security and happiness; disobedience to which results in individual and national conflict and misery. It is now seen that ignorance of these laws is a great, perhaps the great cause of suffering and crime, and that the way to elevate the race is to lead it to a knowledge of their character and working. Seeing, for example, men rolling in gutters, slaves to their appetites, and establishing and maintaining houses of prostitution, slaves to their passions, the enlightened mind says these men are the victims of ignorance of the laws of being; their education in that department has been neglected; and, worse still, they are the victims of an unnaturally large physical, and an unnaturally small moral, development. What they need is the science of a new life. Seeing, still further, how some men grasp and draw into themselves the good fortunes of life, crowding and crushing, in the process, men less shrewd and aggressive,—seeing, as the result of this, abject poverty on the one hand, and abnormal and dangerous accumulations of wealth on the other, it says men are ignorant of how to live in right relations, and what they need is to learn the science of industrial and social justice. Seeing yet again the low idea of woman, inherited by us from barbarism, and only partially relieved of its barbarous elements,—seeing that in work, in education, in the home, in the State, woman is regarded as subordinate to man, dependent on him, and minister to his real and supposed wants, without a separate individuality of her own to be respected in all departments and violated in none, it says men are ignorant in their sex-prejudices, and many women are ignorant also in their sex-prejudices; and what all need is to be educated into the science of a purer liberty and love,—an education without which the true state is impossible, and the home, which should be the divinest spot on earth, but a mockery and a sham.

Seeing all these things, and more, the enlightened conscience of to-day says what the individual, society, the State needs is a broad and comprehensive education into the science of equity. That is the effort of man to perfect himself, is it not? and that is religion. Is there any more pressing duty at this hour than to study and comprehend this science? Why should we try to comprehend other planets if we understand not the forces which govern our own? Why should we speculate about the hereafter if we have more than we can do to discharge our duties in the here? Why should we, how can we, love God, whom we have not seen, if we cannot love our brother-man whom we have seen?

Catholicism, Orthodoxy, Unitarianism, never believed in universal freedom and brotherhood; therefore, they could not do this work. But we, the disciples of free religion, believe in them; therefore we can do it, and, because we can do it, ought to do it. Mr. Phillips thinks the philosophy of our movement won't work. I think it's just the philosophy that will work. But it depends upon human agencies to apply it. Send a whiff of it into your halls of legislation, to teach your law-makers that women have some individual rights which men are bound to respect. Let it lift your criminal code to a higher level of justice and mercy; let it purify your politics, and infuse into your industries more of the spirit of cooperation. In a word, let it aim to establish equity; let it help all men, regardless of condition, race, or sex, to perfect themselves. This is the work, as mighty as any the world has known, to which it is summoned. Are we ready to undertake it, and live? Or shall we pass it by on the other side, and die? That is the question for us to answer. For one, believing profoundly in the philosophy of free religion, and believing that it is adequate to the momentous task before us, I reject all timid leadership, I criticize all wavering, I urge to a brave and hopeful consecration to the new cause. By such consecration we shall lose nothing of self-culture; we shall only strike down nearer to the foundation principles of all strong and beautiful character. For—

"Deeper than all sense of seeing Lies the secret source of being;
And the soul with truth agreeing
Learns to live in thoughts and deeds;
For the life is more than raiment,
And the earth is pledged for payment
Unto man for all his needs.

"Nature is our common mother,
Every living man our brother,
Therefore let us serve each other;
Not to meet the law's behests,
But because through cheerful giving
We shall learn the art of living;
And to live and serve is best.

"Life is more than what man fancies;
Not a game of idle chances;
But it steadily advances
Up the rugged heights of time,
Till each complex web of trouble,
Every sad hope's broken bubble,
Hath a meaning most sublime.

"More of practice, less profession;
More of firmness, less concession;
More of freedom, less oppression,
In the Church and in the State.
More of life, and less of fashion;
More of love, and less of passion;
That will make us good and great.

"When true hearts dignely gifted,
From the chaff of error sifted,
On their crosses are uplifted,
Shall the world most clearly see
That earth's greatest time of trial
Calls for holy self-denial,
Calls on men to do and be.

"But forever and forever,
Let it be the soul's endeavor
Love from hatred to discover;
And in whatsoever we do,
Won by truth's eternal beauty
To our highest sense of duty
Evermore be firm and true."

THE RIGHT OF FREE SPEECH.

The right of free speech always has to be vindicated in connection with an unpopular cause—often in connection with opinions most absurd and injurious. The right to express the opinions which are universally or generally believed is never called in question. It is the new opinion, which, arraignment some popular institution or ancient belief, startles the prejudices or awakens the fears of men, and tempts them to forget or disregard the fundamental principles of a free State. The liberty of speech in this country includes the right to utter folly as well as wisdom, to vindicate injustice as well as justice, to advocate (not practise) vice as well as virtue, and to expose every institution of human society to the most thorough examination; and the man who is not ready to vindicate that right in the person of one whose opinions he rejects and even scorns is unfaithful to liberty. We utterly detest the doctrine of "free love"; the very phrase is inexpressibly odious in its associations and suggestions. But we cannot deny the constitutional right of men to entertain that doctrine, and to vindicate it by argument; and we do not hesitate to affirm that the country cannot afford to sacrifice the freedom of speech and the press even to suppress that abominable sentiment. It used to fill our soul with unspeakable indignation and disgust to hear men, in the name of Christ and the Bible, assert the right of property in man, the right to work men without wages and sell them on the auction-block. The doctrine is one that strikes at the very foundations of morality, public and private, and tends to destroy the family and make society a hell. We believe that the immoralities which are troubling the country at the present time, the frauds, speculations, defalcations, and thefts that so amaze and shock us, are to a large extent the natural fruit of the evil seed sown by pulpits and press for several successive generations in supporting and apologizing for slavery. But the abolitionists never dreamed of suppressing that odious doctrine by law; they knew too well the value of a free press, and felt too sure of their power, under God, to meet and overthrow the odious doctrine by argument, and put its champions to flight. They even rejoiced when the advocates of slavery essayed to vindicate the system by appeals to reason. And so we say now in regard to the doctrine of "free love." Let its champions have the utmost liberty of speech. Give them no chance to win sympathy as martyrs to the freedom of the press. Give them fair play; above all, don't tell lies about them. The louder their talk, the easier will be the task of refuting them! They may even help us to a higher appreciation of the beauties and blessings of the family by stimulating us to re-examine its foundations and correct its abuses. It may be admitted that Mr. Heywood's pamphlet is as offensive to a rightly cultivated moral sense as Professor Stuart's vindication of the fugitive slave-law, or "South side Adams's" apologies for man-stealing; but there is no more need of the terrors of a prison in the one case than in the others.

We submit that the Christian Union owes a frank apology, first to the officers and promoters of the Faneuil Hall meeting for grossly (however unwittingly) misrepresenting them; and, secondly, to its own readers for misleading them upon an important public question. What it owes to us for needed correction and discipline, administered at some sacrifice of time and space on our part, its own generous impulses will no doubt suggest; if not, it will be of no consequence. It will be our sufficient reward to remember that we came to the defence of men misrepresented and maligned by a religious newspaper. It too often happens that the men whose professional function it is to preach repentance to their fellow-men are of all others the most reluctant to exercise that wholesome virtue. But the Christian Union, we are sure, is not of that sort. It will, we doubt not, promptly and gladly make amends for the wrong it has done in unjustly and cruelly stigmatizing as champions of obscenity the brave vindicators of the freedom of the press.—Oliver Johnson, in the Orange (N.J.) Journal, Sept. 14.

[The above noble defence of free speech, especially the sentence we have italicized, deserves to be printed in golden letters. The cause of enlightened liberty and the cause of sound public morality are alike indebted to Mr. Johnson for his brave and ringing words.—Ed.]

OLIVER JOHNSON'S TRIBUTE TO ELIZUR WRIGHT.

MR. WRIGHT FAVORS "REFORM" OF THE COMSTOCK LAWS, IF IT CAN BE MADE EFFECTIVE BY A STRICT DEFINITION.

And now let us turn from the resolutions to the speeches of the Faneuil Hall meeting, and see if they furnish any evidence that the people by whom it was conducted were contending for the right to print and circulate obscenity. The proceedings are before us in a pamphlet of sixty-eight pages, containing a photographic report of all that was said and done. It is natural to turn, first of all, to the address of the president, who is supposed to be selected as a fit expositor of the aims and purposes of the meeting. And who is he? He is a man who brought to the platform, along with his white hairs and venerable presence, the record of a spotless life. He bears a name which deserves to be always spoken with respect, if not with reverence—ELIZUR WRIGHT. In his young manhood he was Professor of Mathematics in the Western Reserve College, where he was the honored and beloved associate of the peerless President Storrs, whose memory is embalmed in one of Whittier's finest lyrics. When the American Anti-Slavery Society was formed in 1833, he was appointed its Corresponding Secretary. He filled that office through the darkest days of the anti-slavery conflict, when the Abolitionists perilled their reputation, their property, and their lives in defence of the right of free speech, and when "chief priest and ruler" were combined to crush them to the earth. The annual reports of that Society for many of its earlier years are an enduring monument of his masterly vigor as a writer as well as of his fearless independence and unswerving devotion to the cause of human freedom. He was, moreover, editor of the Quarterly Anti-Slavery Magazine, the Emancipator, and the other publications of the society, and the associate of Arthur and Lewis Tappan, of Garrison, Whittier, and Jay. Subsequently he was the translator of La Fontaine's Fables and editor of the Chronotype; and later still, for several years, the trusted Commissioner of Life Insurance in Massachusetts. He has reared a large family in virtue and honor, and is a man of tried integrity in every relation of life. He is the only one of all the officers of the Faneuil Hall meeting whom we personally know; but his name alone was to us a sufficient guaranty that the objects of that meeting were honorable, and that it was in no way intended to support or countenance the unspeakable nastiness of obscene literature. The moral tone of his speech is pure and bracing. He says: "Nobody here doubts that there is such a thing as obscenity in literature and art, and that it is a bad thing." Then, after referring to the State law for the suppression of such literature, he says: "Nobody comes here to complain of that law, or to justify that literature. Nobody would have come here, if loose and careless Federal legislation had not been used to prosecute, proscribe, and punish honest freedom of opinion. Nobody here, I think, would object to a law regulating the transmission of literature through the mails, if it could so define obscenity as not to exclude a great portion of our most valuable literature, including the Bible, and so as not to violate the true and constitutional liberty of the press."

These observations of the president, which are understood to have been assented to by those present, mark with unmistakable clearness the distinction drawn by the meeting between the admitted right of Government to suppress obscene literature, and the wrong of so perverting a law enacted for that purpose as to make it an instrument to "prosecute, proscribe, and punish honest freedom of opinion." Mr. Wright also took occasion to say: "I believe the family is the foundation of the State; and the perfection of the family is the union for life, on terms of perfect equality, of one man with one woman." Is this a plea for obscenity?—Orange (N.J.) Journal, Sept. 14.

THE PROBLEM OF THE UNIVERSE.

The American Association for the Advancement of Science is now in session in St. Louis, where a hundred or more of the prominent savans of the country are gathered. Professor Newcomb, the retiring president, delivered an address on Thursday, the subject of which it is not very easy to state concisely. It had reference to the great discussion now in progress between the scientific men and the theologians as to whether all natural phenomena are the result of a working will in accordance with a foreordained design, or the product of blindly-working laws. He did not attempt to determine the question, but rather to define carefully the limitation by which scientific men as such are confined in considering the problem. The key-note of the address was the proposition that science concerns itself only with phenomena and the relations which connect them, and does not take account of any questions which do not in some way admit of being brought to the test of experience. The body of the address was devoted to a clear setting forth and illustration of this proposition, carefully discriminating the processes by which the scientific man must work from those the speculative philosophers may employ. The points of his argument and the suggestions which followed naturally from it are summed up in the concluding portion very carefully by Professor Newcomb himself, as follows:—

"First. When men study the operations of the world around them, they find that certain of those operations are determined by knowable antecedent conditions, and go on with that blind disregard of consequences which they call law. They also find certain other operations which they are unable thus to trace to the operation of law."

"Secondly. Men attribute this latter class to anthropomorphic beings, or gods having the power to bring about changes in Nature, and having certain objects, worthy or ignoble, in view, which they thus endeavor to compass. Men also believe themselves able to discern these objects, and thus to explain the operations which bring them about. The objects aimed at by these supernatural beings are worthy or ignoble, according to the state of society; in ancient times they were often the gratification of the silliest pride or the lowest lusts."

"Thirdly. As knowledge advances, one after another of these operations are found to be really determined by law, the only difficulty being that the law was before unknown or not comprehended, or that the circumstances which determined its action were too obscure or too complex to be fully grasped by the mind."

"Fourthly. Final causes having thus, one by one, disappeared from every thicket which has been fully explored, the question arises whether they now have, or ever had, any existence at all. On the one hand it may be claimed that it is unphilosophical to believe in them when they have been sought in vain in every corner into which light can penetrate. On the other hand we have the difficulty of accounting for these very laws by which we find the course of Nature to be determined. Take, as a single example, the law of hereditary descent; how did such a law, or rather, how did such a process, for it is a process, first commence? If this is not as legitimate a subject for inquiry as the question, How came the hand, the eye, or the first germ into existence? It is only because it seems more difficult to investigate. If, as the most advanced scientific philosophy teaches, creation is itself but a growth, how did that growth originate? We here reach the limits of the scientific field, on ground where they are less well defined than in some other directions; but I shall take the liberty of making a single suggestion respecting a matter which lies outside of them. When the doctrine of the universality of natural law is carried so far as to include the genesis of living beings, and the adaptations to external circumstances which we see in their organs and their structure, it is often pronounced to be atheistic. Whether this judgment is or is not correct, I cannot say, but it is very easy to propound the test question by which its correctness is to be determined. 'Is the general doctrine of causes acting in apparently blind obedience to Invariable law in itself atheistic?' If it is, then the whole progress of our knowledge of Nature has been in this direction, for it has consisted in reducing the operations of Nature to such blind obedience. Of course, when I say blind you understand that I mean blind so far as a scrutable regard to consequence is concerned,—blind like justice, in fact."

"If the doctrine is not atheistic, then there is nothing atheistic in any phase of the theory of evolution, for this consists solely in accounting for certain processes by natural laws. I do not pretend to answer the question here involved, because it belongs entirely to the domain of theology. All we can ask is that each individual shall hold consistent views on the subject, and not maintain the affirmative of the question on one topic, and the negative on another. My object in laying before you these ideas has been, not so much to propound any new views as to promote consistency of view among those who discuss this theme in its several aspects; and if I can make it clearly appear to a disputant that in discussing scientific questions he is to confine himself to the phenomenal side, and to maintain no theory which is not in accord with his every-day views of life, I shall have accomplished my purpose."—Boston Advertiser, Aug. 24.

THE STORY OF A STONE.

Some years ago, George Jacob Holyoake, the famous secularist, in discussing the "Limits of Atheism," gave the following admirable rhetorical statement regarding the mystery of matter: "Look at this humble, obscure, and commonplace stone! We neglect it with the eye, we spurn it with the foot; it is not worth raising from the shore. Yet no book was ever written, no message was ever delivered, no romance ever depicted, no epic ever sung, containing such wondrous interest as the story of this stone, could any man tell it. What thronging conjectures, what unbidden and tumultuous memories rise, as we contemplate its possible mutations of existence! History was unwritten when it first slept in the earth. What generations of men have lived and struggled and died since it was first broken from the rock! Great battles, changing the fate of dynasties and involving the servitude of races, have been fought over its calm resting-place. Possibly thousands of years ago the mastodon trod upon it, and the ichthyosaurus paddled it into the sea. Ancient waves may have washed it into the ocean before the first ship was launched by the first mariner. In the silent and wondrous caverns of the great deep, which no plummet has fathomed, and no eye has seen, it has lain in regal rest. What monsters have glared at it!

What tempests have raged, what tornadoes have broken over it! What earthquakes may have tossed it from its hiding-place! On what shore did it reappear? Did some Assyrian lover watch the waves which washed it up? Did some young Pharaoh play with it? Has it been imbedded in the walls of Troy? Did Achilles plant his spear by it? Did it lie on the plains of Marathon on the morning of the memorable battle? Has it been dyed by the blood of Cæsar in the streets of Rome? Have Chaldean shepherds picked it up as the orient morning sun broke over their silent plains? When all these and a thousand other questions have been answered, its history is not begun. Its elements are indestructible. The parts of which it is composed were never created,—in some form, in some world, they have always existed. Where were they when the earth was without form and void? To what astral system did the matter of this pebble once belong? Of what star did it form a part? Where was it before time on this planet began to be? If matter has existed forever, this stone in its countless transmutations is a geological wandering Jew of eternity. If we cannot tell the history of a single stone, who shall tell the history of God? If a poor pebble is a surpassing mystery, who shall understand the Deity?"

THE TASTE OF beauty and the relish of what is decent, just, and amiable perfects the character of the gentleman.—Shaftesbury.

[For THE INDEX.]

VIRGIL'S SIXTH BOOK.

Gentlest of ethnic souls the Mantuan yet
Hell organized for future bigots' use;
He sketched perdition's melancholy realm
With an exactitude which Homer's muse
Knew not. His Sixth Book he must still regret;
He with it zealots armed to overwhelm
Mortals with imagery of endless doom.
Impressed by lines the school-boy eye should read,—
His walls of infants through the infernal gloom
Were formulated into Calvin's creed.
A topographic realism he first gave
To Hell girdled with ninefold Stygian wave
And fens and marshes drear, which many a weed
Lethæan in their sluggish ooze did breed.
And yet imagination never wrought
To more august effect in twilight gloom
With pencil dipped, limning the place of doom,
The empty halls of Dis, the realms inane
Reëchoing to the moans of hopeless pain
The mournful shadows, who for ferriage sought
With stretched hands yearning for the farther strand
Fluttering like birds, which seek a sunnier land,
The Acherontian maelstrom's hungry roar,
Casting up sand and mire forevermore;
The squalid ferryman still hale though hoar;
The hideous hell-dog with his threefold jaw
Gobbling the Sleepy Sop into his maw:—
These as if entitled his fancy saw.

Gladly the eye, escaped from Stygian gloom,
The blissful greenness of Elysian bowers
Beholds, rustling with fresh, immortal bloom;
A larger ether clothes the fields with light
Purpureal. Blossom fairer flowers,
Another sun and moon and stars more bright
With purer beams the regions blest illumine,
Haunted by heroes born in better years;
There Ius, there Assaracus appears.
Their shadowy arms and chariots stand afar,
Their loosened coursers graze the immortal meads,
Their love for shield and spear 'neath daylight's star
They bear below, and for the glossy steeds,
Which hale o'er shadowy course the shadowy car.

Sweet is that vale retired umbered with gloom
Of rustling boughs, whence Lethe's river rolls,
Where swarm with beelike hum the countless souls
Corporeal limbs about to reassume,
After their exile long from life and light,
After their penance sharp of fire and wind,
Quaffing the wave of dim forgetfulness,
Which memory of the past erases quite,
With discontinuous life the heart to bless
And give from keen remorse deliverance sweet;
Thus reminiscence leaving far behind,
Emerge they fresh existence to repeat;
Thus laved and clean they pass in long review
After their draughts of Lethe's healing dew.

A CARD.

We, the undersigned, Directors of the National Liberal League, offer ourselves as candidates for reelection at the Second Annual Congress of the League, on the following platform of principles:—

1. The right of absolute individual freedom of thought, of speech, and of the press, on all political, religious, social, or other questions, and the right of being wholly uninterfered with by the courts, no matter what opinions as such may be advocated or promulgated.

2. The right and duty of Congress and State Legislatures to pass, and the right and duty of the National and State courts to enforce, laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails; provided, that the offence known as "obscenity" shall be so strictly defined in the statutes as to render impossible the prosecution or punishment of any one for the expression of his honest opinions on any subject.

3. The flagrant wrong of intrusting the execution of the laws for the suppression of obscene literature to any official or officials who shall not scrupulously confine their action within the limits here clearly defined.

And we decline to be candidates for reelection if the principles of the above platform shall fail to be approved by the National Liberal League at this Congress.

"REPEAL" OR "REFORM"—WHICH?

Last week we considered "Two Phases of 'Repeal,'" represented respectively by Messrs. Heywood and Tucker and by Mr. Wakeman.

The two former, at the top of their editorial columns in the Word, keep this standing announcement (the italics and capitals are theirs):—

"Our Present Platform."

"Immediate, unconditional, and permanent repeal of all laws against obscenity, whether Municipal, State, or National."

Mr. Wakeman, although conceding the right and "duty" of the separate States to suppress obscene literature, nevertheless demands the repeal of the existing United States Statutes against the transmission of such literature through the mails. He makes this demand on the merely technical ground that in his private opinion, as against the decision of the Supreme Court, Congress has no right under the Constitution to pass any laws respecting the mails except for "postal purposes" alone; and also on the substantial ground that to pass any national laws whatever prohibiting the circulation of obscene literature through the mails is a violation of that "freedom of speech and of the press" which Congress is expressly forbidden to "abridge."

Of these two positions, we showed last week that the former alone has the force of self-consistency and logic; and that the latter (except so far as it deals with the merely technical question of jurisdiction) contradicts, defeats, and demolishes itself. If freedom of speech and of the press is violated when Congress excludes really obscene literature from the mails, the same freedom is equally violated when the States prohibit it to be circulated or sold. No escape from this conclusion is possible. Mr. Wakeman must change his ground in order to render it logically tenable; so far as "freedom of speech and of the press" is concerned, he must either deny the right of the States, or else concede the right of Congress, to suppress literature that is really obscene. Freedom is violated by any unjust restrictions; and it makes not a pin's difference by what authority the restrictions are imposed. The protest of principle must lie against the restrictions themselves. Mr. Wakeman destroys his own case by conceding the justice of the restrictions when imposed by State authority, and yet inveighing against them as tyranny when imposed by Congressional authority. In consequence of this radical and fatal self-contradiction, the view he presents of the whole subject is merely that of the attorney; he has not treated it either as a philosopher or a statesman.

I.

Now the position of those who favor "reform" is, briefly stated, this: that really obscene literature has no rights anywhere; that to circulate it in any manner is a crime; that it is justly prohibited both by municipal, State, and national law; that to circulate it through the nation's mails is a crime against the nation itself; that this crime is utterly beyond the jurisdiction of the States, and must be under the jurisdiction of the people as represented by Congress; that the Supreme Court was compelled by the necessities of the case to recognize the jurisdiction of Congress over this crime; that all the oppression under the existing laws respecting it has arisen from the "absence of definition"; and that "freedom of speech and of the press" will be abundantly vindicated and protected by supplying this lack. In other words, such a change in the statutes as shall restrict their application to really obscene publications, and render these statutes incapable of being perverted to the suppression of any opinions on any subject, will accomplish all that is necessary to protect freedom to the uttermost. Against the laws thus amended and reformed no objection can be brought on the score of liberty; if objections are made, they must be made on grounds not yet maintained in this discussion.

Now the three positions which are held on this subject by Messrs. Heywood and Tucker, by Mr. Wakeman, and by THE INDEX, agree in this one point—that they all three demand protection for entire and complete freedom of thought, of speech, and of the press. Both "repeal" and "reform" are equally positive, equally emphatic, equally determined on this fundamental and all-important point. There is no difference whatever between them as to the pressing necessity of securing better protection for freedom against the encroachments made under cover of the Comstock laws; they are equally strong and equally extreme in demanding freedom for all opinions on all subjects to use all public facilities in making themselves known.

But the point of difference between "repeal" and "reform" concerns real obscenity, and the right of the people to treat all public obtrusion of it as a crime. The "repeal" party persistently evade this real point of difference; they try to ridicule or pooh-pooh it away; they refuse to treat it as of the slightest consequence. Mr. Wakeman himself says: "In the true point of view, this is not a question of obscenity, but of liberty." On the contrary, as between "repeal" and "reform," there is no other question than that of obscenity. We propose to prove this.

Mr. Tucker's demand for the repeal of all laws against obscenity, and (so far as it goes) Mr. Wakeman's demand for the repeal of the United States laws excluding it from the mails, are merely a negative statement of this affirmative proposition: Freedom of the press covers and includes the legal right to publish, circulate, and mail real obscenity—the legal right of moral monsters to thrust the most nauseating, abominable, and pestilential filth upon the public at all times and in all ways, yet with absolute impunity. That is exactly what Mr. Tucker's platform means; it is exactly what Mr. Wakeman's argument means, so far as the mails are concerned; it is exactly what "repeal" in all its phases must more or less consistently affirm; it is exactly what "reform" must and does indignantly deny. Both "repeal" and "reform" are equally pronounced in demanding better protection for freedom of the press; there is no difference whatever between them on the "question of liberty." But "repeal" affirms, and "reform" denies, that freedom of the press covers the legal right to circulate and mail really obscene publications; there is no other difference between them than this, and it turns wholly on the "question of obscenity." Both the "repeal" and "reform" parties agree in demanding from the nation greater freedom of the press; but, as between themselves alone, these two parties differ on the very important question, whether, in demanding from the nation greater freedom of the press, they shall or shall not deny the nation's right to punish the mailing of really obscene publications as a crime. This is the question at issue before the National Liberal League, and it is a question not of liberty, but of obscenity. We propose now to show that this question is of immense practical importance, and not one to be set aside as unworthy of serious consideration.

The position taken on this subject by liberals in general must affect profoundly not only the future of the League as an organized movement, but also the prosperity, growth, and influence of the whole liberal cause.

II.

Consider first some of the chief reasons why liberals should not now take the position of demanding the total "repeal" of the existing United States Statutes prohibiting the transmission of obscene literature through the mails.

1. The "repeal" position is utterly wrong in principle. It denies the essential criminality of attempts to propagate the most destructive and disgusting vices among the young. It denies the right of the nation to legislate against this crime in a province where there cannot possibly be any other legislation against it,—namely, in the national postal system. If you demand total repeal of the Comstock laws, you necessarily demand total impunity for the villains who formerly used, and would immediately again use, the United States mails as the channel of a business every whit as murderous as would be the importation and sale of infected clothing from the yellow-fever districts of the South. No deluge of sophistry, however copious, will succeed in sweeping away the fact that this business is both physical and moral murder of its victims; and this fact is justification, absolute and demonstrative, for treating this business as a crime, not only by State, but also by national legislation. It is in strict accordance with the spirit of the United States Constitution to interpret it as giving jurisdiction to the United States over all crimes which, from the nature of the case, cannot be brought under the jurisdiction of the separate States. The crime of counterfeiting is of this nature, since the power of coining money is conferred upon Congress alone; and the crime of mailing obscene literature is of this nature, since Congress alone has or can have power to regulate the post-office system. The power of Congress to legislate against this latter crime has been very reasonably recognized by the Supreme Court as one of the incidental powers "necessary and proper" to the establishment of post-offices and post-roads; it is not at all to be classed as an "ulterior power," if by that is meant a power not necessarily implied by the power to establish and regulate the post-office system as such. The Comstock laws are indeed unconstitutional, when interpreted so as to "abridge" that "freedom of speech and of the press" which the Constitution itself guarantees; but they could not possibly be unconstitutional for this reason, if they were amended and rendered thereby incapable of being so interpreted. The "repeal" position is therefore wrong in principle, first, because it denies the essential criminality of mailing really obscene publications; and, secondly, because it denies the nation jurisdiction over a crime which cannot be brought under any other jurisdiction, and thereby compels the nation to be an accomplice in the crime itself.

2. The "repeal" position is, moreover, just as foolish in policy as it is wrong in principle. By confounding freedom of the press with freedom to publish and mail real obscenity, it tends necessarily to prevent the people from perceiving that the Comstock laws have been used to "abridge" the real "freedom of the press." Every consideration of policy would require the friends of liberty to point out the vast distinction between real obscenity and the advocacy of mere opinions, to insist that no opinions as such can possibly be obscene, and to demand that the punishment justly awarded to real obscenity shall not be awarded to any opinions on the pretence that they belong under that head. If we liberals were all sagacious, we should unite in a body to protest, not against punishing those who commit the crime of mailing really obscene publications, but against punishing for that offence those whose publications belong to a different and perfectly legitimate class. The reason why Anthony Comstock has succeeded in getting Mr. Heywood imprisoned is simply because the minds of the people are confused on this point—because they have not drawn the necessary and obvious distinction between really obscene literature and literature which is devoted to the advocacy of social theories. Now those who are demanding total "repeal" of the Comstock laws are practically doing their utmost to perpetuate and increase this lamentable popular confusion, and to prevent the people from perceiving the all-important distinction which would instantly set things right. Could anything be more inexpedient or impolitic than to make common cause with the vendors of real obscenity, and to insist that justice cannot be done to freethought without letting these criminals go scot-free? Is that the way to persuade the people that injustice has been done, and to prevent it for the future? The "repeal" position is the greatest practical blunder that could possibly be conceived. Instead of tending to right existing wrongs, it tends inevitably to aggravate and multiply them. The people will never consent to the total repeal of all laws against obscenity, or of the laws against transmitting it through the mails; they see clearly what the advocates of "repeal" refuse to see at all, that obscene literature has no rights whatever; and they are only made indignant by the demand that it shall share the rights of the free press.

So obvious is the impolicy of confounding freedom of the press with freedom of obscenity,—so patent is the mischief done to freedom's cause by the perpetuation of this confusion,—that the advocates of "repeal," insisting that there can be no freedom of the press without freedom of obscenity, are making themselves the most powerful auxiliaries of the Young Men's Christian Association in keeping the dangerous statutes exactly as they are. This question is not going to be decided by the liberals, but by the whole public. It does not depend on the liberals to take whichever they choose, "repeal" or "reform"; they will not get either unless they can create a public opinion in its favor, and this they can only do in favor of "reform." Why should we liberals dash our heads against a rock? Why should we prove ourselves mere babies in the world of affairs? Cannot we distinguish between the possible and the impossible, and act accordingly? "Repeal" is in the highest degree impolitic, because it is absolutely impossible, and because the demand for this impossibility will only postpone indefinitely all change for the better in the existing laws.

3. The "repeal" position tends to strengthen Anthony Comstock in his hold on power, because it tends to keep his tyrannical abuses of it out of sight. Rightly or wrongly, the public at large have a strong and fixed belief that laws against obscene literature are wise and just; they turn, and will continue to turn, a deaf ear to all arguments to the contrary. If Mr. Heywood cannot be vindicated except by the wholesale wiping out of these laws, or even by the wholesale wiping out of the United States laws alone, then Comstock cannot be made to appear to them in the light of an oppressor. Comstock thrives and flourishes by the confusion in the public mind, and must secretly chuckle at seeing it deepened and spread by Mr. Heywood's own friends. His encroachments on the just freedom of the press cannot be checked or rebuked by the voice of public opinion, until the public discern clearly that the advocacy of social theories, however false or foolish, does not constitute obscenity, and ought not to be punished as such. It would be comparatively easy to teach the public this distinction; it will be impossible to make them believe that the vendors of obscenity ought not to be punished at all. Yet, instead of striving to make this distinction clear, and thereby to expose to the public the abuses of power of which Comstock has been guilty, the advocates of "repeal" take the attitude of demanding absolute impunity both for free-thinkers and obscenity-mongers at the same time! Very well: Comstock himself could not wish them to appear in any worse light. He is perfectly safe from check or dismissal, just so long as the general public see in the complaints made against him nothing but a plea for the sacred right of obscenity. And that is all they would ever see in those complaints, if all liberals were so shortsighted and infatuated as to clamor for "repeal."

4. The "repeal" position is most disastrous to the liberal cause, and would prove to be utterly ruinous if it were taken unanimously. The simple reason is, that the demand of unchecked freedom for obscenity, which is what "repeal" would necessarily establish, outrages the moral sense of the whole community, and so far confirms the general misconception that liberalism tends to immorality. To demand "repeal," as opposed to "reform," is to insist that freedom cannot be complete unless all public safeguards against obscene publications are abolished; and he who deliberately takes that position has no right to complain, if he is set down by the public as a man who is utterly indifferent, at the very least, to public purity. We reflect on no man's intentions; we impugn no man's motives in this matter, and, notwithstanding repeated and purposed misrepresentations, deny emphatically that we have ever done so. What we say is that, in this world as we find it, consequences count for more than intentions, and that the consequence of "repeal" would be the public protection of obscenity through the removal of all public restrictions on it. It is a maxim of the law that every man must be presumed to intend the consequences of his own acts. The world at large judges of men in precisely the same way. Hence the party which declares itself in favor of "repeal" and against "reform" has only itself to blame, if it comes under the suspicion of being utterly indifferent to the evils of obscenity itself. We do not say that, in passing this judgment, the world would be just; we say nothing whatever about inward intentions or motives; we simply point to facts, and affirm that the world will certainly believe that party to be an enemy to morality whose actions practically tell against it. If, therefore, the liberals as a whole should declare themselves to be in favor of utterly repealing all laws against obscenity, or merely the United States laws, they will inevitably be considered by the general community as favoring vice and obscenity, since that would be the certain consequence of such repeal. They will be presumed to intend the consequences of their own acts, and be judged accordingly.

Now, if the "repeal" position were in itself the right one to take, we should be the last to utter a syllable against taking it, notwithstanding the world's condemnation. But we believe that position to be utterly wrong in itself; and the inconceivable disaster of confirming the world's belief that liberalism is an enemy to public morality would be the natural result of that wrong position. If liberalism has any sound claim to the respect of mankind, it is that liberalism proclaims and tends to create a higher, purer, and better morality than has ever yet been practised or preached. It is only so far as it makes men more moral, individually and socially, that liberalism has any right to spread or to be accepted by mankind; and it cannot spread or be accepted, unless it can persuade mankind that its real influence is in favor of morality, and not against it. Hence the ruinous and suicidal error of putting liberalism before mankind in a position which must inevitably make them despise and abhor it as the enemy of morality. Once let it be understood in the community that, while all the rest of the people are anxious to protect their children from the moral poison of vile literature, the liberals are only anxious to remove all legal restrictions on its sale and circulation,—and what sort of growth and progress do you suppose would be made afterwards by the liberal cause? THE INDEX, at least, has labored for the spread of liberalism, because we believe liberalism to be truer and better in its moral influence than Christianity; but if its real effect is to blind and blunt the moral sense, and lead men to take ground less intelligent and less noble than that of their Christian neighbors, the sooner we have done with such a humbug, the better. The "repeal" position, if generally taken by liberals, would reduce to absurdity all the efforts ever made in the liberal cause; it would show that, as a body, they are utterly incapable of any statesmanlike or philosophical view of public affairs, or even of their own interests; it would show that animosity against a mere individual official was enough to destroy their moral and mental equilibrium, and place them in a posture before the public in which they would be the mortification of their friends, and the sport of their exulting enemies. This will be the certain result of outraging and defying the moral sentiment of the nation by demanding that there shall be no laws against obscene literature.

III.

On the other hand, the reasons for demanding a radical amendment of the existing United States laws on this subject, so that henceforth no man shall be liable to molestation for the publishing, circulating, or mailing any book which expresses his honest convictions on any subject, are numerous and overwhelmingly strong. The chief of these reasons may be summed up briefly as follows:—

1. The "reform" position is sound in principle; for it affirms at one and the same time the right of the nation to punish the crime of circulating real obscenity through the mails, and the right of the individual not to be molested in his enjoyment of the "freedom of speech and of the press" guaranteed to him by the Constitution.

2. It is equally sound in policy; for it meets the people half-way, recognizes the good and points out the evil in the laws as they stand, and emphasizes the distinction between free thought and free filth. It thus directly and powerfully tends to dissipate that confusion of the public mind which alone renders possible such cases of oppression as the imprisonment of Mr. Heywood. And it will enable the friends of liberty, by patient argument and effort, to secure from Congress that efficient protection for liberty which can never be obtained by the wild demand for

"repeal." The American people and their Congress never intended to violate freedom of the press by the laws which have been perverted to that evil purpose, and will readily consent to amend them when this dangerous abuse is made clear to their comprehension. Liberals must not forget that the decision of this question does not rest with themselves; they must persuade the people at large that wrong has been done; they must create a public opinion against this wrong; they must understand that liberty will remain perilously unprotected, if they persist in demanding what is not at all essential to its protection, and what the people will reject with indignation. Every consideration of policy and common prudence would teach the liberals to stop at once this unwisdom clamor for "repeal." If they do not, they will richly deserve to suffer all the evils which may flow from the laws unreformed and unrepealed; for "repeal" is absolutely impossible, and, if they continue to clamor for that, they will not even get "reform."

3. The "reform" position, if adopted and pressed home upon public attention, will result at last in a better education of the people in the principles of liberty. In case the Comstock laws are at last so amended as no longer to permit the punishment of free thought under the pretence of obscenity, they will even establish a new and valuable protection for liberty itself; for the "freedom of the press" which the Constitution to-day guarantees will contain a broader principle than ever, when it is definitely established by Congress and the Courts that no theoretical opinion shall be regarded as obscene, or punished as such. "Repeal" would leave this point unsettled; "reform" would settle it for the nation, and speedily for the States also.

4. The "reform" position is the only one of the two which appreciates the tremendous force of that moral sentiment in the people which condemns the circulation of really obscene literature as a crime. The liberals can never break that mountainous moral sentiment; they can easily break themselves upon it. Years ago Daniel Webster warned the South to "beware of the awakened conscience of the North"; we to-day warn the party to which we belong to beware of the awakened conscience of the whole people. If they stubbornly refuse to make the vital distinction between free thought and free filth, which is the soul of the "reform" position, and stubbornly persist in demanding equal freedom for both, the indignant people will take them at their word; but, instead of making filth as free as thought should be, they will deprive them both alike of freedom. Conscience, unenlightened, is the most terrible of tyrants; and it is little less than madness, by exasperating it with this senseless insistence on "repeal," to goad it into fanaticism. Precedent after precedent will be multiplied against liberty, until liberals learn to respect that mighty moral sentiment which too many of them now flippantly denounce as mere "orthodoxy." It was not "orthodoxy" which enacted the Comstock laws, though "orthodoxy" may now gladly avail itself of them for purposes of its own; the real author of those laws was the people's conscience, outraged by the crimes which the laws condemn. Not to see this clearly, not to comprehend the tremendous significance of the fact, is to be smitten with almost fatal blindness. The "repeal" position takes no account whatever of this great fact, though it is one of the chief elements of the situation; the "reform" position alone rates it at its full value, and is wise enough to heed it.

5. In fine, the "reform" position alone can promote the liberal cause, and wrest unwilling reverence even from orthodoxy itself, by proving that liberalism cherishes an even profounder regard for public morality than that which orthodoxy professes. Orthodoxy would punish the crime of circulating obscenity, but is willing to punish with it free thought, which is no crime, but a virtue. Liberalism would punish the crime alone, and pay to the virtue the only reward it seeks—protection and respect. Which of these two policies challenges the higher gratitude on the score of zeal for the public morals? By putting liberalism in this light before the community, the "reform" position in the highest possible degree ensures the future growth, prosperity, and influence of the liberal cause. Surely, this is a service which every high-minded and intelligent liberal will estimate at its real worth.

Fellow-liberals, the case is laid before you, at least in its leading points. You will judge and act for yourselves, as we have judged and acted for ourself. This is the issue to come before the Syracuse Congress. The National Liberal League will decide this issue in perfect freedom; and then—the issue, thus decided, will decide the destiny of the League.

MR. WAKEMAN'S LETTER.

We invite attention to a letter from Mr. T. B. Wakeman, which was received just too late for insertion in our last issue—consequently before he had seen our criticism on his Faneuil Hall speech. This we regret, as it would have made his letter more pertinent to the real issue, if he had seen our article before writing it.

There is little that we need reply to in this letter. The restatement of his position leaves it still exposed to the objections expressed last week, and also in the preceding article. We deem it proper, however, to say that the "whim" referred to by Mr. Wakeman he has failed to understand. Both the "repeal" and the "reform" positions emphasize equally the need of protection for complete liberty; but "repeal" asks also for the abrogation of all United States laws against obscenity, which is more than is required to protect liberty. This more is the "whim" we referred to very plainly; we see no cause to misunderstand it, or to complain of it when understood. Mr. Wakeman is entirely in error in the construction he puts upon it.

He appears to us equally careless in the construction he puts on the second principle of the "Card," which (of course through the merest carelessness) he has entirely misquoted. It was not intended "to force the jurisdiction of the whole subject upon the United States government"; nor do we think the wording at all suggests any such extravagant position. But we take this opportunity to state that the platform in the "Card" is not proposed at all for adoption in that form by the League; it simply states the principles of the signers, which will be fully "approved" if the League in any manner adopts unequivocally, by a simple majority vote, the policy of seeking to "reform," and not to "repeal," the Comstock laws. The League is only expected to decide between these two policies again, as it did decide between them at Philadelphia. Similar resolutions at Syracuse would be the only "approval" contemplated.

Mr. Wakeman's position respecting "postal purposes," and the powers which under this head may be legitimately exercised over the mails, requires some explanation. We have already pointed out that he cannot consistently charge Congress with violating the "freedom of the press" by legislating against obscene literature, when he concedes that the States may legislate against it without any such violation. A still more extraordinary and baffling inconsistency, on a point fundamental to his whole argument, is brought out by a careful comparison of the following passages of the Faneuil Hall speech, to which he again refers us:—

"With the meaning of the documents indorsed, the post-office has nothing to do; and, if they have not, Congress has no authority to punish for sending them. . . . The meaning of mailed matter has nothing to do with the post-office, nor that with the meaning. . . . The correct conclusion is, that Congress has power to exclude for postal purposes and reasons, and no others. All other exercise of power of exclusion is a sheer usurpation.

"Its repeal [i. e., repeal of the law of 1873] is justly called for upon both grounds in the petition referred to. A post-office regulation that all matter should be enclosed, and that postal-cards should contain nothing that could be offensive to those to whom they are sent or to the public, is all that is necessary. This matter of the postal-cards is entirely in the power of the Department as a necessary postal regulation."

How is it that, on the one hand, the post-office has "nothing to do with the meaning of mailed matter," and yet, on the other, may exclude postal-cards with offensive messages? Is that mere "postal regulation"? This question of the postal-cards is not the trivial matter that Mr. Wakeman represents it to be. If his own position respecting the power of Congress over the mails be sound, then neither Congress nor the Department has any right to exclude from the mails postal-cards whose MEANING ONLY is offensive. There is nothing of a "postal" character about this "regulation"; it involves the whole issue raised by the law of 1873. We find Mr. Wakeman painfully inconsistent in the ground he takes; his principles are not clear, nor mutually coherent. In the same speech he denies and affirms the right of excluding mailed matter on the score of its meaning as such! We confess ourselves utterly baffled in the endeavor to reconcile such contradiction, and we must be pardoned for concluding that Mr. Wakeman has not thoroughly mastered the subject on which he would yet instruct the world. He is greatly mistaken in imagining that there is "no material difference as to 'principles.'" He declares that "all are in favor of liberty, and opposed to obscenity." It is true that all [liberals] are "in favor of liberty"; but it is not true that all are "opposed to obscenity." Can a man be said to be opposed to murder, who demands the repeal of all or any of the laws which punish it? We certainly think not. The trouble with "repeal" is that it would abrogate some or all of the laws which punish the crime of circulating obscenity, and thereby, no matter what the intention, does in fact protect and foster that crime. If there is a real answer to this, let us by all means have it.

THE FANEUIL HALL RESOLUTIONS.

The resolutions adopted by the "Indignation Meeting" at Faneuil Hall, August 1, were admirable, and are here subjoined. Let it be particularly noticed that they refer the "injury done to the freedom of the press by the conviction and imprisonment of Ezra H. Heywood" (to protest against which the meeting was called) to the "absence of definition" in the laws. They do not call for "repeal" of all those laws; they do, in effect, call for nothing but their "reform." If the "absence of definition," of which complaint is most justly made, should be remedied, and all possibility of violating freedom be thereby removed, both the letter and spirit of these resolutions would be satisfied. That is the only judicious ground to take, and it is cause for congratulation that the Faneuil Hall meeting took it so clearly. Read these resolutions carefully, and observe how completely they harmonize with the "reform" position:—

Be it resolved, by this meeting of Citizens of the United States, in Faneuil Hall assembled:—

I. That the right to think and to publicly express, by tongue or pen, the results of thinking, is the dearest right which American citizens possess; and to deny its exercise is subversive of natural justice, contrary to constitutional provision, dangerous to public welfare, and corrupting to public morals.

II. That no law ought to be permitted to remain upon our statute books which is, by the absence of definition, capable of being used by designing knaves or narrow-minded bigots in denial of the exercise of this right.

III. That, since the recent conviction of Ezra H. Heywood, of Princeton, Massachusetts, nominally of having circulated obscene literature through the mails, but really of having published his sincere convictions on the subject of love and marriage, and his imprisonment in Dedham Jail for a period of two years, clearly make his case one of persecution of opinion under the law, meriting the severest reprobation of all right-minded persons, we call upon the President of the United States, in the name of the freedom of the press, and as he values the respect and confidence of the people whose servant he is, to release Mr. Heywood without delay.

IV. That Anthony Comstock, Special Agent of the Post-Office Department, whose duty it is to prosecute offenders against the United States law prohibiting the circulation of obscene literature through the mails, has shown himself, by his abuse of the power conferred upon him by the Government in repeatedly attempting to suppress free thought, free speech, and free press, and by the despicable and immoral methods which he habitually employs, unfit to be intrusted with the execution of any law seriously affecting the liberty of the citizen; and therefore we ask his immediate dismissal from the Government service.

V. That a copy of these resolutions be signed by the president and secretaries of this meeting, and forwarded by the latter to the President of the United States.

MR. GREEN'S POSITION.

Mr. H. L. Green sent us this letter before he had seen our issue of September 19, and we delayed publishing it till he had done so. Since he still desires his letter to be published, we present it below:—

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Sept. 16, 1878.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I have read carefully the "Card" you sent me signed by four of the members of the Board of Directors of the National Liberal League, and I fully indorse the principles of the three planks therein set forth.

You request me to sign the card as Chairman of the Executive Committee. I cannot, for these reasons:—

1. I am not a candidate for reelection to the important office I now hold. There are many in our ranks who can fill the place much better than I can.

2. Because it seems to me the issuing of this card has the appearance of forestalling the action of the coming Congress and of any committee that might be appointed to present a platform for consideration.

3. That as officers of the National Liberal League, we have no official authority to issue such a manifesto.

As to the coming National League Congress, I have faith that the intelligent men and women there assembled will, in their wisdom, lay down a platform so just, broad, and catholic, that all the true friends of our new party can conscientiously stand upon it and work unitedly for the entire secularization of the State. We must all work for so desirable a result.

Fraternally yours,

H. L. GREEN.

We have only brief comments to make:—

1. Mr. Green has an unquestionable and unquestioned right to decline being a candidate for reelection.

2. The "Card" has no more "appearance of forestalling the action of the coming Congress" than have the platforms adopted and published by political parties. It forestalls no "action" of the Congress to state what our principles are, or that we decline to be candidates at all if required to execute any policy contrary to those principles.

3. The signers issued that "Card" on their individual responsibility. They needed no "official authority" to say they were candidates for reelection, and to state the principles they would carry out if re-elected.

We are sorry that Mr. Green could not decline to join in a step perfectly proper in itself, without attacking his associates precipitately and bitterly in journals where they have no opportunity of defending themselves.

Communications.

LETTER FROM MR. WAKEMAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I do not know that I shall be a delegate to the Liberal League Congress; and as you call for "public discussion" very pressingly in your last issue (Sept. 19) let me state the position of those you oppose so decidedly, at least as far as I understand it.

There is, as I see, no material difference as to "principles." All are in favor of liberty, and opposed to obscenity. The difference arises in the application of the principles. The question practically is, How far is it Constitutional and safe to liberty to employ the National instead of the State Governments in attempts to define, discover, and punish obscenity? Nobody in the League proposes to repeal all State laws on the subject, so as to "foster obscenity," or to run the League in the interests of free love. Insinuations of this kind can do no good.

Those you choose to regard as opponents believe:—

1. That the Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress no power whatever to legislate upon this subject; that its attempts so to do in the Comstock postal laws are beyond even any "implied powers," and are plain usurpations, which break down the whole Constitution as the bulwark of liberty, and, in the words of Hon. Elizer Wright, leave it "not worth two brass buttons"; that those laws are a decoy and espionage system over the post-office; that they have been the source of great wrongs and injustices; and that they cannot be amended so as to be safe and constitutional, and should therefore be repealed.

2. That the power to suppress obscenity and indecency is one of the general powers reserved in the United States Constitution to the people and the States, and that it should be exercised by the legislatures and courts with the greatest caution, only in "unequivocal and well-defined cases," and plainly within the Constitutions of the several States.

These positions have been clearly and repeatedly stated by a large part of the liberals of the country. They are in the petition signed by seventy thousand, asking the repeal of the Comstock postal laws. They were affirmed when presented at the great meeting at Faneuil Hall, called to protest against the conviction of Mr. Heywood. They were reaffirmed decidedly at the Watkins Convention, and appear at length in the resolutions there adopted. They have been in substance approved by a large part, and I believe, nearly all of the liberal press. I do not therefore feel called upon by your challenge to go over the whole story again. A large edition of my speech at the Faneuil Hall Meeting has been circulated, and covers the main points. No one has as yet pointed out any error in its law or practical recommendations; but, on the contrary, letters from leading liberals and lawyers have been a constant assurance that the positions there taken are sound and safe. In order to do my part in the "public discussion" I will gladly send to any one, who will honor me with address and a three-cent stamp, a copy of that speech (including Judge Field's opinion) and the Watkins Resolutions. All I ask is a fair and impartial study of them, and I believe but one conclusion can result. If the tone of the speech should appear too warm for a legal opinion, let it be remembered that it was delivered at a crowded indignation meeting, and should be forgiven if it has a touch of its spirit.

On the first page of THE INDEX referred to, the repeal of these postal laws is spoken of as a "whim," or an effort to get the Supreme Court to "reverse itself," for which "editors" in jail are supposed "to wait." This levity seems to me unintelligent and ill-timed. I think you will find that those most earnest for "repeal" have been the most earnest for the pardon of the editor, and most active in circulating his petition. Why should they not at the same time ask for the repeal of the law? That law is in truth a real danger, and its repeal not a mere whim. Nearly every case of wrong and outrage by Comstock has been perpetrated under that unconstitutional postal law. Out of thirty cases I have looked over, only two or three have been under the State laws, and only one conviction. Scarcely one of the outrages would have been possible in a State court. I have known of men hunted to death under this law, and one imprisoned for ten years, and fined $5000; and Heywood is in prison yet! This is a substantial whim to those who suffer, and I feel indignant at the indifference of those who call themselves liberals in regard to it. Even if they have no regard for constitutional safeguards, or a free post-office, they ought to consider the causeless misery and ruin of their fellow-beings as more than a whim. I show in the speech referred to that the only safety for liberty is to get the whole subject out of this usurped United States jurisdiction. There is no way in which these laws could be safely amended, even if they were constitutional. The iniquity is in their use,—that is, in the decoy and espionage system which is their very substance; and the only safety is in their "repeal," which is no "empty honor," but a pressing necessity.

Nor is there any intention of getting the Supreme Court "to reverse itself." The action of that court in the Jackson case has made it necessary to reverse the court by the action of Congress,—that is, by the repeal of the law, which will do it effectively. I mention half-a-dozen instances where this has been done with perfect success, in our national history; and it can be done again if our liberals have the traditions of liberty in their hearts, instead of a causeless obscenity panic. The political position of the liberals now is quite similar to that of the Republicans after the Dred Scott decision, but our case is clearer than theirs. All we have to do is to stand firmly by the Constitution and the liberties of the people, as I have pointed out was done by Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln, and the Supreme Court will not be long in the way.

The above are all of the objections I find in your paper to the position I have stated, and these were in a side paragraph. A few words are due in regard to the application of the "principles" proposed by the majority of the officers of the League in their "Card." The only matter of difference is in the second plank, and the wording of the first sentence astonishes me. It goes far beyond anything that any court, or even Mr. Comstock, has ever assumed or claimed, and seems to me to be the work of some one strangely ignorant of the subject. It distinctly claims that it is "the right and duty of Congress and of the national courts to pass and to enforce laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails."

The first and main part of this sentence forces the jurisdiction of the whole subject upon the United States government. I pray to be shown a single word of the Constitution that authorizes anything of this kind. It has never been even claimed. An amendment to the Constitution will certainly be necessary to confer this absolute and preposterous power. Was the Liberal League organized for this purpose? If not, this plank is useless in its platform. As to the second part of the sentence, i.e., as to postal exclusion, which it is proposed to "include" in the larger jurisdiction, I have disposed of that in the speech referred to until some answer is made to it.

So, also, as to attempts to define, discover, and punish obscenity under State laws, I will say nothing further than to refer to the documents named. Danger to liberty still lurks even there; and I hope, Mr. Editor, you will try your hand in framing a statute that will give us a clear and safe definition.

In conclusion, let me express the belief that the "Card" of the Directors of the League has no justification in fact as they suppose. If there had been any caucus, plot, ticket, or concerted action of any kind I should have known of it beyond doubt; and I have heard of nothing of the kind. Notwithstanding my differences on this one point mentioned, I have favored the reelection of Mr. Abbot; and I had hoped that the Freethinkers' Association of this State would be consolidated with the League so as to save the expense and time required to keep up two associations. If this could be done, the political affairs of the liberal cause would certainly find strength in unity. On the other hand, that is on the "spiritual side," the Free Religious Association could be extended so as to largely replace the functions which the old churches and religions have performed. Why may not this dream be realized? There is nothing in the present dispute that should prevent cooperation of liberals. True, it is an important question of constitutional law and of public policy, but it really involves no principle. Let us find out what is true and what is best to be done about it, and not threaten to retire or talk about the League being "assassinated."

Very respectfully yours,

T. B. WAKEMAN,
Counsellor-at-law,

A LETTER FROM MR. ELLIS.

BOSTON, Sept. 23, 1878.

MR. ABBOT:—

Having been frequently asked where I stood upon the "obscenity laws" question, and seeing that the Liberal League has determined to bring the matter up at its next convention, I beg leave to offer the accompanying article as indicative of my opinion. You will observe that it is a communication for the Truth-Seeker, and that it is dated July 16. This necessitates a word of explanation. I sent the article to Mr. Bennett, and he notified me that he would publish it. But after about two weeks he informed me that while he would be glad to accommodate me personally, he had given so much space to this question that he really felt that he must stop, and so would not insert my article. I believe I have given substantially Mr. Bennett's opinion, but in justice to him I would also add that he did not look upon the article as containing any argument that he could not readily answer.

I beg now to say that in offering this article to you, I am not actuated by any desire to recall any difference between you and him, and that I do not lay any emphasis upon the fact that the article was declined by Mr. Bennett, but wish only to offer it as containing an expression of my opinion at that time, July 16, and to add that it is my opinion still.

Sincerely yours, CHARLES ELLIS.

The Comstock-Law Question.

FRIEND BENNETT:—

I am taking the liberty to address you on the unfortunate trouble which seems to have pushed the Truth-

Seeker and THE INDEX so far apart. Personal interest in the matter I have none. I will neither condemn nor defend either party. So far as personal feeling may exist, we "outsiders" have nothing to do with it. But so far as the question of the future existence or non-existence of a law against the untrammeled propagation of obscenity goes,—so far, I, with many others who have been looking on in silence, feel a deep interest in the matter; and I would be glad, if it were in my power, to spike these guns that have been so long playing, not upon the enemy, but upon friends.

Excuse me, but I think that, if you will forget for the time being that there has been any effort made to obtain signers to a petition against the Comstock Law, you will agree with me that there is really no difference of opinion on the question of the free circulation of obscene books, etc., between you and Mr. Abbot, or any other good citizens, be they Infidel, Free-religionist, or Christian. It seems to me that all honorable and moral citizens must stand together on such a question. Whatever distances may divide them on speculative questions, on this one involving one of the corner-stones of society, one of the safeguards of public morals, a consideration that rises infinitely above churches, sects, Bibles, and Gods, all honest men and women must stand together. Their united voice will always be against allowing the privileges of freedom to be perverted and subverted by people whose success in business can only be secured at the expense of virtue and the general well-being of the country. I am sure that you stand with all other sound men and women firm and true upon the side of public good. All are agreed that, if there are men who are making a business of selling books, pictures, or anything else, the influence of which is to degrade the morals of the people, old or young, among whom they circulate, our first duty is to protect society against these men. A great many men and women are imprisoned, and a fair number are converted on the gallows and then hung, for the protection of society, and nobody questions the right of society to protect itself. But if it is right to imprison and punish men for arson, theft, rape, and murder, can there be any question in regard to our duty towards men who exercise the privilege of living in our society, but who make use of that privilege to carry on a business the legitimate end of which can only be to make thieves and murderers? I think not.

We hold it righteous law that the man who sells liquor to another and makes him drunk shall be amenable for the results of that drunkenness. The vicious man or woman who leads others into vice is guilty; and society is bound in duty to itself to deprive such people of the opportunity to do evil, as far as it can. Upon these points, I feel confident there can be no difference of opinion.

How are these matters regulated? Partly by State and partly by National law. In so far as it seemed to be possible for the State to protect its own community interests, all such matters as offences against society were left to the State. In others, where the mutual interests of the whole were concerned,—as, for instance, the right to declare war, to make treaties, to make money, to establish and regulate mails,—the supervisory power is retained by the central government. The right to determine all questions on any of these matters is vested by the Constitution in the General Government, and no State can act upon any of them without being guilty of treason. We have but recently had a memorable illustration of this in the Rebellion. Had the framers of the Constitution foreseen such an abuse of the public privilege of sending mails as seems to have arisen, they might possibly have allowed each State to regulate its own mail system and punish its own offenders; and yet I think the system is a great deal better as it is, under the control of the general government. However, the fact is that no State has a right to interfere with the public mails. It is useless to talk about regulating the sending of obscene matter through the mails by State law, until the Constitution of the United States has been changed so as to delegate that power to the States. Our duty is to do the best we can, with things as they are.

To guard against the abuse of the public mail system, Congress enacts a law that is intended to prevent persons from sending "obscene matter" through this channel of communication, established and kept up for the benefit, not of the rascals, but the honest citizens of the country. Is there anything wrong in that? If it is right for Congress to pass laws for the protection of the money of the country, why isn't it right to do the same for the mails? If it is right to punish men who take advantage of the people's need of money, and so abuse the national government by counterfeiting its money, isn't it equally right to punish those who take advantage of the people's need of a public mail system to carry on a business that is injurious to the well-being of the country and is condemned by all fair-minded men? These laws are for the protection of the whole country, and are as necessary as is any law of quarantine forbidding the introduction of epidemic or plague into the country. So far, are not you and I agreed?

Now comes an unprincipled fellow, who sees an opportunity to hoodwink the government, and turn the power to regulate the character of mail matter into a channel that shall wash the proceeds of all that he can pass for "obscenity" into his own pocket. Backed by willing tools, he makes his move, and succeeds in getting this power vested in his own hands as the agent of the government. What is the result? The Constitution, the supreme law of the land, is perverted, and used as a weapon of offence against citizens whom it was designed to protect, simply because the agent it has chosen is unfit! The Constitution is not wrong; the law protecting the people against misuse of their mails is not wrong. The fact is, Congress alone was wrong in selecting such an agent to do an honest man's work; AND EVERY DAY IT RETAINS HIM IN OFFICE IT GATHERS ODIUM AND DISGRACE UPON ITS OWN HEAD AS BEING NO BETTER THAN HE. What is the remedy? Certainly not to attempt to create a rebellion by taking from the Constitution its right to regulate the mails. Nor would it be any more a remedy to abolish all law relating to the carrying of obscene matter through the mails. Until we can legally take this power from Congress and vest it in the States, every one must see the absolute necessity of keeping this safeguard around the mails. Even those who think that such matters could be attended to better by the State must admit that the State is powerless to interfere now, and must see that, if the law protecting the mails should be repealed, we should be obliged to see the government using the public money to circulate and carry on a business the first, last, and only result of which is to injure the government itself by degrading its citizens.

What then is the remedy? Let Congress simply undo the evil it has done in placing power in the hands of a dishonest agent. The first step is to decapitate Comstock—off with his official head! That done, the first cause of all this persecution is removed, and from that hour the persecution will cease. With the law as it is, and an honest agent to enforce it, none of these attacks on men and women whose only offence has been that they were, not obscenists, but "infidels," would ever have occurred. But I wouldn't have the law left as it is. After removing its dishonest agent, Congress should proceed to so modify AND AMEND the law, that forever after there shall be no question as to precisely what is meant by obscenity, and what constitutes a transgression of the law.

This done, the whole matter is settled, and settled well. Is there anything in such a disposition of it to which you would yourself object? If not, then are not you and I and all of us in the same boat, pulling against the same stream of Orthodox bigotry, hypocrisy, and fraud, towards the same Eldorado of truth, justice, and liberty?

I think so. I may be wrong, but I believe you think so too. You, working for repeal, desire to secure the same end, protection, that those seek who want the law not abolished, but amended. And now, as it is impossible for the State to afford protection to the mails until the Constitution is changed, I beg you to drop all personal feeling in the matter, and for the present, until the State acquires the right to afford the protection you would have, lend your good head and hand, your splendid energy, to the work of obtaining a modification and amendment of this obnoxious law.

To this end I shall take the liberty of making a motion in behalf of the liberals of the whole country: namely, That D. M. Bennett, F. E. Abbot, B. F. Underwood, and R. G. Ingersoll, be and are hereby constituted a committee to draft a petition to Congress for the modification and amendment of what is known as the "Comstock law" against the circulation of obscene matter through the mails.

Forget the past and start again, and not only will every one of the "seventy thousand" sign the new petition, but seventy thousand more will be found ready to place themselves right on a question that reaches to the very heart of the nation's life. Having done this, our own cause shall move on with new life to grapple with the enemies that are sneaking to position all along the line.

Yours truly, CHARLES ELLIS.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Please allow me to say that Thos. Dugan, whose letter you printed last week, seems to have mainly correct impressions of Dennis Kearney and the popular movement of which he is an ominous yet encouraging exponent. "The Moody of politics," in a living sense Mr. Kearney voices an affluence not yet clearly explained to himself or others. While his style and methods are not mine, I discern in him clear sense of reigning injustice and resolute desire that compulsive systems and class devices may give way to essential equity and natural right.

Regarding "obscenity," I think your position logical yet mistaken. Will try and send you a letter soon. Leisure daylight is very limited here, so I can write but little of what I would like to say.

Yours ever, E. H. REYWOOD.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

The Massachusetts State Executive Committee of the National Liberal League wish to make acknowledgment and return thanks, through your columns, to the following-named donors to fund for State Liberal League work: Hon. Eliza Wright, $5.00; John Curtis, $5.00; John L. Stoddard, $5.00; J. Harry Wheeler, $5.00; Rev. M. J. Savage, $5.00; Paine Hall Liberal League, $5.00; John C. Haynes, $5.00; Hon. S. E. Sewall, $5.00; Howard Marston, $5.00.

As the committee is greatly in need of money to carry on the work of organization in this State, donations are solicited from all persons interested in the movement.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1873.
To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still, "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine, from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact facsimile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is from England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on the issues with a promptitude unequalled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers. The following are a few of the contributors:—

Matthew Arnold, Alfred R. Wallace,
Herbert Spencer, Frederick Harrison,
Goldwin Smith, Prof. Tyndall,
Right Hon. Lyon Playfair, Prof. Huxley,
Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Prof. Darwin,
John A. T. Talmage, Author of Supernatural Religion,
M. E. Grant Duff, M.P., Sir John Lubbock,
Hon. Robert Lowe, Anthony Trollope,
Lealie Stephen, T. Adolphus Trollope,
John Morley (the Editor), Sir H. S. Maine,
G. H. Lewes, Sir David Wedderburn,

AND NUMEROUS OTHERS.

Subscription Price, $5.00 per Year.
Published every month by the ROSE-BELFORD PUBLISHING CO., 60 York Street, Toronto, Ont.

THE SECULAR REVIEW,

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The SECULAR REVIEW is the leading organ of Secularism, and each week has Special Articles on Theological, Social, Scientific, and Political Subjects. Its distinctive features are the advocacy of Constructive Secularism, and the dissemination of useful information on all questions which affect the welfare of the people. Letters are inserted in its "OPEN COLUMN" from all who are courteous in the expression of their views; while a special department is allotted for "NOTES AND QUERIES."

The Contributors to the SECULAR REVIEW comprise the principal advocates of Secularism, including its founder, G. J. Holyoake.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD. GREAT THROUGH LINE AND UNITED STATES MAIL ROUTE.

The attention of the travelling public is respectfully invited to some of the merits of this great highway, in the confident assertion and belief that no other line can offer equal inducements as a route of through travel. In

CONSTRUCTION AND EQUIPMENT

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD stands confessedly at the head of American railways. The track is double the entire length of the line, of steel rails laid on heavy oak ties, which are embedded in a foundation of rock ballast eighteen inches in depth. All bridges are of iron or stone, and built upon the most approved plans. Its passenger cars, while eminently safe and substantial, are at the same time models of comfort and elegance.

THE SAFETY APPLIANCES

In use on this line well illustrate the far-seeing and liberal policy of its management, in accordance with which the utility only of an improvement and not its cost has been the question of consideration. Among many may be noticed

The Block System of Safety Signals, Janney Coupler, Buffer, and Platform, The Wharton Patent Switch, and the Westinghouse Air-Brake, forming in conjunction with a perfect double track and road-bed a combination of safeguards against accidents which have rendered them practically impossible.

Pullman Palace Cars

are run on all Express Trains from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, to Chicago, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, and St. Louis.

WITHOUT CHANGE,

and to all the principal points in the far West and South with but one change of cars. Connections are made in Union Depots, and are assured to all important points. The Scenery of the Pennsylvania Route is admitted to be unsurpassed in the world for grandeur, beauty, and variety. Superior refreshment facilities are provided. Employes are courteous and attentive, and it is an inevitable result that a trip by the Pennsylvania Railroad must form

A Pleasing and Memorable Experience.

National Liberal League,
231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

PLATFORM

For the Presidential Election of 1880,

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, regularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N.B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

SECOND ANNUAL CONGRESS

OF THE

National Liberal League.

CALL.

Boston, Sept. 12, 1878.

The Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July 1-4, 1876, will be held at Wisting Opera House, Syracuse, N.Y., on Saturday and Sunday, Oct. 26 and 27, 1878. Further particulars as to speakers, etc., will be announced hereafter.

In addition to the hearing of reports, election of officers for the ensuing year, and other ordinary business, questions of the utmost practical importance to the liberal cause will come up for decision at this Congress. Among them the following may be specified:—

1. What efficient measures can be adopted for securing a great increase in the number of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, and thereby winning for liberal ideas the public influence to which they are justly entitled?

2. Shall the National Liberal League nominate candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States at the present time?

3. How can the National Liberal League most effectively promote the cause of State Secularization, and foil the schemes of those who are seeking to pervert the government to sectarian purposes? What action shall it take with reference to the Constitutional Amendment already twice reported to the United States Senate by the Judiciary Committee, the practical effect of which, if adopted, will be to recognize in the Constitution the right of the Bible to be read in the public schools as a book of divine authority, and the right of church property to be exempted from taxation?

4. How can the rights of free mails and a free press be most effectively defended, and how can the wrongs of persons unjustly punished under the so-called Comstock laws be most effectively righted?

5. Shall the National Liberal League abandon the stand it originally took on the "obscene literature" question at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, or shall it continue to defend equally the cause of public morality and the cause of free mails and a free press? Shall it now demand the total repeal of the existing laws on this subject, and thereby practically protect and foster the circulation of obscene literature? Or shall it continue to demand the radical reform of those laws, in such manner as shall protect freedom of thought to the uttermost without protecting obscenity in the least?

The last two of these questions are peculiarly important at this time, and will inevitably come up for settlement by the approaching Congress. The resolutions adopted at Philadelphia were as follows:—

"Resolved, That this League, while it recognizes the great importance and the absolute necessity of guarding by proper legislation against obscene and indecent publications, whatever sect, party, order, or class such publications claim to favor, disapproves and protests against all laws which, by reason of indefiniteness or ambiguity, shall permit the prosecution and punishment of honest and conscientious men for presenting to the public what they deem essential to the public welfare, when the views thus presented do not violate in thought or language the acknowledged rules of decency; and that we demand that all laws against obscenity and indecency shall be so clear and explicit that none but actual offenders against the recognized principles of purity shall be liable to suffer therefrom.

"Resolved, That we cannot but regard the appointment and authorization by the government of a single individual to inspect our mails, with power to exclude therefrom whatever he deems objectionable, as a delegation of authority dangerous to public and personal liberty, and utterly inconsistent with the genius of free institutions."

The future growth, prosperity, and influence of the Liberal League movement will depend largely on the action to be taken by the Congress on these two questions. Any weakening of the stand taken at Philadelphia will work great and perhaps fatal disaster to the National Liberal League.

In order, therefore, that these vital questions may be fairly and wisely decided, it is recommended that all Local Leagues elect their delegates with special reference to it. The Congress will not be an irresponsible mass meeting, but a convention composed of delegates and members duly accredited, and seats for them will be reserved. Delegates from Local Leagues will receive Certificates of Membership of the Second Annual Congress by forwarding at once the proper credentials, signed by their own local officers, to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston"; charter, life, and annual members who intend to be present will receive theirs by simply forwarding their names and present addresses. These Certificates must be presented at the door and exchanged for Tickets of Admission to the reserved seats, the rest of the hall being open to the public at large. By this arrangement all confusion will be obviated. The Congress will be composed of accredited members, who alone ought to vote on questions of business affecting the League; every member will be admitted to the reserved seats; and the Committee on Membership will be enabled to make an accurate report to the Congress.

Liberals are urged everywhere to organize themselves into Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues and elect good delegates, in order to give this Congress a large local constituency and an influential delegation, and thereby to increase the weight of its decisions with the general public. The questions to be acted upon are of the gravest consequence to the whole liberal cause, and ought to be dealt with by a responsible representative body. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay, if addressed to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston."

By order of the Board of Directors:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.

WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

GLIMPSES.

A SECOND Liberal League has just been formed at Syracuse. This makes the fiftieth Local Auxiliary League chartered by the National League.

EDMUND BURKE once wrote: "When bad men combine, the good must associate; else they will fall, one by one, an unpitied sacrifice in a contemptible struggle."

IT IS REPORTED by cable from the Hague that the King and Chambers have passed a law excluding the Bible and religious teaching from the primary schools. Holland goes forward, and New Haven goes back.

BOARD can be had by members of the Syracuse Congress for two dollars a day at the best hotels of the city, namely, the Syracuse House and the Vanderbilt House. Still lower rates can be secured at private boarding houses.

THE SIXTH Congress of Women is to be held at Providence, October 9, 10, and 11. Mrs. Kate N. Doggett is President, and Miss Mary F. Eastman is Secretary. A long list of distinguished women are announced to read papers.

AT PRESENT writing, we are only enabled to announce positively Mr. B. F. Underwood, Mrs. Clara Neymann, and Professor J. E. Oliver, as speakers at the Syracuse Congress. Others remain to be heard from, while several cannot as yet definitely engage to attend.

THIS PARAGRAPH from the Hampshire County Journal of September 28 is simply an illustration of what will prove to be the nearly unanimous opinion of the general public on the point involved: "The Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League has been called to meet at Syracuse, Oct. 26 and 27. Among the questions announced for discussion is this: 'How can the rights of free mails and a free press be most effectively defended, and how can the wrongs of persons unjustly punished under the so-called Comstock laws be most effectively righted?' The convention will also consider whether it is best to nominate a candidate for president of the United States. We hope that the discussion upon the Comstock laws will be thorough and dispassionate, and that the delegates will not make a mistake of demanding the total repeal of all laws against obscenity, but simply a radical change in them, which it seems to us will accomplish all that is necessary for the freedom of the press and individual."

TO THOSE who choose to understand, we say explicitly that the Directors' "Card" was not prompted in the least by a wish to retain "office," but that its sole origin was a wish to bring before the Syracuse Congress distinctly and fairly a most important issue of principle which would otherwise have been sprung upon it without sufficient warning. There is not one of the four signers who would not be more than glad to be relieved from the arduous and thankless labor which those offices impose, provided the National Liberal League shall only remain firm and true to its original position, and thereby command the increasing confidence, respect, and support of the liberal public. When we were originally elected at Philadelphia, July 1, 1876, we said: "If I thought that this was simply a post of honor, I should have demurred at taking it, for I do not covet it as such. Although it is a post of honor, it is a great deal more than that: it is a place to work hard in and be shot at, and that is why I am willing to take it. The man who faithfully does the work of the President of this League must prepare himself to perform a great deal of labor, and to meet a great deal of opposition and calumny, both public and private. But it is a place in which I believe I can make myself of some service to you who have chosen me, and for this reason I have accepted the duty which you have imposed. It is this, and not the honor of it, that makes the attraction of this post in my eyes." What we then said has proved true—even truer than we knew at the time. If the Syracuse Congress shall elect new and fresh officers, and at the same time take unequivocal ground in favor of "reform" instead of "repeal," every desire of the signers of the "Card" will be gratified to the full. Without emoluments and without even thanks, the offices offer nothing except the opportunity of hard work in a great and despicable cause. Welcome to any successors who will do that work without trailing the colors in the dust!

Is the Reformer any Longer Needed?

BY HON. GEORGE W. JULIAN.

The philosophy of evolution, as applied to the problems of the physical world, is rapidly winning the victory over all opposition. Resting upon the sure foundation of known facts and necessary inductions, it has little to fear from the assaults of mere declamation, or the unbelieving conservatism which sees only danger and disaster in courageously following the truth.

But the attempt of some of the chief apostles of this philosophy to apply its teachings literally in the domain of morals and politics involves considerations of very grave moment to the cause of social progress. They tell us that society is not a manufacture, but a growth; and that civilization, therefore, is not an artificial thing, but a part of Nature—of a piece with the development of the embryo, or the unfolding of a flower. Manufacturing morals, we are told, is as unscientific as manufacturing worlds; while social progress is to be wrought out by gradual development, and not by spasms of philanthropy or sudden outbreaks of reform. It is not an accident, but a necessity, and therefore all special reforms are to be superseded by social evolution. The Clarksons and Wilberfores of a past generation must give place to the Spencers and Bagehotes of the present, and thus usher in a new dispensation in the history of the race. According to Herbert Spencer, no teaching or policy can advance the work of social development beyond a certain normal rate, while it is quite possible to perturb, to retard, or to disorder the process; and, by maintaining favorable conditions, there cannot be more good done than by letting social progress go on unhindered, while an immensity of mischief may be done in the way of disturbing and distorting and repressing by policies carried out in pursuit of erroneous conceptions. The growth of society is thus analogous to the growth of an animal, or a plant, proceeding in a predetermined order under the influence of causes which act spontaneously and in perfect harmony with all comical development. A very high authority on moral and social questions, catching the spirit of these ideas, traces a great portion of existing evils to benevolent interferences for their removal. He asserts that in this world a large part of the business of the wise is to counteract the efforts of the good, and that those only can safely and serviceably encounter social evils who can both watch, and in some measure imitate, God's mode of dealing with them. He tells us that the coldest tempers are generally, in matters of philanthropy, the soundest thinkers and safest guides and administrators, and that a tender-hearted statesman is almost more to be dreaded than a despot or an adventurer; while, to be worthy and efficient coadjutors with God on the great arena of the world, we must be able to borrow some of the sublime, impassive calm with which, age after age, he has looked down upon the slow progress and lingering miseries of his children. The motto of the social evolutionist is "Slow and sure"; and he exhorts us, as far as possible, to eliminate the time-element from our reckoning of human progress, and imitate Nature in her infinite patience in waiting so long for the physical world to grow into decent and comely shape. With him, human endeavors for ameliorating the condition of humanity are, of course, hinderances rather than helps; and the reformer is to be regarded as representing a type of mind no longer needed, and as destined soon to disappear under the law of the survival of the fittest. Like the mastodon, the dodo, and other creations of the past, he will become extinct, and we shall patiently and placidly look on while social evolution does the work which his ignorance and fanaticism so clumsily attempted in a ruder and less advanced stage of society.

This new gospel demands our attention. It makes its appeal in the name of science, and it has the support of great names. Its teaching is plausible, and it embodies a measure of truth. It is remarkably solving to a certain order of minds, and we believe multitudes will be tempted to embrace it as a welcome scapegoat for their laziness or moral indifference. It arraigns all the great reforms of the world, and would substitute a sickly moral fatalism for those deeds of heroism and self-sacrifice which have glorified human nature and lighted the world on its way to higher truth. Let us briefly consider it.

The fallacies on which it rests are not difficult to discover. In the first place it assumes the existence of an obviously false and impossible analogy. When we are exhorted to imitate God's mode of dealing with social evils, and to become coadjutors with him by borrowing his sublime patience, it may be well to remember that we are not gods, but human beings, very limited in our knowledge and circumscribed in our sphere of action. The folly of the suggestion that we should put ourselves in the place of the Creator, in order that we may have wise and comprehensive views of our duties to our fellow-creatures, is only equalled by its sublime effrontery. Whoever believes in a Supreme Intelligence must believe that he sees the end from the beginning. The universe is his expression and breath; all its parts and appointments are the fruit of his infinite wisdom, and are seen to work together for good. What is hidden and inscrutable to us must be to him as transparent as light, and in perfect accord with justice, mercy, and truth. To talk about the patience of the Deity, therefore, is to apply the vocabulary of mortals to a Being who infinitely surpasses our comprehension. Patience is a human virtue, implying weakness and imperfection. It means enduring suffering with meekness, sustaining pains and trials without murmuring or fretfulness, bearing trouble with equanimity. This cannot be predicated of God, whose very attributes must make him impassive in surveying the work of his hands. And even this human virtue is only enjoined upon us in encountering evils which are unavoidable; for, if we have the power to remove them, our patience under their burden ceases to be a virtue, if it does not become a vice.

Equally irrational is the notion that we may become Godlike by eliminating the element of time in dealing with the evils of society. We have no right to break away from those limitations which make us what we are, and we have no more power to do so than we have to add to our stature by taking thought. With our Creator, as we are told and believe, the universe is "an everlasting Now"; but with us the little fragment of time which rounds out our life is simply the gateway of duty and toll. It is our providential opportunity, into which we should crowd every beneficent activity which an unselfish devotion to truth and humanity can kindle. We cannot, therefore, become coadjutors with our Maker by folding our hands and waiting upon evolution, or the cold logic of events, but by acting well our appointed part in the fleeting drama of life—by plunging into the strifes and struggles of our time, and wisely but fervently toiling for our kind. These strifes and struggles afford ample scope for our powers, and we have no right to shirk the task to which we are summoned. Evolution is God's method of operating in the natural world, and, in a qualified sense, in the moral; but it can perform no vicarious office for us as intelligent beings endowed with a conscience, who must work out our own salvation. It cannot supersede the strivings and sacrifices of good men for the race; it cannot cancel our social obligations by eloquent talk about gradual development and comprehensive views; it cannot cure the ills of society by assuring us that progress is a necessity, and that, while we may cripple and retard social development, we have no power to aid it; it cannot strengthen the hands of struggling Virtue, or increase our reverence for our Maker, by reminding us of his unruffled serenity in looking down upon the tardy progress and lingering miseries of his children; it cannot bring reproach and derision upon the world's great reforms and reformers without a corresponding blight and paralysis of the world's faith in goodness; it cannot reform society by proclaiming abstract theories of progress, while those who would smite social evils in their concrete form are branded as fanatics and men of "one idea"; it cannot save the world through the leadership of men who boast of their philosophic principles, and their patience under the troubles and sorrows of their fellow-creatures; it cannot establish its doctrine of scientific fatalism without sapping the very foundation of morals. Every civilized community is scourged by some devouring evil, which invites the organized resistance of good men. Through their agency the work of social evolution goes forward, and they are without excuse if they fail to put forth their endeavors. The shortness of life and the feebleness of our powers make the time-element in our reckoning of progress all the more vital. They should render us not more but less patient in dealing with curable social ills; they should incite us to lavish our efforts in the service of humanity, instead of stingily withholding them, and waiting supinely for evolution to take up our task; they should teach us to capitalize our philanthropy to the utmost, and fund it freely in deeds of active beneficence. Any one of the reforms of our day is large enough to tax the best energies of our strongest men; and all of them must lag and languish if, instead of looking to partial and immediate results through our personal exertions, we commit the solution of social problems to the working of inevitable laws.

But we observe, in the next place, that the central idea of this new philosophy is fallacious. It is not contended that the forces which rule society naturally gravitate in the direction of evil, nor is it denied that their tendency, as in the case of individual men, is toward improved conditions. If this were not true, there could be no such thing as a science of history, and the moral world would be the sport of accident and chance. We accept Mr. Bagehot's general idea of a philosophy of progress, which he so skillfully labors to enforce and illustrate; but Mr. Bagehot himself asserts that "the progress of man requires the coöperation of men for its development." It is not true that the process of civilization is a part of Nature, like the unfolding of a flower. It is not true that social progress goes on as a necessity, according to any invariable law. It is not true that laws and institutions grow, in the sense in which we speak of the growth of plants and animals. If these premises were valid, Mr. Spencer would undoubtedly be right in declaring that, while we can retard or disorder the process of social development, we can do nothing whatever to advance it. But the fact is that, while the process of development, in the animal and vegetable kingdoms, is achieved indirectly and unintentionally, social evolution is chiefly the result of efforts consciously put forth for the purpose. To a very large extent communities, like individuals, are the architects of their own fortunes. Evolution is ever at work; but whether it takes a forward or retrograde course must depend largely upon the voluntary action of the people, or of their recognized leaders, in adopting or rejecting particular laws or policies. Prof. Cairnes, in an article written a few years ago combating the views of Mr. Spencer, proves from the highest critical and historical authority that the stationary condition of the race is the rule, and the progressive the exception, and that the greater part of mankind has never shown the least desire that its civil institutions should be improved. He shows that on this ground, and not according to any theory of social evolution, we must account for the retrograde course of certain nations after they have reached an advanced stage of civilization; and he makes the apt quotation from Mr. Mill, that "political institutions are the work of men; owe their origin and their existence to human will. Men did not wake on a summer morning and find them sprung up. Neither do they resemble trees, which, once planted, are eye growing while men are sleeping. In every stage of their existence they are made what they are by human voluntary agency." And this reasoning is justified by historical facts which he adduces. Rome was incalculably indebted for her later preëminence to the fortunate and timely adoption of her early code of laws. Her decline and ruin resulted from the decay of her yeomanry and her vast landed estates. The paternal despotism of China carried her up to the civilization she has attained, but is a most formidable barrier to further progress. The absolute monarchy of the Jews produced different results, because they had a peculiar body of men called prophets, the patriots and guides of their time, who were able to withstand the power of kings and priests. Not upon any invariable law, therefore, working in the direction of good or evil, but upon human agency, must the fortunes of States greatly depend. The right does not always come uppermost in the concerns of this world. The truth is often put down by falsehood and force. In his famous essay on "Liberty," Mr. Mill says Christianity itself only became predominant because the persecutions of its enemies were occasional, and separated by long intervals of propagandism. Injustice is not an appointed necessity, but neither is Justice strong enough to win in her ever-recurring conflict with the powers of evil without the help of faithful and heroic men. "We ought not to forget that there is an incessant and ever-flowing current of human affairs toward the worse, consisting of all the follies, all the vices, all the negligences, indolences, and supinities of mankind, which is only controlled and kept from sweeping all before it by the exertions which some persons constantly, and others by fits, put forth in the direction of good and worthy objects." This confession of faith of John Stuart Mill, with which Prof. Cairnes enforces his argument, was the key-note of his life; and whoever thoroughly accepts it as the inspiration of his labors will be ready to work for humanity as if the fortunes of the world depended on his personal endeavors. The fortunes of the world, indeed, to a large extent, have depended upon the toils and struggles of just such men; while those who have looked on in indifference, or opposed all efforts at reform because they believed it wiser "to let social progress go on unhindered," have left the world little better than they found it, if they have not been positive obstructions to human welfare.

Who can look back upon the great reforms of the world, and pronounce them so many ill-fated struggles to better its condition which only deflected the path of progress from its true course? Who can gainsay the grand lesson of history so beautifully stated by Mr. Motley, that "the generation that plants is not the generation that gathers in the harvest, but all mankind at last inherit what is sown in the blood and tears of a few"? Who, that is not the slave of mere theories, would disown the martyrs whose blood has been the seed of the Church? Who would dishonor the apostles and prophets of free thought in every age who have blazed the way of progress for the race, and made our present civilization possible? Mr. Buckle affirms that Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations has contributed more to the happiness of man than has been effected by the united abilities of all the statesmen and legislators of whom history has preserved an authentic account. The age we live in is what we find it because of the labors and sacrifices of all the great souls of the past. If progress has been evolved, it has also quite as certainly been propagated. It is not simply the product of law, but the fruit of human toil and sacrifice, voluntarily embraced for the improvement and regeneration of mankind. Our churches, our educational institutions, our organized charities, our scientific associations, our various special reforms, and that marvellous instrumentality called the press, are all so many testimonies to the power of voluntary efforts purposefully employed in the furtherance of human well-being, and so many practical refutations of the theory that social development is dwarfed and deformed by attempts to improve it.

But the new doctrine is not only fallacious, but necessarily demoralizing. This is implied in what we have already said, but it needs to be particularly emphasized. It unavoidably results from the principle that social development, while it may be hindered or deranged, cannot be artificially bettered. Mr. Spencer says this doctrine "is calculated to have a steady effect on thought and action." It cannot fail to produce a paralyzing effect. He admits that sanguine reformers will feel that it takes away "much of the stimulus to exertion"; and he asks, "If large advances in human welfare can come only in the slow process of things, which will inevitably bring them, why should we trouble ourselves?" This staggering question he answers by saying that "on visionary hopes, rational criticisms have a depressing influence," but that "it is better to recognize the truth." The truth which he thus frankly counsels us to recognize is the fatalism of his theory of development, and the consequent helplessness of humanity to speed its social advancement. According to this doctrine, the reformer is not simply a fanatic, but a social nuisance. He is a benevolent intermeddler with a process which may be marred, but cannot be mended; and the business of wise and sober men is to counteract his mischief. The philanthropist must surrender his vocation and his dreams of human amelioration, to men of cold tempers and comprehensive views. The patriot, who pictures to himself a possible future of renovated institutions and a regenerated state, and burns with the longing to realize his aspirations, must be put under the training of Science, while Evolution is to have free course and be glorified.

The effect of these teachings, if generally accepted, cannot be doubtful. Unquestionably, the fanaticism so commonly found in alliance with reformatory movements has wrought much mischief. No one will dispute this. Fanaticism is the epidemic of our times, whether it shows itself in special reforms, in politics, in religion, or in trade. It seems to be inseparable from human affairs, and especially all high endeavors. It certainly has its uses, nor is it easy to see how the race could have advanced without it. Worldly prudence and calculation are not the highest virtues, nor the chief mainsprings of human progress. They are honored by the selfish and the time-serving quite as sincerely as by the worthier classes in society. The reformer often finds them the cousin-germans of cowardice, and the most formidable foes of that disinterestedness which animates his labors. The philosopher, too, with his broad views and many-sided tendencies, will decline to follow him. He loves the truth, and sincerely dedicates himself to its service, but is not ready to bear witness to it by great personal sacrifices. He doubts as much as he believes, and has no taste for any form of martyrdom. One of the foremost writers and thinkers of our time tells us that profound thought, if thoroughly honest and conscientious, is deplorably apt to sap the foundations and impair the strength of our moral as well as intellectual convictions. The thinkers of the world are not its saviors. "The tree of knowledge is not that of life." "Enthusiasm," says Emerson, "is the leaping lightning, not to be measured by the horse-power of the understanding." The truth is, that real social progress is always accomplished by imperfectly aspiring toward a perfect ideal; and in this work the faculty of imagination has the chief share. It has been well said that if you destroy this faculty, the condition of man will become as stationary as that of the brutes. Without the fanaticism of self-sacrifice which the imagination kindles, our civilization would be hopelessly dwarfed and mutilated. The fanaticism of the early Christians was the soil in which their faith took root; and the simple and sublime doctrines of the new religion, which now bear witness to its truth, were floated down the centuries on the errors and misconceptions of its disciples. Without the impelling fanaticism of Luther and his collaborators, their battle against Rome would never have been fought. The founder of Quakerism paid little heed to the canons of worldly wisdom; while the fanaticism of John Woolman purged the Society of Friends of the guilt of slavery, and waked such a response in other humane hearts, in the Old World and the New, that the way was thus opened for emancipation in the British West India Islands, and the ultimate abolition of slavery in the United States. It was the fanaticism of Daniel O'Connell which achieved Catholic emancipation, and made Ireland a nation. When he began his agitation, nothing could have seemed more utterly and hopelessly impossible, according to all human calculation; but his soul was so burdened with the accumulated sorrows of his country, which his matchless eloquence set to music, that he became the liberator of Ireland by thus multiplying himself among his people. It was the fanaticism of reform which repealed the English Corn-laws in opposition to the statesmanship, the public opinion, and the educated classes of the time. If Garrison and his associates had taken counsel of the wise and sober men of America, who could see only failure and disaster in the anti-slavery agitation, the world-famous crusade of the abolitionists would never have been heard of, and the Southern negro would have been turned over to the "slow-and-sure" account of social evolution, through which "the sum of all villainies" would have been planted in every Northern State. It was the fanaticism of our fathers a century ago which achieved American independence; for no unimpassioned judgment of their undertaking could have given strength to their hopes. The chances of success were, in fact, overwhelmingly against them. Of one thing only were they sure, and that was that England had no right to bind them by laws, in the making of which they were denied any share, and that they were ready, if need be, to offer their lives as hostages to liberty. Out of the fanaticisms of Fourier, St. Simon, and Robert Owen, has come the organized struggle of labor which is now troubling the dreams of despots, compelling capital to respect it by its harsh machinery of strikes and trades-unions, and at the same time opening the way for the just and saving principle of coöperation. Christianity itself, the great seed-plot of reform, is the farthest thing possible from a system of logic, nor "was it accomplished by prize essays, Bridgewater bequests, and a minimum of four thousand five hundred a year." To the Jews it was a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness; and its doctrine of perfect self-renunciation fares little better with the philosophers and scientists of to-day.

Indeed, if reforms were to be left to thinkers and scholars, and the wise and prudent, they would never be undertaken at all. The grandest efforts of heroic virtue can only be inspired by that supreme devotion to a holy cause which amounts to a fascination, and nothing less than this can call forth the enduring admiration and perfect love of mankind. This truth is illustrated in the lives of all the world's great martyrs to liberty and high priests of reform. If no hazards are to be braved, nothing will be attempted. None of the great agitations of the world could have passed muster if they had been compelled in advance to go to trial on a cool calculation of the chances of success and the sacrifices involved. The reformer feels that if he would save his life he must be ready to lose it. He sees the particular cause he espouses with such vividness, from his mount of vision, and embraces it with such unreserved ardor, that its service is accepted as a divine command. The light which points his way casts all else into the shade. The fire within him consumes every doubt and fear which could beset the path of a cautious and considerate man. He accepts the philosophy embodied in Mr. Lincoln's motto of "one war at a time." If his mind were large enough to see all reforms in their just relationships, and coolly and impartially to estimate their real value and the difficulties of success, he would probably espouse none of them. The task would seem too large, and he would lack that intensity of conviction and concentration of zeal which alone could inspire the needed courage and self-forgetfulness. The very one-sidedness of reformers, their readiness to die for what they believe to be the truth, and that element of exaggeration which so often enters into their conceptions, thus become providential disguises, for which the world has reason to return thanks. Unquestionably, prudence and common-sense are qualities which cannot be prized too highly in the ordinary concerns of life. Science and philosophy have also their sovereign value, and have rendered inestimable service in checking the excesses and extravagances of reform; but the theory which would substitute social evolution for individual and organized efforts to improve society would take the poetry out of life, and reduce humanity itself to a machine. It strikes a deadly blow at personal responsibility and belittles human character, which is above all price. It lays its benumbing hand upon the divinest charities and sweetest humanities of the world, and pours contempt upon the sublimest displays of exalted virtue with which the history of the race has made us acquainted.

Nor is it any answer to the views we have presented to say that special reforms served their turn as a provisional necessity, before the principle of social evolution was discovered, but are now to be thrust aside as the outgrown garments of childhood. On the contrary, we believe there never was a time when signal efforts and sacrifices for human welfare were more urgently demanded than now. The social progress already achieved only points the way to new duties and wider fields of labor. The discussion and settlement of one question only reveals its relations to others, which logically follow. In the remote future a time may come, through the tolls and struggles of humanity, when the work of reform will end in universal conformity to the moral law; but that millennial day is rather too far off to vex us with its interests. Our duty is with "the living present"; and who believes it safe to hand over the great problems of society to-day to the cold and relentless law of development? Look, for example, at our current politics. The issues which divide our great parties are as undiscoverable as they were in the year 1852. Neither of them dares face the real questions which most deeply concern the people, and upon which alone party organizations can be justified. Respecting the vital questions of finance and the tariff, each agrees that in particular States and congressional districts its leaders may proclaim such doctrines as will be most likely to secure local ascendancy, and thus to make its pretended "principles" the foot-ball of party success. Even their national platforms pipe the same music through different words. It has been aptly observed that half the Democrats are good Republicans, and half the Republicans are good Democrats. Their antagonisms are simply a memory and a habit, and yet party loyalty is intensified just as the uselessness of party machinery becomes more and more evident. Their heaven is power, and each is striving to reach it by despicable makeshifts and stale appeals to its traditions. We have reached one of those seasons of moral stagnation which follow revolutionary periods, and sometimes threaten the very existence of free government. By a sort of universal understanding, the word politics has become the synonym of "jockeyship." Its higher and real meaning is practically forgotten, if not openly laughed at. The old slavery question introduced conscience into our public affairs. It reached down to the very foundations of government, and touched the great springs of our national life. Heart and brain went forth in the glad service of a great cause, and the spirit of reform was in the air. Men of the most commonplace characters were so lifted up and ennobled by the struggle that the whole land seemed ablaze with the fires of a moral revolution. We believe the hour has struck for another revival, and that it should now be the mission of the reformer to rouse the popular conscience from its deadly slumber, and inspire the conduct of public affairs with the great moralities which dignify private life. He should resolve, with all his might, to divinize instead of diabolize public life, and that the word politics shall no longer stand for venality and pelf, but the application of great and enduring principles to the public well-being. He should insist that political knaves and traders shall be sent to the rear, and their places supplied by men who really believe in God, in humanity, and in rectitude. And, as the necessary preliminary to all this, he should forthwith declare war to the death against the despotism of the caucus, and hail the independent voter as the anointed political Messiah on whom we are to believe.

But some one may ask us to be more specific, and to name some of the special reforms which yet demand attention. One of them presents itself in the financial problem. To the present generation, finance is a new issue in American politics. It is altogether unfamiliar to the customary thought of the people, because the course of our politics for more than a quarter of a century has steadily turned in other directions. The protracted and absorbing controversy respecting African slavery necessarily diverted attention from economic questions, while the war which finally swept slavery away left in its track a paper-money problem scarcely less fearful than that of the rebellion itself. Financial knowledge is now the demand of the hour; for, if financial quackery is allowed to take its place, national bankruptcy and irretrievable dishonor may be the result. There is but one way out of our dilemma, and we shall be obliged to pursue it, even should it involve as thorough an overhauling of the whole question as that through which the country was finally prepared to grapple with the slavery issue and to settle it forever. Why is the question of our currency now involved in so hopeless a muddle? Why are so many of our politicians, in dealing with it, so fearfully afflicted with mental vertigo? Why do they lead us into such a wilderness of metaphysics, and spread before us such a famine of ideas? How shall we explain their frequent somersaults, and their marvellous performances in "ground and lofty tumbling"? It is not that the question is an inscrutable one, but it has not been considered. Until quite recently it has not found its way into our politics at all, since the old issue respecting a national bank was settled. What we need is a national education in the elements of financial knowledge, and we should be glad to see this begin in our common schools. Indeed, some of our great party leaders and latter-day statesmen seem to need this knowledge quite as much as the rank and file of the people. If it were possible, the horn-book of finance should be placed in their hands, and they should be taught, as speedily as possible, the definition of money; that something cannot be made out of nothing by an act of Congress; that real money must be dug out of the earth, and cannot be obtained by printing any denomination of it on paper; that a dollar is a silver or gold coin of the value of one hundred cents, and not any fraction of this sum, nor a mere promise to pay a dollar, which can be discharged by another promise; that a paper currency, irredeemable in gold or silver, has proved a curse to every country that has tried it, and that any scheme for relieving the indebtedness of individuals or nations without payment is a violation of the command, "Thou shalt not steal." Undoubtedly, many questions in political economy as yet remain unsettled, but there are certain elementary principles of finance which are as well established as any facts of physical science; and, if they had been well taught in our schools, the men who are now preying upon the popular ignorance and disturbing the peace of the country would have been more worthily employed.—North American Review, September-October, 1878.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

THE MISSION OF FREE RELIGION.

The services of the Unitarian Church, yesterday forenoon, were under the charge of the pastor, the Rev. Wm. J. Potter. The discourse on the occasion consisted of a lecture by Prof. Felix Adler, of the "New York Society for Ethical Culture."

Prof. Adler said the one thing needful is absolute frankness. They say that free religion is cold, and leaves life devoid of comfort. If all they charge were true, we must still accept it. Religion is the science of sincerity. It can tolerate within its own borders nothing that is insincere. The so-called conflict between science and religion is now engaging the earnest attention of all reflecting minds.

We should distinguish between the religions and religion. There is no conflict between science and religion, however greatly certain forms of religion, now dominant, may suffer at the hands of science. Science rejects the miraculous. The laws of Nature remain unbroken. The order of the cosmos shall not be disturbed. The planets swing through their orbits; the islands of the constellations swim through the oceanic immensities of space; they follow their unchanging law. Upon the assumption of Nature's constancy depends the certainty of all our knowledge, the reasonableness of all our actions, the safety and sanity of our lives. Science rejects revelation. We can understand that only which we might have discovered ourselves by observation and reflection. To understand is to reproduce; but we can reproduce only what we might have produced in the first instance, had time and opportunity been allowed us. The theory of revelation therefore involves a contradiction in terms. For either we should have reached the truths revealed to us of ourselves, and then revelation is superfluous,—or we have no intellectual organ wherewith to produce them; and then neither could we assimilate them. They would be to us a strange language, devoid of meaning and utterly useless. Science rejects the claims of what is offered to us as the Book of Revelation. Historical criticism assigns a very large portion of the Biblical narrative to the domain of myth and legend. It points to the questionable morality of certain passages of the Scripture; to the action of the Deity as reported in the last of Samuel; to the slaughter of seven sons of Saul by King David, in honor of God; to the commandment of human sacrifice in Leviticus. It makes clear that the Bible cannot be considered inspired; that it is not a book but a literature, containing parts of unequal merit,—some gross and worthless, others of transcendent and undying beauty. Science has effected a complete change in the theory of life, which is likely to produce a revolution in our habits and mode of living. It is not the question of the existence of Deity nor of personal immortality that will divide us. We all know that we are not mere wind-falls from the tree of Time. We all trust in the final triumph of righteousness. We also know that deep humility of spirit becomes us, and a disposition to ask less for ourselves; and that to confide in the inevitable that it is wise is the truest and noblest faith. The question of prayer marks the true dividing line between the old world of thought and the new. A wide gulf lies between those who pray in the hope that their petitions will be answered, and those who do not. When your only child is sick, even unto death, you pray—if you pray at all—not because of any reflex action on yourselves; but you pray to have the gift of this child preserved to you. To pray in this sense we must believe in miracles. Under the reign of natural law, man appears to have no consolation left to him. But there is another law higher than that of Nature, which we create, even in acting it out. In this we discover the pledge of the divine mission to which man is called. The infinity of the stellar depths dwindles before the infinity of the moral idea, by which we are made free from the confining fetters of mechanism, and our mounting spirit rises to be a partner of the divine. We are world-builders, sent to construct the world of perfect justice, which is not, but is only becoming; which lives only in the demands of conscience and the visions of the prophets who interpret them. The fulfillment of this task gives a solemnity and a sublime dignity to human life, and makes it holy, though it cannot always make it happy.

The duty of free religion is to apply the eternal law of righteousness to the particular unrighteousness of our age; to seize the moral leadership of the times which the churches are allowing to escape them; to draw a new bond and establish a new fellowship among its adherents for the realization of finer and loftier forms of virtue than the outside community cares to cultivate. Free religion must head the movement for social regeneration; and by impressing their rights and duties both on the rich and poor, become the peacemaker between opposing classes.

By the humanity that is in it, every great religion has triumphed. It was not Buddha's doctrine of Nirvana that attracted his followers, but the fact that he mingled with the lowly; that he broke down the castes of earth; that he said, "My law is a law of grace for all men; my law is like the sky, which encompasseth all,—the rich and the poor, the old and the young, the high and the low." It was not the dogma of the Christ, but the humanity of Christ, by which Christianity triumphed. It was the humility of the Master, the simplicity of his teachings, his tender sympathy with the afflicted, that drew the hearts to him.

The lecturer closed with these words: "I sometimes think that I can see that wondrous man, Jesus, the Nazarene, as he treads the realms of the spirit land. His face is pale; his look is weary; he turns away as clouds of incense rise to him from a thousand altars. His wounds bleed! 'They bleed,' he says, 'for those who call themselves by my name have crucified me anew these eighteen hundred years.' Under their stony sepulchres they have buried him; by their lifeless pomp they deride him: the dead Christ they worship, but the living Christ they have denied. And so a new uprising must come for larger righteousness, and a new ideal must vivify the withered hearts, and a new gospel must be preached once more to the poor, and the weary and heavy-laden."—New Bedford Mercury, Sept. 30.

WENDELL PHILLIPS ON THE CHINESE QUESTION.

The general interest excited by the publication in the Chronicle of the opinions of Benjamin F. Butler and Jeremiah S. Black upon the Chinese question induced a gentleman of this city to write to Wendell Phillips, not as a lawyer, but as a well-known champion of the laboring-men, and to invite an expression of his opinion upon the topic. Mr. Phillips' attention was called to the views taken by the two jurists above mentioned, and, after a brief period for reflection, he has returned the following reply, which has been handed us for publication. It will be seen that Mr. Phillips does not enter into the legal merits of the case, but contents himself with a flat contradiction of Judge Black's law, and then proceeds with his well-known vigor to review the whole subject. The letter is as follows:—

"BOSTON, Sept. 5, 1878.

"Dear Sir.—I read the slip you sent me, stating Judge Black's views on the Chinese question. I do not accept his law. Any State 'regulation' which violates a United States treaty is void. No one but a secessionist would question it. As to the general subject—Chinese immigration—I dissent entirely from the opinions entertained on the Pacific coast. Indeed, I detest the shallow, heartless, and narrow views taken there on the subject.

"In the first place, I have no fear of the Chinese coming here in such numbers as even temporarily to disturb our welfare or the character of our institutions. Nations emigrate gradually,—never in tens of millions at a time. History and common sense both bear witness against the possibility of it.

"Secondly, all the millions, from any race that will or can come here, are sorely needed to fill up the vast wastes in our possessions between Omaha and the Pacific. The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; and we have no right to shut a man out of any vacant lot which he needs to earn his bread.

"The Chinese are a painstaking, industrious, and marvellously capable people. Statesmanship and political economy, as well as Christianity, bid us welcome such help in subduing the continent—not violently to thrust them out. That we, who fled here only two centuries ago, should refuse the Chinese a place, is monstrous. But that the Irish, who only fifty or thirty years ago came here and took shelter under institutions already established, should use the rights we have shared with them to oppress and torment the Chinese, is shameful inconsistency; another instance of how often the persecuted are themselves the first to persecute. Shame on the Irishman who, after his country's four centuries of protest and rebellion, borrows of England the self-same infamous and hateful weapons to use them against the Chinese! If so sad and wicked an act could be the subject of mirth, the whole civilized world would see it as the most ridiculous inconsistency. But a deeper feeling, that of detestation and abhorrence, is the mood of every honest man, and one needs the masterly sarcasm and rebuke of O'Connell fitly to describe it.

"Very respectfully yours,

"WENDELL PHILLIPS."

CLERICALISM DESPERATE.

There is no party in France that has contested the triumph of the Republic with more persistency and bitterness than the Clerical party, and none which is so chagrined and embarrassed by the continual triumphs which the Republic has made. During the severe struggle which culminated—though, unluckily, it cannot be said to have ended—in the elections of last year, Clericalism was the life and soul of the motley opposition to the Republicans. The strengthening of the Church, the maintenance of legal and administrative barriers against the advances of the modern spirit of freedom,—these were the sole objects for which Bonapartists, Legitimists, Orléanists, and the nondescript clan known as MacMahonists were united in working. To keep the direction and subvention of the Church under Roman influence, to prevent the rescue of education from the hands of ecclesiastics, to secure to the Church the active sympathy of the Government in its domestic and foreign policy,—these were aims which all the anti-Republican factions held in common. It was only a chance whether a conservative success would set up the Empire again or would pave the way for a monarchy, or would give the Marshal-President a longer and more secure tenure of power; but, whichever of these it would have done, it was perfectly sure that it would have immensely reinforced the Roman Catholic Church, and the partisans of the Church are proportionately vexed and disheartened by the complete failure of the alliance and by the general disintegration that has followed it.

Nor is the situation of the Clerical party reassuring, apart from the reverses which it has met in its political combinations. The same forces which operated upon the public mind to make sterile the political alliance with the Church are undermining the foundations of clerical influence in the community. We are not of those who expect to see the Church of Rome dethroned suddenly or easily from the sway which it has so long and so skilfully and earnestly exercised in France; but there are abundant signs that its hold on the people is loosening. Among the latest and most important of these is the appearance of a recently-published pamphlet, entitled The Great Peril of the Church of France in the Nineteenth Century. The author is the Abbé Emile Bougaud, Vicar-General of the Diocese of Orleans, of which the famous Mgr. Dupanloup is the bishop. M. Bougaud is one of the most active and well-known of the Catholic clergy, and his promotion to a bishopric has been frequently mentioned. The subject of his pamphlet is the difficulty of recruiting the priesthood in France, a difficulty which he says presents the question, whether "we shall continue to have enough priests at least to save the souls which have remained faithful to us; I dare not say to reconquer those who have left us and to regain France, which is escaping from us." He mourns the abandonment of sacerdotal functions by the higher classes, and adds:—

"There are other classes withdrawing from us. Those powerful rural populations, hitherto so faithful to the Church, which, sixty years since, gave her that grand clergy of which it was said that it was the first of the world—these, too, are deserting the pathway to the sanctuary. The evil extends beyond the possibility of denial. It invades all. The result is a singular enfeebling of the Church of France—a sort of paralysis. Her existence is not yet in danger, but her organs only half-perform their functions. Her action is languishing, lessening, enervated."

The figures by which M. Bougaud sustains his statements are furnished by the various bishops. By these it seems that there are only twenty dioceses in France which are even nearly equipped; there are twenty which lack from fifteen to twenty priests each, or a total of four hundred and fifty; there are thirty-six which lack more than thirty priests each, or a total of more than one thousand and eighty. Of the latter, Paris is one. The total number deficient is not given, but it is at least in excess of three thousand. As to the seminaries relied on to furnish new priests, the Abbé cites four in which the average attendance has fallen off from seven hundred and thirty-five to two hundred and eighty-nine. The future, therefore, looks darker than the present. "The malady," says the Abbé, "spreads everywhere—here with more violence, there more slowly, but scarcely any region escapes it. Sometimes it seems to abate for some years; then it revives with vigor. It invades even the most religious dioceses. Every revolution brings it on again: 1890 was fatal; the war of 1870 still more so. At every shock we lose ground."

Nor is it in the priesthood alone that the Church feels the popular indifference. The Abbé Bougaud complains that the attendance at the churches has so fallen off that it is no longer possible to keep up the ancient form of worship even in the cities. He says:

"It must not be concealed, the old net of the city parish in a great number of cities yields less and less to the fishers of men. A high mass, where the men are found only scattered here and there among the women, and, by their unfamiliarity with the things of God, know not what to do; vespers, where the choristers alone take part, where even the women show no interest, and come only to the benediction: all this solemn worship, so beautiful in the seventeenth century, which came down through the eighteenth already hardly understood, scarcely retains life to-day. Men no longer pay any attention to these services, and seldom come to them."

The author, moreover, laments bitterly the lack of literary effort on the part of the Church to contend with the tendencies of modern thought.

"Do you not see," he writes, "the sciences which on every side are in insurrection against the Church? Do not geology and astronomy vie with each other in sapping the recital of Genesis? Are not biology, paleontology, and the study of language making desperate efforts to overthrow the dogmas of the creation and the unity of man? In all the higher circles, are not magistrates, advocates, professors, business men, poisoned by objections for which they can find no answer? Have we one journal, one review, which throws light on all such questions? And why have we none? The teachers are wanting."

These are facts which have long been patent to impartial observers, but they have hitherto been vehemently denied by the Catholic organs. They tend to show that the Roman Church belongs to the ignorant past, and that it is relatively weak,—growing weaker in the presence of the forces of enlightenment at work in the present, and sure to work more effectively in the future. We have them, in the book of M. Bougaud, definitely stated and proved by a man of high standing in the Church, and of unquestionable devotion to her interests. It is not singular that in the face of such facts the Clerical party in France should be desperate.—New York Times, Sept. 14.

FINE ART IN BANKRUPTCY.

THE BUSINESS OF PROVIDING CHEAP "ASSETS" FOR GENTLEMEN WHO WISH TO COMPROMISE THEIR DEBTS—A NEW YORK "ENTERPRISE."

The Herald of Tuesday printed in its financial column the following advertisement:—

IF YOU CONTEMPLATE BANKRUPTCY YOU CAN procure $48,000 good, genuine, regular securities; no more of same kind exist; have never been offered; terms to suit contingency. Address, confidentially, ATTORNEY, box 112, Herald office.

A reporter of the World, contemplating, not bankruptcy, but a good story, answered the advertisement under an assumed name and received the following reply:—

MEMORANDUM.

HENRY H. HADLEY, ATTORNEY AND COUNSELLOR-AT-LAW, BROADWAY, N.Y., August 16, 1878.

Dear Sir,—Your favor referring to bankruptcy, dated 14th instant, was duly received and contents noted. If convenient please call on me to-morrow at 11 A.M., or from 2 to 3 P.M., here at my office, that we may talk the matter over as requested. I remain confidentially yours, H. H. HADLEY, Attorney.

The reporter called on Mr. Hadley at his office and found him busily engaged with two elderly and eminently respectable-looking gentlemen. After waiting some time the reporter was ushered into the lawyer's office. Upon representing himself as the special partner of a firm of hatmakers who were about to fail, he received the greatest and most respectful attention.

"How much do you owe?" Mr. Hadley asked. "About $75,000," was the reply. "How much assets have you got?" "About $20,000." "What have you done with the rest?" "Spent it." "Who?" "I and my partners." "How much have you drawn?" "About $30,000." "How much did you put in the firm?" "Twenty thousand dollars; that is, $12,000 cash and $8,000 I still owe." "Ah! Is your book-keeper all right?" "He is." Can he so change the books as to make it appear that you drew all this $12,000, and that, in return for it and as security for the $8,000 you owe, you gave them $50,000 of securities without further recourse to you?" "He can." "Will he?" "He will, sure." "That'll do," said Mr. Hadley; "my client has $50,000 worth of Southern land bonds; they are worth nothing in the market; they may (with a smile) some day be worth their face value. They are for lands granted to him on the Chattanooga and Cincinnati Railroad. He will sell them for $1000 cash." "Good," replied the reporter; "but how am I to show where I got them from?"

"He shall give you a bill of sale; you shall turn over to him some stock in exchange,—he will furnish it for you,—and you give him the $1000 besides. His bill of sale will be dated back as far as you like, so as to make the whole transaction look genuine; and of course you explain to your creditors that your unfortunate land speculation has led to your failure. You give them a few thousand in cash, then bonds and what stock you may have on hand, and go on your way rejoicing. Twig?"

The reporter did twig. He asked how this sort of thing would stand the scrutiny of a court. "Why, first-rate," was the reply. "We did it in Philadelphia a few days ago,—turned in stock like that, worth nothing, and Judge Cadwalader ordered it put in the schedule of assets as worth 98 cents on the dollar. All you want is to have your book-keeper with you. If he don't understand how to fix his books, let him get new ones for the past two or three months, and understand that, with the $12,000 you have drawn and the $8,000 you owed on the partnership, you owed the firm $20,000. To secure them you gave them $50,000 in Southern land bonds, which they accepted without further recourse to you. Unfortunately the bonds have turned out worthless and you fail. See?"

"But," said the reporter, "won't I be asked how I came to buy such securities?"

"No," was the reply; "or you can refuse to answer. You bought them in a legitimate transaction, as the transfer I will give you will show. You gave them to a third party, and then your share in the business ends. But," he added, "we must be careful to cover our tracks all along. I shall require you to engage an attorney I will recommend to you, as I do not want any shyster to come in and demand the return of the $1000 from my client."

"Oh, that's all right," the reporter assented; "that we will fix when I bring my partner to see you."

Mr. Hadley added: "You need not be alarmed at all. This thing is done every day. Why, those gentlemen you saw just now are clients of mine—men on the stock exchange—whom I have put through. Trust to me and I'll see you all right. But remember that you must have your books show all right, your securities on hand, and your stories learned by heart. If you conclude to take these bonds I guess I will have the transfer made by a man I know here, who used to be on the London Stock Exchange, where he failed for $1,000,000. He is a bright fellow, and they can't get anything out of him on the witness-stand."

It appears from inquiries made by the reporters of the World that the business in which Mr. Hadley is engaged is followed by other people. A well-known Wall Street broker said yesterday: "There is no doubt that a great deal of business is done in the way of buying cheap or worthless stocks and holding them for use by intending bankrupts who want to make a show of assets. There are men on the street, for example, who confine themselves to transactions of this kind. When Erie or Wabash or Hannibal and St. Joe, or any of the stocks that have fallen very low, are down at the lowest ebb they buy them; if they rise, all right; they make a profit; if they do not rise they sell them for something more than they paid for them, to intending bankrupts, who put them in their exhibits as assets, and claim to have bought them at a high figure, and to have failed because of their decline. The transfer papers or bills of sale are so manipulated as to date back the purchase of the bonds to the time when they were quoted high, and the creditors are completely fooled; the newspapers report 'another failure caused by speculation on Wall Street,' and the bankrupt goes on his way rejoicing."—N. Y. World.

A RELIGIOUS "HOSS-RACE."—A church in Wisconsin, finding its finances in that deplorable condition bordering on insolvency, and seeing the vanity of such earthly expectations as are built on the delusive hope realizing from collections, decided to adopt the "hoss-race," not exactly as a means of grace, but as the most feasible plan for gathering lucre wherewith to pay debts and defray incidental expenses. A dozen nags were entered, the people turned out en masse, and the gate-money was enough to make a noble contribution to the treasury of the Lord. In short, the scheme was a pronounced success financially, but it disrupted the church. Dea. Hines got angry because his horse was beaten by Dea. Hall's mare. The pastor, who acted as one of the judges, took sides with Dea. Hall and the mare; the quarrel spread, until the parson wandered forth seeking a new vineyard, and the voice of prayer and praise was hushed in the sanctuary.—Springfield Republican.

SONNET ON NIGHT.

BY I. BLANCO WHITE.

Mysterious Night! when our first parent knew
Thee from report divine, and heard thy name,
Did he not tremble for this lovely frame,
This glorious canopy of light and blue?
Yet 'neath a curtain of translucent dew,
Bathed in the rays of the great setting flame,
Hesperous with the host of heaven came;
And lo! creation widened in man's view.
Who could have thought such darkness lay concealed Within thy beams, O Sun? Or who could find,
Whilst fly, and leaf, and insect stood revealed,
That to such countless orbs thou mad'st us blind?
Why do we, then, shun death with anxious strife?
If Light can thus deceive, wherefore not Life?

A CARD.

We, the undersigned, Directors of the National Liberal League, offer ourselves as candidates for reelection at the Second Annual Congress of the League, on the following platform of principles:—

1. The right of absolute individual freedom of thought, of speech, and of the press, on all political, religious, social, or other questions, and the right of being wholly uninterfered with by the courts, no matter what opinions as such may be advocated or promulgated.

2. The right and duty of Congress and State Legislatures to pass, and the right and duty of the National and State courts to enforce, laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails; provided, that the offence known as "obscenity" shall be so strictly defined in the statutes as to render impossible the prosecution or punishment of any one for the expression of his honest opinions on any subject.

3. The flagrant wrong of intrusting the execution of the laws for the suppression of obscene literature to any official or officials who shall not scrupulously confine their action within the limits here clearly defined.

And we decline to be candidates for reelection if the principles of the above platform shall fail to be approved by the National Liberal League at this Congress.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.
WILLIAM H. HAMLIN, Secretary.
J. A. J. WILCOX, Treasurer.
D. G. CRANDON, Chair. Fin. Comm.

PROFESSOR SUMNER, of Yale College, at a public meeting in New Haven before the late election, declared that the attempt to force sectarianism on the public schools is actually endangering the whole school system. Nothing could be truer. Professor Sumner is not a radical, but he is wiser than many who are.

THE NEW YORK Independent is astonished quite unnecessarily: "It is singular that in a Christian country like Austria a man should be fined for selling a copy of the New Testament. What kind of a Christian religion is it that opposes the circulation of a book containing the record and revelation of the doctrines of that religion?" We are not acquainted with the facts of this case. But we conjecture that the Austrian government has taken its ethics from the Independent, decided to exterminate every "rat" who is caught circulating obscene literature, and applied the same law to the above-mentioned man which the Independent is glad to see applied to Mr. Heywood. If Judge Clark's ruling is correct, that any book must be held to be obscene which contains a single obscene passage, then the New Testament itself comes under that condemnation, as Sir George Jessel declared on the bench only a few months ago.

It is difficult to see how the action of the Syracuse Congress could be more completely "forestalled" than by setting afloat such injurious rumors as these: "NEW YORK, September 30.—The Sun says that the Directors of the National Liberal League have called a convention or congress, to be held at Syracuse, October 26, for the purpose of nominating candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States in 1880. H. L. Green, of Salamanca, Chairman of the Executive Committee of this organization, informs us that the League proposes to make a serious canvass in 1880, and to run electoral tickets in nearly every State. He furnishes us with a list of some of the names most prominently mentioned for the principal nomination. Among them appear those of Colonel Bob Ingersoll, the Hon. George W. Julian, Ellizar Wright, Benjamin F. Butler, James Parton, and B. F. Underwood. We are also informed that the National Liberal League is considering the expediency of putting a lady in nomination for the Vice-Presidency."

THE RELATIONS OF GOVERNMENT TO MORALITY AND RELIGION.

Among the objections brought against the retention of the laws designed to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, these have been urged as of peculiar force: that "government has nothing to do with morality as such," and that, "if government has the right to suppress immoral publications, it has an equal right to suppress irreligious publications, and thus to suppress freedom of the press on religious questions." Having made last week a general comparison of the "repeal" and "reform" positions, we propose this week to consider these two objections.

First of all, let us examine and determine in a large way, without attending to the minor distinctions easily established by a subtle analysis, the mutual relations of government, morality, and religion. With a clear and consistent conception of these three great facts, as actually related in human society, it will be comparatively easy to arrive at a rational solution of the problem proposed.

1. Government is an institution which has its origin in the unavoidable conflict of individual interests and passions in human society; it is a device for reducing the evils of this conflict within the smallest possible limits, and preventing it from growing into a disturbance of the public order or peace. Good men are often arrayed in opposition against each other through the fallibility of their judgments; bad men are often tempted to aggression against their neighbors through the violence of their passions or the selfishness of their ends. Government (we now consider free democratic government alone) has no other basis than the natural necessity of settling these antagonisms without permitting recourse to private war, and adopts the necessary policy of enforcing the will of the majority in the form of laws. The only alternative of government is anarchy,—that is, universal lawlessness. Government, if just and wise, is simply the enforced will of the majority that every man shall be free to do as he pleases, provided he does not violate the equal rights of his fellows; and it enforces this will by punishing certain gross and well-defined violations of equal rights as crimes. It cannot punish all such violations; they must be of a certain magnitude in order to be brought within the cognizance of the government. But the essence of a crime is, that it is a violation of the equal rights of somebody, committed in defiance of laws which have been enacted by the will of the majority for the protection of the equal rights of all.

It is very plain, therefore, that government (1) deals with human conduct so far only as it affects other human beings; and (2) deals with it so far only as it invades their chief equal rights. Government, as such, has nothing to do with human conduct in its normal aspects; it simply respects and protects individual freedom; it only interferes with conduct when conduct becomes abnormal or criminal. It does not reward acts of virtue; it simply punishes crimes. The State, represented by the majority, enacts laws on its own natural authority as law-giver, for the purpose of protecting society from dissolution and anarchy; but its authority extends only to the prohibition and punishment of crimes—i.e., acts which endanger society's very existence by destroying that equilibrium of individual rights on which all social stability depends.

2. The province of morality is much more extensive than that of government, which, however, it includes within itself. Conscience is the moral law-giver; the law of right and wrong, which it enacts, and which it also enforces by penalties of its own, covers all human conduct; that is, the entire activity of the human will. Conscience recognizes the necessary natural existence of rights and duties, resulting from the mere co-existence of equal individuals in a state of society; it commands universal respect for rights, and universal performance of duties; it not only prohibits those gross violations of rights which the State prohibits under the name of crimes, but also prohibits many other violations of rights which the State cannot reach.

All offences against the laws of a just, free, and democratic State are also offences against the law of conscience; but the law of conscience penetrates those obscurer regions of conduct which are impenetrable by the clumsy external agencies of government, and proclaims the existence of rights and duties in matters with which government cannot possibly deal. For instance, the State punishes certain breaches of contracts as criminal; but conscience punishes all disregard of promises as wrong. The law of morality extends over the whole of human conduct, not only over such conduct as affects the legal rights of others, but over such conduct as affects their rights of all kinds; nay, it extends over such conduct as affects mainly the individual himself, with reference to what John Stuart Mill called the "self-regarding" virtues and vices. Wherever the human will has power to act at all, there conscience makes its law supreme, accusing or excusing, and enforcing its authority by penalties from which the fleetest fugitive can never escape. It commands all virtues and all acts of virtue; it forbids all vices and all acts of vice. Offences against the law of conscience, including both crimes and all other violations of the equal rights of others, and including even those subtler offences which are apparently (not really) only violations of one's own moral integrity, are all grouped together under the general head of immoralities. Conscience reigns over the entire world of conduct, as that supreme authority which gives law to the human will, however, whenever, and wherever exercised. As offences against the law of the State are known as crimes, so offences against the law of conscience are known as immoralities; and the latter term covers and includes the former. Not all immoralities are crimes; but all crimes are immoralities, and forbidden alike by the law of the State and the law of conscience.

3. The province of religion is still more extensive than those of government and of morality; it includes these within itself, and much besides.

No less than government and morality, religion rests on the great fact of law. It matters nothing whether religion be conceived as supernatural or natural,—as theistic or atheistic; in all cases, it affirms a supreme and all-comprehensive law, whose province is the entire world of human consciousness. Supernatural religion represents this law as the will of God; natural religion represents it as at once the law of Nature and the law of God's own being; atheistic religion represents it as simply the law of Nature. But, in each and every form in which religion has appeared as a fact of human history or experience, it affirms a universally comprehensive or cosmic law, of which the law of conscience and the law of the State are but elements and parts. This law of the universe embraces not only the world of human conduct (i.e. all exercise of the human will), but also the higher and more interior worlds of human feeling, motive, purpose, thought, aspiration, etc. It commands something more than virtue; it commands sweet, pure, and lofty affections, noble and high motives, constant and enthusiastic devotion of the entire outward and inward life to the true, the beautiful, and the good, as the supreme interests of the cosmos itself. In a word, it creates that Ideal of Perfection which ever flies in advance of our attainment, yet ever allures us onward and upward by the attraction of its own glorious and divine beauty.

Now offences against this law of the Universe, this law of the Ideal which religion reports as the highest known law of Nature herself, are known, not as crimes or as immoralities, but as sins. All depravations of purpose, of motive, of affection, of aspiration, of endeavor, are sins; they do not become immoralities until they eventuate themselves in wrong conduct; and they do not become crimes until they eventuate themselves in positive acts forbidden by civil law. But, just as all crimes are also immoralities, so all crimes and immoralities are also sins. The higher law includes the lower; all infractions of the lower law are also infractions of the higher.

4. We are now in a position to discern clearly the mutual relations of government, morality, and religion. These three stand to each other in the relation of concentric circles, the circle of religion including that of morality, and that of morality including that of government. All three rest equally on the fact of Law. The law of religion is that of God, of Nature, or of both, interpreted to us by the Ideal of Perfection, and infractions of it are sins; the law of morality is that of Conscience, and infractions of it are immoralities; the law of government is that of the State, and infractions of it are crimes.

Thus—

Government rests on the law of the State, made known by the will of the majority expressed in the common organic, and statute law;

Morality rests on the law of Conscience, made known by the perception of rights and duties in the moral consciousness of each individual;

Religion rests on the law of God, the law of Nature, or the law of God and Nature both (according to the view taken of religion itself), made known by the Ideal of Perfection in the religious consciousness of the individual and the race;

And these three laws may be symbolized by three concentric circles, the second including the first, and the third including the first and second.

Also—

Government prohibits crimes;
Morality prohibits immoralities, including crimes;
Religion prohibits sins, including crimes and all other immoralities;

And these three classes of offences may be equally symbolized by three concentric circles, as before.

With this preliminary statement of the mutual relations of government, morality, and religion, which we think must commend itself to every reflective mind as at least substantially true, it will not be difficult to meet fully and fairly the two objections proposed for consideration.

1. "Government has nothing to do with morality as such."

This is true as far as it goes. Government cannot assume to prohibit or punish immoralities as such; it can prohibit or punish ONLY SUCH IMMORALITIES AS ARE ALSO CRIMES, and on the express ground that they are crimes. Will any one deny that murder, arson, burglary, robbery, theft, adultery, libel, etc., are immoralities as well as crimes? Or that government, as such, exists for any other purpose than to protect society from these particular immoralities by treating them as crimes? There are countless other immoralities with which government has indeed nothing to do; but these particular immoralities are of so grave, violent, and gross a nature that they can and must be dealt with by law. Hence, while it is perfectly true that government has nothing to do with immoralities in general, and cannot condemn them on the ground that they are immoralities, it is also true that the crimes against which it is the special function of government to protect society do actually belong to that general class. The law of conscience condemns crimes because they are immoralities; but the law of the State condemns them simply because they are crimes. The error in the objection we are considering lies in the unconscious assumption that the province of government is wholly outside the province of morality,—that the two provinces do not at all overlap or coincide,—in a word, that crimes are not immoralities at all! On the contrary, every real crime is an offence against the law of conscience as well as against the law of the State, and is therefore an immorality as well as a crime. This cannot be, and will not be, seriously disputed. The objection is only one of those loose and shallow generalizations into which even good intellects may occasionally fall in moments of inadvertence; but it is quite certain that no good intellect will defend it in the face of the facts.

2. "If government has the right to suppress immoral publications, it has an equal right to suppress irreligious publications, and thus to suppress freedom of thought and the press on religious questions."

Nobody, so far as we are aware, claims that government has the right to suppress all immoral publications. Certainly we do not claim that. If we did, we should unhesitatingly approve Mr. Heywood's imprisonment, for we consider his pamphlet one of the trashiest and most immoral in tendency that was ever published. But the ground we take is, that any one has the right to discuss, advocate, or promulgate any opinions whatever, however immoral they may be or appear in their tendencies, since freedom of the press must cover the whole field of intellectual liberty, and since the propagandism of mere opinions, honestly held and honestly promulgated, is no crime at all. Opinions as such, being the necessary and involuntary products of thinking, are neither crimes, immoralities, nor sins; and therefore they cannot be condemned either by government, morality, or religion. If wrong opinions grow out of vicious habits or acts (as they may), those habits or acts should be condemned, but the opinions as such cannot be. Thought must be free; the utterance of it must be free; the publication of it must be free; and, if erroneous or immoral in its tendencies, it must be counteracted, not by law, but by better thought. Not all immoral publications, therefore, but only such publications as are criminally immoral, should be suppressed by government; and the circulation of really obscene literature has always been, as we are informed on excellent legal authority, a crime at common law. The reason is obvious. Such literature does not appeal to thought or contain thought; it is utterly vile, and aims only to inflame and pervert the passions, and to stifle the voice of conscience and reason; it is written with the worst intentions, and circulated with the worst intentions; it has no rights; it is a gross and wicked attack upon society in its tenderest point, the character and health of its little children. A thousand immoralities in literature must be silently overlooked by the law; but this particular immorality has been adjudged a crime by the unanimous voice of mankind from time immemorial, and for reasons that cannot be overthrown.

By the same train of thought, we are led to the same conclusion respecting "irreligious publications." Really obscene publications are certainly as irreligious as they are immoral. But they are not condemned by government on either ground; they are condemned simply because they are criminal. The moment that the radical distinctions we have pointed out between crimes, immoralities, and sins are clearly understood, all grounds for fear lest the right of suppressing really obscene literature should carry the right of suppressing literature of other kinds totally vanish. Immoral publications as such are not criminal; irreligious publications as such are not criminal. No publication sent forth with honest intent can be criminal, however immoral or irreligious its tendencies and influences may be. A chasm of tremendous breadth separates really obscene publications from all that are ever offered openly for sale; and a carefully drawn provision in the law itself for the protection of intellectual and literary liberty will obviate all possible danger of its being abridged.

In fine, the decisive question is this: is the circulation of really obscene publications a crime or not? This question has not been yet discussed in the least by the "repeal" party. Mankind have answered it already by making such circulation a crime at common law. We wait patiently for the appearance of some one bold enough to challenge that just and righteous judgment.

Communications.

HEYWOOD'S SENTENCE: AND LIBERTY.

AN OPEN LETTER TO J. A. J. WILCOX.

ESTEEMED FRIEND:—

It will not surprise you that I think your communication in a late number of THE INDEX inconclusive.

I have not now the time to treat this matter in a way which you will think satisfactory. But what is much more (otherwise, I would make time, for I am sensible of the grave importance of the subject), I have not yet thought enough about it or read enough upon topics likely to throw light upon the theory of liberty, to feel as sure of the value of my views as you seem to feel of yours, or even to have any views which I wish to offer as conclusions.

But I will remark upon one or two points in your communication which show that my previous article was either insufficient or misunderstood; and then, with a very brief statement touching the general subject, I shall close all I have to say at present.

It appears that more than one person has taken me as accusing Heywood of intentionally writing in a bad manner "in order to reap a pecuniary harvest." This I regret, simply because the idea was not in my mind. I do not find that you so take me; and in justice I must say that I think the charge is not to be found in my previous letter upon a fairly careful reading of it.

"My remark was, that Heywood had 'yielded to the temptation of daubing his work, or to make it sell well, and take with the uneducated and exposed.' I have not said, or even hinted nor intended to hint, that this was a pecuniary speculation. The thought in my mind was, that Heywood did not write for the better informed and trained minds, but for the untrained people (it is folly to suppose that such a piece of writing could recommend itself to a highly educated person: Abbot, for example, calls it a 'worthless thing'); that for these untutored minds, it is especially necessary that language should be temperate and sober; that of course Heywood could not afford to issue and give away his pamphlets, but they must be sold in order to be issued at all; and that he had yielded to the temptation to use a manner and style calculated to 'take' with the ignorant (and therefore the exposed) instead of the careful and sober and cool and unstimulating appeal to the reason which such minds need, but which must always limit the spread of a man or a book, because it demands the exercise of thought instead of tickling the imagination or inflaming the passions. In my whole article, I charge Heywood with nothing more than a 'recklessness' which I considered guilty; and I still consider it so. [I should think it wrong under any circumstances; but in connection with the particular matters treated by Heywood, I deem the guilt aggravated.] No matter how excellent his motives, which I do not question, it is wrong to be so little discriminating as to the means."

I place the above passage in quotation marks, because it is an extract from a private letter.

A word as to my remark that Heywood's punishment is unwise, which comes under your criticism. I mean to say that the actual punishment is unjust and any punishment would be unwise. I deem the punishment unjust, because it is excessive and disproportionate in severity. But I would admit some punishment to be just in the sense that Heywood deserves correction, because he has shown himself deliberately or recklessly unmindful of the due claim of society upon every man for a certain sobriety and cleanliness of speech. You raise the point that the conviction was shamefully illegal. Of this I am not entitled at present to form an opinion; although I think it likely, from all that I have read, that the judge on the bench presented a figure as discreditable to the cause of pure liberty as Heywood in the dock—a melancholy spectacle altogether. But be this as it may, it has no effect on the moral question of the justice of correction; that turns exclusively upon the rightful claim of society and the guiltiness of a reckless disregard of it. I can conceive of but two ways in which this point can be met so as to make even the least punishment of Heywood wrongful. It may be said, on the one hand, that the rightful claim of society does not extend so far as to cover Heywood's case; on this, good and true men may differ; and I may add, with reference to a style of remark which has swollen to unhandsome proportions of late, that I am not grateful to a friend for "grieving" over me and I pay your independence the respect of not being in the least "surprised and grieved" because you differ from me upon a matter confessedly so difficult and delicate as the adjustment of social claims and individual rights, seeing that as yet we stand only on the threshold of that great inquiry. Or, it may be said, on the other hand, that society has no rightful claims at all over the individual in moral points: this, in my view, is not only confusion and disorder, but, what is not understood so generally, the destruction of liberty itself. I am at a loss to decide whether you assent to this latter alternative.

You refer with disapprobation to alleged "rights of majorities, including the right of society to enact a moral code for the individual, its acceptance to be enforced"; but I cannot without more authority from you interpret this into the assertion of unlimited individualism. I find in your communication a vagueness with which I try in vain to be satisfied (for I love liberty as dearly as you do), and which, in my judgment, is not the sort of stuff which can grapple with this question in a manner to bring out intelligible and coherent principles. Perhaps it is for this reason that after some weeks' study of my article, you write, "you say the sentence was unwise, though not wrong"; when in truth I say expressly that it may be granted that the sentence is wrong as being too severe, and then go on to the question whether any punishment whatever would be unjust because there was no primary purpose of corrupting the reader.

But now, if I think some punishment might be just, why do I think any punishment unwise? In a general way, Mr. Abbot has answered excellently this question in his full and careful article immediately following the trial, in which he places Heywood's "worthless pamphlet" in the third of the three classes into which he divides publications affected by the discussion. The fact seems to be, that Heywood's offensiveness is not great enough for society wisely to be aware of it. All who have had any experience in government, whether domestic or political, know the frequent wisdom, and even necessity, of a resolute ignorance. One must often turn his back, determined not to see; or, having seen, to take no notice. This, in the present case (Heywood's), for the following reasons,—

1. To punish him, even slightly, makes him a martyr in the eyes of many well-meaning but unthinking people.

2. What is, perhaps, still worse, it is likely to make a martyr of him in his own eyes. In my judgment (I must say it frankly), Heywood is not one who discriminates well between himself and his cause; and in one or two letters written by him since his incarceration, which have fallen under my notice, I think I see the sprouting of an exulting sense of conspicuously suffering for the truth, which is likely to have a bad effect upon his purposes and his insight.

3. All this gives his pamphlet a currency which otherwise it never could have attained.

4. It will still further make many good and often generous but untutored persons rabid about a mistaken liberty.

5. And it will gladden and encourage the enemies of all liberty, and so stir up passions and animosities.

Throughout your communication, my friend, you treat me as a foe to "freedom of opinion." You express it thus, "My surprise and grief that you could lend your influence in justification of the disregard and violation of the principle of freedom of opinion, which has become established at a cost for which there is no measure." But this is an entire mistake, and, I take the liberty to think, a remarkable error, after my article has been "studied with care" and "pondered" for several weeks. Do I discuss Heywood's opinions anywhere? Do I denounce his opinions? and a fortiori, do I denounce him for proclaiming and supporting them? Do I find fault with him for treating (as I expressed it) "a topic of extreme delicacy and of the first moment to public morals," or for any opinion of his thereupon? No: I object only to his manner, which I hold to be a harmful and indecent manner. I can say honestly that I do not care enough about his opinion to notice it. If it began to prevail and to threaten domestic peace and public rectitude in my view, I would meet it, as I do other things, with arguments drawn from human nature and human history, and not with prisons. But I insist that society may rightfully claim certain sobrieties of conduct and manner in the proclamation of opinion; and that, when these are outraged, it depends upon many circumstances whether it be well to ignore or restrain. I believe that the preponderating sense and virtue of society is entitled to shield by force the young, ignorant, and passionate, not indeed from the knowledge or assertion of any opinions (though the persons exposed may be as little able as Heywood is to fathom the black and treacherous ooze on which this current rolls), but from the sweetening of the waters with intoxicants. I wish you would read over again Mr. Abbot's article, wherein he distinguishes between the proclamation of opinion on the one hand and decency of manner on the other. I can add nothing to that clear statement.

And yet, a word may be proper upon this matter of opinion; for in one way, anything may be opinion. The greatest abominations could be called a man's opinions. Will you shield everything under "freedom of opinion" which any man chooses to claim as his opinion? I think not. I can imagine many things which might be asserted as opinions, and which would be so asserted at once, if, by that claim, certain vile traffics could be rescued from restraint or punishment. It is common to escape this difficulty by claiming that persons who would make such claims are mentally or morally insane. But pray consider the nature of the criterion,—to wit, an assertion of opinion. Is it any more excellent to restrain a man as insane for a difference of opinion than to restrain him as a corrupter of youth for the same difference?

You ask, "Who shall be our accepted authority in such matters? Who shall be the infallible standard of decency or of doctrine?" Truly an apt question, although I do know many persons who act like "infallible standards" of the nature of liberty, at least if that may be judged infallible in its own view which never suffers a doubt. Here we come directly upon the difficulty of gradation. For example, in the lower orders of life, it is all but impossible to distinguish between animals and plants, or even to frame definitions which shall separate them. Will any one fall, on that account, to distinguish between an ox and an oak, or to act upon that perception? In colors, you may dilute a deep blue until but a faint tinge is visible, and that only to a casual, sidelong glance. Will any one, on that account, hold color-blindness to be the only philosophy of vision? Yet no human ingenuity or expression can draw a line, saying, "On this side it is all a dark shade, and on that all a light shade." Make the surface of uncertainty in shade as large as you please; the error consists in not seeing that there is an immensely larger surface, regarding which there will be no difference of opinion in the same or similar societies. It is true, my friend, that nothing human is infallible; it does not, therefore, follow that all things are to be equally held in doubt; though it does seem a fair conclusion that probably I am not more fallible in my view of what liberty forbids than you may be in your view of what it allows. Besides, let me ask you how you entertain any judgment? Do you think there is such a thing as obscene literature, and would you restrain it? If so you think, and so would act, what is your "standard of decency," your "accepted authority"? Answer me, and you have answered yourself.

One thing I observe running through your letter with much emphasis, and that is apparently a social philosophy summed up in the one word, Liberty. It was with this in mind that I said in the beginning I would close with a brief statement touching the general subject. And here, when I depart from my practical stand in the particular case in question—with which I feel at least so far content as that I have not yet repented of it—to venture upon the philosophy of liberty, even but a step or two, I must be understood to move with much greater uncertainty, and leave upon my page a much larger margin of doubt. But thus it seems to me:—

When social philosophy is summed up in the one word, Liberty, I assent to the statement so far as it implies merely that all social qualities are so intimately interwoven that perfection in one noble thing must go along with excellence in all other noble things, and that no one can thrive well unless all the others flourish also. In this way it is proper to say that liberty sums up social ethics; but with equal force, so does justice, so does reciprocity, so does love. Nay, even so does education, so does division of labor, so does commerce, so does peace; for these all depend on each other in such ways that the noble development of any implies all the others, and social happiness is epitomized in any one, and in many other things not mentioned. But, on the other hand, liberty does not sum up social philosophy, if it be meant thereby that absence of restraint is the be-all and the end-all of social reliance and security. For to my mind, liberty is wholly inconceivable, considered merely as negation of restraint, even of external and forcible restraint as always a possibility, however little occasion there might be for its exercise. Two extremes appear: In one extreme we have the one-man power: this, in theory, is the government of the wisest and best; and I am inclined to think that, if it were possible in practice to get the wisest and best, this form, with some modification, would guarantee the utmost development of personal liberty, prosperity, and happiness. For even if the wisest and best one could not be possibly so wise and good as the collective wisdom and virtue of great numbers of ordinarily good people, he might be much better than that aggregate quality which includes the collective folly and vice of large numbers of extraordinarily bad people, and of still greater swarms of selfish, cold, unearnest, and greedy people. Moreover, large bodies, even of the best, necessarily move slowly, and frequently too slowly; there are many cases in which delay is itself injustice or hardship. In the other extreme, we have total elimination of restraint held to be liberty, according to a definition lately given me. It has interested me for a long time to ask definitions of liberty when occasions offered, seeing that it is what every one speaks of and few understand. I asked a definition of a high-minded young man just graduated from Harvard, an excellent scholar and high in college rank. "Liberty," he answered, "liberty! why liberty is doing what you please." This, in the theory of its advocates, is social order without social authority; in practice it is social disintegration, and not only the destruction of liberty, but of that organic composition of social life, that subordination of parts to the whole, and that division of labor on which liberty depends. The one extreme seems to offer liberty, but in practice becomes tyranny; the other extreme seems to offer total removal of restraint, but in practice is destruction of society, and the return of the worst form of slavery,—subjugation by insensate Nature. Somewhere between the two liberty hides. If you ask me where and how to find the goddess, I must say that I have yet had no chart to guide me in that overland expedition of discovery, and I stand waiting and longing upon the borders of that Western wilderness. I leave other words, if there be others, to wiser heads, or until I shall myself grow wiser in this matter. Meantime, there is one definition of liberty which I like to repeat to myself. It is the noble saying of Hegel: "Liberty is the spirit's realization of its own nature."

J. VILA BLAKE.

QUINCY, Ill., Sept. 28.

P.S.—I cannot send off this letter without adding a word (urged thereto by admiration and affection), referring to the previous article on the same subject by S. H. Morse. I would not seem to overlook his claim to the same attention which he paid me. At first I began to write to both jointly; but this, for sundry reasons, proved impossible, and I occupied myself with your letter as being the more recent, and also as addressed personally to me. Moreover, Mr. Morse apprehended, as you have not, that I am no foe to liberty of opinion; he perceived the distinction, running through what I wrote, between proclaiming opinion and a gross manner of doing it. But since, overlooking some particular points in Mr. Morse's article, the better part of what I have written herein will serve also as my reply to the general doctrine of his communication. I hope he will allow me to leave it so. Mr. Morse and I have long disagreed utterly concerning the theory and nature of the State, and many and long are the discussions we have held thereon. I remember them with a peculiar pleasure, now that distance deprives me of the exhilaration of his company. If I should embrace his views, or he mine, whatever satisfaction might ensue, something would be lost. Love grieves to count reasons for loving.

LETTER FROM MR. WAKEMAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Your criticisms of my Faneuil Hall speech and letter, in your two last issues, have interested and pleased me much. To have the supposed difficulties ably and fully disclosed is the first step towards removing them. It seems to me that the material positions of that speech will appear sounder than ever when your objections and misapprehensions are cleared away, as I think they can be.

But as you call for public discussion, and as I am not the fortunate owner of a newspaper, I must ask you to let your readers see the counter-statement in your columns as prominently as they have the criticisms. But do not fear that I shall try to equal them in length. Much less than eleven columns will show whether I undertook to give an opinion about a matter that I had not fully examined, as you seem to intimate. Until the other side of the shield can be presented, let me ask of your readers a careful reading of the speech in question, and a suspension of judgment.

As a reminder, however, that there is another side, may I ask you to insert the enclosed letter from an historian and liberal, whom I believe we all love and honor—James Parton?

Yours very respectfully,

T. B. WAKEMAN.

NEW YORK, October 4, 1878.

NEWBURYPORT, Mass., Sept. 29, 1878.

My dear Friend,—I think those Comstock Laws, as they are very properly called, ought to be totally repealed, and for these reasons:—

1. Because they are Comstock laws, and not the deliberate judgment of Congress.
2. Because they are useless. The forbidden articles can still be sent everywhere by express.
3. Because it is not possible to put into human language a definition of the word obscene, which shall let the Song of Solomon, Rabelais, Juvenal, and Tom Jones pass, and keep out works intended and calculated to corrupt.
4. Because the control of the government over the mails is obviously limited to what you well style "postal reasons." Dynamite may be excluded; sealing-wax may be excluded; liquids may be excluded, because they endanger the fulfilment of the contract with all the other senders of mail matter. But the government is not called upon to sit in judgment upon the moral character or intellectual quality of the parcels entrusted to it.
5. Because the laws in question are so liable to abuse by a narrow-minded or provincial officer. They enable the prim and prudish village to judge and condemn the metropolis.
6. Because the State laws and Municipal laws, previously and now existing, are sufficient for the detection and punishment of all real offences against decency and good morals.

With regard to the Constitutional argument, so ably and powerfully presented by yourself, I can only say, being no lawyer, that it seems to me unanswerable. It came upon my mind with convincing power, and I have never had a doubt since.

Those laws are wrong every way, and pernicious in many ways.

You know how I hate and loathe the books and papers that circulate among boys which can have no other than a corrupting effect. I could join, heart and hand, in hanging a wretch who, for a little money, would either write or publish or sell such works. And yet, it seems to me that the espionage of the mails by an illiterate person is even a worse evil than that. It menaces the very citadel of liberty.

Yes, I go for immediate and unconditional repeal. And this has been my feeling ever since reading your masterly speech delivered in Faneuil Hall last summer.

Very truly yours,

JAMES PARTON.

TO T. B. WAKEMAN, Esq.

THE ISSUES AT STAKE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I presume I am only one among the readers of THE INDEX who feel the deepest obligation to you, for your manly and determined stand on the subject of "Obscene Literature." Every man who is worthy of the name "Liberal" contends for liberty without license, and purity with honest purpose. The course now adopted by the radical wing (as they call themselves) would be death to our efforts, and a reflection upon our intelligence. I hope with all my heart that you will "hold the fort" you have so nobly taken, and that the Liberal League, at its meeting in Syracuse, will not only indorse your opinion, but confirm the sentiment by electing you to fill the office you have so honorably filled during the last year. I feel the need of united effort and of associated action, to accomplish the work before us. Never was the opposition to free thought more bitter and determined than now,—the spirit of hatred to reason, science, truth, and philosophy was never more visible than it is in our day; the men who assume to be our teachers appear conscious of the deception, fraud, and falseness of their position, their craft is in danger, their lazy and licentious natures dread the ominous cloud they see gathering. They have lost their power over the simpletons who have fed and pampered them. Hence they are prepared to attempt to crush and stamp out any and every effort to free the people from their bondage and superstition. As a class, I have found the persons who call themselves "clergy" the most consummate hypocrites and unprincipled citizens; the arrogance of their assumption has no bounds, and if they had the power they once had, the Liberal League would cease to be; but thanks to our public schools, our independent literature, and our free souls who dare to speak out, their power is gone, never to return, and their sacerdotal nonsense is only a subject of amusement for small boys and little ladies. The shadows are fleeing away; the day of reason is dawning; humanity will yet be free.

Yours, W. D. CORKEN, M.D.

THE NEW HAVEN SCHOOL QUESTION.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Sept. 19, 1878.

EDITOR INDEX:—

You have heard of our defeat in the election to fill vacancies in the Board of Education. I presume you, like the rest of us, felt more regret than surprise at the news. The wonder is that, in a community like this, there should at any time happen to be a majority for a school board who favored secular education; and that, being such a majority, they should have enough backbone to run so far counter to popular prejudice as to abolish devotional exercises in the schools. The action caused general surprise here at the time; and, though the liberals were highly elated, they could not have much confidence in the permanency of the decision.

The canvass was managed on the part of the liberals with great circumspection, headed by a ticket much superior to the other side, and conducted by men universally respected in the community. At the meeting to ratify nominations, Hon. Francis Wayland, Professor of Mercantile Law and Evidence in Yale College, was elected chairman, and opened the meeting with a few masterly words, just to the point and unanswerable. Mr. Wm. G. Sumner, Professor of Social and Political Science in Yale, who headed the ticket, made the address of the evening, followed by two of our most popular clergymen, Baptist and Congregational (the latter but a short time ago on the other side), the Jewish Rabbi, and a Catholic citizen. The meeting was very enthusiastic. Among the vice-presidents were many of the college professors, and any number of prominent and respected citizens. The Register and Union were both on our side. We circulated the majority report of the Board, in reply to petitions asking for restoration of religious exercises.

The other side was led by a man who commands but little respect, but is a consummate party manager and adroit wire-puller, "the bright and shining hypocrite of this community," as the Union puts it, aided by the paper which he runs but does not edit, the Palladium. The Demands of Liberalism, with invective comments, were distributed over the city, and no doubt had some effect; for many who will submit to secular schools are alarmed at the wide scope of the demands. The minority report on the matter mentioned above was extensively circulated, and published in full in two city papers. The Catholics united with the Protestants against us. In some churches, tickets were supplied and instructions given. Of course it was the "religious" party that circulated informal ballots with misplaced initials, etc., to spoil (the Egyptians') liberal votes. I do not know whether many were deceived in this way; probably not; but the fact speaks for itself. The vote stood: total, 6,821; majority for religious exercises, 2,918. It was a victory of ignorance. Does any one imagine that the result would have been otherwise if the issue had been the Christianizing of the United States Constitution? A friend (Christian, of course) said to me the next morning: "I am glad of it; it satisfies me." "No doubt," I replied; "but it is a dear satisfaction that is bought at the expense of justice."

Well, we are defeated; but we may console ourselves that the good cause is slowly making progress.

A few years ago such a contest would have been impossible. The wise and just are waking up to the wrong and danger of present church-and-state alliances. I believe it is only necessary to keep the crisis off a little longer, and the sentiment will become sufficiently diffused to set the matter right. Meantime the liberal has his task before him; and you, dear friend, will not rejoice less over the memory of past sacrifices.

Your attitude on the obscenity business is appreciated here. I see no other decent position.

With great respect, yours,

R. M. SHERMAN.

SECULARISM AND RELIGION.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

This is from the Philadelphia Times, and, as it but voices a commonly-held conception of the secular movement, it cannot be amiss to quote it:—

"The Bible is likely to be read henceforth more than has been common in New Haven. It was excluded from the public schools in 1877 by a vote of five to three, the only Catholic member of the board voting against its exclusion, and the late local election turned on the issue of restoring religious services. After a most bitter contest, in which Protestants and Catholics were all mixed up on both sides, the ticket favorable to the use of the Bible in the schools was elected by 4881 to 1963. Whether such an agitation will promote either the usefulness of the schools or respect for the Bible may not be so clear; but it will be likely to make many study it with unusual interest for a season. There's nothing that makes the average American so determined to know all about a book as the effort to prevent him from doing so."

I never supposed a man of the intellect of Alexander McClure would stand sponsor for such stupidity as is exposed by intimation in the last sentence of the above paragraph. We might suppose it to have been plain to any sensible person that there was no effort made in the recent election, from any source whatever, to so order things in New Haven as to prevent parents and children from reading the Bible. The question at issue was that which asks whether the Christians of to-day should impose upon the minority the various distasteful creeds which he may chance to hold. The contest was one between just secularism and unjust orthodoxy; and this only in their connection with public institutions which they both uphold. It is absurd for intelligent men to prate about the agitation in so slipshod a manner as is their wont. There never has been any effort made to prevent people reading their Holy Book, so named, in its proper place. The lips of Radicals only utter protest against the tyranny which taxes all beliefs for the benefit of some particular belief. This is what is antagonized by secularism; and we never have grown, and never will grow, so arrogant as to wish to coerce the private beliefs of others. 'Tis only when men wilfully tread on our toes that we strive to remove the offensive and painful burden. This is true, now and ever, notwithstanding all the clamorings of faith-blind writers.

Col. McClure is the most prominent journalist in Philadelphia at present, and when he puts his sanction to such superficiality as I have quoted, it only serves to illustrate how even men of high talents may drop, through prejudice, into folly and misrepresentation. His is but a reiteration of the common argument, forged to meet the secularist, that in striving to brush sectarianism from the schools he wishes to destroy religion. At bottom, and contrarily, the agitation, in its purity and of itself, aims at no such point as that. However individuals in the movement may regard religion, it need scarcely be said that the movement itself only insists on real church and State separation, and aside from that directs no attack at any person's creed. So, at least, I understand it.

It is a pity that so many men of even good intellectual calibre take up with the current gross misconceptions of the secular agitation. It seems to me that many a brave heart and hand will be needed to dispel that unfortunate illusion. Error is quicker born than killed, as often a man and cause have found out to their sorrow. By all means let the secularists urge their ideas, and the certain fruitage cannot but be a gratifying result of the sowing.

THE GREAT REACTION.

EDITOR INDEX:—

I was surprised to see in a communication to your paper by Mr. Charles Ellershaw the following language: "The people is the people, and hath its own interest at heart." Would it not be impossible for him to prove that proposition unless he inserted the word supposed before interest? Mrs. Browning wrote that it required a man of large soul to move the masses even to a cleaner sty. History seems to justify her saying, for we have no record of a people improving its condition voluntarily and without some form of coercion. Genuine reform is sure to meet the opposition of those who most need reformation, and who will reap the most benefit therefrom.

Although a very private citizen, I have, from boyhood, watched our political life with a keen interest. Especially have I loved to follow the course of that immense wave of action which first made itself known by the name of abolitionism or Liberty party. It made the Free-Soil party, and culminated in the Republican. Taking all drawbacks into account, the future historian will probably consider this forward movement the most beneficent in our history. However, its beneficence could not prevent it from soon finding the bound of its power, nor long delay its decline. At present the reaction is gaining rapidly. Action and reaction are proportionate; the more extreme the push, the fiercer the rebound. The intensity of the upward motion was so great during the war that it swept in a multitude of minds who had no abiding sympathy with liberalism. After Lee's surrender these began to drop out, and many are now floating on more congenial waters.

When Horace Greeley consented to serve as the head of the democracy, he became the most conspicuous representative of the great reaction. Not only by his position was he thus conspicuous, but, being himself deluded, he was the symbol of the vast flood of delusions that have since distracted the public and are now filling the air with their din. These delusions have taken the general name of reform. That word has become utterly perverted from its old meaning; it is now the cloak for all manner of pretence and deception. I observe that the word is still clung to by a few worthy Rip Van Winkles in the East, but here in the West we have no reformers any more except Brick Pomeroy and H. C. Dean! The reaction is now gaining rapidly. One proof of this is the great abundance of smoke and dust under which it lies concealed. Whether the smoke and dust be termed "fiat money," or bear some other one of delusion's names, it serves for a cover to the important fact. That fact is, that liberalism is to be soundly beaten by an organization that will combine all the unprogressive, reactionary elements of society. I do not know its name, but when the air gets cleared we shall find it firmly holding all the high seats of power; not only that, this result will be by the help of some who least desire such a result. This victorious party will combine the bigotry and intolerance of the solid South with the bigotry and intolerance of the Roman Church. The hosts of ignorance and fanaticism will furnish a numerous following.

In connection with this, I am reminded of a "vision" seen in 1803 by a Quaker preacher whose name was Hoag. You may have seen it, as it has been printed in various newspapers. The first four points of that prophecy have been literally fulfilled. The substance of the fifth and last is, that we are to be ruled by an arbitrary, despotic power, which shall enforce a religious test and be harsh and repressive in its measures. It will force us to renew the old fight in behalf of free speech. This is not to be believed because Mr. Hoag saw it; the condition of society tends directly to that conclusion. It should be added that the vision was finished by predicting that liberalism would finally triumph. But that cannot be till after it has received some rough discipline. The culmination of the reaction must lie some years in the future. I hope and believe it will pass without a brutal, bloody, civil war; but if we escape such a dire calamity it will be by a very close chance.

It is not worth while to inquire who is to blame; nor should we expect those hypercritical gentlemen who spend their energies criticising their comrades and brushing their own clothes to cease from their absorbing labors. But liberalism should seek to bring harmony of purpose out of the prevailing confusion; it should close up its ranks, and prepare for a bitter conflict that may not be short. Doubtless a glorious victory will be the final result,—a victory that will forever secure in practice the blessings of equal rights and free speech to our New-Rome.

EX-REFORMER.

COMPULSORY CHURCH TAXATION.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

In one of your "Glimpses" printed in THE INDEX of September 12, allusion is made to the fact that the Oxford Street Chapel, of Lynn, Mass., is advertised to be sold for taxes, and you close the item as follows: "If churches must be exempted from taxation at all, let us at least have impartiality, and exempt all alike." Please allow me to demur, and to express the sincere hope that, if the Oxford Street Chapel in Lynn is really owned by a Free-Religious society, it will be taxed just the same as secular property.

Free religionists claim to be in favor of the secularization of the State, and one of the main planks in the secular platform is church-taxation. If free religionists were honest in their secular doctrines, they would not delay paying taxes until their church-property was sold out from under them. Either the taxation of church-property is right, or else it is wrong. If right, then it is right whether the law compels it or winks at it, and free-religious congregations should set the noble example of paying their taxes whether compelled to do so or not.

It is this "morality of expediency" practised by our free-religious friends which make us atheists look askance at anything which labels itself "religious." If the Lynn free-religious church is sold for taxes, I, for one, will hold up both hands and say "well-done." Let these good New England leaders of free thought learn by taking it how good is the medicine they are prescribing for their evangelical neighbors. The good preacher practises the morality he teaches; the brave captain says to his soldiers, as the storming party approaches the enemy's works, "Follow me!" The bird that can sing and will not, should be made to sing; and if our progressive Lynn friends "know the right, and still the wrong pursue," I should be in favor of a little extra-judicial pressure to compel them to behave themselves just as well as they know how, even if it was ever so much better than their more benighted Orthodox neighbors.

FRANK J. MEAD.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Sept. 17, 1878.

[We entirely agree with the doctrine of the above, and only wonder that our good friend, Mr. Mead, imagined us to hold any other on this subject. The Lynn Society ought to pay its taxes without protest or demur. The point we made about "impartiality" did not apply to them, but to the city authorities. These authorities ought to exempt all churches, or none. It is a very unfair discrimination on their part to assess taxes on churches they dislike, and to exempt those they favor. Of course, the Lynn Society ought to live up to its own principles, and pay its taxes cheerfully; but they have a just right to protest against the favoritism which exempts certain religious beliefs and taxes others. We are quite certain that Mr. Mead did not mean to be captious, and think that he will be abundantly satisfied with this explanation of the "Glimpse" he misunderstood.—ED.]

INFINITE INTELLIGENCE.

If it can be shown that originality is relative and not absolute, the demonstration of infinite intelligence will be assured. Spiritualist and materialist agree that there is an infinite power,—one ascribing, the other denying to it infinite intelligence. Now it is evident that infinite power cannot be progressive, because infinite power, while it precludes an external limit, involves, so to say, a self limit. Hence infinite power must be eternally the same and unchangeable; and, being eternally the same and unchangeable in itself, it must, of course, be eternally the same and unchangeable in its effects. On the other hand, finite power is progressive, and therefore originates or produces that which is new to itself, because, being susceptible of and having scope for progress, there is power outside of, operating upon, and developing it. Infinite power admits of no power distinct from or external to itself. Hence man is a part of this infinite power; therefore man's productions are the productions of this infinite power; consequently, as infinite power cannot be progressive, man's original ideas are not absolutely, only relatively, original.

Now as it has been shown that there cannot be an absolutely original idea, infinite intelligence has been demonstrated; because we all know, whether we believe or disbelieve in the immortality of individual intelligence, that the intelligence of man is continually progressing.

BOSTON.

DIRECT TESTIMONY TO THE EVIL.

MR. ABBOT:—

Dear Sir,—Some liberals who desire the total repeal of the Comstock law argue on the assumption that obscene literature does not exist; or, at least, there is not, nor has there been, an extensive circulation of really obscene matter through the mails of this country. Within a few years, in my intercourse with other boys, I have seen books filled with pictures horribly obscene, sent to them by the villainous vendors of the stuff, who made it a part of their business to obtain the names of the youth of both sexes, and using the United States Mail as the medium by which to carry on the nefarious work.

The Comstock law has done a great deal to check this vile traffic.

Let liberals pause ere they countenance in any degree gross immorality. The chief element of our power is the reputation of liberals in the practice of the virtues, and zeal in pushing forward moral reforms. We cannot afford to be apologists for vice.

Our honor is at stake. Let there be candid discussion, and it cannot be that liberals will err upon a question so momentous.

Yours respectfully, BENJ. F. SMITH.

DEDHAM, Mass., Sept. 2, 1878.

THE INGENUITY OF BEES.

In the first number of the journal of the Cincinnati Society of Natural History, recently issued, appears the following note by Mr. V. T. Chambers on the method adopted by some bees of reaching the nectary of flowers:—

"That humble bees frequently pierce the corolla of flowers near its base with their proboscis, which they then insert into the opening thus made, has long been known and frequently mentioned. Indeed, it is the usual way taken by these bees to reach the nectary when the corolla is too long for the tongue to reach the nectary from the mouth of the corolla, unless, indeed, the flower is a very large one,—large enough for the bee to enter its mouth and reach the nectary in that way. Mr. Chambers remarks that if the same practice obtains with hive bees, he does not remember having seen the fact stated, and so records the following observation: a large bush of Weigella rosea was literally covered with flowers in all stages, from the unopened buds to those that were withered and ready to fall; and great numbers of bees swarmed over them,—humble bees, hive bees, mason bees, and sweat bees (Andrenidae). The older flowers were each pierced near the base by a longitudinal slit, made by hive or bumble bees, which had previously visited them; and, whenever one of these bees alighted on one of these flowers, it immediately went, without attempting to enter the corolla, to the base of the flower and inserted its proboscis into the slit already made; or, if the flower was a fresh one, having no slit, it proceeded immediately to make one. By the humble bees this was instantly effected without trouble; but to the hive bees it seemed to be more difficult,—probably because the blade of the maxillæ, which are used to make the slit, are weaker or more flexible than in humble bees. Of the numerous hive bees observed, only a single one attempted to enter the mouth of the corolla, and it came out without going further than just within the opening. On the other hand, the mason bees and sweat bees went in every instance straight into the mouth of the flower, and never attempted either to make a slit or to use one that was already made. Yet one of these mason bees (Megachile) was fully as large as the hive bees."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
"13 to 25 " " 8 " "
"26 to 51 " " 6 " "
"52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent. On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
Yours truly,
HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address publish

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tennessy, N.J.
J. L. STODDARD, Boston.

W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.
ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.
JAMES E. OLIVER, Ithaca, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fifth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine, from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact facsimile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is from England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on the issues with a promptitude unequalled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers. The following are a few of the contributors:—

AND NUMEROUS OTHERS.

Subscription Price, $5.00 per Year. Published every month by the ROSE-BETFORD PUBLISHING CO., 60 York Street, Toronto, Ont.

THE SECULAR REVIEW.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The SECULAR REVIEW is the leading organ of Secularism, and each week has Special Articles on Theological, Social, Scientific, and Political Subjects. Its distinctive features are the advocacy of Constructive Secularism, and the dissemination of useful information on all questions which affect the welfare of the people. Letters are inserted in its "OPEN COLUMN" from all who are courteous in the expression of their views; while a special department is allotted for "NOTES AND QUERIES."

The Contributors to the SECULAR REVIEW comprise the principal advocates of Secularism, including its founder, G. J. Holyoake.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD. GREAT THROUGH LINE AND UNITED STATES MAIL ROUTE.

The attention of the travelling public is respectfully invited to some of the merits of this great highway, in the confident assertion and belief that no other line can offer equal inducements as a route of through travel. In

CONSTRUCTION AND EQUIPMENT

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD stands confessedly at the head of American railways. The track is double the entire length of the line, of steel rails laid on heavy oak ties, which are embedded in a foundation of rock ballast eighteen inches in depth. All bridges are of iron or stone, and built upon the most approved plans. Its passenger cars, while eminently safe and substantial, are at the same time models of comfort and elegance.

THE SAFETY APPLIANCES

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE! CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

PLATFORM

For the Presidential Election of 1880,

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

SECOND ANNUAL CONGRESS

OF THE

National Liberal League.

CALL.

Boston, Sept. 13, 1878.

The Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July 1-4, 1876, will be held at Wisting Opera House, Syracuse, N.Y., on Saturday and Sunday, Oct. 26 and 27, 1878. Further particulars as to speakers, etc., will be announced hereafter.

In addition to the hearing of reports, election of officers for the ensuing year, and other ordinary business, questions of the utmost practical importance to the liberal cause will come up for decision at this Congress. Among them the following may be specified:—

1. What efficient measures can be adopted for securing a great increase in the number of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, and thereby winning for liberal ideas the public influence to which they are justly entitled?

2. Shall the National Liberal League nominate candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States at the present time?

3. How can the National Liberal League most effectively promote the cause of State Secularization, and foil the schemes of those who are seeking to pervert the government to sectarian purposes? What action shall it take with reference to the Constitutional Amendment already twice reported to the United States Senate by the Judiciary Committee, the practical effect of which, if adopted, will be to recognize in the Constitution the right of the Bible to be read in the public schools as a book of divine authority, and the right of church property to be exempted from taxation?

4. How can the rights of free mails and a free press be most effectively defended, and how can the wrongs of persons unjustly punished under the so-called Comstock laws be most effectively righted?

5. Shall the National Liberal League abandon the stand it originally took on the "obscene literature" question at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, or shall it continue to defend equally the cause of public morality and the cause of free mails and a free press? Shall it now demand the total repeal of the existing laws on this subject, and thereby practically protect and foster the circulation of obscene literature? Or shall it continue to demand the radical reform of those laws, in such manner as shall protect freedom of thought to the uttermost without protecting obscenity in the least?

The last two of these questions are peculiarly important at this time, and will inevitably come up for settlement by the approaching Congress. The resolutions adopted at Philadelphia were as follows:—

"Resolved, That this League, while it recognizes the great importance and the absolute necessity of guarding by proper legislation against obscene and indecent publications, whatever sect, party, order, or class such publications claim to favor, disapproves and protests against all laws which, by reason of indefiniteness or ambiguity, shall permit the prosecution and punishment of honest and conscientious men for presenting to the public what they deem essential to the public welfare, when the views thus presented do not violate in thought or language the acknowledged rules of decency; and that we demand that all laws against obscenity and indecency shall be so clear and explicit that none but actual offenders against the recognized principles of purity shall be liable to suffer therefrom.

"Resolved, That we cannot but regard the appointment and authorization by the government of a single individual to inspect our mails, with power to exclude therefrom whatever he deems objectionable, as a delegation of authority dangerous to public and personal liberty, and utterly inconsistent with the genius of free institutions."

The future growth, prosperity, and influence of the Liberal League movement will depend largely on the action to be taken by the Congress on these two questions. Any weakening of the stand taken at Philadelphia will work great and perhaps fatal disaster to the National Liberal League.

In order, therefore, that these vital questions may be fairly and wisely decided, it is recommended that all Local Leagues elect their delegates with special reference to it. The Congress will not be an irresponsible mass meeting, but a convention composed of delegates and members duly accredited, and seats for them will be reserved. Delegates from Local Leagues will receive Certificates of Membership of the Second Annual Congress by forwarding at once the proper credentials, signed by their own local officers, to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston"; charter, life, and annual members who intend to be present will receive theirs by simply forwarding their names and present addresses. These Certificates must be presented at the door and exchanged for Tickets of Admission to the reserved seats, the rest of the hall being open to the public at large. By this arrangement all confusion will be obviated. The Congress will be composed of accredited members, who alone ought to vote on questions of business affecting the League; every member will be admitted to the reserved seats; and the Committee on Membership will be enabled to make an accurate report to the Congress.

Liberals are urged everywhere to organize themselves into Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues and elect good delegates, in order to give this Congress a large local constituency and an influential delegation, and thereby to increase the weight of its decisions with the general public. The questions to be acted upon are of the gravest consequence to the whole liberal cause, and ought to be dealt with by a responsible representative body. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay, if addressed to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston."

By order of the Board of Directors:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.

WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

GLIMPSES.

A NEW Liberal League has been chartered at Freeville, New York. Another has also just been chartered at Lynn, Massachusetts.

THE POET WHITTIER says that Ralph Waldo Emerson is the one living American who will not be forgotten a thousand years hence.

FOUR OTHER NEW Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues were chartered last week by the National League: namely, at North Hannibal, N.Y., at West Newton, Mass., at New York, N.Y. (Fourth Liberal League in that city), and at Florence, Mass. These raise the number of chartered Local Leagues to fifty-six.

THIS is from a Western correspondent: "I can do nothing but wish you and the cause you so bravely defend success. Should the effort you speak of succeed, the cause of liberalism will receive a fatal blow. Stand by the principles of decency and civilization in the coming fight; and, if immoral fanaticism prevail, make a manly protest in favor of a higher liberalism."

THIS CHEERING MESSAGE to us was dated Passaic City, New Jersey, October 11: "Dear Sir,—It is but fair to say that Passaic City Liberal League, as a society, unanimously approve of Mr. Abbot's position on the obscenity question; and that its delegates to the coming Congress will be instructed in accordance with such approval. Respectfully, F. W. ORVIS, Secretary."

THE LIBERAL LEAGUE of Tompkins County, N.Y., held a meeting at Ithaca, on October 7. Mr. M. A. Randolph made an excellent address on the question of the evening, "How to protect the community against immoral literature without abridging the freedom of the press." It was moved and carried that this League "heartily indorses and reaffirms the position taken by the National Liberal League at the Centennial Congress at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, as embodied" in the resolution offered by Mr. Underwood and published in the Call for the Syracuse Congress.

THIS ITEM is from the New York Tribune of October 12: "Dr. Samuel Adler, father of Professor Felix Adler, and for many years Chief Rabbi of Temple Emmanu-El in this city, performed the ceremony at the private wedding of his own daughter last week Thursday. That day being one of the Ten Penitential Days in which Jews are not expected to take part in any wedding or other festivity, Dr. Adler's action has occasioned much comment. He says in reply that there is nothing in the Mosaic law to forbid marriage at such a time, and that it is at best only custom which is opposed to it."

THE OVERWHELMING majority of American liberals are on the side of "reform," as opposed to "repeal." If they only spoke out, the less intelligent opinion would vanish like smoke; but so repellant to refined feeling is the issue forced upon them that they are in danger of neglecting their duty and letting their own cause go by default. We know that we have the silent sympathy and approval of thousands upon thousands in the position we have taken; we ought to have their open word and deed. The same torpor which throws political parties into the management of the least fit, threatens to throw all liberal organizations into similar hands. Are they worth preserving? That is a question which the liberals themselves must answer; and inactivity is a fatally emphatic answer.

IN HIS letter published in THE INDEX of October 3, Mr. T. B. Wakeman said: "Nobody in the League proposes to repeal all State laws on the subject [of obscene literature], so as to 'foster obscenity,' or to run the League in the interests of free love. Insinuations of this kind can do no good." We call Mr. Wakeman's attention to this statement by Mr. J. S. Verity, a charter-member of the National Liberal League, in the Truth Seeker of October 12: "We believe that obscenity laws are wrong, and therefore we ask for their repeal; let the consequences take care of themselves. . . . We must denounce all laws against obscenity." Mr. Wakeman is not aware of the nature of the movement he is aiding. The logic of his position will put him squarely by the side of Messrs. Tucker, Heywood, and Verity, or he must refuse the inevitable corollaries of that position. He will yet discover that this is just as much a "question of obscenity" as it is a "question of liberty."

Is the Reformer any Longer Needed?

BY HON. GEORGE W. JULIAN.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

The thorough reform of our civil service is another urgent demand of the times. It has often been pronounced "the best on the planet"; but it is, in fact, a perfectly shameless system of official huckstering and political prostitution. It poisons the life-blood of the body-politic; it places the power and patronage of the Government at the disposal of trained political pickpockets, who make the very atmosphere mephitic with their familiar vices; it frames iniquity into law, and makes law the servant of iniquity; it stains the good name of our country at home and abroad; it is the root and source of the most startling bribery and corruption, breaking out in high places, and inundating the whole land with their desolating effects; it robs the people annually to the tune of millions and tens of millions through its whiskey rings, its Indian rings, its custom-house rings, its railroad rings, and other legalized machinery which it manipulates; it reduces rapacity to a science, and elevates roguery to the dignity of an art; it has so polluted our politics and debauched the moral sense of our public servants that even so respectable a man as Senator Howe, of Wisconsin, openly defends it, and actually refers to the saturnalia of thieves who defied the country under the two administrations of General Grant as a proof of the honesty of his party. The sovereign remedy for all this is the destruction, root and branch, of the whole system of spoils and plunder; and this will require the bold surgery of reform. It calls for an insurrection of honest men against the disciplined party Janizaries who have so long ruled them. Neither Congress nor the Executive Department of the Government will take a single step until compelled to do so by public opinion. We can no more depend upon our parties and politicians to begin the work than we can trust the dram-shops of the country to organize against their traffic. If any man doubts this, we need only refer him to the spectacle of duplicity and demagogism which our servants at Washington have exhibited in dealing with this question during the past six or seven years, and to the general chuckle of delight which followed the final abandonment of all further attempts to reform administrative abuses; while the faithlessness of the present administration to its pledges in dealing with this issue, and its slippery game of fast and loose have provoked the disgust and contempt of honest men of all parties. The remedy must come from the people, and the people must be rallied and organized against the hierarchy of rogues and malefactors who prey upon the nation and make political honesty a jest.

The labor question involves a reform of world-wide significance. The question of finance is simply a part of it. The abolition of negro slavery was a magnificent triumph of labor reform, lifting four million human beings from the condition of beasts of burden to the dignity of men. This system of chattelized humanity rested upon that false relation of arbitrary power upon the one side, and dependence and helplessness on the other, which is the life of every form of oppression. The right adjustment of the conflict between capital and labor will emancipate all the races of men from all forms of slavery. It will consummate the work of which abolitionism was the beginning. This involves a complete revolution in our whole system of legislation and policy. The foundations of our civilization were laid in conquest and robbery, and these, under the names of feudalism and monarchy, have held the race in subjection. The remedy is radical reconstruction, and it involves the life of our institutions. "At the very commencement of society," says Mr. Thornton, in his valuable book on Labor, "as soon as materials for its construction were brought together, its living constituents proceeded forthwith to arrange themselves in layers, the stronger, nimbler, and cunninger climbing up on their brothers' shoulders, and occupying the higher places, and leaving to those below only the office of upholding them in their elevation." He adds, "The upper myriads may cry peace, peace, but there will be no more peace for them, on the old terms, with the lower millions." And there ought to be none. When we talk about the rights of labor, we talk about the rights of man. When we say that a fair day's work is entitled to a fair day's wages, we declare a principle which, as Carlyle says, is as "indisputable as arithmetical multiplication-tables," and which "must and will have itself fulfilled." We can no more escape it than we can escape gravitation. Our talk about democracy and the sacredness of human rights, while capital has its foot on the neck of the laborer, is a sham and a cheat. It is the hollow dreariness of demagogism. The chief end of government is not the protection of property, but of man; and this truth must be practically illustrated in such laws as shall hold in check the power of concentrated capital in alliance with labor-saving machinery, and those giant corporations which too often control the makers and expounders of the laws, and are virtually endowed with life-offices and powers of hereditary succession. The task is a large one, and of course will require time, toil, and patience. It presents the most fearful problem with which enlightened humanity has yet been called on to deal. By the side of this labor question, the old slavery issue dwindles into a trifle. It casts its portentous shadow across every civilized land, and is rallying and organizing multiplying millions of discontented and determined men, whose just demands cannot safely be alighted. It foreshadows a conflict between the vandalism and madness of communism on the one hand, and the rapacity of capital on the other, which naturally tends to provoke and inspire it, and which, as the Duke of Argyll declares, "overrides even the love of life, and silences even the fear of death." The omens of a coming storm are quite as discernible as were those which preceded the deadly struggle which at last buried African slavery in its bloody grave. Shall we heed these omens, and by wise and timely precautions seek to avert the threatened calamity; or madly resign ourselves to the reckless and pitiless principle of evolution, and thus invite the lightning of retribution which else might be conducted harmlessly to the earth?

The land question is the twin-brother of the labor-question, and involves considerations equally momentous and far-reaching. "The earth is literally the loaf we feed on"; and, therefore, no question can more vitally affect humanity than the character of the laws which deal with it. This is most signally illustrated in England, whose agricultural laborers are among the most degraded human beings on earth. This is the ripe fruit of her system of land-tenures. "Time was," says the Westminster Review, "when, at the call of the country, the yeomen of England rose and fought and conquered her liberties. Their degenerate descendants would be more likely to fight as hirelings for any form of slavery and superstition—if, indeed, they could be got to fight at all." It is as true of England as of any country in Europe, that "the whole energy and knowledge and resources of the land are barreled up in the towns." Mr. Hoskyns, in his chapter on the land-laws of that country, says: "There is not a living animal connected with the farm, from the draught-team down to the sheep-dog, that is not better lodged and looked after than the laborer and his family." He is a slave; his condition is exactly described by the definition of a slave, as given in the old codes of the Carolinas, namely, "one doomed to live without knowledge, and without the capacity to make anything his own, and to toil that another may reap the fruits." Liberty implies opportunity, self-culture, the untrammelled development and use of the powers of a man; and all these are denied him. Land-monopoly, indeed, is slavery. A government which allows the land to become the patrimony of the few cannot be free, for the simple reason that the landholders of every country are its masters. The most stupendous system of organized robbery which scourges the world is that which strips the poor of their natural inheritance in the soil.

Are we told that this question does not concern us in the United States, since we have no laws of primogeniture and entail, and no great monopolies handed down to us as the fruit of feudal times? We answer, that, through our large grants to railway corporations, our system of Indian treaties, our swamp-land legislation, our yet unforbidden curse of land-speculation, and other forms of maladministration, we are laying the foundations of a system of serfdom almost as fearful as that which now afflicts England. In several States of our Union there are single farms of a half-million acres; and even in old Massachusetts, where liberty and local self-government had their birth in her policy of small estates, the large farms are rapidly swallowing up the small ones, while a crouching tenantry, toiling under absentee landlords, bears witness at once to the decline of agriculture and the decay of freedom. If our popular system of government is to be preserved, nothing is more certain than that our land-policy must be radically reformed. And it will not reform itself. Evolution will not meet the danger, for evil and ruin are evolved, as well as good, when unchecked by human endeavors. The false steps we have taken must be reversed in the interest of justice and the rights of the people. We need such agitators and reformers as Cobden and Mill, and such missionaries as Joseph Arch. What will our vaunted freedom be worth if we suffer the canker of great estates to eat away the life of our yeomanry? What refuge will be left for us against the unhealthy growth and fearful domination of our chief cities, if a great system of centralization in agriculture is to pale the manhood of our "rural districts," and give us such a breed of cultivators as those of England? These questions demand an answer from every believer in democratic government. They take hold of our social well-being and our national life; for—"A bold peasantry, their country's pride,

When once destroyed can never be supplied."

The reformer is needed in dealing with still another question. We have lately commemorated the nation's first centennial. We fitly honored the deeds of the famous men who declared that "taxation without representation is tyranny," and threw life, fortune, and honor into the defence of this principle. It was the key-note and ceaseless battle-cry of their grand struggle. The right of the people who paid the taxes to be heard on the question of voting them was accepted as a self-evident truth. "They who have no voice nor vote," said Dr. Franklin, "in the selecting of representatives, do not enjoy liberty, but are absolutely enslaved to those who have votes." This is as self-evident as any truth in the great Declaration. A free government is one resting upon the free choice of the people, and every person having the power of choosing has an inborn and equal right to be heard in person, or by his representative, in the management of those public interests which concern him in common with all other citizens. Idiots, lunatics, infants, and criminals who have forfeited their right are necessarily precluded from any share in the exercise of political power; but no other exceptions can be made consistently with the natural rights of man. An intelligent human being, innocent of crime, yielding his obedience to the Government, answerable to it in his person and property for disobedience, and yet denied any political rights, is a slave. If this is not true, then nothing is true. But our fathers were not ready to apply this truth in its complete length and breadth. They did not perfectly keep step to the logic of their own avowed principles; they lived in the twilight of the political gospel they proclaimed, and scarcely dreamed of the high-noon of democracy which has since lighted up the political horizon. Accordingly, they withheld the ballot from the poor man on account of his poverty. This was done in all the States in the early years of the Government. As a nation, we have long since outgrown this folly. The negro was denied any share in the exercise of political power on account of the color of his skin, or that American prejudice which had been evolved from the institution of slavery. But slavery has perished, and the principles of our fathers have found another application in the conversion of the negro into a citizen and a voter. We have now no qualification for the ballot founded on race, or color, or property, or any educational requirement; and yet we have twenty million citizens in the United States who are compelled to pay their taxes and obey the laws, while they are denied any share whatever in the exercise of political power. This is done because of their sex, and is as hateful and anti-republican a discrimination as can well be conceived. An aristocracy founded on it is quite as odious and absurd as an aristocracy founded on color, or race, or any other mere accident of humanity. It cannot be defended for a moment by any believer in democracy. In the name of justice and decency, what has sex to do with the question of moral or political right? But our purpose is not now to argue the question, but only to state it, and to rank it among the grand living issues yet to be tried by the people. How it will finally be decided is not a matter of the least doubt. Our exclusion of woman from politics will take its place among the curious and startling barbarisms of the past. It is true that as yet we are only midway on our journey to universal suffrage; but that journey will be completed, because any step backward will be as impossible as any pause where we are. We are constantly enlarging the sphere of woman's occupations; we are reforming our laws respecting her personal and property rights. We are providing for her a higher education, and thus recognizing her claim to equal rights; we have already made her a citizen, and in some of the States, and as to certain positions, she is entitled to vote and hold office. There is, and there can be, no abiding-place in her progress toward perfect political equality with man. When and how this goal shall be reached must largely depend upon the labors and sacrifices of those who would speed the work; for the toils and struggles of the abolitionists might just as wisely have been renounced as to surrender the cause of woman's enfranchisement to the tender mercies of social evolution.

Our space will only permit us to refer to one further task which invokes the helping hand of reform, and that is the total separation of our civil and ecclesiastical affairs. Our Protestant sects complain that the pope, as the viceregent of God on earth, not only claims supreme authority over the consciences of men, but over all human governments, and thus assails civil liberty as well as religious. They say it was the Catholic Church which defeated Mr. Gladstone's Education Bill, and inspired the Franco-German war, while it is striving to prevent the unification of Germany, and blocking up the way of struggling liberalism in France and Spain. They affirm that this same power is waging war against our common schools, and endeavoring, by sapping and mining, to intrench itself in the United States; and that it believes our free institutions offer a better soil for the growth of its principles than the centralized governments of Europe, while plotting the overthrow of our liberty through its vast and well-drilled army of Jesuits. How shall we deal with this alleged raid upon civilization and progress? Social evolution will not meet the danger, for that has brought it to our doors, and seems to be constantly giving it strength. Shall we appeal to sectarian animosities, and array Protestantism against Catholicism in deadly strife? The thought of such a struggle between a great centralized power, always acting as a unit, and warring sects which could never be effectively rallied under a common banner, is not to be entertained for a moment. The question is not so much one of sects or religions, as of constitutional liberty, vitally affecting the rights of all men. The Government of the United States is neither Protestant nor Catholic. It is not even Christian, Washington himself being our witness; nor is it Jewish, Mohammedan, or pagan. The Government rightfully has nothing to do with religion, and religion has nothing to do with the Government. The State has no more right to teach religion than the Church has to assume the functions of the State. Our only safe ground, therefore, is the total secularization of our politics. The "concubinage of Church and State" must be utterly destroyed. On this principle all can stand, irrespective of religious faith. While the State is bound to protect all men in the unmolested enjoyment of their religious opinions, it must stand entirely aloof from any sort of espousal of any form of faith. This is our safeguard against ecclesiastical domination, whether Catholic or Protestant.

And this will require an amendment of the Constitution of the United States. It declares that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," and thus places the national Government in its true position; but the individual States are left entirely free in dealing with this question. They may make the Catholic faith or that of any Protestant sect the State religion, and levy taxes for the support of it upon those who conscientiously disbelieve in its creed. The union of Church and State, which our fathers repudiated in the national Constitution, may thus be established in defiance of the rights of conscience, as was systematically done in all the colonies save one during the period of the Revolution, and at the beginning of the Government. Some of them required all officers of the State to be of the Protestant faith; and even at this day religious tests are prescribed in several of them as conditions of holding office, by which the choice of fit men for the public service is foolishly restricted. In violation of the principles of our fathers, the church-property of both Catholics and Protestants is exempted from taxation, thus indirectly compelling Jews, Mohammedans, theists, atheists, and freethinkers to contribute to the support of a religion which they disbelieve, and violating the rights of conscience, which, to every reflecting man, are even more precious than the right to liberty or life. A constitutional amendment has recently been proposed in the Senate of the United States, which, if adopted, will recognize the Bible in our public schools by "divine right," and forever protect Church property in its present unjust exemption; and this amendment lacked only a few votes of the two-thirds required to pass it. The growth of the ecclesiastical spirit is still further manifested by another proposed amendment, emanating from an organization called the "National Reform Association," providing for the "acknowledgment of Almighty God as the source of all authority in civil government, of the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler of nations, and his revealed will as of supreme authority." Should this be adopted, the union of Church and State would be complete, and "appropriate legislation" for the disfranchisement and punishment of heretics would undoubtedly follow. The only true remedy for these threatened dangers is the absolute divorce of civil and ecclesiastical authority. There is no middle ground on which we can stand. "Our Constitution must be changed to suit our practices, or our practices must be changed to suit our Constitution." It must be on one side or the other, and the attempt to place it on both will prove as fruitless, and it may be as disastrous, as was the effort to make our Government "half-slave and half-free." We oppose and denounce the assaults of the Catholic Church upon our common schools as a monstrous interference with purely secular affairs; but our own sense of consistency and self-respect should compel us forthwith to exclude the Bible from those schools, and thus deprive that hierarchy of a very convenient and weighty apology for its course. The policy of the Catholic Church, so far as it makes itself the ally of ignorance and superstition, must be resolutely resisted; but that resistance can best be made by jealously maintaining civil liberty, and insisting upon a well-organized system of common schools and compulsory secular education. In thus standing by the equal religious rights of American citizens, we shall be invincible; for liberty and popular intelligence are the deadly enemies of every form of ecclesiastical usurpation, as they are the impregnable bulwarks of our democratic institutions. In seeking our purpose through an amendment of the Constitution, we cherish no hostility to State rights, but only an overmastering devotion to human rights. We cherish no hostility whatever to any form of religion, but would protect and defend all religions under equal laws. Nor do we fear sectarian wrangles and divisions as the result of the principles for which we contend. On the contrary, we confidently predict perpetual peace through the final removal of the chief causes of strife; and our grand aim can only fail through the criminal recreancy of the people themselves to the teachings of our fathers and the pregnant warnings of history.

And here we close our protest against the baleful heresy which has served us for our text. In confounding the distinction between physical and social evolution, it tends to confound the distinction between right and wrong. It threatens to dethrone conscience, and substitute development for duty. It exchanges liberty for necessity, and thus deals with humanity as a factor in mechanics. By committing all social questions to the working of inevitable laws, it disparages the value of human character, and trifles with human responsibility. It weakens the very foundations of virtue, by belittling the motives which inspire it. It unduly exalts the intellect, and makes the follies and mistakes of good men an excuse for tearing down the sanctuary of the heart. Its ugly footprints are already visible on the other side of the Atlantic in the halting steps of special reforms, and the growing indisposition of Government to deal with great social questions over which its jurisdiction is clear. This is true in a measure of our own country, while the moral felonies which blacken our politics and defile the name of religion have their root, to some extent, in the same soil. This deadly mildew of modern life, this dry rot of moral unbelief which would wither the leaf and flower of virtue, must be arrested if we would escape social stagnation and spiritual death. We speak earnestly, because we feel deeply, when we say that by all means we must keep alive our faith in virtue, in the preciousness of character, and in personal responsibility; for, without this faith, men will content themselves with coddling their own worldly comfort, and turning every good cause adrift, while we shall be left without God and without hope in the world.—North American Review, September-October, 1878.

THE RELIGIOUS OUTLOOK IN THE WEST.

ED. INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Here in the West the observant rational sees many unpleasant features in the religious outlook. The aristocracy of grace is apparently very prosperous. The revivalists who go about the country dubbing sinners with spiritual knighthood in the name of God are successful, if crowded houses, insanely excited communities, and long purses are any indication of success. And the more coarse and irrational their preaching, the greater their apparent success. And these knight-errants of Orthodoxy preach a gospel more disgustingly immoral than that of Tetzels in the days of Luther. Tetzels made people pay for their passport to glory. But a cheaper way has been devised; sainthood to-day costs only a little mumbling of dogmas well wet down with tears, hysterical or otherwise. Such saints are easily made to-day; and, after they are manufactured, they are a curse to the world and a disgrace to their Creator.

Dr. McCosh opposed evolution because there were so many apparent gaps in the process. But in the hands of popular religion, the reprobate of yesterday is met to-day dressed in the livery of heaven, acting as plenipotentiary from Omnipotence. What an awful moral gap is there here!

In our midst is a man who for years was a debauchee, and in one day he was thus galvanized into a saint. Nay, worse than this: this man is not only represented as standing on the steps of the throne in the full blaze of divine favor, but he is applauded when he turns earthward; and, with lips not yet forgetful of their long-inwrought sensuality, boldly charges, in the name of God (sic), that the disbeliever in Jesus, though a man of integrity, is the joy of the devil. If this be so, we will make our bed in hell and rejoice. Of old it was prophesied that there would come a time when wolves would go about in sheep's clothing. That time is here, and the Church monopolizes the trade of disguising wolves in robes of innocence. They go in as wolves, they come out (in appearance) lambs; but worse than this is the fact that they claim to possess a commission bearing the seal of infinite justice. "There is no alchemy known in the dread hereafter that will turn dross into gold," is the closing sentence of an article on "Future Punishment," in the last British Quarterly. Undoubtedly true; but Orthodoxy stoutly claims a possession of such powers of alchemy as far as the present is concerned. Shame upon Orthodoxy for banishing the alchemist from the hereafter, while herself pretending to work the alchemist's charms in the present! Thus moral distinctions are effaced, character is discounted. The way to heaven is made the monopoly of an ecclesiastical pooling-ring.

The press condemns our civil service because advancement is a matter of patronage, and not a reward of solid worth. At such injustice a cry of horror fills the land, and men say, Let us reform our civil service. But before this, let us first reform the civil service of heaven. Popular religion represents salvation as a matter of patronage,—not as a reward of solid worth. As men get office by clinging to the garments of a politician, so we must get salvation by clinging to the robe of Jesus.

Civil service reform must commence with theology. There sits the monster; there is the fountain-head of the stream that bears moral death to the nation. Men rise not above their God ideals. What! expect a reform in our civil service while the Church represents God as acting precisely like a ring politician,—that is, rewarding people for other considerations than purity of character? Such teaching is a brutalizing and barbarizing force.

This is only one proof of the moral incapacity of the Church. Talk about exempting the Church from taxation because it is a teacher of morals! Pahaw! It doesn't teach morality. Morality sits in the back seat, poor thing, in cold neglect, except as the preacher sees fit to condemn and insult, when it becomes the centre of a thousand scorn and jeers and mockings.

What man, when in doubt as to the true course of action in business, would think of going to a clergyman for moral instruction? The article is not among his wares. Dr. Tiele shows us how, in the early stages of religious growth, religion was united to morality. Now the case is worse; religion is disjoined from morality.

But the Church is as tyrannical to mind as oblivious to morals. The Indians put boards on their children's heads to flatten and repress the brain. But what is that to the conduct of Orthodoxy in hooping the intellect by its iron bands of dogmas? We condemn the Chinese for disfiguring the feet and crippling people; but what does Orthodoxy do but put thought into the iron shoes that Calvin wore?

Is not mind more than body? Orthodoxy despises evolution because it makes our ancestors monkeys; yet in anathematizing reason, she tries to put us below them, for even monkeys have surely a little reason. Now there is, perhaps, no place where the truth, that progress makes the problem of life more complex, is better illustrated than in the West. With progress there is an increasing demand for more reason to enable men to solve the problems of society. The perpetuity of progress depends upon the increase of reason. When that time arrives that the average power of reason is below that quantity demanded for the solution of life's problem, at that point demoralization and retrogression must set in. Every year, especially here in the West, is complicating the problem of life, and therefore increasing the demand for stronger and better trained powers of reason. Were they needed, a thousand illustrations of this vital truth might be gathered from the everyday duties of common life. Now, in view of this fact, is it anything less than criminal for a church to set itself against reason, as the fountain of evil and the citadel of the devil? The church that says to men that they must not reason is preparing these men for political nonentities; nay, worse: for elements of ruin.

The clergyman that preaches that reason is a dangerous guide is preparing men for the guidance of demagogues, making them the sport of professional quacks,—is preparing the way for social disruption and political anarchy. The preacher that discredits the authority of reason is paving the way for the progress of error, superstition, fraud, misrule, and retrogression.

A church that requires men to renounce reason as they step over her threshold is clearing the ground for the erection of shams and gigantic deceptions. The Sunday-school teacher that paralyzes the reason of children by demanding their acceptance of miracles and irrational dogmas is not only neutralizing the scientific spirit instilled by secular education, and thus defeating the object for which the public treasure is expended, but is actually maiming their very natures, and is consigning them to the use of theological crutches—something worse, if not so observable, as the dependence upon material ones.

This popular blasphemy of Nature, in which reason is anathematized in the interest of ignorance, bigotry, and superstition, is a damning blight upon every life, disqualifying every man, woman, and child, upon whom its influence lights, for the best and truest discharge of life's most sacred duties. To pick our way through the mystic maze of life's myriad duties, so that we may ever be in the line of right, truth, and joy, demands reason. Hence a religion that demands the amputation of reason multiplies our foes, robs us of our peace, bolts before us the treasure-house of truth, blocks the way that leads to the joy-crowned heights of life, slays our guide, and leaves us in a desert where we are forever the prey of marauders, disarms us of our weapons, and multiplies the enemies around us, and darkens the sky above us. We are accustomed to hear ridicule meted out to those religions of old that demanded a bodily mutilation of its votaries; but how much worse is popular religion that demands a mutilation of mind, an assassination of thought, beside which the bloody rites of ancient times were as sweet innocence and commendable justice. Such is the popular religious teaching here in the West. As a result, we find the people divided into three classes: those who believe, those who countenance, and those who ignore. The thorough-going, believing class is the smallest of the three, and numbers only a very small fraction of the total population.

It is hardly necessary to speak of the influence of such teaching upon this class of stout believers. By it they are debarred from progress. This is self-evident; for progress is rationalization, and in the renunciation of reason stop is put upon growth.

And yet it is hard to fully comprehend the extent of this mischief. In the horror of reason thus inspired, believers throw away the implements of progress,—they spurn their only powers of locomotion. They are warned away from science. The religious press and pulpit leave no opportunity to impress upon their minds the evils of science. With one voice they shout its dangers and viciousness. Thus they are kept from a knowledge of those facts and laws so well calculated to broaden, sweeten, and bless human life.

Again, the very religion in which they trust deludes them into a belief that they are pure, when they are not pure; that they are safe, when they are not safe; that they are saved, when they are not saved. It fills them with a self-complacency, a sense of security, a feeling of wealth, which is as opposed to progress in spiritual life as supreme egotism is to growth in knowledge. It gives them a readiness-for-heaven feeling, so that it is with supreme contempt that they impatiently listen to any urging toward general culture as something that is to shape the here and the hereafter. The maniac who suffers under the delusion that he has mines of gold at his command, cannot be made to see the necessity of work. As difficult is it to make the believer in popular religion see the necessity of his own culture.

"I am saved; Jesus has paid it all. His blood has made me clean." Again their progress is defeated because popular religion blinds them to the true way of progress. Every day brings the great truth into clearer light that growth must be along the line of natural law. But their religion makes them look for progress along the pathway of the supernatural. They are thus by popular religion as much deceived, and in the same manner, as those who look for the cure of bodily maladies by the influence of charms and the practice of magic.

Again, popular religion defeats their progress by binding them to an unnatural course of life. The Sunday-school teacher commends on Sunday a course of life which he would discharge his clerk for practicing on Monday. What merchant would keep a clerk who would turn the right cheek to the scallawag who had hit him on the left? Thus popular religion effectually retards the growth of its believers. They become a dead weight upon the spirit of the age; they stand not only unleavened by that spirit, but arrayed as a barrier in the way of advance.

Another effect of popular religion upon its believers is to intensify their bigotry, and shield them from the humanizing influence of the times. The drift of the age is toward the brotherly recognition of all men, and the estimation of each man by what he is in character. Popular religion antagonizes this humanitarianism by enforcing a fellowship of dogmatists, and an estimation of men by what they believe, making their ability to believe in hobgoblins more precious than learning or character.

This effect is well illustrated in the case of a neighbor who said his conscience would not allow him to sing for Unitarians; but it did not seem to interfere when he lied to his neighbor in a trade.

But there is another and larger class: those who countenance. Almost every day Orthodox people ask us, Do you really suppose that very many church-members believe the creeds, and what the minister preaches? Our answer is that we hope so; for down-right belief is better than hypocrisy. Here in the West, outside of the ministry, hardly an educated man, nominally Orthodox, can be found who will not confidentially tell you, when you get him into a corner, that he doesn't believe a word of it. This is true of church officials and Sunday-school teachers. Not a few young men of good standing, when plainly approached, will admit that they are, religiously, hypocrites. They speak in Sunday-schools and prayer-meetings the phraseology of Orthodoxy; they are willing to be popularly counted among the faithful; they rent pews in Orthodox churches; they commend their children to Orthodox instruction; they subscribe to Orthodox confessions; they bow assent to Orthodox preaching; but in reality they are not only indifferent, but unbelieving. That the existence of such a state of affairs argues a fearful amount of moral obliquity, needs no proof. It is the presence of this large class of apparent believers, but real unbelievers, that causes the real weakness of popular religion. That it is the natural result of the failure of the Church to be a moral guide and an intellectual teacher, is most plain.

The Church is responsible for this ugly state of affairs. Her course has been just such as would manufacture hypocrites out of all those whose minds were too large for her creeds, but whose interest demanded the favor accruing from religion. But it is not for us to upbraid her for her errors; this wide-spread hypocrisy is a source of weakness that is a fitting reward for her unjust stewardship.

We take the fact as it is, and concern ourselves only with the question, What are its bearings? To the persons themselves such conduct is a scorching drought. It is an unnatural condition that serves as a perennial source of ignoble life. A mind that is not honest with itself and the world, respecting the highest interests of life, is no place for the elaboration of a great character; great ideas do not luxuriate there; such is not the birthplace of holy, heroic aspirations. We need not speak of the dark damnation of hypocrisy that rests upon such. These are strangers to any burning enthusiasm for a great cause such as gilds humanity with a bright divinity.

Those who countenance Orthodoxy, without having any faith in it, commit religious suicide. They place themselves in an atmosphere from which all vitalizing properties have forever been removed. It is bartering life for its semblance; it is a perpetual shamming; it is a surrender of individuality to nonentity; it is trifling with duty,—making of life a hollow mockery, a vain show; it is a virtual dismemberment of self, and that, too, for the most shameful reasons. It is impossible to use language too harsh when we speak of the utter meanness of such insincerity. Upon society at large the result is equally injurious; it is a converting of so many integers into eiphers, and thus it vastly decreases the products of civilization. Here is a destruction of forces that are demanded by the best interests of the race. And this ruinous extirpation of religious interest and influence we must charge upon popular religion. But there is another aspect of the case more lamentable than that just noticed. How ruinous to the character of the young must be this parental hypocrisy in religion! The children of those who thus countenance, but disbelieve, Orthodoxy, are generally sent to the teachers of popular religion for culture in the higher things of life and duty. What death-blows to morality are dealt by that parent who in public says loud amens to doctrines that his own child well knows he despises. Thus the leprosy spreads from father to son.

But there is a third class larger than the other two combined,—those who ignore. Among these there are persons of every shade of interest and opinion, from those who never think of religion to those who, in the best sense of the word, have a religious experience of the most beautiful and vital kind, though not fashioned after the Orthodox pattern. But their general characteristic is that they ignore the Church. Occasionally they may be found in the churches to please friends, to pass away time, to hear the music, from personal regard to the clergyman, or other reasons, but not from religious motives; not because they expect anything will be said to benefit them.

Some look upon popular religion as a good thing in its way, for the ignorant; some look with contempt, some with entire indifference. But all, as far as their own lives are concerned, ignore it. Its warnings, its discussions, its pleadings, no more touch them than those of the lama of Tibet. And yet among this class there is little organized opposition to Orthodoxy; nor is there any attempt at a reconstruction of anything else to take its place.

Several things are remarkable about this class. Its extent in numbers is remarkable; the character of those composing it is remarkable. They are the best men in business and in the professions. Another remarkable thing is their quietness and indifference to organization, while surrounded by such irrational teachings from the popular pulpits. Another thing to be noticed is the extent of the breach between themselves and the Church. There are hardly any points of contact. The clergyman may prove his doctrine by the Bible, but they see in it only a human book; he may appeal to Jesus, but over them Jesus has no influence save as his teachings may commend themselves to their own minds. Popular religion, therefore, does them but little harm, because it does not directly influence them. Apparently they are in a religious retirement, yet it is among this class that there may be found the freest religious thought and the deepest religious life and the most beautiful religious experience. They are thinking out and living their own creeds from day to day; they have a religion, but do not know it under that name. In fact, the irrationality of popular religion has caused these persons to look upon religion in general as a superstition, and their prompt reply to any religious inquiry is, "I haven't any religion; I believe in honesty,"—a frequent reply not very complimentary to the Church. With the first class popular religion is a dread reality; with the second it is a convenience; with the third it is considered a delusion.

To the first the Church seems as a weak sort of consolation; to the second as stock in trade; to the third as a target of criticism. The first have religion in its antique concreteness; the second possess a religious pretence; many of the third unconsciously enjoy a religious life. Such, then, in broad outline, is the religious outlook here in the West. If here we should attempt any lamentation over the scene thus portrayed, doubtless many would say, "Tis all right; 'tis but to let the ignorant hug their superstitions; and as for the third class, are they not free from the old,—just where we wish them to be?"

It is only too true that when we say that popular theology is immoral, that it induces in the masses hypocrisy or spiritual lethargy, many will composedly remark, "What of it?" This, too, said in a tone that declares them aliens to every true interest of humanity. Such is not the spirit that has led men up to the holy heights of such heroism as the world has loved to remember and honor. There is no ring of greatness in that tone; it is hollow and false. Such words flow not from a heart filled with love for humanity. Something of the coward shows through; something of the indolence of Asia sounds in the voice. This state of affairs reveals enough cautionary signals to make the wayfaring man apprehensive of danger.

Popular theology is a menace to the hope of humanity. It disqualifies the first for progress; it debauches the second; it exiles many of the third from organized moral culture. It hardly needs any argument to make good these assertions. Progress in civilization is along the line of growth in character; hence, the first class are just so far obstacles to progress as their theology influences them, for it is a persistent war upon the worth and beauty of character.

As for the second class, it is impossible for them to have any moral enthusiasm; the very motive that put them where they are was a death-warrant to every rising aspiration for a higher life among men. A man who just countenances popular religion for the material advantages which it conveys, is already spiritually dead; he adds no life-forces to the church which holds his membership, and he is shut out from every other avenue of zeal.

Popular religion has simply annihilated the moral impetus of this class. The third class, by the irrationality of Orthodox religion, have been driven into a region of spiritual life where no necessity is felt for coöperation, for association, for positive, affirmative work in ethical culture. With them the joy of emancipation has been so great that there has been no care or thought for life's greater enfranchisement; they see not the necessity of work to give them the more blessed freedom of culture's royal estate. But the whole history of the race is full of instruction on this point. The devil takes those who are out of the old, and not in the positive new. Those out of prison, and yet out of a home, are where ruin lurks. Hence this third class is in danger because it is destitute of organized methods of ethic culture. Work for general righteousness is growth in individual character; hence organization is needed not only to gather units of effort into a vast product of results, but to supply the motive to put forth effort. Again, organization is needed to diffuse the higher life through the lower ranks, as the school diffuses the higher knowledge thus. Thus this third class are not beyond the need of culture; not beyond the need of organization for culture. The Church fails, from reasons already given, to afford them culture; and yet to longer continue without organized rational methods of culture is dangerous; not that man must ever be in the bondage of an ecclesiasticism, but that he needs culture to be free.

What shall be done? This question we do not propose to answer, but in conclusion would present a hint or two which may be of some use.

1. What is done must be heroically radical,—no diluted Orthodoxy will do. It is not a grafting, but a planting that is needed. The old house cannot be made suitable for the new family by putting on here and there a liberal bay window; a new home must be built upon a new foundation. There is an irrepressible conflict between ecclesiastical authority and reason; naturalism and supernaturalism. No compromise will do; compromises have been tried and they have failed. Liberal religion has too long failed by trying to keep its place as a sort of corporal's guard to the right of the Orthodox army.

A half-way liberalism is no liberalism at all. It is hated by Orthodoxy and feared by the rational. A liberalism that makes the man Jesus its Lord, is as inconsistent, and a far greater failure than an Orthodoxy that makes its Christ ideal a very God. Those who have rejected the Christ of Orthodoxy can only seldom be made enthusiastic over the Jesus of conservative Unitarianism. Those who have rejected the substance will not be won by the semblance.

Again, a liberalism that ties itself to the Bible as a book that contains the supernatural revelation of God, has all the defects and none of the virtues of Orthodoxy. This third class can only be roused to enthusiasm by a liberalism that is bold and outspoken, free from any taint of supernaturalism, and devoid of superstition.

2. What is done must be enthusiastically radical. What is needed is the enthusiasm for a great idea; what is needed is a shrill battle-cry that will voice into a plain language, comprehensible by the masses, some great practical truth. It must touch something tangible in the present common experience of humanity. Liberals must feel how much depends upon them, and enthusiasm will run as a mighty river of irresistible power.

3. What is done must be reconstructively radical. It may be a poor shanty in which people live—one that they feel is shockingly and needlessly poor,—but they will hardly be won to an out-door life, without any protection as long as it stands at all. Let liberalism build its palace by the shanty's side, and people will be glad to go there and live. Liberalism must crowd out the old by a new growth. Results, not arguments, are needed to make liberal religion popular. The question that is perplexing the minds of thinking people to-day in the Church and out, is not whether Orthodoxy is true; they are ready to admit the falsity of its fundamentals. They are asking, Where is there anything better?

Arguments will not answer the critical inquiry of the masses. They must have ocular demonstration in results clearly wrought out and noble.

LOUISIANA NOTES.

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 5, 1878.

DEAR INDEX:—

Although Louisiana liberals are apparently few and silent, they take a deep interest in every movement affecting the growth of liberalism throughout the country. They note your position on the question of obscene literature in the mails with pride, and hope the coming Congress may be wise enough to vindicate your manly stand for the protection and not the abuse of individual liberties, in accord with the highest demands of society.

Extreme depression in business previous to and following the advent of the fever plague will probably deprive Louisiana of representation in the Annual Congress on the 26th of this month.

Mrs. E. L. Saxon, a member of the State Committee, and President of the Ladies' Physiological Society, has most earnestly labored for the relief of the fever sufferers, proving herself invaluable by reason of her preëverance and indomitable energy. I regret to inform her friends of THE INDEX that she has been sorely tried by the scourge. Her son hovered between life and death for many hours, and before he had entirely recovered, her youngest daughter, aged eleven, was taken down, and on Thursday 3d inst., her eyes were closed to the scenes of this earth forever. To the noble woman and bereaved mother, our heartfelt sympathy is due in the hour of affliction.

Another member of the State committee, Dr. W. H. Gray, of Morgan City, is busily engaged at his profession, in a fever centre. He writes that out of fifty-six yellow-fever patients under his charge only five have died.

The undersigned, honored with a membership of the National Executive Committee for this State, has been made a trustee of a relief fund, being distributed among the sufferers who are becoming a legion, dependent upon the charities from abroad.

Therefore, let it be understood that we are not afflicted with lukewarmness, but compelled to yield to circumstances beyond our control, in absenting ourselves from the Liberal Congress, and a failure to properly organize this State.

Very respectfully, EMERSON BENTLEY.

THURMAN ON SUMNER.

I knew Mr. Sumner very well, and saw him quite frequently outside of the Senate, in a social way, and conversed with him on all sorts of topics, literary and general as well as political. The attractive quality of Mr. Sumner's conversation was its elevated tone and its entire freedom from vulgar anecdote and allusion. It was not, however, the conversation of a profound or original mind, nor of an acute thinker. Neither was his expression brilliant, nor always felicitous. His talk was simply that of a scholarly and very well-informed gentleman. But his scholarship has, as appears to me, been very much overrated. He was in a certain sense widely read, but he had not wide attainments. He spoke, I believe, only one foreign language, the French, and that with some hesitation, stopping often for a word, as he did sometimes even in English. He should have spoken French well, having lived a year or two in Paris; but he had acquired his knowledge of the language so late in life as to have missed a correct accent. I have heard him read from an Italian book, but he did not speak in Italian, and knew almost nothing of German, I think. In the matter of reading, Mr. Sumner was a sort of omnivorous browser in literature, reading a great deal promiscuously and miscellaneous, without the method which seems to me to be necessary to acquire the proper instruction or discipline from study. This habit of unlimited general reading to keep posted, as it is expressed, upon a host of topics, the new as well as the old, tends to stultify the mind rather than quicken it. Nothing so quickly and surely becomes dull, for instance, as a book of anecdotes. It is like a dinner all dessert. Mr. Sumner used his information obtained in this habit of general reading, but he never fairly digested it, or broke it in with his own mind. He crammed a great deal, and then spent his time in working up the results into stately sentences, which in some way escaped the edge of eloquence. As a public man, Senator Sumner gained his reputation by his persistent enthusiasm in the anti-slavery cause, and from his personal and political integrity. He was, peculiarly speaking, honest and incorruptible, beyond suspicion even. He had not great political sagacity. In this sort of wisdom he was excelled a hundred times over by his colleague, Henry Wilson, who, in my judgment, was the most discriminating judge in political matters, and the ablest party leader that the Republican party has ever had.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

LIFE.

Oh youth-time rare!
What meaneth life to thee?
Can thy clear eye
Pierce its dark veil of mystery?
"Life bringeth me love's richest treasure;
The golden hours enchanted flow;
But whence life's spell
I cannot tell,—
Its past or future cannot measure,
The wondrous secret cannot know."

Oh toiler strong!
What meaning doth life yield
To thee? Hast thou
The hidden well-spring seen revealed?
"In heavy laden days of duty
All vain is toil and thought to see
The hidden source
Of law and force,
Whose workings fill the world with beauty,— Unfathomed still life's mystery."

Oh trembling age!
Hast thou, in growing old,
Life's purpose found?
To thee hath been its meaning told?
"Life brought to me joy's skies of azure,
Youth's dream of love, years toil-oppressed;
But still no tone
From the unknown
Disclosed life's charmed source of treasure;
Soon sinks in death earth-life's unrest."

Oh mystic life!
Still flowing silently,
While ages flee,
Thy secret known alone to thee,
Oh now thy beauty doth delight us;
Thy full tide swelling high and strong.
It ebbs and flows,
It comes and goes;
Anon thy vivid terrors smite us
As thy mighty current sweeps along.

Who e'er shall mark
Thy boundaries sublime?
Thy marvellous power
All space pervadeth, and all time.
Our little years thy power upholdeth;
To us its force mysterious lends.
We live and die,
We know not why.
Too soon, too soon thy spell enfoldeth;
Our life with thee in silence blends.

A CARD.

We, the undersigned, Directors of the National Liberal League, offer ourselves as candidates for reelection at the Second Annual Congress of the League, on the following platform of principles:—

1. The right of absolute individual freedom of thought, of speech, and of the press, on all political, religious, social, or other questions, and the right of being wholly uninterfered with by the courts, no matter what opinions as such may be advocated or promulgated.

2. The right and duty of Congress and State Legislatures to pass, and the right and duty of the National and State courts to enforce, laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails; provided, that the offence known as "obscenity" shall be so strictly defined in the statutes as to render impossible the prosecution or punishment of any one for the expression of his honest opinions on any subject.

3. The flagrant wrong of intrusting the execution of the laws for the suppression of obscene literature to any official or officials who shall not scrupulously confine their action within the limits here clearly defined.

And we decline to be candidates for reelection if the principles of the above platform shall fail to be approved by the National Liberal League at this Congress.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.
 WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.
 J. A. J. WILCOX, Treasurer.
 D. G. CRANDON, Chair. Fin. Comm.

ONLY THOSE who labor for the real and permanent interests of society, which are always those of justice, freedom, and genuine morality, are at last approved by the deliberate judgment of mankind. He who yields to the passionate and importunate demands of the moment, and lends his sanction to that which is inherently immoral, may be greeted with cheers at the time only to be remembered with mingled pity and contempt by posterity. In this question of obscene literature, we choose to consider only the ultimate verdict, which, whatever the decision of the moment, will sustain our position unreservedly. The National Liberal League may, if it pleases, vote solidly for "repeal"; but such a vote will be its own defeat, not ours. There are lessons well worth pondering in this paragraph from the Tribune of Oct. 10: "Not a great many people outside of Boston will remember the Rev. Nehemiah Adams, who died in that city last Tuesday. Yet twenty years ago the proslavery folk used his name to conjure with. He was the author of a book, now nearly forgotten, which made a great noise at the time, and was thought by those who wished to think so, a sort of set-off to Uncle Tom's Cabin. It was called A South Side View of Slavery, and it gave those who took a patriarchal view of the institution a great deal of satisfaction. Mr. Rufus Choate, who was a parishioner of Dr. Adams, was particularly delighted with it, and lost no opportunity of extolling its author. Really, the condition of the slave, no matter how comfortable it might be, had but little logical bearing upon the abstract question of slavery; but men like Dr. Lord, of Dartmouth College, and Dr. Adams, thought that it had, and were never weary of arguing that the institution was a divine one, because most of the Southern negroes had enough to eat and to wear." Gentlemen of the "repeal" party, you may succeed at Syracuse in blinding the convention, and in making the worse appear to be the better reason for the hour; but you will fail utterly before that larger audience which is not to be imposed upon, and will take your place beside Dr. Adams and the host of others who, it matters not whether honestly or dishonestly, pleaded the hopeless cause of that which is wrong.

THE LIBERAL LEAGUE: ITS PAST AND FUTURE.

Six years ago, there was no Liberal League. But our thoughts were as busy with it then as now, planning how to initiate a great organization which should unite all liberals on principles common to them all, both for their own advantage, and even more for the application of the mighty moral and intellectual forces latent in unorganized liberalism to the higher development of society, and the nobler direction of the national life. We believed that the time had come for a powerful and dignified affirmation by the liberals of America that their principles were the substratum of modern civilization, and that the fortunes of liberalism and the fortunes of this vast republic were indissolubly bound together. We believed that the total separation of Church and State was the necessary condition of the further evolution of humanity, the indispensable first step in the realization of the resplendent dream of a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people." We believed that, until all the faculties of human nature were completely emancipated from the control of the ecclesiastical spirit and policy, there could be no full, natural development of either individual, social, or political life in the future, and that the mission of liberalism was twofold—first, to make humanity totally independent of ecclesiasticism, and, secondly, to prove historically the adequacy of natural conscience and reason for the creation, maintenance, and development of a better state of society than had ever yet existed. That belief was the germ of the Liberal League.

In the first issue of THE INDEX for January, 1873, the call to organize Liberal Leagues was originally promulgated. The plan of organization there matured in detail proposed the formation of local Leagues all over the country, and, as soon as five hundred such had been organized, the calling of a "National Convention of Liberal Leagues," composed of two delegates from each, for the purpose of uniting them all in a powerful national movement. The response was enthusiastic enough, but a rapid success of the movement was obstructed by many causes, above all by the lack of unity among the local Leagues already formed, while waiting for the "National Convention" just referred to. After a couple of years, it became evident that the project of organizing a National League ought not to be longer postponed. A "Preliminary Convention of Liberal Leagues" was therefore held at Philadelphia, September 17, 18, and 19, 1875, at which it was voted to call a "General Congress" of liberals in the same city "on or before the Fourth of July, 1876," for the express purpose of organizing a "National Liberal League"; and a General Centennial Committee was appointed to execute this plan. In conformity with the arrangements made by this committee, the "Centennial Congress of Liberals" was held at the great Centennial Celebration in Philadelphia, 1876, and the new National Liberal League was successfully launched on the hundredth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence.

Two years have elapsed since that time. During the first of these, twenty Auxiliary Leagues were chartered by the National League; during the past year, this number has been nearly trebled. The movement has been steadily striking root, and growing in power. From the beginning, the aim has been to create an able, high-toned, and dignified REPRESENTATIVE ASSEMBLY for American liberals, not for the purpose of controlling them in the least, but for the purpose of bringing to bear on public opinion and national affairs the concentrated influence of the great liberal party as a whole, and of thereby making the principles of liberalism enter into the collective life of the nation as factors of beneficent and constantly increasing power. In no other way than this can the liberals discharge the great public duty they owe to their principles, to their country, to mankind. The days of pure individualism are over; the grand idea, sentiment, and spirit of unity, without violating the freedom of individuality in the slightest degree, are everywhere asserting themselves to-day as never before, and slowly reconciling the individual and the race in complete harmony of coöperation for the noblest ideal ends. Of this characteristic tendency of the nineteenth century, the National Liberal League is a condensed proof and most significant illustration; it is a genuine product of the spirit of the age, as comprehended and interpreted by the truest philosophical and spiritual insight. To destroy its budding beneficence for the gratification of mere pride of opinion or personal spleen would be a crime against the century itself, and the long future of centuries. Patiently and tenderly have we watched over this seed of our own planting, watering it and tending it with a care such as mothers bestow upon their offspring, and expending upon it an amount of thought, time, and toil such as no one else will ever again expend. The object held steadily in view has been simply the advancement of the liberal cause in the noblest possible way, by making liberalism itself contribute its united energies to the true advancement of the country and of mankind. Few indeed have comprehended this object; many, even of those from whom comprehension might have been fairly anticipated, have cavilled at it, misrepresented it, belittled it, or ignored it altogether. Nevertheless, the National Liberal League has been steadily growing all the while; it is already beginning to be felt, and will continue to be felt in proportion to the wisdom of its management and the growth of its local constituency. It has nothing to fear from without; all its perils are from within. And it is now called suddenly to confront one of these internal perils.

Briefly stated, this peril consists in the temptation to betray the fundamental purpose of the organization. No organization can ever be false to its own organic idea, and live; its life consists in faithfulness to it. What is the organic idea of the National Liberal League?

To answer this question, it is only necessary to quote the second article of its Constitution, which is in this:—

"ARTICLE II.—The general object of the National Liberal League shall be to accomplish the TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE: to the end that equal rights in religion, genuine morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood in all human life, may be established, protected, and perpetuated."

Genuine morality in politics—note those words. The total separation of Church and State is not an end in itself; it is only a means; it has its end in the establishment of "equal rights in religion, GENUINE MORALITY IN POLITICS, and freedom, VIRTUE, and brotherhood in all human life." Whatever is opposed to genuine morality in politics or to virtue is, ipso facto, opposed to the primary end for which the National Liberal League was organized—is flatly hostile to its organic idea and fundamental law. The National Liberal League is pledged by its own Constitution, explicitly and unequivocally, to genuine morality in politics and therefore in legislation; if it can be driven, seduced, or beguiled, on any political question, into any position which is inherently opposed to genuine morality, it draws the sharpest of razors across its own throat, and will speedily be no more.

Now the question of the so-called Comstock laws is preëminently one of political morality. Having been judicially perverted to the punishment of individuals who have committed no real crime whatever, these laws have been made an engine of individual oppression and also violation of freedom of the press. Against this oppression and violation both the "repeal" and the "reform" parties protest with equal vigor. But why? Simply and solely because the oppression of individuals and the violation of freedom of the press are POLITICAL WRONGS OR IMMORALITIES—direct transgressions of "genuine morality in politics." If these governmental acts are not wrong or immoral, then the protest is not only invalid, but even ridiculous. The "repeal" party themselves, by the bare fact of protesting against these political wrongs or immoralities, confess that the whole question is one of "genuine morality in politics." They cannot pretend, therefore, that the protest in which "repeal" and "reform" unite is not essentially a moral protest. If it is not wrong for government to violate rights (words expressive only of moral ideas), then there is nothing whatever to complain of, and the protest is simply a piece of arrant folly. There can be no doubt, however, that the abuse of the Comstock laws is an offence against "genuine morality in politics," and entirely justifies the moral protest made by "repeal" and "reform" alike.

But now the difference between "repeal" and "reform" emerges to view. In order to right one wrong, and prevent the perpetration of further violations of individual or public rights, "repeal" commits another wrong and demands that the crime of mailing obscene literature shall hereafter go unpunished. Shall government, or shall it not, protect society and its individual members from criminals and their crimes? To demand that there shall be no law against the mailing of obscene literature is necessarily to demand that that crime shall go unpunished; and to demand that any crime shall go unpunished is a glaring violation of all political morality. This is the position of "repeal." But "reform" demands protection against any further wrongs under cover of the Comstock laws, and just as emphatically demands protection for society against the crime of mailing obscene literature. Consequently, the "repeal" position is half in favor of, and half opposed to, "genuine morality in politics"; while the "reform" position is wholly in favor of it.

Could anything be plainer, therefore, than that the National Liberal League is now solicited by the "repeal" party, as opposed to the "reform" party, to assume a public position which is, on a most grave and important public question, utterly immoral—utterly antagonistic to that "genuine morality in politics" to which the League is solemnly pledged by its own Constitution? The issue is one of life or death for the League. It cannot afford to deny its own foundations, or take a flagrantly immoral position before the world. To do that is to die. It is built upon respect for morality; it will crumble to pieces, if that foundation is now deliberately denied by its own action. It is altogether frivolous and silly to fly off on a tangent, and pour forth protestations of immaculate purity of motives, etc. Motives have nothing to do with this question; consequences have everything to do with it. If a man means to go to New York, but gets into a train bound to Chicago, what sense is there in scolding the neighbor who informs him of his mistake? No matter what his intentions, he will go to Chicago, and not New York, if he stays on board of that train. And no matter what the intentions of the National Liberal League, it will go straight to destruction, if it gets on board the train of which "repeal" is the conductor.

Why? For crushing reasons.

1. Because the National Liberal League is shaped symmetrically in all its parts for the ends named above, of which "genuine morality in politics" is one; and its beautiful ideal and beautifully adapted machinery can no more lend themselves to the purposes of "genuine immorality in politics" (which is a synonyme for "repeal" as opposed to "reform") than a beautiful painting can lend itself to the uses of a floor-cloth.

2. Because the National Liberal League appeals exclusively, as its Constitution declares, to "that natural intelligence and morality which constitute the necessary and all-sufficient basis of secular government"; and because, by taking the "repeal" position, it would outrage beyond forgiveness that very "intelligence and morality" from which all its support must come.

3. Because a deliberate majority vote for "repeal" will have the effect of serving a general "notice to quit" upon all those members who have too much respect for themselves to remain connected with an organization which has lost all respect for itself,—which has dared to insult the nation by demanding, not only that there shall be absolute impunity for the crime of mailing obscene literature, but that the nation itself shall become an accomplice in the crime.

4. Because, if the National Liberal League is ever to grow formidably great and strong in public influence, its greatness and strength must come from the accession of the very best liberals of the land—best in brain-power, best in moral character, best in executive ability, best in that generous love of humanity which moves men to consecrate their all to the service of their race; and because a decision by the League in favor of "repeal" will prevent all such accessions, until this decision is itself repealed with penitence and shame.

5. Because, if the National Liberal League is ever to grow numerically great and strong at the polls, it must receive immense accessions from that vast body of citizens who are neither Orthodox nor Radical in religion, but who will give their support to whatever they judge most likely to promote the general welfare; and because all such citizens will recoil with disgust from a fanatical organization which, deaf to all reason, insists that there is no way to protect freedom of the press without also making the mails absolutely free to the vendors of obscene literature. Common-sense should teach us all that the only hope of creating a victorious public opinion in favor of secular government depends on securing the votes of this great mass of unprejudiced, right-minded citizens, with whom lies the balance of power, and that advocacy of any policy which outrages their moral sentiment will prove fatal to the Liberal League. Nothing would be easier than to satisfy them that the Comstock laws should be confined to their legitimate object of closing the mails to matter intentionally vile and corrupting; but it will be impossible to convince them that such matter as that has any rights anywhere, or that the mailing of it is not essentially a crime.

Friends of liberty, truth, and justice, the National Liberal League is simply an opportunity for you to exert your legitimate influence in moulding the future of this great republic. We rely on the people's honest purpose to enact righteousness so far as they understand it; and it is your duty to show them what it is. The Liberal League, if true to itself, will be to you an increasingly valuable means of accomplishing this great work of popular education; if it now takes the immoral position of demanding freedom for crime as inseparable from freedom of the press, and thereby miserably belies its past, you cannot be wrong in concluding that it has no future, and in seeking some better means for the advancement of freedom's cause.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

I entered the field early this season, and am speaking almost every night, meeting, as far as able, the demand for lectures criticising the old creeds and systems, and presenting the latest and freshest thought of the age. Mr. Stevens, when he had editorial charge of THE INDEX a few weeks ago, in a paragraph referring very kindly to my efforts to advance freethought, represented that my work consisted chiefly in demolishing the Orthodox theology. The fact is, my work is chiefly positive and constructive, consisting largely in presenting from the platform modern, scientific, and philosophic thought. Criticism of the popular religion I regard as right and proper, as important and necessary; but only as a means to an end, only that the old and the false may be replaced by that which is truer and better.

The people are getting interested, to an extent they have not been in the past, in the issues between Christianity and freethought. I have had every evening I have spoken large and, almost invariably, very attentive and appreciative audiences. In some places, in the midst of political excitement, my audiences have been larger, I have been told, than have assembled in the same communities this fall to hear the political speakers of either party. Dissatisfaction with old creeds is growing deeper, and dissent from them more general every day. In some places the decay of theology is more rapid than the dissemination of scientific knowledge and the acceptance and assimilation of advanced liberal thought. Hence the necessity of giving great prominence and special emphasis to the positive side of liberalism. We must not be content with the mere disintegration of dogmas, creeds, and systems. We must popularize those scientific truths and those ethical principles which will serve as intellectual and moral food to minds that, in doubting and rejecting the teachings of their childhood, are in a state of unrest, and feel profoundly the need of something more in accordance with reason and common sense.

The question whether Congress has constitutional and rightful authority to prohibit the circulation of obscene literature through the mails is, I see, likely to be a matter of contention at Syracuse. Good men who are equally opposed to obscenity have opposite views on this subject. Neither side thinks for a moment that any paper or publication should be excluded from the mails on account of its sentiments, whatever they are. The question is simply whether filthy literature, written, not to convey information nor to maintain any doctrine or principle, but to inflame the passions of the young, and to make money thereby, should be excluded from the mails. Many, nearly all, probably, who think Congress has no authority to prevent its transmission by mail, hold that the State and Territories can and should suppress it by law. Both sides, then, are opposed to obscenity; both are in favor of its suppression by legislation; both are inflexibly opposed to any law suppressing any kind of literature on account of the views it advocates or opposes; both are opposed to the law of 1873 as it now stands, in as far as it is liable to be interpreted in a way that will render possible the conviction and punishment of any person for any other offence than circulating what is condemned by all decent men and women. One side thinks Congress has no authority to legislate on the subject, and that a law cannot be so framed that will not subject innocent persons to punishment. The other side thinks Congress has the authority to exclude moral filth from the mails, and that a law may be so clear and definite in mentioning the class of books to be excluded that no such injustice as is apprehended will result from it. This, then, is the difference between those who favor "repeal" and those who favor "modification." Shall this difference prevent continued harmony and co-operation between those who are equally interested in the objects of the League, but who are not agreed on the points above referred to? I hope not. Personally, I am with those who hold to the propriety of a law by Congress—the only authority that can make such a law—prohibiting the circulation of indecency and filth through the mails; but that is no reason I should not work with those who differ from me on this point for State secularization. A resolution in favor of "repeal," or of "modification," can only show which view is that of the majority; it will neither change the constitution of the League, nor subordinate its principles and objects to "repeal" or "modification."

I speak next at Nevada and La Rue, O. I give a course of lectures at Big Rapids, Mich., this month. I speak at West Liberty, O., Oct. 18, 19, and 20, and at Naples, N.Y., 23 and 24, and from there go to Syracuse. I attend the Convention. I will be as far West as Hannibal, Mo., November 12, when I begin a course of lectures in that city. B. F. U.

LIFE INSURANCE CHEATING.

Theology is not the only intellectual field in which freedom of thought is discouraged. Life Insurance, the modern method of providing for widows and orphans, has its Orthodoxy, which frowns upon discussion. You cannot attack its methods without having business people look at you very much as devoted church members look at infidels,—aghast.

Just now the Life Insurance world is a good deal excited by a new secret movement of the managers of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, the largest in the world. It cannot be fully appreciated without knowing that an ordinary insurance policy is a series of bets, which the company takes one at a time. The company bets that the insured will not die within a year; he, that he will. The two stakes, both held by the company, seldom, if ever, equal the face of the policy, and they always have to each other the ratio of the tabular chances, at his present age, of the insured surviving one year to the chances of his dying in that year. And, what is seldom understood by the insured is, that the company bets less and less every year, till in the last year of an endowment policy or of a life policy, when the age is 99 it bets nothing. What reduces the company's bet is the accumulation of a fund growing out of what the insured pays for a number of years at the start over and above his proper or tabular stake.

For example, at thirty, a man takes a policy for $1000 in the "Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, F. S. Winston, President," and is to pay $22.70 a year for it as long as he lives. Of this, $5.73 is margin for expenses, and has nothing to do with the bet. The net premium is $16.97. And this is what appears to be paid for the insurance of $1000 one year. But if $1000 were to be insured for one year by the company, the bet by the table would be $991.58 by the company, against $8.42 by the insured. And the company would then lose $991.58 by his dying, and win $8.42 by his living through: If, however, $16.97 is paid in advance, instead of $8.10 in advance, (which at four per cent. will be $8.42 at the end of the year), the company risks losing—that is bets—only $982.35. If its bet is reduced in the ratio of $982.35 to $991.58, then the other party's bet or stake must be reduced in the same ratio, and be $8.34 (or $8.02 if paid in advance). Deduct this $8.02 from $16.97, and we see that the insured has paid $8.95, which has nothing to do with the bet, and does nothing but diminish the company's bet by $9.31, to which it will amount at the end of the year.

If the insured dies, it comes back to his heirs, of course. For the company pays its stake..... $982.35
Returns the insured's..... 8.34

Which is the insurance..... $990.69
And gives up the self-insurance..... 9.31

Total..... $1000.00

If the insured lives, the company wins the $8.34 to pay death claims on other policies, but not the $9.31, which it is bound mathematically as well as legally to keep accumulating, to reduce its future bets.

If the insured should live to be sixty, and pay at sixty, this self-insurance fund will have increased to $440.25, and the company will that year insure only $559.75; that is, it will bet $542.77 against $16.98 that the insured will not die, and this $16.98 is all it can win if he does not, although at that age it costs $29.17, in advance, to insure $1000.

Now here comes the opportunity for the Chinese sharp practice, in a game which the public does not understand.

The insured has fully paid for all the insurance he has had, having lost thirty-one of his yearly bets, his full share of contribution to death claims. But if he stops betting, the company is relieved from all further risk on his account, and he would seem to be fairly entitled, on the average, to get back his $440.25 in cash. The reason why he will not get it is, that in drawing the policy, the company took advantage of his ignorance or carelessness, and inserted a clause by which the whole of it is forfeited to the company by the nonpayment of the $22.70 when due at the beginning of any policy-year.

However, if any man has such a policy as this, he must have been promised by the company, in one of its beautiful little books, that on its surrender after two years he might receive for it an "equitable consideration," "paid to him in cash"; and any court of equity in the world, worthy of the name, would say, if the company could afford to pay him one single cent, after his paying two premiums, it could afford to pay him at least $418.59 after paying thirty-one. Yet this company, which professes to hold in trust over $85,000,000 of the money of its policy-holders, which receives premiums every year to the amount of nearly $10,000,000, of which little short of $2,000,000 comes from Massachusetts, which does its business here in a building as gorgeous as a palace and with a steeple that would aggrandize a church, refuses to pay anything like $400 on the surrender of such a policy. If the holder, as has been the case with thousands, is unable to pay the $22.70, he is obliged at the very best to forfeit two or three hundreds of dollars, unless he is willing to go without his money, and take it out in more insurance. Such profits, in years past, have gone largely to swell dividends that served to content all policy-holders able to keep up their policies. But now comes a document announcing a new line of conduct, not that retiring members are hereafter to be treated equitably,—that might have been published openly,—but that the outrageous and inequitable forfeitures are no longer to be divided among persistent policy-holders, but are to be used in a certain way to entice new members. And this has to be put into a secret or "confidential circular," issued thus clandestinely, not by the responsible officers, but by the general agents to the soliciting agents, who are instructed to make as little noise about it as possible.

I have a copy of this circular before me. It is probably too long for your columns, but if I garble it at all the company can disgrace me by publishing it in full. I quote enough to show distinctly the mode of operation and the argument the managers rely on to escape injunction from the old policy-holders.

The mode of procedure will be as follows: when you receive from us a new policy for delivery, you will collect from the insured seventy per cent. of the premium payable on delivery in currency, and thirty per cent. in a draft of the following form:—

[EXAMPLE.] PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Oct. 19, 1878.
No. 182,963
MESSRS. VANUXEM, BATES & LAMBERT, PHILADELPHIA:
At sight please pay to the order of B. D. Smith seventy-nine dollars and fourteen cents.
Yours truly,
$79.14. ANNA W. JONES.

In the foregoing draft the number to be inserted should be the number of the policy; the place and date should be respectively that where and when the payment is made; the payee should be yourself, and the signature that of the person in whose favor the policy is written. The latter may be made by the insured signing as attorney where the beneficiary is other than the life insured. The company's receipt may then be delivered for the premium so paid, and returns and vouchers transmitted to us in due course. The usual commission on the full premium will be allowed. On receipt of the full payment made as directed, we will stamp the draft "Paid." The indorsement by you is without recourse; and if it should be necessary to satisfy the applicant that he will not be held liable for the draft, you may write the words without recourse before the signature. But do not do this unless it shall be absolutely required. The blank draft to be used will be sent you, etc., etc.

Of course the reader will see the necessity of keeping such instructions secret. This "mode of procedure" will be pursued for two premiums, the circular proceeds to say. "The third annual premium will return to regular rates less the regular dividend then awarded to all policies uniformly as before."

The circular says, "We wish this plan to be put into effect by personal explanation."—"No advertising permitted." As the words "without recourse" are not to be put before the signature of "Anna W. Jones" on those two drafts of hers, unless she "absolutely requires it," and she may not think of it, or look up "recourse" in Webster, or suspect the two words are necessary to protect her from having to pay the drafts out of her dividends, or, at all events, out of the policy when it becomes a claim, it is not likely that the agent's "personal explanation" will make her any wiser on that point. Perhaps the Boston Trustees of the Mutual Life, Gov. Rice and George C. Richardson, can explain what this circular means by so carefully avoiding the words "without recourse" before the drawers of these drafts, if the company does not intend to count them as assets, and take recourse. Here would seem to be a playing fast and loose—now you see it, and now you don't—worthy of the expertest thimble-rigger in the world. Here, to the insured who knows enough to put two certain words before his signature, there is a present of thirty per cent. of two premiums; and his drafts, being without recourse to the indorsing agents, are perfectly worthless. But to the ignorant dupe, nothing at all is given, for his drafts are as good to the company as so much gold, if it pleases to take recourse.

If the applicants for new policies should be sufficiently up to trap to make sure of the present of thirty per cent. of two premiums, since the agents are to have full commissions, there must occur some vacuum somewhere. As I have already said, it is to be filled from the fund robbed out of retiring members, which has heretofore fattened the dividends of the persistent. The argument to make them contented without it is this:—

When the number of lapses and surrenders grew to such proportions as to make it evident that the loss of contributing members must some day be repaired by the introduction of new lives at more than the average cost, a fund was created [extorted would have been the proper word] from retiring members, to which the existing policy-holders have not contributed, and which is now made available, and will be used for the purpose intended. The money contributed by the existing members is, consequently, not taxed for the benefit of new entrants, as might otherwise be supposed, and the foresight of the management is made apparent. The benefit of existing members will be in the enhanced addition to their dividends resulting from the infusion of new lives, and the corresponding diminution of the average death rate thereby.

The mortuary experience of this company, expensively and vauntingly published by it, flatly contradicts the pretence that the numerous lapses have so deteriorated the residual vitality as to make it necessary to introduce "new lives at more than the average cost." But if the old policy-holders are content to lose one of the great sources of their dividends, it is to be hoped they will see the propriety of putting a stop to the robbery of their unfortunate comrades who are obliged by poverty to drop their policies, for the purpose of enticing new business at reduced premiums out of which the agents may get "full commissions"!

One extract more, to exemplify the exceeding dignity of the men who through their general agents send their secret instructions to an army of solicitors.

In presenting this matter to the public, do not fall into the error of representing it as a discount, rebate, or dividend in advance. No dividend is ever declared by the company in advance. No charge is made against the policy or policy-holder for any part of the premium, and the whole of it is cash to the company.

How the whole of the premium can be "cash to the company," when the policy-holder paid only seventy per cent. of it, and no charge is made against his policy or him, is a conundrum which I can solve only by supposing, as above stated, thirty per cent. is drawn out of the robbery fund which the "foresight of the management" has "created." But then, why the drafts, with or without recourse? Why would not receipts in full, without the drafts, have done the business? Here we get into a fog, which only the Boston Trustees or the Insurance Commissioner can clear up. Ordinary eyes cannot see through it.

Finally nothing can be truer than what the circular says about the existing or persisting members not having contributed to the fund robbed from the retired members. And it is certainly true that the only reason for retaining anything out of the $440.25, in the case I have supposed, and the only legitimate use of it, after it is retained, is to get into the company, if possible, as good a life as it lost by the retirement. To do this the company proposes to give precisely $13.62, or thirty per cent. of two premiums. It ought therefore, by its own showing, to have paid the retiring policy-holder a cash surrender value of $440.25—$13.62=$426.63. Instead of that, it has paid, at most only one or two hundred dollars, and it expects with $13.62 to entice the new life into the same trap!

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

A NOVEL ORDINATION.

Mr. F. A. Hinckley was ordained and installed as resident minister of the Free Religious Society, at Providence, on Sunday, Oct. 6. The form of service was simple, but impressive. The President of the Society, Mr. Ballou, addressed Mr. Hinckley as follows:—

"Mr. Frederic A. Hinckley: I am instructed by the Free Religious Society of Providence officially to recognize you as our resident minister; and we therefore ordain and install you as such, in accordance with the principles and usage of our religious fellowship."

Mr. Hinckley replied in these words:—

"Mr. President and Members of the Free Religious Society of Providence: It is with no formal ceremony, but with the earnest purpose of the heart, that I here and now assume the trust you have tendered me. I assume it with a sincere desire to consecrate my best efforts to the service which it implies. I assume it in the spirit of liberty. I assume it in the spirit of brotherly love. And may all the good influences which the past or the present can bring, bless this our united effort to carry the principles of a natural, free, and practical religion to the souls of men."

Mr. Hinckley then gave a more formal address, setting forth in an earnest and forcible manner his idea and plan of work for a Free Religious Society. Mr. A. W. Stevens was present to represent the fellowship of liberals in general, and made a brief address.

AN ORTHODOX OPINION.

The comments of the Philadelphia Christian Statesman, in its issue of September 26, upon the issue to be decided by the Syracuse Congress, are deserving of careful consideration. They show that that journal, although the most determined opponent of the objects of the National Liberal League and of THE INDEX, is far more just and fair, and evinces a far truer insight into the existing situation, than those who are now vehemently insisting on "repeal."

There is a magnanimity worthy of all respect in this willingness to see and admit what is good even in a movement which is earnestly opposed. Of course the sneer will be thrown out that to be approved by opponents in any degree is necessarily a proof of having yielded to their demands; but such a sneer will commend itself only to fanatics. Orthodoxy and Liberalism have this in common, that they both seek to promote morality, however they may differ as to means, and even in some respects as to what morality is; and if this were not so, neither could maintain itself for a day. The comments of the Statesman prove how easily a "reform" of the Comstock laws could be obtained from the people, if justice were not denied and parodied by the demand for "repeal." The comments alluded to are as follows:—

The Second Annual Congress of the Liberal League is called to meet in Syracuse, New York, on Saturday, the 28th of October. It will consider the expediency of nominating candidates for the next Presidential election on the platform of secularism in politics; and also what action the League should take "with reference to the Constitutional Amendment already twice reported to the United States Senate by the Judiciary Committee, the practical effect of which, if adopted, will be to recognize in the Constitution the right of the Bible to be read in the public schools as a book of divine authority, and the right of church property to be exempted from taxation."

It is a striking illustration of the incapacity of infidels for permanent organization that the National Liberal League is at this moment involved in a bitter controversy, and is threatened with disruption. Significantly, too, the question in dispute is that point of practical morals on which unbelief has always displayed a fatal laxity,—the seventh commandment. The arrest and conviction of E. H. Heywood last summer for the circulation of an obscene pamphlet, intensified tenfold the bitter and unscrupulous warfare which had been waged against Anthony Comstock and the law under which he acts. A large part of the liberals furiously espoused Heywood's cause, and forwarded a petition to Congress demanding the repeal of the law. Mr. Abbot, President of the League and editor of THE INDEX, took the ground that a law prohibiting the transmission of obscene and immoral publications through the mails is right and necessary, but that such a law should be applicable only to productions whose intent and purpose was unmistakably corrupting. In reference to Heywood's case, he judged the author and publisher innocent of such corrupt intent, and denounced the decision of the court as an infraction of the sacred rights of personal freedom. He strenuously maintained, however, the necessity of some legal safeguards to social purity, and advocated the modification, not the repeal, of existing laws. For this exceedingly moderate position, he has been the object of unsparring attack by many liberals themselves; and it is now announced that a movement is on foot to capture the approaching Congress of the National Liberal League, to unseat Mr. Abbot from the Presidency, and to commit the organization to the demand for the unconditional repeal of the laws in question.

Mr. Abbot's course in this matter has been such as to win the respect of those who differ from him most widely on other points. We utterly dissent from his judgment as to the character of Heywood's book, but we endorse the general distinction which he makes, and we admire his fidelity to his own convictions. The whole controversy is not only a significant illustration of the tendency to disintegration inherent in all infidel organizations, but a fresh proof of the charge that unbelief tends to impure living. The New York World, commenting on the arrest of three or four persons at the Watkins Glen Convention for selling Heywood's book, makes remarks which THE INDEX admits have an uncomfortable modicum of truth: "It is a pitiable thing that the martyrdom of freethinkers is commonly incurred for the circulation of an indecent book. What necessary connection is there between freethinking and peddling indelicate writing upon delicate topics? Why do these reformers always come in contact with society upon this topic of the relation of the sexes? It cannot be that they choose this theme deliberately as their best battle-ground, and we must conclude that they drift towards such discussion in obedience to some prurient propensity inherent in the freethinking mind. Certainly if there be any cause in which martyrdom is not heroic, it is in the assertion of the right to peddle an indecent fifteen-cent pamphlet, with the indecent passages carefully marked to draw the attention of the reader."

CENSORSHIP OF THE PRESS vs. RIGHT OF PRIVATE JUDGMENT IN MORALS.

EDITOR INDEX:—

I have read attentively your elaborate articles on the obscene literature laws, and regret that my "pent-up" condition forbids me to worthily reply. In giving generous space to this important subject, you go to school to yourself in a way that suits me; for having got on a century without a censorship of the press, the American people will not sanction one now, even though the Liberal League continues its mistaken advocacy of it. Agreeing with you that, whether viewed as a State or Federal question, the issue differs only in degree—federal law covering a wider field, and clashing with more diverse interests,—I assert, without fear of successful refutation, that any law against obscene literature, since it invades mental liberty, initiates, if it does not establish, a censorship of the press. I understand you to concede that liberty is the natural and desirable condition of human beings; that to form and express opinions is the inalienable right of all; that "no man may use his freedom so as to infringe on the equal rights of others" (and conversely, that no one may restrict the rights of others because they do not think or act to please him); and that "the office of government," as well-defined by Daniel Webster, is "to protect persons and property from invasion." A Frenchman spent years to write a book perfect in style but devoid of thought; he failed, because even behind his purpose not to express thought was the thought to be thoughtless. Since no book, pamphlet, newspaper, or circular is possible without expressing opinions, any law forbidding any publication on any subject whatsoever invades opinions, and is therefore self-condemned on your own principles conceded above. John Calvin held that to think differently from himself was irreligious and hence immoral; so he burned Servetus with green oak wood. You hold that free thought in morals leads to obscenity, and you seek to restrict it by fining and imprisonment of its author or vendor. If you are right he was right, public opinion then allowing him to employ severer penalties than are now permitted. If liberty is unsafe, we must all go back under the "five points" of John Calvin's total depravity banner. Your claim to suppress what you call obscene literature, if conceded, destroys your right to publish THE INDEX when Orthodox jurists are able to suppress it. Rev. J. M. Manning, D.D., pastor of the "Old South" in Boston, once was reported to say in a Sunday evening discourse in Hollis Street Church, that the writings of Ralph Waldo Emerson are more immoral in their tendencies than the thefts and debaucheries of North Street, because immoral principles are more vitiating than vicious practices, though he had not the hardihood to invoke legal power to abate Emerson! Yet he will have such power if your view prevails, which fortunately it cannot.

You rightly say that those who would repeal the national statutes yet sustain State obscenity laws are illogical. Granted; but better be inconsistent favoring liberty than logically opposed to it. "To be great is to be inconsistent," says Emerson. State laws, heretofore, have been practically dead letters. They will be found to be as objectionable as the national laws when serious effort is made to enforce them. The fathers saw that State religion would admit oppression and disaster; "to be as good as they we must be better"; opposing State morality one must unflinchingly assert the right of private judgment in morals. The absurd doctrine of "constructive treason," demolished by the genius of Erskine in the famous trial of Tooke, Thelwell, and Hardy in 1794, reappears in present efforts to punish "constructive" immorality. You say "the crime" of obscenity should be defined. Certainly; will you please define it? Elizer Wright neatly says: "Obscenity, if there is such a thing, consists in want of respect for the sexual nature." Is that a punishable offence? But "society must be protected?" Yes, by maintaining individual liberty inviolate. In cases of forgery, libel, or perjury, invasion of persons gives ground for action. If I sell a book to another, or send it to him in the mails, its morality or immorality is our business, not yours. But "children should be protected?" Yes, by knowledge and discipline. When parents give a child money to spend, they invest him or her with power of contract, the child acting in place of parent; hence there is no invasion and therefore no grievance. If you invade the natural rights of the parent you destroy the child in advance. If one's child is safe only when watched by police, the parent should attend free-love conventions and learn how to have no more such children. Your idea of government seems to be compulsive, not voluntary; and hence in conflict with natural right,— which was before government, and will survive it. Mine finds liberty, individualism to be the primary facts; society to be an outgrowth, and the State an instrument to be "altered or abolished" as "we other folks" who improvise it think best. In attempting to regulate morals by any power outside of appeal to reason and conscience, you impose "communism" suitable for jails, but not encouraging to the voluntary associations of intelligent people contemplated in the Declaration of 1776, and the Massachusetts Bill of Rights.

You generously concede that my book is not obscene; but a United States jury and two United States judges thought differently; hence I am here, caged in a logical conclusion of your doctrine, more confining than convincing! I do not like it. Judge Clarke could make a strong defence of his rulings, in the case of the United States assault on me, based on invectives you have bestowed upon Cupid's Yokes in the columns of THE INDEX. The mistake is in Government undertaking to suppress publications of any kind whatsoever; and I am profoundly surprised that the policy of repression suitable to the Vatican in Rome is so stoutly defended by the founder of Free Religion within sight of Faneuil Hall! Your distinction between theoretical and practical opinions [we never made any such.—Ed.] would not be accepted by authors of the latter. Your habit of imputing a lascivious tendency to my free-love faith, and of implying that the friends of repeal (few of whom are free-lovers) practically favor obscenity, is as illogical as it would be for me to say that you favor drunkenness, because you wisely oppose prohibitory liquor laws. "Freedom," said Macaulay, "is the only cure for the evils which freshly-acquired freedom produces." Free-lovers were the first to detect the fearful prevalence of obscene desires and satisfactions, and have suggested the only method of effectual renovation; viz., liberty, and the knowledge, sobriety, and continence which follow in wake of expanding tendencies. Repression is abortive; kills at the breach, not at the muzzle. Have they suppressed Cupid's Yokes? They have advertised it. Have they "reformed" me? Not much. They have taken me from my beloved family, broken up my business, unfriended me as a felon, fed and caged me as a savage; but the ideas my book proclaims "march on" with greater speed and strength than before, and the rebound of the blow which struck me down, will demolish compulsive government itself! In reply to your fear that repealers hinder modification, my experience in reform is, that if you would get even a half loaf, ask for the whole. "The world rests on believers," says Emerson. The fact that modificationists, issuing no petitions of their own, turn their guns on the advance party, the repealers, indicates where the working forces of liberty gather, and on which banner victory will finally rest. Thanking you for your uniform friendliness and courtesy to me personally, and confident that this discussion will clear and broaden the scope of freethought, helping also to bring the grave issues of love and parentage within the domain of reason and moral obligation, which is the object of my book, I am yours to hasten it.

EZRA HOAR HEYWOOD.

{ CELL 52, THE JAIL, DEDHAM, Mass.,
{ Oct. 5, Y.L.B.

[1. There is no "censorship of the press" established by punishing libel (an abuse of the press to the malicious injury of an individual's reputation) as a crime. Neither is any such censorship established by punishing the circulation of obscene literature as a crime. Publishing remains in each case as free as eating or walking; but publications which are criminal, whether libellous or obscene, are treated as such.

2. It is preposterous to allege that we "hold that free thought in morals leads to obscenity." On the contrary, we hold that it leads to purity alone. We conclude that Mr. Heywood utterly fails to understand what he cannot argue against except by such wild misrepresentation. To establish freedom is necessarily to establish the possibility of crime, but not to deprive society of the right to punish crime.

3. There is no need to define obscenity in the abstract; the law would define it, by describing clearly the class of publications which it means to suppress, and by explicitly recognizing the right of free discussion of all subjects whatever. We have again and again described this class as publications whose main and manifest intention is, not to discuss or to excite thought, but to inflame lewd passions for the sake of profit to publishers or advertisers. Doubtless this definition can be improved; but it has been in substance before the public already nine months, at the very least. Why not criticise it, and thereby help to make it better, instead of shutting the eyes or looking the opposite way?

4. We cannot honestly "concede" Mr. Heywood's book to be, in our own opinion, "not obscene"; we have not done so. But we have all along contended that it ought not to be suppressed by law, because its obscenity is merely incidental, and because common-sense as well as common justice requires the courts to judge books by their general tenor and main object, not by exceptional passages.

We cannot make any further notes on the above, except to say that whoever insists on making the cause of free thought protect the villainess of really obscene publications, does his utmost to tie a corpse to a living body and to bury both together in the same grave.—Ed.]

FREE SPEECH ABOUT FREE LOVE.

GALETTA, Ontario, Oct. 2, 1878.

ED. INDEX:

Dear Sir,—It seems to me that in all the discussion that has been going on in THE INDEX and elsewhere about the case of E. H. Heywood, the main point at issue has been overlooked. It is, that society has the right to protect itself against any doctrine which is subversive of its own structure.

You yourself admit that it ought to protect children and youth by restraining and punishing the dealers in obscene literature; but, notwithstanding all that is said about the rights of women, they are just as much entitled to protection, and require it quite as much as children and youth. The free-love advocate, like Heywood, who goes about advising women to set at naught the marital relation, to seek for fathers to their children wherever they choose, is a greater enemy to society, is doing more to undo the work of civilization, than all the vendors of obscene literature put together. When, in addition to this, his work is admittedly coarse and indecent in sentiment and language, it is strange that so much sympathy should be wasted on him. In fact, the very name of his book is enough; for what man, desirous of treating this grave and important subject in anything like a scientific spirit, would give his book such a title as Cupid's Yokes?

It seems very extraordinary to hear some of the speakers at the indignation meeting in Boston (such as the Hon. Elizer Wright) taking occasion to say that they abhorred Heywood's views; which can only mean that the adoption of them by society would lead to consequences too horrible to contemplate. Yet they pour out floods of eloquence on his behalf, and would move heaven and earth to have his sentence remitted.

This alliance of freethought and indecency is a most unfortunate thing. It will have the effect of closing the ears of the Orthodox, and that, too, of the inquiring sort, to all appeals against superstitution. At the same time, such parties as Mrs. Besant and Mr. Bradlaugh are not to be put on the same category with Heywood. Their object is evidently to make marriage more general, by showing how its burdens may be more easily borne, thus facilitating the union of the sexes,—a praiseworthy object at any rate, whether they seek it wisely or not. I think such subjects are far better left alone. Nature will regulate these matters better than we can do. In our present stage of civilization, especially, our emergence from barbarism is so recent that the public discussion of such topics can only do harm.

Among the early races of men, chastity in woman and heredity on the paternal side were unknown. Proofs of this state of things are to be found in savage tribes still existing. By-and-by polygamy came into use, and strong men were able to give protection to a number of women. But all the experience of civilization goes to show that the right relation between the sexes—that which will give most happiness to the parents and most security to the children—is the marriage of one man with one woman. If the zealots of free love were open to argument, it would be easy to show them that the unhappiness in married life which so fires their imagination is due, not to the institution itself, but to the imperfect characters of the men and women who enter it.

It is noteworthy that almost all stages of social progress exhibit tendencies toward reversion to former conditions. Thus Mormonism is evidently a reversion to the ancient polygamy,—an experiment so contrary to the whole tenor of modern ideas that it will probably be short-lived. Free love is a reversion to an earlier and far more objectionable state of things. Were such a thing possible, we should land in the original chaos from which we emerged by so many painful steps and slow. If it is urged that the expression of opinion should be perfectly free, it is answered that there are many limitations to the expression of opinion. No one is allowed the free expression of his opinion if it injures the character of his neighbor. No one is allowed to preach down the government of the country in which he lives, because the safety and authority of the State are paramount considerations to individual freedom,—as witness the American civil war. But the free-love agitation is the greatest of all treasons, and strikes at the very root of human society.

J. G. WHYTE.

[We have altogether too much sympathy with Mr. Whyte's views of "free love" to dissent from his estimate of that; but he proves too much, we think, if it be admitted that opinions believed to be mischievous must be suppressed by force of law. The Roman Catholics would suppress us all on that ground! Libel and treason are crimes; so is the circulation of obscene literature. But no theory is a crime. The State can only deal with overt acts; there is no safety for liberty if it can deal with thoughts.—Ed.]

DANIEL WEBSTER is credited with once good naturedly writing a letter for an ignorant servant, and when he asked him, "Is there anything else to say, Mike?" the man scratched his head, and finally said: "Yes, if you please. Just say they must excuse the poor scholarship and want of sense the letter shows"; and the God-like Daniel accepted the suggestion.

CONTEMPORARIES appreciate the man rather than the merit; posterity will regard the merit rather than the man.—Buxton.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.	For 13 to 25 insertions, 8c per line.	For 26 to 50 insertions, 6c per line.	For 51 to 100 insertions, 5c per line.
13	25	51	100
26	51	100	100
51	100	100	100

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 26, 1872.
TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
Yours truly,
HENRY S. STERNBERG.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

Office, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON, publish

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

- O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
- WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
- WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
- Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
- GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
- DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
- Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenafly, N.J.
- J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
- ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
- C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
- W. D. L. SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
- BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.
- ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.
- JAMES E. OLIVER, Ithaca, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wilson and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. Wm. E. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion." Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, Wm. Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for five cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for five cents at the office.

For series of important Tracts see last page of THE INDEX.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1873 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston, Mass."

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, coarseness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fifth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyses the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of these several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 50 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. TO THE AMERICAN PATRONS OF CHOICE LITERATURE.

We have made arrangements with Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL, London, England, for the right to publish an American Edition of

The Fortnightly Review,

Edited by JOHN MORLEY,

and are now publishing this celebrated Monthly Magazine, from a special duplicate set of stereotype plates, which are forwarded from England so promptly as to enable us to produce each month, not only an exact facsimile of this able Review, but to publish it almost at the same time the original is from England. It is in every respect equal to the London issue, at about half the original price. This effort will place in the hands of American readers the freshest utterances of leading thinkers on the issues with a promptitude unequalled. The comments of a large number of the best European thinkers on Science, Philosophy, Literature, Politics, and Miscellaneous Matters of general interest cannot fail to be appreciated and encouraged by thoughtful American readers. The following are a few of the contributors:—

Matthew Arnold,	Alfred R. Wallace,
Herbert Spencer,	Frederick Harrison,
Goldwin Smith,	Prof. Tyndall,
Right Hon. Lyon Playfair,	Prof. Huxley,
Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone,	Prof. Darwin,
Lionel A. Trollope,	Author of Supernatural Religion ,
W. M. Grant Duff, M.P.,	Sir John Lubbock,
Hon. Robert Lowe,	Anthony Trollope,
Leslie Stephen,	T. Adolphus Trollope,
John Morley (the Editor),	Sir H. S. Maine,
G. H. Lewes,	Sir David Wedderburn,

AND NUMEROUS OTHERS.

Subscription Price, $5.00 per Year. Published every month by the ROSE-BELFORD PUBLISHING CO., 60 York Street, Toronto, Ont.

THE SECULAR REVIEW.

EDITED BY CHARLES WATTS.

The SECULAR REVIEW is the leading organ of Secularism, and each week has Special Articles on Theological, Social, Scientific, and Political Subjects. Its distinctive features are the advocacy of Constructive Secularism, and the dissemination of useful information on all questions which affect the welfare of the people. Letters are inserted in its "OPEN COLUMN" from all who are courteous in the expression of their views; while a special department is allotted for "NOTES AND QUERIES."

The Contributors to the SECULAR REVIEW comprise the principal advocates of Secularism, including its founder, G. J. Holyoake.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD. GREAT THROUGH LINE AND UNITED STATES MAIL ROUTE.

The attention of the travelling public is respectfully invited to some of the merits of this great highway, in the confident assertion and belief that no other line can offer equal inducements as a route of through travel. In stands confessedly at the head of American railways. The track is double the entire length of the line, of steel rails laid on heavy oak ties, which are embedded in a foundation of rock ballast eighteen inches in depth. All bridges are of iron or stone, and built upon the most approved plans. Its passenger cars, while eminently safe and substantial, are at the same time models of comfort and elegance.

CONSTRUCTION AND EQUIPMENT

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD

THE SAFETY APPLIANCES

in use on this line well illustrate the far-seeing and liberal policy of its management, in accordance with which the utility only of an improvement and not its cost has been the question of consideration. Among many may be noticed

The Block System of Safety Signals, Janney Coupler, Buffer, and Platform, The Wharton Patent Switch, and the Westinghouse Air-Brake, forming in conjunction with a perfect double track and road-bed a combination of safeguards against accidents which have rendered them practically impossible.

Pullman Palace Cars

are run on all Express Trains from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, to Chicago, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, and St. Louis.

WITHOUT CHANGE,

and to all the principal points in the far West and South with but one change of cars. Connections are made in Union Depots, and are assured to all important points. The Scenery of the Pennsylvania Route is admitted to be unsurpassed in the world for grandeur, beauty, and variety. Superior refreshment facilities are provided. Employees are courteous and attentive, and it is an inevitable result that a trip by the Pennsylvania Railroad must form

A Pleasing and Memorable Experience.

ADDRESS

National Liberal League,
231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE. For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE
231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE! CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient co-operation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

PLATFORM

For the Presidential Election of 1880,

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution; including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

SECOND ANNUAL CONGRESS

OF THE

National Liberal League.

CALL.

Boston, Sept. 18, 1878.

The Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July 1-4, 1876, will be held at Wisting Opera House, Syracuse, N.Y., on Saturday and Sunday, Oct. 26 and 27, 1878. Further particulars as to speakers, etc., will be announced hereafter.

In addition to the hearing of reports, election of officers for the ensuing year, and other ordinary business, questions of the utmost practical importance to the liberal cause will come up for decision at this Congress. Among them the following may be specified:—

1. What efficient measures can be adopted for securing a great increase in the number of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, and thereby winning for liberal ideas the public influence to which they are justly entitled?

2. Shall the National Liberal League nominate candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States at the present time?

3. How can the National Liberal League most effectively promote the cause of State Secularization, and foil the schemes of those who are seeking to pervert the government to sectarian purposes? What action shall it take with reference to the Constitutional Amendment already twice reported to the United States Senate by the Judiciary Committee, the practical effect of which, if adopted, will be to recognize in the Constitution the right of the Bible to be read in the public schools as a book of divine authority, and the right of church property to be exempted from taxation?

4. How can the rights of free mails and a free press be most effectively defended, and how can the wrongs of persons unjustly punished under the so-called Comstock laws be most effectively righted?

5. Shall the National Liberal League abandon the stand it originally took on the "obscene literature" question at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, or shall it continue to defend equally the cause of public morality and the cause of free mails and a free press? Shall it now demand the total repeal of the existing laws on this subject, and thereby practically protect and foster the circulation of obscene literature? Or shall it continue to demand the radical reform of those laws, in such manner as shall protect freedom of thought to the uttermost without protecting obscenity in the least?

The last two of these questions are peculiarly important at this time, and will inevitably come up for settlement by the approaching Congress. The resolutions adopted at Philadelphia were as follows:—

"Resolved, That this League, while it recognizes the great importance and the absolute necessity of guarding by proper legislation against obscene and indecent publications, whatever sect, party, order, or class such publications claim to favor, disapproves and protests against all laws which, by reason of indefiniteness or ambiguity, shall permit the prosecution and punishment of honest and conscientious men for presenting to the public what they deem essential to the public welfare, when the views thus presented do not violate in thought or language the acknowledged rules of decency; and that we demand that all laws against obscenity and indecency shall be so clear and explicit that none but actual offenders against the recognized principles of purity shall be liable to suffer therefrom.

"Resolved, That we cannot but regard the appointment and authorization by the government of a single individual to inspect our mails, with power to exclude therefrom whatever he deems objectionable, as a delegation of authority dangerous to public and personal liberty, and utterly inconsistent with the genius of free institutions."

The future growth, prosperity, and influence of the Liberal League movement will depend largely on the action to be taken by the Congress on these two questions. Any weakening of the stand taken at Philadelphia will work great and perhaps fatal disaster to the National Liberal League.

In order, therefore, that these vital questions may be fairly and wisely decided, it is recommended that all Local Leagues elect their delegates with special reference to it. The Congress will not be an irresponsible mass meeting, but a convention composed of delegates and members duly accredited, and seats for them will be reserved. Delegates from Local Leagues will receive Certificates of Membership of the Second Annual Congress by forwarding at once the proper credentials, signed by their own local officers, to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston"; charter, life, and annual members who intend to be present will receive theirs by simply forwarding their names and present addresses. These Certificates must be presented at the door and exchanged for Tickets of Admission to the reserved seats, the rest of the hall being open to the public at large. By this arrangement all confusion will be obviated. The Congress will be composed of accredited members, who alone ought to vote on questions of business affecting the League; every member will be admitted to the reserved seats; and the Committee on Membership will be enabled to make an accurate report to the Congress.

Liberals are urged everywhere to organize themselves into Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues and elect good delegates, in order to give this Congress a large local constituency and an influential delegation, and thereby to increase the weight of its decisions with the general public. The questions to be acted upon are of the gravest consequence to the whole liberal cause, and ought to be dealt with by a responsible representative body. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay, if addressed to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington Street, Boston."

By order of the Board of Directors:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.

WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

GLIMPSES.

COLONEL INGERSOLL lectured in Boston, last Sunday evening, on "The Hard Times and the Way Out," to an audience of over three thousand. It is needless to say that he spoke with the usual effect of his unique oratory.

FOUR NEW Local Leagues have been chartered the past week, one at Brockton, Massachusetts, one at Cato, New York, one at Palmyra, Nebraska, and one at Long Island City, New York. P.S.—Two more are now chartered—one at Weedsport, N.Y., and a fifth in New York city, making sixty-two in all.

THESE WORDS came to us in a private letter dated October 12: "Your position on the obscene literature question is as impregnable as the everlasting hills. . . I presume I have no occasion to say, as Sumner wrote to Stanton, 'Stick!' Whatever may be the result reached at the approaching Congress at Syracuse, your position is the true one, and will be so viewed by every true and thoughtful liberal in the not distant future."

A PROFESSOR in a prominent Western university writes: "I think all persons of good repute will stand with you in the Comstock matter. So long as Mr. Comstock can be held to the work of the scavenger, pure and simple, he, like other scavengers, will be of great service to society. It would seem that we might get this kind of work done without endangering the liberty of the nation or seriously interfering with the rotation of the earth."

THE SKYMOOR (Indiana) Times, edited by Dr. Monroe, deals slashing blows at superstition of all sorts, with a vigor and incisiveness the effect of which is greatly increased by his fearless honesty. On the obscene literature question, the free-love question, and other questions involving the moral interests of society, the Times takes bold and true ground, and earns the cordial respect of all those who believe that the cause of free thought cannot be divorced from the cause of pure morality.

A FRIEND sends the following notice of the Free Religious Society of Lynn, Sunday before last: "Rev. L. K. Washburn gave one of his soul-stirring lectures to a large and influential congregation in Oxford Street Chapel. His subject was 'Vices and Virtue.' More truth was condensed in his discourse than in all the sermons delivered in this city during the day. Such was the general opinion expressed by many who were present. The charming singing of Miss Annie Orr, and the sweet playing of Miss Nellie Mills, added not a little to the interest of the occasion. The collection was generous."

THE SPEAKERS who have at present writing accepted invitations to deliver addresses at Syracuse, are as follows: Hon. E. P. Hurlbut, of Albany (formerly Judge of the Supreme Court of New York State), on "The Liberty of Printing"; T. B. Wakeman, Esq., of New York, on the Constitutionality of the Comstock laws; Mr. B. F. Underwood, of Thorndike, Mass., on "The Conditions of Success"; Rev. M. Schlesinger, D.D., Rabbi of Albany, on "Morality and Liberty"; Mrs. Clara Neymann, of New York, on "The Issues of the League"; Mr. C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, and Prof. J. E. Oliver, of Ithaca (subjects not announced). In addition to these, there is some reason to hope, at least, for addresses from Hon. George W. Julian, of Irvington, Ind.; Hon. Ellizur Wright, of Boston; E. W. Meddaugh, Esq., of Detroit; Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, of Tenafly, N.J., and others.

MR. WAKEMAN'S comfortable assurance that all the world rides behind him on his legal hobby is an illusion destined to be speedily dispelled. For instance, George W. Park, Esq., one of the best lawyers of Boston, and one of the counsel on Mr. Heywood's side in the late trial, writes explicitly: "Upon the most mature reflection that I have been able to give the subject, I do not reach the conclusion that the statute under which this indictment was found is either unconstitutional or unsound. It has been stated that the statute can exclude matter from the mails only for 'postal reasons.' This ground of unconstitutionality was carefully examined by us long before it appeared in print; and, although on first view quite plausible, it was abandoned, and never presented to the Court, because believed to be clearly unsound." We are sorry for Mr. Wakeman that his chief argument proves a broken reed to lean upon.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

An Answer to "The Index" Criticisms.

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

The editor of THE INDEX has honored my speech at Faneuil Hall against the Comstock postal laws with criticisms now extended to about eleven columns. This reminds me that "it never rains but it pours"; and if in all this quantity of words some things seem to escape me, let it be charitably remembered that I cannot reply to every sentence. But I will be careful to meet the material points.

This I do cheerfully, for these criticisms are the first and only public objections that have been presented to the positions taken in that speech. Otherwise it has received a very general and decided approval from those who seem to me most competent to judge. But let no one suppose that those positions are particularly mine; they belong to the mass of the Liberals, and I believe to the mass of the people of this country. They were embodied in the petition against the Comstock laws signed by some seventy thousand citizens; they were approved by the officers and audience of the indignation meeting before which the speech was delivered in Faneuil Hall; they were deliberately approved and incorporated into the resolutions of the great convention of liberals, of every shade of belief, held at Watkins Glen; they have been generally approved by the liberal press, and also by distinguished liberals in many speeches and letters, of which one from Mr. James Parton was published as a specimen in a recent number of THE INDEX. The editor also does the liberals too much honor if he represents the position as peculiar to them. It is simply that of the Constitution and of the people at large, and only as such have I represented it.

He also lays out the geography of the discussion in too much of an individual manner, as though it was a kind of triangular contest between Messrs. Heywood and Tucker and myself and himself; whereas the real question is simply whether we shall insist upon the free press and free post-office which the Constitution provided for us, or not. On this question, which is the only issue, the editor and his personal friends stand against the mass of the liberals, as I have indicated, and will stand against the people of the country when their attention can be called to the issue. Messrs. Heywood and Tucker do not differ from the liberals of the country on this, the only issue before us. What the States may or ought to do about obscenity, are questions as to the discretionary exercise of State powers. No question of that kind is now before the League or the liberals of the country; and until the liberals can get Mr. Heywood out of jail, I do not propose to discuss with him how far, or in what way, the States should exercise a power which all must admit they possess. I do not believe in hitting a man who is down,—not even Mr. Heywood. He is not to be held responsible for his opinion until he is a free man. As long as he is kept in prison, his extreme views as to the exercise of State powers are not to be wondered at, and are certainly excusable.

The question is, Shall the Comstock postal laws be repealed? The position of Congress and the people for one hundred years—i.e., until the Comstock postal laws were passed—was stated and defended in the speech referred to. It was substantially as follows:—

(1.) "That the Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress no power whatever to legislate upon this subject; that its attempts so to do in the Comstock postal laws are beyond even any 'implied powers,' and are plain usurpations which break down the whole Constitution as the bulwark of liberty, and, in the words of Hon. Ellsbur Wright, leave it 'not worth two brass buttons'; that those laws are in substance a decoy and espionage system over the post-office; that they have been the source of great wrongs and injustice, and that they cannot be amended so as to be safe and constitutional, and should therefore be repealed.

(2.) "That the power to suppress obscenity and indecency, together with all other crimes or offences, is one of the general powers reserved in the United States Constitution to the people and the States; and that it should be exercised by the State legislatures and courts with the greatest caution, 'only in 'unequivocal and well-defined cases,' and plainly within the Constitutions of the several States."

The speech in question is a defence of these positions from a constitutional, political, and moral point of view, as against a dictum of the United States Supreme Court. As this speech has never appeared in THE INDEX, I must remind all concerned that no adequate understanding of this discussion can now be had without reading it and the opinion of the United States Supreme Court annexed to it. I will cheerfully send both to any address, so as to do what I can to aid in the proper understanding of this subject. I offer to do this because I have not time to answer the lengthy criticisms in detail; and because, after considering them carefully, it seems as though a careful reading of the speech itself would be the only answer to most of them, really needed.

I say this, not with any feeling of disrespect, but from the belief that, if the editor had delayed forming an opinion until he "had thought out the subject in all its bearings," and had been free from circumstances and unfortunate controversies, which I fear have unconsciously influenced his judgment, he would have stood bravely with us. This view is confirmed by the nature of his objections, which, let me say once more, seem to involve no real difference of principle, but only (1) confusions and (2) misapprehensions which he unfortunately seems to desire to magnify as if in self-defence.

The discussion, as far as it has gone, has certainly developed important agreements, which I did not anticipate from the defiant manner in which the editor opened it. Let us call attention to these agreements as the common ground between us from which we may hope to conquer the remaining differences.

I. The editor is entirely with us on the most important part of the subject,—one that seems to me to involve in substance the whole. He agrees that the present Comstock laws are unconstitutional; that they abridge the freedom of the press, and that the Supreme Court is all wrong on this subject.

He says: "We entirely agree with Mr. Wakeman that the Comstock laws, as they have been administered—nay, more, as they can scarcely fail to be administered,—so long as they retain their present dangerous vagueness and indefiniteness, FLAGRANTLY VIOLATE the freedom of the press, and are certainly for that reason unconstitutional. His argument is powerful and unanswerable so far as it relates to these laws in their present form."

The best thing to do with unconstitutional laws is to repeal them—that is the general impression; but the editor wishes to reform them. He is certainly under a misapprehension in supposing that these unconstitutional laws can be made constitutional by being made more definite. That is a great difficulty certainly, but not the greatest. The trouble is, as the argument in the speech which he says is unanswerable shows, that no postal laws on this subject can be enforced at all without abridging the freedom of the press, because they involve espionage and decoy as the only possible means of their enforcement. The poison is the very substance of them. Judge Field, in the opinion of the court, points out these inquisitions as the only means by which these laws can be enforced, and they are the only means that have been or can be practically used. The judge expressly says that the party "receiving" the prohibited matter may complain, or the officers of the postal service "can act upon their own inspection" "in excluding the prohibited articles, or refusing to forward them," and such official may also make the complaint. Now the "unanswerable" argument goes to show that no power of this kind was ever dreamed of under the Constitution, and that its exercise is a direct violation of the freedom of the press and of the freedom of property from seizure, guaranteed by the Constitution, and that it is a means of inquisition utterly "inconsistent with the genius of free institutions," as the League resolved at Philadelphia. I have repeatedly and respectfully requested the editor to draft a statute that shall be free from "vagueness and indefiniteness," and which shall have any practical value without involving these very objections which have made my argument "unanswerable." The general talk about "reform" is of no possible use in such cases as this; if the thing can be done he is under the deepest obligation to show how it can be done. Until he gives us a reformed Comstock law, he is not only clearly guilty of "vagueness and indefiniteness" himself, but is guilty of making a schism in the liberal ranks without any sound, clear, or sure ground to go upon. Vague declamation about "reform" and "purity" and "principles" amounts to nothing. Let us see the unconstitutional law "reformed" into a constitutional one, or let us have silence on this whole subject.

The editor intimates that the elements needed are certainty of definition, and inquiry into the "intention" of the sender. But "legal definitions of crimes" must be by acts, words, or things; and "obscenity" is neither, unless all of the guilty acts, words, and things are described. Let the editor give them! And again, when it comes to "intention," what legal process can ever reach and determine that? Only one tribunal has sat upon the intentions of men, and that was the Inquisition itself.

Lawyers of the greatest skill have given up the framing of such laws in despair. I have tried far enough to appreciate their difficulties. As an introduction to this task, let me ask the editor to reprint a remarkable letter of the great American jurist, and perhaps our greatest codifier, Edward Livingston, found in his life by C. H. Havens, page 289 (Appleton, 1884), and which was reprinted in the Boston Traveller of July 15, or the Word of August last. But Livingston's difficulty was with the definitions only; he did not propose to discover and punish intention, too.

Another important agreement to be observed is, that by the admission above quoted, the editor has placed himself, with the rest of the liberals, in direct opposition to the United States Supreme Court on this subject. It is merely inconsistent cruelty, therefore, for the editor to refer to the presumption of my "individual opinion" as against the Supreme Court. Though I am "merely an attorney," I have as good a right to dissent from the moral, political, and constitutional opinions of that court as the editor. But his position will help all liberals to see the absolute necessity of such dissent; and that the grounds of the speech in that regard should be really and practically admitted by this position of the editor himself, is a great step of progress.

By the time the editor has disposed of both difficulties, I believe he will find that the only practical reform of the Comstock law is the Shakespearean cry, "O, reform it altogether!"

II. Another agreement which the discussion has happily brought out is the abandonment of the second plank of the "Card platform" upon which he required all liberals to stand at Syracuse, or to suffer the terrible consequences of his indignant abandonment. In my former letter to THE INDEX, this plank was quoted by carefully (not carelessly, as the editor supposed,) omitting the words in it relating to the State, so that its statement on the national postal-law question could be seen at a glance. Thus stated, it affirms: "The right and duty of Congress to pass, and the right and duty of the national courts to enforce, laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails."

It will be seen at once that this all-important plank, upon which the editor insisted we must all stand or go under, goes to the full extent of asserting the unlimited jurisdiction of the United States over the whole subject of suppressing the circulation of obscene literature, and that only as an item of that general jurisdiction he "included" the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails."

That this was the editor's former view is clearly evident from his editorial of September 26, in which he argues at length for what is summed up in these words: "The powers of Congress are nothing but the powers of the people itself as a whole, for Congress is only a representative body, deriving all its powers from the people it represents. To limit its powers, therefore, is to limit those of the people."

Again, in his editorial of October 3, he derives this general power and jurisdiction of the national government from the nature and enormity of the "crime" itself. He says there is a moral justification for treating this business "as a crime not only by State, but also by national legislation." "It is in direct accordance with the spirit of the United States Constitution to interpret it as giving jurisdiction over all crimes which, from the nature of the case, cannot be brought under the jurisdiction of the separate States. The crime of counterfeiting is of this nature, since the power of coining money is conferred upon Congress alone; and the crime of mailing obscene literature is of this nature, since Congress alone has, or can have, the power to regulate the post-office system."

Here we have the repetition of the general jurisdiction-doctrine of the "Card" with a vengeance. Because any act is very bad it is worthy to be "a crime"! and if the States cannot reach it conveniently, then the Constitution authorizes Congress to create it into "a crime," and to punish it. Thus Congress can acquire unlimited jurisdiction from its judgment of the criminality of acts and the difficulty of the States in punishing them. Can this be seriously pretended? Is it possible that the editor wrote what is above quoted after he had "thought out the subject in all its bearings"? It seems not by his own admission; for in the next editorial in the same paper, in reply to my letter which pointed out the absurdity of this general jurisdiction-plank, he says of that Card: "It was not intended to force the jurisdiction of the whole subject upon the United States Government; nor do we think the wording at all suggests any such EXTRAVAGANT position. But we take this opportunity to state that the platform on the 'Card' is not proposed for adoption in that form by the League; it simply states the principles of the signers, which will be fully 'approved' if the League in any manner adopts unequivocally, by a simple majority vote, the policy of seeking to 'reform' and not to 'repeal' the Comstock laws."

The foregoing is a frank and plain withdrawal of the very plank upon which the "reform" rested in the Card. We were expressly told that the "exclusive" right and duty to exclude was "included" in the right and duty of Congress to pass, and of the national courts to enforce laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature. Now if this general jurisdiction-claim is abandoned as an "extravagant" and ridiculous blunder, what becomes of the right of "exclusion" which was "included" in it? Why, of course, that falls with the right and duty in which it was included. The part goes down with the whole. What ground is left, then, upon which the editor demands that we must still vote for reform? He asks us to vote for reform upon, and as necessarily included in, a "great principle," which he abandons as soon as its extravagant nature is pointed out to him; and yet he insists that his "principles" will be approved if we will only vote for "reform," although the very ground he rested it upon has dropped from under it. But after the bottom is gone, we are still asked to stake our all upon a "reform" that all experience has proved to be impossible by simply an act of faith in him,—taking it like "a pig in a poke." We should certainly be very sure that the editor has "thought out the subject in all its bearings" before we do this.

By the admission above made, if he really means and understands it, he comes back to the old and safe grounds of the speech, which would end all differences at once; to wit, "The power possessed by Congress embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country for postal purposes; but not for moral, religious, political, or any ulterior purposes."

III. But no sooner is the admission made than he goes to work to invalidate it, and this brings us to a third point. He tries to revive the notion that the power to create and to legislate against "the crime of mailing obscene literature" is "an incidental power" necessarily implied in the power "to establish post-offices and post-roads."

In the speech criticized, this matter was so thoroughly disposed of that no reply is needed to those who will read and heed what is there said. It was there shown, in the words of Henry Clay, that the mere mailing of anything is not, and cannot be made, a crime, and can never be so legislated by Congress under the Constitution; that the post-office can never be made a source of criminal jurisdiction or detection for the purpose of punishing the crimes which are named in the Constitution as within the power of Congress, to say nothing of making new crimes, which it has no right whatever to create. It was shown that any attempt to punish crimes by espionage or decoy laws could only detract from the use, income, and "convenience" of the postal service, and instead of being "appropriate to postal ends," could only be detrimental, expensive, or useless as such, and could have no use or justification except as attempts to use the post-office for supposed moral purposes; i.e., for "ulterior purposes"; that until a part could be greater than the whole, no such justification for this was possible under the postal power.

The editor dissents, but makes no serious attack upon these positions, as indeed who can? They stand as they did in 1836, when Daniel Webster said in the Senate that he was "shocked" at the claim to the contrary, and that the prohibition of the mailing of anything on account of its meaning was "expressly unconstitutional"; and the senate agreed with him. The editor, however, refers to two items, really taken from the speech, which seem to him inconsistent with this position. One is counterfeiting, and the other postal cards. These seem to me amusing items to be brought forward by one who has "thought out the subject in all its bearings." Counterfeiting is referred to in the speech as one of the crimes expressly placed by name within the jurisdiction of Congress, (by Art. 8, §8) of the Constitution. Moreover, by Section 10 of the same article, all of the other crimes which the United States are allowed to punish at all, are declared to be "piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations." All other crimes are expressly reserved to the States, except treason, which is specially provided for and defined in another article; so that Congress could not, by definition or pretended incidental powers, get farther criminal jurisdiction of any kind.

Now the editor says that counterfeiting is really an incidental power under the express power "to coin money," etc., just as the newly-made crime of mailing obscene literature is similarly an incidental power under the express power "to establish post-offices and post-roads." He therefore declares them both "to be of the same nature," and concludes that if one is constitutional the other must be.

The answer is, that the Constitution has expressly provided that Congress shall punish counterfeiting, and has no word whatever that looks towards making a crime of mailing anything, or punishing obscenity in any way. It is true that to punish counterfeiting might be considered an incidental power under the grant "to coin money," etc., but the editor will find that it was just for that reason that the authors of the Constitution dragged it out of any such possibility and put it in express words. They, as the debates show, expressly used every precaution to prevent the inference of criminal jurisdiction as an incidental power, and thus, in the only case where it might be implied, they inserted a separate clause, rather than to leave it to inference. Now the well-known rule of construction is, that the expressed inclusion of an instance in a grant is the exclusion of all similar instances of power. The expression of this only instance of incidental criminal power excludes all other instances, and means that they are not to be implied. It shows that the authors of the Federalist were entirely right in saying that this postal power "must in every view be a HARMLESS power." By "harmless" the contemporary discussions show they meant free from usurpation and criminal jurisdiction. The editor would make mail-carrying the unlimited source of both!

The next point the editor discovers is, that the speech is inconsistent in regard to postal cards; but he is mistaken again. The speech says: "With the meaning of the documents INCLOSED the post-office has nothing to do, and if they have not, Congress has no power to punish for sending them." Again it says: "Its repeal (i.e., the repeal of the Comstock law of 1873) is justly called for upon both grounds in the petition referred to." That is, on the grounds of its unconstitutionality and its impolicy or wickedness. But in "thinking out the subject in all its bearings," each clause of the law was considered, and the clause relative to postal cards was disposed of in this way: "A post-office regulation that all matter should BE INCLOSED, and that postal cards should contain nothing that could be offensive to those to whom they are sent or to the public is all that is necessary. This matter of the postal cards is entirely in the power of the department as a NECESSARY POSTAL REGULATION. It is evidently in the law in question only to give it the color of necessity. If it is thought best to retain the form of the law, it should be materially modified so as to be within the postal powers and purposes only." Now the editor imagines there is inconsistency in these quotations, simply because he overlooks the all-important difference expressly pointed out, that in the first case inclosed matter is treated of, and which differs entirely from postal cards in which publicity is compelled for postal reasons; in such case the same reasons compel that they should be inoffensive to the receiver and not exciting to the public. Otherwise that part of the postal service could not be maintained at all, much less worked conveniently. As it is, we are told that this publicity is the great objection to their general use, and to their safe and punctual delivery. It is said, and believed, that often the real excuse for their tardy delivery or loss, is that the postal employees and their friends have not had time to decipher them. The postal reasons for reducing this disadvantage of the postal-card service to a minimum are too apparent and practical for a doubt, and such reasons have dictated the restrictions wherever this new system has been adopted, as the necessary condition of its existence.

Again, that this service is a new postal provision not intended under the Constitution, may leave it in the discretion of Congress as to how it shall be used as a condition of granting it at all, as is the case with postal carrying of dry goods and parcels of merchandise. But letters, papers, pamphlets, and sealed packets were and are mail matter under the Constitution which Congress cannot interfere with.

There is no inconsistency in the speech then in suggesting that these regulations should be those of the department only, and that they should be limited to postal purposes and to ordinary postal fines in case of complaint, thus repealing the cumbersome penal laws, penalties, and proceedings on this subject which are not ridiculous only because they are terrible.

But note the further fact that this postal interference is allowable only where the enforced publicity requires it. It therefore excludes the conclusion that it can be rightfully allowed so as to exclude matter where there is no such reason for it. Where the reason ceases the law ceases; and the inclusion of it in the one case, according to the rule above cited, necessarily excludes it in the other. So far from there being any inconsistency, the postal card regulation, like the counterfeiting illustration, lead to exactly the opposite conclusion the editor supposes, and sustain the speech. Thus when a "subject is thought out in all its bearings" truth is ever confirmed.

The above three points dispose of the Constitutional and most important aspects of the subject; and as to them it is clear that the editor has admitted or confirmed the main points of the speech. His reform of the Comstock postal laws will therefore have no legal basis to rest upon, even if he could make them safe to liberty, and practical, which he cannot.

IV. Here we might rest the discussion, but for some grave misapprehensions he is under as to the bearing and importance of the question involved.

The first we notice is a fatal misapprehension as to the legal and practical importance to liberty of preserving the Constitutional provisions, clearly defining and limiting the Federal jurisdiction in criminal matters. It really seems that the editor had forgotten all about the Constitution and the wisdom and statesmanship that framed it! How else could he write in this way?

"So far as freedom of speech and of the press is concerned, he [Wakeman] must either deny the right of the States, or else concede the right of Congress, to suppress literature that is really obscene. Freedom is violated by any unjust restrictions; and it makes not a pin's difference by what authority the restrictions are imposed. The protest of principle must be against the restrictions themselves. Mr. Wakeman destroys his own case by conceding the justice of the restrictions when imposed by State authority, and yet inveighing against them as tyranny when imposed by Congressional authority. In consequence of this radical and fatal self-contradiction, the view he presents of the whole subject is merely that of the attorney; he has not treated it either as a Philosopher or Statesman."

Again hear him: "The fact is, that Mr. Wakeman has not thoroughly thought out his subject in all its bearings; he has treated it in too narrow and technical a manner. The powers of Congress are nothing but the powers of the people itself, as a whole; for Congress is only a representative body, deriving all its powers from the people it represents. To limit its powers, therefore, is to limit those of the people," etc., etc.

It seems to me incredible that a President of the Liberal League can write in this way.

Talk of statesmanship! when the great labors of all the statesmen we have ever had have been to prevent the establishment of a federal tyranny. The safest way to be a Philosopher and Statesman is to follow in their footsteps. In every convention and meeting that passed upon the Constitution in its formation, in every administration that has shed glory on the Republic since then, the point was and has been to defend the States and people from the tyranny and usurpation of the general government backed when possible by the Supreme Court. I pray the reader to continue the line of argument of the speech into the works and records of those who adopted the Constitution, and will gladly leave the question of statesmanship to them. The very theory of the government, as well as the traditions of liberty, are in danger of being lost when our Liberal teachers write in the tone of mingled ignorance and indifference above quoted.

As Patrick Henry pointed out, usurped power is "tyranny," and is irresponsible, and unlimited. If Congress can create and punish crimes without regard to the Constitution, it is the end of all popular liberty. The only protection the liberal party and free thought can have against the whim of the majority is gone.

All that was said in the speech about the necessity of insisting upon the true position of the Supreme Court as simply a legal tribunal, and not an arbiter of morals, religion, or of liberty, is the voice of Statesmen, and derives strange force when it is found that the President of the Liberal League is ready to surrender to it the Bill of Rights which is the only possible protection of the free-thinking minority. Suppose that Jefferson, Jackson, or Lincoln had done so, where would we have been now? It is the first duty of a Liberal to stand by the Constitution and its Bill of Rights as the fountain of all our liberties. When that is frittered away by giving Congress the power to create and punish crimes, the temporary party majority is simply an irresponsible tyrant. It will wield a vast judicial and criminal system foreign to the people, before which the individual will be as helpless as before a Russian Czar.

The great purpose of the Constitution was to protect liberty by keeping the individual before the legislature, judge, and jury of his vicinage, and under laws that he could have some influence in executing or changing.

These are the very conditions of liberty, and the federal government can protect them; it cannot supply or replace them. These very Comstock laws are a practical illustration of this vital distinction. All of the outrages have been under these United States laws, and by means of federal judges and officials. Under the State laws, even in New York, unconstitutional as I think they are there, no great wrong has as yet been consummated; and there is less danger now than ever, for the State officers and grand juries are recovering from their obscenity panic.

I am not now called upon to determine what restrictions the State should impose to suppress obscenity. I simply say that those which were in force before the United States usurped this jurisdiction, were in fact found to be sufficient; that the evil was practically removed under them before the postal laws were passed; and to those State laws, or to others, which the people may have a rational knowledge and control of, I propose to return. I leave the matter to them.

The editor has not shown how otherwise the Constitution and our liberties can be preserved.

V. The editor is under a similar misapprehension in regard to the position of liberals in regard to obscenity. Because they do not deem it necessary to throw overboard the Constitution and all their liberties to get it punished, he represents them as in favor of it, and so has been the cause and source of unlimited misrepresentation, if not slander. He says, for instance, in italics: "Freedom of the press covers and includes the legal right to publish, circulate, and mail real obscenity." This, he says, "is exactly what Mr. Wakeman's argument means so far as the mails are concerned." Again, when I tried to show that the "principles" underlying the discussion were common to us both, viz., that both "were in favor of liberty and opposed to obscenity," and that the real object was to discover the true, lawful, and practical way to secure the first and to avoid or repress the other, he will have none of it. He replies indignantly: "He [Mr. Wakeman] is greatly mistaken in imagining that there is no material difference as to principles. He declares that 'all are in favor of liberty, and opposed to obscenity.' 'It is true that all liberals are in favor of liberty; but it is not true that all liberals are opposed to obscenity.' Can a man be said to be opposed to murder, who demands the repeal of all or any of the laws which punish it? We certainly think not. The trouble with 'repeal' is, that it would abrogate some or all of the laws which punish the crime of circulating obscenity, and thereby, no matter what the intention, does in fact protect and foster that crime.

If there is any real answer, let us by all means have it!"

Certainly; you shall have it; but it seems strange that any answer should be needed. Liberal people and all sensible people are not in favor of crimes because they want them discovered and punished constitutionally, and by the only and proper authorities provided by law for that purpose, and by methods that will not work far greater harm to society than the average injury of the crimes themselves, under the lawful means of repression. There is nothing so dangerous as a panic.

The editor seems not to have recovered from the obscenity panic from which the whole country was suffering as the result of a few sensational newspaper articles, and some real cause in 1872, and which gave us Comstock and his laws after the real evil had been removed by the State laws and public opinion, as I believe will always be the case. The editor condemns us upon a very amusing "principle." If he argues a thing is very wrong, then it is a crime, and then it has no right, anywhere or when, or how; and anybody may punish it in any way lawfully or not; and if he does not do so, or favor doing so, then he acknowledges that the crime has "rights," and he favors and fosters it, whether he intends to or not.

This feels to me like the logic of Judge Field's opinion, and I fear the editor has absorbed it from that source. Let us try it on. Liberals are very wicked and villainous, and are generally circulated through the mails. An editor, often on the mere word of a private correspondent, abuses his tremendous power to charge evil acts, intentions, and even crime, that injure and often practically ruin and murder his victims. I believe such offences are very wrong,—are crimes, that make obscenity itself appear white; and so the laws of all civilized countries declare. But shall we ask Congress, which has nothing to do with it under the Constitution, to go to legislating on the subject, and to declare the mailing of a libel a crime punishable with death in the United States courts, and to be discovered by espionage of mail matter, and to be induced by decoy? Or shall we resort to lynch and mob law? Certainly not. We will have the States make reasonable and sensible laws on the subject, and will try to have those laws reasonably and effectively enforced by the proper courts and juries of the vicinage.

So we deal with forgery, treason, swindling, and many other crimes, in the commission of which the mails are constantly used. Yet because we punish these crimes only through the States we do not favor or foster them. So as to murder, to which the editor refers. Many excellent people believe that society has advanced so far that the death penalty for it does more harm than good, and they ask its abolition; but are they, therefore, in favor of murder? Not long ago every felony was punished with death. The scaffolds were constantly hung with victims and red with blood. Civilization has been measured by the abolition of these penalties, and cherishes the memory of those who labored for their abolition. Now are we to be told that they did it all because they wished to favor or foster the crimes, or that they did so in fact? When the editor recovers from his panic he will see the absurdity of all this; and will regret that he said that "all liberals are not opposed to obscenity." Such charges should not be made upon mere inferences, for they are misunderstood.

The editor began this discussion by saying that "we do not imagine that Mr. Tucker [Mr. Heywood's champion] is any more in favor of obscenity than anybody else." Certainly, after that certificate he ought to give the rest of the liberals a clean bill of health even though, in the words of Mr. Parton, they do go for "immediate and unconditional repeal" of the Comstock postal laws, "because they are unconstitutional and wrong in every way, and pernicious in many ways."

When the editor preaches on the enormity of obscenity as he does so eloquently—I will not say that he does it "merely" as an ex-parson,—I listen gratefully, and reply only from the Amen corner. But it is hardly fair for him to represent me as an obsceneist because "merely as an attorney" or otherwise I try to explain to him what the Constitution, law, and common-sense on the subject really are. When he is content to rest his zeal for purity upon them, I shall be with him.

VI. The editor is under misapprehension as to what the people expect of the Liberal party. It is not sound "in principle or policy" for a liberty party to become the advocates of unconstitutional laws and pernicious espionage and inquisition, which have been dictated by "religious" zeal or hypocrisy. To curry favor with an obscenity panic, is business that can be better and safely left to Mr. Comstock and his friends. We have no call to compete with them, and shall gain nothing but contempt for the attempt.

The "awakened conscience" of the whole people is in favor of constitutional liberty and common-sense on this subject. The Liberals are the natural leaders of this sentiment and movement. If they know enough to advance in it, they will become the vindicators of the rights of the people, and of Man. They will stand forth as a moral and political power in the land. If they fall in this crisis, they will have no sufficient reason for their existence. They will struggle along scarcely worthy of the notice, or of the contempt of their opponents. Let them take the watchwords, Liberty and Purity, now and forever, one and inseparable! The future will then find in them the great, because the reforming, growing, and moral influence of the country; for the free and the pure will certainly inherit the earth.

TO WRITE WELL is to think well, to feel well, and to render well; it is to possess at once intellect, soul, and taste.—Buffon.

A CLERICAL CONGRESS.

Even the French Clericals have caught the mania for congresses. One is to meet during this month at Chartres, which styles itself "Le Congrès de l'Union des Œuvres Ouvrières," which being freely translated may be read, "The Congress of the Society for Strengthening the Catholic Church among the Working Classes." The title is rather extensive, but the work of the society is still more so; and though it is not a new enterprise, and dates from the outbreak of the war, it proposes this year to take possession of a wider field, and its operations have consequently attracted more attention. Among the works which the society avows are: the surveillance of the reading-matter which reaches the hands of the working classes, and especially of the women and young girls; the placing of Catholics in factories and shops presided over by men of their own faith; the encouragement of religious zeal among the workmen and workwomen; and the "moralization" by means of foremen and forewomen specially chosen for the task, of the employés in such factories as they can obtain access to.

Apparently the association ought not to be a very formidable one, and corresponds very nearly to our own organizations for promoting the spread of the Gospel among working people. But there are two important differences between the Catholic society and our own, resting on two very essential facts in the situation of the Church in France, which go far to justify the indignation with which the society has been greeted by the Republican press in France. In the first place, the clerical organization is not a purely religious one, and cannot be. It will aim everywhere, in making Catholics, to make opponents of the Republic and of the Republican party. The clericals feel, and justly, that the Republic, with its programme of general education, free discussion, and freedom of political action, is fatal to the control of the people by the priesthood. The very doctrine of the sovereignty of the people, on which the Republic rests, is radically opposed to the doctrine of absolute authority on which the Church rests. The Church teaches that it is supreme in all which relates to the spiritual or religious life, and that it is for it to decide what does relate to that life; therefore, it is supreme over every department of human action which it chooses to enter. The firmer hold it gains upon the working classes, the more it will seek to use them to undermine or overthrow the Republic. There is no half-way point at which it can stop, if it would. It is bound by the nature of its belief and by the conviction which it holds as regards the Republican idea to fight it everywhere and always, and by every means of which it can gain control.

In the second place, while our evangelizing organizations are purely the result of voluntary association among men who have little in common except their special religious purpose, and who have certainly no ulterior purpose, the Catholic society is managed by the episcopacy, and is under the powerful centralized control of the Roman hierarchy. The work in each diocese is under the supervision of the bishop, and the bishops together are under the supervision of Rome. The old sentiment of independence, which made the Gallican Church patriotic first and Roman Catholic afterward, has practically disappeared. A propaganda by the French bishops and their agents means an active extension of the doctrines taught at Rome, which are in conflict not only with the political principles on which the Republic rests, but with the social principles, which go hand in hand with them. It is of the essence of the Republican régime in France, that there shall be no classes with antagonistic purposes in society, and particularly in the industrial field. Under its just rules, it is intended that every man shall have a fair opportunity to buy or sell commodities or services, unhampered by any conditions relating to his religious or political views. The law of competition must at best carry many hardships with it, entailed by the differing capacities and differing opportunities of individuals; but it is the only one which secures even rude justice, and it has the merit, which belongs to no other system, that it is progressive, and that it tends gradually to correct the evils which may temporarily exist under it. It is necessary to its proper operation, and particularly to the development of general contentment with the justice of its working, that those who are lowest in the scale of opportunities shall feel that it is fairly and uniformly applied, and that no class has an unjust advantage over another.

Against this essential condition of the success of the Republican system, the Catholic society referred to threatens a direct attack. It proposes to bring the vast machinery of the Church, centred and controlled in Rome, and reaching to every city and hamlet, and to almost every household in the land, to promote the employment of Catholics in preference to others, and of zealous clericals in preference to Catholics who may be inimical or indifferent to the claims of the clergy. When it is remembered that the margin of profitable industry in France is very small; that wages are uniformly low; that the pressure for employment is great; and that manufactures are depressed, it will be understood how high a bribe the priesthood is trying to offer to those who can be hired to submit to its influence. What in this country would be resented as an insult to the workman and an impertinent interference with business by the employer, becomes a tempting inducement to many thousands in France. The scheme is denounced by the Republicans as an attempt to carry religious prejudices into business affairs, to promote the interests of the priesthood at the expense of the equal rights of workmen, and to extend the insidious policy of the Church by a more or less open corruption. They say that it corresponds to the League of the sixteenth century, working in a different field and by other instrumentalities, but inspired by the same narrow purpose, and equally hostile to the stability of society and the best interests of the whole community. The Abbé De Segur, Canon of St. Denis, of Paris, has published a formal denial of the charges against the society; but it is more formal than explicit, and, translating the peculiar phrases of the churchman by the light of what the Church has done and is doing, M. De Segur's letter practically admits all that has been brought against the "Union des Œuvres Ouvrières."—N. Y. Times, Sept. 21.

THERE NEED BE NO FUSS OVER THIS QUESTION.

We fail to see the necessity of so much clamor among freethinkers about the obscenity laws of Congress. Why there should be angry discussion on this matter is a mystery. All good men must admit that it is to the interests of society to maintain the proprieties and decencies of life in action, speech, and print. Immodesty, no matter how expressed, is very reprehensible. The man who will print words for general circulation that the proprieties will not suffer him to use in good society, needs some law to regulate his sense of the fitness of things. There are publications and prints of an immoral character, the circulation of which all will agree had better be discouraged, so far as can be. There is another class that under the pretence of teaching physiology, are really meant to foster the passions and appetites that had better be held in abeyance. They are printed because they will sell. They are not so bad as the books and pictures first referred to, but some of them are profuse in expression and words that corrupt the taste of the youthful reader and feed the prurient appetite. They offend good taste and do no good; but it is doubtful whether, under our Constitution, their circulation can be legally interfered with.

But as regards men's creeds and faiths, one man has as much right to set forth his views as another has his. A man may hold to one religion, or he may repudiate all, and publish what he pleases either way, provided he does it in language that isn't obscene and offensive to moral and well-behaved people. We hold that no man has a right to use his individual rights in a way that is indecent and offensive to others—offensive to refined taste. In short, we hold that personal liberty doesn't include personal license for a man to commit a public indecency and become a nuisance. In regard to social and moral subjects, full license must be given for a man to put forth his views, always premising that his language shall be that of the refined circle, and not that of the brothel. We protest against indecent language, and hold that books couched in such should be excluded from the mails. Its indecency is one of our greatest objections to the Bible in the schools or in the family circle. But the age in which it was written must plead for it. There is no such excuse for a publication now. The man that uses unbecoming language does it because he believes it will be pleasing to the class of readers he seeks to reach, and will sell his book.

There can be no difference of opinion among freethinkers as to the Church's construction of the so-called Comstock law. The delegation to such a scoundrel as Comstock of powers to rifle the mails and the privacy of persons and papers for what he deems obscene literature, is the most infamous act authorized by any government during the last two hundred years. No greater outrages against personal liberty were ever perpetrated than have been perpetrated by this religious fiend under his construction of the law. The law wants modifying so as to define exactly what it includes in its scope, so we will know just where we stand. While we will join with orthodoxy or anybody for the exclusion of vulgar and indecent prints and books from the mails, we will yet stand firm with those who claim their right, under the Constitution, to print and circulate without question their views on religious, political, social, or any other subject, provided that the language used is not obscene and "smutty."

We object to the Heywood pamphlet solely on account of the indecencies and obscenities that render it unfit to be put in the hands of boys and girls, or of anybody, for that matter. While we scout the doctrine of that pamphlet we hold that Heywood has a clear right to advocate it, in print or otherwise. There is no fear that his doctrine will damage many people of sound sense, and even if it would, he has yet the right to disseminate it. We object to his obscene way of illustrating his doctrine, and this is precisely what the jury condemned him for. At the same time we hold that his punishment is out of all proportion to the offence. It was Christian bigotry and hate that imposed the imprisonment. And right here comes the point that impels liberals to take common ground with Heywood. Many who reject his doctrine and condemn his language, will yet defend him and make common cause with him because the common enemy of freedom, free thought, and enlightened progress is persecuting and oppressing him. But it is unfortunate for the liberal cause that the fight with the new American inquisition for freedom of discussion and speech should be made over such a book as Heywood's. That should have been avoided. We should like to have had the test made over some matter pronounced "blasphemous." It is not pleasant nor profitable for "infidelity" to come into court as the defender and apologist of any book or doctrine that can, even by the utmost stretch of Christian hate and bigotry, be liable to the charge of obscenity. Infidels may as well place themselves upon high moral grounds as regards this question. The sense of the country will condemn the circulation of indecent, vulgar books and prints for immoral purposes. At the same time it will stand firm for the freedom of speech and the press, and the free discussion of all doctrinal questions in decent language.—Neymour Weekly Times, October 5.

HALLUCINATIONS.

In a recent lecture, Dr. H. Maudsley says that one striking feature observed by medical men who have had cases of hallucinations under their charge is that the patients cannot be convinced that the objects they see, the sounds they hear, and the smells they perceive have no real existence, and that the sensations they receive are the result of their excited nerves. It frequently happens that a person who suffers from hallucination in respect of one sense has the others unaffected, and is on all other matters perfectly sane. Hearing is most frequently affected and sight next. Several interesting cases were referred to: one of a gentleman actively engaged in business, who believed his body continually gave an unpleasant odor, and consequently kept away from everybody as much as he could; and when he was assured that people did not perceive it, always replied that they were too polite. Hallucination may arise either from an idea on which the mind has dwelt, appearing as something exterior, or from excitement of the sensory ganglia. It is said that Newton, Hunter, and others could, at will, picture forms to themselves till they appeared to be realities. A successor of Sir John Reynolds, Dr. Wigan records, had the power of painting portraits after seeing his sitters but for a short time at one visit only, and was able at will to reproduce them to himself as exterior realities. As years advanced, he found he could not dismiss these forms as he could recall them, and he began to fancy himself haunted, and was for many years in an asylum.—Scientific American.

HOW THE DESCENDANTS OF THE AZTECS REGARDED THE ECLIPSE.—We have had a great deal about the recent eclipse of the sun from the scientific gentlemen; but now from New Mexico comes an amusing account of how the phenomenon was regarded by that little handful of sun-worshippers and descendants of the ancient Aztecs, the Pueblo Indians. Unprepared by any almanac for the event, the gradual hiding of the face of their luminous god caused the greatest consternation among the simple Pueblos. The chief of the village was called from his hut, and, with every eye strained heavenward, anxious council was held over this dire visitation of mid-day gloom. Evidently some great sin had been committed by one of them, and their sun-god was hiding his face in anger. Who the particular Jonah of the occasion was could not of course be known, but every effort must be promptly made to appease the wrathful divinity. A messenger was sent to a neighboring clan, keepers of the eternal flame burning in honor of Montezuma, with the injunction that the memorial fire should be made brighter and stronger than ever. Only one more method of expiation remained. The women of the tribe, old and young—two hundred in all—were commanded to hasten to the track used for foot-races on fête days, and there, disrobing themselves, run in pairs naked till either they fell from exhaustion or the light returned. The tribe assembled and the women ran. Solemnly the men looked on, and eagerly and prayerfully the women raced about the course for upward of two hours. Then the sun shone once more, and great was the rejoicing. Each woman was looked upon as a heroine and borne home in triumph. This custom of requiring the women to run naked on such occasions is of very ancient origin, an injunction, the Indians say, laid upon them by Montezuma himself.—Springfield Republican.

DUPANLOUP.

Farewell, Dupanloup, three centuries ago
You would have found a world more to your taste;
Yet from the current one you did not haste.
Priestly reactionist and mired foe
Of liberty in France, your fondest hopes were foiled;
You saw your emperor overthrown, despoiled.
Your soul indignant to the shades below
Has fled,—to use a line of Virgil's verse,— Incantations before high altars brayed
In a dead tongue 'tis useless to rehearse.
You were the champion of a faith decayed;
The French republic 'neath your pious frown
Flourished its branches like a bay-tree spread,
While you, its foe, have to the dust gone down.
You smiled upon the dead usurper's crime,
When innocent thousands his vile minions slew,
Repeating massacre of St. Bartholomew.
Your church again was stained, and for all time
The Vatican's God straightway did bless his son
In Jesus Christ, petite Napoleon,
Who wrought the butchery. Hugo exiled,
The butcher scourged with his immortal verse,
Whilst you, a parasite, upon him smiled,
And priestly benedictions did rehearse.
Though you are gone, your deeds live after you.
Freedom, whom you assayed to stab, now towers
Majestic 'e'en in France, with victory's flowers
Circled, nor doth in blood her hands imbue.

MRS. CLARA NEYMANN would like to meet with some engagements to lecture in the neighborhood of Syracuse after the Congress, Oct. 26 and 27. Subjects: "German Liberalism"; "The Redeeming Feature in the New Faith," and other topics. Address 97 Malden Lane, New York.

A CARD.

We, the undersigned, Directors of the National Liberal League, offer ourselves as candidates for reelection at the Second Annual Congress of the League, on the following platform of principles:—

1. The right of absolute individual freedom of thought, of speech, and of the press, on all political, religious, social, or other questions, and the right of being wholly uninterfered with by the courts, no matter what opinions as such may be advocated or promulgated.

2. The right and duty of Congress and State Legislatures to pass, and the right and duty of the National and State courts to enforce, laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails; provided, that the offence known as "obscenity" shall be so strictly defined in the statutes as to render impossible the prosecution or punishment of any one for the expression of his honest opinions on any subject.

3. The flagrant wrong of intrusting the execution of the laws for the suppression of obscene literature to any official or officials who shall not scrupulously confine their action within the limits here clearly defined.

And we decline to be candidates for reelection if the principles of the above platform shall fail to be approved by the National Liberal League at this Congress.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.
WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.
J. A. J. WILCOX, Treasurer.
D. G. CRANDON, Chair. Fin. Comm.

PROGRAMME OF THE CONGRESS.

The Directors of the National Liberal League, at their meeting of October 18, adopted the following as the Order of Business of the Syracuse Congress, subject to the approval and ratification of the Congress itself:—

Saturday, October 26.

BUSINESS SESSION, AT 10 A.M.

1. Reading of Records of last Congress by the Secretary (if required).
2. Appointment of Committee on Membership.
3. Address by T. B. Wakeman, Esq., of New York; by his speech on the Constitutionality of the Comstock laws, delivered at Faneuil Hall, Boston, Aug. 1, 1878.
4. Address by Hon. E. P. Hurlbut, of Albany, on "The Liberty of Printing."
5. Report of the Committee on Membership.
6. Appointment of Committees on Resolutions, on Nominations, and on Finance.
7. Report of the Directors.
8. Report of the Treasurer.
9. Temporary Adjournment.

BUSINESS SESSION, 3 P.M.

1. Report of Committee on Resolutions.
2. Debate and Vote on the Resolutions concerning Freedom of the Press and Obscene Literature.
3. Temporary Adjournment.

PUBLIC SESSION, 8 P.M.

1. Addresses by Invited Speakers.
2. Temporary Adjournment.

Sunday, Oct. 27.

BUSINESS SESSION, 10 A.M.

1. Debate and Vote on the remainder of the Report of the Committee on Resolutions.
2. Temporary Adjournment.

BUSINESS SESSION, 3 P.M.

1. Report of the Committee on Nominations, and Election of Officers for the ensuing year.

2. Report of the Finance Committee.
3. Miscellaneous business.
4. Free Conference; short speeches, etc.
5. Temporary Adjournment.

PUBLIC SESSION, 8 P.M.

1. Addresses by Invited Speakers.
2. Final Adjournment.

The two opening addresses by Mr. Wakeman and Judge Hurlbut are intended to present to the Congress at the outset both sides of the question touching the constitutionality of the Comstock laws, as advocated by able representative men. The whole afternoon of Saturday is allotted to the discussion of the important subject of freedom of the press, as affected by the laws suppressing the circulation of obscene literature; and thus ample time is allowed for arriving at a deliberate, wise, and just decision. It will not be the fault of the officers of the League, if the question is not debated and decided on its merits alone. They have done everything to secure perfect fairness. Both sides on the grave question at issue should address themselves to reason, and to reason only. The Congress will undoubtedly recognize the equity of the arrangements which have been made, and require all participants in the debate to respect strictly the rules of parliamentary decorum and courtesy.

HOW NOT TO "ANSWER."

Mr. T. B. Wakeman, in our present issue, undertakes "An Answer to THE INDEX Criticism." It will be both curious and useful to restate, in condensed form, exactly what the criticisms were which he now affects to "answer." He begins by exaggerating the amount of attention we paid to his argument; he appropriates to himself "eleven columns" of which he has a right to barely four. That, however, is a matter which only raises a smile; we call special attention to the criticisms we actually made, in order that the reader may decide intelligently whether they are, or are not, successfully "answered."

Evasion Number One.

We said that Mr. Wakeman's argument that the Comstock laws are unconstitutional is partly technical, partly substantial. The technical part undertakes to show that these laws are unconstitutional on the ground that Congress has no jurisdiction over the mails except for "postal purposes" alone. The substantial part undertakes to show that they are unconstitutional because they abridge the freedom of the press guaranteed by the Constitution itself.

Our reply to the technical part of the argument was that Mr. Wakeman interprets the Constitution in one way, while the United States Supreme Court, the only authorized interpreter of the Constitution, interprets it in another way. This issue is one between an individual young lawyer and a body of learned judges who may safely be assumed to know at least as much law as himself; and we left this issue to be settled between themselves by these rather unequally matched parties.

Our reply to the substantial part of the argument was that, if the freedom of the press is not violated by State suppression of obscene literature, neither is it violated by Congressional suppression of it; that Mr. Wakeman explicitly concedes the right of the State to suppress it, and is therefore logically estopped from denying the right of Congress to suppress it; and that, so far as the SUBSTANTIAL FREEDOM OF THE PRESS is concerned, Mr. Wakeman takes a self-contradictory and suicidal position.

Now Mr. Wakeman very prudently omits all mention of our division of his argument into its technical and its substantial parts. His answer, however, to our criticism of the technical part of it is the astonishing assertion that we have ourselves "admitted" that the present Comstock laws are unconstitutional, and have therefore joined him in alleging that "the Supreme Court is all wrong on this subject."

We have done no such thing. The Supreme Court has simply declared the law itself constitutional; we simply declared the administration of the law by the lower courts to be unconstitutional. What the Supreme Court has declared we have not disputed; so far as he and we are concerned, he alone claims to know more about constitutional law than the Supreme Court. He must try again; he has not "answered" our criticism of the technical part of his argument.

As to the substantial part of his argument, he does not even attempt an answer to our criticism. He says: "What the States may or ought [the italics are ours] to do about obscenity are questions as to the discretionary exercise of State powers. No question of that kind is now before the League or the liberals of the country, and until the liberals can get Mr.

Heywood out of jail, I do not propose to discuss with him how far, or in what way, the States should exercise a power which all must admit they possess." Again, after stating and evading elaborately this part of our criticism, he says: "I am not called upon to determine what restrictions the State should impose on obscenity." Now Mr. Wakeman is not proposing to answer Mr. Heywood; he is proposing to answer THE INDEX, and promises that he will be "careful to meet the material points." We assure him that there is here a very material point to meet, which it is abandonment of his whole argument not to meet. He declares that it is a violation of freedom of the press for Congress to suppress obscene literature, but that it is no violation of freedom of the press for the States to suppress it. This is truly a "question of liberty,"—and Mr. Wakeman dodges it. He gets behind Mr. Heywood, and refuses to meet the most "material point" of all! What we want to know, and what the public wants to know, is how the freedom of the press is involved by Congressional legislation against obscene literature, if it is not equally involved by State legislation against it. After quoting our criticism on this substantial point [see the paragraph of his article which he has numbered IV.], he indulges in various rhetorical exclamations, and then, under cover of his own eloquence about "statesmanship," effects his retreat back to the technical question of jurisdiction, without saying a word on the "material point" he has just quoted!

We repeat, he has completely dodged our criticism on the substantial part of his argument; he has not "answered" it at all, not even feebly. He himself puts forward two main arguments for his position that the Comstock laws are unconstitutional and ought to be repealed: first, because Congress has no jurisdiction in the premises; and, secondly, because they violate the freedom of the press guaranteed by the Constitution. When you come to analyze these two arguments, you find that he does not adduce a single consideration in support of the second which he has not already adduced in support of the first. His technical plea of no jurisdiction is made to do duty over again in a slightly new dress; he plays the same tune once more with scarcely a variation. His argument is, in fact, only a harp of one string, vibrating the same everlasting, monotonous note—"No jurisdiction!"

Does Mr. Wakeman imagine he can fire the American heart on a mere question of jurisdiction, unless some substantial wrong is done by it? "Of course not!" he will reply; "Is not Heywood in jail?" Very well; in what does the wrong of his imprisonment consist? "O, as to that, he is imprisoned by the wrong party! It is Congress that has put him in jail." "Then it would be all right if the State of Massachusetts had put him there?" "Certainly; there is no danger to liberty except from a 'Federal tyranny.' I should not have gone to Boston to protest against anything but that. What the State may do about freedom of the press is a 'question as to the discretionary use of State powers.'"

This lame and impotent conclusion, which is the precise doctrine of his speech and of his present article, is the only "answer" that Mr. Wakeman has yet made to Criticism Number One, pointing out his contradictory position as to substantial freedom of the press. What an "answer"!

Evasion Number Two.

Our second main criticism of Mr. Wakeman's position exposed a false assumption which pervades his entire speech: namely, that the only issue lies between the Comstock laws as they are and no national laws at all. He did not in the least consider the obviously evident alternative of amending these laws, so as to protect liberty and punish the crime of mailing obscene publications at the same time. Consequently, he declared that "this is not a question of obscenity, but of liberty," whereas it is really a question of both.

How does he "answer" this criticism? Simply by restating his former position, and dogmatically denying the possibility of so amending the laws as to protect liberty. He says: "They cannot be amended so as to be safe and constitutional, and should therefore be repealed. . . . No postal laws on this subject can be enforced without abridging the freedom of the press, because they involve espionage and decoy as the only possible means of their enforcement. . . . The general talk about 'reform' is of no possible use in such cases as this; if the thing can be done, he is under the deepest obligation to show how it can be done," etc.

Now we have again and again shown how this "thing can be done," and neither Mr. Wakeman nor any other of his side has yet ventured to question the proposal. Briefly, we have maintained from the beginning that FREEDOM OF THE PRESS WILL BE EFFICIENTLY PROTECTED, if the present Comstock law is amended so as to prohibit the mailing of only those publications whose main and manifest intention is to inflame lewd passions and incite to vicious practices for the sake of profit to publishers and advertisers, and if a definite provision is inserted in those laws to the effect that they shall not be construed to prohibit the discussion, advocacy, or promulgation of any opinions on any political, literary, scientific, moral, religious, or other subject whatever. This proposition has been laid before the public in various forms, but with substantially the same features, in THE INDEX of June 28, December 6, and December 20, 1877, and January 31, May 23, June 13, and July 4, 1878—not to mention numerous other repetitions of the same points in other issues. Of course, we have not undertaken to throw these suggestions into the form of a statute, which requires the trained hand of a practical legislator; and of course we know they can be improved. But we have not, with Mr. Wakeman, such profound faith in the imbecility of the human intellect as to imagine that the perfectly easy and simple task of drafting a safe law cannot possibly be accomplished! Nothing in the world would be easier than for a skilled legislator to amend the Comstock laws so that liberty of thought, speech, and press should be entirely safe from such abuses as the imprisonment of Mr. Heywood. It is mortifying to hear radicals echoing the cant of Orthodoxy about the feebleness and impotence of human reason. The object to be gained by a "reform" of the Comstock laws is so clear, precise, and practicable, that it is positively humiliating to see men of brains fold their hands and sigh—"It can't be done!" If radicals don't know enough to do it, so much the worse for them. "Where there's a will, there's a way." Nothing but the will is wanting here.

Mr. Wakeman's objections about "espionage and decoy" are not to the point; the point is about "abridging freedom of the press," which can be efficiently protected without protecting obscene publications as above defined. The determination of proper methods to be used in detecting crime is a general question, to be settled on general grounds; it is not a question that concerns us now in the least. The question now is how to frame a just and efficient statute on this subject. Let us stick to one thing at a time.

Still less are his objections about determining "intention" worthy of serious consideration. When he asserts that "only one tribunal has sat upon the intentions of men, and that was the Inquisition itself," who would suspect that it was a lawyer who made so rash and wild a statement? Is he really ignorant that the difference between murder and manslaughter hinges wholly on the fact of premeditation, and that, no man is ever hung for murder until the court has first "sat upon his intentions"?

In short, Mr. Wakeman evades Criticism Number Two almost as completely as he evades Criticism Number One. He flippantly denies "reform" as a third alternative, ignores the repeated, pertinent, and definite propositions made for effecting it, sees only a question of "liberty," and gets rid of the "obscenity" question by muscularly closing his eyes to the facts. His "answer" to our second criticism is merely an evasive appeal to the feebleness of "poor human reason!"

Evason Number Three.

We showed that Mr. Wakeman, by denying to Congress all power to exclude obscene literature from the mails, conferred power upon individual malefactors to make the nation an accomplice in their own crime; that the postal system is and can be under no control but that of Congress; that the necessities of the case compelled the Supreme Court to recognize the right of Congress to prohibit this criminal abuse of the mails; that otherwise there could be no possible punishment of this crime.

Does Mr. Wakeman "answer" this criticism? Not in the least. Having twisted it into an assertion of the right of Congress to "create" crimes at its pleasure, he only denies outright that the mailing of obscene literature is a crime at all! Exactly; we thought it would come to that. Mr. Wakeman is already advancing to Mr. Heywood's position. He says that his speech showed that "the mere mailing of anything is not, and cannot be made, a crime, and can never be so legislated by Congress," etc.

Now the plain rejoinder to this "answer" is that the circulation of obscene literature in any way is a crime at common law; and that circulating such literature by mail is only one of innumerable ways of committing this crime. The crime itself was long ago "created" by the common law; Congress did not "create" it, but merely forbade it in a case beyond the jurisdiction of any other power than its own. To deny to Congress the power to punish this common-law crime is to leave it altogether unpunished when committed through the postal system, and thus to compel the people as a whole to be the tool and cat's-paw of the criminal. Mr. Wakeman transparently evades this whole difficulty. But it will not be evaded; it stands, and will continue to stand, a break-water that cannot be shaken by the frothy waves of "repeal." His "answer" to Criticism Number Three is nothing but an attack upon the common law itself; but we suspect that the common law will receive no serious detriment under the circumstances.

Evason Number Four.

We pointed out that Mr. Wakeman flatly contradicted himself with regard to the application of his own principle to the case of postal-cards. On the one hand, he declared explicitly that "the MEANING OF MAILED MATTER has nothing to do with the post-office, nor that with the meaning." On the other hand, he justified the law that "postal-cards should contain nothing that could be offensive to those to whom they are sent or to the public." And he tried to conceal the absurdity of this contradiction by treating the exclusion of offensive postal-cards from the mails as a "necessary postal regulation"—i.e., one made for mere "postal purposes and reasons"! We pointed out that postal-cards could "contain" nothing that is "offensive" except their meaning only; that Mr. Wakeman had declared that the "meaning of mailed matter" was entirely outside of all "postal purposes and reasons"; and that, therefore, in the same speech he "denies and affirms the right of excluding mailed matter on the score of its meaning, as such."

How does Mr. Wakeman "answer" this criticism? Does he succeed in reconciling his own contradictory assertions? All he has to say is that "the same reasons [i.e., postal reasons] compel that they [i.e., the postal-cards] should be inoffensive to the receiver and not exciting to the public." We look anxiously to see what these "postal reasons" can be, since they must not, according to Mr. Wakeman himself, have anything to do with "the meaning of mailed matter." But we get no light on this subject; the "publicity" he refers to is the publicity of the meaning itself. We discover that, in trying to "answer" our criticism, he omits, as altogether unmanageable, the strongest passage we had quoted from him and quote again above; he only ventures to deal with passages which he thinks he can more easily handle. But his ingenuity is all wasted. The contradiction still stares us in the face; it is there still, as intractable as Banquo's ghost. Now Criticisms Number One, Two, Three, and Four were the real criticisms we made; and Mr. Wakeman, as any one may see, has not "answered" a single one of them. He promises to "meet the material points"; he has not met a single one of them. If he could have "answered" or "met" them, he would undoubtedly have done so. On the contrary, he has either not understood them, or else not chosen to face them. In either case, the force of these four leading criticisms remains unshaken and unweakened; and though imagining that he has found his way to a successful "answer," Mr. Wakeman has missed his way completely. The Indian, wandering about and being asked if he had got lost, drew himself up with dignity, and replied: "Ugh! Indian not lost. Indian here. Wigwam lost!" Mr. Wakeman's "answer" will probably be found in the Indian's wigwam; it is certainly not to be found in his article.

Nevertheless, it would be quite unjust to our ingenious opponent to represent him as not having "answered" anything. He has set up and completely demolished several "men of straw." We will enumerate a few of these, some of which he calls "confusions" and others "misapprehensions."

Man of Straw Number One.

Mr. Wakeman avers that we "agree" with him that "the present Comstock laws are unconstitutional; that they abridge the freedom of the press, and that the Supreme Court is all wrong on the subject."

On the contrary, we believe, and have said with sufficient explicitness, that the Supreme Court is substantially right on the subject; that the Comstock laws are entirely constitutional, when so interpreted and administered as not to abridge the freedom of the press; that their only unconstitutionality lies in the "absence of definition" which renders such abridgement of freedom possible, and will be easily obviated by a proper amendment; and that, even as they are, the original intention of these laws is perverted, when they are made to interfere with the freedom of the press in any degree. This is not at all to agree with Mr. Wakeman, who holds that, no matter how administered or amended, those laws are unconstitutional because Congress has no power to pass them. On this latter point we believe that the Supreme Court understands the Constitution better than Mr. Wakeman. Our "confusion" on this head is Mr. Wakeman's Man of Straw Number One.

Man of Straw Number Two.

Mr. Wakeman avers that we have "abandoned" the second plank of the "Card." His manner of proving this astonishes us. His original misquotation of this plank we charitably attributed to "carelessness," while we emphatically repudiated the meaning which by such means he had tortured out of it. By now deliberately insisting on his misquotation, and attempting to force upon us an opinion we never expressed and never held, he constrains us to say that he garbles the plank in question purposely, and for most unfair purposes besides. The obvious meaning of that plank is that both Congress and State Legislatures, each in their appropriate sphere, are bound to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, because the common law properly treats this as a crime; that Congress is bound to punish this crime when it is committed within the special jurisdiction of Congress, which includes the postal system as well as the District of Columbia, the Territories, the Military and Naval Academies, etc., and that the States are bound to punish it within the limits of their own jurisdiction. To insist that we originally intended to advocate "the unlimited jurisdiction of the United States over the whole subject of suppressing the circulation of obscene literature," in the face of our explicit denial that this was our original intention, is an insinuation which we forbear to characterize as it deserves. It is enough to point out that the "confusion" evinced in this pretended "abandonment" of the second plank of the "Card" is Mr. Wakeman's Man of Straw Number Two. We never held to that plank more firmly than we do after reading Mr. Wakeman's argument.

Man of Straw Number Three.

Mr. Wakeman represents us as attributing to Congress the power of "creating" a "new crime," because we recognize its right to exclude obscene literature from the mails. We have already shown the fallacy of this charge. Circulating obscene literature is a crime at common law; Congress does not "create" it by prohibiting it within its own proper jurisdiction. The fact is that, when the Constitution was adopted, advertising had not become the science and art that it now is; and it never occurred to the framers of the Constitution that the "post-offices and post-roads" which they empowered Congress to "establish" could ever become the favorite channel of an infamous and criminal business. If they had once suspected this development, they would have expressly empowered Congress to deal with this crime, because it grows solely out of the postal system over which there can be no control at all but that of Congress. The omission to enumerate this crime as the analogous crime of counterfeiting is enumerated only shows how impossible it is for one generation to foresee and provide for all the necessities of another. In authoritatively confirming the right of Congress to deal with this entirely modern crime of corrupting society by means of the mails, the Supreme Court obeyed strictly the general spirit of the Constitution; and, whatever force there may be in Mr. Wakeman's argument as a piece of mere jealous literalism, the Court's decision is a triumph of the spirit over the letter—of a broad and healthy statesmanship over the hypochondriacal dread of a "Federal tyranny." He attributes to us an "obscenity panic"; we reciprocate the compliment by attributing to him a "Federal tyranny panic." Let us pit one panic against the other, and "call it quits." But the "confusion" he discovers in the notion he invents for our benefit that Congress has the power of "creating new crimes" must join Mr. Wakeman's growing regiment as Man of Straw Number Three.

Man of Straw Number Four.

Mr. Wakeman attributes to us a "misapprehension" as to the necessity of "preserving the Constitutional provisions clearly, and defining and limiting the Federal jurisdiction in criminal matters." We modestly decline the honor of this "misapprehension." But we point out his own misapprehension of the necessities of governmental evolution, in not recognizing the necessity of conforming Constitutional exegesis to new circumstances and new times. This crime of mailing obscene literature is a vile fungus of quite modern growth, which could never have originated except through the marvellous development of the newspaper press and the general science of advertising. The Supreme Court is simply more progressive than Mr. Wakeman—less old-foggyish than he in adapting itself to modern conditions. The hysterical dread of "Federal tyranny" and centralization which he evinces belongs to a period anterior to the Civil War; it will degenerate into positive hypochondria, unless vigorously checked in season. He must learn that the growth of the national idea can never tend to a diminution of personal liberty, so long as its political formula is—Town government for Town purposes, State government for State purposes, National government for National purposes. The decision of the Supreme Court is in perfect keeping with the spirit of this formula; and if Mr. Wakeman had had a fuller comprehension of it, he would never have invented the "misapprehension" he attributes to us, or set up Man of Straw Number Four.

Man of Straw Number Five.

Mr. Wakeman attributes to us another "misapprehension" as to the "position of liberals in regard to obscenity." He says: "Because they do not deem it necessary to throw overboard the Constitution and all their liberties [!!!] to get it punished, he represents them as in favor of it, and so has been the cause and source of unlimited misrepresentation, if not slander." We repel this charge with indignation. We have never represented liberals as a class, or the "repeal" party as a class, as "in favor of obscenity." It is about time for such men as Mr. Wakeman to cease propagating in this way the low and venomous scurrilities of the Truth Seeker; we have a perfect right to expect from such men as himself the intellectual capacity of understanding the distinction between the motives and the consequences of actions, and the moral capacity of scrupulously respecting this distinction when we have never once forgotten it. Here is a crime which consists in using the mails for the wilful corruption of society; here is a statute which, whatever its faults, formidably interferes with the commission of this crime; here are a body of liberals who insist on the total repeal of this statute. Their motives are their own affair; we care not whether these motives are good, bad, or indifferent; but we do say, and we challenge contradiction, that the CONSEQUENCE AND RESULT of totally repealing that statute must be to facilitate the commission of that crime. Now it happens that we are every whit as earnest for the protection of freedom of the press as Mr. Wakeman himself; we are working for it just as hard; and we insist that we have an undoubted right to point out to the public the bad results of total "repeal," as opposed to "reform," without hearing an instantaneous chorus of accusation from all its supporters that we have slandered their motives! Mr. Wakeman, at least, is bound to know and to understand the well-known rule of parliamentary discussion which Cushing states thus: "The nature or consequences of a measure may be reprobated in strong terms; but to arraign the motives of those who advocate it is a personality and against order." We deny for at least the twentieth time that we have reflected upon anybody's motives in this matter; but we shall certainly be forced to think, if we hear any more of this insufferable nonsense, that the motives of the complainers must be bad, or they would not be so absurdly sensitive and suspicious. We repeat, with greater emphasis than ever, that the necessary consequence of repealing the Comstock laws must be to leave the crime of mailing obscene literature wholly unpunished, and thereby to foster and promote the circulation of it. Refute this statement if you can, gentlemen, but do not be so cruel to yourselves as to insist that the statement contains a reflection upon your motives. This last "misapprehension" which Mr. Wakeman has invented for us is the shabbiest Man of Straw of the whole lot; it is good for nothing even as a scarecrow, unless to put the other four to flight.

In fine, Mr. Wakeman has failed to "meet" a single one of the "material points," or to "answer" a single one of the leading "criticisms," which he professes to consider. But he has set up in their stead five men of straw, and toppled them over. Whether this is "An Answer to THE INDEX Criticisms," let the reader decide.

THE CHURCH OF FREE RELIGION.

THE INDEX has already contained the item of information that the Free Religious Society of Providence has invited Mr. Frederic A. Hinckley to become its resident speaker and minister. I use the word "minister" in its natural sense, and not as an ecclesiastical title. The new relationship between Mr. Hinckley and the Providence society began on the first Sunday of this month by a simple ceremony of public recognition.

This society at Providence was the first local society that was organized under the free-religious name after the formation of the Free Religious Association; and, so far as I recall, it is the only one among three or four similar attempts at local organization which has shown much vigor or continuity of existence. The Free Congregation Society at Florence, Mass., was formed several years before the Free Religious Association came into being, though its fundamental principle is essentially the same. And there are some other local religious organizations that are now quite as free, but which originated as Christian churches and have become free by natural evolution. Of these it may be said, and doubtless with truth, that at least a part of the strength they may show is due to their Christian inheritance. Their methods have certainly been more or less shaped in Christian moulds. But the Free Religious Society at Providence was organized independently of such traditions, and it is the only local society of much moment, probably, that can be said to have been organized as a direct special result of the formation of the Free Religious Association. It has now called Mr. Hinckley to its service in order that it may be formed into a more compact body, with greater practical efficiency. The success of the experiment will be watched with interest by all liberals as bearing on the problem of the future church of free religion.

By many liberal minds it is questioned, it is true, whether free religion will ever have any such form and coherence of institutions as can be called a church, and not a few would strenuously object to the organization of anything that should be so named. Indeed, the term "church" in Christian history has been so synonymous with mental bondage, that, however innocent a word in itself, it will doubtless by natural antagonism be discarded as damaged phraseology in all attempts at free religious organization. Yet that free religion will in time develop some kind of free institutions taking the place of the church, I for one can have no doubt. I believe that institutions are as necessary to the welfare of society as ideas,—that ideas cannot do their full work for mankind at large until they are embodied in institutions. Souls are necessary, but so are bodies.

And there is growing evidence that the time is approaching for the better embodiment of free religious ideas. Not to speak of the organization of Liberal Leagues, which have a special semi-political work for their motive, there are in many places scattered through our country the nuclei of liberal religious societies, where a tendency begins to manifest itself for some more effective kind of associated action: places where free-thinking people for years have been accustomed, perhaps, to come together for weekly discussions or for hearing a lecture, until the more thoughtful and earnest minds among them appear to have passed through this phase, and are now beginning to inquire whether they cannot have something which shall be more satisfying to themselves and their families, and more helpful to the community around. Free thought and free speech are very much, but they are not the ultimate end of human existence. When they are still denied, no labor and no sacrifice are too great to win them. They are everywhere to be vigilantly guarded, and are the essential conditions of all institutions which free religion may construct. But with freethought in religion there come duties as well as rights. There are obligations to be discharged as well as emancipations to be enjoyed,—obligations towards those not yet emancipated; obligations for the instruction of the young and the improvement of home and social life. If free religion means anything practical, it means the emancipation of the religious sentiment from bondage to creeds that it may work directly for the amelioration of human society. It is eminently social and humanitarian in its mission. It is religion set to work on the practical problems of life.

And whatever special institutions the free religious movement may develop, and however variously they may be adapted to local exigencies, they will all be cast, we may be sure, in this mould of philanthropy and self-improvement. Their prevailing motive will not be speculative, but educational, humanitarian, practical,—the elevation of the conditions and aspirations of human life. Prof. Adler's society in New York, though not yet realizing, doubtless, his ideal, seems to point in the direction of the coming church of free religion. Around the Sunday assembly, as a centre, with its discourse and singing, he has gathered a school for the moral instruction of the children of his own society, a kindergarten for the neglected and destitute children of the street, a workmen's institute, and a benevolent section for more miscellaneous charitable work. Other societies here and there are working towards the same end. They do not call themselves churches of Christ nor churches of God; but they aim to be churches of humanity.

LETTER FROM MR. JOHNSON.

We are very glad to publish the following letter:—
NORTH ANDOVER, Oct. 12, 1878.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

If the owners of the Oxford Street Chapel claim to be the Free Religious Society of Lynn, discussion of their duty in relation to secularization of religious property is of course in order at the present time. For one, I do not insist, as your Western correspondent seems inclined to do, that every one who takes part in such a society shall hold the same views on that subject with the "free religionists," or the secularists, or any other special communion, on penalty of being read out of liberal sympathy and respect. Nor is this a question which calls for the style and manner of a papal bull. If I were now the minister of a free church, I should certainly take the secularist side on the matter of taxing the property of that church; but I hope I should not try to enforce on my hearers a "platform" of doctrines, legal and other, technically entitled "Free Religion," as the test of fidelity to freedom in thought and belief. Your correspondent's charges as to "profession and practice" are mere rhetorical flourish, unless he is the authorized expounder of freedom in religion, and, moreover, acquainted with the facts as to what the Lynn society do actually "profess" under that name.

Were this all, I should not send you a communication concerning its affairs, upon seeing them commented on in the public papers. But the real question is a different one, and ought to be stated fairly.

It is now eight years since, for reasons published at the time, I resigned the position of minister of the "Free Church of Lynn"; since which action on my part, no religious meetings of that society have been held, though the building has still been devoted to religious purposes. It is for those interested in the work thus broken off to say whether the society still exists or not. It had already fourteen years of history when this chapel was erected, and its public occupancy of the same lasted but four years. But as its only minister, from the time of its organization at my own instance, on a thoroughly independent basis, to the time of my withdrawal, I am able to state that at no moment was it the owner of the "Oxford Street Chapel," or responsible, as a society, for the action of the corporation which did own it. That the members of that corporation were mainly, if not wholly, persons connected with the society, is true; but the Free Church was simply occupant of the premises, and by the very freedom of its nature, being open to all, and without distinctions as to voting qualification among those interested in its worship and work, unsuited for holding property in shares. It was with the view of protecting its independence in this respect, that I requested the "Oxford Street Chapel Association," before the society commenced meetings in the new edifice, to declare with distinctness their own purpose not to sell nor rent pews therein, nor in any way to divorce it from the free and equal worship which characterized the society, and of which they were themselves the supporters. They have faithfully kept the promise then made. The property, however, was held by them alone: and no vote of the Free Church, as such, has ever been taken, so far as I know, on the question of their paying taxes to the city, certainly not during my connection with the congregation, for the general subject was not then mooted; and my own first knowledge of this special case dates but a few weeks back.

With your correction of the letter of your correspondent I am glad to agree. But this brief statement is made, in order to guard against an identification of the two organizations, which seems likely to mislead as to the responsibilities of the Free Church, as I understand them, on this matter. The right or wrong of claiming that as religious property, this edifice has now the same legal rights as during the period of the society's active existence, is another question, on which I am not competent to decide. I do not, however, understand that the peculiar opinions of the society on religious matters are at all connected with the decision of the city as to taxing the property of the corporation. Cordially yours,

SAMUEL JOHNSON.

THE BABYISHNESS OF THE ORTHODOX CREED.

There is a becoming pride of intellect. Man, of all the inhabitants of the earth, has more mind and more knowledge than he can use as a mere animal, and he has a right to feel proud of the surplus. In childhood we believe many things taught us as real truths in the nursery; but when we become men, implicit faith gives way to godlike reason, on all propositions except in one department. The Lord High Chancellor of England would be ashamed now to believe the story of Jack the Giant Killer, which he so firmly believed when first told him by his nurse. The President of Princeton College would blush to have it suspected, in a company of savants, that he still believed in the exploits of Sinbad the Sailor, or of Baron Münchhausen. But in theology—the science of God—where we are brought into close relationship with the essence of reason, Orthodox dignitaries still continue to believe propositions quite as absurd and insulting to the human understanding as any of the nursery tales of our childhood.

For instance, we are required to believe, and that at the peril of our soul's salvation from a lake of fire and brimstone, that a child may be as old as his father! Michael Servetus believed sincerely that the person known as Jesus Christ was the Son of God, the first begotten of the Father, and devoutly adored him as such. But his intellect could not accept the proposition that he was the Eternal Son of the Father, for that clearly implies that a son can be the same age as his father, which is absurd because it is a natural impossibility. Therefore he was condemned to be burnt alive by the Synod of Geneva, with John Calvin at their head. As the flames gathered round his devoted person, Farrel, Calvin's right-hand man, stood by, and with tears of pity running down his cheeks, begged him, in the most plaintive language, to say the "Eternal" Son of God. But Servetus, as an honest man, could no more believe that proposition than that two and three make seven. His heresy being mortal and damnable, the executioners were ordered to make the fires slow, not to lengthen out the agony of the sufferer, but to give him a chance at the eleventh hour and fifty-ninth minute to recant, and thus escape a fire that will burn in hell eternally! Yet this proposition, that a child can be as old as his father, is embodied in all the creeds of Christendom, and is a fundamental doctrine; and thousands of cultivated minds teach and profess to believe it to this day!

The Orthodox sects, one and all, unite in calling the radicals atheists, because we do not believe in their God, as defined by all their scores of creeds in the doctrine of the Trinity. But as Lord Bacon says, it is better to deny that there is any God at all than to believe in a God who is both foolish and wicked. Only think of a God who would endow his creature man with the divine attribute of reason, and then, in defiance of reason, require him to believe, on pain of eternal damnation, that a child could be as old as his own father! Think of educated gentlemen who knew the multiplication table believing such a proposition themselves, and having the hardihood to ask other people who have ciphered to the single rule of three, to believe so mountainous an absurdity!

When a credulous Churchman believes an absurdity in his creed, giving as a reason that it is a miracle, he little dreams of the insult he offers to God. It is only a fourth rate machinist who places a locomotive engine on the track, and, when the steam is up and the machine is in motion, discovers that this screw is loose, this piston too long, that one too short, that there is a flaw in the boiler which threatens an explosion, and that the engine must be taken back to the shop to have the blunders in its plan corrected. This is just what the Almighty does when he is supposed to work a miracle. How utterly unworthy God is of our homage, when, unable to see the end from the beginning of his plan, he has to arrest it in the execution, and correct his blunders! A belief in such folly might do in the childhood of the race, when the Rev. Dr. Alphabatarus flourished, who got his distinctions as a bishop of the Church from the fact that he was so learned that he could say all the letters of the alphabet, but is unworthy the credence of the nineteenth century.

I was going to give another instance or two of the babyishness of the Church creeds, but, as I suspect the printer will run out of exclamation points, I desist. A. B. B.

ENON VALLEY, Pa., Sept. 16, 1878.

SHALL WE HAVE A "RADICAL CHURCH?"

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

When this subject was first mentioned in THE INDEX (June 6), I did not give it much attention; for Mr. Neville has shown by several of his later communications that he is but about half-way between a conservative and a liberal,—some kind of a "liberal Christian,"—his Christianity largely overbalancing his liberalism. For such a man it may, perhaps, be desirable to have a church; and as he is neither fully Orthodox nor Christian, nor fully liberal, none of the churches as they are seem to satisfy him, and so he wants to get one corresponding to his notions. Well, that is natural enough for Mr. Neville, and therefore hardly worth while to dispute. Now, however, comes also a Mr. G. E. Thomas, who "seconds the motion" of Mr. Neville (INDEX, September 26), so I think it may be well now to debate the matter; and I would "move," Mr. Editor, "to lay that motion on the table."

The very word church has for me, and I am inclined to believe for every radical, an ominous sound, reminding one of superstition and bigotry, of persecution and inquisition, creed and intolerance, and all the countless evils resulting therefrom. No, my dear Mr. Abbot, radicals suffered, and still suffer, too much from churches to desire any church under what name or form it ever may appear.

But it is further argued by these churchmen that liberals are disorganized, and therefore weak, and that a "Radical Church" would unite and organize them. Well, it is but too true that liberals are disorganized and weak in consequence. I myself deplore this as much as anybody; but a church is by no means the right thing to unite and organize them. A church necessarily must have a creed, and a creed means authority and dictation, means dogma and belief. Liberals, however, acknowledge no authority but such as churches reject,—reason, science, and nature; admit of no dictation but that of these authorities and their own consciences; acknowledge no binding dogma and no enforced belief. They want freedom,—freedom to investigate, and freedom to believe or disbelieve. A church could therefore never unite and organize them. The great trouble with liberals is, that they love their freedom too much; so much, that they are jealous of any organization, and therefore will not organize. They rather suffer the disadvantages of disorganization and be free, than enjoy the great benefits of organization at the cost, as they apprehend, of their individual freedom. This, sir, is the reason that the so timely and necessary organization, "The National Liberal League," does not grow as fast as it ought to. It does and must grow, however, though not as fast as its friends would wish, if liberals themselves will not prevent it. The Orthodox themselves will aid its growth. They will ever become more and more audacious and provoking; and they must become thus, it seems, before liberals can be made to see the necessity and great advantages of the National Liberal League, support it en masse, and organize under its aegis. The Church, the Orthodox Church, will effect this finally; but the proposed "Radical Church" of Mr. Neville never can and never will do it. It could be of no earthly benefit whatever, but of much harm. The best of it is that it is but a scheme of some church-people, but never will become a possibility with liberals.

MORRIS EINHSTEIN.

TITUSVILLE, Pa., Sept. 28, 1878.

DEFINITION WANTED.

As I understand, Mr. Heywood now lies in Dedham jail simply because a jury decided that to preach free love is obscene; nor will this verdict surprise any one who knows the public feeling. A decision similar in principle was reached by an English jury in the case of the Crown v. Bradlaugh and Besant. Now how is this to be prevented from happening again? The advocates of a reform of the law propose to make provision that no opinions shall be proscribed. But supposing that provision had been already made when the Heywood case came off; would not the jury still have said, "Opinions! Yes, we respect all opinions honestly entertained; but this man is an apologist of fornication. That is not an opinion, but a vice." I ask, Would not the jury have said so? Honestly, I believe they would. To define obscenity satisfactorily may not be so easy as some people think. One says that whatever appeals to the passions is obscene; but that will never do at all, because some of the noblest products of art and literature appeal to the passions, and to the voluptuous side of the nature. It is their very purpose. What distinguishes an honest man from a knave is not that the one appeals to the passions and the other not, but that the one strives to elevate humanity, and the other not. The utter wickedness of those who prey upon the licentiousness of the young cannot be exaggerated, and it is not good to leave the wheat and tares to grow together. Still, it is better to let a few small tares grow than to root up the very finest of the wheat.

It seems to be taken for granted that obscene literature, etc., is one main cause of the prevalent impurity—be the same much or little—among young people. But is this proved? On the contrary, is not that very prurency which tempts the young to buy these filthy wares a proof that they were previously corrupted?—doubtless from natural causes which are likely to be an hundred times more operative than any books or pictures or any sort of apparatus. Children should be better observed than they now are. They vary extremely. For instance, Sir Henry Maudesley quotes the incredible case of a child of four years who was physically a woman. I opine that children of voluptuous temper who do not take care of themselves must go wrong.

CHARLES ELLERSHAW.

NEW YORK CITY.

[Nobody imagines that laws against theft will ever abolish all dishonesty; but that is no reason for repealing them. They tend to reduce dishonesty more or less; and that is as much as is required to justify retaining them. The same reasoning applies to the case of mailing obscene literature.]

The jury that should take the position above stated would need to be instructed by the Court as to its exceeding unreasonableness. A man has a legal right to "apologize" for anything; it is only when he commits overt acts that he should be liable to punishment. This is precisely the distinction that a well-expressed law would make unmistakable, and there would be no practical difficulty whatever in expressing it precisely as to protect freedom of opinion completely. All that is wanted is the will; the way is plain enough.—Ed.]

A CALAMITY INDEED.

PALMYRA, Neb., Oct. 3, 1878.

EDITOR OF INDEX:

Dear Sir,—It would most unquestionably be a great misfortune to have the National Liberal League fall into the hands of the "total repeal" party; thereby practically putting the only influential body of State secularizationists on the side of "obscene literature." Wherever I have been, on close examination I find the chief reason of liberals not exerting more influence for their principles is because they, as a class, do not work with sufficient earnestness and perseverance for a higher standard of morality, and for greater purity of life among themselves.

The State secularizationists will labor in vain so long as they are inconsistent and illogical. It is not often that you can get a true man or woman to work heartily for a political or religious reform, with a person that is deteriorating in some other department of life, as far too many liberals are by using tobacco, liquor, and practising some of the various forms of licentiousness. I would like to call the attention of the readers of THE INDEX to E. G. Thomas' timely article about "A Rational Church" in the last number; it seems to me that Mr. Thomas strikes the keynote of the whole question, when he says that, in order to secure justice between man and man, an "important auxiliary is to build up a strong character that can stand up and defiantly demand that justice be dispensed with an impartial hand"; the italics are mine.

It is to be hoped that sufficient toleration will be shown, and regard manifested for the secularization cause at the Syracuse Congress, to prevent either side bolting, if beaten in the settlement of the issues brought forward there.

Yours for the triumph of State secularization,
C. F. WOODS.

WAS IT RIGHT?

I send THE INDEX the following item, cut from a local paper:—

"The May Fisk Blondes were prevented from giving their exhibition in Keokuk, by the prompt action of the mayor of the city, who declared that the immorality of the show was sufficient excuse for his interference. His Honor had seen some of the vulgar handbills which have been circulated in Quincy by the agents of the troupe, and at once notified Miss Fisk and the owner of the hall not to attempt to give the advertised performance. Miss Fisk was defiant, and endeavored to carry out her purpose, but was prevented from doing so by the police."

I wish to ask whether a family rightfully may exclude such things from its home, and whether there is a similar corporate capacity in which citizens rightfully may exclude such things from their city. For my part, I approve highly of the act of the mayor of Keokuk, and I like his pluck. I think I risk little in holding that he did not overpass the legitimate limits of social authority, provided any social authority at all be legitimate. Moreover, I can see no important difference between spreading before the eye a spectacle or performance on the one hand, and on the other hand a page of print having the same meaning; except that the latter is likely to be the more shameless or insidious because the more covert and private. The most profligate persons will find insupportable publicly what they relish or practice privately.

J. VILA BLAKE.

QUINCY, Ill.

GARIBALDI'S HOME at CAPRERA is the simplest of habitations, and the life he leads therein is as simple. He has but few attendants, and it is told that guests are required to make their own beds. The general's days are uneventful. He rises in the morning at four o'clock, and without taking anything to eat goes off to look after some pets who inhabit the border and surface of a small pond not far from the house,—a flock of geese. He feeds them, and then, having gone back to the house to get his cup of black coffee, he sets to work in his fields until about an hour before midday, when he returns home and looks over and signs letters which Bassi, his secretary, has written, according to his instructions. Some twelve or thirteen years ago he used to employ this hour before dinner in teaching a little shepherd lad named Luca Spano. The boy was little more than a cretin; but by dint of steady, quiet perseverance and kindness, Garibaldi succeeded in making something of him. He had learned to read well, write a good hand, and was progressing well when, on the 24th of July, 1866, he fell by the general's side, fighting like a hero, at Monte Suello, in the Tyrol. Of this brave death, and other incidents connected with his adventurous life, the general freely discourses as he sits at the head of the board, his son Menotti and his friends on the one side and the other, and the servants "below the salt." Dinner at Caprera is always a simple meal,—minestra, i.e., soup with Italian paste or vegetables in it, followed by two dishes at the most, and no wine on the table. At the end of about an hour the general leaves the table, and going to his room throws himself dressed upon the bed, sleeps for awhile, and then reads the papers or any book he is interested in. At four o'clock he goes back to his work in the fields until six or six and a half, when he returns home again to sup. After supper he retires to his room, never neglects to write a page in his journal, and note the meteorological changes of the day, and is generally in bed at the time when a great part of the world are beginning to turn night into day.

"GIVING to others what you don't want yourself,"—a little boy's definition, but with not a few older practical endorsers.

CHARACTERS never change; opinions alter, characters are only developed.—Disraeli.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

Per 1 to 12	Insertions, 10c per line.
" 13 " 25 "	" 2 " "
" 26 " 51 "	" 3 " "
" 52 " 77 "	" 4 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEINER.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

- O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
- WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
- WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
- Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
- GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
- DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
- Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.
- J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
- ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
- C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
- W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
- BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.
- ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.
- JAMES E. OLIVER, Ithaca, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Proceedings of Tenth Annual Meeting, 1877. Contains Essays by Rev. Wm. E. Alger, on "Steps towards Religious Emancipation in Christendom," and by C. D. B. Mills, Esq., on "Internal Dangers to Free Thought and Free Religion": Addresses by O. B. Frothingham, Wm. Henry Channing, Rabbi Lasker, Dr. J. L. Dudley, and T. W. Higginson; and tenth annual reports of the Executive Committee, Treasurer, etc.

Any one of the above pamphlets of "PROCEEDINGS" sent to any address for Five cents received in postage stamps; and more at the same rate. Sold also for Five cents at the office.

For series of important Tracts see last page of THE INDEX.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1873 is quite limited and at special rates. Orders by mail may be addressed "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston, Mass."

WM. J. POTTER, Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fifth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyses the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 15.—The Battle of Syracuse. Two Essays by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D., and F. E. Abbot discussing the Authority of Christianity. Price 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 20 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD. GREAT THROUGH LINE AND UNITED STATES MAIL ROUTE.

The attention of the travelling public is respectfully invited to some of the merits of this great highway, in the confident assertion and belief that no other line can offer equal inducements as a route of through travel. In

CONSTRUCTION AND EQUIPMENT

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD stands confessedly at the head of American railways. The track is double the entire length of the line, of steel rails laid on heavy oak ties, which are embedded in a foundation of rock ballast eighteen inches in depth. All bridges are of iron or stone, and built upon the most approved plans. Its passenger cars, while eminently safe and substantial, are at the same time models of comfort and elegance.

THE SAFETY APPLIANCES

In use on this line well illustrate the far-seeing and liberal policy of its management, in accordance with which the utility only of an improvement and not its cost has been the question of consideration. Among many may be noticed

The Block System of Safety Signals, Janney Coupler, Buffer, and Platform, The Wharton Patent Switch, and the Westinghouse Air-Brake, forming in conjunction with a perfect double track and road-bed a combination of safeguards against accidents which have rendered them practically impossible.

Pullman Palace Cars

are run on all Express Trains from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, to Chicago, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, and St. Louis.

WITHOUT CHANGE,

and to all the principal points in the far West and South with but one change of cars. Connections are made in Union Depots, and are assured to all important points. The Scenery of the Pennsylvania Route is admitted to be unsurpassed in the world for grandeur, beauty, and variety. Superior refreshment facilities are provided. Employes are courteous and attentive, and it is an inevitable result that a trip by the Pennsylvania Railroad must form

A Pleasing and Memorable Experience.

ADDRESS

National Liberal League,
231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

of the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

Will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Annual or Life Members of it.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE
231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE! CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome Seal of the National Liberal League, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

PLATFORM

For the Presidential Election of 1880,

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

VICTORY!

On the eve of going to press, only a brief announcement is possible of the general result of the Syracuse Congress. The control of the National Liberal League has been thrown into the hands of the "repeal" party, who artfully persuaded the "reform" minority to vote for a resolution postponing the question of "repeal" versus "reform" to the next Annual Congress, and then broke their own agreement by immediately proceeding to elect a strong "repeal" ticket by a vote of 76 to 51.

But the minority, headed by Judge Hurlbut, withdrew from the Congress at Wisting Opera House, re-assembled in the Syracuse House parlors, elected Judge Hurlbut Chairman and Mr. R. P. Hallowell Secretary, passed resolutions protesting against the "breach of faith" by the majority in not adhering to their own agreement, and re-organized as the "National Liberal League of America," with substantially the old Constitution and old list of officers.

The evidence of the existence of an organized conspiracy to capture the League, for the purpose of reversing its record and committing it to the total "repeal" of all national laws for the suppression of obscene literature, was overwhelming. But the seeming success of this conspiracy is really its utter defeat; and of this the chagrined conspirators are themselves aware. Only the empty shell of the organization remains in the hands of the "repeal" party; its life and soul are with the new "National Liberal League of America." The old flag flies triumphant above the latter, and every liberal who refuses to be the willing or unwilling abettor of obscenity and free love will speedily rally to its support.

Next week we shall give an account of the proceedings in detail: this week, we can only congratulate the liberals on a splendid moral victory, wrested out of the very jaws of defeat.

GLIMPSES.

IT IS STATED that "the Pope delivered some opinions on Protestantism in the Eternal City, the other day, to a deputation from across the Tiber. He deeply deplored the permission given to heretical sects to invade the centre of Christianity and erect churches and schools. He trusted that Catholics would not imperil the salvation of their children by allowing them to come in contact with these heresies. There were not wanting schools in which children could receive instruction without outrage to their faith or detriment to their morals."

THE Tribune says: "Colonel T. W. Higginson, in lecturing recently in London on 'The Aristocracy of Wealth,' is said to have been very frank concerning the evils of hereditary rank. He declared that the attitude of hereditary rank toward intellect is degrading; he acknowledged the faults of rich men in this country, but said that he couldn't imagine one of them giving precedence in his home to any one of their number merely because of his riches over Tennyson and Longfellow." Colonel Higginson intends to make his future residence in Cambridge.

BISMARCK declared in a recent speech in the Reichstag that he has no faith in universal suffrage: "My conversations with Lassalle also turned upon universal suffrage; but I never in my whole life entertained so monstrous an idea as to decree its introduction. I accepted it with a certain reluctance, as a Frankfort tradition. In the rivalries of those times with the adversaries of the State that card had been played; and we found it lying upon the table as a legacy left to us. At that time my conviction of its efficacy was but small, and only in the direction of its utility during a political contest as a popular weapon."

WE FIND this statement in the daily press: "The autographs of eminent Americans do not seem to be very valuable property. At a recent sale in Boston, papers signed by Jefferson and Madison were bought for forty cents each, an autograph note on politics by Edward Everett went for thirty cents, and a letter of Franklin's writing for eighty-five cents. A letter addressed to Mr. Adams by Thomas Jefferson, in 1823, sold for $2.50. A long letter of Daniel Webster's was sold for eighty cents. One page of writing from Timothy Pickering, in 1782, was sold for fifty cents. A commission signed by John Hancock brought $1.50. A letter from Jonathan Belcher, a governor of Massachusetts, dated 1714, was knocked down at sixty cents."

THE Seymour (Ind.) Weekly Times, a very radical and freethinking journal, says: "We hold that personal liberty doesn't include personal license for a man to commit a public indecency and become a nuisance. In regard to social and moral subjects full license must be given for a man to put forth his views, always premising that his language shall be that of the refined circle, and not that of the brothel. We protest against indecent language, and hold that books couched in such should be excluded from the mails." But minor and incidental offences against decency cannot be dealt with by law; all publications should be judged by their main intent and object, and none should be excluded which, however coarse, are published with manifest good intentions. With this qualification, the Times expresses the ground taken by THE INDEX, and foreshadows the ground which will be taken by all sober and far-seeing radical minds.

HON. JOHN F. HOUSE, recently renominated for Congress from Tennessee, paid this tribute to the North in a public speech: "In the next contest between the two great parties, they will divide upon governmental policy, and without sectional animosity. Sectional hatred will be eliminated from the contest. So far as the South is concerned, I am certain that such will be the case. I cannot, fellow-citizens, find it in my heart to indulge in feelings of malice toward the people of the North. When I witness their magnanimous and generous conduct toward the Southern people, I feel like pulling off my hat, and standing uncovered in their presence. Oh, grander than the victory of Appomattox is the victory won by the people of the North in their noble and generous contributions to the stricken and suffering South! Upon that fated field, the South surrendered her' upon. Within the shadow of the dark wing of pestilence, beside the new-made graves of her heroic sons and daughters, with bowed head and tearful eyes, she extends her hands and surrenders her heart to the generous and magnanimous North. God's own hand has bridged the 'bloody chasm.' Let not the ambition of man seek to reopen the wounds and to rekindle the embers of sectional strife. Let us go into this great contest of 1880 without any of these elements of sectional bitterness. Of course we will be divided as to question of governmental policy, but with sectional bitterness eliminated from the contest, representatives of the South can stand upon the floor of Congress as the peer of any from the Northern States, and can look to the material development of his own section, to the enlargement of commercial relations, and make the Southern people more prosperous. With fraternity and harmony restored, this great country can march on to a more glorious and illustrious future than has been seen in the past."

Who are Christians?

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

If we can accept the testimony of history, there was once a time when the word "Christian" had one meaning, and when men and women, who believed certain things and performed certain duties, were called "Christians." That was when the disciples of Jesus had the religion instead of the theology of the New Testament. It was before Christianity was known. The early Christians, generally called primitive Christians, were ignorant of the dogmas of the Church, which to-day are regarded as the most essential part of the Christian religion. The word Christian once stood for something definite, for something intelligible, and was susceptible of no uncertain signification. Its meaning no one doubted, no one denied. All regarded the word as representing a certain faith, as standing for a particular belief. Though many rejected the faith which the word signified, though many did not accept the belief, no one contended for the name who did not accept its proper and legitimate meaning. In the first century there was no peculiar charm associated with the name Christian which the world was anxious to possess; no honor which it conferred that the world coveted. There was no money in it. It was a reproach then; it is now held to be a crown of glory. It is as popular to be a Christian as it was once to be a Roman. There is that in the word Christian which gives to a large part of the world its most coveted possession; namely, popular respectability. The word Christian signifies to many persons all that is religious, all that is good. It is a sort of password to pious circles; and all who are Christians are supposed to be fitted for the whole future. It pays to be a Christian, in a worldly sense; it covers a multitude of sins.

The question, "Who are Christians?" can best be answered by showing what it is that makes one a Christian. No one will presume to assert that living a good life, speaking good words, making the world better, makes one a Christian,—for this would make all good men, of whatever religion, Christian. It is not the possession of any virtue, or of all the virtues; it is not the highest life, the grandest or purest soul; it is not manhood or womanhood—that makes one a Christian. A Mohammedan may keep the ten commandments, and more: he may obey the Golden Rule, may be moral and righteous, kind and loving, but he would not be a Christian for being and doing so. A Jew may be above evil, free from vice, never wrong his neighbor; may practise temperance, charity, and brotherly love; may observe the laws, and “keep himself unspotted from the world,” and not be a Christian. A man may be manly, a woman may be womanly, and not be a Christian. It is not being true, kind, morally brave and great, that makes one a Christian. No good thing that man can do will make him a Christian. No resistance of temptation, no reformation of habit or manner, no turning from evil, no character, no conduct, makes one a Christian. Though the human soul be clothed with all the powers of manhood, though it possess every inward virtue, every outward grace, though it have every endowment of nature and every advantage of culture, it is not Christian. No man is born a Christian. It is not the work of God, not any natural possession, that makes one a Christian.

I think we have shown that man may be religious, may have all that is good in life, all that makes manhood beautiful; may be honest, truthful, and all that is “lovely and of good report,” and yet not be a Christian. The word Christian stands for no virtue. It represents a faith. It does not represent a life different from the life of the rest of the world, only a belief different from other beliefs. We have seen that a man may be a good man, and not be a Christian. Let us now see if he can have a good faith and not be a Christian. We find that among the Hindus there is a belief in one universal spirit,—that “God is the soul which standeth in the bodies of all beings”; that there is a belief in the goodness and mercy of God; in the divinity of man, who is immortal; and that only by doing good can man reach the highest destiny. The Hindu believes in the sacredness of human life, in temperance, chastity, honesty, and moral and religious worth, and yet he is not a Christian. The Mohammedan has faith in one God, in his kindness and mercy, in his justice and love; he believes in moral and religious duty, in being upright and pure, in humanity and forgiveness, but he is not a Christian. It is not belief in God that makes one a Christian, for every nation believes in God. It is not belief in divine revelation that makes one a Christian, for every people on the globe have such a faith. It is not belief in the immortality of the soul that makes one a Christian, for every religion of mankind has such a belief. It is not belief in a mediator that makes one a Christian, for nearly every people have this faith. It is not belief in inspired men or inspired books that makes one a Christian, for all religions have had such men and such books. It is not belief in any power of human nature, in any virtue of the human heart, in any work of the world that makes one a Christian. It is not belief in freedom, in right, truth, love, or progress that makes one a Christian. A man may believe all this, may have faith in God and man, in truth and right, and yet not be a Christian.

We have seen that man can have faith in all that is good, that he can be all that is good, and not be a Christian. Let us see now if he can teach what is good and true and not be a Christian. The morality taught by all the ancients is similar, and we find their commandments written in almost the same words. The five commandments of Buddhism are these:—

- “Not to destroy life.”
- “Not to obtain another's property by unjust means.”
- “Not to indulge the passions so as to invade the legal or natural rights of other men.”
- “Not to tell lies.”
- “Not to partake of anything intoxicating.”

Buddha also taught forgiveness, humility, and all the nobler and manlier virtues. It is related of him that “a foolish man once heard him in preaching defend the great principle of returning good for evil, and therefore came and abused him. Buddha was silent, pitying his mad folly. The man having finished his abuse, Buddha said: ‘Son, when a man forgets the rules of politeness in making a present to another, the custom is to say, ‘Keep your present.’ Son, you have rallied at me. I decline to entertain your abuse, and ask you to keep it, a source of misery to yourself. For, as sound belongs to the drum and shadow to the substance, so in the end misery will certainly overtake the evil-doer.’”

We find in China the same moral teaching that we find in India. A disciple asked Confucius: “Is there one word which may serve as a rule of practice for all one's life?” The master said “Is not reciprocity such a word? What you do not want done to yourself, do not do to others.” One of the disciples of Confucius said: “The doctrine of our master is to be true to the principles of our nature, and the benevolent exercise of them to others; this, and nothing more.” The ten commandments of the Israelites we find in substance as the law of conduct in Egypt; and in every nation, ancient or modern, we find morality and religion taught in similar words.

We find that there are moral and religious precepts taught by people who are not Christians; that a man may teach the highest truths and not be a Christian. The teaching of love, temperance, chastity, and duty depends upon no faith. All religions have taught the same virtues. We see that man may be good, that he may have a good faith, and teach goodness, and not be a Christian.

A Christian is a person who believes that Jesus was the Christ; that through his death, atonement was made for the sins of man; and that salvation from future punishment comes by this faith. A man may be religious and not be Christian; he may be Christian and not be religious. To accept faith in Jesus as the Christ makes one a Christian; but no one will presume to say that accepting this faith makes one religious. Christianity is a faith; religion is a life. There can be a religion without a Christianity; there cannot be a Christianity without this faith in Jesus as the Christ. The word Christian cannot be separated from Christ, cannot be applied to Mohammedan or Jew. The peculiar meaning of the word Christian depends upon the character of Christ. The idea of Christ, the belief in Christ, determines the meaning of Christian.

The God-Christ of some Christians, and the man-Christ of others, represent totally different ideas. The word Christian stands for many ideas of Christ, for many interpretations of the nature and office of Christ. The older Christian theology regards Jesus as God, and that he was Christ by virtue of his divinity; that he, as Deity only, could make atonement for the world's imperfection. It holds that he, being God, superhuman and supernatural, was conceived and born in a superhuman and supernatural way; that he performed miracles in accordance with his divine character; that he cheated death at the last, and ascended bodily into heaven, violating the natural and known law, but keeping the higher law of his own divinity. This idea of Christ, which is the common and general one, is supported by text and argument, and is known as the Orthodox idea, it being considered the only safe and sound theory of the nature and character of Christ. Christ is to do a superhuman work,—he is to restore nature; hence he must be a superhuman being, that is God. Christ is to reveal the will of God, and in order to do this he must be God,—for one being cannot reveal the will of another. We cannot conceive of one being living another's life; he must live and show his own life; and if God was revealed in Christ, Christ must have been God. The nature of Christ was not to be a larger human nature, a better union of the human faculties, a higher development of human power; it was to be a divine nature, above human nature. Christ was to be greater than humanity, higher than human height; he was to be the fulness of God, not of man. Christ, to do what he was to do, must be more than man. This theory of the nature of Christ is the only one which can accept and support the history, as a whole, that is written in the New Testament; and those who receive this theory regard themselves as the true Christians; that is, a person cannot be a Christian who does not believe that Jesus was God. No matter what strange contradictions of nature this theory involves, no matter how it shocks reason and common sense, we must believe it in order to be Christians. To believe in Jesus as the Christ, as the Savior of the world, is to believe in him as the God, as the Creator of the world. Then, not only was the man-Jesus born in Bethlehem and crucified, but God, “the soul which standeth in the bodies of all beings”—the spirit, not of one body, but of all the millions of worlds that exist in the vast idea which we call space,—was born and crucified on the earth; that is, the one great, all-filling Spirit of the universe, which dwells in uncounted worlds, in stars millions of miles away, and which are more than a million times as large as the earth, was born in a manger and put to death on a cross in a forgotten place on one of the smallest bodies in the heavens. Absurd as such an idea is, we must believe it in order to be Christians.

This theory of Christ has a corollary which must not be omitted in our review of the subject. The God-Christ who died for man must have a God-history, written for man, that man may read and know this strange and divine story. This God-history is called the Bible. The Bible is divided into two parts, the Old and New Testaments. In the former we have an account of the human race preparing itself for the coming of God; in the latter, the account of his advent and teachings. In the Old Testament, we learn that the human race, created perfect, descended until it was necessary for God to come upon the earth to save it; and in the New Testament we learn how he did it. This book, in order to be trustworthy and infallible, must be written by God, or by the inspiration of God; and so, we are told, God wrote his own life and teachings, and the Bible is a true history and a true guide for the whole human race. This Bible, as all know, is full of narratives of an impossible nature; it is false in its theories of creation, of the origin of life and man; its science is false; its philosophy is delusion; and much of its morality is not for moral men and women: and yet, to be Christians, we must believe the story of Christ. We must accept the Bible as the word of God—as written out of his own nature, a true transcript of the reality of things, a true account of divine existence, a true copy of the laws of the universe, and a faithful and certain guide of human conduct. We are not to believe what is true and good; not to accept the high thoughts and grand words which ring in this age with the ring of a noble manhood; not to believe what our reason approves; not to receive some of the Psalms as inspired by a pure heart and a good life,—but we must accept the whole Bible—every word, every thought, every Psalm as equally divine—in order to be a Christian.

After receiving the Bible as inspired, Jesus as God, we have also to accept a creed which contains the doctrines to be believed in order to be Christians. The word Christian has been employed to represent such different faiths that it is almost impossible to determine the meaning of the word. It seems adapted to all kinds of beliefs, and fits any faith that is willing to adopt it. Either it is a word of no meaning, or else it is claimed for certain religious ideas which are not entitled to it. The word Christian, as accepted and defended by Orthodox Christians, stands for the belief of the Orthodox Church, stands for the Orthodox dogmas. It does not simply represent the idea of Christ which the Church holds, but it stands for all of its doctrines,—for its belief in God, the Bible, man, and the hereafter. It is made to represent the whole faith of the Church. The term Christian is denied by the Orthodox Church to all those who do not accept its faith, who do not believe its dogmas. There are they who deny the dogmas of the Orthodox Church, deny the ideas of God, man, the Bible, and the hereafter, which are taught by Orthodoxy; they repudiate the methods of the Church, as well as its doctrines, and yet claim to be Christians. They call themselves “Liberal Christians.” Orthodox Christians say God is three persons in one being. Liberal Christians say God is one Spirit in all beings. The former say the Bible is all of the word of God; that it is all he has inspired, and all that he will inspire; that it is true in every part, and that no other writing is sacred. The latter say that the Bible is not the work of God; that it contains many sublime thoughts and noble words; that it is worthy to be read, but that we must read it as we read all other books. The former say that man was created pure and perfect, but that he fell from innocence, and that the whole human race is born in a state of depravity in consequence of his fall. The latter say that man was created with the power to win all virtues for himself; that the heart of man can be pure from his youth up, and that depravity is the fault of man and not the fate of nature. The former say that God has made a heaven for Christians, and a hell for everybody else; that the hereafter is divided into two parts—one for those who believe the doctrines of the Church, the other for those who reject them. The latter say that God's justice is the same hereafter as here; that the pure heart and upright life win heaven,—not any belief of dogmas. The former believe that Jesus was God. The latter believe that he was man. Liberal Christians accept the theory of the man-Christ. They do not believe that Jesus had a nature different from human nature, only a better human nature; he is Christ by his superiority as a man. He is the perfect man,—the Savior of the world by possession of this higher virtue. Liberal Christians accept Christ as teacher and leader; as one who knew the way to the better life, and showed the way. He is Christ by his example, by his perfect manhood. They do not judge Jesus by what the Christ was to be; they have faith in Jesus as he was, as he lived. They do not clothe him with any borrowed divinity; they revere him for his perfect humanity. He is not to them the only son of God, but the best son of man. Jesus is the Christ, according to this theory, only so long as he is regarded as the best man that ever lived. If another has lived better or shall live better, he is or will be the Christ. Liberal Christians are they who believe that Jesus is the best man that has ever lived.

These two theories of the nature of Jesus and character of Christ—so wide apart, so different in their postulates, so unlike in their conclusions—claim the same honor to the Christian name. The Orthodox Christians think Christianity a faith, believing the doctrines of the Christian Church. The Liberal Christians emphasize the life of man more than the faith of man, and make their church for all who are willing to try to live a good life after their model. No one can be a Christian who does not regard Jesus as the Christ. This is the minimum of faith required of the believer. Whatever else he may doubt, he must in some way look upon Jesus as the Savior of man, either by his divinity or by his humanity, either by his sacrifice or by his example. The most Orthodox theory demands this belief; the most Liberal will not accept less.

Let us see what it is to be a Christ. Among the Jews it was a custom to anoint their kings, and the anointed king was called a Messiah. Saul was a Messiah, David was a Messiah, and so were all the Hebrew kings who were anointed. In the Greek language, the word corresponding to the Hebrew word Messiah is Christos, of which Christ is the English; hence any king who was anointed was a Christ. This is the meaning, and the only meaning, which was given to the word Christ previous to the birth of Jesus. The Jews, who had been conquered and subdued by the Romans, who had lost their place among the nations of the earth—confident of the favor of Jehovah, their people's God, “the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob,”—looked for a man among their tribes who should, with the power of God, restore their lost supremacy. “A king of the Jews,” was the prophecy and prayer of the Israelites for three centuries before the birth of Jesus; and the Romans in derision hailed the Nazarene, when dying on the cross, with the oft-repeated cry of “King of the Jews.” This title, which was given Jesus by the men who put him to death, was accepted by his disciples, and the king, after their custom, was the Anointed, the Messiah, the Christ. This leader of the people, this champion of freedom, this brave teacher and great man, was the Christ of his people, not as their king who should with sword deliver his nation from the Roman yoke; not, as in former days, as the man who had been anointed, but as the King who taught how to live a truer life, how to be a better man; who demanded human rights, and even suffered death for his principles; as the King of men, who led a kingly life and died a kingly death.

From this reflection of history, we see how Jesus was called the Christ, how natural it was for his disciples to give him every honor; how they would love the name “Christ,” which was the highest title among the Jews; and that it was no marvel of greatness, no superhuman possession, that entitled him to the honor of being the King, the Christ of his people. The Hebrews often called their king their Messiah, their Christ, when he had defeated the armies of the enemies, and saved the nation from pillage and destruction,—Savior. “The Savior of the people,” “The Savior of his nation” are common expressions of gratitude among the ancient Israelites. The Christ is the Savior: Jesus the Christ becomes Jesus the Savior. This is no title which belongs to divine beings, but to human beings. Washington was called "The savior of his country."

We can imagine how the affection of the people for Jesus, after he had been taken away from them, would grow into a reverence which was almost worship, and how much higher and more beautiful would be the idealized Jesus, whom they had seen and known, than the idols of the Romans or the God of the Old Testament. Doubtless, Jesus was regarded by the more ignorant and superstitious of the people as a god; and his deification was the expression of the people's love or fear. The idea of Christ, which is associated with the name of Jesus to-day, is the property of mythology. His divinity is the divinity of all heathen deities.

The theology which grew around the life of Jesus, and which probably found its full expression as late as the second or third century, is the common theology of all nations. Jesus, as the Son of God, as the Word of God, as the Atonement for the world's sin, is not the Jesus who lived in Judea. This Jesus of Christian theology, who is the usurper of the place of Jesus of Nazareth, is the fiction of mythology.

In mythology, whatever is beautiful, whatever is powerful, whatever is good, is divine. Beauty, power, and goodness are gods, and all that helps mankind or saves man is a divine power; hence a savior must be a god. It is the amplification of this idea that has clothed Hercules, Jesus, and other ancients with deific robes. Without the pagan theology, which deified men, Jesus would have belonged to the world's humanity; and the great darkness which has covered the civilized world for so many centuries, and which is the shadow of the Christian Church, could never have been known.

The wrong which has been done in the name of Christ has robbed the word of any good meaning in this age, when used by the Church; and the lustre of Jesus has suffered by being made the Christ of Christianity. The narrow and unimportant meaning of the word Christian must be apparent to all who are familiar with the history of the word. It is only a catchword used by the theology of the age, and is void of the great and grand significance which is assigned it by Christendom.

Christian is a dead word, and its importance belonged to an earlier age. It is only a shadow of a noble virtue, of a brave word, which all are entitled to who live true to the voice of their souls. Christ to-day, in our modern religious thought, is a word which stands for all that helps mankind, for all virtues. Christ is the principle of salvation; not the savior of man, but the saving power of man. It is the name of that virtue which all souls possess,—not the virtue of one soul. Christ is in all men. It is the power of goodness. This idea of Christ is the only one that we can accept. They are not Christians who believe in this Christ, but men and women.

CHRIST'S SECOND COMING.

WHAT SUNDRY BISHOPS, PROFESSORS, AND PASTORS THINK ABOUT IT.

THE SAINTS TO BE CAUGHT UP INTO THE CLOUDS AND THE SINNERS TO BE LEFT BEHIND—WHAT THE GREAT TRIBULATION WILL BE LIKE—A PECULIAR DOCTRINE AND A REMARKABLE DIAGRAM.

A circular has been issued—signed by the Rev. Dr. James H. Brookes, of the Presbyterian Church, St. Louis; the Rev. Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., of this city; Bishop W. R. Nicholson, of the Reformed Episcopal Church, Philadelphia; W. Y. Morehead; the Rev. A. J. Gordon, of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston; Maurice Baldwin; the Rev. H. M. Parsons, of the Presbyterian Church, Buffalo; and the Rev. Dr. Rufus W. Clarke, of the Dutch Reformed Church, Albany,—inviting those who believe in the personal pre-millennial advent of Jesus Christ to meet at the Church of the Holy Trinity in this city, on the 30th and 31st of October and the 1st of November, to listen to a series of papers on the pre-millennial advent of Jesus Christ, and to join in such discussions as the topics may suggest. A large number of professors, ministers, and laymen have endorsed the call. Among them are the elder Tyng, Bishop Vail, of Kansas, Professor Kellogg, of Alleghany Presbyterian Seminary, the Rev. Dr. Imbrie, of Jersey City, George T. Pentecost, the Boston Evangelist, and other well-known men.

The call sets forth that "the precious doctrine of Christ's second personal appearing has lain under neglect and misapprehension"; that while there is cause to lament this, and to regard it as an alarming symptom of the present state of religion, it is an occasion for the profoundest gratitude that there has been within the last few years such a powerful and wide-spread revival of this ancient faith.

Desiring to know more of this ancient faith, a reporter of the Sun visited the Rev. Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., yesterday. The young clergyman was in his study, hard at work, but he cheerfully gave up an hour of his time to a conversation upon this subject. The doctrine is evidently a favorite one with the doctor.

"I haven't the slightest objection to talking on this subject," he said, "but I don't want to give you all the points I am going to make in my paper on 'Christ's Coming: Is It Personal and Visible?' which I am to read before the Convention. Neither do I wish to rush into print with my views. It is so easy to be misrepresented; so easy for a reporter to make a man say what he didn't say, especially on a subject like this. When I read my paper before the Conference I expect to stand by that. I shall get hauled over the coals, of course. Already this movement is being made a subject for jest and for paragraphing, and I come in for more than my share of the ridicule because I happen to be the man on the ground. It's curious, too, for I've preached this doctrine for many years, and my father preached it before me."

"What was the origin of this particular movement, this Conference?"

"Well, there is an association called the Believers' Conference for Bible Study, which meets every spring. Last year we met in Clifton Springs, and then it was suggested that a conference of all who hold the pre-millennial doctrine should be held. From that suggestion the plan grew. Each one told such of his friends as he thought might be interested. The result has been surprising. A vast number of people have identified themselves with the movement. I have received as many as fifty letters a day asking for reserved seats. It is going to be a great success. Such a conference was held in London in February last, and the result was gratifying."

"You want to know just what we believe in? Simply this: in the personal and pre-millennial coming of the Savior. We base our belief on more than three hundred passages in the New Testament. As for instance, Matthew xvi., 27: 'For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works.' And in the first chapter of Acts the angel says: 'Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.' And again, the Lord's answer to Pilate: 'Hereafter ye shall see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven.' Then take the attitude of the primitive Church on this doctrine, as expressed in the first chapter of I. Thessalonians, where Paul says: 'How ye turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God; and to wait for his Son from heaven.' And again where he writes: 'Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord.' And so I might go on inundating you with texts and passages of Scripture proving the doctrine that we hold."

"But do you mean to say that you believe the Lord will come visibly?"

"I hold just this: that the Lord will come in just such a manner as he disappeared. He may not come to the earth, but he will be visible to his people, wherever they may be, and he will gather his own out of the world, just as Enoch and Elijah and our Lord himself were gathered out of the world. At this coming the dead that have died in Christ will rise first, and then those of his children who are alive will be caught up into the clouds with them, and their bodies will undergo a change, and they will dwell in heavenly places for a season. It will be as if to-day you and I are talking, and suddenly I disappear. You don't know where I have gone. This disappearance of God's people will not affect society, except that there will be a great many missing persons. New York City will be governed by the same men; business will go on without interruption; the churches will go on as they are, with a good many people in the pews. I hope there won't be many preachers left in the pulpits. Then will begin that period of great tribulation prophesied in the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew. All the good will have been taken away. Only the bad will remain. You take all the salt out of the world and it will be in a bad way."

"Then," continued the doctor, evidently much interested in his theme, "God's people having been taken away to heavenly places, in those heavenly places will be fulfilled the promises addressed to God's people. There will be the judgment seat, which will be a judgment for services, not for sins. The judgment for sins was on the cross. And then will follow the marriage supper of the Lamb, when those who were united with Christ by faith on earth shall be recognized before the multitude of the heavenly host. Meantime, on earth, for how long a time I don't know, there will be the great tribulation. I don't know times. Some there are who fix dates and the like. I can't. Dr. Cummins, of London, deals with prophecies largely. I prefer to abide by the promises. The former relate to the development of God's purpose on earth; the latter to the manifestations to his people of his desires concerning them."

"Well," continued the doctor, "after the tribulation the Lord will come with his people to the earth. In Matthew, twenty-fourth chapter, beginning at the twenty-ninth verse, you will find the passage referring particularly to this coming. It is the coming of the Lord with his people to establish his kingdom on the earth. Then begins the millennium."

"I believe that the Scriptures are plain upon the point that the Lord is to come to Jerusalem personally. The temple and the city shall be rebuilt, and the ceremonial of the restored tribes reestablished for a memorial of grace. The Lord may not long remain personally on the earth, but he will govern, King of kings. I read the Scriptures literally. Now I have given you a brief outline of the doctrine held by the pre-millennialists."

"It ought to be said that in relation to details of the truth, there is a wide difference of opinion among expositors; but there is one point of agreement, and that is, the belief in the personal and pre-millennial coming of the Lord. It is not a new doctrine. It is old as the Church. And by Church I mean our Lord's people. A gentleman said to me, 'You'll be charged with heresy, won't you?' I told him that it was particularly a doctrine of the Episcopal Church. It is expressed in our Advent services, in the creed, in the Te Deum; it is the quæ centrat truth. This conference was called without reference to denominations, but care had to be taken not to overrun it with Episcopallans. A funny incident occurred. I wrote to Bishop Cox inviting him to the conference. He answered, giving his firm allegiance to the doctrine, but declining to take part, because the conference is not under the presidency of the bishop of the diocese."

"How do you differ from other Adventists?"

"There are evangelical and non-evangelical Adventists. The former believe as we do, except, perhaps, in details; the latter advocate the unconsciousness theory, annihilation, and other heresies. They do not believe in the soul's existence, the existence of a personal devil and a personal Holy Ghost, and are a low grade of materialists. Miller's idea was that Christ's coming was to introduce the great catastrophe spoken of by Peter, the destruction of the world by fire. Bible expositors now are divided into two great classes: the pre and post-millennialists, or those who expect Christ before the millennium, and those who postpone his appearance until the close of the millennium. The post-millennialist holds that Christ has spiritually come, and that in death he mystically comes to every believer, and that in the influence of Christianity he is always coming. He denies the literal interpretation of the promises, construed according to the laws of language, but spiritualizes the promises and prophecies. He looks for an extension of Christianity under the present dispensation, and by its instrumentalities, until the whole world shall be converted. By the development of the present Christianity, and its control through government and society, he expects the millennium; and at the close of this period, however prolonged, believes that the Lord will come to judge the earth. The pre-millennialist believes that the world is every day growing worse, and that the gospel is the instrument used to gather a people out of the world, not to convert the world. At the Lord's appearing, crime and discontent and evil will be worse than ever. He believes that things are going to the bad instead of getting better, and that, as in the past, so in the future, the Lord will come, by a new manifestation of himself, to introduce the promised millennium. The post-millennialist is an optimist; the pre-millennialist is a pessimist."

"The whole question," continued Dr. Tyng, "rests on the principle of interpretation of the Bible. If interpreted according to the laws of language, it means one thing; if taken in an esoteric sense, another. If interpreted in the latter sense, then Brigham Young and the Pope have just as much ground for their doctrines as Protestants. Said a little girl to her mother, 'Mamma, if God didn't mean what he says, why didn't he say what he meant?' That's the whole question. The post-millennialist, for instance, says that when in Matthew the coming of the Son of Man is spoken of, it means the coming of Titus and the Roman army. We think it means what it says. Again, take the correspondence between the prophecies and the literal life of our Lord. The post-millennialist will not deny that the prophecies were fulfilled in the life. The birth, crucifixion, burial, resurrection, and ascension were all prophesied, and the prophecies fulfilled. Is it not sense to believe that the prophecies concerning his second coming will be in like manner fulfilled?"

"This conference will not attempt to decide anything. It will be a meeting of expositors, students, and believers. A series of papers, written to cover the disk of the doctrine, will be read and discussed, in order to give the doctrine a new and complete statement. Then it is hoped, by their publication and circulation, to bring the matter before the people."—New York Sun, Oct. 15.

A NON-POLITICAL, BUT IMPORTANT ISSUE.

The great political parties of the country have not as yet made any issue concerning the right of the Government to prohibit the sending through the mails of obscene and indecent publications, but an issue has been joined on that point, and the battle is soon to be fought. The contest will be waged between the two wings of the National Liberal League at the second annual Congress of that body, which is to be held in Syracuse on Saturday and Sunday next. The radicals, or extremists, in the League demand the repeal of all laws which prohibit, or seek to restrain, the publication and circulation of obscene literature. They urge that the dangers to liberty are very great when the power to decide what is and what is not obscene is confided to individuals like Anthony Comstock, whose prejudices are very strong, and whose zeal is utterly disproportioned to his knowledge. They point to two or three cases where Comstock has prosecuted men for violations of the law which, in their judgment, are no more violations than would be the sending of the Scriptures by mail.

The Conservatives, under the lead of the President of the League, Mr. Francis E. Abbot, admit the danger to liberty, and do not deny that Comstock has grossly abused the powers conferred on him by the law. They do not deny, indeed, that the law is susceptible of grave abuses. They insist, however, that the remedy for these evils is to be found in the revision and amendment of the objectionable and obnoxious laws, and not in their repeal. Such repeal, they urge, would inflict upon the community an evil tenfold greater than any which the laws referred to bring to individuals.

In such a conflict as this, the sympathies of all thoughtful people must be with the conservative portion of the Liberal League. The liberty of the press is a sacred right, and so is the right to a free use of the United States mails. Neither of these rights is so sacred, however, as to sanctify its abuse to the destruction of another right equally sacred,—the right of the people to protect themselves from the filthy flood of corruption which has been poured out on the community in times past through the mails. It may not be easy at all times to distinguish between that which is obscene and that which is not. Fallible men in their private capacity, in the jury-box or on the bench, may find it very hard to draw the line, just as they often find it hard to draw the line between morality and immorality. Men may, with the best of intentions, and from the purest and most philanthropic motives, write and publish what other men, equally pure in motive, may consider immoral or obscene. These facts furnish, however, no sort of basis for the obliteration of all distinction between morality and immorality, obscenity and purity. There have been publications—are still, we are sorry to say—concerning the indecent and corrupting character of which no sane man, whatever his private character may be, has any doubt, and which every right-thinking man knows should be kept out of the hands of childhood and youth. Whatever of legal enactment may be necessary to accomplish this end, or to punish the wilful corrupters of the rising generation, will be cheerfully acquiesced in by the vast majority of the people; and no man who honestly has at heart the popular welfare, and especially the physical and mental purity of those who are coming to manhood and womanhood, will raise any objections, either in the name of liberty or otherwise, to such legislation.

That the present laws on this subject are grossly defective there can be no reasonable question; and there is quite as little that the power conferred by the laws has been outrageously over-stained and misused. They ought to be amended, and that speedily. There should not be on the statute book any legal excuse for oppressing any man because the doctrine he teaches or publishes is unpopular or distasteful to the professor of any creed or belief. Every possibility of such oppression should be as carefully guarded against as human foresight can do it. Where doubt exists, the accused should have fullest benefit of it; but the barrier against obscenity should not be thrown down. It would be a thousand pities if any honest friend of humanity should be deprived of his right to publish and circulate his opinions, because to some self-righteous fanatics in the detective service or on the bench these views seem immoral. But it would be a million pities to expose the youth of the country to a renewal of the outrageous license in the dissemination of undoubted immorality which held sway so long in this land of the free.—Detroit Post, October 20.

A BATTLE FOR DECENCY.

The Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League is to be held in Syracuse, N.Y., on the 28th and 29th of October. Mr. Francis E. Abbot, editor of THE INDEX, who willingly accepted the presidency of the League "because it was a place to work hard in and be shot at," is carrying on a vigorous canvass in advance against the element of lawlessness represented by D. M. Bennett of the Truth Seeker. The issue which arises, and which must be met at Syracuse, is thus stated in the "call":—

"Shall the National Liberal League abandon the stand it originally took on the 'obscene literature' question at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, or shall it continue to defend equally the cause of public morality, and the cause of free mails and a free press? Shall it now demand the total repeal of the existing laws on this subject, and thereby practically protect and foster the circulation of obscene literature? Or shall it continue to demand the radical reform of those laws, in such manner as shall protect freedom of thought to the uttermost without protecting obscenity in the least?"

Mr. Abbot and three other officers of the League have published a card, in which they offer themselves as candidates for reelection on the sole condition that the League shall demand a reform of the laws against obscenity, and not a repeal. This issue has been hurried forward by the prosecution and imprisonment of Ezra H. Heywood for publishing a pamphlet which the court pronounced obscene,—a case which involved at once the definition of obscenity and the rights of opinion.

As a champion of 'just liberty under just law,' Mr. Abbot is doing battle for civilization against a tendency which sweeps backward toward barbarism. But the attempt to use the Liberal League for the destruction of law rather than for its improvement, is the outcome of a philosophy so crazy and an impulse so gross that we believe it will have few open advocates.—Christian Register, October 19.

ROUSSEAU.

It has been maintained by a recent English writer, of signal ability, that the influence of Rousseau gave an important impulse to the American Revolution, and that his ideas and phrases are embodied in the great charter of American liberties. But there is a looseness in this assertion of which we do not find frequent examples in the writings of its author. The Declaration of Independence was not a political charter. Nor does it attempt to establish the foundations of civil government as a matter of precedent and authority. It was the simple expression of convictions that had been current among thinking men since the first settlement of the country. It did not pretend to announce any novelties in doctrine, to introduce any strange speculations into the flowing stream of American thought, but simply to embody the ideas which had been of household influence from the earliest history of the American colonies. The principles of the Revolution were distinctly formulated in the cabin of the "Mayflower," nearly a century previous to the birth of Rousseau. His writings had little circulation in this country at the colonial epoch. An acquaintance with French literature was a rare accomplishment. The studious men of the period investigated the principles of liberty in the works of Sidney and Milton and Locke, but never acknowledged the vehement declaimer of France as their master in political science. Traces of Rousseau may no doubt be detected in the writings of Thomas Paine. He made a strong impression on the ardent and susceptible mind of Jefferson; but the serene and grave wisdom of the youthful Washington was never dazzled by the brilliant lights of foreign eloquence. The salutary Puritan of Boston, Samuel Adams, would have shrunk from the "self-torturing sophist," as from a glittering but poisonous snake. Joseph Warren, Josiah Quincy, Jr., the early hero, if not the martyr of American freedom, John Adams, had been cradled in the principles of liberty before the name of Rousseau had ever been uttered on American soil. The liberty of which we boast is a plant of nobler lineage and more wholesome growth. It is not the inheritance of French exaggeration; it has not been nourished by the stimulus of heated rhetoric; but has matured with the life of the people, and gained health and vigor at every step of national progress.—George Ripley, in the Weekly Tribune.

SOJOURNER TRUTH.

SOME OF THE SABLE-FACED PHILOSOPHER'S EXPERIENCES IN HER EVENTFUL LIFE.

Sojourner, on being introduced to the audience, related how, when a slave on the Hudson River, many years previous to the war, she had changed hands from one master to another, her name being changed each time. She was first called Bell Hard-enburgh, then Neeley, then Schriver, then Dilemon, and finally Bell Van Waggoner. The Lord had "redeemed" her out of all those names. She had suffered almost everything since she was born,—if she ever was born,—for everything was here when she came. The first thing she ever remembered was a steamboat on the North River, and then she was as big as now. She said it was a dreadful thing that she had lived until forty years old and never knew that Jesus Christ was any different from Washington or Napoleon Bonaparte, for all three of 'em were considerably talked about then. "Now, ain't it sing'lar, chill'n," asked she of her hearers, "dat I was so poor dat I knew nothing 'bout Jesus so long?" She said she used to talk to the Lord, and say, "Now, God, if I was you, an' you was me, I'd give you a good master, so's you could be good. But I thought God seemed to pay no 'tention to me, an' I'd make a new bargain with him. I said now, God, I can't get free; oughtn't I to walk off?—for I did 'spise a runaway nigger, and thought that was something low like. An' it came to me 'fore daylight in de morn'n dat I ought to walk off 'fore sun-up." She went on to tell how she went to a distant friend with her child, and of how she told him that since her master had not kept his promise to give her freedom, she had started out and left him. She finally got a home with Isaac Van Waggoner, who bought of her old master her child, and gave it to her. He told her not to call him master, but Isaac. "Oh, mercy, how large I felt den, wid no master no more! God was no 'count no more, for you see well enough knows no God." She then went on to tell how, when she got ready to leave there and went out toward the wagon, she actually saw God, and she sang out to him "O, God! I didn't know you was so big. No, God, 'twasn't me; 'twas somebody else." "An' den," said she, "I wilted down like a cabbage leaf." She then told of her struggle, and how, without any previous Christian teaching, she had heard uttered in her heart the word "Jesus" and the sentence "Jesus loves you." The picture she drew of her joy on finding a Savior was a most vivid and interesting one. She had felt him come between her and God, just as sensibly as she ever felt an umbrella come between her and the sun. "But, you see," said she, "the devil was chas'n' of me all aroun', an' wherever I went it seemed as though the devil was there fust. An' when I went to a Methodist speakin' meetin' an' heard a woman tell the same 'periences, and how the same devil was after her too, an' a tempting of her, I was so glad he was after some one else dat I jumped up an' shouted, 'Why, dat's de same devil as is after me!' An' one brother tole me to just call on Jesus, an' de devil would leave me. An' I tole him I knowed dat all de time, but I didn't happen to think of it afore." . . .

This was a wonderful age, and its people had every invention to lessen and lighten labor. "Why," says she, "dey almos' has machines to put de vitals down your throat an' plug 'em down! But who gives God the glory? It's all 'we' an' 'us' an' 'ours' an' 'see what we have done.'" She was very glad to have a place to speak in and to have an audience to hear her, for she wanted to speak and spread the truth. Vanity and pride and all such things among her sister women were great stumbling-blocks which hindered them from being like the Marthas and the Marys who ministered to Jesus. She told of how she was scrubbing and cleaning houses in New York city, to earn money, and how it came to her that she was earning all this money and taking it from others who needed it worse than she did. "And," said she, "You're worse than a thief an' a robber was whispered in my heart. But I say to myself, 'My Lord, I never stole nuffin in my life.' But it come to me dat I mus' leave dat city, an' I asked de Lord whar he would have me to go, an' he said, 'Go East.' An' den I knew dat I was goin' to have a new name, an' I started on de ferry-boat for Long Island. When I stepped off'm dat boat I heard whispered plainly in my ear the new name. It was 'Journar.' De fust place I stoppeded the woman asked me what my name was, an' I tole her 'twas Journar. Why, chill'n, when she heard dat she seemed to think I was foolish; and when I tole her my old name was Bell, but de Lord had given me de new name, she thought more'n ever 't I was foolish. She did pick dat name to pieces so, dat it begun to look kinder small an' no 'count to me. So when I went out to go on East, I prayed an' said, 'Lord, do give me a name with a handle to it!' Then it came out, clear an' plain, 'Sojourner Truth.' An' that's how I got my name. Hain't been 'shamed o' dat name at all, for it come from de Lord, an' he knowed de name bes' fittet to me."—Detroit Post.

PAPAL SUPREMACY.

Hon. Richard W. Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, in his great work entitled "The Papacy and the Civil Power," published by the Harpers, speaking of the claim set up by the Pope to universal supremacy over civil rulers, makes this logical statement:—

"Nothing is plainer than that if these principles should prevail here, our institutions would necessarily fall. The two cannot exist together. They are in open and direct antagonism with the fundamental theory of our Government, and of all popular government everywhere. The Constitution of the United States repudiates the idea of an established religion: yet the Pope tells us that this is in violation of God's law, and that, by that law, the Roman Catholic religion should be made exclusive, and the Roman Catholic Church, acting alone through him, should have sovereign authority 'not only over individuals, but nations, peoples, and sovereigns,' so that the whole world may be brought under its dominion, and be made to obey all the laws that he and his hierarchy shall choose to promulgate; and that this same church shall have power also to inflict whatever penalties he shall prescribe upon all those who dare to violate any of these laws! The Constitution secures the right to every man of worshipping God according to the convictions of his own conscience: yet the Pope calls this insanity, and declares it to be 'most pernicious to the Catholic Church.' The Constitution guarantees liberty of speech and of the press; yet the Pope says that is 'the liberty of perdition,' and should not be tolerated. The Constitution provides for its own perpetuity, by making its principles 'the supreme law of the land'; yet the Pope says that if he shall find, as he has already done, any of its provisions against the law of God, as he interprets it, they do not acquire the 'force of right' from the fact of its existence, as the fundamental law of the nation. The Constitution requires that all the people and all the churches shall obey the laws of the United States; yet the Pope anathematizes this provision, because it requires the Roman Catholic Church to pay the same measure of obedience to law that is paid by the Protestant churches, and claims that the Government shall obey him in all religious affairs, and in all 'secular affairs' which pertain to religion and the church, so that his will, in all these matters, shall become the law of the land. The Constitution subordinates all churches to the civil power, except in matters of faith and discipline; yet the Pope declares this to be heresy, because God has commanded that the Government of the United States, and all other governments, shall be subordinate to the Roman Catholic Church! The Constitution is based upon the principle that the people of the United States are the primary source of all civil power; yet the Pope insists that this is heretical and unjust, because God has ordained that all governments shall 'rest upon the foundation of the Catholic faith,' with himself alone as the source and interpreter of law. The Constitution repudiates all 'royal power'; yet the Pope condemns this, and proclaims that the world must be governed by 'royal power,' in order that it may protect the Roman Catholic Church to the exclusion of all other churches! The Constitution allows the free circulation of the Bible, and the right of private judgment in interpreting it; yet the Pope denounces this, and says that the Roman Catholic Church is the only 'living authority' which has the right to interpret it, and that its interpretation should be the only one allowed, and should be protected by law, while all others should be condemned and disallowed. In all these respects, and upon each of these important and fundamental ideas of government, there is an irreconcilable difference between the Constitution of the United States and the papal principles announced by this encyclical letter. The two classes of principles cannot both exist, anywhere, at the same time. Where one is, there it is impossible for the other to be."—American Protestant.

The Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 31, 1878.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

N. B.—The following resolution was adopted by the National Liberal League, at Philadelphia, July 3, 1876: "Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management."

THE NEW YORK Nation says: "The new régime at Rome does not seem likely to help the clericals in either France or Germany. Pope Leo XIII. was at first supposed to be a moderate, and likely to abate the extravagant pretensions of his predecessor, and come to terms with the Italian Government and modern society. He has already, in his Encyclical Inscrutable, called for the restoration of the temporal power; and he has now gone further, and has given, in a letter to the Cardinal Vicar in June last, as a reason for his not leaving the Vatican, the existence in Rome of Protestant temples and schools, and the godless schools of the municipality, in the midst of which he could not, he says, 'attend, respected and tranquil, to the duties of his Pontifical ministry.' In explanation and enforcement of this view, the Cardinal Vicar has issued instructions to the parish priests of Rome, in which, after calling their attention to the schools for boys and girls, and churches or 'temples,' set up by the Protestants in Rome, he excommunicates the architects, contractors, foremen, and artists concerned in their erection; the persons who attend worship or furnish music in them, the printers and compositors who make Protestant books, or posters announcing Protestant meetings; nobody, in fact, who has anything to do with bringing such temples and schools into existence, or carrying them on, is exempted from the curse, except the bricklayers and hodcarriers. These 'additional rules,' it is announced, have received the Pope's express sanction, after having been submitted to the College of Cardinals. Last month, too, in an address to a deputation, the Pope indicated what he would do with these pest-houses if he had his way, and what he expects the Italian Government to do for him. 'It is greatly to be deplored,' said he, 'that in this our Rome, the centre of Catholicism, august seat of the Vicar of Jesus Christ, it is permitted heterodox sects to erect temples, open schools, and diffuse corrupting publications among the people, while to us it is not given to oppose, as we would do, an efficacious remedy against inundating implety.' As he had already used all his spiritual weapons against it, this efficacious remedy must mean the arm of flesh. It is easy to see what valuable ammunition talk of this kind furnishes to the Radicals. They have, at least, got the arm of flesh for which His Holiness sighs on their side, and they mean to make him feel it. But how is it that Christ and the Apostles were able to carry on their work in the presence of wicked schools, temples, sinful architects, contractors, and bill-posters, without the aid of the army and navy? Another curious exhibition of the intractableness of the clerical temper has been shown in Marseilles, where the new bishop, availing himself of an old and obsolete law of the Consulate, insisted, in defiance of the entreaties of the authorities, on having the streets lined with troops when he came to take possession of his diocese, a guard of honor of thirty soldiers at his heels, and a salute of artillery."

THE THEORY OF THE ROCHESTER PLATFORM.

The following brief analysis is partly due to a thoughtful lady friend, the chairman of the Tompkins County Liberal League's Committee on Public Work.

The "planks" of the Rochester "platform" are three: State Secularity, National Protection for National Citizens in their Equal Rights, and Compulsory Elementary Education as the Basis of Universal Suffrage. The possibility of future "addition of . . . planks on other issues" is also recognized; and so the Liberal League may, in time, grow into that long-wished-for movement which, by dealing justly and wisely with all great public questions as they arise, shall redeem American politics from its present degradation.

But such a movement must be based upon a clear theory of government. What theory, then, underlies the Rochester platform?

First, there is our demand for complete State secularity; and however its details may be criticized by those who forget the catholic spirit in which the Rochester convention construed them, its principle forms the very basis of our organization, and is the one thing to which our membership in the league commits us. It is, that the State should be strictly impartial as to religious views, neither preferring, patronizing, nor discouraging any religious or anti-religious practices as such. Now evidently this demand is not based upon the "laissez-faire" doctrine that "the best government is that which governs least," but simply upon its own intrinsic justice. For, in the second plank, we propose to increase the power of the government, and even of the central government, by affording, through the United States Constitution and courts, protection to personal rights whether civil, political, or religious.

By the third plank, we propose to extend this governmental protection to another class of personal rights; and in two ways our project is instructive.

First, we would have the government recognize and protect every child's right to education. Through untold effort and suffering, the world has arrived at certain results of experience, certain intellectual and moral truths, certain ways of developing healthy character, whose substantial soundness and value can no longer be doubted; and we insist that the benefit of these results be extended to every child, so that if in after life he fail to reach the full stature of noble and useful manhood, the fault shall be his own. And this does not conflict with our protest against any provision by the State for religious instruction; both because no religion is as yet so indubitable as to command the assent of all sound and well-trained minds, and also because any instruction based upon the authority of sacred books must almost necessarily forget that the best results which the world has reached are not dogmas, but rational methods of self-guidance.

Secondly, we would have the child's right to a suitable education secured, not merely against the indifference of communities and of parents, but against the immature impulses of the child himself. We would have the United States Constitution "require every State . . . to PERMIT no child to grow up without a good elementary education." In other words, we recognize that the child is the ward of the nation; and that he may rightly be even constrained, for his own future good, as the mature man may not.

Perhaps our demands as to education can also be based upon State necessity. If the public safety really requires it, the nation may rightly compel the child to attend school, as it may compel the man to bear arms. The plea of "State necessity" should be received with extreme caution when it seems to conflict with natural rights; but in this case, as with the emancipation of 1863, there is no conflict.

And finally, we demand "universal suffrage"; that is, for every man and woman, excepting such as have proved themselves unworthy or incompetent. We would not enfranchise criminals under sentence, nor idiots and maniacs under guardianship. Neither would I extend the suffrage to unnaturalized foreigners; nor to any who have once used votes or public trusts corruptly; nor to drones or imbeciles who, having had a fair opportunity, have not qualified themselves intellectually to deal with the problems of our complex modern life. Perhaps I would even limit the power of non-tax-payers over city expenditures; while, per contra, I would tax large estates at a higher ratio than small ones. All this seems to me theoretically sound, though it is not the Rochester doctrine.

We may well be proud of our platform, for it would base government upon justice and individual rights. Among these rights, let us not forget the right of every adult who respects his neighbor's rights to complete personal independence, the rights of conscience, and the right to the freest utterance of all social, political, and religious opinions. Nor let us forget the right of the man who, as yet, is latent in the boy, that the boy be so trained, and so kept from moral harm, that the man shall not blame his guardian, the State, for his half-irresponsible childhood having been exposed to blighting influences whose effects he will never wholly outlive. Neither let us ignore the right of future generations to be well born, and to receive from us, undiminished, all of good which we have received from our fathers. Let us remember that the right to the fruit of one's own labor and enterprise has its complement, the right of every one to his fair share of the world's common heritage of comfort and opportunity, and that both should be fully secured. Again, let us insist upon the right to have good government, and not to be at the mercy of ignorant or unscrupulous majorities; while we also claim for all who will intelligently prepare themselves, the right to aid in shaping the course of the government. To some of these topics I hope to return in future articles, in connection with questions of property, communism; population, etc. Their theory seems to me, in the main, accordant with the Rochester doctrine, though not deducible from it. But let us close by seeing how that doctrine does apply to another question that is now in controversy.

Many earnest and pure-minded liberals find it hard to reconcile the legal protection of their children against vile literature with the freedom of the press. They pertinently ask, "If spoken and printed discussion about religion, etc., ought to be free, why not likewise about sexual ethics and physiology? Without such free discussion, must not society continue to suffer even graver evils than a licentious free press could inflict? With vile publications, as with drinking-shops, gambling-hells, and the like, must we not do merely this: explain to the boy or girl the harm they will do; rob them and their subject-matter, as far as may be, of the charm of mystery; preoccupy the young mind with healthier and nobler instincts; and cultivate such relations of parental and filial confidence that the child will not go far astray without telling the parent all?"

Yes, this is better than to suppress free discussion; and, if done aright, it will educate the young to a pure and robust morality. Most of us liberals can, if we will take the trouble, exert this kind of influence, for it accords well enough with our general ideas about education. But the vast majority of young people have not parents who are liberal and sympathetic as well as pure-minded, and so the poison of vile reading would come to them without the antidote. Many of the most conscientious parents are unfitted to help their children in this respect, because they base their own ethics largely upon authority, and fear to inquire too curiously into the reasons of things. Hence, if there were no other way to reconcile the interests of purity and of intellectual freedom, we could not greatly blame those who, for their children's sake, keep aloof from us.

But the Rochester theory meets the whole difficulty, by emphasizing the old distinction between the legal rights of minors and of adults. It is a distinction already often made; for instance, in the laws of New York and other States, which make it criminal to sell liquor to a minor. Such laws can be enforced when public sentiment appreciates them; and their principle, I think, is sound. Like all laws, they should be drawn with care, so as to make serious abuse impossible, and to interfere as little as may be with the convenience and independence of good citizens; but this minimum of inconvenience should be cheerfully borne.

Hence, if the "Comstock law" of 1873 be constitutional, we ought on principle to preserve and enforce it as regards the sending of improper matter to minors; and if not constitutional, it should be replaced by laws that are. But every such law should be guarded by provisos exempting from its penalties any mere advocacy of opinions, and making impossible the outrage which was recently committed in England when prisoners were convicted for circulating a book which the jury were not allowed to examine. Other provisos may suggest themselves, to the end that laws of this kind, so necessary in themselves, may not in the least endanger the freedom of public discussion nor our civil liberties.

THE RIGHT OF DISCUSSION.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Mr. Whyte, in the THE INDEX of October 17, lays down the broad principle that "society has the right to protect itself against any doctrine which is subversive of its own structure." I lay down the still broader one that every individual in the land has the right to combat every doctrine which does not recommend itself to his reason; but I add that he must combat doctrine with doctrine, argument with argument. If a man whose opinion I question replies by knocking me down, he will certainly create the impression that he could not conveniently reply by argument; and if I choose to carry the case before the police-court, the knock-down will be informed that his peculiar mode of dealing with adverse opinions is not permissible in a free country. Mr. Whyte would have the community reply by a knock-down argument to any reasonings hostile to the marriage-laws of our time; but I hold that society can only rightfully do what its individual members (whose delegated powers it exercises) might rightfully do; and if it is universally recognized that individuals can only rightfully reply to argument by argument, then I do not see how, in their collective capacity, they can rightfully reply to argument by prison or the stake.

The "alliance of freethought with indecency" would, indeed, be a most unfortunate thing, but not one whit more unfortunate than the alliance recommended to us by Mr. Whyte of freethought with tyranny. We are told that no one is allowed the free expression of his opinion if it injures the character of his neighbor,—a statement which, under important limitations, may pass as correct. By character Mr. Whyte here means "reputation," and the reason for the interference of the law in this case is, that a man's reputation is held to have a commercial value. An action for libel generally takes the form of an action for damages. But supposing a man's character, in the true sense of the word, his moral make-up, so to speak, has been injured by something he has heard or read, is any legal recourse open to him? Can he go into court and say, I am not as honest, or as charitable, or as humane, or as pure-minded as I was before reading this book, or hearing that lecture, or conversing with Mr. So-and-so, and I therefore wish to be avenged of my enemy"? Such a man would be laughed out of court, and told to go and mend his own honesty, or whatever else it was that was broken. Yet Mr. Whyte would have "society" prosecute on behalf of people who, if they sought to prosecute in their own behalf, would be objects of universal ridicule.

Mr. Whyte says that "no one is allowed to preach down the government of the country in which he lives." I reply that in a free State any one is allowed to advance what theories of government he likes, and with as close an application as he likes to the circumstances of his own country. Thus Mr. Frederic Harrison discusses Monarchy in the pages of the Fortnightly Review with as much freedom as he could do in the United States. In a tyrannical State, from which possibly Mr. Whyte wishes us to draw our lessons, this of course would not be permitted. But possibly in such a State Mr. Whyte himself might be placed under restrictions which would give him much food for thought.

If "Nature" is such a good regulator of the population question, why should she need such a backing up of penal statutes on the marriage-question? Has lust so much to do with the latter, and so little with the former? If our marriage-laws do not work well, says Mr. Whyte, it is the imperfect characters of men and women we must blame, not the laws. How does this agree with the testimony borne by a writer in the Fortnightly Review, a few years ago, that, in the manufacturing districts of England, numbers of women preferred to live with men, unmarried, because they thus, in general, secured better treatment?

Mr. Whyte is surprised that Mr. Wright and others, while "abhorring" Mr. Heywood's doctrines, should interest themselves in what they regard as his unjust sentence. According to this elevating doctrine, then, if a man is your enemy upon one point, you need not mind what befalls him,—not even if the powers which you have delegated to the State are abused for the suppression of his opinions. Therefore, if Mr. Whyte were imprisoned for his theological opinions, it would be very absurd for any Christian who "abhorred" his opinions to cry out, "That is not a righteous way of dealing with error."

Lastly, we are to consider women as children. I leave that proposition to others to discuss. There is much to be said on it.

In conclusion I would only say that, sympathizing as deeply as I do with the zeal which I know Mr. Whyte to possess for purity of life and thought, I very much regret his want of faith in the inherent vigor of right principles. I do not know what could more strengthen the hearts of his enemies than just such a display of nervous trepidation as his letter affords. "Let us shield our women from such doctrines," he virtually says, or society is undone. Fie on such faint-heartedness! Not thus can liberty flourish. Talk of "reversions"! But if what he proposes to us is not a reversion, what on earth could be? Very faithfully yours, WM. D. LE SUEUR.

OTTAWA, Oct. 19, 1878.

"WHAT FOOLS THESE MORTALS BE!"

Emerson remarks in one of his inspired essays, regarding the actual capacity of the large majority of mankind, as follows: "The fossil strata show us that Nature began with rudimental forms, and rose to the more complex, as fast as the earth was fit for their dwelling-place; and that the lower perish as the higher appear. Very few of our race can be said to be yet finished men. We still carry sticking to us some remains of the preceding inferior quadruped organization. Half engaged in the soil, pawing to get free, we call these millions men; but they are not yet men." And Plato has shown us, in his immortal Republic, how absurd it would appear, outside the realm of politics, to place the shepherd in command of the war-vessel, to apply to the physician to mend the kitchen table, or to expect the village blacksmith to expound the abstruse sciences. Nevertheless, the citizens of the United States are perpetually guilty of the consummate folly of expecting to get more power out of the machine than they put into it; continually insisting that a new cog here, or a different application of force there, will produce results out of all proportion to the means that are, of necessity, to be employed.

Thus all our rampant "reformers," who would correct the various ills of the body politic by mere legislative enactments—the Neal Dows and Dr. Miners, who expect to eradicate the taste for alcoholic stimulants by making the selling of liquor a crime; the Republican party, which, having coerced the bodies of Southern secessionists, vainly attempts to extirpate the "States-rights" theory by amendments to the Constitution; the Democrats, who would force the full-grown man to retain always the garments of his boyhood, by insisting upon obsolete constitutional forms now outgrown forever; the greenbackers, who argue themselves into the irrational belief that any edict of any government can ever reverse the immutable laws of supply and demand,—each and every one of our various political organizations give evidence of the general incapacity of the average American to comprehend the most obvious laws of his social and political environment, and betray how slight is his real claim to the right of "governing" his neighbors.

And yet it is deemed little less than treason soberly to discuss the restriction of popular suffrage as a possible cure for some of the evils at present afflicting the United States of America. It has been assumed for so long a period that every intelligent human being is entitled to equal opportunities for manifesting his tastes or prejudices, without reference to his special qualifications, that it has become difficult and wellnigh impossible to obtain a hearing for the other side of the case. But the signs of the times serve to show that (Democracy having been reduced to very nearly its lowest terms, and requiring only that women and children, Chinese and native American Indians, be admitted to the free exercise of the suffrage) a hopeful reaction is at hand, and that leading minds are turning their attention to the only possible ultimate solution of the question.

Because all decent men are entitled to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," protection to their property, and the opportunity of educating their children at the public expense, it does not follow that knaves and fools should secure equal opportunity for perpetuating their vices, crimes, follies, ignorance, and "quadrupedal instincts"! But, says some one in favor of universal license, under the specious caption of "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," who shall decide what constitutes decency? The answer is not far to seek; for all mankind being wiser than the wisest individual, have an inalienable right to institute certain laws requiring universal conformity, or emigration: as, for instance, that men shall wear clothing, so long as they desire to live in New York City, and, if they have an irrepressible desire to go nude, must either be restrained of their liberty or secure a passage for Central Africa. In like manner the instinct of self-preservation forces all civilized communities to enact laws against the circulation of obscene literature; nor will men stop to scrutinize too closely the—possibly—well-intended motives of the man who helps to disseminate such publications. What parent would hesitate in taking the law into his own hands, when confronted with the actual evidence that this same much-abused Anthony Comstock is able to produce, in scores of cases, where the susceptible minds of girls and boys have been tampered with for the basest of purposes? Because a certain individual honestly believes that the sure way to elevate the morals of the youth of the country is to leave them free to peruse any class of literature, whatever its character, it does not follow that his intention justifies the experiment! Universal suffrage has produced only its natural and legitimate results in making commonplace mediocrity the successful standard. Never since Christ was crucified and Aristides ostracized, has great preëminence in well-doing, and exceptional purity of character, failed to excite the envy, malice, and hatred of a large proportion of contemporary mankind. One of the most thoughtful and experienced of the present generation of American statesmen, Horatio Seymour of New York, gives it as his deliberate opinion that the longer he lives the higher he inclines to estimate the vague, general intentions of the majority of American voters, and the lower their capacity for realizing their aspirations. Their hearts are all right, he thinks, but their minds are sadly unequal to the tasks that are devolved upon them. This is but another proof of the old adage, "Hell is paved with good intentions"! And unprejudiced observers of the course of events in America, ever since the adoption of the principle of indiscriminate and all but universal suffrage, must confess that if the true theory of government is to provide peaceful prosperity to all good citizens at the smallest possible expense, the United States are still far from the end desired. "The greatest good of the greatest number" requires a preconceived idea as to what constitutes "good," and also implies that "the greatest number" shall be worthy of that good. If it could once be proven that the vast majority of mankind—left to follow only the devices of their own hearts—would straightway transform themselves into human wolves, tigers, hyenas, and seek to prey upon the innocent cattle and sheep forming the minority, it would be easy to demonstrate, first, that after the latter had been nearly or quite exterminated, the former would destroy one another; and next, that the law of the "survival of the fittest," in such circumstances, might mean morally the survival of the unfittest! But the majority of mankind is largely in favor of "law and order," because repeated experiments have taught them that "live and let live" is better for the individual as well as for the community; in other words, an enlightened utilitarianism is at the foundation of the accepted ideas of conventional morality. What is most needed at the present day is some modern Kung-fu-Tze, whose authoritative announcement that "every cobbler should stick to his last," might be heeded.

ALBERT WARREN KELSEY.

THE HONORS OF THE ECLIPSE.—W. Fraser Rae, one of the British observers of the recent solar eclipse, awards the principal honors to Prof. Watson for his discovery of the heretofore hypothetical planet Vulcan, between the sun and Mercury. Mr. Rae observes that it is a striking illustration of the irony of events that the University of Michigan—which we may add is scarcely known out of the State except by Prof. Watson's connection with it—should have decided to cut down the astronomer's salary some hundreds of dollars next October. He might have had a place under the khédive and made his fortune; but he preferred his native land, and came back to discover asteroids and this shy planet of Leverrier's predicting, which all the astronomers in the world have been looking after for twenty years,—all for the glory of an institution which keeps him as cheap as possible. Mr. Rae also singles out for admiration Mr. Edison and his micro-tasimeter. He watched the inventor's experiments with it in respect to the stars, and then in determining the temperature of the sun's corona during the eclipse, and pronounces it "a heat-measurer of unprecedented range and delicacy." He adds that Mr. Edison intends to design a telescope in connection with this apparatus, whereby the heavens may be swept and stars detected that are too remote to reveal themselves to the telescope alone, by watching the manner in which the tasimeter is affected. Mr. Rae considers that this may possibly be the provision of a new era in astronomy. In regard to the general observations and deductions, Rae tells the Tribune (to which paper all this is addressed) that the astronomers are as yet in complete disagreement all around,—Lockyer with Draper, President Morton with Prof. Hastings, etc. The eclipse as a spectacle was the finest from Pike's Peak, where the observer was impressed by the extraordinary and awe-inspiring prospect of the moon's vast shadow sweeping over the region below him.—Springfield Republican.

THE SCIENCE OF UNIVERSOLOGY.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

NO. XXX.

Let us now expound, or, in strict propriety, really translate this brilliant semi-poetic Oriental allegory, into the soberest of modern prose, in accordance with the principles of interpretation previously indicated; bearing in mind that "the woman clothed with the sun" is presumably the same as "the lamb's wife," which last is elsewhere (Rev. xxi., 9, 10,) as specifically identified with the New Jerusalem as is "the harlot" with Babylon; and that the New Jerusalem is the undoubted and well-recognized symbol of Christianity, in its prospective triumph and ultimate glory, in the world. The reader is again referred to the twelfth, thirteenth, and seventeenth chapters of the Revelation.

Translation.

There is a wonderful conflict now instituted and actually going on in the world, between the new doctrine, that of the Christian Church, and the old superstitions. In the foreground of the scope of vision of the observer ("a great wonder, in heaven")—[lifted, as it were, in the sky], is the Church ("a woman"), warmly affectional, loving, devout, and gloriously feminine ("clothed with the sun")—[the heat of which denotes the warmth of sentiment and affection]; with, however, a subordinate degree, also, of rational philosophy ["the moon under her feet"]—the moon symbolizing reflection, and its subordinate place denoting the secondary rank assigned to the intellect in the scheme of religion; the woman with her predominant affectionality and the warm rays of the sun holding precedence; that is to say, the communion of affection being the staple of Christianity, and the doctrine developed in its dogma secondary. The Church has also a grand array of special sources of enlightenment ("and upon her head a crown of twelve stars"). And, notwithstanding the fact that Christianity is as yet a sentiment rather than a philosophy; notwithstanding she is as yet only in a subordinate sense intellectual, she is nevertheless pregnant with, and gestating, and near to the production of the final and absolute philosophy. ("And she, being with child, and travelling in birth, and pained to be delivered.")

The opposing object of consideration, lifted also into the same scope of critical observation, and appearing prominently before the world, is the ancient and traditional kabbalistic system of doctrine, which has prevailed and still prevails among mankind, with its ten fundamental doctrines, its three general and its seven specialized principles,—its characteristic heads and points of doctrine ("the dragon")—[with his "heads and horns"].

This old traditional system of belief is the most formidable enemy both of the Church as such ("the woman") and of the new scientific philosophy which the Church is about to produce, and which is destined to rule the world. It is especially antagonistic to the new philosophy, which is to be produced through the Church [the son to be born of the woman]. "And the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered," standing ready "to devour her child as soon as it was born"—[a philosophy foretold and foreshadowed, if not foreseen, as the true science-and-philosophy of the future; and so of this latter day]—with its critical and vigorous principles and methods: ("the rod of iron") with which the son of the woman, the resultant philosophy of the Church, is to rule the whole earth. [Such is to be the masculine or intellectual progeny of the Church; though she is herself ruled by affection and sentiment.] This new philosophy, to be born of the Church, will certainly escape the hostility of the old traditional system ("the dragon"), and will rise into the supreme place, and will be triumphant over all. ("And she brought forth a man-child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron; and her child was caught up unto God, and to his throne.")

[John was probably a Jew by birth; a Roman by citizenship; a Greek-and-Jewish Kabbalist; an adept of "the secret wisdom" by education and training; and a Christian by conversion. Like all converts, he employs the learning of the old system against the old system. He is fighting Kabbalism, by the use of the occult and mystical style and methods of the Kabbala; and he was, we cannot doubt, far better understood by the adepts and initiates of that day than he has been since. Observe also, again, that the Kabbala which in its day had treated all popular belief as mere tradition, and scorned it as such, is now, in its turn, treated as tradition, and as the worst enemy of the new doctrine.]

There is [the writer continues], undoubtedly, an open warfare between these two systems, the modern doctrine of truth and progress ("Michael and his angels"—the advocates of truth), and the old traditional doctrine the dragon and his angels—the advocates of error. ("And there was war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels.") But the old tradition so far from conquering ("and prevailed not") is destined to fade out, and to be known no more in the world. ("Neither was their place found any more in heaven"; i.e., within the scope of the mental vision of mankind.)

Virtually (the author proceeds), learned tradition ("the great dragon, the old serpent called the devil and Satan"), the popular (philosophic) error of the past (which deceiveth the whole world), with its followers ("his angels"), is already conquered in its worst form, as merely traditional; and is landed upon a somewhat more rational basis ("cast out upon the earth"). [Hence the water-serpent or sea-serpent and dragon or saurian reappear subsequently—ch. xiii.—

as a land beast, with the same characteristics, the seven heads and ten horns, and no longer as a serpent of the sea or a dragon. The dragon, an intermediate reptile of the waters' slimy edge—the crocodile,—is the transitional stage between the other two. The serpent, the dragon, and the beast are three stages of the development and governing influence of the old doctrine; first as pure tradition and mystery, with no philosophic ground, properly speaking, to stand upon; the serpent—then as tradition modified by philosophy,—the reading of myths into story, the dragon or saurian; and finally as a full-fledged or grounded philosophy, the beast that came up "out of the sea." "The sea," the slime, and "the earth" repeat the symbolism, or represent, in another form, the same three stages.] ("And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent called the devil and Satan [the adversary of the truth], which deceiveth the whole world; he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him.")

[The figure is here mixed. It was a real progress, an elevation, for the serpent to become a dragon, and then a land-beast; but the favorers of the new doctrine, the lovers of truth were conceived of as elevated into heaven or the air, and so as above both sea and land; and hence from the point of view of their position it was a being cast down for the adversary to be thrown on the earth. And even then he is allowed but a short time to exist.] ("Therefore, rejoice ye heavens and ye that dwell in them" disciples of the true doctrine.) "Wo to the inhabitants of the earth and the sea" (disciples of all the stages of the old doctrine), for the devil is come down unto you having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time."

The highest and best grounded form of the old doctrine ("the beast with seven heads and ten horns"), (so the revelator proceeds), is still a mere derivation from the earliest and most debased form of it.

I hold it, therefore, to its legitimate genesis from mere tradition (as "coming up out of the sea"). I speak from that point of view ("standing upon the sand of the sea"). It is not the less a profane and false system ("and upon his heads the name of blasphemy"). The ten fundamental principles of this old doctrine are still propounded and exulted in ("and upon his horns ten crowns"; "and I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy"). The description of the old doctrine is here resumed and amplified, as it presents itself, at the best, as symbolized by the land-beast in the place of the saurian and ophidian.

The old doctrine (the symbolist continues) is, at its best, a motley patchwork of contradictions ("like unto a leopard"); its real basis, or pedimental supports, if allowed to be represented by the nobler quadrupedal animals at all, must be likened to the feet of the inferior style of such brutes ("and his feet as the feet of a bear"); while yet the loud-mouthed and pretentious promulgations of the sect would present it as a lion ("and his mouth as the mouth of a lion"). But whatsoever it be, its character and authority are, as we have said, wholly derived from and merely transferred to him from the dragon, and so farther back from the serpent; that is to say, the most advanced school is not distinctively different from the earlier schools. ("And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were like unto the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion; and the dragon gave him his power and his seat and great authority.")

One of the fundamental doctrines of this system was, indeed, at one time supposed to be refuted and abandoned ("and I saw one of his heads wounded, as it were, unto death"); but it is really upheld and defended as staunchly as ever (but "his deadly wound was healed"), and mankind have continued to delight in this false philosophy ("and all the world wondered after the beast"). But they were, in reality, doing homage to ignorant tradition merely ("and they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast"), etc.

[Many details of exposition have here to be omitted for the want of space.]

There is another great system of philosophy also prevalent in the world (so the account proceeds); namely, Persianism or Zoroastrianism, with its two fundamental principles of good and evil. This doctrine seems innocent, amiable, and lamb-like in comparison with the other; but at bottom it is nowise different. Its teachings are equally pernicious ("he spoke as a dragon"), and are indeed allied with those of the Kabbala, notwithstanding the fact that it is undoubtedly better grounded in philosophic reasonings ("coming up out of the earth") [not out of the unstable sea like the other]. ("And I beheld another beast, coming up out of the earth; and he had two horns [points of doctrine] like a lamb [but], "he spoke as a dragon.")

And so (the account proceeds) these two systems, Kabbalism and Persianism, have blended into each other, and have virtually become one system. Persianism has succumbed to Kabbalism, and now in effect teaches the same doctrine, and so enhances its influence in the world. ("And he [the lamb-like beast] exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, and causeth the earth and them that dwell therein [the great mass of unchristianized philosophers and religionists] to worship the first beast [Kabbalism] whose deadly wound was healed.")

There is also (the account proceeds) a corresponding social system, or state of society—a grand phase of human evolution—which rests upon and is due to the prevalence of this double form of false philosophy. ("And I saw a woman [the chosen emblem for humanity, or any special civilization or collective state of mankind—as the Church was, as we have seen, represented by a woman] sit upon a scarlet-colored beast [the same color is here assigned to the beast as previously to the serpent], full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns" (ch. xvii., v., 8). This entire social polity or condition is the old and yet prevalent one in the world, full of wrongs and outrages of every conceivable kind, rich, luxurious, and hypocritical ("and the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet color [identified in character with the beast], and decked with gold and precious stones," etc.); meretricious and false and sustained (up-held) by the old traditional doctrine [sitting or riding upon the beast. Our doctrines are our hobbies or "hobby-horses." We still speak of "riding our hobbies." What with us is a trivial illustration or figure of speech was with the Kabbalists an elaborate symbol. Swedenborg makes the Scripture symbol of a doctrine to be a "bed," which is only another form of something to rest upon. Bed, couch, seat, saddle, or mounted hobby, the genuine idea is the same. Kabbalism was an elaborate form of literature wrought out in the spirit of such symbols, and any attempt to translate or expound it otherwise than by using the key, can lead only to absurdity.]

Still (continues our Kabbalistic author), the crowning sin and branded shame ("upon her forehead") of the extant social order is its babel of conflicting doctrines and deceptive usages ("Babylon the great"); and, again, the essential cause, the whole, in spirit, of this confused mass of ideas and conducts may be summed up in the one word MYSTERY. [And upon her forehead was a name written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH."] This alone is the source of all falsities and extravagant conceptions of the nature of things. [The initiate and adept of the ancient and sacred mysteries, eleusinian, etc., here solemnly renounces and defies them as the very fountain of error; and we of this day can hardly conceive the strength of conviction and the hardness of bravery required for that act. To make such a renunciation, or to vulgarize the sanctified wisdom of the wide-spread secret society of which the mysteries were functional manifestations had been, for ages, punishable with death.] The old social order (so the account proceeds) is just now especially engaged in the attempt to stamp out the new doctrine by bloody persecutions and other means. ("And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus.") And one can only look with wonder at the great conflict, as it progresses. At this point the angel, the admonishing demon, the muse, suggests a needed explanation to the writer's mind (v., 7); but the explanation is given in the terms of the same symbolism. It is to the effect, previously implied, that the beast is merely a re-presentation of the serpent, and so merely means tradition (time, or time-lore). "The beast that thou sawest was, and is not," yet; consists, in other words, of the past and the future; the two great divisions of time. Below they are increased to three, by inserting the present. "The beast that was (past), and is not, yet (future), and yet is," now, the present. (v., 8.) The interpolated clause, "shall ascend out of the bottomless pit and go into perdition," repeats the "was and is not" as describing the past and future, meaning time. The bottomless pit, the abyss of the mystics, was that past incomprehensibility out of which all things came, and the perdition of the future is that ulterior incomprehensibility into which all things go. "They that dwell upon the earth," and who wonder at or admire the beast, are the unenlightened masses ("whose names were not written in the book," etc.).

"And here is the mind that hath wisdom," means merely, "I am now about to make a learned statement, which only such as are well versed in this mystic lore will comprehend." "The seven heads are seven mountains" means that "heads and mountains—mountain-peaks—are synonyms, or mean alike, and may be indifferently used to denote fundamental points of doctrine, horns denoting minor points." "And there are seven kings" means that kings is another word employed, in this form of literature to mean principles, as in the Zohar (compare princes and principles in their etymology). "Five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a short space." This clause has a sufficiently obscure look, and after what exposition I can give of it, may still retain somewhat of obscurity; but in the main it is easily apprehended. The writer for some reason, not wholly clear, throws the seven ground doctrines of the Kabbala into a series, and allies five of them with the past, one with the present, and one with the future—as if we were to ally them with the musical septave, taking the sixth for the present. "Five are fallen," i.e., relate to the past (as we say that a note has fallen due, when its time is past); "one is" (relates to the present), and "the other is not yet come" (relates to the future); "and when he cometh," when this future arrives (becomes the present), "he must continue a short space" (will be transitory, like the present). "And the beast that was and is not" yet—time at large, past, and future—"even he is the eighth"—is the full octave, "and is of the seven"—subsumes or unifies the seven in one totality aspect which is the eighth—the whole of time—"and which goeth into perdition"—is lost in the incomprehensibility of an eternity to come. Perdition means simply a being lost or lost sight of.]

And the ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings [principles] which have received no kingdom as yet [minor or more general] in character, not so vigorously stated as principles, but receive power as kings one hour with the beast, [accessory commentaries which are attached temporarily to the general body of the doctrine—the beast]. "These have one mind," etc. "These shall make war," etc. The meaning of the seventeenth and eighteenth verses (ch. xvii.) seems then to be that the habit of adding commentaries, of making comments upon the old doctrine will help to undermine and destroy it; God thus intervening to convert evil into good. "And the woman which thou sawest is that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth,"—that on-going of the social order, which moulds and modifies the operation of all philosophical and doctrinal views.

The contents of the eighteenth chapter (and indeed of all the chapters to the end of the Revelation) become now perfectly luminous in the light of these principles of interpretation; and nowhere in the whole range of literature is there a more gorgeous exhibition of the power of language to produce a stupendous picture in words.
