We opened the Revised New Testament, and really hoped to find King James' translators had made a false rendering of this last quoted text; but it is almost identical; and the same is true of the Douay Bible, the Catholic version. Then we turned to our Latin and Greek Testaments, and we found the word "hate" agreed with the original.

With these facts how in the name of truth can any one say: "Christianity embodies the Christ principle of Love?" If the exhibitions of love displayed by the Teacher by allowing a magdalen to wash his feet and dry them with her hair had occurred in our day, a term of service in a reformatory would have been deemed a just place for the offender.

People have been grossly deceived as to the Bible teaching, having listened to panegyrics without end from the priests as to what is related there. Catholics declined to place the collection of booklets in the hands of the people, but used it as a fetish. They claimed to have "God's Word" in their possession, and they told of its great value and sacred character, and repeated their falsehoods in regard to it until it was finally wrested from them and was given to the people by Luther. The Protestant clergy kept up the deception, and continue to repeat it; till now with favorite texts selected and repeated by the clergy the general character of the compilation is unknown to the masses.

So soon as a person masters the underlying current of the book, and is so unwise as to relate it, he is dismissed from the church with curses, and is branded an infidel or an atheist, anything to show Christian hate.

OUR SPIRIT CHILDREN.

While it is true that poets often put into words the emotions of our hearts, and express for us the feelings which we are ourselves unable to utter, it is also true that they share our ignorance and our sorrows, and fail to give us light and leading.

Many parents have felt that the children they really "keep" are not those who live to maturity here, but those who have passed through the gateway of death into the life beyond. Those who live to "grow up" on this side often forsake the home-nest, and the dearest old folk, in their loneliness and solitude, find what comfort they can in the thought that they are not really alone but that their beloved "dear" are with them still. Katherine H. Terry beautifully tells their pathetic story in the following lines:

"I heard their prayers and kissed their sleepy eyes,
And tucked them in all warm from feet to head,
To wake, again with morning's glad surprise—
Then came where he lay dead."

"Those other children long to men have grown—Strange, hurried men, who give me passing thought, Then to their ways. No longer now my own."

Without me they have wrought.

"So when night comes, and seeking for my little ones, I turn home at eventide,
I fold him close—the child that's left to me,
My little lad who died."

How, apparently, sad those last two lines are! One can feel the unshed tears and heartache in them, and yet our Spiritualism has made us think more accurately upon this subject, as it has done on so many others; we now realize that our dear, dead children do not remain babes or infants, but that they grow in stature and in mind "over there" as they would have done here. Longfellow puts the truth clearly and truly when he says:

"Day after day, we think what she is doing
In those bright realms of air;
Year after year, her tender steps pursuing,
Behold her grow more fair."

"Thus do we walk with her, and keep unbroken
The band which Nature gives,
Thinking that our remembrance, though unspoken,
May reach her where she lives."

"Not as a child shall we again behold her;
For when with rapture wild
In our embraces we again enfold her,
She will not be a child;

"But a fair maiden, in her Father's mansion, Clothed with celestial grace;
And beautiful with all the soul's expansion Shall we behold her face."

Readively, our sorrows and bereavements, are often beneficial; teaching us resignation and trust, and arousing us spiritually to the realization of the transitory nature of this present life. By our griefs we learn to be sympathetic and patient, tender and helpful to others. Under the providence of the All-Father our tears often become the solvents of our hardness of heart and make us softer and more gentle, and, "because of grief," we learn to love all.

The writer of the following lines embodied the feelings of many of those whose little ones have been lost to them amid the mist of the valley of change:

"Because of one dear infant head
With golden hair,
To which I have been so fondly true,
I have loved little heads
A holy love;
And for one saintly face I knew,
All babies are fair."

"Because of two wide earnest eyes
Of heavenly blue,
Which look with yearning gaze
My sad soul through,
All eyes now fill mine own with tears,
Whatever their hue."

"Because of little death-marked lips
Which once did call
My name in plaintive tones,
No voices fall
Upon my ears in vain appeal
From children small."

"Two little hands held in my own,
Long, long ago,
Now cause me, as I wander through
This world of woe,
To clasp each baby hand stretched out
In fear of loss,
That I cannot plead in vain—
I loved him so."

Who has not seen the whole attitude and outlook of a man, or a woman, changed by the passing into the unseen of a beloved child? It is to Spiritualism, formerly spurned and despised, that such sufferers turn for comfort and light in their darkness; and our own poet, Gerald Massey, one of the sweetest singers of love and its blessings, shows how the knowledge of Spiritism inspires and strengthens us by enabling the understanding that our children in the Beyond are ever near us; sometimes remain in fact and love that those who remain with us, and by their loving ministry constantly striving to console and bless us. He sweetly sings:

"As, after death, our Lost Ones grow our dearest,
So, after death, our Lost Ones come the nearest.
They are not lost in distant worlds above;
They are our nearest link in God's own love."

The human hand-clasps of the Infants That life to life; spirit to spirit knit.

"They all the rift they made, like veins of gold."

In fire-fretted features torture-torn of old—
With agonies store the empty place they left.
As of wild money in the rock's bare cleft.

"In hidden ways they aid this life of ours,
As shadows lend a finger to the flower."

Shadowed and shrouded in the Wood's dim heart,
To climb by while they push their graves apart.

They think of us, at Sea, who are safe on Shore;
Light up the cloudy coast we struggle for.

TO SPIRITUALISTS EVERYWHERE.

Important Matters From the N. S. A. Headquarters—Greetings, Convention Reports, Posthumous Requests, Etc.

To the Editor:—It gives me much pleasure to send New Year's greetings from the N. S. A. to you and your constituents, and to express to one and all our best wishes for success and progress in the search for spiritual truth and growth. The N. S. A. is continuing its good work and receiving commendation of its efforts and for what it has done, from all quarters.

Its committees and officers are busy attending to the various duties laid upon them by the last convention and all are zealous in the desire and effort to promote our cause in the blessing of humanity. We recognize an important factor in the success of our labors, in the spiritual press, and we hereby give thanks and praise to each editor for his noble aid.

Convention Reports.

As previously announced, the N. S. A. has published in pamphlet form all the essential points and reports of workers, including full reports of N. S. A. officers for the year. These booklets are for sale at headquarters and we can now supply them for four cents per copy, post-paid, thirty-five cents for one dozen, and one dollar and twenty-five cents for one hundred copies. This is splendid missionary literature, also good to keep at home for reference. Scatter it broadcast. Send your orders soon for these pamphlets are well worth double the price.

Posthumous Requests.

Recognizing the fact that many Spiritualists would like some form of request to leave behind them in regard to the service to be held over their remains, and the disposition of the body, the late convention adopted a suitable form which we have printed in suitable and legal shape on good paper. This document plainly states the desires of the deceased in regard to Spiritualistic funeral services and disposal of the body by burial or cremation. Two copies of this form are needed, one to be kept by the holder in some place where it will be easily found by friends after his or her decease, and a duplicate to be filed with officers of the nearest spiritual society, or with some near friend. The object of this request is to avoid objectionable forms of burial service, and so forth, and is highly important. We sell this paper, one copy for three cents; two copies for five cents.

Mass-Meetings.

The convention voted to hold ten mass-meetings during the year, if practical, with six Spiritualists or large local societies conjointly, each meeting to be held in a suitable city and to last two or three days. Societies were to co-operate with the N. S. A. in matters of arranging for such meetings, securing talent, bearing expense, and so on. Up to the present time we get but little encouragement from societies and local workers. Association wishing to co-operate with the N. S. A. in arranging for mass-meetings, will kindly address N. S. A. office.

Goff Will Case.

which involves thousands of dollars and the rights of Spiritualists to dispose of their property as they choose, should demand the attention and secure the aid of every Spiritualist, especially those who live in Michigan. The N. S. A. is expending large sums of money in defense of the Goff will. We call on Michigan Spiritualists to aid in the defense of the Michigan State Association, Miss Rena D. Chapman, of Marquette, Mich.

With loyal and fraternal greetings to all,
MARY T. LONGLEY,
N. S. A. Secretary.

GONE—A MAN OF DEEDS.

A Tribute of Respect From Helen Stuart-Richings.

In The Progressive Thinker of Jan. 13, I read of the transition of B. F. Schmid of Indianapolis, and I said to myself, "Another lifter gone!" It has been my good fortune during years of work on the spiritual platform, to have had many engagements in Indianapolis, and to have known Mr. Schmid and his faithful hard work in the cause he dearly loved; work to which so few lent a helping hand that he finally became discouraged.

In a letter dated August 7, 1905, he wrote: "After fourteen years of continuous effort, I withdrew from the work, and the society has gone to pieces." How much of endeavor, and discouragement; of high ideals and carping criticism; of generosity in money and time and toil, and practical intolerance, one may read between the lines of that brief sentence!

A prosperous citizen, a genial acquaintance, a loyal friend, a lover of humanity, a devoted Spiritualist and a true man—a man of deeds—gone!

Over there, Brother Schmid, you are finding the golden sheaves of your harvest.

Planted in darkness, but seeking the light,
Tolled for in loneliness all through earth's night,
Watched for, waited for, longed for with tears,
Harvested now in the eternal years.

O teller in the great work, who find yourself in the minority, among the lifters, take courage! You are one of the stones in the piers of the mystical bridge that spans the Gulf of Despair.

HELEN STUART-RICHINGS.

EXPECT A MESSAGE FROM HIM.

Psychical Research Society Awaits a Message From Dr. Hodgson, Late Its Secretary.

According to the New York Mail, members of the Society for Psychical Research await anxiously some report of immortality from Dr. Richard Hodgson, of Boston. Dr. Hodgson is dead. During his life he was the best known, most patient and most skillful investigator of so-called psychical phenomena in America.

It was under his direction that some of the most astonishing experiments were performed through Mrs. Piper, the celebrated Boston Medium. Dr. Hodgson was preparing a book on these experiments.

It was expected that in the event of his own death Dr. Hodgson would have been found to have made some careful provision, for an experiment to show his own continued existence in another world, if such a thing were possible.

His Place Hard to Fill.

"Dr. Hodgson's death was a great shock to the members of the society," said a prominent member of the society. "It came as a blow. His place will be hard to fill. The doctor died while in the midst of many interesting investigations, the result of which was eagerly awaited by all of us."

"He was a man in the prime of life, in the ordinary course of nature he would have lived twenty years more, but his fondness for athletics proved fatal. He overworked himself in a game and an artery burst. His end was very sudden."

"We who are concerned in the study of psychic phenomena are simply stupefied. We are endeavoring to arrive at the truth. There are many things that are true in the material world cannot be explained; so, also, are there many things of which we have positive knowledge that cannot be explained or reasoned out from a purely mathematical basis."

"Among the things which we hold to be true is that the soul of man, after having departed to another state, is not able, instantly, to enter into communication with living beings. It requires time to 'find itself.' The time required may be a day, a week, a month, maybe a year or more. We know from instances where messages have come from departed souls within twenty-four hours after death. Others have communicated within a week, and still others have been heard from after a longer time. In some years have gone by. We have absolutely no manner of knowing the conditions or the circumstances that surround the departed souls."

Expect to Hear From Dr. Hodgson.

"This much is positive, however, that Dr. Hodgson will, as soon as he can, communicate with some medium. Phenomena of this nature were his study while alive. Would he not, therefore, endeavor to aid us who were his fellow-students and associates to the extent of his power after he had passed to another state of being?"

"The report that Dr. Piper, or through any other special person, is all nonsense. While Mrs. Piper possesses extraordinary powers, yet that would not mean, necessarily, that she would prove an acceptable medium for communication from Dr. Hodgson or from any other particular person who had

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed, yet we wish it distinctly understood that the editor is not adequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our contributors that the Progressive Thinker is set up as a plain, simple machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that we must generally have to be more or less crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE.—That all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES OF YOUR POEMS sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

Virginia Barrett is in the city and desires engagements to lecture and hold seances. Call or address her at No. 630 Sedgwick street.

E. W. Baldwin writes of the spiritual cause in Madison, Wis., in connection with the work of "St. Michael's, W. D. Noyes and wife." This pair of noble workers are in Madison for the month of January. Lecturing and tests is the public program every Sunday evening at 7:30 o'clock, in K. P. Hall over Holister's drug store. Their residence is 328 W. Main street, where they give sittings week days. Mr. Noyes is an inspirational speaker, and informs us as to what Spiritualism really is. He wastes no words quarrelling over petty forms and ceremonies. The people get what they come to learn, are pleased, and go home to tell their neighbors of the good news. Mrs. Noyes follows with tests and nearly every day is a spiritual seance. The first meeting had a large house than was expected. At the second the weather was very bad, yet the audience equalled the first night, which is fair evidence that had the weather been pleasant the increase would have been considerable. The third and fourth meetings are yet to come.

Correspondent writes: "The German-English Society of the North Side, Bund der Wahrheit No. 18, will give a spiritual concert on Sunday evening, Jan. 28, beginning at 8 o'clock sharp, at its regular meeting place, Brand's Hall, 152 E. North avenue. We will have a program with piano and other selections to please the musical; a lecture in English by E. T. Vaas, and addresses by other visiting speakers to stimulate intelligent thought on spiritual lines; messages and tests by Frank Joseph and other visiting mediums to demonstrate the truth of Spiritualism and to bring aid, cheer and comfort to human hearts. We extend a cordial invitation to the general public to come to our concert. We know you will be glad you were there. We also cordially invite mediums and speakers to come and aid us, and give of their light to a people hungry for truth. We will make it pleasant for you, will help you to lift yourselves to a higher walk of life, and spirit friends will give you aid and comfort. Come and welcome! Admission at the door 15 cents."

R. M. Jones writes: "We have read and re-read the wonderful Occult Life of Jesus, and owing to other sustaining evidence, we are inclined to believe it the real expression of the spirit of Jesus. He says he had then been in his last condition nearly 1900 years. The seer, Emanuel Swedenborg, says that in his visits to the unseen world he saw Saint Paul in a lost condition. This must have been nearly 1800 years after the death of Jesus, and the two accounts support each other to a fact, if we can rely on psychic evidence as proof. I think we have a good case. If he was in such condition it was for a cause, and there can be no other conclusion than that his confession was true, and the book should be read by everybody. The Occult Life of Jesus is given through a most excellent medium, Alexander Smythe, and is entitled to as much credit at least as any other spirit communication. But like ALL OTHER SPIRIT MESSAGES, some mediums will deny its authenticity, and call it bogos. As a novel it is charming—fascinating throughout! As a guide to truth, it is consistent, logical and inspiring, and will hold the attention throughout. As to spirit messages, read the article by Dr. I. K. Funk, on another page, and then THINK."

Mrs. H. A. Nellis writes: "There are so many good things in the paper, it is hard to decide which is the best. I sincerely hope and pray you may be spared long to send forth the good tidings to many hungry souls."

Uncanny noises in Duluth, Minn., for three nights in a vacant building, which has been locked up since its last tenants moved out several weeks ago, have compelled three families in rooms over 123 West Fifth street to seek the aid of the police in solving the problem. They say that no sooner are they asleep than they are disturbed by noises made by unseen things in the vacant room on the ground floor, which was occupied for several years as a saloon. Spirits undoubtedly are to blame for the disturbance.

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

We go to press early Monday morning, hence communications intended for that current issue should reach this office not later than the previous Saturday morning. Bear this in mind.

ALWAYS GIVE YOUR FULL NAME AND ADDRESS WHEN SENDING NOISES AND COMMUNICATIONS FOR PUBLICATION. OTHERWISE THEY WILL FIND THEIR WAY TO THE WASTE BASKET.

Gust Williams writes: "The North Star Spiritual Union in its hall, 1546 Milwaukee avenue, had the pleasure of greeting President Harrison, again occupying his chair last Sunday evening after being ill for the past two weeks. He was congratulated by many. Sister Letzger's lecture for the evening was masterfully handled from start to finish; the subject being, 'Why Do So Many Members of Orthodox Churches Visit Spiritual Meetings?' The subject was chosen because a majority of the audience consisted of members of different churches, but who could not find sufficient food for their souls in their respective places of worship. The North Star Spiritual Union surely plays a large part in bringing light to those homes where spiritual return is unknown. It and The Progressive Thinker are certainly awakening the Northwest Side from its slumbers, as the hall is filled every Sunday night. Speakers and mediums are welcome to help us let the light shine forth into the homes of the discouraged and downcast, to throw open the door that their loved ones may be able to enter."

Gardner S. Eldredge says: "In the majority of cases that have come under the notice of the writer the dying person has become unconscious and passed away in that condition. Yet there are notable exceptions, especially in certain diseases, where the wasting of the body has been slow, as in the case of consumption. Here the spiritual side of life has become more evident and has awakened at times into testimonies beautiful and convincing. One aged physician said to the writer that he had seen enough of such death scenes to convince him of the reality of a future life."

Mrs. Marie Cummings of St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I celebrated my anniversary wedding at the Spiritual Research Society's hall, 3331 South Seventh street. The couple were Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Hendricks of 2425 De Kalb street. They were married in 1880, then Methodists, and through Mrs. Price, a medium, they have found Spiritualism is the only true religion. On the 2nd of October, 1905, they were reunited by Mrs. Price while in trance, after a recital of a poem given by someone in the audience. The organist played a march and three little girls with beautiful flowers led the way down the center aisle, followed by the bridesmaid and groom; then the bride and groomsmen. Then the children. The hall was packed with people. Some very fine presents were given by the society and friends."

Mrs. E. A. Miller writes: "The Spiritual Society of Akron, N. Y., is holding services once in two weeks. Our pastor, Mrs. Atcheson of Buffalo, N. Y., is still with us, and through her efforts and devotion to the cause, the beautiful philosophy of Spiritualism is spreading, and is finding a place in the hearts of many of her hearers. Her lectures are of interest and inspiring. Her readings are enjoyed by all. There is much opposition to Spiritualism in our little town, but eventually I think the veil of superstition will be lifted. The scales will fall from their eyes and the light of truth will be upon them."

Anna Harlowe writes from Niagara Falls, N. Y.: "Sunday, January 14, Mrs. A. G. Atcheson of Buffalo, N. Y., pastor of the First Spiritual Church of Niagara Falls, was greeted by one of the largest audiences we ever had. She greeted them with her usual pleasing manner. The subject chosen by her guides was 'Individualism, or the Un-Subordination of the Soul.' It was food for any thinking man or woman, no matter what their religion was. Many messages were given to strangers which were acknowledged as true."

Hattie G. Webster writes: "Mrs. Margaret Martin and Mr. Harry Shaw were united as life companions at the home of Mrs. Martin on Mead street, Columbus, Ohio, Dec. 24, 1905. Rev. H. B. Bodwell, president of the West Side Spiritual Church, assisted by Rev. Hattie G. Webster. Many worthy Spiritualists were present, as well as many of the bride's relatives. The bride wore a beautiful gown of pearl grey, trimmed in pink satin embroidered in white rose buds, and carried a beautiful bouquet of white and pink rose buds. The groom wore the conventional suit of black broad cloth, white vest and white tie. There were many elegant presents, and all present wished them a long, happy and prosperous married life. They departed on the five o'clock train for Pickaway, amid showers of rice and old shoes. For a short time they will visit the childhood home of the bride and then return and be at home to their many friends, on Mead street, near Broad street."

Mrs. J. M. Morris writes from Hartford, Ct.: "I write to let you and other friends know that we are alive and doing all we can for the cause. We hold a meeting at our house every Sunday evening with good attendance, and Thursday afternoon and evening the same. The last Sunday in this month we have an afternoon social and supper, and lecture in the evening by Mr. Ressegué. We hope to do as well as we have done in the past, to have a house full."

Victoria C. Moore writes from 231 McCall street, Toronto, Canada: "During the month of November and December, I have been serving societies in Hamilton and Toronto, Canada, at the Independent Spiritual Church, which is under the direction of Mrs. M. C. Ryner. The audiences were so large that Mrs. Ryner was obliged to secure a larger hall. Spiritualism is doing its mission in a conservative Toronto. I would like to hear from societies who might desire my services as lecturer and psychometrist. Will make engagements for camp-meetings."

President Harrison D. Barrett.

Harrison D. Barrett, having been disappointed in his efforts to secure work in the South, is now open for lecture engagements, week nights and Sundays. For dates and terms, address him care of The Progressive Thinker, 40 Loomis street, Chicago, Ill.

J. W. High writes from Washington, D. C.: "I am surprised to learn how few Spiritualists read what they need. I have made the personal acquaintance of several who do not read anything on the subject, but who go regularly once or twice a week at 50 cents or a dollar to some of Washington's FAKED mediums. I recognize the crying need of the emancipation of these slaves to delusion. The Progressive Thinker is the greatest of intellectual liberators, and must be placed in position to wield the power necessary. I shall do all I can towards it."

Correspondent writes from Wheeling, W. Va.: "The First Spiritualist Association of Wheeling, W. Va., opened the season on Sunday evening, Oct. 1, with the Rev. Nellie S. Baade of Detroit, Mich., in charge. This most excellent medium has ministered to the association before, and the exceptionally large audience and the interest manifested are fitting testimonials to the high esteem in which she is held by them. On several subjects being suggested by the audience the guides chose, 'Is Heaven a Locality, and If Not, What Is It?' For nearly an hour the audience feasted on a liberal discussion of the subject. Her lectures are a revelation to even old spiritual workers, and her tests are clear and convincing to both the recipients of them and the audience at large."

Clarise H. Mullins writes: "I have just finished reading what our worthy brother, Melior Rudolph, has to say in this week's issue of The Progressive Thinker. Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, I agree fully with Brother Rudolph. Indeed, why should we wait to sing the praises of such a wonderful teacher as our beloved pastor until after her work is finished here? Members of the Church of the Soul, Spiritualists all, join hands and help to make the year of Mrs. Richmond's sojourn here the crowning years of all. Do any of us realize that at longest we can have her with us but a few short years? Let us take the opportunity and gather up the sunbeams lying all about our path, etc. I have just received a letter from a friend in London, England, who says, 'Again I wish to thank you for sending me The Progressive Thinker. I get so much help from the beautiful lessons it contains.'"

In her lecture entitled "After Death—What?" at the First Spiritual Church, Franklin street, near Fremont avenue, last night, Mrs. Helen Stuart Richings pointed out that the law of spiritual evolution and the deeply rooted and persistent desire of the human being for knowledge demands a field of operation beyond the grave. Nothing that has an upward tendency for which the heart of man may hunger but comes to him sooner or later. Indeed, the very hunger is offering the line of least resistance to all the forces Godward. The noble ambition, here toward the reality, circumscribes the environment, and yet their highest gratification in some yet-to-be sphere of activity. The poet, whose song dies upon deathless lips, will again take up the theme in the land of light and set his measure to the rhythm of the stars. The sculptor, from whose hands the chisel and the mallet at the altar of the sculpted stone, the painter, whose longed-for eyes turn from the shroud to the unfinished canvas, will find the material and the power to embody the conceptions of beauty that eluded them here. The astronomer, whose lens but hinted at the glories of the infinite spheres; the geologist, with a single word, his reason, his philosophy, his hope, his faith, in vain to unravel the tangled web of life, and the simile man of the common rank, who longed to know and had not time to learn—all will find the field of knowledge and the pathway that leads through them to the heights of wisdom—Balt's American.

Wherever our premium books go, they are enthusiastically received. Alfred H. Saunders writes from Station, S. I.: "The premium books came safely to hand a week ago, and since then I have been (figuratively) hugging them all the time. I have put every other book or paper to one side to devote all my leisure time delving into the remarkably fertile soil these books contain. Please forgive me, for being a 'dabbling' Theosophist, for I have found that in the near future. They are indeed worth four times what they cost me, and if I could not get more I would not part with them for ten times their cost. This is my honest opinion and what is due to you for the way I wrote so skeptically. I have shown them to several readers of The Progressive Thinker, and they will no doubt be hearing from them."

Mrs. M. Rudd writes from Council Bluffs, Iowa: "The Harmony Band Circle has been open for some time; the Sunday circle at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. It is conducted by home mediums. Night Watch Meeting was quite a social affair, with music, singing and speaking. Many tests were given at a late hour to 30 people."

M. Hendricks writes from Philadelphia, Pa.: "Hon. Thomas M. Locke, president of the Philadelphia Spiritual Society, and his wife, Julia R. Locke, corresponding secretary and treasurer, resigned their positions at the annual meeting, held on Monday night, Jan. 8, 1906, serving the society faithfully for the past eleven years. They still retain their membership, but not as active workers, for they feel as the finger of time is slowly but surely pointing in their direction that they need the much desired rest and comfort that they have rightfully earned. To all E. Johnson, president of the American Spiritual Society, Monday evening, January 22, 1906, at 8 o'clock."

Frank T. Ripley, speaker and pianist, test medium, has February and March open for engagements. He can be engaged for camp-meetings for 1906. Terms reasonable. Address all letters to Tipton, Ind., Box 543.

Thos. S. Kizer writes from Decatur, Ill.: "Our city had Mr. Frank T. Ripley with us during the month of December. He is quite a forceful speaker and gave general satisfaction. He returned to Rockford for January. Mr. Bell, Mr. Hugh Frazer and Mr. Donlevy are with us now. Mrs. Bell's adopted daughter was with us for a short time, but returned to Chicago a few days ago. Mr. Frazer has a Hindoo control that is certainly grand, and holds the close attention of all hearers. Mrs. Bell also has fine controls, and they both give fine tests."

R. Mitchell writes: "The Spiritualistic Society of Students of Nature held its monthly benefit circle at Brother Smith's parlors, 149 W. Randolph street, Jan. 17. The next circle will meet at the Northwest side, 20 Powell Park. All are welcome."

Bro. R. T. Hale, who has done excellent service in Los Angeles, Cal., in purifying the cause of Spiritualism there, is still in that city, as active as ever in the good work. He appreciates The Progressive Thinker.

Sidney J. Biles, a prominent Spiritualist of Lansing, Mich., sends to this office $2.00, and writes: "May the higher intelligence assist, guide and guard your every effort to enlighten and broaden the vision and the horizon line of the masses, to more sublime fields of thought and life."

Hattie G. Webster writes from Columbus, Ohio: "Rev. Fred D. Dunakin, worthy president of the Ohio State Spiritualist Association, served the West Side Church, Columbus, Ohio, on McDowell street, near State street, Sunday evening, Jan. 8. The church was full as usual, and Brother Dunakin held his message, 'The hungry souls of his listeners with the bread of life, taking for his text, 'Man, Know Thyself.' His eloquence melted the hearts of many and many were the tears that were shed. Bro. Dunakin was assisted by Bro. Boerstler, Mrs. Edith McCrossen and Mrs. Susanna Harris as message bearers. Their work was so well done that this evening that they far exceeded anything he had ever listened to in the state. The conditions were excellent, and the work was well done. Our church was never more prosperous, adding new members all the time, and money in the treasury was being paid in large amounts, both religious and business meetings. At the last business meeting in December the officers for 1906 were elected as follows: President, H. E. Boerstler; vice-president, J. R. Grove; secretary, Hattie G. Webster, 55 McDowell street; assistant secretary, Helen Lucas; treasurer, Joseph Bladwell; trustees, G. W. Webster, chairman; P. J. Cummins, L. A. Grove, J. F. Brickman and Bessie McLain. Mrs. Susanna Harris will serve the church the remaining Sundays of January."

Juliet H. Severance, M. D., will speak on Sunday, Jan. 28, at Corinthian Hall, Masonic Temple, for the Society of Anthropology, at 2:30 p. m. Subject, "The Life Work of Thomas Paine."

Helen Stuckings writes: "The First Spiritual Church of Baltimore, with no admission fee, and no tests or readings, in spite of some wet, cold and blustering weather, is well attended. Thursday evening of each week is devoted to psychic demonstrations, and an effort to learn more of the laws governing them. These meetings, too, are well attended, and the collection is good. There are several good mediums in the society; among them Mrs. Lane, Mrs. Daniels and Mrs. Schaffert. A special feature of this society's work is its monthly social. Last month there was a 'sale of noses' which caused much merriment. The ladies went in with a collection of noses, and placed them in it, at which each very placed her nose. The gentlemen bid on the noses, and took in to super the owner of the article knocked down to him. January 17, is the date of this month's social, and 'Experiments in Mind-reading' is announced as the feature of the evening. No fee charged, no collection taken. The Baltimore American, one of the most liberal papers in the country, gives space to reports of the lectures, entertainments, etc. My engagement here is for January and February. March and April—cancelled by the New Thought Spiritual Society of Grand Rapids, Mich., because of its conflict with the First Association of Philadelphia, which society I served during December. For camp dates in June and July (August filled) and season of 1906-7, address 636 N. Carrollton Ave., Baltimore, Md."

Spiritualists of the city will meet tomorrow afternoon, 2:30, at the home of J. W. Woodson, 1007 W. 1st street, to perfect a new church organization, to be known as 'My Church.' A preliminary canvass shows that a membership of about seventy-five will start the new organization. Officers will be elected at the meeting Sunday afternoon—Marshalltown (Iowa) Republic.

Mrs. L. M. Chamberlain writes: "I wish to report to you the success of the meeting held at Woodson's home, 1007 W. 1st street, last evening by Mrs. Henrietta Lichtig. I feel that the people of Oregon are thinking this morning that there is more in Spiritualism than fortune-telling, or insanity. The congregation consisted of the best of the town presumably. Many came through the city, and many names are coming in rapidly. Mrs. Alice Sexsmith, assistant pastor, will speak Sunday evening, Jan. 21, and C. A. Burgess Sunday evening, Jan. 28. The open door plan has been adopted. All are welcome to the meetings every Sunday afternoon at 3, and evening at 8, and are requested to add their names and support to the growing list of members."

Mary Purcell writes from Grand Rapids: "The Grand Rapids Spiritualist Society elected its board of trustees for the ensuing year, Jan. 2, 1906: W. D. Hembling, former vice-president, elected president; Mrs. J. M. Hosken, vice-president; Lou E. Johnson, secretary; J. M. Ogden, treasurer, and Mary Purcell, corresponding secretary. Dr. W. C. Knowles, an old and experienced worker in the cause of Spiritualism, former president of the society, and who has served in that capacity many times in Grand Rapids, and who has been at times president of the State Spiritualist Association, when nominated for first trustee, was elected almost unanimously, overwhiningly. Lou E. Johnson, who was nominated for second trustee, was also elected by a majority vote. She has held the office of secretary for many years and has been elected as above. Dr. Edson A. Titus is serving the society according to agreement. Addresses are given by him every Sunday at 2:30 and 7:30 p. m., followed by messages. Conference meeting at 6 o'clock every Sunday and much interest is manifested at all the Sunday meetings, and everything points toward the future success of the society. The Ladies' Aid of the society also held its annual election Jan. 3, 1906."

Maurice Mac writes: "On Thursday evening, Jan. 25, Mrs. M. A. Burland will hold her regular monthly social at her residence, 3015 Vernon avenue. All are invited to spend a pleasant evening for the small sum of 25 cents. Always a good psychic there to entertain with readings and spirit messages. Refreshments served."

Mrs. Maggie Henry writes: "Sunday, Jan. 14, at (Old 77) Spiritual Mission chapel, the new year brings an increase in our audience both afternoon and evening. The speaker, Prof. F. M. Stoffer, Madame Lucile Deloux, a fine psychic, and other mediums and clairvoyants are always welcome. On Wednesday evening, Jan. 31, our society will hold a social and dance in Vincennes Hall, 3514 Vincennes avenue. A special invitation to all."

The spirit friends came at the seance held here, with unmistakable proof of their identity. One gentleman said it was worth gold to him, for he knew the medium nor any one present could have known what his wife in spirit life told him, therefore, I say, 'Try the spirits.' The medium is only the gateway. In one circle a gentleman said: 'I am astonished I did not know that such things could be done by you, my countenance whenever Mr. Barnes has a meeting. So we have opened the door in our home to prove the beautiful truth of spirit return, and with the help of the angels it will not be closed.'

Charlie also held a private seance for a neighbor, a widow of many years. Her husband, children and friends came to her with the glad tidings that they lived and loved her still. She said it was worth a hundred dollars to her. So friends, you see a 'prophet' has honor in his own country, if his life is

TOPIC FOR THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.

Sunday, January 28, 1906: "Links in the Chain."

Gem of Thought:
We are links in the mighty chain
Of life forevermore;
Look you well that each day is gain,
Toward Peace, the love-kissed shore.
Mr. each day shine with holy light
Of helpfulness and cheer;
Brightly gleam for order and right,
And draw bright angels near.

Ferd C. Suhr writes: "The congregation of the Rising Sun Mission were in favor of sitting in one large circle on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 14. President Kirchman readily consented, and the results obtained by this unusual proceeding were both surprising and beneficial to many. In the evening we had for our speaker the Hon. Chas. E. Hughes, who selected for his subject, 'Education of the Mind, Heart and Body.' Messages were given by the guides of Sister Dill which were truly wonderful for their accuracy. Dr. Burgess was also a welcome visitor, and when called upon responded by giving a few tests. Dr. J. H. Randall comes to us again after a long absence and will lecture for us Sunday evening, Jan. 21."

Geo. E. Koons writes from Palmetto, Fla.: "I am glad to state that we have in our town Bro. James Madison Allen, whose name and record need no comment as an old veteran worker for our noble cause. He has been in the field since 1863. We are having some good and interesting meetings. I am entertaining him at my home. He will remain here for some time. Perhaps you would like to know better who this Geo. E. Koons is. He is a son of Jonathan Koons, and a brother of N. W. Koons, who is the living medium for physical manifestations living in earth life today. He is residing at Temple Oklahoma."

Held for $560 Lila Cure—Mrs. Julia Auer, a clairvoyant, accused by Otto Wick, 2843 Forty-first court, of charging him $950 for telling him to buy a farm in Michigan and hang a lilac bush from it in his room to cure his myeloiditis. He was held in the grand jury yesterday by Justice Underwood.

Societies and individuals in Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois and Iowa wishing their services will please address them as follows: 702 H. street N. W., Washington, D. C., until Jan. 30. After that date, address 613 Newland avenue, Jamestown, N. Y.

Spiritualists of Des Moines and other portions of the state as well, are greatly interested in a series of experiments being conducted by Max Hoffmann, Dr. Hoffmann lost a valuable watch charm during the early part of last week and is now endeavoring to find it through communion with spirit guides. He is giving his close attention to the task and will bring to bear upon the problem all his extensive knowledge of Spiritualism. Report on the success of the experiment is to be filed at the coming interstate convention of Spiritualists—Des Moines (Ia.) News.

W. H. Flury writes: "On Dec. 6, a number of leading Spiritualists of the city met at O'Donnell's College Hall, South Paulina street, near Washington square, and organized the Golden Rule Spiritualist Society, electing the following officers and trustees: D. G. Hill, president; J. M. Wiers, vice-president; W. H. Flury, secretary; Thos. Fields, treasurer; J. E. Sexsmith, P. Morse, Dr. J. H. Randall, trustees; Mrs. Nora E. Hill, pastor; Mrs. Alice Sexsmith, assistant pastor. A charter was obtained from the State of Illinois on Jan. 9. Since its organization the society has been holding some very interesting meetings at its hall on South Paulina street. The following speakers have held the close attention of the large audiences: Dr. J. H. Randall, Mr. A. Stackhouse, Mrs. Nora E. Hill, Dr. Geo. B. Warner, C. A. Burgess and others. On Jan. 25, a watch meeting was held, and the large audience was more than pleased with the address of Dr. Warner, president of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association. Well known mediums have assisted in giving messages at each of the meetings. The society now has a membership of 60, and new names are coming in rapidly. Mrs. Alice Sexsmith, assistant pastor, will speak Sunday evening, Jan. 21, and C. A. Burgess Sunday evening, Jan. 28. The open door plan has been adopted. A. Haeger, president speaks encouragingly of the good work being done by the pastor at the Temple Light and Truth, No. 370 Wabasha near Robey, on Sunday, Jan. 14. Medium Mrs. Binz was present in the evening and she and the pastor were message bearers, bringing good cheer to many. Sunday evening, Jan. 28, the Temple will give a spiritual concert. We will have with us a well known speaker and several well known mediums. There will be instrumental and vocal recitations. All will be made welcome.

Eva L. Stewart writes: "On Jan. 7, the Hyde Park Occult Society enjoyed a pleasant evening by having Dr. G. B. Warner with us. We always have a rich treat when he comes. J. K. Hills did himself credit through his guides in giving messages. On January 14, Dr. C. S. Tisdale held his class in Occult Science in the afternoon and lectured in the evening. J. K. Hills was again present and gave satisfactory evidence of spirit return. Our social dances are increasing in interest, and with such music as Miss Sturdevant and Miss Staple produce on piano and violin draw a good crowd. Thursday, Jan. 18, a Hard Times Social was held, which was quite interesting. On Thursday, Feb. 1, we have a necktie and apron social. All invited to attend. Admission 25 cents. Refreshments served. Dr. Tisdale will continue his class after noon and lecture in the evening. He is certainly worth hearing."

Mrs. George Williams writes: "The Ladies' Temple Fund Society of Cleveland, Ohio, has just had the pleasure for the past two weeks of having on the rostrum Mrs. Elizabeth Schauss of Toledo, Ohio, a gifted speaker and test medium. An extra supper is to be given this coming week, followed in the near future by a bazaar. The ladies have been working very hard for months past in preparing for this fair, and many very useful and beautiful articles are to be had, the proceeds of which will go towards helping to pay off the debt of the temple. Everybody is welcome to our temple. Seats free."

J. W. Dennis writes from Buffalo, N. Y., that the First Spiritual Society has had Mrs. Amanda Coffman of Grand Rapids, Mich., under engagement for months of December and January, and she has proved herself a grand, good medium and worker in every respect. She is giving a very interesting series in all her lectures and actions, and her platform tests all the temple to the very last seat in the hall, and many times there is only standing-room. The tests and full names that she gives while blindfolded seem to astonish the most skeptical.

THE DEPARTURE OF "NORA."

A High Tribute of Respect Paid This Remarkable Woman.

Why sit by the silent sepulchre? Why wander through cypress-shaded cemeteries? Why weep over the shell from which the bird has emerged? Do we not know that the bird has been rolled away from the door of the sepulchre? Do we, as Spiritualists not know that in every death of the body, there is a resurrection from it and an ascension?

Yes, we know it, and yet we are human, with tender cords of sympathy vibrating in our hearts. Tears will fall. We naturally weep in other's sorrows. It is reported that the martyred Nazarene wept at the grave of his friend, Lazarus.

But, why the above? Because I have just learned by letter from the aged father, now almost ninety, J. L. Batchelor, of Ashland, Oregon, of the departure by death of his only daughter, Nora Batchelor (Hensley). On my way from California to Seattle, I met this excellent and truly cultured woman, who, seemingly, all too soon has passed from the toils and trials of mortality to the evergreen shores of immortality, leaving, in departed husband, a fond father, and devoted husband.

This lady, so esteemed by all who knew her, was born in Kirkwood, Ill., 1866. She graduated from the Iowa State Normal School. Continuing her studies after her graduation, and looking into psychic phenomena and spiritual philosophy, she rapidly developed a marked mediumship, passing through several phases of the phenomena. These varied experiences of hers in the telling phenomena of Spiritualism, enabled her to write those remarkably able articles in The Progressive Thinker upon the subject of spirit obsessions. Having been psychically influenced for a time by a presentist influence, she was enabled to write all the more understandingly and philosophically upon this subject, which more and more interests all thoughtful Spiritualists. She was gifted naturally with a clear, brilliant mind, giving her a taste for spiritual literature, philosophy, and the metaphysical questions of the times.

Not dead! She signals back to the loved ones of earth in symbols, signs, and tones, sweet as angels use. Listen to her: "All is well! All is well! I patiently await your coming!" Spiritualism would see no mourning garments worn, would see no doorknobs scraped in creases, and no tears shed in black; but would see in funerals, only friends, opening buds and blossoms, and hear only the resurrection songs of trust and confidence in the All-Father and the present ministry of angels. Spiritualism would further see cemeteries made as beautiful as gardens and groves in spring time; and upon tombstones it would see the mind's relations to the physical organism, and the power of thought in the upbuilding of health and character. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of
HUDSON TUTTLE.
Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing would require the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby terse, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary of waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to any question unless the name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give the best information I am able, the ordinary correspondence of correspondents is expected.

A. C. MacQuarrie: Q. Will you please inform me at what stage the marvelous gifts manifested through Andrew Jackson Davis had ceased to be as prominent as they were in his younger days, and does he still operate his medical practice through the power of hypnotism, as I understand he is practicing medicine in Boston?

A. He cannot be correctly said that "the marvelous gifts" of A. J. Davis have "ceased," although they exist less attention. In his "Magic Staff," or autobiography, he relates how when entering his 18th year, he met Mr. Livingston who first magnetized him. At most immediately the "gift" was used in diagnosing disease and prescribing therefor. At the end of a year, he found that he made no further progress, and as instructed while in the "superior" state he exchanged for Dr. Lyons. Soon after he began giving the "lectures" which form the first and at the time most noteworthy of all his voluminous writings. This book, "Nature's Divine Revelations," was spoken while the youth was in a superior condition induced by Dr. Lyons' magnetism. The lectures were reported by a scribe—Wm. Fishbaugh. As there were no funds for the support, prescription for the sick was continued of necessity. After this book was prepared the young subject became "independent," and the presence of an operator was not required to induce the mesmeric sleep. He could bring it by force of his own will. His other volumes were written by him while in the "superior condition," and the operator and scribe dispensed with.

During all these years he has practiced medicine with success, following his clairvoyantly received directions. He took a complete course at a medical college, graduating with honors. He did not attend this institution expecting to improve his gift, or because he could be taught, but to give his practice legal sanction, and his self-professional standing. His practice at present as it has always been, is entirely at his office, and is highly successful. It is not, however, through "hypnotism."

The state into which he passes, according to his statement, is by self-induced means, and not from an external source. This he calls the "superior state" and is scarcely to be distinguished from "independence," or clairvoyance. It has no advantage over the inductions by an operator, and the thoughts are not influenced by the magnetizer. It is a state wherein the spirit is so far freed from the limitations of physical conditions that it is able to exercise its spirit faculties. The last and highest stage of this independence is complete separation, and it enters into spirit life. The spirits uniformly teach that no great advantage in knowledge is gained by this transition, only a keener perception, it is difficult to understand why it is that while a wholly freed spirit does not become illuminated with a flood of knowledge, there should be a half-way state, where it would have such exceeding capabilities. We can explain this satisfactorily only by supposing that this superior or independent state is one of receptivity to the thoughts of spirit intelligences. The subject then becomes a receptive instrument for guiding and illuminating spirits. As such his knowledge and insight into the arcana of physical and spiritual things is commensurate with that of the intelligences with whom he is in rapport.

Although this state may be entered by the recipient complying with the conditions it imposes, it cannot be correctly called "independent." It is a superior state and the most desirable of all phases of mediumship. It is in itself educational, by uplifting the subject to the high plane of the mentality of those whose thoughts are thus received.

God Bless the Girl Who Works.

God bless the girl who works. She is brave and true and noble. She is not too proud to earn her own living or not ashamed to be caught at her daily task. She smiles at you from behind the desk or counter or printer's case. There is a memory of her in a silent gown. She is like the brave mountaineer, struggling, rejoicing. The sight should be an inspiration to us all. It is an honor to know the girl and be worthy of her esteem. Lift your hat to her, young man, as you pass by her. Her hand may be stained by dish-washing, sweeping, factoring or printer's ink, but it is an honest hand, it is a patient hand, it is a hand that protects a family from the alms house. All honor to the brave toiler. God bless and protect the girl who works.—Medford (Ola.) Patriot.

"How Shall I Become a Medium," Fully Answered

In Mediumship and Its Laws, Its Conditions and Cultivation," by Hudson Tuttle. Price 35 cents. Send to M. T. Tuttle, Berlin Heights, O.

She Has Arisen.

A Pathetic Review of the Life, Death and Ascension to Spirit Life of Rose Bonheur Tuttle Staley, of Berlin Heights, Ohio.

Rosa Bonheur Tuttle Staley entered the higher life, Dec. 30, 1905. "Is death the final sleep? No, it is the last awakening."

To us the old year went out in darkness and the new year dawned with sky overcast with clouds. After months of suffering the icy hands of death and darkness had borne all patiently, hopelessly, bravely, for she wanted to live, for her own sake and those dear to her. No one ever enjoyed life more. She loved its strenuous duties, and never shrank from any set aside, its obligations. As friend, wife, mother, she gave her best with self-sacrifice and devotion, and with a care for others more than for herself.

In the evening, her sister, who all the weary time had been her constant attendant, asked: "Are you in pain?" "No, dear," she whispered, "I am going home at twelve." After a while she said, "I am happy, but hate to go!"

As the midnight hour approached, we dear ones gathered around, saw the unmistakable shadow of the messenger whose task it is to break asunder the cord of life. The lines of pain disappeared; her eyes looked from one to the other, questioning, and then into the vacant air above her with an eager joy. She was seeing through the veil, what mortal eyes have never seen. A smile came over her face, from her lips a whisper not audible, and her spirit escaped the bars of its bondage and left with us only the broken cage.

And she passed through the gateway of the resurrection into the angel land. Did you ever hope against hope, hope with your heart when reason all the time told you it was folly? Have you ever seen the bones of the departed rack of disease, and prayed with shifting prayer that the inevitable could be turned aside? So had we prayed, and with our prayers went every effort that skill and love could suggest. Her room was decked with flowers sent by thoughtful friends; her whimsical appetite enticed by dainties; her every symptom noted and provided for, and her least wish answered. Her tender vitality was not mortal, her tenacious disease would have been victorious. She fought a brave battle against fate.

When she returned from the hospital, she thought the operation had been successful, and always buoyed up by hope, she expected to be soon well. We all members of her family and while she planned pleasures for the coming season—visits to friends, receptions for them, outings here and there, what she would do for her children, and ornamentation of the home and grounds, we knew all to be a dream that never would be realized.

And so she drifted on till Christmas time. There was a slight improvement, so much, her brother, her physician, said there would be hope, did we not absolutely know the incurable cause. She gained in strength to walk around the room, and take her place at the table. On that blessed Christmas day she was bright and cheerful. How many kind and thoughtful friends she had! A table was placed in view of her easy chair, on which was placed her gifts that she might enjoy them. Friends near and far remembered her. The morning mail brought many tokens with accompanying notes. Some of the writers, not knowing her condition, wished a Merry Christmas, which sounded like mockery. Others expressed prayers for her speedy recovery. How much she enjoyed these symbols of regard. There never lived one who more devotedly loved her friends, or more appreciated their kindness.

Nor had she been forgetful with all her suffering, and unable to do anything for herself. She sent souvenirs to all members of her family and near friends—last tributes of friendship already half transplanted to the realm of souls!

Oh! that Christmas day! We all made merry for her sake, and she concealed her mortal hurt with smiles and bantering words.

You come today to pay your last tribute; you always met the glad smile, the hospitable recognition, the hearty voice of welcome, and no greeting. The mistress who loved home more than any place on earth, and in every sense was a home-maker, greets you not. The rooms are silent. Her favorite pictures on the walls are dumb. The body she possessed while here, lies on a couch in unprying mockery of life. The departed spirit left a smile on her dear face when it caught a glimpse of the heavenly glory.

It is human to regret and weep; not one who has not felt the shaft of bereavement strike deeply into his heart. The happiest lives are prolonged to the end, and the dearest depart. The grand majority are on the other side of the river.

Can we see across to the other side? Do the fogs never lift, or is it forever shrouded by dense clouds and brooded over by darkness? When we sit down by the ashes of our hopes, our heart bleeding with wounds and every sense benumbed, justice, affection, mercy, pity, faith, love, seem far off! A wall yawns between us and heaven.

And yet we know the sun is shining above the murky clouds, shining serene, bright and beautiful as on creation's morn. Through the darkness and doubt of the senses, shines the glory of the future life. We may not comprehend; we may not know its subtleties; possibilities; we must be content!

Must we be content? Nay, we have knowledge! We may have visions of the glories of the Spiritual Kingdom!

Our dear one believed this with a knowledge that bridged the gulf between life and death, and made it a triumphal pathway for her transcendent spirit. From her childhood she had been doubted. She constantly saw spirit friends and conversed with them. Her daughter, Emma Clair, who died in infancy, was constantly present. To ward the last, she said to her little children who came to kiss her: "I have been with you a long time, and now I am going to visit Emma Clair, who has come for me." Was this a delirious dream of fever, or a ministering spirit? Can there be doubt?

We cry out in the blindness of our grief. We are selfish, and want our friends to stay, and that there will be no change. But is it not more, even to our selfish desires, to have an angel enthroned as a guardian above us?

If we could by our prayers recall her to the full flood and joy of life, on bended knees we would pray without ceasing till the answer came; but if it must be to this worn body, which she has deserted because a burden, how supremely selfish to recall her!

Rather will we pray that we may approach her devoted life. The angel world may bend low over us in infinite love, and strive to assist us. Let grief bring suffering hearts into sympathy. It shows human weakness and need of dependency. We are strengthened by sympathetic tears, and adversity, disappointment and loss are not the worst that can befall us. They chasten and free us from egotism. While they show our weakness, they develop our strength.

We come together and bear and share each other's burdens, and thereby brighten the golden links of fraternity which bind us together.

We cannot expect this world to remain under a clear sky with gentle winds; so in every life some rain must fall, some blasting lightning stroke be received. There is no flock however watched and tended, But one dead lamb is there; There is no household, however so well defended, But has one vacant chair.

We think there is little left of joy when such disasters come, and yet it is our duty to leave to them, we will see how much worse our condition might be. How many ties yet bind! How many duties to be performed! How much joy in life if we grasp what is presented! We make the mistake of thinking that as there is no happiness for us to-day, there will be none tomorrow. No day so dark but joy comes into it, and when the darkest comes to us we should make the most of it.

Enjoy the living! Grief chastens and makes us more gentle and careful of others. There are times when we would give all we possess, the whole world, were it ours to receive "The touch of a vanished hand," and hear the sound of a voice that is still! And yet when that voice is heard in life, we gave not the greeting it craved!

Sorrow has its lesson: It is to gentleness of spirit, tenderness of feeling, and loving kindness; all the care, thoughtfulness and interests we had for our departed ones, we transfer to the living. What the departed would have done, for us to do, we love them, and yet when that voice is heard in life, we give not the greeting it craved!

"I am going home at twelve!" Home! Is the soul conscious that this world is not its home? How it longs for greater opportunities and dreams of happiness never gained in this life. Countless generations have repeated the saying: "The angels are waiting for us, and depart for this is not our rest."

Six hours, however, the angel flashed his message, "Coming home at twelve." Father, mother, husband, children, friends, may unite in prayer to hold back the going, but when the fateful hours toll from the tower, the command, "Arise," will be obeyed.

All are going home. To the home of the soul, the kingdom so glorious that it has been pictured as of gold and all precious gems, because nothing on earth can represent it. All going home in endless procession! Rest for the weary toiler in new activity. Rest for the sorrowing in meeting those gone before. Rest in doing the things that were his duty, and no longer bowed by repulsive burdens. The weary toiler feels that this life is not his home; that there is a place of rest whither he is going. "The stricken hearted have reliance on the promise: 'You are going home! When the hour strikes you will go!'"

Spiritualism gives knowledge which is a higher faith, a higher questioning soul. There is a higher life where the injustice of this world is righted; its pain repaid by joy; its losses with gain; its deprivations compensated, its fetters broken! There the tangled skein of life will be made straight; its broken threads united. There the separated will be joined together; friends reunited; and the emancipated soul unimpeded, arise to its destiny.

Our narrow lives feel the loss, the disappointment, the regret, the ruin of our dream-castles, all built on this side. Though the departed come through the mist-curtain shutting down between our mortal lives and theirs, and give us assurance, all is so changed and different, our senses are unappeased.

Even in the clouds of our grief, our dear one has come like a star of hope, and already our dream-castles arise on the other shore. We will not grieve, for it reflects on her. "Ministering spirits," remember us, and bend low in brooding care, and as a beacon-light on some jutting headland guides the storm-tossed mariner through gathering fogs from reefs and treacherous bars and wreck-strewn coasts, may their influence guide unto the morning's call, "COME HOME!"

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Letter From Seattle, Wash.

Although it is some time since a communication was sent from the Ladies Auxiliary, we are still in the land and working for our Temple. Since the camp there has not been quite so much work done on account of many of our workers being ill. We are looking forward, however, to renewed efforts on the part of all in this new year. Our president, Mrs. G. W. Stetson, has been severely ill during the past two months. She is at present at the Green River Hot Springs and on the road to recovery. She has been greatly misused, as she is a host in herself.

The Spirit World is Limitless.

Declaration of Rev. W. F. Peck, President of Mississippi Valley Spiritualist Association.

The Rev. W. F. Peck of St. Louis, president of the Mississippi Valley Spiritualists' association, spoke Sunday, January 14, at St. Joseph, Mo., both morning and evening at King Hill Hall, 9th and Frederick ave. He has been engaged by the local society of Spiritualists for every Sunday night month.

The subject last night was "The Spirit World—What and Where is It?"

In part he said: "Although the belief in immortality and a future life is almost universal among mankind, yet there are few questions upon which men have differed so widely as they have upon the character, conditions and location of the spirit world."

It must be evident that these differences have resulted from a lack of reliable information upon the subject. Men always differ most about the things of which they know the least, and differ least about the things of which they know the most.

The chemist never quarrels with his belief in the existence of a mixture of oxygen and hydrogen contained in water, nor as to the chemical elements of common salt. But when man begins to speculate upon those things for which he has little or no scientific data, the way is opened for a vast diversity of opinions.

BELIEVE IN IMMORTALITY.

While the majority of mankind believe in immortality there is a large and respectable minority who doubt and even disbelieve it. It must be admitted that the skeptics are, for the most part, among the most intelligent of the race. To convince such will require the presentation of the strongest logic backed by scientific facts. To that class we wish particularly to appeal.

The difficulty of conceiving of a realm or state fitted for the existence of the disembodied spirit after it has done with earth has always been a stumbling block in the way of the thinker. Hence the question they have always asked is: "Where is the spirit world?" "If there is a spirit world, where is it located? Where is heaven? where is hell?" Before the birth of science that was not a difficult question. Judging by appearances the universe was a sort of three-story affair. The sky was solid, the ceiling of the earth, the floor of heaven. God and the angels dwelt there. While hell was immediately beneath the surface of the earth, heaven was above because the sunshine, the rain and all the blessings came from there. Hell was beneath as proved by earthquakes, hot springs, volcanoes. But when science was born those theories were dispelled. Astronomy, with her telescope swept away the solid sky and found not a solid surface, but a vast earth with pick and shovel and found no lake of fire, and so the question still demands an answer.

WHERE DOES SPIRIT GO?

Some have surmised that at death the spirit goes to inhabit other planets, or some believe, by sunbeams, but monochromatic science has dispelled that possibility by showing that the sun and planets are constituted of practically the same elements as the earth and so are no better fitted for the abode of spirits than the earth.

Some metaphysicians maintain that the spirit world is subjective and not objective reality. They say that the objects are merely conditions, states of consciousness. This in a sense, is true, but these states of consciousness must exist in space, somewhere, hence they must have locality, but where?

SOME STARTLING FACTS.

Before attempting to locate the spirit world let me call your attention to a few startling facts.

In the opinion of scientific authorities the trend of events, past and present, point to the final extinction of life in the visible universe, not by fire, but by cold. The sun and planets are growing, and the cooling motion is growing. The sun will become a cold, dark ball of gas. In the course of time—too great for figures to measure—the entire visible universe of suns and worlds will be cold, barren, dead, even as the moon is supposed to be today. But will that be the end of conscious existence? Will nature conclude her marvelous work by such a miscarriage as that? I cannot believe it.

The conservation of energy is no longer a theory, it is a demonstrated fact. As matter is indestructible, so is force. Force may change its method or mode of motion, but it cannot be destroyed. Where, then, have these wonderful forces gone that manifested themselves in a thousand ways in the living universe? There is no empty space in all the universe. Science is universally agreed upon that filling all the space between the suns and worlds and interstices between the atoms, pervading and permeating the universe to its remotest bounds, is a subtle form of matter or substance apparently independent of the laws which govern all other forms of matter. For a space of time it has been demonstrated "ether." All scientists agree that it exists. In no other way can they account for the phenomena of light, electricity, gravity, etc., but none of them can tell what it is.

May I venture to supply the information? What the scientists call "ether," we call spirit, or spirit-matter; it is the subtle substance which all forms of visible matter are temporary expressions. It is the substance of which the spirit world is composed.

NOT BARREN WASTE.

Can anyone believe that this mighty limitless matter is a lifeless, barren waste? And that brings us back to the question: What have become of the mighty forces which have escaped from the dead world? I answer: Back into the mighty field of "space," the source from whence they were derived. Out into the mighty expanses filled with spirit substance developing and revealing a living universe as infinite as the great, so wondrous in beauty and grandeur that it eclipses all that mortal eyes have ever beheld.

Andrew Jackson Davis, the wonderful seer, and other clairvoyants, have seen and described scenes of surpassing beauty spread throughout space, landscapes, mountains, rivers, lakes, water and plains fairer than a poet's dream.

There are many who will sneer and say "moonshine," and declare all this impossible. Softly, my skeptical friend, a noted scientist has said that he would not venture to pronounce anything impossible outside the realm of mathematics.

CONDITIONS RELATIVE.

Remember that all conditions are relative. If you had never seen a fish living beneath the water or a bird flying in the air, you would pronounce both impossible because you could neither see nor hear them. You think the ether of space too fragile and attenuated to allow of such things. Let me give you the latest word of science upon that matter. Professor Stanley Jevons, one of the greatest authorities on physical science, tells us that the ether of space "is infinitely more solid and elastic than steel."

EXERTS GREAT PRESSURE.

Another scientist estimates that this invisible substance exerts a pressure upon the earth of "seventeen billion pounds per square inch." "Yet," says Professor Jevons, "we live and move without appreciable resistance, through this medium as easily as through air, and more elastic than adamant."

Think of that. No story that any Spiritualist ever told, no event that ever took place in the seance room was a thousandth part as difficult to comprehend as this statement of the world's greatest scientist.

With the mighty expanse of space filled with this wonderful substance, with the active forces of light, heat, electricity, magnetism, and many other forms, what logical reason have we for denying that the spirit world is in the depths of space? No narrow and contracted "city of gold" can contain the emancipated souls of men and women.

That idea of heaven was formed before science had demonstrated that this little world was only one of countless millions of worlds doubtless populated as densely at least as ours.

Nothing less than the whole expanse of space will suffice, and that is where it is. The infinite fields of space, inhabited by beings of immortal love, lighted, warmed and unfied by the breath of the Divine Spirit, our Eternal Father.

JOHN DEITZ

A Prominent Spiritualist Passed to the Regions of Souls.

Biography makes a large part of history. It is a record of the life of a man, of his deeds, of his thoughts, of his feelings, of his character. It is a record of the life of a man, of his deeds, of his thoughts, of his feelings, of his character.

What is the history of Greece without Lucius, Socrates and Alexander? What is Egypt without the Pharaohs?

What is the history of the Reformation without Luther or Melancthon? What our own America without Columbus, Washington or Lincoln?

Knowledge of human character and the complex incentives that have actuated the makers of history, are important to every student of economics and constitutional law. The qualities of every religion are indicated by the type of mind and character they evolve. Modern Spiritualism has evolved some of the noblest of human characters; and a large per cent of its following are of the best classes of modern civilization.

The development of the spiritualist, as a class, are of a low order of intelligence and morality, is an infamous libel, for which religious bigotry and prejudice are largely responsible. We often refer to such representatives as Prof. Crookes, Hyslop, Flammarion, Lodge, James, Hyatt, Savage, Coles, and others as types of mind and character that reflect credit upon Spiritualism. But there are tens of thousands of Spiritualists whose intellects and moral character are as creditable as any of these. That they have not all attained to the notoriety, or had the opportunities of scholarly finish that the few have, does not weaken the value of their lives as factors of progressive civilization, or worthy examples for the inspiration of society, and encouragement to noble aspirations in the young and right motives and aims in whatever circle their personality impresses. To read and meditate upon the worthy lives that help to mold the character of every man, woman and child. Especially is this valuable in the history of mediums, writers, and speakers in the vineyard of Spiritualism, and also those staunch supporters who never waver or hide their faith, or compromise conviction for popularity or worldly gain. The moral value of such lives can hardly be overestimated. Their influence is felt among all the workers, and they accomplish as much in their way as those who are more widely known and publicly praised. Conspicuous among this class of moral heroes and representative Spiritualists, is the late John Deitz, of Caro, Mich.

Born in Germany, Dec. 12, 1838, his parents came to America and settled in Syracuse, N. Y., in 1848. He was a carpenter and a lover of liberty and justice, he enlisted in the Second Michigan Volunteers in 1861, and served his country with honor and credit until his discharge, June 4, 1865. The army fare developed a disease of the stomach from which he never recovered. Nevertheless he made vigorous headway in business and became one of the leading men in public affairs, and he had the confidence and esteem of all who knew him.

He became a Spiritualist early, and faithfully represented its best teachings. He was never ashamed of his belief, and was ever ready to stand up and be counted. He was three times married. His first wife, Louisa Malory Deitz, died in 1878. His second wife, Elizabeth Malory Deitz, died about 1877. His last marriage to Mary L. Richardson occurred in 1880. She now survives him and though shadowed by the mortal eclipse and deeply feeling his physical absence, she accepts the ordeal bravely, and enjoys the blessed assurance of her relation to her consciousness, that he is not lost or dead, but her spiritual companion and counselor still, whose tender love and expanded life make heaven more real and earth more beautiful by his silent presence and affectional aura.

The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Marcellus Carpenter of Detroit, Mich., on the afternoon of Dec. 6, 1905. Over a large area of Tuscola county, Mich., the beneficent influence of John Deitz will be felt for many years to come. His sterling character and gentle nature, his tender sympathy and high ideals of life, and his frank and fearless search of his sustaining faith, will leave a light for many doubtful pilgrims in search of truth. His moral influence will continue to guide and strengthen the weak and weary when evil temptations lure; and his spiritual faith and integrity will illumine the way for many who walk in darkness weighed with doubt and sorrow.

RETURNS FOR FRIENDLY VISIT

ten tale.

THE MEDIUM BAILEY.

"The only thing I live for now, is to be of service to my fellow-men, and I can best do this by spreading knowledge about Spiritualism. We are looked at askance by the world because of the prevailing ignorance on the subject, but the time is not far away that will see this new science universal. There are many people who are Spiritualists, but will not let the outside world know it because of the unbelief on the subject."

Mr. Thomas Welton Stanford, Melbourne, is in many respects a most remarkable personality, and this fact was abundantly demonstrated to the Melbourne representative of the "Sunday Times" in the course of a short conversation recently with that gentleman on the subject of Spiritualism and kindred matters. Mr. Stanford is a brother of the late Senator Leland Stanford, founder of the Stanford University, California, and he has been a leading figure in Spiritualistic circles for the past forty years in Melbourne. His brother was during his life a prominent Spiritualist in America, as also was that gentleman's wife during her earthly existence.

"Once upon a time," says Mr. Stanford, "I said 'I believe' in connection with Spiritualistic matters; now I say 'I know.' I have gone beyond the mere belief stage, because I have had so many undoubted demonstrations of the facts of spirit existence that I can no longer have any doubt whatever."

As he says this, Mr. Stanford's eye lights up, and his face takes on an expression which conveys to his auditor a vivid idea of the earnestness that is within him. A Sydney newspaper has remarked that this gentleman's appearance suggests Svengali, of the play "Tribe." This simile is not only offensive, but it is palpably incorrect. Svengali of the play has black whiskers, and so has Mr. Stanford, but there the parallel ends. Svengali's whiskers are black and coarse and tangled; the subject of this sketch has a long beard, with fine quality of hair, thoroughly well groomed. His complexion is bright and well colored, his eye evidently that of a shrewd man of business, and he evidently is more liberally endowed in an intellectual sense than are the majority of even the leading business men of the city of Melbourne.

Mr. Stanford is a philanthropist first, and a plain, hard-headed business man afterwards. His personality, in short, is calculated to deeply impress even the unbeliever in Spiritualism, and such being the case one cannot help paying a full measure of heed to what he says in regard to the manifestations he had. He is not a charlatan with a business axe to grind; he is a man of considerable wealth, as may be judged from the fact that he has set apart in his will a sum of £50,000 to provide an Australian scholarship for the Stanford University, and has also set aside a large sum of money for a "Chair" of Psychology in connection with the same institution.

The foregoing facts should be borne in mind while reading that which is to follow, as there must necessarily be a vast difference between the mere mountebank who is working Spiritualism for a living, and the gentleman of means who is devoting a large share of his time to what he describes as the new religion, having no hope of profit in a worldly sense, and wishing only for the satisfaction of knowing that he is doing some good in this world by spreading knowledge upon what he regards as a subject of paramount importance. Although the office he occupies is well guarded by a secretary, who does not invite intrusion, but rather repels it, and although he lets it be known that he does not seek publicity or encourage visits, he very readily grants the "Sunday Times" interviewer a portion of his time, and discusses the whole question with considerable amplitude of detail.

Referring to the press statement that certain articles said to have come from the "tombs" of Egypt through a Spiritualistic medium, were rejected by the management of the Stanford University, the gentleman under notice says that the statement, so far as it goes, is correct; that is to say, they were not rejected when sent by him two years ago to the late Mrs. Stanford, his brother's wife, and if they have since been removed from the museum, he has so far received no word about it, although he expects some communication on the subject by an early mail from America.

"Dr. Jordan," he says, "President of the University, is a rank materialist, and refuses to investigate anything connected with Spiritualistic matters. Since Mrs. Stanford died he has been dictator of the affairs of the University, and in view of his antagonism to Spiritualism, I would not be surprised at his taking any step in the direction indicated; but I mention on this point that I am a trustee of the University, and if I learn that the president has acted in the manner alleged I shall see about it in due course."

Referring to the seances that have taken place in his large office in Melbourne, and at which such wonderful manifestations have been experienced by the sitters, Mr. Stanford speaks with intense earnestness and in a way to impress the bitterest scoffer.

"The fact," he says, "that at these meetings we have had placed upon the table numerous ancient tablets, writings on papyrus, parchment, and other sheets, also live birds, snakes, etc., is regarded by the uninitiated as marvelous, but to me it is not so. As I said before, I do not 'believe,' I 'know.' Manifestations of this description are only useful for the purpose of impressing unbelievers. They are of no value to me, because I cannot be more impressed than I am at present. These things are not miracles at all, but they are brought about by the agency of a perfectly natural law. It matters not that we do not know what that law is, for there are many laws we know nothing about."

"Does any man know what electricity is? Yet we accept it as an ordinary circumstance of life, and make no comment indicating our unbelief in it. The whole universe is one vast mind, and all that is in it is beyond human apprehension. As a result of my studies and my knowledge, I am satisfied that there is no such thing as death. Life is continuous, beginning 'over there' in the spirit world when it ends here. This is a beautiful region to possess, and if it were universally accepted we would have no need for policemen or soldiers, for what we do here influences our life on the other side, and what our tastes are here are continued on the other side. When a man gets on to the other side he gravitates to where he belongs. The same law exists there as here."

After giving a number of similar views on religious and spiritual matters, Mr. Stanford came more directly to the subject of immediate interest, namely, the manifestations that have taken place, and promised that before the interview closed he would show his visitor the wonders the office contains, these having been deposited during seances. The live birds and growing plants which are still alive at his home were not seen, but sufficient was examined to impart a considerable weight to what the Spiritualist had to say.

"I am not a clairvoyant," says Mr. Stanford, "nor do I intend to become one. I am a business man, and I do not care to be hypnotized, which process is necessary before a person can become a Spiritualistic medium. My motto is let those who have the clairvoyant faculty become mediums if they wish; for my part I am satisfied to engage a medium and pay him for his services when I find one who can satisfy me as to his bona-fides, although I may remark there are more charlatans than genuine mediums about."

"The medium Bailey, through whose instrumentality the most wonderful manifestations have been secured, was engaged by me about two years ago. At the first seance in which he took part at my house a heap of road metal came upon the table, fortunately without striking any of the sitters. By some means about this time the electric light was turned on full glare, and this so affected Bailey that he fell forward from his chair, and lay apparently lifeless for a quarter of an hour. Since this I have been careful not to have the light turned on so suddenly during the time a person is in a clairvoyant trance. Some time after this Bailey was engaged by the Psychological Society in Italy, and he gave in Milan a course of fourteen sittings, during which some remarkable psychic phenomena were witnessed. These have been described in pamphlet form, and are duly attested to by men of undoubted integrity."

"Bailey afterwards went to Rome, where his clairvoyant powers seemed to forsake him, and he was pronounced to be a fraud. On his return to Melbourne, where he now is, he was found to be still in an unfit condition to carry out the work of an earlier day, the brain having apparently become worn, as an ordinary piece of machinery would be worn, by the severe work to which it was subjected. I have hopes that I will be able to magnetize him again and make him probably as useful in a Spiritualistic direction as he was before. I have the power to magnetize, and I exercise it sometimes, but I do not hypnotize."

"On one occasion I magnetized Mrs. — (I do not wish to mention her name), and during her trance she has written for hours, setting forth statements made to her by the spirit of Dr. Motherwell, a one-time famous medical man of Melbourne."

In respect to the disembodied Dr. Motherwell, who, by the way, has done duty at many seances, it is said by Mr. Stanford that modern methods of medical treatment are adopted by the spirit, as it keeps itself up-to-date by study, just the same as it would have done had it remained in the flesh on earth.

On the subject of the mysterious conveyance of tablets, parchments, and various strange and ancient articles to the seance room, it is pointed out that the work is accomplished by the spirits of Indian jugglers, who, when in life, practiced the tricks of magic. "These people's spirits," says Mr. Stanford, "can do acts of mystery that could not be performed by the spirits of ordinary persons. This does not mean that trickery is adopted at the seances, because that has not been possible. I have always searched Bailey from head to foot before he started, and I have asked the guests to do the same. I have always paid the medium and borne the incidental expenses of the sittings, and thus became the controller of the whole affair. My object has all along been research and inquiry, and I have watched closely to make trickery by the medium or anybody else quite impossible. The manifestations must necessarily have been genuine in such circumstances, and having proceeded thus far let me show you some of the articles sent here by the spirits."

Drawers in the office contain a number of clay tablets of the early Egyptian times, also weird hieroglyphics and writings on parchments, papyrus, and other sheets possessing an ancient and uncanny appearance. The translations of the cuneiform writings were supplied, per the medium Bailey, by the spirit of a Dr. Robinson, a noted archaeologist of his time. The translations were taken down in shorthand by a stenographer employed for the purpose to attend the seances, and one of the tablets, which bears the date 2,000 B. C., reads as follows: "A Nada of silver Nurdurri Uh a Ninevite gave in the city of Kaleb he will take the life of Nebo Uta which shall pay when demanded of him." A note by Dr. Robinson's spirit says that he had reason to believe that that this was a contract between two men, a Ninevite and another to take the life of a Babylonian. The tablet has been given to the man who was to commit the murder, and it was presumed that money was paid to him if he ever did commit the deed, and that the tablet was handed back again. "It is a strange thing," the note continues, "that a record should be kept of such a deed."

"The man Bailey," says Mr. Stanford, "spoke these words in my hearing, and it must be noted that he did not utter them from his own knowledge, as he is unlearned in the history of the time. Besides tablets, parchments, etc., in the drawers, there is on the floor a leopard skin, said to have come from India, through the instrumentality of a spirit; also in a glass case the skull of a man said to have been killed in the Philippine war; a piece of spermaceti from a shipwreck, which was wet and covered with seaweed when it arrived; objects of fetish worship from India and Africa, human leg bones, a divining-rod, a piece of bread that had arrived in the dough state, and since been baked, the spirit intimating that it had been taken from a woman in India; a human shoulder blade, such as the Africans worship so that they might be blessed with strong arms; also other articles which are, to quote the auctioneer's phrase, "too numerous to particularize."

"Not only did spirits bring these things to my room," said Mr. Stanford, "but on certain occasions they have asked me per the medium to be allowed to remove certain articles from the room during a sitting. On permission being given, and the desired article being covered with a cloth for an instant, it disappeared to do duty, I presume, at a similar seance then progressing in some other part of the world."

"Spiritualism," remarked Mr. Stanford, "is only about sixty years old. It was started in America by the Fox family, who began to get manifestations at that period. I was in California in the year 1852, and I commenced to give attention to the matter. Table rapping and planchette writing are the A B C of Spiritualism, and I passed through the various stages and tested everything that came before me until now it is not a question of belief with me, but absolute knowledge. My experience, as well as my reading, have covered a wide field, and as a business man I have never allowed myself to be carried away by frauds of any sort. Bailey, who until recently was the best medium I had ever met, has not only produced the manifestations I have mentioned, but he has also, while influenced by the spirit of the late Mr. Creswick, a noted actor of his time, recited complete plays, giving the parts Creswick had assumed and those of other actors, changing his voice and actions to suit the several characters. In his normal state the medium knew nothing about either Creswick or the plays he had helped to produce."

Asked why he had made such liberal provision in his will for Australian students, as mentioned earlier in the present article, Mr. Stanford said that he had been in this country for forty years, and as he had made his money here he wished to benefit the country that had made him rich. The details of his bequest will not be made known while he lives, but he remarks incidentally that a condition will be that those who from time to time secure scholarships yielded by the interest on the money will have to study for a time at the Stanford University, and ultimately come back to Australia to give this country the benefit of their knowledge.

"There is not much hope," he continued, "of having the chair of psychic science and research endowed ident, but my will is so worded that the money I do not, but my will is so worded that the money I have set aside can not be used except in the specific direction I intend."

"The only thing I live for now," he remarked in conclusion, "is to be of service to my fellow-men, and I can best do this by spreading knowledge about Spiritualism. We are looked at askance by the world because of the prevailing ignorance on the subject, but the time is not far away that will see this new science universal. There are many people who are Spiritualists, but will not let the outside world know it because of the unbelief existing on the subject. Mr. — (a leading Australian politician) is as much a Spiritualist as ever he was, but he keeps his own counsel because of his politics; many others are in the same position, but those in the circle know of their belief, and know also how true a thing Spiritualism is, and how satisfying to those who realize that much of the teachings of denominationalism falls short of giving that solace which is enjoyed in such full measure by Spiritualists."

The foregoing is a plain and unhyphenated statement of what was seen, and a true, unvarnished report of what was said. It is written by one having no bias as a Spiritualist and no prejudice as a materialist. The facts as to the articles seen are plainly given and may be accepted for what they are worth. Of course, the presence of the articles in the room does not prove Spiritualistic agency, but the statement of a sane and earnest man (Mr. Stanford) as to how he came into possession of them must necessarily carry some weight, for he undoubtedly speaks the truth, to the best of his knowledge and belief. — Melbourne Representative of the Sunday Times, Sydney, New South Wales.

WHENCE CAME CHRIST?

BY JOHN E. REMSBURG.

In each of these divinities we find some element or lineament of Christ. And all of them existed, either as myths or mortals, long anterior to his time. Plato, the latest of them to appear, was born in the fifth century B. C. These pagan divinities and deified sages, together with the religious system and doctrines previously noticed, were the sources from which Christ and Christianity were, for the most part, derived.

The following religious elements and ideas, nearly all of which Christians believe to have been divinely revealed, and to belong exclusively to their religion, are of pagan origin:

Son of God, Messiah, Mediator, The World, The Ideal Man, Annunciation, Immaculate Conception, Divine Incarnation, Genealogies showing royal descent, Virgin mother, Angelic visitants, Celestial music, Visit of shepherds, Birth of Christ, Star of Magi, Slaughter of innocents, Temptation, Transfiguration, Crucified redeemer, Supernatural darkness, Resurrection, Ascension, Descent into hell, Second advent, Unity of God, Trinity in Unity, Holy Ghost (Spirit), Devil, Angels, Immortality of the soul, Last Judgment, Future rewards and punishments, Heaven, hell and purgatory, Fatherhood of God, Brotherhood of man, Freedom of the will, Fall of man, Vicarious atonement, Kingdom of God, Binding of Satan, Miracles, Prophecies, Obsession, Exorcism, The priesthood, Pope and bishops, Monks and nuns, Worship of Virgin and Child, Adoration of saints, Worship of relics, Image worship, Inspired Scriptures, The cross as a religious symbol, Crucifix.

Rosary, Holy water, Lord's Day (Sunday), Christmas, Easter, Baptism, Eucharist, Washing of feet, Anointing, Confirmation, Masses for the dead, Fasting, Prayer, Auricular Confession, Penance, Absolution, Celibacy, Poverty, Asceticism, Tithes, Community of goods, Golden Rule and other precepts.

The Old Testament consists largely of borrowed myths. Nearly everything in Genesis, and much of the so-called history which follows, are but a recital of Assyrian, Babylonian, Chaldean and other legends. Dr. Draper says: "From such Assyrian sources, the legends of the creation of the earth and heaven, the garden of Eden, the making of man from clay, and of woman from one of his ribs, the temptation by the serpent, the naming of animals, the cherubim and flaming sword, the deluge and the ark, the drying up of the waters by the wind, the building of the Tower of Babel, and the confusion of tongues, were obtained by Ezra" (Conflict, p. 223).

The ten antediluvian patriarchs, Adam, Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahaleel, Jared, Enoch, Methuselah, Lamech, and Noah, whom Luke presents as the first ten progenitors of Christ, are now known to have been a dynasty of Babylonian kings. Abram, Isaac, Jacob, and Judah, whom both Matthew and Luke declare to have been ancestors of Christ, and whom Matthew places at the head of his genealogy, were not persons at all, but merely tribes of people. In regard to this Rev. Dr. Orr, professor of Oriental languages at Amsterdam, says:

"They do not signify men, so much as groups of nations or single tribes. Abram, for instance, represents a great part of the Terachites; Lot, the Moabites and Ammonites, whose ancestor he is called; Ishmael, certain tribes of Arabia; Isaac, Israel and Edom together; Jacob, Israel alone; while his twelve sons stand for the twelve tribes of Israel. * * * Here and there the writers of the old legend themselves point out, as it were, that the patriarchs whom they bring upon the scene as men are personifications of tribes" (Bible for Learners, Vol. 1, pp. 100-102). Moses, the reputed founder of Judaism and archetype of Christ, doubtless existed; but nearly all the Bible stories concerning him are myths. David and Solomon, from whose house Christ is said to have been descended, are historical characters, but the accounts respecting the greatness of their kingdom and the splendor of their reigns are fabulous.

Christ and Christianity are partly creations and partly evolutions. While the elements composing them were mostly derived from pre-existing and existing beliefs, they were not formed as a novel creation, as a hero and a convention frames a constitution. Their growth was gradual. Jesus, if he existed, was a Jew, and his religion, with a few innovations, was Judaism. With his death, probably, his apotheosis began. During the first century the transformation was slow; but during the succeeding centuries, the rapidity of the change was such that the Jewish elements of his religion were, in time, nearly all eliminated, and the pagan elements, one by one, were incorporated into the new faith.

Regarding the establishment of this religion Lecky says: "Christianity had become the central intellectual power of the world, but it triumphed not so much by superior rival faiths as by absorbing and transforming them. Old systems, old rites, old images were grafted into the new belief, retaining much of their ancient character but assuming new names and a new complexion" (Rationalism, vol. 1, p. 223).

Its origin is thus traced by Mrs. Beeton: "From the later Jews comes the Unity of God; from India and Egypt the Trinity in Unity; from India and Egypt the crucified Redeemer; from India, Egypt, Greece, and Rome, the virgin mother and the divine son; from Egypt its priests and its ritual; from the Essenes and the Therapeutics its asceticism; from Persia, India, and Egypt, its sacraments; from Persia and Babylon its angels and devils; from Alexandria the binding into one of many lines of thought." (Freethinkers' Text Book, p. 322).

Concerning this, Judge Strange, an other English writer, says: "The Jewish Scriptures and the traditional teaching of their doctors, the Essenes and Therapeutics, the Greek philosophers, the Neoplatonism of Alexandria, and the Buddhism of the East, gave ample supplies for the composition of the doctrinal portion of the new faith; the divinely procreated personages of the Grecian and Roman pantheons, the tales of the Egyptian Osiris, and of the Indian Rama, Krishna, and Buddha, furnished the materials for the image of the new Savior of mankind." (Portraiture and Mission of Jesus, p. 27.)

While affirming the divine origin of Christianity, the church historian Mosheim admits its early paganism. He says: "The rites and institutions, by which the Greeks, Romans, and other nations had formerly testified their religious veneration for fictitious deities, were now adopted, with some slight alterations, by Christian bishops, and employed in the service of the true God. * * * Hence it happened that in these times the religion of the Greeks and Romans differed very little in its external appearance from that of the Christians. They had both a most pompous and splendid ritual. Gorgon robes, mitres, tharases, wax-tapers, croziers, processions, lustrations, incense, gold and silver vessels, the use of such circumstances of pageantry, were equally to be seen in the heathen temples and the Christian churches. (Ecclesiastical History, p. 105.)

The creeds of old are dead or dying, and the celestial kings, who seemed so real to their worshippers, are

A Little Pilgrim.

This is a charming narrative illustrating the beauty, grandeur and sublimity of the spirit side of life, the realms of souls, the immortal spheres of existence. Margaret O. W. Oliphant is the author. And while it has been read by millions in the past, it will prove refreshing and soul-inspiring to our readers to again peruse it and feel its thrills of inspiration, and enjoy its uplifting influence.

The little Pilgrim sat very still, wondering at all this. She had thought when a soul left the earth that it went at once to God, and thought of nothing more, except worship and singing of praises. But this was different from her thoughts. She sat and pondered and wondered. She was baffled at many points. She was not changed, as she expected, but so much like herself, still—still perplexed, and feeling herself foolish; not understanding; toiling after a something which she could not grasp. The only difference was that it was no trouble to her now. She smiled at herself and her dullness, feeling sure that by and by she would understand.

"And don't you wonder, too?" she said to her companion, which was a speech such as she used to make upon the earth, when people thought her little remarks disjointed, and did not always see the connection of them. But her friend of heaven knew what she meant.

"I do nothing but wonder," she said, for it is all so natural, not what we thought.

"Is it long since you have been here?" the Pilgrim said.

"I came before you, but how long or how short I cannot tell, for that is not how we count. We count only by what happens to us. And nothing yet has happened to me, except that I have seen our Brother—our mother sees him always. That means she has lived here a long time, and well—"

"Is it possible to live ill—in heaven?" The little Pilgrim's eyes grew large, as if they were going to have tears in them, and a little shadow seemed to come over her. But the other laughed softly, and restored all her confidence.

"I have told you I do not know if it is heaven or not. No one does ill, but some do little, and some do much, just as it used to be. Do you remember in Dante there was a lazy spirit that stayed about the gates and never got further? But perhaps you never read that."

"I was not clever," said the little Pilgrim, wistfully. "No, I never read it. I wish I had known more."

Upon which the beautiful lady kissed her again to give her courage, and said: "It does not matter at all. It all comes to you, whether you have known it or not."

"Then you mother came here long ago?" said the Pilgrim. Ah, then I shall see my mother too."

"Oh, very soon, as soon as she can come; but there are many things to do. Sometimes we can go and meet those who are coming; but it is not always so. I remember that she had a message. She could not leave her business, you may be sure, or she would have been here."

"Then you know my mother? Oh, and my dearest father too?"

"We all know each other," the lady said with a smile.

"And you? did you come to meet me—only out of kindness, though I do not know you?" the little Pilgrim said.

"I am nothing but an idler," said the beautiful lady, "making acquaintance. I am of little use as yet. I was very hard worked before I came here, and they think it well that we should sit in the sun and take a little rest, and find things out."

Then the little Pilgrim sat still and mused, and felt in her heart that she had found many things out. What she had heard had been wonderful, and it was more wonderful still to be sitting here all alone, save for this lady, yet so happy and at ease. She wanted to sing, she was so happy; but remembered that she was old, and had lost her voice; and then remembered again that she was no longer old, and perhaps had found it again. And then it occurred to her to remember how she had learned to sing, and how beautiful her sister's voice was, and how heavenly to hear her, which made her remember that this dear sister would be weeping, not singing, down where she had come from; and immediately the tears stood in her eyes.

"Oh," she said, "I never thought we should cry when we came here. I thought there were no tears in heaven."

"Did you think, then, that we were all turned into stone?" cried the beautiful lady. "It says God shall wipe away all tears from our faces, which is not like saying there are to be no tears."

Upon which the little Pilgrim, glad that it was permitted to be sorry, though she was so happy, allowed herself to think upon the place she had so lately left. And she seemed to see her little room again, with all the pictures hanging as she had left them, and the house darkened, and the dear faces she knew all sad and troubled, and to hear them saying over to each other all the little careless words she had said as they were out of the Scriptures, and crying if any one but mentioned her name, and putting on crape and black dresses, and lamenting as if that which had happened was something very terrible. She cried at this, and yet felt half inclined to laugh, but would not, because it would be disrespectful to those she loved. One thing did not occur to her, and that was little Pilgrim looked up too, with her heart beating, but there was no one. Then she gave a little sigh, and turned and listened again.

"I had not been looking for him, or thinking. You know my mind is too light; I am pleased with whatever is before me. And I was so curious, for my mother had told me many things; when suddenly I caught sight of him passing by. He was going on, and when I saw this a panic seized me, lest he should pass and say nothing. I do not know what I did. I flung myself upon his robe, and got hold of it—or at least I think so. I was in such an agony lest he should pass and never notice me. But that was my folly. He passed. As if that could be!"

"And what did he say to you?" cried the little Pilgrim, her heart almost aching, it beat so high with sympathy and expectation.

The lady looked at her for a little without saying anything.

"I cannot tell you," she said, "any more than I can tell if this is heaven. It is a mystery. When you see him you will know. It will be all you have ever hoped for, and more besides, for he understands everything. He knows what is in our hearts about those we have left, and why he sent for us before them. There is no need to tell him anything; he knows. He will come when it is time; and after you have seen him you will know what to do."

Then the beautiful lady turned her eyes toward the gate, and while the little Pilgrim was still gazing, disappeared from her, and went to comfort some other stranger. They were dear friends—always, and met often, but not again in the same way.

When she was thus left alone again, the little Pilgrim sat still upon the grassy mound, quite tranquil and happy, without wishing to move. There was such a sense of well-being in her, that she liked to sit there and look about her, and breathe the delightful air, like the air of a summer morning, without wishing for anything.

"How idle I am!" she said to herself, in the very words she had often used before she died; but then she was idle from weakness, and now from happiness. She wanted for nothing. To be alive was so sweet. There was a great deal to think about—in what she had heard, but she did not even think about that, only resigned herself to the delight of sitting there in the sweet air and being happy. Many people were coming and going, and they all knew her, and smiled upon her, and those who were at a distance would wave their hands. This did not surprise her at all, for though she was a stranger, she too felt that she knew them all; but that they should be so kind was a delight to her which words could not tell. She sat and mused very sweetly about all that had been told her, and wondered whether she too might go sometimes, and with a kiss and a whisper clear up something that was dark in the mind of some one who loved her. "I that never was clever!" she said to herself, with a smile. And chiefly she thought of a friend whom she loved who was often in great perplexity, and did not know how to guide herself amid the difficulties of the world.

The little Pilgrim half laughed with delight, and then half cried with longing to go, as the beautiful lady had done, and make something clear that had been dark before, to this friend. As she was thinking what a pleasure it would be, some one came up to her, crossing over the flowery greenness, leading the path on purpose. This was a being younger than the lady, who had spoken to her before, with a wing hair all crisped with touches of sunshine, and a dress all white and soft, like the feathers of a white dove. There was something in her face different from that of the other, by which the little Pilgrim knew somehow, without knowing how, that she had come here as a child, and grown up in this celestial place. She was tall and fair, as if along with so musical a motion, as if her foot scarcely touched the ground, that she might have had wings; and the little Pilgrim indeed was not sure she saw a white angel; for she knew that there were angels among the blessed people who were coming and going about, but had not been able yet to find one out.

She knew that this new-comer was coming to her, and turned towards her with a smile and a throb at her heart of expectation. But when the heavenly maiden drew nearer, her face, though it was so fair, looked to the Pilgrim like another face, which she had known very well,—indeed, like the homely and troubled face of the friend of whom she had been thinking.

And so she smiled all the more, and held out her hands and said, "I am sure I know you," upon which the other kissed her and said, "We all know each other; but I have seen you often before you came here, and knelt down by her, among the flowers that were growing, just in front of some tall lilies that grew over her, and made a lovely canopy over her head."

There was something in her face that was like a child; her mouth so soft, as if it had never spoken anything but heavenly words, her eyes brown and golden, as if they were filled with light. She took the little Pilgrim's hands in hers, and held them. These hands had been very thin and worn before, but now, when the Pilgrim looked at them, she saw that they became softer and whiter every moment with the touch of this immortal youth.

SPECIAL THOUGHT CHANNEL. SYMPOSIUM.

The Question Before Spiritualists is this: Can a Spirit dematerialize a white dress, a white hat, a pair of white stockings, a scarf, fan and doll, and convey them to her home in spirit life, and then at will materialize them, and bring them back to earth?

Letter From a Washington Spiritualist.

To the Editor:—A fine demonstration of spirit power took place at Mrs. M. A. Keeler's some time ago. A short time before Christmas Clara Collingwood, Mrs. Keeler's cabinet messenger, expressed a wish for a full outfit of earthly clothing. ONE LADY GOT HER A NICE WHITE HAT, ANOTHER MADE HER A WHITE DRESS; ANOTHER PROVIDED HER WITH A PAIR OF WHITE STOCKINGS; ANOTHER WITH A PAIR OF WHITE SHOES; ANOTHER WITH A NICE WHITE SCARF, FAN AND DOLL. These articles were presented to her for a Christmas present, and were taken away somewhere by the spirit messenger, not one of them being left in the séance room. When inquiry was made, Clara said she took them to her spirit home.

Keeler, who is a spirit photographer, to take her photograph while entranced in the cabinet in the dark. She seated herself in the cabinet, the curtain pulled a little to one side, the camera placed in position, the room made dark, and the photograph was taken. To one side, and in front of Mrs. Keeler, stands Clara Collingwood, the spirit messenger, clothed in her Christmas presents of earthly clothing. I send you the photograph; also a photograph of myself and spirit wife and son, and also one of myself and Spirit Dr. Holland, who controls the materializations, and the face and head of Clara and others supposed to be relatives, and whom I do not recognize.

This demonstration proves to me that spirits can be photographed and that they can take solids to their spirit homes. RUFUS SUMERLIN, Washington, D. C.

THE ABOVE LETTER SPEAKS FOR ITSELF. WHETHER THE MATERIAL GARMENTS OF EARTH CAN BE TRANSPORTED TO SPIRIT LIFE, AND THEN BE RE-MATERIALIZED, AND WORN BY A MORTAL, IS A QUESTION THAT THOSE ONLY WHO CONTRIBUTE TO THIS SYMPOSIUM, MUST DECIDE. HOWEVER, WE DESIRE TO SPEAK OF THE GROSS DECEPTION PRACTICED IN THIS CITY, CARRIED ON BY MATERIALIZING MEDIUMS. THE DECEPTION HAS BEEN MOUNTAIN HIGH. THE FRAUD PRACTICED HAS BEEN OF THE MOST CROOKED, HEARTLESS KIND. THE ACTORS MUST BE CLASSED WITH THE THIEF, WITH THE BOLD-UP MAN, WITH THE VILLAIN CABINET.

AN AWAKENING. A Conscientious Spiritualist of Marked Intelligence, Honesty and Integrity, Relates Some Interesting Details in Connection With Materialization and Dematerialization.—Like Thousands of Others, He Believed in the Spirit's Assertion Until the Deception Was Revealed.

In expressing my views regarding the deception, I have been termed "A Fine Demonstration of Spirit Power," the account of which includes, according to the writer of the circular letter, the dematerialization of a nice white hat, white dress, white shoes, white stockings, and presumably an entire outfit of feminine white attire, and later the materializing of the whole outfit for a very remarkable occasion when a photograph was taken of the medium and of materialized spirits, one of whom was attired in the above-named white apparel, and all photographed in a DARK ROOM, I will remark that Experience is an expensive teacher, but a certain class of mortals can not be taught by any other method; or I might say that people upon a certain plane in their development of knowledge and common horse sense, can not be made to believe other than that "the moon is made of green cheese."

Some writers maintain that it is better not to molest the fools in their folly, but let them pay the price and learn the lesson well while they are about it. Another class of thinkers and writers, who perhaps think not so much about the gullible ones as of the detestable fakers whose necks are so well adapted to the hangman's rope, maintain that such practices as above referred to should be prohibited under a heavy penalty of fine and imprisonment.

Not pausing at this time to choose any method of dealing with such fraudulent practices, as above referred to, I wish to call attention to the teachings which have come to mortals from the spirit realms through the hand of a Petersburg and from a Petersburg, and from other reliable spirit sources, teaching that all living things upon the material plane are permeated with spirit essence, and that it is spirit only which can by any possible means find its way into the spirit realms.

Gross material of earth can never be absorbed into the sphere of spirit, is not only the declaration from the dwellers of spirit spheres but is a statement which will stand the test of reflection by all intelligent thinkers of this they (the spirits) could dematerialize any material article, and so the mortal was encouraged to "try the spirits" with articles of jewelry, all of which were dematerialized (?) in the same manner as the flowers had disappeared, and finally the proposition was made to our gullible friend, by the spirits (?) to become his spirit bankers, stating that if he would deliver to them some gold coins, the more the better, they would dematerialize them and use them as a nucleus for gathering more of that same precious element from the great storehouse of nature, and then materialize gold coins for his use at any time, thus giving him an inexhaustible bank account to draw from for all time to come, and so the compact was formed, the gold coins were delivered to the "dear spirits," and then the awakening came so suddenly that it was a great shock to the mortal. He soon realized that his gold coins were dematerialized. Indeed, he passed on to a higher plane of development. He had learned his lesson and had paid the price. The price was high. It was the price of experience.

I recognize that work of dematerializing the white hat, etc., as work from which the gullible patrons of such shows will sooner or later experience an awakening. H. A. CROSS.

HOW IT WAS DONE.

The Materialization of Garments for Angels, Considered From the Standpoint of a Critical Spiritualist of Anderson, Ind.

That objects may be materialized and dematerialized at the will of the medium seems to be a popular fallacy with many Spiritualists. Replying to the marvelous story contained in the present number of this paper, wherein a lady's suit of clothing was dematerialized and waited to the spirit spheres—yes, to the spirit home of the "spirit messenger," I would call the attention of the reader to some statements contained in the said article.

Now if it can be shown that any particular part of the performance was fraudulent, then it must necessarily follow that it was all fraudulent—in short if it can be clearly demonstrated that the photographer's work was fraudulent, then the conclusion must follow that he was working in collusion with the materializing medium in the deception.

The medium requested the spirit photographer to take her picture "in the dark," and lo, and behold, the "spirit messenger, clad in her Christmas presents of earthly clothing," appeared upon the photographic plate. It was the identical suit made by human hands—made of earthly materials for the use of one whose home was in the spirit world, and which had disappeared from the séance room in such a marvelous manner. But that photograph—that photograph taken in the dark—that is the important thing to be considered at this juncture.

NO PHOTOGRAPH WAS EVER TAKEN IN THE DARK. It is a physical impossibility. To produce a photograph, there MUST BE LIGHT. First, there must be an opaque substance to produce the image upon the lens of the camera. The sensitized plate retains the image, and from which the image, or picture is printed.

The very fact that the "room was made dark" at the time is sufficient evidence that no picture was taken. But no doubt some credulous friend will maintain that "lighting is possible in the séance room," out when we fully realize that nothing contrary to natural law ever occurs—that miracles are not wrought in the séance room or anywhere else—that there never were any miracles, for—matter, then we must be compelled to this conclusion, that the picture showing the spirit clad in earthly garments had been taken at some time prior to the séance named; that the subject was the medium or some one else in the flesh who had dressed herself in the garments just mentioned, and therefore the deception was perpetrated jointly by the mediums named.

This must be the conclusion of all who view the case from a rational standpoint. When all must know that WITHOUT LIGHT it would be utterly impossible to photograph a spirit, or anyone else, or anything, in fact, then it would seem strange, indeed, that anyone competent to reason from cause to effect could arrive at any other conclusion than the one indicated in this article. I don't think they will.

A word concerning those garments: THEY WERE SPIRITED AWAY, and then returned through the process of re-materialization. What! Materialize shoes and stockings and dresses? Is this a fact to be accepted as a part of our Spiritualism? Let us see: If dry goods could be materialized, why wouldn't it be an easier process to materialize the greenbacks with which to purchase the dry goods?

I am personally acquainted with some good Spiritualists who prize very highly various and sundry scraps of lace materialized for them in séances, similar to the one under discussion. I sometimes wish that the thing could be done. Imagine how easy it might be to provide suffering humanity with the comforts of life. . . . But I should certainly be in favor of the paper money idea in preference to lace and clothing, for obvious reasons. Such stories, bearing upon their faces the evidences of deception in such a manner as to leave no doubt in the mind of any thinking, rational being as to their mythical character, have done much to retard the growth of genuine Spiritualism. Those who report these marvelous performances are undoubtedly sincere—actually believe that a spirit form could be photographed in a dark room, and would emphatically disclaim any faith whatever in so-called modern miracles; and yet that is just what a photograph taken in the dark would be—a miracle pure and simple. It can not be done.

But when it comes to materializing ready-to-wear garments, Col. Mulberry Sellers, that over-sanguine character in Mark Train's "American Claimant," has them double discounted. Sellers, it will be recalled, had been converted to the claims of materializing mediums and forthwith became exceedingly enthusiastic over the possibilities of materialization. He would save millions of dollars to the people. He would materialize the "dead armies of the past" to take the place of our present army. Nothing to pay for food or clothing! The soldiers in the flesh could go home and go to work and the whole world would thereby become so prosperous that no man would need to work more than three hours a day! Growing more enthusiastic, the Colonel exclaimed: "Imagine, gentlemen, what could be saved to every municipality—a policeman on every corner and not a cent to pay. When more are needed just materialize them and put them in the harness!"

Now, it is needless to add that Mark Twain got his inspiration for this burlesque on Spiritualism from the reports of materializing seances given by fake mediums.

The fake medium lives upon the credulity of his fellow being; this same credulity that made priestcraft possible in all the ages of the world. The world has been humbugged from time immemorial. The bunco man is ever with us to separate us from our money. His scheme may be along financial lines, where we are to reap large dividends from small investments, or it may be a ghost show—but the principle is the same.

It was a beautiful sentiment that prompted the gift of that wearing apparel to that spirit messenger, and pleasurable indeed must have been the thoughts of the donors when they contemplated the joy that was felt in the spirit household upon receipt of those earth-made garments fresh from the hands of their loved ones of earth! Yes, it was a beautiful sentiment, but the angels didn't get the clothes—that's the sad part of it! And for aught you may know those earthly garments may still be doing materializing stunts for some fake medium. Still worse.

But now that you are able to see how these mediums managed to secure some very desirable togs for cabinet work, for nothing—yes, were even paid for accepting these garments, we feel quite sure that you will not be so ready in the future to regard the statement of a medium as an absolute truth, who may claim to be able to export dry goods to the spirit world in the twinkling of an eye. TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF "The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED. A careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity is the normal tendency; the Bible doctrine of angel ministry, the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all clearly and fully explained. The Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, are expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST. A comparison of Spiritualism and Modern Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

The Bishop Sustained by the Bible.

No idea in regard to man's future was more earnestly taught by Jesus, according to the New Testament as authority, than that compensation for good works is not contingent on the time spent in service, or of the good accomplished. The servant commencing labor in the vineyard, which the Teacher declared was likened to the kingdom of heaven, at the third hour, 9 o'clock, received the same wage as he who commenced at the eleventh hour, 5 o'clock. See Matthew 20:1 to 18. The teller who had spent a long day in service complained; but he was told, verse 14, "I will give unto this last even as unto thee," though he had served but one hour to the twelfth, or, as we reckon time to 6 o'clock. Then it almost seems as if insult was added to injury, verse 18, "So the last shall be first and the first last." The colored bishop who is reported in a Southern paper, cited by C. W. Clark, in his communication appearing on the second page, sixth column, of our issue of January 6, seems to be sustained by good Bible authority:

"But through His death and resurrection we may commit sins of lying, stealing, Sabbath-breaking, getting drunk, gambling, murder and every species of villainy, and then come to God through our resurrected Christ and enter heaven in the end."

This seems very pernicious teaching; but, certainly, it is not only in harmony with holy writ, but it is illustrated in Catholic practice. The culprit, after a long life spent in crime, is convicted of murder, and is about to pay the penalty for his crime. The priest comes to his relief; he is shrived, given absolution, and swings from the gallows to glory, imitating the thief on the cross, who, for only believing Jesus was the Christ, was told: "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise."

Fraud mediums, here is your opportunity; but, please remember, it is not Spiritualism; on the contrary every offender must pay the last farthing, and there is no escape by forgiveness, nor by vicarious suffering. We have no Jesus to answer for your wrongs.

What Was He Thinking?

It would be a pleasure to know what that old German scholar, Mosheim, the author of that very reliable work, "Ecclesiastical History, Ancient and Modern," had in mind when he wrote:

"One thing, indeed, appears at first sight very remarkable—that the variety of religions and gods in the heathen world, neither produced wars nor dissensions among the different nations."

Had Jesus' words, "I came not to bring peace, but a sword," just revolved in Mosheim's mind? And did he think of all the wars waged "for Christ's sake," from the time Jesus' words were uttered, down to the period he wrote, some one hundred and fifty years ago? And did the unnumbered millions slain in consequence of those prophetic words pass in review before him?

Rough on "The Guiding Star."

George Clark, aged 60, of Detroit, who committed suicide not long ago, wrote, a letter, found in his own hand written on his body, in words following: "My life has been a complete failure, and I lay it all to the Bible. I have read it through a great many times, and have tried to live up to its teachings. If I had never seen the Bible I would be a healthy, prosperous man to-day. The Bible is the biggest humbug book ever written. If you don't stop reading the Bible you will fall in your plans."

The poor fellow followed bad teaching too long, hence a suicide's fate. Said an exchange, in publishing the quotation:

"The Bible opens two roads to the student. He may follow its economic teachings and go to the poor-house, or its moral precepts and land in the penitentiary."

Yes, and if he becomes a disciple of Jesus, he must HATE his own life—Luke 14:26—which is the stepping-stone to a suicide's grave.

Mediocrity is all-powerful because it almost always has the majority in its support.—B. G. Richards.

BUDDHISM.

Was It the Parent of Christianity?—A Very Striking Parallel.

Only expressions of gratification and delight come from readers of our issue of January 20. The address of the lamented Col. Ingersoll was highly appreciated, as was that of Mrs. Richmond and Mrs. Longley. Even the editorials were complimented; but the greatest satisfaction was expressed at Baron Hickey's splendid presentation of the parallels between Christianity and Buddhism.

That such a person as Gautama Buddha lived and taught in India no one of common intelligence denies. He was born some 550 years before our era. His teaching, other than the doctrine of HATE, was substantially that of Christianity. There are ancient records, recovered from the tops, otherwise shrines, or temples, dedicated to his memory, which were closed and sealed near two and a half thousand years ago, which tell of his doings. At the period ascribed to Jesus, Buddhism was the prevailing religion in Hindustan. Inscriptions on rocks and temples, still well preserved, tell how greatly this teacher of peace was everywhere adored. No blood was shed to propagate his faith; no wars were engendered on his account.

When Alexander the Great overran Asia in quest of empire, three hundred and twenty-seven years before our era, he encountered disciples of Buddha, and his biographer relates events connected with that people. A little before the middle of the 3rd century of our common era Asoka, the grandson of Chandragupta, a powerful king of India, adopted the creed of Buddha. Rev. John P. Mahaffy, D. D., in his "Story of Alexander's Empire," p. 140 says: "This was probably as great an event as the adoption of Christianity by Constantine." Then he says:

"This great king's influence gave free scope to the missionary spirit of the Buddhist priests, and we are told in his [rock] inscriptions their apostles reached into the kingdoms of Greece. . . . We may take it as probable Buddhist missionaries preached in Syria two centuries before the teaching of Christ was heard in Northern Palestine."

The good preacher and author was too cautious with his "probables." The Encyclopedia Britannica, Vol. 12, p. 784, says:

"Asoka is said to have supported 64,000 Buddhist priests. He founded many religious houses, and his kingdom is called the Land of Monasteries. He did not add to the number of monks, but for Christianity, he organized it on the basis of a state religion."

So early as 244 B. C. Asoka convened the first Buddhist council of 1,000 elders. The heresies that had crept into the faith were then corrected, and Asoka published by edict the grand principles of the faith. Says Ency. Britannica, p. 784:

"Such edicts are still found graven deep upon pillars, in caves, and on rocks, from the Yusufat valley beyond Peshawar to the northwestern frontier, through the heart of Hindustan, to Kathawar and the Central Provinces on the south, and Orissa on the east. Tradition says, Asoka set up 64,000 memorial columns or tope; and the thirty inscriptions extant in our own day show how widely these royal sermons were spread over India."

We need not multiply quotations, of which we have enough for a volume. It is a fact, all Phoenicia, which includes what is now known as Palestine, was overrun by Buddhist missionaries; they passed on into Egypt, and the first monasteries erected there were founded by Buddhist monks. They overran Asia Minor, and left enduring traces of their religion in all the provinces. They crossed the Hellespont, and indoctrinated Greece. Through Roman intercourse with Egypt, Phoenicia and Greece the faith impinged on that empire.

This writer solemnly believes the so-called Council of Nice, pretentiously convened by Constantine, whose records it is claimed were lost, was only Look on All Sides of "Hindrances." Whatever the subject is, examine it from every point of view. We know that Spirit Return is true, having from a boy up, seen spirits, had visions and prophetic dreams; but our knowledge is of little value to those who have not had a like experience; they must perhaps pursue a different line of investigation. Dr. J. K. Funk in the course of his strenuous exertion to find the exact truth has met what he designates as HINDRANCES.

Through one of the best mediums he ever met he was told that the spirit of Theodore Parker wished him to do a certain thing. This was explicit. Three days after, he was with another equally famous medium whom he believed, and still believes to be honest. Theodore Parker reported himself as present, but DENIED ALL KNOWLEDGE OF THE PREVIOUS INTERVIEW.

saying that he was not there and had said nothing of the kind. Since then Mr. Funk has had "Theodore Parker" at a dozen seances through different mediums, and has not yet been able to get him to recognize any previous interview that he had with him.

Never once in a clearly marked way, has he, in an interview with a second medium, had described with anything approaching exactness, a previous interview.

Then Mr. Funk points out a second class of HINDRANCES:

He has sought in many ways and very often in vain to bring harmony out of the personal experiences of spirits in the spirit land.

Through one medium of remarkable power and, to his mind, of unqualified honesty, a spirit described to him with great particularity his trip to the planet Mars. He described the inhabitants, their civilization, far in advance of a reflex of Asoka's Council, held 244 B. C.; that at the General Councils, Laodicea among them, are precisely antitheses since the crusades; and now, good Christian reader, doff your hat and listen:

It was shown by Baron Hickey, in his address published in these columns two weeks ago, that the Essenes of Palestine, and the Therapeutae of Egypt, who lived such exemplary lives, mentioned by Josephus and Eusebius, were followers of this Indian Savior, the Buddha, or, in English, the Wise, as the word Buddha means.

Now we don't care for our present purpose, whether Josephus was written A. D. 90, and Eusebius A. D. 324, or, as is more probable, after the Renaissance, say the beginning of the 16th century. Both works are found in every well-educated clergyman's library, and are received as authority.

Good reader, have we your attention? We want it all.

We hold in our hand as we write, a copy of "Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History," translated from the original by Rev. C. F. Cruse, M. A., Assistant Professor in the University of Pennsylvania; published in 1839 for the Methodist Episcopal Church at the conference office, 200 Mulberry street. Can we cite better orthodox authority? Take the nicely bound, closely printed, and well-preserved book in your hand, open to pages 67, 68 and 69, and read aloud for our delectation. Eusebius is discoursing on the Therapeutae, who, according to him, in Egypt, in each of its districts, and particularly about Alexandria. He has told of the habits of those Therapeutae, as related by Philo the Jew, and now, near the top of page 68:

"These facts appear to have been stated by a man who, at least, had paid attention to those who have expounded the sacred writings. But it is highly probable, that the ancient commentators which he [Philo] says they have ARE THE VERY GOSPELS AND WRITINGS OF THE APOSTLES, and probably some expositions of the ANCIENT PROPHETS SUCH AS ARE CONTAINED IN THE EPISTLES TO THE HEBREWS, AND MANY OTHER OF ST. PAUL'S EPISTLES."

We are reluctant to consume space or we would quote a page and a half in continuation, showing the action of those Therapeutae, but we cannot omit this, from page 69:

"Why should we add to these their meetings, and the separate abodes of the monks and the women in the mountains, and the exercises performed by them, which are still in vogue among us at the present day, and which, especially at the present day, are the FESTIVAL OF OUR SAVIOR'S PASSION, we are accustomed to pass in fasting and watching, and in the study of the divine word? All these things the above mentioned author has accurately described and stated in his writings, and are the same customs that are observed by us alone at the present day, particularly the vigils of the Great Festivals [Christmas among them], and the hymns that are commonly recited among us."

Stand back, under! Something is about to drop! Here is the oldest Christian Ecclesiastical Historian, showing that every feature of Christianity, even the "festival of our Savior's passion," was related by Philo Judaeus, who lived and wrote before the alleged birth of Jesus, and was practiced by the Therapeutae of Egypt.

Baron Hickey's closing words, mere sop, to placate Christian criticism, like similar words by the author of "The First Two Hundred Years of Christianity," in his closing inquiry: "What have we left," betray an effort to gain applause where applause is not due.

Catholicism led in the effort to suppress facts, first, by the destruction of all the great libraries; second, by prohibiting with severe penalties the reading of proscribed books, followed with its Index Expurgatorius, which prohibits the reading of all books therein named, because they militate against the church. Protestants have been almost as bitter in their efforts to prevent the reading of books exposing the errors of their faith.

A new age is on us. The press, free and untrammelled, the truth must come to the front, and falsehood will retire from the field, crushed by its own exaggerated fabrications.

ours; the fauna, the flora, with great particularity—all this from personal observation. Some time afterwards, through another medium equally credible, another spirit told him of his (the spirit's) trip to Mars, telling him that he found it wholly UNINHABITED AND PRACTICALLY DESTITUTE OF ANIMAL AND VEGETABLE LIFE.

Some spirits assure him that there are an abundance of animals and flowers and trees galore on all the spirit plateaus connected with the earth; others tell him there are none. Some tell him they have their hospitals, and schools, and churches; others the reverse. Some tell him no one in the spirit realm believes in what we here call God; others that He is preached in and believed in far more there than here.

He inquired of a spirit concerning Mr. C., a friend whom both the spirit and he knew very well, but from whom he had not heard for years. He assured him that the man had "passed over," and "at this moment is with me and desires me to thank you for remembering him." Shortly afterwards, through another medium, Mr. Funk was placed in communication with another mutual friend, and was told that Mr. S. "is still in the flesh, and only yesterday I was with him and helped him in some of his plans."

Mr. Funk could have gone on almost indefinitely and made out an exhibit of contradictions that would have been startlingly true, and which would have constituted a perplexing problem to anyone who desired a satisfactory solution, and yet the truth of Spirit Return has been established again and again, until the evidence is piled mountain high, one little fragment thereof being the appearance of a spirit one evening

THE TEMPTATION OF BUDDHA AND CHRIST

Orders for our Special edition, containing Col. Ingersoll's remarkable lecture on "The Devil," are coming in one CONSTANT STREAM. But Col. Ingersoll's lecture is not the most important feature. The article by BARON HADEN HICKEY, describing the PARALLEL LINES BETWEEN BUDDHIST AND CHRISTIAN STORIES, is especially valuable to every reflective mind; so are the lectures given by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Mrs. M. T. Longley, and Judge North. The suggestive poems by Dr. Williams and Joseph Bert Smiley, on St. Peter, are immortal. Everything in this special issue will attract world-wide attention. One cent per copy. No order received for less than ten copies. One and two-cent stamps can accompany the order.

KELLAR SCORED FOR IMPUTING FRAUD.

Magician's Claim That Manifestations and Communications With the Departed Are Tricks He Can Duplicate Is Denounced by Hudson Tuttle in the Chicago Record-Herald.

To the Editor:—In the Sunday Record-Herald for December 17, a page with vivid illustrations was given to an interview with Kellar, the magician. He has deluded the public for so long a time—forty years—that he believes everything bordering on the supernatural to be of the same nature as his tricks, and thus accounts for spiritual phenomena.

There is no doubt that his performances are tricks, as are all those of the false class to which he belongs; but when he asserts that all manifestations of Spiritualism are similar exhibits of deception on the one hand and credulity on the other does he in his lengthy talk give more than assertion? His wife deceived him by rapping, and he deceived Edwin Booth with "the table lifting trick," therefore all those who give these manifestations are tricksters!

If he should pass a counterfeit coin on a trusting friend would he conclude that he had proved there are no genuine?

I have more directly the charge made by Kellar against Spiritualism to answer, but in passing I mention his explanation of the performances of the jugglers of India. These may be all deceivers, but does he prove them to be? He says these fakirs always wear long, flowing robes, under which they conceal the boy in the basket, the cobra and plants which they use in their work.

I have learned from several eyewitnesses that many of these fakirs have no more than the slightest clothing, with bare arms and limbs, and absolutely nothing to conceal accessories. This is the testimony of Dr. Peebles, who visited India for the special purpose of studying the occult and to become intimately acquainted with the higher class of wonder-workers.

KELLAR AND HINDU TRICKS.

Kellar says: "Concerning the 'disappearance' trick, the Hindus, I never saw it done. The man who saw it was always somewhere else."

If he wants to see a man who saw it, Dr. Peebles is the man. He not only saw the "disappearance" trick, but also the planting of the seed and growth of the mango tree. Not a little shrub or pineapple, but a large, vigorous tree loaded with fruit. This he does not try to explain, but he demolishes the theory of Kellar by observing that the fakirs stood in the middle of a large court, surrounded by a crowd of spectators, clad in the usual scanty garments. There was no opportunity for concealment of assistants or paraphernalia.

The one question on which the value of Kellar's assertions rests is this: Are his tricks identical with what are called spiritual manifestations? He presents no proof that they are, and complacently seems to think his assertion settles the matter. If his word is to be taken as evidence, it must be, it must be above criticism or reproach. Let us see if this is the case.

Last year he was interviewed by a writer for a magazine. He said he attended the meeting of the Assembly of Light at Cassadaga, N. Y., the leading camp meeting of the Spiritualists, which has an average attendance of several thousand. There he "denounced the whole business as a fraud and was publicly challenged to explain the manifestations." He gave a public seance telling a prominent Catholic priest that his (the spirit's) daughter, lying in a coffin in one of the rooms of the church, was not dead, and urgently requesting him to bring her to his room and resuscitate her. Early the next morning he did as requested, and succeeded in bringing her back to life.

THE LATE DR. HODGSON.

His Exposure of the Tricks of Madame Blavatsky.

Dr. Hodgson was a native of Australia, having been born in Melbourne in 1855. Early in life he gained a reputation as an investigator into Spiritualistic and psychical phenomena, and from 1887 he was connected with the Society for Psychical Research, eventually becoming head of the American branch.

In 1885 he was sent to India to look up Madame Blavatsky and her wonderful doings with the Mahatmas. The very first thing he found upon his arrival in India was a series of letters alleged to have been written by Mme. Blavatsky, in which she had been telling him of her trip to the planet Mars, and of her discovery of the inhabitants, their civilization, far in advance of

Dr. Hodgson declared that the letters had really been written by Mme. Blavatsky. Handwriting experts backed him up. The Theosophists said they were forgeries. Dr. Hodgson went further. He examined every one of the alleged miracles. He proved her Hindu associates to be her accomplices. He showed the ordinary mechanical appli-

"to the wonderment and confusion of the Spiritualists, who were completely stumped."

The reliability to be placed in the assertions of Kellar may be learned from the published reply of A. Gaston, president of the association, a widely known man of business and a representative, that Kellar had never openly visited Cassadaga, had never given a performance or been challenged. The constant attendance at the assembly had never seen the magician on the grounds. If he was not at Cassadaga, as he claims to have been, gave no seance or received no challenge, what value shall be given to his confidence?

When he says, "The work of the Fox Sisters was so ordinary we could not use it; spirit devices are usually clumsy," he talks without understanding his subject. The Fox Sisters may have done ordinary work, but it was of such character that all the "magicians" that ever existed could not duplicate it. They would not use it because they could not. They might produce an imitation of the rappings, but not the intelligent back of the rappings, which identifies itself as the departed ones whom it claims to be.

Mediums have no "devices" nor appliances unless it be a "cabinet," used only in one phase, and for that not necessary. In this is the marked difference between them and the fakirs, who prepare for every trick and can do anything if there is the least disarrangement in their appliances.

SCIENTISTS QUOTED AS PROOF.

The reader will remark that Kellar does not make any explanation other than fraud. The believers are deceived just as he deceives his audience. Those unacquainted with the seances conducted by Spiritualists may accept his words, but those who are well taught at their absurdity. Spiritualists are among the first to detect fraud and deception and recognize the true from the false. They will readily admit that the phenomena can be imitated, but the imitation falls so far short of the real that the trained observer cannot be deceived.

Kellar declares that "there is no such thing as physical manifestations of Spiritualism."

A score, at least, of men eminent in the walks of physical science, who are recognized authorities in their respective departments, have investigated these physical manifestations and have become convinced that they are produced by spirits of the departed, and affirm that spirits can thus communicate with mortals. The Society for Psychical Research in England and America, composed of leading men of science, after twenty-two years of investigation, have reached the conclusion that the soul of man lives after death and can be communicated with.

Professor W. T. Barrett of the Royal Society, Edward F. Bennett, assistant secretary; Dr. Hodgson, Professor F. W. H. Myers, Professor James of Harvard, Professor Hyslop of Columbia, Oliver Lodge, Sir William Crookes, Professor Varley, electrician to the Atlantic Telegraph, A. R. Wallace, who with Darwin, divides the matter of discovering the theory of evolution—these are a few of the long list of names of those who have given years of research to this subject and come to the mature conclusion that the manifestations are of spiritual origin.

The conclusions of these eminent men, based on the rigid observation of facts, is opposed to the assertion of the great magician.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

ances which she had used to perform her miracles exactly like those used in the arts of the conjurer.

Shrines that delivered letters from the Mahatmas in Tibet were proved to have concealed trap doors. Dr. Hodgson found the Coulombs and they repeated for his benefit some of the "miracles" which had been worked by Mme. Blavatsky. They showed how letters from the "adepts" might be dropped from the air by the simple use of cotton thread and a convenient beam in the ceiling.

Dr. Hodgson showed how Colonel Ocott, one of Mme. Blavatsky's first American dupes, had been fooled. He had found a pair of fine lacquered vases within a cabinet previously empty. Dr. Hodgson produced the receipt for the vases delivered to Mme. Coulomb. As a result of Dr. Hodgson's researches the Society for Psychical Research passed resolutions declaring Mme. Blavatsky an impostor and Theosophy a fraud.

And this is the very same man who declared his belief in Mrs. Piper and made arrangements to communicate with the living after his death.

Will he speak? If so, to whom and when? Will it be to Professor Hyslop first of all? If not, how will the dead psychist make it known, if ever he does—that his spirit still lives?

A time is near at hand when our museums, our art galleries, our cathedrals, churches, and chapels will be open on the Sabbath for intellectual development and elevating music set to healthy words.—Frederick Hovenden.

If anyone says that consciousness cannot exist except in the relation of cause and effect with certain organic molecules, I must ask him how he knows that. And if he says that I can, I must ask him the same question.—Huxley.

H. A. CROSS, Sec'y.

Illinois State Spiritualists Association.

Proposed Amendment to the Constitution reads as follows:

Art. IV, Sec. II.—Individuals who are Spiritualists, resident in this state, and not connected with any other society auxiliary to this association, may become members of this association upon making application in due form, accompanied by the sum of one dollar, and pledging compliance with its Constitution and By-laws, provided they are accepted by a majority vote of the active members present at an annual meeting of the association, or by a majority vote of the official board at any of its meetings when the association is not assembled. The payment each year thereafter of one dollar to the secretary of the association, shall constitute their rights of membership in the association.

A Great Upheaval!

Never before in the whole history of Spiritualism has there been such an upheaval in our ranks as now. Never before has the attention of Spiritualists been directed towards The Progressive Thinker to such a great extent as at present. They look to it as the great exponent of a living vital truth. They know it is the only Spiritualist paper on earth today that dares lift the curtain on the frauds that infest our ranks, and show our people the difference between Legerdemain Spiritualism and that which is genuine. From the North, South, East and West subscriptions are pouring in, and from all sides comes the cry: "Give us light on the dark cabinet with its artificial toggery, its legerdemain, its lightning change artist, its ghostly wigs, beards, illuminated gowns, etc."

That is just what we are now doing. So send in your subscriptions at once. The Tidal Wave is on. Keep it in the ascendancy. TRUTH PROMOTES a cause; ERROR INJURES it, or totally destroys it. One Brother living at Ft. Worth, Texas, sends in one hundred and eighty yearly subscribers; another, H. E. Russegue of Hartford, Ct., sends eight; others too numerous to mention, send in from two to five, and all combined make a vital Tidal Wave. Remember, the Curtain is SOON TO RISE on the Dark Cabinet, disclosing its contents, whether of truth or falsehood.

Discouraging Information.

The revival season is now raging, and the evangelists are reaping their harvest. It opens each year soon after the holidays, and the operators spurge until the resumption of business in the spring. Our Rev. Billy Sunday, at last advice, was holding forth at Freeport.

We learn from the Rockford Morning Star that Evangelist C. Fenwick Reed, of Terre Haute, Ind., is stirring up the faithful in our suburban Forest City. He starts in rather roughly, but it was probably necessary to infuse new life in the church. The Star reports him as proclaiming:

"Hell is full of church members." He continues with, "There are lots of church members that don't want to go to revival meetings on account of having their feelings worked upon, but will go to the theater and pay 75 cents to have the emotional side of their natures stimulated." He said: "If church members would get right they could stir up northern Illinois, and a shaken Rock River Conference." He gave notice that "Sunday morning he would be on dress parade," which we suppose means all his hypnotic powers will be exerted to psychologize those who are susceptible to mental impressions. The Plinks have just been in that town, and, as is their custom, they have laid a good foundation for their religious mountebanks, the subjects of the one being good victims for the other.

"Hell full and slopping over with church members" is discouraging information to those who hoped to escape the monotony of eternal psalm-singing with the disciples of "hate" in heaven.

GET IN TOUCH WITH A BABY

If your life is getting drouthy and the days seem dreary and gloomy through each week and month and year, if your heart is getting callous and your spirit getting sour, Get in touch with some sweet baby and just love it every hour.

If the wrinkles on your visage, that so plainly tell of age, seem to haunt you with the coming till you feel all in a rage; if you feel your strength is failing and your mind is losing power, Get in touch with some sweet baby and just love it every hour.

If the light of life is fading and you seem just as if you were dying on, Only waiting the landing for the coming day to dawn, Only watching in impatience for a signal from the tower, Get in touch with some sweet baby and just love it every hour.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE N. S. A.

He Gives a Lucid Explanation of Important Matters Pertaining to the Cause.

"What is Religion? Matthew Arnold says: 'Religion is morality touched with emotion.' Francis Ellingwood Abbott says: 'Religion is man's effort to perfect himself.' Thomas Carlyle says: 'Religion is labor.' Again he declares, 'Work is worship.' Once more, 'Blessed is he who has found his work.' If Carlyle is right, then every man who honestly toils with hands or brain is a worshiper—a religious being. Even Channing Severance, Brother Hollingsworth, Brother Ambler, Brother Pomeroy, and that indefatigable worker, Mrs. Clara Watson are engaged in daily worship and are full of pure religion, if Carlyle's definition holds good."

Permit me to correct the statement recently made by one of your correspondents with regard to the ordination of R. E. Coon of Oregon. Brother Coon was ordained by the Clackamas County Religious Association, organized and incorporated under the laws of Oregon, with full power to act in such cases. The official board of that association voted to ordain R. E. Coon to the ministry of Spiritualism, and elected Rev. Harry J. Moore to perform the ordination ceremony. Rev. G. C. Love was appointed to give "the right hand of fellowship," while I was directed to deliver the "charge to the candidate." These several offices were filled by the parties named, yet Mr. Coon was ordained by the society, and not by the three persons, either individually or collectively.

The N. S. A. ordains no one to the ministry of Spiritualism. It never has done so, and I hope it never will. In its constitution and by-laws it distinctly declares the above fact, and delegates all ordinations to state associations, where they properly belong. At certain places, I have assisted in ordination services, but always under instructions from the society conferring the rite, and never as an officer of the N. S. A. A record of the vote by which I have been invited to assist in the services is always made, and I have uniformly asked if it has been done before I take the post assigned me.

PRESIDENT BARRETT'S BELIEF.

From certain personal letters, and from quite a number of recently published paragraphs anent myself, I notice that my religious belief has been questioned. Well, my friends, I did not think there could be any serious doubt with regard to the matter, in view of my well-known relation to the movement as a whole, but perhaps a restatement of my position is necessary in view of recent developments in the field of spiritual thought. Aside from my being an officer of the N. S. A., no one can have any interest in my personal opinions upon any question.

TRUTH MOVING ALONG ONE LINE.

Really, what do I believe? Let me see: I once gave an address upon the subject, "The Soul in Action," in a Universalist church, at which the minister and a score of members of his society were present. At the close, he and they told me that I must be a Universalist, because I had given such a good Universalist sermon!

On one occasion, I spoke upon a Spiritualistic subject in a Unitarian church, only to be told at the close that I must be a Unitarian because I had given an address directly in line with the tenets of Unitarianism. At another point, I spoke in an orthodox congregational church upon the subject, "What Is Spiritualism?" The minister and many of his people were present, and I was informed by them that I was a good Congregationalist! Still again, I spoke in a Methodist church, only to be told that I was a good Methodist. On yet other occasions, I have spoken in halls where Theosophists, New Thoughtists, Metaphysicians, Christian Scientists, and Free-Religionists honored me with their presence, to be told by them that I was in full accord with their views and could be counted as one of them. So it has been all over the Union. Does it follow because of all of these claims and declarations that I am a member of any one of these denominations? Does it not rather prove the oneness of truth, and the unity of thought of all rationalists upon the essentials of pure religion? Labels of themselves count for nothing; but the principles of the movements which they name rest upon certain fractions of truth, hence are worthy of careful study on the part of all who claim to be thinkers.

THE FINDING OF TRUTH.

I admit that I find much in Buddhism, Mohammedanism, Parseeism and Babism, to interest and instruct me. Am I therefore to be labeled with those terms? So far as these and all other religious movements contain truth, I am one of and with them.

"Eclectic!"
Perhaps!
"Polyglot!"
Possibly!

One thing is certain, I AM A TRUTH SEEKER AT ALL TIMES! I HAVE NEVER FOUND THE ALL OF TRUTH INVOLVED IN ANY ONE SYSTEM OF RELIGION—NOT EVEN SPIRITUALISM. I have always held, and still hold, that Spiritualism should be large enough to take in every expression of truth. To do this, it must become universal in its nature, otherwise it will have to take its place as one of the rush-lights along the pathway of human progress, giving only a feeble ray from the great truth center, whereas it should be the sun from which all truth rays emanate.

If Spiritualism stands for the Universal, if it means the involution of all truth, and its evolution into such finite expressions as meet the needs of the human race, then I am a Spiritualist. Short of this position, I am a Spiritualist with a proviso, i. e., that I be permitted to tell what Spiritualism means to me.

THE TERM SPIRITUALIST GOOD ENOUGH.

Suffice it to say that the term "Spiritualist" has been good enough for me for over a quarter of a century. In all that time, I have never been ashamed of true Spiritualism, nor have I ever denied its glorious truths. I have iterated and reiterated the statement that whatever is true in other expressions of religion is likewise true in Spiritualism. I hold, as I have heretofore said, that it is a great world religion, having much in common with all ethnic religions, yet superior to them because of its demonstrations of truth through spiritual revelation.

Let me say here, however, that I have been humiliated by much that passes under the name of Spiritualism, and been made to blush for its sorry appearance before the world by reason of some of its so-called advocates. I cannot condone counterfeiting in mediumship, nor do I believe that apostasy and vensality should be made badges of honor for those who occupy our platforms. But, beyond all these things, I can see with the eye of the soul, and feel assured of the ultimate triumph of Spiritualism—at least, of its great essential truths. I love the name of Spiritualism, and should be loth to see it discarded, yet the victory for truth is always great and glorious even if it be won under other flags.

Fraud, apostasy, falsehood, denunciation and personal abuse cannot turn me away from Spiritualism. I can say in my soul, "These things do not move me," and go on with my work. When questioned by press, pulpit and court, I have the right to define Spiritualism for myself, as Oliver Johnson did when called as a witness in the famous Beecher-Tilton trial. "Are you a Spiritualist, Mr. Johnson?" queried the lawyer. "Yes," was the quickly spoken reply, "but I am not a fool!"

I wish there were more Oliver Johnsons. There would be much more respect accorded to Spiritualism as a movement, and fewer attempts made to "rend the veil" by the exploitation of fraud, chicanery and humbug of any kind. The money squandered in the publication of utterly worthless trash, purporting to emanate from the "spirit world," would be applied to worthy ends, and the innocent victims of unprincipled rogues would be protected both from these knaves and from themselves.

HOLDS TENACIOUSLY TO GENUINE PHENOMENA.

It seems like trespassing to attempt to present any remarks upon this subject. Despite my oft repeated affirmations that I cling tenaciously to genuine phenomena, I am again accused of having discarded them all and repudiated mediumship. This accusation forces me to again declare that I hold to every genuine phenomenon offered in the name of Spiritualism. I want it understood that I emphasize that word: genuine. I want no simulations, no counterfeiting, no mountebankism in mine. I also accept, as scientifically proven, the declaration of Andrew Jackson Davis that there are forty-five or forty-eight forms of mediumship. I hold to every one of these, and I have no apology to make for viewing with suspicion those forms concerning which Davis is so significantly silent. I WANT PHENOMENA—PLENTY ON THEM—FRESH AS THE SPARKLING WATER FROM LIFER'S PERENNIAL SPRING—BUT I WANT THEM ALSO TO BE AS PURE AND AS WHOLESOME AS THAT WATER!

I honor and cherish mediumship; no man in our ranks has more respect for an honest medium than myself. I have never attacked a medium in my life, but I have had just a few words to say against the counterfeiters, and I expect to keep right on doing so, whenever occasion requires it. My honest critics, my sincere opponents, my fraudulent friends, please remember what I have said above, and quote me correctly hereafter.

RELIGION DEFINED AND ILLUSTRATED.

Prof. J. S. Loveland's recent articles touching this important topic are full of instruction. I do not refer to this question in any controversial spirit, because I do not know as there is any essential difference between the "Sage of Los Angeles" and myself. He seems to accept the definition given by the Apostle James as being perfectly satisfactory to him, summing up his remarks in these significant words: "Service to humanity, and a pure moral character." Can any honest man take exception to that definition of religion? I feel that Prof. Loveland has most ably set forth the fact that Spiritualism is a religion, and demonstrated it by his matchless logic and lucid reasoning. The sneers, sarcasm, and persiflage of Spiritualistic anti-religionists find nothing in the writings of J. S. Loveland to sustain or comfort them. Such things are not argument, hence are only resorted to by uninformed people, and by those who know they have no case, who adopt the lawyer's method of abusing the opposite side with the hope of confusing the jury and thereby securing a verdict.

What is religion? Matthew Arnold says: "Religion is morality touched with emotion." Francis Ellingwood Abbott says: "Religion is man's effort to perfect himself." Thomas Carlyle says: "Religion is labor." Again he declares, "Work is worship." Once more, "Blessed is he who has found his work." If Carlyle is right, then every man who honestly toils with hands or brain is a worshiper—a religious being. Even Channing Severance, Brother Hollingsworth, Brother Ambler, Brother Pomeroy, and that indefatigable worker, Mrs. Clara Watson are ENGAGED IN DAILY WORSHIP AND ARE FULL OF PURE RELIGION, if Carlyle's definition holds good.

Take F. E. Abbott's words: "Is not every thinking being trying to perfect himself? Are not the good friends I have named honestly endeavoring to add to their store of knowledge, to improve morally, spiritually and psychically in every possible way? If they are, are they not trying to perfect themselves in all of the cardinal virtues, by means of which they become daily examples to all their fellow-men? Take Matthew Arnold's definition: Can any Spiritualist object to a pure and holy morality, so touched by the spirit of unselfish love as to enable him to recognize the kinship of the race, and his responsibility to himself and to others because of his own membership therein?"

A SIGNAL LACK OF INFORMATION.

The attempt to make religion mean only the worship of a Being, anthropomorphic, or otherwise, inside or outside of the universe, betrays a signal lack of information. Spiritualism of itself IS A PURE AND HOLY THING, hence is not to be censured nor condemned for that which is heaped upon it by its so-called friends. We can say the same of religion. Prof. Loveland says it is service to humanity and the maintenance of a pure moral character. "That is good enough for me, and I can combine with it the definitions quoted from Arnold, Abbott and Carlyle, and accept them all without a regret or misgiving."

But religion is a broader term than people realize. I had occasion once to trace the root meaning of the word in some of the ancient languages. Philologically I did not find an instance where it was defined as "The worship and service of a God," or of gods. Here are some of the definitions given: "To call together; to throw together; to rush together; to bind together; to bring together; union for protection and support; service to one another; combination for mutual aid," etc., etc. I rather like these definitions!

WHAT IS THE PURPOSE OF SPIRITUALISM?

Is it not to prove the brotherhood of the race, and to establish a system of unselfish service for our fellow-men? Is it not to present a clearer understanding of the principles of right and justice? Does it not aim to make men and women better through right living and right doing? Does it not rest upon the inexorable law of consequences? Why, then, should anyone attempt to do away with that which makes man unselfish, leads him to aspire for the good and true, and inspires him to nobler living and going? Please consider this definition for a few moments: "Religion is that which calls and binds men and women together, gives them morality permeated with love, helps them to perfect themselves through honest effort, inspires them to labor for mutual aid and protection, and makes them spend their lives in a round of good and noble deeds." Those who object to religion are invited to give us a substitute for the principles involved in the foregoing definition. I should add these words to it: "And bring them into harmony with the Infinite."

There has been too much objection to doing good, to right living and right doing in the past on the part of some Spiritualists, hence it is not strange that our cause is now in a state of "innocuous desuetude" in many sections of our nation. There has been too much egoism and not enough altruism in our movement. The worship of the "I" and the blind egotism of credulity and ignorance have done their noble (?) work. Man requires the all-compelling Must offered by Spiritualism, to keep his thoughts from wandering after the material and sensuous things in the world. The law of consequences is that Must, for through it man learns of life beyond the tomb and what he must meet when he enters there.

In concluding this paragraph, let me remind all who read my words that there is a wide difference between theology and religion. Theology has used religion for ignoble purposes, and has blinded many good people by declaring that religion is the worship and service of an anthropomorphic deity. It is theology only that does this, while religion tells man "to visit the fatherless and the widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

COMMERCIALISM COMPREHENSIVELY ILLUSTRATED.

All who read Prof. Loveland's remarks upon this subject were greatly benefited thereby. I do not know that we differ upon any vital principle involved in this important issue, yet I do not quite grasp his thought in his explanations of spiritual and business-mediumship. Laying aside all other issues involved in his most instructive article, let us confine ourselves to this special topic. Perhaps the speaker is "commercial" when he takes money for his work; perhaps the medium who demonstrates the continuity of life beyond the grave, is indulging in "commercialism" in so doing; perhaps the giving of a dollar to a starving child is "commercial," yet I hold that there is SPIRITUALITY IN THEM ALL, EVEN IF THE COMMERCIAL ELEMENT DOES OBTAIN IN EVEN THE SLIGHTEST DEGREE. I CONTEND THAT SPIRITUALITY DOES NOT ENTER INTO ANY DEMONSTRATION IN MEDIUMSHIP THAT DEALS WITH MATERIAL THINGS ALONE.

A man goes to a medium, seeking for information in regard to a gold mine, a possible invention, the state of the stock-market, tips on horse races and base ball games, probable rise in real estate values, lost cats and dogs, his runaway wife, points as to how he can overcome the virtue of some young girl, and receives that which he seeks; by means of which information he is enabled to gain his end. Will any intelligent Spiritualist presume to assert that there is anything "spiritual," "uplifting," or "religious" in any one or all of those things, or in the revelations concerning them? Are they not sensuously sordid, decidedly base, and unworthy of aspiring souls?

ELEVATING INFLUENCES ILLUSTRATED.

Another man goes to a medium, seeking for whatever manifestation of truth that may be offered him. His mind is fixed upon those things that are eternal, for his heart is softened and his soul thirsts for the waters of life. His loved ones have all passed away, and he wants both to know where they are and to receive some word from them. Suddenly the medium speaks to him in a voice not her own, and tells him things known only to himself and the dear one gone. She gives him a peculiar but well-remembered hand-clasp; perhaps she is made to stroke his face for a moment just as baby was wont to do while on earth; perhaps she whispers the baby's last words to him, or gives him the token that proves that his wife, his mother and his child have all survived the change called death. He is made to know that they live beyond the grave and love him just as dearly as before. They comfort, cheer and instruct him, and he pays his dollar with a thankful heart for the blessing that he has received.

EXPERIENCES CONTRASTED.

Contrast this experience with the former—the so-called business (?) sitting. Which is the purer, the truer, the more uplifting? Which one is really worthy of the angels? Which one makes the world better? The former is selfishly conceived, and only selfishness results therefrom. True, money is a medium of exchange, and is, therefore, necessary in the business world, yet when it is made the be-all and the end-all of man's existence, its influence is deteriorating and ignoble. The so-called business sittings are sought for the purpose of increasing the individual's wealth, never with a spiritual purpose, nor with a thought of the good that might be done with that wealth.

I have heard men by the score declare that they had no use for Spiritualism, other than the help it gave them in money-making. Such men use mediums, get rich, belong to fashionable churches, and endow sectarian institutions when they take leave of earth, with the very money that they made out of Spiritualism! Many mediums pride themselves on being the special instrument through whom some Hanna, Platt, Morgan, or Rockefeller gets his points on politics or the stock market. Others deal wholly with mines, mining, inventions, and the like, and then braggingly declare that they and they alone are the genuine mediums of the land, and that they are pure exemplars of spirituality and religion! Ye Immortal Gods, what effrontery is this!

TIPS ON A LOW ORDER OF EVENTS.

I heard a medium declare last summer that ninety-five per cent of all her readings were for business purposes only. She then added that those mediums who gave names of the departed and spiritual messages from our arisen ones were frauds, pure and simple! She declared further, that business readings were the highest types of spirituality and purely religious, because they were so convincing to the sinner!

Yes, it is "spiritual" to ruin an unsuspecting business friend! Very "spiritual" to destroy the virtue of some young girl! Exceedingly "spiritual" and "religious" to give tips on cruel horse races, bull fights, football games, and other brutal sports! Combine these with those who give fake materializations, trumpet sennaces, typewriting and the like, and the reader will have those to whom I refer when using the word "Commercialism." I believe every one of them should pay an occupation tax or a license, or contribute in some way to the support of the government whose privileges they enjoy.

TAX AND LIBERTY.

Frankly, I believe that every citizen should pay a small tax for the blessings of liberty that are his under our flag. I would not exempt any minister of any denomination from that tax. I would even make a man's failure to vote on election day or at his party primaries subject to a heavy fine. But if any one is to be favored, if any exemptions are granted, I should urge that those who prove that death does not end all, that father, mother, wife and child can come to us to comfort and console us, are the ones who, first of all, should be given these favors. But my Spiritualism makes me emphasize those words of the immortal Thomas Jefferson when he said, "Equal rights for all; special privileges to none." Therefore, there should be no exemptions for any class under our government, and all clergymen should be dealt with as are the members of all other professions.

To me, spiritual and religious mediums are those who give psychic instruction, comfort, consolation; messages from our departed loved ones, spiritual advice, soul-culture, words of love and tenderness, etc. Outside of these, I can find no better label than the term "Commercialism" for the pretended business readings and unmentionable bogus physical manifestations. The former are of the heavenly, and are uplifting in their influence. The latter are Diakka, and retard the spiritual progress of all who seek them.

THEISM—DEIST.

Private letters and personal interviews are questioning me with regard to my use of the term "Theism," and what I mean thereby. I believe I can make my meaning clearer by contrasting it with "Deism." A Deist is a person who believes in God, but denies revelation, hence does not believe in an individual immortality for man. A Theist is a person who believes in God, in revelation, and in a future life for man as an entity. Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and John Adams were Deists. Abraham Lincoln, Edward Everett, and Charles Sumner were Theists. Theism is the direct opponent of Atheism. The former affirms the immanence of life in this universe of ours, while the latter rules life out altogether.

To me, Theism means the Universal Principle of Life that fills the entire universe, in which are involved the potencies and possibilities of wisdom, love and volition that are evolved into finite expression in the forms with which all sentient beings are familiar. "A personal Deity?" Nay, not an anthropomorphic God, but an Infinite Principle, eternal, invisible, all-potent, manifest in all of the wondrous works in Nature's splendid laboratory.

Emerson calls this Power the "Over-Soul"; Prof. Lockwood says, "Supreme Principles of Nature"; the Brahmin says "Brahm"; the Mohammedan says "Allah"; the Christian says "God"; the N. S. A. says "Infinite Intelligence," and other persons and cults give different names to this self-same Principle. Theism is an all-inclusive term, involving the idea of Infinite Intelligence, and recognizing revelation as a demonstrated fact respecting man's survival of death and the grave. It personifies nothing, but accepts everything that is true, from whatever source it may come.

Yours for Spiritualism,

HARRISON D. BARRETT.

Death of George Jacob Holyoake.

Announcement of the death of the veteran thinker and writer, George Jacob Holyoake, appeared in Tuesday's dispatches. Holyoake has been before the public more or less prominently, during the last sixty years. He was the founder of that system of thought which is known under the name of secularism, formulated as a kind of counterpoise to ecclesiasticism and excessive other-worldliness.

In his earlier life his vigorous opposition to the taxation of the people for ecclesiastical purposes, aroused a bitter opposition, especially among the clergy, and for some of his utterances he was arrested, convicted of blasphemy and sentenced to jail for one year. While he was in prison he wrote "The Last Trial by Jury for Atheism in England," which had the effect to awaken a sentiment far and wide of sympathy and respect for the wronged man.

Later Mr. Holyoake became deeply interested in the subject of co-operative industry and became the founder of the Rochdale co-operative associations. Years ago he wrote a work on the co-operative movement which has since been an authority relating to that subject.

He was the author of a score or more of works on a great variety of subjects, his last work, recently published, being "Bygone Worth Remembering," in which he gave an account of a very large number of persons with whom he had been acquainted and a multitude of interesting events and incidents with which he had been intimately connected. He was acquainted intimately with Mazzini, Disraeli, Garibaldi, John Stuart Mill, the Brights, Gladstone, Herbert Spencer, Harriet Martineau, and a host of other celebrities of his day.

Years ago Holyoake espoused the cause of the working classes, was intimately associated with their leaders, and a writer in defense of measures for their betterment.

He died in his eighty-fifth year. His faculties were preserved to the last. He left to mankind a legacy of which his surviving daughter and his many friends may justly be proud. No man in England, in the last half century has commanded greater respect for his unswerving honesty, and his conscientious devotion to the cause of liberty and reform. The writer of this article knew him well and never knew a truer or worthier man.

Journeys to the Planet Mars

Or, Our Mission to Ento (Mars)

A Narrative by Sara Weiss, Illustrated with Thirteen Original Drawings by the Author.

This strangely attractive narrative does not assume to be either scientific, philosophic, or as advancing any special religious creed. It is a plain statement of facts based upon the experience of a woman whose highest aim is to acquire a knowledge of truth, to earnestly strive to live it, and to offer to others a stepping-stone which may aid them, in their progress towards the light. From the standpoint of Spiritualists this is a most interesting book, as Mrs. Weiss actually took these journeys in spirit and has given them in all simplicity, to the world. The book is uplifting and full of beautiful thoughts. 548 pages. Price $1.50.

RIGHT LIVING

—BY—

SUSAN H. WIXON.

Author of "Applaud of Gold," "All in a Lifetime," "The Story Hour," "Summer Days at Oat," "Sunday Observance," etc., etc.

"Living is an art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the nobility of the art."—THOMAS STARR KING.

This book gives an admirable course of study in ethics, and supplies a long-felt want of an ethical textbook especially adapted to the comprehension of children, as well as of those persons whom it is wisest and most profitable to instruct with teachings from the Bible. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principles of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more valuable than any other of the kind. It is a most excellent book for use in children's libraries. In the hands of young and old it will be a most useful and valuable book and should be widely circulated. Price $1.50.

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy to insure insertion in the paper, and other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will be all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and sometimes to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE.—That all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES.—Of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

Mrs. Annie C. Jones writes from Rochester, N. Y.: "I think The Progressive Thinker grows better with every succeeding number, and I know I am growing better intellectually and spiritually from its perusal. I attend Mrs. Mossesmith's meetings in the Building on Union street. I have known her for the last six years and I believe her to be not only a good medium, but honest, and an open foe to fraud and immorality."

We deeply regret to learn that Will C. Hodge is very ill at 532 24th street, a private sanitarium of Oakland, Cal. He will answer all correspondence soon as possible.

Ferd Suhrer writes: "Obsession was taken as the subject by Mrs. Howe, a visiting medium, at the afternoon service of the Rising Sun Mission, 378 So. Western avenue, Sunday, Jan. 21. Dr. O. E. Miller was our lecturer for the evening. As announced in our bulletin, his subject was Obsession. Mr. Miller will speak for us again Sunday evening, Feb. 18. 'Diet and its Relation to Character Building' will be the subject. Bro. Charles Thompson's guides have some honest demonstrations of the life after the so-called death. Sunday, Feb. 4, will be Mediums' Night and will be given up to short talks and spirit messages."

Dr. U. Smith writes: "Your paper of January 20 is received. It is a splendid number. You ought to send out millions of copies. Col. Ingersoll's address is priceless."

Mrs. Susie R. Thompson has returned to the city. She will hold her Spiritualistic meeting every Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock at 769 Van Buren street. All cordially invited to attend. Gustave Williams writes: "The North Star Spiritual Union, Sunday, Jan. 21, had the pleasure of greeting a fairly large audience in his hall, 1546 Milwaukee avenue. Sister Lettzer being absent on account of sickness, was assisted by our next speaker, evening Brother Temple was the lecturer for the evening. The subject, 'What Is Prayer,' was well handled. He is also a well-known test medium and gave a large number of spirit messages which were recognized."

Charles Brock writes: "Thanks to you for such a paper. It has helped me progress. It is full of advance thought and ideas from the very best men and women."

Dr. P. S. George writes from St. Louis, Mo.: "While recently in Denver I had the pleasure of meeting a most excellent medium, Mrs. Alice Gehring Patterson, who is doing a good work as a trumpet medium. Denver has lately passed an ordinance taxing mediums $100 per annum, which is an outrage. Sister Patterson has refused to pay, and says if arrested she will fight. Let us join with her and help her resist the payment of the license. I know she will win if it comes to a legal battle. Sister Patterson's address is 1434 So. 15th street, Denver, Colo."

Escanaba, Mich.—After having a premonition that he was to be the victim of a serious accident, Arthur Story, aged 22, was caught beneath a rolling log at the I. Stephenson Co.'s plant at 4 o'clock this morning and instantly killed. Story was to have married Miss Mildred Johnson next month, and when he left her last night to go to work he said that he felt that something was about to occur that would interfere with their plans. The girl pleaded with him to remain home, but he refused.—Courier-Herald.

Mrs. N. G. Smith writes: "Your paper is my bible, and I feel I could not get along without it. I know it has brought comfort to others as well as myself, for I give the papers away to church people and many have told me they were surprised; they had no idea Spiritualists were as good as the paper stated. I tell them that they get it for their children and they will all be benefited by it."

Geo. A. Kiehl writes from Lancaster, Pa.: "Many thankful souls unite with me in the wish to let your readers know what the angel world has done for the cause of Spiritualism in this orthodox community. Not until four years ago was any information given in a public manner here. The angels reserved this honor to the missionaries of the N. S. A. Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague. They gave several public lectures and tests here, and organized a small so-city. After a glorious reunion they have just left us. They were greatly pleased with the progress made. Home circles are being formed and mediums developed. Another society has lately been formed here, which is also doing a good work. We have a very hearty interest in the field of Spiritualism. We have a small library of good, selected Spiritualistic books. Three long years ago a committee was appointed by the N. S. A. to draw up a course of readings and general instructions for just such small, weak societies as ours. I trust this committee is now at work yet. Our fifth annual election of officers for the First Spiritualistic Society of Lancaster was held recently. We elected as president, George A. Kiehl; vice-president, John K. Hartman; secretary and treasurer, J. L. Brunner; trustees, J. B. [Reardon], D. L. LeFever, Herman Hoch and Allice Rife; librarian, Allice M. Rife.

A. W. H. Cunningham writes: "We have just completed one of the best four-room cottages on the ground of the Chesterfield camp, and expect to make it our future home. Last evening under the auspices of Mrs. Anna Thronsdon as medium, we held our first seance in the cottage and dedicated one of the rooms to our spiritual friends, and it will be used for no other purpose. The seance room is named the Home of the Angels. Too much praise cannot be accorded Mrs. Thronsdon and her efficient controls."

Mrs. Martha Woolsey writes from Indianapolis, Ind.: "I have often thought I would write you of our work here in Indianapolis; of our many earnest and faithful workers for our beautiful religion; of our little band in the Indian city, and of our struggles. How many have been added and assisted us in many ways, both socially and financially, that we might be able to spread the good tidings of joy that we do live after the so-called death, and can return. Last night our dear good pastor, Mrs. Anna Thronsdon, had been called to spend the good evening to a musical audience, and we were favored by having with us Mrs. Josephine Ropp Amos, who in her own inimitable way gave comfort and cheer to many seekers after the truth. It was through her that my husband was convinced that our loved ones return."

A loved tale comes from the vicinity of Swede Mill, near Carbon. There is a "real ghost" there. No person can live in the house for any length of time. The ghost disappeared, only to reappear lately during the holidays, when he made himself especially busy. The mysterious actions of the past few days have aroused certain people to an unusual degree of excitement and there is a movement on foot to organize a posse of good citizens to lay his ghost-spirit, Greenburg (Pa.) Tribune.

Lawrenceburg, Ind.—The body of Mrs. Nettie Martin Holmes, aged thirty-nine, was brought here from her late home in Witt, Ill., and interred in the family burying ground in Manchester Township. Mrs. Holmes was accidentally shot by her son while he was attempting to draw a loaded shell that had lodged in his gun. It is authentically stated by relatives that she foretold her death, having been warned in dreams on three successive nights, which she related to them. On the first two nights dead relatives appeared to her while she slept, and on the last night a black-robed figure of death stood by her bedside holding a paper. While it beckoned to her, she suddenly went out. She interpreted the visions as meaning that death was near.—Chicago American.

Ruth Eastman, Secretary, writes from Mancelona, Mich.: "Forest Home Camp Association is now seeking talent for 1906 camp, which will open July 23, with Georgia Gladys Cooley as speaker and message bearer for the day, and will continue over the following week, giving two lectures followed by messages, and again occupying the platform, Aug. 5. The committee congratulates itself in being able to secure the services of this talented speaker and message bearer, who has rendered like services for many years the length and breadth of our land. Any arrangement wishing to be made to entertain those who will be made to themselves of this opportunity. Full particulars will be published later on. The main object in writing this note is to secure speakers and message bearers for August 12, with week days following, and August 19, with week preceding, week days. The secretary would like to correspond with a view to engagement with speakers and message bearers who wish to render their services at time mentioned."

Mrs. India Hill, the lecturer, writes: "Perhaps a voice out of this wilderness may startle some of our friends in the broad field of spiritual progress. We desire to call attention to the work of our friends and co-workers in the cause of Spiritualism. I feel greatly encouraged with the progress our cause is making. We feel to hope for greater results from the abundant seed that has been, and is still being sown by our guardian angels, and we truly hope we may all become so close in touch with their loving presence that we can do no wrong, while they desire our purest and best. I have been answering calls for lectures and funerals quite frequently, and holding some meetings at home. I will answer calls for lectures and funerals in this state and Indiana. I am as ever, for pure mediums and spiritual Spiritualism. Address me at Decatur, Ill."

Mrs. A. Birdsall writes from Jackson, Mich.: "Dr. P. T. Johnson, the veteran Spiritualist of Battle Creek, has been with the First Progressive Spiritual Society for the past three Sundays. If I am not mistaken he is past 80 years, and has been in the Spiritualistic field for more than fifty years. His lectures are entirely void of whitewash or embellishment, and I want to say that the good sound philosophy and logic as expounded by his controls holds his listeners spellbound. The very countenance of the old gentleman under control seems to shed an inspirational light that penetrates and vibrates in one's being to the very depths."

Mrs. Laura Jones writes from Elgin, Ill.: "I wish to inform the many readers of your grand paper of the excellent and happy meeting we had at the home of Mrs. D. Wheeldon, Elgin. The occasion was a reception and surprise given by the Spiritualistic Society to our old time mediums and friends, Mr. and Mrs. G. Parker, it being the 50th anniversary and golden wedding; also their 50th year of mediumship. Beginning with a spiritual seance, Sisters West and Rasmussen gave beautiful spirit talks, after which our dear sister, Miss Tillie May, the gifted medium, under control gave loving messages. The wedding ceremony was celebrated by Sister West, the pastor, joining their hands, and with a gold circlet, giving one of the beautiful messages. After the ceremony the guests repaired to the large dining-room to partake of all the good things only Spiritualists can give. There came the presentation of gifts and the wedding cake, decorated with American flags and gold coin, and other presents too numerous to mention."

Miss Melvina Bush writes from Detroit, Mich.: "I would like Art Magic, by Emma Hardinge Britten. I read it about twenty-five years ago, and have often wished I could read it again. You have given me the opportunity to possess a book, which pleases me very much."

Beaumont, Texas, Jan. 16.—Mrs. Carrie N. Hinsdale of Fort Worth, president of the Texas Association of Spiritualists, has arrived in the city and will be here for some time endeavoring to reorganize the local lodge of Spiritualists and to inspire interest in a project for holding a grand rally or camp meeting of the Spiritualists of Texas next summer. Mrs. Hinsdale will deliver a lecture in the interest of Spiritualism to-morrow evening at the Temperance Hall, to which the public is cordially invited to attend.—Galveston Post.

Mrs. Fox writes from Missoula, Mont.: "I think Montana has suffered more through fake mediums than any other place on earth. We have many men who are interested in mines, and the mediums think they are the ones to graft, and they do get the worst of it. A reading costs from $2 to $25. I know one poor woman who thinks everyone is honest, and who pays $15 for a reading and not one thing true given. Then the next fake comes along and reads in the same old story. Here is a fake for some missionary work. The people are hungry for the truth. The mediums that pass through here advertise largely. We had one here who was lately released from jail. She knew that Montana was the place where people could be worked. So you see we need some good ones to come to this field who will do good work."

Mrs. George Williams writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "The Rev. Dell Herick for the past two weeks has been engaged at the Fullerton street Spiritualist Temple, Cleveland, Ohio, under the auspices of the Ladies' Temple Fund Society. His work is always productive of good, and the ladies are always glad to have him with them. When the Temple was first dedicated, he threw himself into the work, with an ardor and enthusiasm that had a noticeable effect in placing the affairs of the Temple upon a firm foundation. He will be followed by Mr. W. J. Colville, due notice of which will be given. The supper given at the Temple this week was a very enjoyable affair, was largely attended. Brother C. Solinger as chef converted the esculent bivalves into many toothsome and delectable courses."

T. W. Wisner writes: "I was born in Livingston county, N. Y., Nov. 7, 1826. I was a natural born mechanic, and what I most desire to do is to learn the 'whyness' of things. Mechanics as a class are practical men. They know that if rotten timber is put into a building, repentance and prayer never will give it strength; it will only show the weakness in their head and rottenness in their heart. There is much I would like to say, but there is a lack of pattern, and I will leave it to the machine shop where I work, more or less every day. Friends often say to me, 'Well, Wisner, you hold up wonderfully.' I tell them there is a cause for all things. I never use whiskey or tobacco, and never had the small pox or religion."

A pleasant, Iowa, was delighted with the grand work done in their city last week by Georgia Gladys Cooley. The week previous she visited Leroy, Ill., and this week has again called from this state, and will be in Geneva Tuesday evening, Jan. 30; Rockford, Wednesday evening, Jan. 31; and Belvidere, Thursday evening, Feb. 1. She will give outside calls and not interfere with her Sunday meetings which are held regularly at Grand Boulevard Hall, corner Grand Boulevard and 47th street, this city."

Jas. C. Underhill writes: "That was a brilliant inspiration that suggested the idea of republishing 'The Progressive Thinker.' A little pilgrim in the Union. It is a beautiful poem, full of genuine spirituality, showing in its composition the emanation of a beautiful mind in blended cooperation with pure and sweet spirit dwellers in the world unseen. It cannot fail to leave a good impression on the minds of its readers. Subscribers to The Progressive Thinker are to be congratulated that they have an opportunity to read it."

There will be a social at Mrs. Hill's, 705 West Madison street, on the evening of Feb. 3, for the benefit of the Golden Rule Society.

Mrs. Nettie Sweet McManamon of Shafter, Mich., wishes engagements for February and March to lecture in Michigan.

Dr. Beverly writes: "The meetings at Arlington Hall, 31st street and Indiana avenue, continue to draw our kind medium supply every week. Our kind message, Dr. Beverly is delivering a course of lectures on the New Age which this spiritual movement is ushering in, and is showing the people how to realize the many benefits of this new kingdom. The demonstrations are really wonderful. We have new attractions at every meeting."

Harry J. Moore is meeting with excellent success in Seattle, Wash. Maggie Henry writes: "On Sunday, at Spiritual Mission Chapel (Old 7th) in the evening our speaker, as usual, took his subject from the audience and at the close of the lecture several mediums gave messages. All are welcome, sure of an intellectual treat at all our meetings."

J. M. White writes: "Having completed my labor in Topeka, I am en route to Galveston, Texas, and am prepared to stop at inland towns and school houses wherever a lecture or test seance is wanted. On going into a strange place to work I wish to hold no conversation with investigators until we meet in the seance room. All that can be done to make the work absolutely test in all ways is my rule. Engage agents wanted in Indian Territory and Missouri. After Feb. 4, letters will reach me at Walker, Mo., Jasper, Carthage, Webb City and Joplin. Families desiring help in home developing circles are requested to write me at these points."

Mrs. Mary E. Aron is now located at Arapahoe, Neb., and is holding Spiritual meetings every Sunday with success. Her many Chicago friends will be glad to hear the good news.

Mrs. Carrie M. Hinsdale, president of the Texas State Spiritualist Association, writes from Beaumont, Texas: "I found 'Confusion' worse confounded among Spiritualists in Beaumont, but there are many here who are earnest, outspoken Spiritualists and who will unite and work together for the good they can do their fellow-men by scattering abroad the truths of Spiritualism. There are also many, who having learned something of this truth, will join hands with those who know, and all work together for the brotherhood of man."

Thos. S. Kiser writes from Decatur, Ill.: "In the article I wrote that was in last issue, 27th ult., I am made to say 'Mrs. Bell,' where it should be 'Mrs. Bell,' and 'Mrs. Bell's adopted daughter.' The word 'adopted' was not in the copy. If she was to be adopted I should like the privilege and pleasure of adopting her myself."

Secretary writes: "The next public meeting of the Chicago Spiritualists League will be held in the Blue Room, Handel Hall, 40 Randolph street, Wednesday, Feb. 7, at 8 p. m. sharp. Rev. John H. Green, an able representative of modern thought, will lecture on 'Spiritual Dynamics.' Well known message bearers will contribute to the exercise. Prof. Tolman's quartette, he has assured us, will render some of its best selections for this occasion. Five-minute remarks from anyone at the close of the lecture, for a limited time will be in order. A cordial invitation is extended to the public to attend our regular monthly meetings. Dr. Burgess, president; Dr. J. H. Randall, secretary."

BECOMING MORE CRITICAL.

Spiritualists Everywhere Are Beginning to Examine Spiritual Phenomena With the Same Critical Mind That They Bring to Bear When They Examine Any Manifestation of Nature.

To the Editor:—I have watched with much interest your war on frauds, as related from time to time in The Progressive Thinker. If Spiritualists will not aid and sustain you in laboring to expose the fakes, who will? We have a right to know better than the Christian fakes we all condemn? A system of religion built on falsehood no flourish for a time, but it has no enduring base. All truth is safe, and nothing else is safe. Said the learned Judge J. W. Edwards, one of the first and ablest defenders of Spiritualism: "I know full well that Truth is ever born with many a bitter pang, and most to those who give it birth."

You, Sir, in defending the truth, at the same time exposing fraud and imposture must expect to suffer from the fangs of the vipers you would destroy. During the summer of 1868-9 I rejoined the ranks of the Spiritualists, and was pleased to attend the Sunday services of Spiritualists. It was announced at one of these assemblies that a distinguished materializing medium, whose name escapes me as I write, would give a seance that evening, admission $1; that those who desired to see their dear ones who had gone to the great beyond, would have an opportunity that night which might never occur again, to meet and converse with them, and thus remove every doubt of spirit return."

Though I had been an ardent Spiritualist from the spring of 1848, having a representative, as a journalist, at Hydeville, N. Y., who spent several years of his life as a committee from Brooklyn in investigating the phenomena, yet I had seen nothing in the materializing line other than the tiny raps; so when evening came I joined the others in the crowded hall. The lights were well turned down, but I judged there were full 300 in attendance.

Due time the "operator" put in his appearance. The lights, at his direction, were turned still lower, followed by singing. Then the dear self-styled medium conjured with the spirits, and seemed very anxious to have them put in an appearance; but they disregarded his importunities. Cheese-cloth and other kind of auxiliaries had not yet come into vogue.

The patience of the audience seemed exhausted when the operator announced, "The conditions are not favorable for the spirits to appear to-night. There are too many doubters present to make a seance a success. On another occasion we shall be more successful." After paying his hall rent he had taken a handsome amount to compensate him for his antics. It was amusing to hear him expressing the hope the brothers and sisters would not be discouraged, but come again when he was sure the spirits would be in attendance.

I dare not write there is no genuine materializations, but I do not hesitate to say, if there was no other proof of spirit return I should at times feel like questioning whether the whole system is not a fraud; whereas now I am sure, with the evidence in my possession, there can be no more earnest believer than myself—in fact, it amounts to knowledge.

Item of Thought:
Every task in life a privilege.
When Truth has blessed the mind;
Duties vanish and we gladly
Go cheer and help mankind.

For good that it may yield.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Mrs. Hannah Wilcox Cheney passed to the higher life, from the residence of her son, at Courtland, Ill., Jan. 9, 1906. Mrs. Cheney was born in Scipio, Cayuga county, N. Y., in 1807, having almost reached the century mark. She was a devout Spiritualist for a great many years. Her end was peaceful, and in the full realization of all her faculties she welcomed the messenger as it came to her, for she knew it would bring her peace and comfort.

GEORGIA GLADYS COOLEY.
Thos. Morgan passed to spirit life, from his home at Gilborton, Oct. 12, aged 80 years. He was true in his devotion to the cause of Spiritualism, and a faithful reader of The Progressive Thinker. His companion still survives him, aged 71 years.
MRS. MARTHA TREGDA.

Passed to the higher life, Jan. 14, 1906, at his residence, 2056 Douglas avenue, Ogden, Utah, Wm. Foster, aged 71 years. He was an avowed Spiritualist and a good medium. Many and beautiful were the floral offerings from his many friends.

MRS. E. FOSTER.

Florence A. Simpkins, adopted daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Simpkins, was born at Columbus, Ohio, July 20, 1891, and passed to spirit life, from her late home in Bloomington, Ill., Jan. 3, 1906. The mother of Florence was a sister to Mr. Simpkins, and at her death she adopted her little four-year-old Florence as their own child. Her beautiful and loving nature intertwined itself into their lives until they knew no different love than that of father and mother for their own. The interment took place at their old home in Ohio. The writer officiated at the funeral in Bloomington.
MRS. INDIA HILL.

WAS IT OBSESSING SPIRITS?

Or Principles of Molecular Induction as Expressive of Mental Processes?

Being seriously in doubt as to the possibility of a claim made by Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood regarding obsession, I desire to state and ask for enlightenment. When in Boston I interview a patient of the obsession specialist, G. Lester Lane, D. M. D. O. (672 Huntington avenue, Boston, Mass.), and here is the testimony, as stated to me, the name of patient only not to be used.

The vocal organs of this patient had been for ten years to speak indelibly through, by conversation with them as with any other person, but could not force them to depart or cease their annoying.

Brother Lockwood in 'The Progressive Thinker,' January 13, states in a way: "That obsession is due to the irregular physiological structures with their consequent unrythmic functioning and mental expression."

The patient interviewed was not an Indian, and could not speak that dialect. How came that language to be spoken? What is there in irregular physiological structures with their consequent unrythmic functioning and mental expression that go to PRODUCE A KNOWN LANGUAGE INDEPENDENTLY?

Is it not logical, my brother, to conclude that if irregular functioning of our organs can produce all the mental and physical phenomena produced by obsessing spirits, then those irregularities can produce all mental and physical phenomena accredited to good and truthful spirits, as both operate by the same spirit laws, and can produce much of the same results except in the quality of good or evil, blessing or injury; both produce the trance state, rapping, moving of material objects, writing and so on, and if all these phenomena are but the irregularities of our being, then all spirit communication is a mistake, and Brother Lockwood has relegated to Spiritualism out of existence and introduced something more wonderful than spirit obsession.

To establish Brother Lockwood's theory he must prove that our ideas, will and reason take on human spirit form, move, speak and exercise other faculties and all independent of the physical and mental organism of living persons. The testimony of the intelligent thousands, both spirits and mortals, has been that as the evil or good pass from the material body they are not improved by the change, and as good or evil spirits, can and do manifest on the earth plane.

We passionately await this molecular modern miracle that is threatening our beloved spiritual truths, but not with fear and trembling.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing would require the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby as terse, which of all things is to be deplored. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the orderly courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Alta M. Lilly: Q. We sent for an aluminum trumpet. It is in three pieces, like a telescope. It is impossible for mortal lips to speak through it without the aid of the hand to conduct the sound. Is it as good as any trumpet?

A. This is one of the "trick" trumpets, and so made as to be extended to make the voice sound at a distance from the medium, or contracted to sound near.

It is made difficult to speak through, without the use of the hand, that the "voice" may seem more of a "test" of its spirit source.

This telescopic form is advantageous only for purposes of deception. A light tin trumpet should be chosen, as the best instrument for the object sought, by honest investigators.

Ignorance: Q. What is the meaning of a four per cent curve and a three per cent grade?

A. A four per cent curve is one which departs from a straight line four feet in one hundred. A three per cent grade is a fall or rise of three feet in one hundred, from a horizontal line.

L. Reynolds: Q. How can the precocity of some children who give answers to the most profound questions without giving them seemingly the least thought, and when they reach maturity, are below the average, and have no longer this ability, be explained?

A. The most plausible explanation of this precocity is that they are impressionable and thus subjects under spiritual influence. This would manifest to them in certain directions and not in others, according to the fact that in precocious faculties of the mind are rudiments of the faculties called into action by the spirit impressing.

When they reach adolescence, in almost all cases the sensitiveness is lost and the recipient becomes himself, often of mediocre attainments.

It is, however, possible not only to preserve, but to increase this wonderful ability, by culture as a spiritual faculty, if the recipient becomes an active factor, training his mind to the understanding of what he thus receives; in brief, awakening his reasoning and quickening his mind by this impressing of intuition, he may have the advantage of an education along both lines.

Student: Q. What is the exact distance of the sun from the earth? Astronomy is said to be an exact science, and supported by the demonstrations of mathematics, and yet I find a variation of more than five millions of miles in this distance by different astronomers.

A. "Student" makes the variants too large, for the latest observations reduce the margin of error to 500,000 miles, more or less.

Almost all the data of our knowledge of the sun depend on this computed distance. There are several ways of determining it, but measurements of the angles parallel are the most direct. The instruments by which this measurement is performed are as near perfect as human skill can accomplish. Encke in 1824, with such instruments as he possessed, made the angle 8 m. 58 s., corresponding to a distance of something over 95,000,000 miles. Observations on the velocity of light showed this to be too great, and with more perfect instruments, the distance has been reduced to a mean distance of 92,500,000 miles, with a margin of half a million either side. This may not be thought to be as accurate as it should be, but when it is taken into consideration that the apparent size of a hair at a distance of 125 feet, must be measured, for that almost imperceptible space will make a million or more miles in the calculation based thereon.

From data drawn from several other sources the distance of the sun has been computed, and the results approximately agree, but not perfectly. For all practical purposes the present received number is sufficiently accurate. The detection of the error by the velocity of light, was a beautiful illustration of the interdependence of phenomena. It was found that light from the sun reached the earth in too short a time if it had 95,000,000 millions of miles to traverse.

According to the best and most recent authorities the distance of the sun may be taken in round numbers at 93,000,000 miles. (It is somewhat less.) It is not claimed that the instrument can measure with absolute accuracy, and a margin of two hundredths of a second is allowed for error. Taking this for the true distance the diameter of the sun is 866,500 miles or its volume or bulk is equal to one million, three hundred thousand worlds like the earth.

J. B. Davis: Q. By whom was the order of Melchizedek founded, and what are its teachings?

A. The order of Melchizedek is a living thing, with a journal of its own, with headquarters in California. As it is a most secret order, with more mystery and "concealed knowledge" than even Masonry, its teachings are known only to those who have taken its awful vows.

It has been hinted that a good deal of Spiritualism had been injected into the institutions and ritual, and a bid thereby made for those of that belief to become members, but Spiritualism has no purpose to conceal the knowledge it brings, and has no inner shrine which can only be approached by grip and password. They who pretend to have spiritual knowledge unknown to others, on which they fix a price, have nothing to dispose of, and all their patrons will gain will be a sad and disappointing experience.

S. A. W.: Q. A year ago while descending the stairs, I suddenly became unconscious and fell nearly to the bottom, severely injuring myself. Yesterday while engaged in my room, I was suddenly thrown with such force that my knee ached for hours. It came without warning like a stroke of lightning. Was this caused by an unseen power intending to injure me?

A. An "unseen power" should be the last resort in explanation. If spiritual beings of the lower order, were able to exercise such influence over mortals nothing imaginable could be more dreadful than this life. The entrance of evil disposed spirits into our lives is possible, but only as we, by our conduct, prepare the way, consciously or unconsciously.

In this instance the cause must be sought in the physical condition of the subject. It is organic and not psychic, and the effect will recur if the cause is not removed. This arrest of vital force by momentary heart failure may be prevented by hygienic living and avoiding sudden exertion and nervous strain. Slight benefit can be expected from medical prescriptions.

F. M. S. Melvin: Q. Did the universe have a beginning? Can the human mind conceive of a "beginning" to the universe as a whole. It can comprehend a beginning to some special part, as the solar system. The processes of its growth are incomplete, and can be traced to the cosmic fire-mist, out of which it was evolved.

There it had a beginning. But what was before? Out of what came the fire-mist material? It is idle to conjecture.

In the universe are countless millions of stars, each representing a solar system like our own. Held by gravitation in the vast spaces, they are mutually related and dependent. These systems have birth, grow old and die, and new ones take their place. Perfect equilibrium is preserved, and the idea of a beginning or ending comes from the limitation of the human mind, within whose narrow horizon the infinite is inconceivable.

THE FUTURE RELIGION.

A Comprehensive View of What It Should Be.

The few thoughts by Dr. Juliet Severance in a recent issue of The Progressive Thinker deserves the highest consideration by thinking Spiritualists.

That the future religion will embrace ideas of practical benefit to mankind, and that this religion is now in the process of construction, there is no doubt in my mind.

The demand for practical points in this religion, was recently voiced by a woman writer, Dr. Alice B. Stockham, when she said that in many instances the parents need education along practical lines more than the children do. Prof. Jackson of the University of Chicago, in a lecture before the Home and Child's Development of the Woman's Club of Evanston last April, said: "What we want is a religion that will teach the people how to live. Vox populi vox dei is an old expression upon which the future of our present political status rests, and upon which the next great partisan battles will be fought, because the great political leaders are learning that the people's wishes ultimately will triumph."

The tendency of our times is socialistic and practical. One year ago the presidents of two large labor unions in Chicago, stated that there was no church that was of practical benefit to the poor working man, and to this I heartily acquiesce, unless it is the practical social work of the Hull House, or the Chicago Commons.

Perhaps the free dispensary, to which the poor people in the large cities crowd, or the large hospitals, which are everywhere on the increase and enlarging, comes as near being of practical benefit as anything we have under our present religious system, and along these lines the Christian church has at last found out that it does not pay to oppose science any longer, but that the people themselves can appreciate and welcome practical work; therefore the church is contributing money to found hospitals, not only in America but also in the so-called heathen countries. It is establishing Medical Missionary Training Schools, and Training Schools for Missionary Nurses, and the like. The curriculum of the teaching of the Y. M. C. A. in this city of a two years' course in practical medical subjects conclusively proves that the bright, intelligent young men of America appreciate the influence of a teacher who understands practical points as well as metaphysical.

The question to my mind is, What is the great organization of the Spiritualists going to do about this practical part of the coming religion? Is it going to oppose it, or will it boldly take up this matter and embrace it for its own glory and the benefit of eager waiting humanity?

There is a field that is not filled entirely by any religious organization, and can only be filled by a practical religion as Spiritualism surely is.

Etchings From the Hull Pilgrims

Interesting Items From the Pacific Coast.

Tempus fugit. The days come and go much faster than I can. Our last Etchings left us in El Paso, Texas. We only stayed one day after that article was closed. Our last day in El Paso was our best ones. The size of the audience and the interest increased until the very last moment. I do not know how many people were present. The same persons stuck to us more faithfully from first to last than at El Paso. The people did not like to see us leave. Many shed tears when the last good-byes were said. We left many friends whom we shall want to meet again.

On the first day of the present year we traveled the Southern Pacific train from Los Angeles and San Diego, Cal. Our journey was in every sense of the word a pleasant one. In the first place we had none but pleasant memories to carry away with us. Then we had pleasant anticipations concerning the future.

The greatest curiosity we saw on the way was the sea. I had seen the Pacific Ocean at Salton Lake. That baby sea is not yet quite one year old. It is located in the southwestern Desert of California. It began to fill with water, apparently from the Colorado River, and has been filling ever since until it covers hundreds of square miles; and still it increases in depth at the rate of the Pacific ocean. This leads many to suppose that there is some kind of subterranean connection between the ocean and this little sea. I will add that many people in Southern California believe that the sea is already having an effect on the climate of California.

The S. P. railroad has been compelled to move its tracks several times on account of the rise of the water, and is now engaged with its thousands of men in again moving its tracks. It is supposed that the railroad will very soon be compelled to give up the entire basin to the sea—I think in its lowest depths the basin it occupies is three hundred feet below sea level.

We arrived in Los Angeles several hours late, and found our friends apparently glad to meet us. We held one meeting there; that was managed by our friend of many years, Mrs. Nettie Howell. The meeting was a success in every way, though the notice was short. We promised to spend a week there on our way North. This we will do, after we have had a further report. It may here be said that the Spiritualists of Los Angeles have formed an association and purchased a camp ground, in the suburbs of the city, and are going to work to fit it up for a camp meeting this year. Something further will be said on this matter later.

From Los Angeles, we came on Saturday, Jan. 8, to San Diego, the "Bay City" of California. This is my first visit to San Diego in sixteen years. One can hardly imagine the change that has come over the city in that length of time.

Judge of our surprise, upon arriving, when we landed at 1023, Ninth street, to find that we had gone right into the home of our old friends, Orrin W. and Gertrude Smith. We had known them intimately during the past eighteen years, but had no idea of meeting them here. Brother Smith is a kind of all-round literary man, and Mrs. Smith is a medium of much more than ordinary merit. We are home here, and of course we will call this our home until we leave San Diego.

Our meetings here are largely attended. It was indeed pleasant to look over the large audiences and see the familiar faces of the long ago. Among them was that familiar face of Dr. J. M. Peebles, now about eighty-five years of age, then a young man, and a copy of every one of his valuable books—I mean the books of which he is the author. Now my brother, Dr. W. Hull, has sent a portion of his large library to the school, and promises the remainder when he and his wife get through with it. When I return to my home in the spring I shall carry a large amount of my library over to the new hall in the Institute. Dr. Peebles made us glad by making the public announcement in the San Diego Spiritual Temple, that he was going soon to send his large and well selected library to the Morris Pratt School. At this rate we shall soon have a library, the study of which will make one a five year young man. As soon as we can have our library properly arranged, the Morris Pratt School will not be ashamed to compare its library with that of other young schools. It has perhaps four thousand volumes now.

Our appointments for the immediate future are as follows: Jan. 30 to Feb. 5, Los Angeles, Cal., and the management of Mrs. Nettie Howell. Address us while there, 1410 Kellam avenue, Feb. 6 to 13, San Jose, Cal. There address us in care of Mr. Dobson Barker. Feb. 13 to 28, Portland, Ore., and March and April, Seattle, Wash.

Both Mrs. Hull and myself are enjoying better health than we did before we left home on Nov. 10.

float in from space. In all of their entertainments every performer has learned his part well. The smallest children, whether educated over on the Point or in their Raja Yoga school in the theater building, do their duties on the stage with all the composure and nonchalance of old veteran actors. Their San Diego school is very popular, and it is conceded to be far, very far ahead of the public schools. Many people, not at all in sympathy with what is called Theosophy send their children to the Raja Yoga school.

Whatever these people may be they certainly have a model home, a model government and a model system of education. Every one is trained to exactly fill his place, and it is done with such grace as is seldom seen elsewhere. Whether a tallyho driver, a guide or a secretary in any of the offices, each one has learned just how to answer, just what questions to answer, and just how to avoid any question which borders too much on matters which it is not designed that the world should know. No one ever hears any profanity, obscenity, loud talk, or ungrammatical or mispronounced words on Point Loma.

We did not get into any of the main buildings. They are not open to the public except on certain days, and on great occasions. We did not see Mrs. Hanger, who seems to be wise enough to keep herself away from the public. They say she is a very busy woman, and spends most of her time with her cabinet, agents, secretaries and stenographers.

From whatever source the wisdom may come, there is surely much of it manifest in every department of the Point Loma works. I would surely advise all who come to San Diego to make at least one visit to Point Loma.

Our meetings in the Temple in San Diego, have been and still are large and interesting. Many seem deeply interested in the school, and are helping it. Our school is slowly but very surely on the up grade. Mrs. H. and I only wish that we could take the Spiritus take a personal interest in its every movement, but until it grows to where it is a little nearer self-sustaining that cannot be. As I am out in the work I have reason to believe more and more that the time is very near when we can take more of a personal interest in each student.

I do not remember that it has been announced that Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, who is still on our board of directors, has felt compelled to resign her position as secretary of the M. P. I. A. The distance between the school and herself is so great that she does not feel that she can discharge the duties of secretary as they should be done. Her resignation has been graciously accepted by the board of directors. Mrs. Emma J. Owen, of Clinton, Iowa, has been chosen secretary in Mrs. Stewart's place. Mrs. Owen is now in the school as student, teacher and secretary.

Mrs. Stewart is now in Seattle, doing whatever she can find to do, both for the school and for the cause of Spiritualism. It is hoped that the Spiritualists of the West will keep her busy and will pay her well for her work.

The Morris Pratt School, now being blessed, and to be further blessed in the future by having additions made to its library. Dr. James M. Peebles, less than one year since enriched the school library by adding to it a copy of every one of his valuable books—I mean the books of which he is the author. Now my brother, Dr. W. Hull, has sent a portion of his large library to the school, and promises the remainder when he and his wife get through with it. When I return to my home in the spring I shall carry a large amount of my library over to the new hall in the Institute. Dr. Peebles made us glad by making the public announcement in the San Diego Spiritual Temple, that he was going soon to send his large and well selected library to the Morris Pratt School. At this rate we shall soon have a library, the study of which will make one a five year young man. As soon as we can have our library properly arranged, the Morris Pratt School will not be ashamed to compare its library with that of other young schools. It has perhaps four thousand volumes now.

Our appointments for the immediate future are as follows: Jan. 30 to Feb. 5, Los Angeles, Cal., and the management of Mrs. Nettie Howell. Address us while there, 1410 Kellam avenue, Feb. 6 to 13, San Jose, Cal. There address us in care of Mr. Dobson Barker. Feb. 13 to 28, Portland, Ore., and March and April, Seattle, Wash.

Both Mrs. Hull and myself are enjoying better health than we did before we left home on Nov. 10.

MOSIES HULL

A Prominent Spiritualist Passed to Spirit Life.

Mrs. Lizzie Cone Reals of Summerland, Cal., passed to spirit life, Jan. 19, after a long illness of years of bronchial consumption. She had been a great sufferer, yet always patient and cheerful. She was a firm Spiritualist and felt conscious of the presence of the departed, giving her assistance to bear her trials and suffering. She had written many beautiful poems which found their way in the different spiritual periodicals of the West. A few days before her transition to spirit life, in her invalid chair, she wrote the following poetic lines which seemed prophetic as the day had been cloudy and rainy, but on the morning of her passing away the sun came out in brilliancy and the earth teemed with the gladness of spring as though answering the cry of a freed spirit from the grievous hand of sorrow and disease. It cannot wish her back, although my heart is made desolate and lonely by her absence, and only the assurance that her spirit is with me can allay the sorrow I feel. The following are the lines I found in her notes she had pencilled among her papers:

On the wings of spirit, bright sunny morning,
Let my spirit soar away,
When the powers from their dewy slumbers
Are opening to welcome the day;
When they shed their perfume sweetly
On all the air around,
Then heavenward let my spirit—
Oh, homeward let it be found.
When the birds are singing sweetly
Their gleeful morning song,
Let me list to their swelling cadence
As I joyfully pass along.
Let it float with me so gently
Till it mingles with the streams,
By angel voices chanted,
On those bright celestial plains.

BUILDING LOTS.

They Are For Sale in Hell.

AN Experience of Charles Dawbarn.

With spectroscopic and telescope man is everywhere trying to discover what is going on above and below him; but the instruments have yet to be invented that will tell the history of a block of lava before its mother volcano permitted it to run alone.

Lava is everywhere around me, as I write by the side of the crater of the most active volcano in the world, and some of it is yet so hot that no policeman is needed to order the wayfarer to "move on."

I just pushed a stick into yonder bank. It came out coated with sulphur, liquid with the heat.

Everything is weird and unreal. The lava bends as you walk, and below is an echo which is at least a very unsatisfactory foundation for the trail three miles long, by which you creep to the edge of the crater of the celebrated active volcano of glory and terror of the island of Hawaii.

I rarely note down a first impression, and have often regretted it, so here, on the spot, I record a rather irreverent comparison suggested by the scenic play going on 100 feet below.

It is not yet quite dark, so the lake is still dimmed by the light of day; but it is chased and recrossed by lines of fire. They are just cracks in the lava, but have a strange regularity that somewhat resembles the map by which a dealer in real estate advertises his coming sale of most valuable and eligible lots. One almost expects to see somewhere a huge sign announcing "BUILDING LOTS FOR SALE IN HELL TO-NIGHT."

But the play goes on. Fountains begin to sparkle, cascades tumble and roar, geyser spout, and presently a huge wave of white hot lava rolls over at least one-third of the great lake, where it had seemed previously rather neglected and unsaleable.

In one corner the hour has come for increased activity, and we hear the puff, puff of engines, with the thunder of pneumatic hammers, evidently pounding and smashing great blocks of chaos into fragments of suitable size for the fuel needed by the volcano.

It is a gruesome and weird scene, and none the less so when the guide tells me that he considers this rather comfortable ledge on which I am sitting is liable to tumble into the crater any hour. No one is to be seen going to heaven, or elsewhere, by this route, but the guide says he has often found the resting spot of one day has disappeared at his next visit. So a rather startling newspaper epitaph is included as one of the possibilities of a tourist's ticket.

This volcano is presided over by the Goddess Pele, and at intervals that seem almost deadly, she sends from a much higher crater a stream of lava that usually makes quite a reputation for itself before it ceases. And there, by hangs rather an interesting tale.

In the year the theologian calls 1822, the last of these great lava rivers started to cross the island, and reach the ocean. But right in its road was the sea serpent of the island, the famous little city of Hilo. The inhabitants, both sacred and profane, naturally objected to being wiped out in this manner, and a battle royal began, just as, according to sacred history, a similar battle was fought to the bitter end between Elijah the prophet and the priests of Baal. The prophet defied the priests to set fire to the sacrifice on a great altar he had built. Their prayers were many, but too cold for the occasion, and the sacrifice remained unroasted. But the prayers of the prophet went straight to the spot. There was a grand conflagration, and, of course, the "maddening crowd" joined his church immediately. For there was, even in those days, nothing so popular as success. Here was to be a similar battle between the prophet and the priests, and was to put out a fire instead of kindling it.

The missionaries and their flocks took first linings, but the dread goddess continued her march to the tune of "Roll on, thou shining river." When the awful stream was less than three-fourths of a mile from the city a dear, good princess of the then royal family undertook to appeal to the goddess. It was a bold move, and she was weighing something over 300 pounds, who proceeded to take the accustomed offering in a chariot which would vulgarly be called an ox-cart, only it was drawn by loving and enthusiastic natives. She sat flat on the bottom of the cart, with her princely limbs hanging out behind in the full glare of the 19th century. With her were offerings well known as acceptable to the divine Pele.

From a rock overhanging the flowing stream, the princess cast in a sucking pig, and bananas, where the goddess could immediately scent and enjoy the feast. In a moment the lava ceased to flow and the city was saved. A gentleman holding high office under the king took me to witness the scene. It was something over 300 pounds, who proceeded to take the accustomed offering in a chariot which would vulgarly be called an ox-cart, only it was drawn by loving and enthusiastic natives. She sat flat on the bottom of the cart, with her princely limbs hanging out behind in the full glare of the 19th century. With her were offerings well known as acceptable to the divine Pele.

Of course, the natives believed more firmly than ever in their great goddess. And why should not they? Elijah murdered all that did not believe in his god. These gentle natives should continue to make unswerving prayers. The missionaries shouted "only a coincidence." Just so. But the same remark hits the case of Elijah. Personally I confess to a great respect for an answered prayer, but none at all for the petition that can neither start a fire, or do any other useful work. So Pele, dear Pele, write down as an humble admirer, and accept my earnest congratulations on your success.

Just one question to the learned. How comes it that the goddess of the Hawaiian volcano on the lonely Isle of the mid-Pacific has the same name as the Atlantic volcano which since the above was written has destroyed the city of Martinique? A SPIRIT MESSAGE.

Presenting Some Reflections on the Birth of the New Year.

The year of 1905 is very near its close at this writing. It has but a little over one hour to live, as you of earth would say.

You realized as the sun sank behind the western hills, and as the shadows of the approaching night came silently on, that before the curtain of night was raised again the death of the old year and the birth of the new would have taken place.

How many, as they entered their chambers to retire, and long before this hour have passed into the peaceful condition which comes with normal sleep, fully realized that the year of 1905 was soon to die and the new year born and ready to greet them?

They feared nothing from the change which was so soon to take place, for they knew a year was only a time limit as measured by man; only a brief period in their earth life.

They believed the sun will shine just as brightly for them in the coming year as in the past; that rain and the dew will moisten the earth, and that all of nature's laws will be safely and wisely carried on.

Friends, try with all your power to bring yourselves into a condition to look upon the death of the material body with the same calm assurance as you do upon the death of the old year.

This is the condition which we of the spiritual world are trying so hard to bring about, and to prove to you on earth in every possible way, that we do live, after the change called death.

When we have fully proved this fact to you (and this knowledge is being accepted to a much greater extent than it was even one year ago), then will the belief and knowledge of eternal life have gained the victory over the King of Terrors.

It may require a long time to bring about the great work we are anxious to accomplish, but we will have the patience and the work will be done, but with a great portion of the inhabitants of earth the progress may be slow as they will hesitate to accept the testimony of the most eminent mediums of the day.

They cannot accept the truths so freely given to them.

We earnest workers for the advancement of the great cause of Spiritualism do unite in sending our best wishes to each one who is inclined to accept our teachings, and who will take the time to read our testimony through earthly mediums.

We unite in sending to the readers of The Progressive Thinker the best wishes for the coming year.

The Progressive Thinker is like the Star of Bethlehem. May its celestial light guide you to the manger of peace, love, truth and spiritual understanding for which it is intended.

Follow in its light through the night of earth life for it leadeth you to wisdom and comfort.

Follow in the good work you have begun, for it will bring to you a priceless reward.

We send to the whole world our Happy New Year's greetings.

Lo! a mighty chorus of voices fill the air with "Peace on earth, good will to men."—Received by L. M. Cobb, at Grafton, Mass.

Some Suggestions Made as to Our Cause.

The world needs Spiritualism in its purity.

Millions of earth's children are groping in spiritual darkness, huddled and thriving to know where truth is to be found. Let each one of us go forth with a will and tell the glad tidings of great joy to human beings everywhere, that God is no demoniacal, inhuman, disgusting, ignorant or treacherous being, beneath the brutes of the field and animals of the forest, and as the creedal dogmas of the churches would have us believe; such as they have been frightening humanity with for centuries.

Spiritualists should do their duty, and declare the whole truth, instead of trying to compromise with error; and what else are they doing when they try to establish creeds by which to rule Spiritualists as the churches do their own.

If Spiritualists will do their duty to themselves and to others, instead of following in the old worn-out by-paths of creeddom, they will establish a plan whereby the truths brought to earth by angels (progressed spirits who have overcome the lusts of the flesh and their earthly desires), will be proclaimed to earth's people, freed from all dogmatic teaching.

They will see to it that these so-called co-operators with the angel world, who fail to realize any higher purpose in Spiritualism than a means of making money, are barred from their nefarious practice of fraud and dishonesty in the name of Spiritualism.

Spiritualism means humanizing humanity, lifting the people up morally and spiritually, enlightening them in regard to right living and their duty to themselves and others. It means not only the immortality of the soul, but it means that, instead of praying to imaginary beings whom we are ten million-million times glad to learn never existed, we are to purge ourselves of all wrong doing, by overcoming all imperfections from our lives, living pure, honest, upright, chaste and loyal, doing our whole duty in regard to everything, not only to ourselves but to everyone else.

A CURIOUS PHENOMENON.

Occurring in the Presence of a Little Boy Four Years of Age.

Our grandson, within a few days of four years, is very sensitive, yet a healthy child, not afraid of anything. He gets up once or twice nearly every night, alone in the dark. He has been staying with his grandmas the past five months. His mamma having been absent came home a few days ago, and slept with her child. A few nights ago he got up on his knees in bed, wiping one hand on the wall. His mamma awoke and asked him what he was doing. He said he was wiping the blood off his hand, and when she asked what made it bloody, he stated that it was made bloody by the shadows of the room. He said he saw the shadows of the room, and that they were full of shadows, but the three particular were throwing a white light up and down, and finally threw it to the floor, and hit it with a stick.

HAUNTED BY DEAD MOTHER.

Believes the Apparition of His Dead Parent Is Punishing Him Because He Cursed Her for Leaving Most of Her Property to His Sister—His Wife Confirms Report of Mysterious Doings in Their Household—Tables and Chairs Upset.

Because he cursed his mother for her supposed injustice to him [says the Chicago Tribune], Frank Swullus, 1596 West Thirty-ninth street, Chicago, believes he and his family are haunted by her spirit.

When the mother of Swullus died last February she left most of her property to her daughter. The son thought he had been treated unjustly, and his anger over the matter caused him to utter violent execrations against the dead woman. Shortly afterward the strange apparitions, accompanied by uncommon noises, took possession of the Swullus residence.

Convinced He Is Haunted.

At first the son and his wife treated the visitations as imaginary and tried to forget the "spirit" because they did not believe in what are termed "ghosts," but as the apparitions increased the number of their visits Swullus' conscience smote him and he became convinced that he was haunted because of the unkind words he had spoken against his mother.

One night recently a shadow passed between Swullus and the lamp in his room. He looked up and saw what he declares was the form of his mother. Mrs. Swullus also saw the apparition. Since then tables and chairs have been moved to and fro and the water was turned on and off at the sink when nobody was near.

Bothered While at Work.

Until two weeks ago Swullus was night watchman in one of the warehouses of Swift & Co., at the stockyards. But the avenging spirit haunted him there, too, so he sought a day position on the killing floor of the Swift plant.

"I am convinced that there is more to these apparitions than I first thought," Swullus said. "I know I haven't imagined the things that have happened recently." Mrs. Swullus corroborated her husband's story.

The mother of the haunted man was Mrs. F. Kujawski. She lived with her daughter, Dr. R. Reenstrom, at 1003 West Thirty-first place.

"My mother was always kind to all of us," said Dr. Reenstrom, "and if Frank is followed by a specter it is because his conscience troubles him. He sees her in his own conscience and then he believes that he is being pursued."

THE PRODIGAL DAUGHTER.

Some Reflections in Regard to Her Status.

As for as this world is concerned there is no mercy or pity for the returning prodigal daughter. The son may wallow in the mire and filth of pollution, feed on the husks of sin and infamy, and he will come back clad in becoming raiment and knock at the door of society; he is eagerly received within the portals; marriageable misses smile and simper sweetly in the face of the moral leper, and fond mamma's are very gracious and kind, "feeling it their womanly duty to encourage the poor fellow to do better and settle down now that he has saved his wild cat."

But the repentant daughter! Oh, hush! Breathe not her name within the precincts of society; keep her out, push her downward, hurry her onward to the suicide's grave and after having appeased your righteous indignation, return to petting the dear boy who has made a start to come back to the path of rectitude. Ten to one, he never comes back. He knows he can wade up to his eyes in sin and keep his place in society.

But how is it with the poor prodigal coming to God? He receives all alike. A broken and contrite spirit and a genuine repentance is all he asks. He has only one code of morals for all, and of the son a full and complete surrender of sin, and just the same requirement is made of the daughter.

All this prattle about women being sweet angels of purity, and it is so much worse for them to be wicked than their brothers, is a silly and dangerous doctrine. It upholds men in the idea that it is not half so sinful and ruinous for them to curse, lie, drink, and act the demon generally as it would be for their wives, sisters and then society (?) steps in and completes the ruinous delusion.

In the eyes of God impurity means as much in the eyes of one of his subjects as another, and the ambassadors of the most high have a right to say a wicked man is bad, but a wicked woman is worse. It is false; they are good or bad according to the degree of sin, and without reference to sex.

We hear someone say "A man who is an infidel is bad enough, but, oh, it is so much worse for a woman to be skeptical on the subject of religion." Yes, from a human standpoint it may seem worse, but human judgment is not always a safe criterion, and people who always conform to society's laws regardless of higher moral obligations are apt to go astray.

It is the duty of parents, teachers, the press and the pulpit to teach purity, truthfulness and morality to all alike, and to insist that the boy cultivate a high sense of honor and self-respect as well as his sister, impressing his mind with the fact that the penalty of disobedience will fall as heavily on one as on the other. God hastens the day when society will throw the same restraint around about what is said by their sisters. It is right it should be so.

MRS. E. B. BRADSHAW.

The other shadows seemed to be throwing dishes and among them was the shadow of a black hog. The three that were abusing the baby started to carry it upward, and when they got to a level with the bed the boy reached out to catch it and got his hand bloody, and while wiping it the shadows and baby reached the ceiling and disappeared. On being asked the size of the shadow, he said it was the size of Hildred, a little girl one year old.

WOE IS THINE.

"Hark from the tombs, a doleful sound!"
A voice comes from the silent ground—
"Our loved ones lost have all been found!—
Not clothed in garb of earthly taint, Illumined with phosphorus paint;
Not decked with wigs and whiskers, made
On earth to win and gain a trade
For fakes at peep-shows on parade;
But clothed in spirit from their deeds,
And fed according to their needs
In Soul-Land's greener, fresher meads."

A sound comes up from every grave;
From those interred as king and slave;
From cringing coward and from brave;
From every closet, dark and dank,
Of high and low in human rank;
Of optimist and silly crank;
Proclaiming—"Life! Eternity!"
Proclaiming—"Truth! Fraternity!"
Proclaiming—"Love! Maternity!"
Proclaiming—"Death to Fraud, and due Allegiance unto all that's true
On earth and out beyond the blue."

HANGED ON SPIRITS' TESTIMONY.

That Spirit Return to Earth Has Been Proved in Thousands of Different Ways.

The testimony of a "ghost" would not now count for much in a court of law, but the day has been when it has sufficed to hang a man. It is stated that the original depositions are in the Moulton library of a most remarkable case of this character.

A girl named Anne Walker was supposed to have been sent away for her good by a substantial farmer. Some time afterward an apparition appeared to a neighbor, with its head all bloody from wounds, and telling him that she had been murdered by the farmer and an accomplice. Her body, the apparition said, had been buried in a spot which she described, and she begged the man to whom she appeared to bring her murderers to justice. True enough, the body was found in the place mentioned and the men were brought to trial. The sensational character of the case was intensified by one of the jurymen declaring that he saw the child of the dead woman "sitting upon the shoulder" of its father, the farmer. Both the culprits were hanged.

There was a ghostly accuser in a case with which the readers of Scott are familiar. Soon after the "45" an English soldier wandering near Braemar met a violent death. Hawks do not peck out hawks' eyes and no man opened his mouth to give a clew. Years passed and then came a story of a communication from another world.

A farm servant declared that in the night a spirit had appeared to him, declaring itself to be the ghost of the soldier, whose bones it said lay still unburied. The Highlander must see to their decent interment and have the murderers, two men named, brought to justice. The Highlander promised, but did not keep his word, and a second and third time the spirit appeared and upbraided him for his breach of faith. Alarmed at last and no longer daring to delay, the man called a companion, went to the spot, which the spirit had indicated, and there found the bones of the murdered warrior concealed in a moorland tract called the Hill of Christie.

The story of the Highlander came to the ears of an anti-Jacobite, who caused the matter to be brought to trial before the court of Justiciary, Edinburgh. There the tale was corroborated by a woman who had seen a naked figure enter the place on the night spoken of by the man.

It was an age of superstition, in a district more than commonly given to superstitions, and the jury seemed disposed to find the two men charged guilty of the murder. But it happened that the principal witness spoke only Gaelic.

"Now," said the counsel for the defense, "in what language did the ghost speak?"

"In as good Gaelic as I ever heard in Lochaber," was the reply.

"Pretty good for the ghost of an English soldier," said the counsel.

And that question and comment saved the necks of the men at the bar. The jury could believe in a ghost, but not in an English ghost speaking Gaelic.—London Daily Standard.

PENNVILLE, IND.

Its Numerous Advantages Pointed Out.

Pennville, Ind., formerly Camden, is a nice little town of about 1,000 population, located on the C. & O. R. R., 10 miles from Portland, 18 from Bluffton, 10 from Redkey, 10 from Montpelier, and 13 from Hartford City.

This is a fine farming country, with first-class gravel pits. The famous Twin Hills (gravel) being only 2 1/2 miles from town.

There are enough Spiritualists in the surrounding country to make the levitating work nicely. The West Grove Hall being 3 1/2 miles northeast of town.

This comes as near being a "free country" religiously as any place I ever saw, the population being composed of Quakers, Spiritualists, Methodists, Campbellites, United Brethren, Independent, Materialists, Agnostics, and last but not least, "I Don't Knows."

Mrs. Bowman is giving seances once a week, either at her home or some friend's, which are said to be giving general satisfaction; as there is no charge made, there is no inducement for fraud.

EXPLANATION OF DREAMS.

We Never Die—Even in the Sleep of Death We Live, Move and Have Our Being.

Often, in the nightly trance of our senses we drift into the mysterious, untrilled land of dreams. It is a land of lights and shadows, of hopes and despair, where the pleasures, sorrows, and emotions of daily life follow us with a vague and strange intensity. We see, as if awake, feel, or seem to feel, as if in conscious life, experience the joyful elevation of love, hope, and veneration, or the agony of mental anguish, fear, and horror. Under the strange spell of the unknown part of ourselves, whether inferior or superior to the workaday part, we struggle and debate, argue and declaim, entreat, weep, laugh, cry, sing, perhaps swear, as when awake. Sometimes we awake with deep regret from parting with cherished friends and halcyon associations; and sometimes we start up in shuddering terror, as if escaped from the clutches of a demon, and lo, the sun is shining and the birds are singing, and—"Thank God, it was only a dream!"

It is a sacred and mystic land, this land of dreams, sacred from the impudent, exploring probe of the scientist. Even that great and gentle analyst and exponent of human nature, the immortal bard of Avon, shrank from exploring its jealous preserves. Many and marvelous are his eulogies of sleep: "Innocent sleep! Sleep that knits the ravell'd sleeve of care; the death of each day's life; sore labor's bath, balm for hurt minds; nature's great second course; chief nourisher in life's feast." But nowhere in all his rich treasury of thought has he left us an analysis of the meaning or scope of our dreams—those strange things that come and fill in the cloudland in which the soul struggles towards the mysterious fulfillment of its creation. Intangible and elusive, they mock at us, and flit like specters at the crow of the cock. Vain to attempt in our realistic waking hours to pluck out the heart of the mystery, futile and silly as to listen with the ear of flesh for "the footfalls upon the confines of another world."

Some one has said, "Dreams are but the children of an idle brain." Idle and begot must be the brain that gave birth to anything so rapid and illogical. There are cases wherein the influence of dreams on some of the world's master minds have affected the destiny of nations, the fate of empires. Even scripture has set its solemn seal on their occasional portentous warning. "What 'idle brain' produced Jacob's celestial ladder, and Pharaoh's fat and lean kine, and the dream of Pilate's wife?"

WE NEVER DIE, EVEN IN THE SLEEP OF DEATH WE LIVE, MOVE, AND HAVE OUR BEING. "Even in our ashes, live their wonted fires." Hamlet feared not death, if death ended all. Is the dream a reflex or premonition of the good or evil to come when we shall have shed our fleshly raiment? Since we are dreaming of dreams and getting more vague in our blind attempt in questioning the mysterious forces which impel and propel us towards the shadowy land, the suggestion naturally arises: Why may not dreams such as afflict "Poor fools of nature, who shake so horribly withal and have thoughts that are above the reaches of our souls"—why may not our dreams, with their ofttime thralldom and suffering, be an illustration, or rather exemplification of what theologians formerly denominated hell and modern erudition with gentle classicism spells hades? Whence comes the glad sense of redemption from a dreamland inferno, to which we had been condemned perhaps for untiring and untiring attempts of loving, loving, and loving, and where we had been suffering torments? Whence, too, our regret and disappointment in awakening from a pleasant dream? The pleasant dream is the crown of life. It leads us by roseate paths into "green pastures, beside the still waters," where we are envied with noble and beautiful people, among whom we are at ease, and joyfully contented, with a peace of mind that passeth understanding.

"Is this a dream?
Then waking would be pain.
Pray do not wake me,
Let me dream again."

Vain for the ordinary mortal to try to recall the elusive and bewildering dream for purposes of narration. We may soar into that cloudland as an aeronaut may venture towards the upper heaven, only to return chilled to the marrow, benumbed and dazed by the awful infinity of the unreachables; for it is written for our mental limitations much more than for the solution of our physical problems. Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther.

As sleep is the sister of death, so may our dreams be the sister of what follows death. In this contemplation we can but prescribe for our groping selves the faith defined by the Apostle Paul: "The substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."

Vast is the amount of man's energy expended in unsubstantial results for final good, aimful yet futile, as the ant toils restlessly while all else is inaction, only to have its ephemeral mound swept away by the next gentle rain. Like that indefatigable little toiler, silently and persistently fulfilling the cause of its creation, must we poor mortals go on working and dreaming and conjecturing. Up the adamantine bill of the hereafter we may gaze with clasped hands, in mute wonder and hope, keen to the prospect that some time the search of the soul for the true shall be a sublime reality, that there shall be a merger from our lot: "Upon this bank and shoal of time," to an eternal reckoning, which cannot be amiss, since the Omnipotent has made the calculation of our immortal manifest destiny. But the more we try to unravel the mysteries of our being, the attempt to gain the secrets of the Almighty, the deeper do we founder in the hopeless depths of speculation. When even the physical facts of our being are too deep for human doctors and scientists, when to them, even in this advanced age, the facts of our birth and death, evolution and development are but phenomena, how may we, anthill toilers, hope to find light or truth as to our spiritual future being by researches in the mystic borderland of dreams? Then let us work and weep and suffer and bravely bear the burdens which we are destined to carry, with faith deep, broad, tender, and unquestioning, till at length we may have

TO DRIVE AWAY LONELINESS.

Writer Says Every Mortal May Store His Mind So as to Add to Happiness.

Not long since a woman of culture (as set forth in the Chicago Record-Herald) remarked that she was "never lonely." When this remark had taken the proper hold upon me I realized how true this state might be to others of the human family and how desirable such a condition is as a factor in human happiness.

Especially is it true that mortals must live more and more within themselves as age approaches and must in an ever-increasing ratio draw from the store of earlier impressions the pleasures of life. The question with us when young should be, therefore, as to whether we shall prepare for the most happy and desirable condition of never being lonely and of always being mentally alert and vigorous, by reason of living upon the delightful impressions received when the mind was in its most receptive condition, or whether we shall be content to look into the future with nothing of value in that storehouse and must depend in age on dozing in the chimney corner and be ever lonely.

I am sure, apart from the consolations of religion, which all do not have, there is no factor so great as all the world to prevent loneliness as a brain whose every recess is filled with the beautiful thoughts and choice language of those great authors whose works live to bless mankind. And I know of no factor that exerts so potent an influence in giving us the means to arrive at the most desirable condition of living happily within ourselves when from necessity we may have others to cheer us as the library, whether it be private or public. Its stores enable all to lay by memories fit to save them from an unhappy future of solitude and to endow them with that blessed spirit which, as Pope says:

"Warm in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
Glows in the stars and blossoms in the trees,
Lives through all life, extends through all extent, Spreads undivided, operates unspent;
Breathes in our soul, informs our mortal part,
As full, as perfect, in a half as heart,
As full, as perfect, in a vile man that Burns and shares the same divine spark."

Lines of Heaven.

Oh if upon some fair and fadless land,
Where Jasper seas their wavelets gleam and roll,
Neath wondrous soft light of a spirit sun

To find the one true love mate of the soul Could this be aught less than heaven—to thee
Oh! traveler lone, o'er earth's desert waste,
Once in the "many mansions" pure and free
Forever love's immortal joys to taste?

Art thou, dear soul, preparing for that sphere,
To augment the store of that lov'd one's bliss?
Dost thou cause heart's around to grow less scar,
As thou dost bear those bright realms from this?

Strive ever! take heaven with thee to that land;
All of earth, perishest here below,
But Love's pure name for aye, with God may stand,
While happy angels through those mansions go.

Thou may'st dwell near heaven on this earth;
And oft from sorrow's bitter cup drink deep,
From a sweet soul crushed all native mirth—
But angels o'er thee their fond vigils keep.

For that which looks to man as merest chance,
Shows pain, and love, o'er a thousand years ago,
That he, or she, God's glory should advance,
Though they in earth's humblest homes may grow.

A STRANGE OCCURRENCE.

An Illustration of Occult Influence.

Between 8 and 9 o'clock, while reading, my eyes became tired and I closed them for rest, when immediately a beautiful green lawn appeared plainly before me, studded here and there in a Sunday suit of mixed flowers. I often have such visions. Now the strange part: While admiring this lovely scene a well dressed young lady, a spirit, advanced and jestingly looked at me and laughed. I asked, "Who is this?" She then vanished.

I had made a pair of pincers out of a solid piece of wood and had placed them in an adjoining room, hardly dry from varnish.

Early in the morning I discovered the pincers were missing. There was no one in the house but myself and daughter. After she went to work, I made a thorough hunt for the pincers, all to no purpose, and I became worried as I had put considerable work on them.

About 9 o'clock I went to my room, and, lo! to my surprise there lay the pincers in the very place I put them 24 hours before. Now did that pretty young lady take them? It is plain that either the human hands had to do with this. Those who know me will give this statement serious attention.

A Little Pilgrim.

This is a charming narrative illustrating the beauty grandeur and sublimity of the spirit side of life, the realms of souls, the immortal spheres of existence. Margaret O. W. Oliphant is the author. And while it has been read by millions in the past, it will prove refreshing and soul-inspiring to our readers to again peruse it and feel its thrills of inspiration, and enjoy its uplifting influence.

"I knew you were coming," said the maiden; "when my mother has wanted me I have seen you there. And you were thinking of her now; that was how I found you."

"Do you know, then, what one thinks?" said the little Pilgrim, with wondering eyes.

"It is in the air; and when it concerns us it comes to us like the breeze. But we who are the children here, we feel it more quickly than you."

"Are you a child?" said the little Pilgrim, "or are you an angel? Some-times you are like a child; but then your face shines, and you are like—You must have some name for it here; there is nothing among the words I know." And then she paused a little, still looking at her, and cried, "Oh, if she could but see you, little Margaret! That would do her most good of all."

Then the maiden Margaret shook her lovely head. "What does her most good is the will of the Father," she said.

At this the little Pilgrim felt once more that thrill of expectation and awe. "Oh, child, you have seen him?" she cried.

And the other smiled. "Have you forgotten who they are that always be-hold his face? We have never had any fear or trembling. We are not angels, and there is no other name; we are the children. There is something given to us beyond the others. We have had no other home."

"Oh, tell me, tell me!" the little Pilgrim cried.

Upon this Margaret kissed her, putting her soft cheek against hers, and said, "It is a mystery; it cannot be put into words; in your time you will know."

"When you touch me you change me, and I grow like you," the Pilgrim said. "Ah, if she could see us together, you and me! And will you go to her soon again? And do you see them always, what they are doing? and take care of them?"

"It is our Father who takes care of them, and our Lord who is our Brother. I do his errands when I am able. Some-times he will let me go, sometimes an-other, according as it is best. Who am I that I should take care of them? I serve them when I may."

"But you do not forget them?" the Pilgrim said, with wistful eyes.

"We love them always," said Margaret. She was more still than the lady who had first spoken with the Pilgrim. Her countenance was full of a heavenly calm. It had never known passion nor anguish. Sometimes there was in a far-seeing look of vision, sometimes the simplicity of a child. "But what are we in comparison? For he loves them more than we do. When he keeps us from them, it is for love. We must each live our own life."

"But it is hard for them sometimes," said the little Pilgrim, who could not withdraw her thoughts from those she had left.

"They are never forsaken," said the angel-maiden.

"But oh! there are worse things than sorrow," the little Pilgrim said; "there is wrong, there is evil, Margaret. Will not he send you to step in before them, to save them from wrong?"

"It is not for us to judge," said the young Margaret with eyes full of heav-ily wisdom; "our Brother has it all in his hand. We do not read their hearts, like him. Sometimes you are permitted to see the battle—"

The little Pilgrim covered her eyes with her hands. "I could not—I could not; unless I knew they were to win the day!"

"They will win the day in the end. But sometimes, when it is being lost, I have seen in his face a something—I cannot tell—more love than before. Something that seemed to say, 'My child, my child, would that I could do it for thee, my child!'"

"Oh! that is what I have always felt," cried the Pilgrim, clasping her hands; her eyes were dim, her heart for a moment almost forgot its blessedness. "But he could; oh, little Margaret, he could! You have forgotten, 'Lord, if thou wilt thou canst—'"

The child of heaven looked at her mutely, with sweet, grave eyes, in which there was much that confused her who was a stranger here, and once more softly shook her head.

"Is it that he will not then?" said the other with a low voice of awe.

"Our Lord, who died—he—"

"Listen!" said the other; "I hear his step on the way."

The little Pilgrim rose up from the mound on which she was sitting. Her soul was confused with wonder and fear. She had thought that an angel might step between a soul on earth and sin, and that if one but prayed and prayed, the dear Lord would stand between and deliver the tempted. She had meant when she saw his face to ask him to save. Was not he born, did not he live and die, to save?

The angel maiden looked at her all the while with eyes that understood all her perplexity, and her doubt, but spoke not. Thus it was that before the Lord came to her, the sweetness of her first blessedness was obscured, and she found that here too, even here, though in a moment she should see him, there was need for faith. Young Margaret, who had been kneeling by her, rose up too and stood among the lilies, waiting, her soft countenance shining, her eyes turned towards him who was coming. Upon her there was no cloud nor doubt. She was one of the children of that land familiar with his presence. And in the air there was a sound such as those who hear it alone can describe, a sound as of help coming and safety, like the sound of a deliverer when one is in deadly danger, like the sound of a conqueror, like the step of the dearest beloved coming home.

As it came nearer, the fear melted away out of the beating heart of the Pilgrim. Who could fear so near him? Her breath went away from her, her heart out of her bosom to meet his coming. Oh, never fear could live where he was! Her soul was all confused, but it was with hope and joy. She held out her hands in that amazement, and dropped upon her knees, not knowing what she did.

He was going about his Father's business, not lingering, yet neither making haste; and the calm and peace which the little Pilgrim had seen in the faces of the blessed were but reflections from the majestic gentleness of the countenance to which, all quivering with happiness and wonder, she lifted up her eyes. Many things there had been in her mind to say to him. She wanted to ask for those she loved some things which perhaps he had overlooked. She wanted to say "Send me." It seemed to her that there was the occasion she had longed for all her life.

Oh, how many times had she wished to be able to go to him, to fall at his feet, to show him something which had been left undone, something which perhaps for her asking he would remember to do. But when this dream of her life was fulfilled, and the little Pilgrim, kneeling, and all shaken and trembling with devotion and joy, was at his feet, lifting her face to him, seeing him, hearing him—then she said nothing to him at all. She no longer wanted to say anything, or wanted anything except what he chose, or had power to think of anything except that all was well, and everything—everything as it should be in his hand.

It seemed to her that all that she had ever hoped for was fulfilled when she met the look in his eyes. At first it seemed too bright for her to meet; but next moment she knew it was all that was needed to light up the world, and in it everything was clear. Her trembling ceased, her little frame grew inspired; though she still knelt, her head rose erect, drawn to him like the flower to the sun. She could not tell how long it was, nor what was said, nor if it was in words.

All that she knew was that she told him all that ever she had thought, or wished, or intended in all her life, although she said nothing at all; and that he opened all things to her, and showed her that everything was well, and no one forgotten; and that the things she would have told him of were more near his heart than hers, and those to whom she wanted to be sent were in his own hand. But whether this passed with or without words, she could not tell. Her soul expanded under his eyes like a flower. It opened out, it compre-hended and felt and knew. She smote her hands together in her wonder that she could have missed seeing what was so clear, and laughed with a sweet scorn at her folly, as two people who love each other laugh at the little mis-understanding that has parted them.

She was bold with him, though she was so timid by nature, and ventured to laugh at herself, not to reproach herself; for his divine eyes spoke no blame, but smiled upon her folly too. And then he laid a hand upon her head, which seemed to fill her with currents of strength and joy running through all her veins. And then she seemed to come to herself, saying loud out, "And that I will! and that I will!" and lo, she was kneeling on the warm, soft soil alone, and hearing the sound of his footsteps as he went about his Father's business, filling the air with echoes of blessing.

And all the people who were coming and going smiled upon her, and she knew they were all glad for her that she had seen him, and got the desire of her heart. Some of them waved their hands as they passed, and some paused a moment and spoke to her with tender congratulations. They seemed to have the tears in their eyes for joy, remembering every one the first time they had themselves seen him, and the joy of it; so that all about there sounded a concord of happy thoughts all echoing to each other, "She has seen the Lord!"

Why did she say, "And that I will!" and that I will! with such fervor and delight? She could not have told, but yet she knew. The first thing was that she had yet to wait and believe until all things should be accomplished, neither doubting nor fearing, but knowing that all should be well; and the second was that she must delay no longer, but rise up and serve the Father according to what was given her as her reward.

When she had recovered a little of her rapture, she rose from her knees, and stood still for a little, to be sure which way she was to go. And she was not aware what guided her, but yet turned her face in the appointed way without any doubt. For doubt was now gone away forever, and that fear that once gave her so much trouble lest she might not be doing what was best. As she moved along she wondered at herself more and more. She felt no longer, as at first, like the child she remembered to have been, venturing out in the awful loneliness of the morning before anyone was awake; but she felt that to move along was a de-light, and that her foot scarcely touched the grass. And the whole being was instinct with such lightness of strength and life, that it did not matter to her how far she went, nor what she carried, nor if the way was easy or hard.

The way she chose was one of those which led to the great gate, and many met her coming from thence, with looks that were somewhat bewildered, as if they did not yet know whether they were going or what had happened to them,—upon whom she smiled as she passed them with soft looks of tenderness and sympathy, knowing what they were feeling, but did not stop to explain to them, because she had some-thing else that had been given her to do. For this is what always follows in that country when you meet the Lord, that you instantly know what it is that he would have you do.

The little Pilgrim thus went on and on toward the gate, which she had not seen when she herself came through it, having been lifted in his arms by the great Death Angel, and set down softly inside, so that she did not know it, or even the shadow of it. As she drew nearer, the light became less bright, though very sweet, like a lovely dawn, and she wondered to herself to think that she had been here but a moment ago, and yet so much had passed since then. And still she was not aware what was her errand, but wondered if she was to go back by these same gates, and perhaps return where she had been.

She went up to them very closely, for she was curious to see the place through which she had come in her sleep,—as a traveler goes back to see the city, gate, with its bridge and por-ticulis, through which he has passed by night. The gate was very great, of a wonderful, curious architecture, hav-ing strange, delicate arches and cano-piles above. Some parts of them seemed cut very clean and clear; but the outlines were all softened with a sort of mist and shadow, so that it looked greater and higher than it was.

The lower part was not one great doorway, as the Pilgrim had supposed, but had innumerable doors, all separate and very narrow, so that but one could pass at a time, though the arch in-closed all, and seemed filled with great folding gates, in which the smaller doors were set, so that if need arose a vast opening might be made for many to enter. Of the little doors many were shut as the Pilgrim approached; but from moment to moment one after another would be pushed softly open from without, and some one would come in.

The little Pilgrim looked at it all with great interest, wondering which of the doors she herself had come by; but while she stood absorbed by this, a door was suddenly pushed open close by her, and some one flung forward into the blessed country, falling upon the ground, and stretched out wild arms as though to clutch the very soil. This sight gave the Pilgrim a great surprise; for it was the first time she had heard any sound of pain, or seen any sight of trouble, since she entered here. In that moment she knew what it was that the dear Lord had given her to do. She had no need to pause to think, for her heart told her; and she did not hesi-tate, as she might have done in the other life, not knowing what to say. She went forward and gathered this poor creature into her arms, as if it had been a child, and drew her quite within the land of peace; for she had fallen across the threshold, so as to hinder any one entering who might be coming after her.

It was a woman, and she had flung herself upon her face, so that it was difficult for the little Pilgrim to see what manner of person it was; for though she felt herself strong enough to take up this new-comer in her arms and carry her away, yet she forbore, seeing the will of the stranger was not so. For some time this woman lay moaning, with now and then a great sob shaking her as she lay. The little Pilgrim had taken her by both her arms, and drawn her head to rest upon her own lap, and was still holding the hands, which the poor creature had thrown out as if to clutch the ground. Thus she lay for a little while, as the little Pilgrim remembered she herself had lain, not wishing to move, wonder-ing what had happened to her; then she clutched the hands which grasped her, and said, muttering:

"You are some one new. Have you come to save me? Oh, save me! Oh, save me! Don't let me die!"

Analysis of Wrong Doing.

"That FRAUD AND GRAFT ARE AT PRESENT SO 'GENERALLY PREVALENT,' should not be charged to the 'world of spirits,' but rather to the insatiable greed and ignorance of those still in the body. False training and false philosophy are largely responsible, operating both in the past and present."

In The Progressive Thinker of December 9, 1905, is to be found an article by Brother James Dow, of Manhattan Kan., on "Physical Phenomena," and in it he raises a number of important issues, and makes several statements that are somewhat startling, if one assumes them to be correct.

Now, were it not a fact that some of the statements thus made have an im-portant bearing upon the attitude that Spiritualists in general are taking, with reference to physical phenomena, and as well as how to deal with the frauds, and fraudulent, it would not be worth while to take valuable space in The Progressive Thinker by way of discussion, for Brother Dow's favor is plain, and to the point. But we have not yet settled the question of how we shall dispose of the fraudulent manifesta-tions, and their originators, and so, some will still "have to be shown."

To quote Brother Dow, speaking of "materializations," he affirms that "some claim them to be genuine, while others declare them to be only fraud." Now, both are correct, and there should be no dispute between them. It would seem to the writer that if we are to dispute (not angrily of course) about anything, right here is a good place to begin. If we are expected to draw spiritual inspiration from a great truth, and from its most dis-picable imitation, and from the same general source, and at the same time, we must certainly develop a power of discrimination that can only be at-tained by long practice, and in the meantime more or less of disputation is likely to occur.

But Brother Dow explains by saying, substantially, "that we are compelled to reject the spirit of a low moral and gross spiritual nature for all a phys-ical phenomena, and should cer-tainly guard against fraud." He also affirms that "the higher class of spirits who have become more re-fined and etherealized cannot handle unrefined material substances."

In these statements are food for thought, and a basis for reputa-tion. For instance, how shall we deal with the honest, and oftentimes sor-rowing investigator, when he inquires as to the merits and benefits of modern Spiritualism? He is in need of as-sistance, and needs conclusive evi-dence, if it can be obtained.

We have already suggested by Brother Dow would repel, rather than attract, and like one of old, the in-vestigator would "go away sorrowing."

Brother Dow also says that "scientific research has shown that people who were spiritually minded have been able to materialize just as they were leaving the body, and while hovering between the physical and the spiritual, but never afterwards."

He attempts to explain the appear-ance of fraudulent manifestations, and to remove anxiety from the minds of worthy people as to the real status and utility of Spiritualism, and his article above noted is worthy of careful study, but for some reason we cannot quite agree with him upon the above-stated propositions, as well as some others contained in the article in question. It seems to me the real solution of fraud-ulent manifestations of any phase or grade, is found largely on this side the line.

The rule is, I believe, that we re-ject that which we invite. This is a natural law, with, of course, the usual exceptions as to its application. That FRAUD AND GRAFT ARE AT PRESENT SO GENERALLY PREVALENT, should not be charged to the "world of spirits," but rather to the insatiable greed and ignorance of those still in the body. False training and false philosophy are largely responsi-ble, operating both in the past and present.

To attribute our weakness and fail-ures to the co-operation of bad men and evil spirits, as is alleged, and the propo-riety as taught by our orthodox friends. But, as before stated, we have honest doubts as to the accuracy of some of Brother Dow's statements. The one quoted above as showing the results of scientific inquiry.

The investigations of Dr. Hare, the great electrician, Professor Wallace, and Professor Crookes, and many other eminent scientists, called into play a range of intelligence and spiritual power on the part of the disembodied men difficult to parallel. These men ex-hausted every resource known to the scientific world, including even the most complicated and costly balance mechanical appliances in "testing" the accuracy and genuineness of the phe-nomena, and were compelled to ac-knowledge themselves matched by the intelligence of those on the other side, and while evidence of deception and fraud was everywhere to be seen, suf-ficient of the high moral attainment and purity of motive was obtained to cause these eminent men to unhesi-tantly endorse the phenomena and the philosophy based upon it.

Will Brother Dow kindly give us the scientific evidence he refers to?

We have already more from Brother Dow, "Materializing mediums are often forced while in an unconscious condition to present themselves to a credulous audience as materialized spirits by their materializing control, even when the medium might be averse to such practice."

It is to be noted that Brother Dow uses the word "often," thus conveying the idea of a somewhat general prac-tice, and a something to be expected. Now, while admitting the possibility of this, and even its evident probabili-ty of occurrence, it should be cited as an exception, and not the rule, and where the medium is averse to such practice, it is rarely, in my opinion, ever true.

The trouble with all these statements lies in mistaking exceptions for the rule, and enlarging upon them as such. We all want "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," and Spiritualism can but grow stronger in the process.

It seems to me to be just that we in-sist that the medium shall rid himself or herself of this liability, and we all know about how it can be accomplished. At once let it be known that no "professional" mediums can PRAC-TICE FRAUD, and then charge it up to the "guide" or "control," occasionally or as a rule, and escape public odium or suspicion, and the healthy, robust manipulator (and we know several of them, and they draw their principal sus-tenance from Spiritualists themselves) should at least be compelled to stand on their own footing, and not under-standing of our own philosophy de-mands and justifies this attitude.

Now, Brother Dow's attitude towards fraud is too well known to need definition from me; none, probably, would do more in a legitimate way to remove it.

What strikes me from his definition of the case, is the fact that the classes referred to are quite likely to "take un-ction to their souls," rather than to receive the restraining influence which would so gladly exert.

THE TRUTH NEEDS NO COVER-ING. "Truth needs no man's bow to no human shrine; seeks neither place nor applause; she only asks a hearing."

Mind, Soul and Spirit. To the Editor:—My last two articles published in your excellent paper, have brought me a number of letters from all directions, the majority of which compliment the clear expression of those deep subjects, and give me words of encouragement, and I thank the writers thereof.

Regarding the last article in No. 842, or Soul and Spirit, one letter from Boston, Mass., accompanied an adver-tisement indicating "readers" who insist that "mind, soul and spirit" in man are one and the same thing, and it is not clear to me, to consult a good dictionary.

O ye gods! I leave Modern Spiritualism no better message to give than dictionary defini-tions?

Man will never know himself as he is, so long as he borrows his knowledge thus, and does not enter the inner life of himself and all that is.

That which I have given out thus far to the public is exactly what I have been taught by my spirit teachers, and have seen clearly, and confirmed by actual outworking, as well as my own and general experiences.

My conscience tells me to affirm the truth as I know it, as a result of being so taught.

A number of times in the past while being taught lessons on man material and spirit, I have been privileged to see the entire mechanism of man in action, and I therefore know that soul and spirit in man's wonderful composi-tion are not one and the same thing, but are, of necessity, interactive.

Man is a living dynamo. The brain is the battery, the brain cells magnets, and the entire ganglionic system serves as lines through which soul substance passes to and from ex-change, and spirit is active through the soul and soul substance.

The brain is also the home of the spirit and seat of the soul from which it spreads all through the nervous sys-tem.

The golden bowl so often referred to, to which the silver is attached, through which the vital supplies of life are carried, is located in the top brain.

The writer of the letter referred to affirms that mind, soul and spirit in man are one and the same thing. This is not true. The mind being resident in the brain, represents consciousness, reason, memory, etc., and the entire outfit of the brain, all these represent the powers and principles inherent in the immortal soul quickened by spirit and unfolded, strengthened and made useful by contact with external con-ditions and nature's soul-life.

On one occasion, four beings were brought before me. Two I knew to be men of earth; the other two from what is called immortal realms. These men of earth were acted upon by the other two, and soon they became so intensely active in thought that their souls fairly flowed out and returned and thus they labored and learned. I saw it in this manner that the psychic system in man and in space is through nature, for as those men were deeply en-grossed in thought, these soul fibres, like fine wire-like threads went out in silvery sheens, and so came in rapport not only with the souls and minds of the two immortals, but also with the "Universal or Over-Soul."

The scene was marvellous, wonderful, spirit acting as flashes of light through this output and exchange of soul substance, marked itself clearly, and I cried out, "Oh! how wonderful is man!" He can dissolve even as the Grand Supreme Model after which man and all that is fashioned, and re-solve himself again. Truly man as soul and spirit is a God.

"Yes," said the angel, "even so; but as to his material composition, he is the outgrowth of all that is beneath him in the kingdom of form-life and manifest-ation of expressions of cosmic substance."

I will not expand further here, but will add instead, a lesson given by a spirit on Personal Sunshine.

CHRISTIANITY IN INDIA.

How the worship of Jesus Christ was Changed to That of Jesus Christ.

In the year 1498 Vasco da Gama, a Portuguese sailor, made his way around the Cape of Good Hope, and reached the bay of Melinda on the east coast of Africa, at 3 degrees south latitude. Melinda was an Arabian city, the center of trade between India and Africa, where the spices destined for consumption in Europe were exchanged for gold and the fabrics of Arabian looms. There he found a number of traders who had come from southern India in four small vessels. Some of these traders being conducted to De Gama's ship, observed in the cabin a gilded image of the Virgin Mary, whereupon they fell down and worshipped it, presenting offerings of spices, and recognizing it as their own Maryanna, the mother of Christna, their Savior and God.

The Portuguese saw in them a means to accomplish the end they had in view, which was to obtain a pilot to the coast of India. Accordingly they claimed the Indian merchants as fellow Christians, and through them De Gama accomplished his object in reaching the shore of India.

An interpreter was found in a renegade Moor who had voyaged by way of Egypt and the Red Sea to India, and could speak Portuguese, Arabic and the language of Southern India. De Gama found on the Malabar coast worshippers of Jesus Christ, and Mary-anna, and was informed that that wor-ship prevailed for a long distance north and south. He and his sailors inferred that St. Thomas, one of the twelve apostles, had introduced the worship of Jesus Christ into India, which had degenerated to that of Jesus Christna.

The Portuguese were conducted to a large Indian temple in which were many painted images, some with great protruding teeth, others with four arms, and faces so frightful that they began to doubt whether it was indeed a Christian church. One image, which was reached by stone stairs, and which was approached by a priest, was but dimly seen in the darkness. The priest advancing toward it, called out "Maria! Maria!" The people fell flat on their faces three times, and then said their prayers standing while De Gama and his companions, who thought it was an image of the Virgin Mary, fell on their knees and prayed. But one of their number as he knelt said, "If this be a god, I, for one, worship the devil," at which the rest of the sailors smiled.

De Gama, with twelve attendant sailors, appeared at the court of the Zamorin. Addressing the dignitary he artfully said that the king of Portugal having heard that there were Chris-tian kings in India, of whom his Majesty of Calicut was said to be the principal one, had him as an ambas-sador to settle terms of friendship and trade with him. The Zamorin, with equal art, shunned all reference to the subject of religion, but wanted to know where and how distant was Portugal, and what was her naval power.

The first commercial transaction was a presentation to the Zamorin by De Gama of packages of olive oil, honey, sugar, and scarlet cloth, for which he hoped to receive a present of equal or greater value. The subordinate of-ficial laughed, saying that the poorest merchant who visited the port offered better gifts, and that if De Gama wanted to make the sovereign a present it must be of gold.

Upon being admitted to another audience with the Zamorin, when a similar intimation was made to De Gama, he replied that he had no gold. "But," said the Zamorin, "I hear you have a golden image of Mary." De Gama re-plied, "That is only of wood, gilded." "Tell your sovereign," said the Zamorin, "that in this country there is plenty of cinnamon, cloves, pepper and precious stones. What I want in exchange are gold, silver, coral and scarlet. Now you may go."

Upon leaving Calicut De Gama erected at a convenient spot on the coast above, a cross and image, mod-estly taking possession, in the name of his spiritual and temporal sovereigns, of India, and calling the place Santa Maria.

Soon after an Italian renegade boarded his ship and told him he was in the service of a Mohammedan priest, the sovereign of an island called Goa, about twelve leagues distant. In re-turn for this information De Gama seized his informant, subjected him to torture, baptized him by the name of Jaspes De Gama, and compelled him, being now a Christian, to betray his master's secrets. Thus was begun the Holy Inquisition of Goa.

A few years later more ships were sent from Portugal to India and the island of Goa was planted with papal establishments, among others the Holy Inquisition. And the worship of Jesus Christ was changed to that of Jesus Christna. The natives were told that their ritual and liturgy, since the remote days of St. Thomas had become corrupted and needed a thorough reformation; that their images were idolatrous and must be replaced by the works of European artists.

Some of the "Christian" clergy were burned at the stake after the estab-lishment of the papal system on the coast of Malabar. The clergy had mar-ried wives, had owned but two sacra-ments, had neither invoked saints nor worshipped images, nor believed in pur-gatory, had refused to say the Latin, and had used their ancient language, the Syriac.

The natives had never heard of the Christian pope until the advent of the Portuguese. Their Jesus Christna was the eighth avatar, Buddha being the ninth. The Portuguese added the ter-minal "us" to Jesus, and thus the ter-minal to the first syllable of Christna. I affirm without fear of successful con-tradiction that the name Jesus Christna is a comparatively modern one—that there is no proof of its existence long before the revival of learning—that Christna is not a Latin, a like to a proper name—and that it was coined by cloistered monks at the revival of learning, or at least not much earlier.

Nor is the word Christos a genuine Greek word. It was doubtless coined simultaneously with the Latin christus. If there was a person in Judea or Galilee answering to the Jesus of the Gospels, his name was probably Iscariot, who was also called in the language of Arabia the "Masich," that is to say, the healer. He was the prophet of the descendants of Abraham, and was re-garded as the one great prophet be-tween Abraham and Mohammed. The Koran repeatedly refers to Iscariot and his English translation of the Koran falsely renders the words, Jesus Christ. The Mohammedans bor-rowed nothing from Christianity. But the whole story of Iscariot the masich, has evidently been borrowed by the writers of the Christian Gospels from the Arabian W. HENRY BURR.

The Critic Criticized.

A Christian brother writes, that while it is true Jesus was reported, Luke 14:26, as saying:

"If any man comes to me and hates not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, yes, his own life, he cannot be my disciple," yet he did not mean an intense aversion, the lack of love, to detest, to abhor, to feel hatred, as the dictionaries define the word; but he meant he must love Jesus more than his nearest of kin."

How does our critical friend know this? Who authorized him to wrest scripture from its plain meaning, and give to it quite another? To set aside the plain words of Jesus, as recorded by Inerrant Wisdom, and make it convey an opposite idea? It is a habit of the priestly class to make Bible language convey the idea the preacher wants, not what it says.

Does not the law of evidence apply in this case? "A party shall not be allowed to alter, vary, or explain a written instrument. The parties have deliberately reduced their agreement to writing, and neither shall be permitted to show, by parole testimony, that something else was intended than the written instrument expresses. Any other rule would encourage perjury."

The table of the satyr is in point: A traveler, weary, cold and hungry, applied at the door of a satyr for a night's lodging, with food and warmth. The stranger was welcomed and seated, when he made a great ado, and blew on his hands. The table was quickly spread with the best of the humble quarters afforded to which was added hot tea and fruit. The guest turned out a saucer of tea and blew upon it with his breath.

"Why do you blow on your tea?" inquired the host.

"When you first arrived you blew on your hands. Why did you do that?"

"To warm them."

"Get out of my house. No one who blows hot and cold with the same breath shall find shelter here."

What would the wise old satyr have done with the Bible, had it been presented to him, with the claim that Jesus meant love for himself when he used the word hate?

Christian brother, think of this matter, read and tremble:

"If any man shall take away the words of this book, God shall take away his part out of the book of life!"

Hebrew Historians Not to Be Trusted.

Professor Deltzsch, in the service of the Pennsylvania University, one of the oldest and most substantial literary institutions in the United States, has spent several years in explorations on the site of ancient Babylon, one of the most famous cities of antiquity. He returned to America several months ago, and lately gave a course of lectures in New York in regard to his discoveries. Of course he labored in his lecture to avoid the discussion of religious subjects, but here is an extract that shows he is a thinker of the progressive stamp:

"The Chaldean magic and astrology passed to Egypt, and to Greece, and has come down to our times. The long stay of the Jews in Babylon and the settlement of Samaria and other portions of Palestine by Babylonians explains how so many Babylonian ideas entered into the minds of the Jews of the New Testament time—for instance the belief in demons. Many religious ideas were taken to the Old Testament, and much earlier in Babylon and are found in these records. Plenty of Bible phrases occur word for word in the legal documents. We find in Babylon inscriptions God appearing in a dream, or interfering in person, or speaking to man. We find prophets, and the legends that man was made of clay and moistened by the sweat of the maker. We find the conception of life after death, not as the Hebrew view, and ideas of a hell of drought, and a paradise of waters."

Without quoting the Professor verbatim further, it is proper to state, he found the reputed father of history, Herodotus, unvarnished, just what Prof. Sayce wrote of him several years ago. He added: "The Hebrew historians are not to be trusted," just what The Progressive Thinker has maintained for a long time.

THE UPHEAVAL

The Twentieth Century Upheaval in Spiritualism is creating a VIBRATION all along the line as never before. It is an era of candid criticism and research. To be an honest, conscientious seeker after the truth, and at the same time a FRAUD-HUNTER, is now regarded as strictly legitimate. In fact, without the gentle, considerate and humane fraud-hunter, ever on the alert for the truth, Spiritualism would pass in a great measure into the hands of the fraudulent element, just as our national currency would pass into the hands of counterfeiters if not for the whole regiment of detectives, who are constantly watching for them, arresting them, and sending them to the penitentiary. PURE SPIRITUALISM, like the genuine currency, attracts a horde of counterfeiters. With this Upheaval now going on SPIRIT RETURN is extending its benign influence everywhere. —Emil Old Theories Give Place to the New.

It is true old-time philosophers taught the universe was hastening to an eternal smash-up; that the sun was cooling off; that the orbits of planets were lessening, and eventually will fall into the sun, and that only ruin will mark the site of rolling worlds.

This idea is an inheritance from the remote past. It is akin to that statement of "our Lord," that "the sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood;" or that other theory, that all shall be destroyed by a universal conflagration.

Since astronomy has been reduced to a science there is no indication of the shortening of the paths of the planets; no abridgment of light and heat; no promise of an end; on the contrary our ablest philosophers now repudiate the idea of either a beginning or an end. Matter is eternal, always has been and always will be. Change is ever going on but destruction, never.

Light and heat are not emanations from a sun of flame. Heat is not continued by bodies falling into the sun. The nearer the approach to the sun the lower the temperature. The highest mountains are crowned with eternal snow. The deepest valleys on the earth show the greatest heat.

More than fifty years ago a learned English writer maintained our light and heat are electrical, that because all are believed to have—then the passage of light through the atmosphere calorific is produced. Flashes of light during an electric storm tell in a small way the source of illumination; but it remained until quite recent years, with the invention and practical use of the dynamo in generating electricity, to furnish an object lesson to show how the thing was done on a magnificent scale.

The whole solar system is a grand dynamo; every planet, asteroid, and comet, each revolving around the central orb, completes the circuit. It matters not how near, or how remote, the planets having atmospheres—all are believed to have—then the heat on the surface of Neptune may equal that of Mercury. And so long as the mighty natural dynamo shall continue action so long light and heat will be generated.

The sun itself is now believed to be a cold body. It is of the same material as the earth, and it may be inhabited by animal life with intelligence equal or superior to man.

Judge Daniel K. Tenney, of Madison, Wis., has lately brought out a booklet with upwards of 100 pages, bound in cloth, entitled "Eternity of the Earth," wherein these subjects are discussed more fully than in any other publication we know of. At the small price of 75 cents it should be in the hands of all our readers.

A Parallel Case Related.

The present state executive of Missouri became prominent while officiating as state's attorney. He found frauds in every department of government, state, county and municipal, and set himself to work to bring the offenders to justice. Though violently opposed by politicians, the people, by an overwhelming vote, made him governor—a reward for his integrity, and a desire that he should continue his services in a more influential position to secure honesty in the discharge of official duties. His name has become a tower of strength because of his zealous labors to suppress wrong.

The Merchants' Association of Boston.

On the evening of January 20, gave a banquet, at which Gov. Folk was an invited guest, as well as the most distinguished speaker. Among the good words he is credited with saying, we find the following, which we trust those Spiritualists who are fearful of the exposure of fraud mediums will injure the cause, will consider at their leisure and joy to heart. We quote:

"No state can be injured by the enforcement of law. No nation can be hurt by exposing wrong-doing; either public or private. If any business is hurt by an investigation, it shows something has been wrong, and it should be hurt. There is no secret remedy known for evils of this character. They cannot be cured by hiding them. The disgrace is in submitting to them by indifference—and in their correction."

What is true of state and nations, is no less true of social and religious societies. The individual who obtains money by false pretenses, if prosecuted as he should be, is made to do service to the state. He is less guilty because he personates spirits, and thereby robs the people?

A Thoughtful Child.

"Grandma, I have always had such a dear opinion of God. I will not read the Bible any more, if you don't mind."

Thus a little girl who had been presented with a copy of the sacred volume by her grandmother with instructions to commence with the beginning and continue the reading at her leisure until the end was reached. She thought as she read, and was soon satisfied.

The true man is he who does the truth and never holds a principle on which he is not prepared in any hour to renounce it. —F. W. Robertson.

Two of Our Grand Workers Sick.

Charles Dawbarn, the eminent California philosopher, is suffering badly from ill health. He writes:

"A week ago I went down with a terrible pain in my heart. It upset every other organ, destroyed my appetite and left me ten years older, with all my work done. It is liable to come back. Perhaps I may crawl around for a few months; anyhow my work is now done here. I began an article a day or two before the attack, and it died in the 'bornin'."

"Our friend Hodge writes from an Oakland sanitarium, that another attack of his foes has left him helpless this time."

"Good luck to you and yours. I have given you the best I had, and you have paid it back with interest."

Let us hope and pray that these two eminent lecturers may recover their health, and continue their grand work of uplifting humanity, for many years to come. To accomplish that end each one should at once concentrate upon them their healing, uplifting thoughts. Both have done an excellent work for Spiritualism, which will be long remembered after they have passed to the realm of souls.

Gross Exaggeration.

It is just as well not to place full trust in the press reports of great revivals in progress, and of the multitude of converts made, if the statement made by the evangelist, Rev. Reed, now operating in Rockford, Ill., is an illustration. He is reported in the Morning Star of that city as saying:

"He [Rev. Reed] tells of a place where he commenced a series of meetings and the day following the initial service the papers came out with big headlines stating that a great revival had been inaugurated; eighty people converted the first night. The fact is the case was that when he called for those to arise who would like to lead a better life, eighty persons responded. He then asked them to tarry after the meeting and gather about the altar. Just twelve stayed, and out of that number one little colored boy made a decision for Christ."

Emotional Revivals Out of Date.

Reports come from neighboring cities where revival meetings are being held, that though the ablest evangelists are employed, and the speaking exceptionally good, no enthusiasm can be awakened. In one city, with more than 40,000 population, the leading daily says: "Attendance is almost wholly limited to church members. Not five per cent in the audiences are other than churchmen. Just why a greater awakening has not resulted it is difficult to tell."

"It would not be so 'difficult to tell,' if our brother of the press would stop to comprehend the facts. The evangelists have been overdoing the business. The boy who cried 'Wolf, wolf!' for amusement was not believed when the ravenous wolf came, so was torn to pieces for want of that aid. Had he not previously practiced deception, would have come to his relief. A myth of ignorance, as is the hell of the churches, yet it was formerly a good drawing card on the superstitious."

In those localities where intelligence is the most widely diffused, and the people become very general, the calamity howlers are the least successful.

PARSON BEAT THE DEVIL.

Satan Disappeared Through a Rat Hole.

That an able minister once beat the devil and drove him out of his house through a rat hole, is written history of the ancient town of Topsfield, Mass. The hero of this fight with Satan was Rev. Joseph H. Capen, and his cause was a servant in the paragonage. On one peaceful Sabbath during the witchcraft period, the minister preached in Salem village. During his discourse he had a prominent case, something was wrong at his Topsfield home, and he returned to it as speedily as possible. He found his fears to be true. Satan was about, and had tempted the household servant to read a book forbidden on the Sabbath. The minister seized the wicked book and defied Satan to take the unhappy maid. He threw one-half bushel of flaxseed upon the floor and boldly told the devil that if he could pick it up, seed by seed, before he could read the book backwards, and thereby undo the wickedness of the servant, he could have her for his own. Straightway the minister began to read, and he read with such skill, though backwards, that he beat the devil, and then he drove him from his home. Satan disappeared through a rat hole, and for many years after doubting one could see the rat hole as proof of the tale.—Lynn (Mass.) Item.

The above shows that ministers used the same methods (exaggerations) as the less educated savages.

SPIRITUALISM.

It is the Broadest and Truest Ism of Any.

While here, it is the needful to act well our part, For here we can blunder and miss life's true goal, It is in our own hands to do honest work, Or, missing the right road, to lose our own soul.

H. B. POMEROY.

EACH ONE A WORK TO DO.

If It Is Not Accomplished the Spirit Will Have to Return to Earth, to Do It, Says a Medium.

To the Editor:—Do not worry about our cause, the little heaven which the old pioneers sent out has leavened the whole lump.

Spiritualism has already entered the churches, but they feel that it is not quite popular enough yet, but by and by everything in that line will adjust itself to the new conditions. The truth of the matter is, like all new things which have come to the churches, they do not understand it, or know how to handle it. There are ministers who preach through inspiration, but they do not know it, and if a Spiritualist were to tell them of it they would have a good old ecclesiastical fit, and the spirits knowing it, hide it from those "wise" heads and reveal it to babes who have become as little children, rendering them able to enter the kingdom of heaven within themselves, there to enjoy the unseen visitors who come to sup with them, but the time is fast approaching when all men will understand the kingdom of heaven is not meat or drink, but the words which proceed out of the mouth of man.

Last evening a spirit spoke to my husband through my organism, telling him to be careful of an accident, and explaining to him how hard it was to finish one's work on earth after leaving the body. He said that each mortal is given just so much work to perform during his life, but if he did not accomplish all that was given, he had to return to finish the task.

I believe in working for the spirits but I do not believe in letting them monopolize us to the detriment of our own work. I believe that we are on this earth for a purpose, otherwise we would not be here, but I do not think that purpose is to give our whole life and attention to spirits. If they had done their work they would not have to come back, so do not let us neglect all other duties and make the same mistake, but let us try to settle and balance all accounts while here on earth.

A MOST REMARKABLE STORY.

Recorded by the English Society for Psychological Research.

One of the most remarkable stories carried on the records of the Society for Psychological Research in England, concerns a little named S. R. Wilnot, who was crossing the Atlantic on the steamer City of Limerick when that ship was overtaken by a storm lasting nine days. Wilnot's story is as follows:

"Upon the night following the eighth day of the storm the tempest moderated a little, and for the first time since leaving port I enjoyed a refreshing sleep. Toward morning I dreamed that I saw my wife, whom I had left at home, come to the door of my stateroom. At the door she seemed to discover that I was not the only occupant of the cabin, hesitated a little, then advanced to my side, stooped and kissed me, and after gently caressing me for a few moments quietly withdrew.

"Upon waking I was surprised to see William J. Tait, my fellow-passenger, whose berth was above mine, but not directly over it, owing to the fact that our room was at the stern of the vessel—leaning upon his elbow and looking fixedly at me.

"You're a pretty fellow," said he, 'to have a lady come and visit you in this way.'

"I pressed him for an explanation, which he at first declined to give, but at length he related what he had seen while lying wide awake in his berth. It exactly corresponded with my dream.

"The day after landing I reached my wife who had been for some time visiting her parents. Almost her first question when we were alone together was: 'Did you receive a visit from me a week ago Tuesday?'

"My wife then told me that on account of the severity of the weather she had been extremely anxious about me. On the same night on which the storm had just begun to abate she had lain awake for a long time, thinking of me, and about 4 o'clock in the morning it seemed to her that she went out to seek me.

"Crossing the wide and stormy sea, she came at length to a low, black steamship, whose side she went up and then descended into the cabin, passed through it to the stern until she came to my stateroom.

"Tell me," she said, 'do they ever have staterooms like the one I saw, where the upper berth extends farther back than the lower one? A man was in the upper berth, looking at me, and for a moment I was afraid to go in, but soon I went up to the side of your berth, bent down, and kissed you and then went away.'

RENA D. CHAPMAN,

Secretary M. S. S. A.

THE TRUTH OF THE MATTER.

It is Expressed Very Briefly, But With a Thunder of Potency.

Of the 105 counties in Kansas, 35 are without a pauper, 25 have no poorhouses, and 37 have not a criminal case on the docket. In Kansas, women have had full municipal suffrage since 1887.

During these eighteen years women have neglected their homes for politics, as the opponents of equal rights prophesy that they will, half the men in Kansas would have been brought to the poorhouse by lack of thrift and domestic industry on the part of their wives, and the rising generation would have gone astray and filled the prisons to overflowing for want of motherly care. Just the opposite has happened. This is another illustration of the fact that "it is idle to argue from prophecy when we can argue from history."

When a bill was introduced a year or two ago to take municipal suffrage away from the women of Kansas, no wonder it was voted down almost unanimously, and "amid a ripple of amusement."

ALICE STONE BLACKWELL.

THE BROKEN CHORD.

Once when the angels were singing their angelic songs and praising in creation's earlier days,

They lost from the chord of the seventh its note of sweetest intensity, And it fell through the gateway of heaven

Down to the world of sense. It chose for its place of abiding The aspiring soul of man, And since that holy coming Man's dream of love began.

Deep in his soul it is stirring, That drop of immortal heaven, While the angels are reaching earthward

Man is uplifting to heaven— That note of celestial music Years for its home afar And draws the soul with its longings Unto love's distant star.

When the angels have replaced it, And the broken chord is complete, Man's soul will have reached the kingdom

And the heart of the Infinite. —Caroline Rentrapp in the Woman's Tribune.

IT IS DELIGHTFUL TO DIE.

The Pleasure Thereof Is Vividly Portrayed by Rafael Conte.

Do we suffer to die? La Lecture, the famous French paper, [says the Chicago Examiner] puts this question, and Dr. Necker, the eminent Parisian physician, answers with a big, round NO.

"I have observed and noted with the greatest attention and care," he says, "all the phenomena of that most important act of life that is called death, and can affirm that it is painless. Sensibility, the compound action of the brain, nerves and muscles, which produces all our feelings, both physical and psychological, is the first thing to die. It becomes extinct before the animal life ends, and consequently there is no pain in death."

"Death, like sleep, is an absolutely inconscient and painless act. Nobody can remember the exact moment he fell asleep, and no one has a notion of the exact moment when he dies."

No Physical Pain.

"In some cases, when the brain is clear enough to permit the patient to think and reason, the man about to die realizes his position, but even then he is only able to have a very faint and nebulous idea of what happens to him. His mind is too confused to make deductions that would necessarily cause intense moral suffering."

"As to physical pain, there is none. 'When a person becomes so ill that he is about to die, no matter what the direct cause of his condition might be—in other words, when a man is about to die a natural or violent death, the atrophy of physical sensibility is so complete, that he would not feel any pain, even if he be pinched or slashed or in any other way hurt.'

"It is logical, therefore, to think that if previous to reaching the agonie or pre-agonie period he was suffering from any pain, it had disappeared, for there can be no pain where there is an absolute absence of sensibility."

"I am acquainted with the case of a man who jumped overboard from a steamer in mid-ocean, with the object, as he afterward testified, to find out what the feelings of a drowning man were."

Tried to Describe Sensation.

"He struggled desperately for two or three hours, and during that time, he said, his sufferings, both physical and mental, were intense; but, then, with the approach of death, all feelings disappeared. His brain worked still, but it had been so weakened that while he had a notion of what happened, it was so faint and imperfect that he could not fully realize his position. He was picked up and saved when he was, in his own opinion, 'more than dead.'

"A little child had his two legs cut off by a train. He was brought to the hospital and, according to the balance surgeon, he did not feel any pain. He only begged the doctors that his legs be not amputated. He conversed with him for a few minutes of indifferent things and to all my questions the child answered with perfect accuracy. Suddenly he looked at me and said:

"How good this is!"

"What?" I asked. "Nothing," replied the child, "but I feel all over my body something that is very nice!"

"And he died."

It is known that the sensation felt by a mortal wound inflicted with a rifle bullet is that of a light blow. In many instances, when the wound, while dangerous, is not necessarily mortal, the blow is felt in another part of the body. The writer himself was shot in the liver in one of the battles of the Cuban revolution and felt the pain, a very slight one, would right eye. It was only after several hours that he discovered his mistake.

Call Death Delicious.

Death by hemorrhage, according to the most famous medical authorities, is "delicious," as is death by hanging. Buffon declares that death is a specter that looks from the distance far more horrible than it really is.

Lucan's words were: "If men only knew how good it is to die they would not struggle so hard to live."

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is held responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, but it is no reason why they should be suppressed, yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is made up to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that the Progressive Thinker is set up as a typewriter machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with a blue or white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have at our disposal, and in order to do so we will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

Mrs. Mary Esther Aron writes from Annapolis, Nebraska: "I am located permanently here, holding successful Spiritualist meetings every Sunday evening. My many friends in Chicago will be glad to learn of this."

Virginia Barrett writes from 320 W. Jefferson street, South Bend, Ind., that she would like engagements.

W. H. Mitchell writes from St. Louis, Mo.: "Rev. W. P. Cook of St. Louis, closed his month's labors in this city last night. He is a forceful, eloquent, logical speaker, and is doing great good for the cause."

Mme. Helen Stuart-Richings, B. D. A., gave a very entertaining dramatic recital at the First Spiritual Church last evening for the benefit of the church fund. Her program began with a recitation of a poem by Virginia Woodward Cloud, of this city, entitled "Christmas, 1776." It is a spirited poem and was very well given by Mme. Richings. Another Maryland number was the "Maryland Yellow Throat," which was faithfully illustrated by the whistling of the bird.

Mme. Richings is very successful in her imitations of nature in its diurnal and nocturnal sounds. Her own composition of "Five Feathers Make Five Birds," in her old-fashioned songs, "The Laird o' Cockpen," "Lord Lovel," "Bryan O'Lyne," and "Rise Mourners, Rise," she showed her mastery in dialect. Her greatest successes were in her character sketches, in costume, of "An Everybody Boy" and "A Naughty Girl." Her recitation from Wagner and other composers filled the interludes between the recitations. The evening was highly enjoyed by an appreciative audience.—The Baltimore American.

First Spiritual Temple, South Side Turner Hall, 3125 State street. Meetings every Sunday evening at 8 o'clock. All are welcome. Mrs. Lucille De Loux, pastor.

John A. Toren writes: "The meetings of the Society at the Psychic Porch at Wilcox Hall, 361-363 East Forty-third street, are well attended, and growing more interesting. Dr. J. O. M. Hewitt, permanent lecturer for our society, addressed the temple members of the Independent Order of the Mystic Brotherhood, on Sunday evening, January 28, his subject being 'Mysticism and the Ages.' A large majority of the members were in attendance as well as a number of strangers, and all evinced their pleasure by the hearty applause accorded Brother Hewitt at the end of the discourse. Mrs. Ada Zazelle was present and gave a number of psychometric readings which were fully appreciated. Mrs. Isa Cleveland's guide, 'White Star,' performed her work in the usual convincing manner by giving such messages as are always understood and recognized. We extend our usual invitation to all strangers and skeptics."

W. J. Elmo writes: "The Spiritual Alliance Church at 3514 Vincennes avenue, is having large audiences every Sunday at 3 and 7 p. m. Plenty of good tests and messages by various mediums in the afternoon, and a selected program in the evening. Prof. H. S. Fraser has returned from the South, and is assisting Mrs. Elmo in lecture work and giving messages. Our socials and dances held every Saturday evening are well attended and enjoyed by all. A cordial welcome to the services is extended to all who are anxious to learn more of the growing gospel of Spiritualism."

W. D. Noyes writes: "Our January month at Madison, Wis., was a success. Our public services were the largest ever held there. We held two large mid-week parlor meetings at Baraboo, Wis., and were entertained by those staunch true Spiritualists, Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Pratt, whose home is always opened to visiting Spiritualists. We go from here to Beloit, Wis., for the first Sunday in February. All mail addressed to General Delivery, Baraboo, Wis., will reach me."

Mrs. C. Lee writes: "I feel without your valuable paper, I could not see to read, but will get some help to me, and the book I always wanted it, and I can read it on bright days."

Mrs. C. Lee writes that she is more than pleased with one of our premium books lately received.

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

We go to press early Monday morning, hence communications intended for that current issue should reach this office not later than the previous Saturday morning. Bear this in mind.

ALWAYS GIVE YOUR FULL NAME AND ADDRESS WHEN MAKING NOTICES AND COMMUNICATIONS FOR PUBLICATION, OTHERWISE THEY WILL FIND THEIR WAY TO THE WASTE BASKET.

Gertrude Baker writes: "On the dates of Jan. 25 and 26, under the auspices of the Indiana State Association of Spiritualists, we had with us, at Sheridan, Will J. Erwood, who delivered two very excellent lectures. His genial manner cannot fail to attract to him many friends, and his mode of speaking has much to do with impressing his sound logic on the minds of his hearers. Ignorance backed up by prejudice has all to do with retarding the progress of the Harmonical Philosophy, and since some of the people have been induced to come out and listen to Mr. Erwood's lectures, we feel encouraged to hope the seed will not soon be sown in barren soil."

Gustav Williams writes: "Sister Lester was with us again last Sunday evening, and welcomed by the members of the North Star Spiritual Union, and their many friends. A large audience was present. The lecture given by Sister Lester, subject, 'Beware of False Prophets,' was certainly educational. After the lecture many excellent tests were given by the speaker, undeniable evidence of spirit return, the audience giving credit to the medium for correctness. The North Star Spiritual Union and The Progressive Thinker are certainly doing great work among strangers and skeptics of the Northwest Side. We invite all who are interested to be with us Sunday evening at our hall, 1544 Milwaukee avenue."

Mary E. French of Clyde, Ohio, writes: "Rev. Dell A. Herrick served our society the first and second Sundays of January, to fine audiences. His lectures were argumentative and logical, impressing one with the fact, 'There is a power behind the throne, stronger than the throne itself.' Inspiration, to me, is a beautiful phase of psychic unfoldment, without which we cannot be great. In order to enjoy a truly inspirational lecture we must possess to some degree that spiritual unfoldment ourselves. His sermons are marvels of power. Elizabeth Schauss serves the society next Sunday."

C. Fannie Allen, one of our most efficient workers, writes from St. Louis, Mo.: "On Sunday, January 23, I delivered a lecture on the memory of Thomas Paine. The lecture, joined the services, with lesson sheets and every child and many adults, gave a quotation from his writings. Brother Grimshaw gave an eloquent address. Mr. Symons, our president, made a brief but telling speech. Friend Johnson from the thirteen side, spoke of the subject, 'Mysticism,' excellently. Mrs. Detloff and Mr. Amborg gave messages. At 7:30 Paul MacArthur played all with an earnest speech. Mr. Gilbert followed with a strong, logical address. Mrs. McCaslin and Dr. Hughes interested us and Mrs. Allen made remarks and gave an impromptu poem on 'The Skeptic's Monitory.' The subject suggested by Mr. Nouriss, faithful friend and worker in the lecture, who is also a teacher and healer. Mrs. Bezeman and Miss Grosse gave interesting and pleasure by their sweet singing. We parted feeling that had been one in spirit with friends both sides of the mystic veil. From your subscribers, I have many words of praise for your work."

L. P. Wheelock's address is at Madison, Wis., instead of Moline, Ill., as announced.

Hattie G. Webster writes: "The first social of the year was given by the officers and members of the West Side Church, on McDowell street, Columbus, Ohio, and an enjoyable evening was spent. The net proceeds of the event were twenty-five dollars, the same going to a fund for beautifying the church. We expect to give the grandest social we ever gave, the 32nd. Our young girls will give the grand flag drill and song for which they are famous. We hope soon to have our lecture reopened. Our socials are one of the means we employ to let the outside world know what we are doing, and those who come to them, and receive a hearty welcome, are sure to visit our religious meetings, and when they come once they come again and again to receive new life."

E. R. Fielding writes from Washington, D. C.: "Mr. and Mrs. W. Sprague, missionaries for the N. S. A., have finished the month of January at the interest of the First Spiritualist Society. There has certainly been an awakening among the Spiritualists, and many converts to Spiritualism made under their ministrations. The consecration services for the members were very impressive. Oscar Edgerly will be the speaker for the month of February. He is a trance speaker and message bearer. Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague entertained the Auxiliary of the First Association, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Collins. This was the largest gathering of the season. Several mediums were present to assist them—Mrs. Longley, Mrs. Stevens, Mrs. Collins, Mrs. White and others. Mr. P. L. O. A. Keeler is holding seances. Manifestations in the light. The Temple League has for its speaker for February, Mr. W. J. Nigh, and Mrs. A. M. Zoller gives messages after the lecture. Mr. A. Terry is the message bearer for the Educational Society. Mrs. Jaquet is speaker at Wood's Hall, and Mrs. Julia Warnke, the message bearer."

Columbus Wells writes: "There is no such thing as creation. The earth is undergoing changes all the time, but the atoms of land and sea remain the same. Sometime in the remote past the atoms of this earth were wandering in space. What caused them to coalesce together and make a planet or world? My conclusion is, that this world was always a world, and will always remain one."

A Prize Masquerade Ball will be given by the First German Spiritualist Society, Saturday evening, Feb. 27, at its hall, corner of Ashland and Third streets. Go and take your friends and have a good time. Admission 25 cents.

W. J. Colville has just delivered a course of lectures in Boston, also in Hartford, Ct., which have been very largely attended. The new book, "Universal Spiritualism," which he is now writing, is expected by March 31. After its publication the author expects to go to California to Australia and New Zealand.

A. H. Sullivan writes from Mooseport, Pa.: "With a membership of less than twenty, a charter was obtained from the N. S. A. in June, 1904, and meetings have been conducted ever since in Postoffice Hall, every Sunday evening, and Wednesday afternoon, with Richard Fischer, of Homestead as speaker. His earnestness of manner and eloquence brings large crowds to the meetings. His efforts have been rewarded by an increase in membership of more than double that of one year ago. The tests given by such well-known mediums as Mrs. Gillard, Mrs. Zelle and others, have been most successful. Our Ladies Aid has also been doing much good work under the leadership of Mrs. Gillard, assisted by other local mediums. Though our Aid membership is not large, yet they are all willing workers, and our treasurer's report shows a surplus of more than $275, and we hope to do no distant day to have a meeting place all our own. Many of our members are readers of your paper and hope it will long continue to spread the truth broadcast."

A. Turbett writes: "There will be a euchre party on Thursday, Feb. 8, at Mrs. Dexter's, 1000 N. Halsted street. Everybody welcome."

Cyrus F. Allen writes: "I think The Progressive Thinker is the best paper published in this city."

Mary Bastian, formerly a resident of this city, and a most excellent materializing medium, greeted us at our office yesterday. For the last thirty years his residence has been in England. We were glad to meet him again.

Dr. F. O. Matthews, the medium, passed very suddenly to spirit life, Jan. 28, at his home, West Delvan avenue, Buffalo, N. Y. He had not been well for several weeks. The family heard him in the room where he was and found that he had fallen to the floor and expired.

A gentleman writes to this office, choosing the following for a subject: "The Mission of Modern Spiritualism, and a Few Words About Mediums." The closing page of his article is missing. Will he please send his name and address to this office, in connection with the above subject, so that the omission can be supplied?

W. J. Colville has just completed a very successful lecture season in New England, where he spoke to very fine audiences in Boston and Haverhill, Mass., and Hartford, Ct., during last month. At present he is in Cleveland, Ohio, lecturing Sundays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays, till Feb. 25 inclusive, at 3 and 7:30 p. m., in Spiritualists Temple, 235 Fullerton street. All letters, etc., may be addressed there.

O. Merritt writes from Genoa, Ill.: "First Spiritualist Convention of the Society of Genoa held its first monthly meeting in O. F. Hall, Tuesday, Jan. 30, with Mrs. Georgia Gillard as speaker and message bearer. Although the evening was cold and disagreeable, there was a good audience, some driving nine miles to attend. Mrs. Cooley was at her best, and the best messages ever given in Genoa. Subject of lecture: 'Prove all Things, and Hold Fast That Which is Good.' About one year ago we organized the Northern Illinois and Southern Wisconsin Circuit Association, the object being to have the same speakers take in all this territory. Mrs. Cooley is filling appointments in the circuit in furtherance of the design of the association, going from Genoa to Rockford, and from thence to Belvidere, which will take nearly the entire week."

O. Merritt writes from Genoa, Ill.: "First Spiritualist Convention of the Society of Genoa held its first monthly meeting in O. F. Hall, Tuesday, Jan. 30, with Mrs. Georgia Gillard as speaker and message bearer. Although the evening was cold and disagreeable, there was a good audience, some driving nine miles to attend. Mrs. Cooley was at her best, and the best messages ever given in Genoa. Subject of lecture: 'Prove all Things, and Hold Fast That Which is Good.' About one year ago we organized the Northern Illinois and Southern Wisconsin Circuit Association, the object being to have the same speakers take in all this territory. Mrs. Cooley is filling appointments in the circuit in furtherance of the design of the association, going from Genoa to Rockford, and from thence to Belvidere, which will take nearly the entire week."

This department is under the management of
HUDSON TUTTLE.
Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby as terse, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and letter letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information is available, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

Doctor I. K. Funk: Q. What is the clear, rational explanation of these inconsistencies in an explanation that shall clear all doubts from a "sane" mind concerning the spirit-identity process?

A. In my reply to the question, "Is Doctor Funk a Spiritualist?" I said: "Doctor Funk has remained neutral, continuing with remarkable perseverance his researches. We presume he continues this course, we keep him in touch with the churches." In his "Open Letter," he appears to quite misunderstand my meaning. It was not because he is insincere or wanting in courage of his convictions, as the answer as a whole, emphatically shows. The idea was that by keeping in touch with the churches he could exert more influence and gain a wider hearing, and this without in the least compromising his convictions. Not one of his carrying critics appreciate his position, or the honest courage he has shown.

His investigations have been for the one motive of gaining the truth, which he has made the greatest sacrifice, feeling that to demonstrate immortality is the highest achievement to which the mind of man can aspire. Of course Spiritualists would prefer a clearer sounding note, but admit that his course may be the wisest. No one for a moment questions the sterling honesty of his purpose.

Now I am glad I did not make a clearer statement, and that he misinterpreted, for it has called out a full and free expression and presented the difficulties in the way. An investigator and would-be believer, with a thorough clearness which not only justifies him in taking his position, but presents the profound problem awaiting solution. Dr. Funk has come to the point where the result may be various mediums and the result may be various mediums and the result may be various mediums.

During the investigation, Dr. Funk has come to the point where the result may be various mediums and the result may be various mediums and the result may be various mediums. Dr. Funk has come to the point where the result may be various mediums and the result may be various mediums and the result may be various mediums. Dr. Funk has come to the point where the result may be various mediums and the result may be various mediums and the result may be various mediums.

Now the first lesson in Spiritualism is that the spirit awakes in the spirit world exactly as it left this. It has gained nothing, lost nothing. There are in this world weak, foolish, false, deceptive, lying, malicious, untruthful, in the face of all these contradictions and confusion, he asks: "What is the clear, rational explanation of these inconsistencies—an explanation which should clear all doubt from a 'sane' mind concerning the spirit-identity hypothesis?"

Investigators since the advent of Modern Spiritualism have had these perplexing difficulties. In their research they have unexpectedly had the foundations of their belief almost swept away. A great deal of this misunderstanding has come from the old and entirely erroneous views of the nature of spirits. It has been the belief that spirits were all-wise and infallible. They possessed the property of "knowing" and were as pure in moral teaching as wise.

If we were on one side of a wall and the inhabitants of the world on the other, how could we identify a friend who came to the wall. There are hundreds of millions of human beings any one of whom might assume the name of that friend. Should anyone desire to gain our attention, he might take the name of some distinguished man. If we attempted to learn what mankind believed, one would tell us that God was a trinity; another, that he was a unit; and that he did not know. Some would affirm that there was a literal fiery hell, and others that hell and devil were fairy tales.

If we asked for a description of the earth, an Esquimau would describe it as a realm of ice and snow, while, seal and fish for food. A man from the torrid zone would tell us of the burning sun and fruits of many kinds which served for food. If asked, "Does it snow on the earth?" Does the water become hard as glass, and the trees lose their leaves?" this torrid zone man would laugh at the folly of the questions, and say: "What chaff! What is snow? If trees lost their leaves would they not die? I assure you there is nothing of that kind on our earth."

Knowing that all come to the wall and attempt to communicate with us, the bad, profligate, ignorant, superstitious, as well as the intelligent, because we received these conflicting statements, would it be wise to conclude that there were no people on the other side, or if there were nothing could be gained by conversing with them? All the contradictions and discouragements would only make us more eager to obtain a more perfect method of gaining information through the wall. We would not for a moment doubt that under such difficulties a friend might be identified, not by giving a "test" but by many communications all tending to express his individuality. Nor would we expect infallibility or revelation in science, or affairs beyond the known capacity of the one with whom we purposed to communicate. If names of distinguished men were given, to whom we must be unknown, instead of priding ourselves on their favor, we would know that we were being made sport of by deceivers.

In a similar manner we stand on one side of a wall and on the other are all those who have passed from the earth, carrying with them all the characteristics of that life. Pressing close to that wall are the multitude of the least developed and most earth-bound. The first lesson in Spiritualism is that the spirit awakes exactly as it left this life. Hence it is that the same methods apply to the identification of a spirit that would to an earthly friend. Assurance must come from collation of many communications and "tests."

Discrimination and reason must be exercised as on all other subjects. Errors and conditions arise from imperfect knowledge of the method, ignorance of the communicants, and intentional deception. In our desire for communion with the higher world, we must make the conditions as perfect as possible with our knowledge. A private, home circle, harmonious in the earnest prayer for the coming of the departed, hear the members, the ideas and should meet at an appointed time and place. When such a circle meets the pulsations of thought as from the transmitting instrument of the wireless telegraph, reach remotest distance, and are responded to by the spirits invoked.

A circle may be held under these conditions, which not a single "manifestation" is received, and yet the members will experience a delightful exaltation and sense of spirit presence almost as satisfying as the most startling phenomena.

In response to the circle on this side, on the other the spirit friends will form another circle, for they are as anxious to communicate as we are to have them. Promiscuous and undesirable controls are thus prevented from interfering for the spirit circle will not allow such to approach. The unguarded circle, promiscuous in choice of members, not only opens the door for the entrance of evil spirits, but also opens the door to the other for the coming of any spirit that may desire to do so. Mediums who give séances to all who seek them, place themselves outside of reliable control.

There is one point not mentioned which has a great influence on the communications. A long experience, and somewhat wide observation, has made it clear that there is a large number of spirits bitterly opposed to the establishment of communication between the two worlds. They hold a similar position as many do in this life and hate the belief of its possibility.

But all experience gained by promiscuous mediums, and mediums holding séances reckless of the laws and conditions of perfect and reliable control, must be sifted by reason and common sense; the rubbish blown away. Spiritualism in this does not differ from other affairs. What mountains of chaff are left in the field for a few handfuls of grain? What wilderness of error the churches traverse for here and there a truth?

THOMAS PAINE MEMORIAL.

This Patriot and Freethinker Honored at Columbus, Ohio.

The First Spiritualist Church of Columbus, Ohio, observed Sunday, Jan. 28, the birthday of Thomas Paine. This occasion was one of great interest, as at the service there was on exhibition the famous wreath which belongs to Miss Elizabeth Jones of Philadelphia, Pa.

Thomas Paine has been so dreadfully neglected by all Americans, that it aroused Miss Jones to a determined action, that she would, if possible, gain the right to decorate his picture on Memorial Day, the same as all the other pictures are in Independence Hall.

It took her several years to gain this privilege, but at last it was hers. And she had a laurel wreath made for the occasion. This wreath has been placed on his picture every year now for ten years, by Miss Jones.

As the Louisiana Purchase was suggested and argued for by Paine, Miss Jones placed this wreath to the St. Louis Fair in 1904, where it hung on Paine's picture in the rooms of the American Secular Union. Here thousands of men and women paid it homage. At the close of the Fair the wreath was returned to Miss Jones.

For the service at Columbus, the 28th, Miss Jones loaned Miss Harlow the wreath, and it was the center of attraction on the platform where it encircled a large picture of Mr. Paine. The platform was most beautifully decorated in silk flags, flowers, and pictures of Paine and mottoes from his works. This must be a patriotic in character, and Miss Gray, the soloist, was at her best. The church was full to overflowing, many having to stand. Several orders of the city were represented and the Red Men's league was present in uniform.

Miss Harlow delivered the address of the evening. She read a lecture by reading extracts from Paine's works, showing him to have been a firm believer in the God of Nature and also in the immortality of man. The lecture was a historical account of his life and work, and a measurement of his character and its worth. This was certainly appreciated by the large audience, for loud applause greeted the speaker as she took her seat.

THOUGHT PHOTOS? IT'S EASY.

Picture of Every Mental State Possible, Scientist Says—Sit Quietly, Think Hard—Plate Will Read Your Mind, New York Experimenters Assert.

Photographs of thoughts and mental impressions will soon be as common as cabinet portraits, according to Dr. A. M. Veeder, a scientist of Lyons, near Rochester, N. Y., says the Chicago Tribune. He believes he has solved the problem of photographing brain waves.

Dr. Veeder last evening invited a number of friends to a photograph gallery to participate in an experiment intended to demonstrate the possibility of affecting a photographic plate by a purely mental process.

Thought Appears Dimly on Plate.

It was found that all of those who assisted in the experiment were capable of exercising supersensitive powers that are ordinarily latent. This having been shown, a plate from a package which had not been opened before was put in the holder and laid on a table, the shutter being closed. Each person placed one hand about four inches above the plate, with the other hand under the plate and table, and were requested to fix their minds on a named object.

After an exposure of about one minute the plate was taken into a dark room and developed. It was found that a spot had formed about the size of a silver dollar, which, it developed, was what the persons participating in the experiment had in mind. The precaution taken was such that there was no escape from the conclusion that the picture printed on the plate was an impression of the thought in the minds of those interested.

It demonstrated, Dr. Veeder says, the fact that persons in a certain state of sensitiveness of the mind, which has been fully identified, are able to produce an impression on a rapid photographic plate without direct contact.

Mind Must Be Sensitive.

The experiment, Dr. Veeder stated, cannot be successfully performed by sheer effort of the will without the peculiar sensitiveness of the mind, evidence of which was secured in the case of the persons participating in this experiment.

Dr. Veeder believes that the fact that brain waves or something of that sort are capable of producing photographic impressions is not unreasonable and is of remarkable interest in many ways. Whether the mind can project itself into the ether, or that of wireless telegraphy for considerable distances remains to be seen. He says his experiments would indicate that it is among the possibilities.

TOO MUCH OF THE IRONIC.

A Comprehensive Criticism From California.

To the Editor:—I was interested and somewhat amused with the article in your issue of January 13, over the signature of G. W. Norris. I had not read the article by Mr. Severance until you published it. Now I come down so heavily, but think it could not have justified such an expenditure of irony. Probably it denounced those creeds which under the name of religion enacted the massacre of St. Bartholomew, the tortures of the Inquisition, the human sacrifices at Druidic altars, and in ancient Mexico temples, the burning at the stake of Servants and of hundreds of other victims of religious bigotry and intolerance. Doubtless Mr. Norris in spite of his religious zeal would agree in this view.

The fact that a man views with abhorrence a religion which is responsible for the cruelties and the inhumanity with which millions of pages of history are darkened, does not necessarily imply that he has no belief in righteousness, truth and honor.

One may even doubt the existence of a personal God and be a virtuous man and a good citizen. Such doubt does not denote the belief that chance rules the world, or that a kaleidoscopic arrangement of atoms has brought nature into its present form. The presumption is that matter and its laws are as eternal as they are pitiless and inexorable. The era of human existence on this fragment of the universe, as compared with the vast expanse of space and time, is brief. It is but an unimportant incident in its history. From a globe of fiery mist it has gradually attained its present stage—to again become uninhabitable for organic life, and finally return to a state of fire mist. As Shakespeare puts it:

"The red-crested towers, the gorgeous palaces, the solemn temples, the great globe itself, yea, all which it inherits, shall dissolve, and leave not a wrack behind."

Man with all his aspirations—after he knows not what—his ideals of the unattainable, ever the slave of his passions, and needs, will forever disappear from the face of the earth. Then, one may say, "cui bono," unless by some miracle of evolution, which I do say is impossible, his consciousness survives "the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds."

CURIOS EXPERIENCE.

A Haunted House—A Watch Placed in a Church by the Spirits.

To the Editor:—There is a place in this part that the people say is haunted. Everyone knows that very strange things happen there, but no one can explain. There have been tales to try and fathom the mystery, but failed. Things would move about there with no hands to move them.

There would be writing on slates in a room locked and guarded.

One night there were three detectives watching; one was watching the family sitting-room with his feet high up on a chair, and the chair was taken from under him and carried into another room.

The old man who lived there was writing a letter one night and stepped into the kitchen, and when he went back there was some writing on his letter in a very heavy hand. No one in the room but himself. The writing consisted of warnings, telling him to leave the place.

Once he put his watch in the sewing machine drawer, and locked it, and when he went to get it, it was not there. Several days after he found it in the churn of butter milk.

At last his wife refused to stay there any longer.

I would like to know why a spirit does not want anyone to live there. It is said an old man was killed there years ago, and one can live there in peace now. There are plenty of witnesses to the truth of my statements. I would be pleased to have some of the readers of The Progressive Thinker send me their old papers. They would be new to me.

A SPIRIT MESSAGE.

Chips From the Ether.

The spirit is not born; it is the infinite life that never dies. In man it is individualized; becomes the holy atom life within life. Each soul possesses this atom of supreme consciousness.

The outward body grows and develops, so also the inner self. The body is an outward sign of the invisible spirit, the thought life. These atoms of divine spiritual growth never lose relationship to the infinite One; breathe the life of the soul within, and draw from the infinite, throbbings and pulsations of life divine. The realm of the created lies beyond death's touch. The internal spirit is the power that controls the external.

Life is only a station along the endless journey of spirit. Souls reflect the glory and light of the infinite presences.

Through sacrifices, trials and temptations you will find the true growth and strength of spirituality. All that harasses and perplexes will in time be made clear. The troubled waters of life mortal will be calmed, and thy soul find harmony in the beyond.

Let the true light which you are receiving, guide you on to perfect peace at the final summing up.

Turn from the outward symbols to the spiritual that giveth life; life is a manifestation of the spirit, but with feeble vision you fail to see the white light of life eternal.

Ever obey the voice within. At the gate of celestial glory, universal love and compassion will vibrate every atom of thy soul. From the heights you will perceive and know the truth. Sympathy and love will all your being spiritual. Within yourself unfold the spiritual conditions which belong to you. Put from you all impure and unclear desires. Let your destiny as revealed help you on to greater efforts, to nobler sacrifices. Around you shines the halo of immortal life. With unflinching steps move on in life's strife and turmoil.

Let the spirit within speak the highest ideals of thy soul.

Bible Spiritualists and Christian Spiritualists.

The moral teachings of the Bible, in a general sense, are all right. I do not think that it would harm a few of our so-called Christian Spiritualists to closely follow the Golden Rule found therein. I observe that the terms, "Bible Spiritualists" and "Bible Christian," are not similar, that is, they do not mean the same thing. The latter applies only to those persons who profess to be the followers of Jesus Christ.

The former is a person who has seen and realized what the spirit is. This knowledge once observed and experienced is never forgotten. He becomes more directly interested in spiritual things than he ever could on simply receiving them by faith, because he knows them to be true. It is true that Jesus never wrote a word which has been so widely misinterpreted as to come, may, or may not, be correct in every detail, and we know that much that he taught is found in the books of Moses, written long before Jesus came. We admire, however, his theme and laws of love.

Now as to formulating doctrines, for the benefit of our members, I observe that the various religious organizations, the Methodists, Baptists, Universalists, Catholics and others, do that from the Bible, and differ widely in their declarations. Is it not left to the Spiritualists to do the same?

HIGH ENCOMIUM.

An Intelligent Thinker's Estimate of Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood.

A philosopher, dominated by truth alone and bound by no ism, creed or schism, who has searched the realm of material science and ascertained the relation of its facts to the principles of Spiritualism; a polished lecturer with a good command of language, who can present his conclusions so clearly that even the untrained intellect can comprehend without difficulty—this is the description that best fits Professor W. M. Lockwood, who has just concluded an engagement with the New Thought Spiritual Society of Grand Rapids.

Professor Lockwood came to us a stranger, but in one brief month he has made a host of friends, all of whom will long remember and be benefited by his teachings; and it is the earnest desire of the spiritualists, officers and members of the society, that he will return each year to refresh our memories and offer us yet other truths, the results of further investigations.

A DREAM VISION.

Thinks That Another Attempt to Assassinate the Czar Will Succeed.

On the night of Tuesday, Jan. 16, I had an experience that can only be called a dream-vision; for it partook of the characteristics of both. While asleep at home, I dreamed that I seemed to be walking on the earth, and I awoke to see a large plane-like structure being blown up from within, followed by flames breaking out. Then I heard the words, "The Czar! Russia!" and I felt that another attempt to assassinate the Czar would succeed.

THE CONTENTED SAINT.

Poetry That Has Run Away With Itself.

Fair one, 'tis mine own to rejoice that you and I are very often contented. I assume my voice to gladness that we are obscure. Were you a princess, or a queen, were I noble, or a knight, our every action would be seen illumined in the calcium light. The stammered words in which I made of my proposal such a mess would in bold letters be displayed, "together with your dulcet 'yes.' Your age, your weight, your glove, your shoe, your talents, and your taste in hats, the others who have come to woo, would be set down—with our chance spats. My working hours, my fads, my bets, my growing bald spot, and my ties, with my income, and my debts, would be shown forth for any eyes; the time and length of all my calls, the full report of all our talks would be made known—our feasts, and balls, our auto rides, our idle walks. Ah, happy we! You are no queen; no princess—just a simple girl; I am no prince of regard; I am no knight of the land. I take great joy in thinking this: Our words are not caught up and hurled, and best of all, my farewell kiss don't make a smack heard round the world.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

The Cause in This City Still Surging Ahead.

To the Editor:—I wish through the columns of your paper to correct an impression that the Spiritualists at Indianapolis are dead.

Sister Helen Stuart-Richings, in her eulogy of Bro. Frank Schmidt, seemed to leave the impression that the society was no more. Brother Schmidt was, I believe, a good man. He had money at his command. It was, I understand, his intention in a few years to start in anew and boom the cause he loved so well.

No, we are not dead, but after the severe blow of the high tide and gathering up the fragments, a few ladies who had no money, but a good supply of faith in the cause they loved so well, banded together at once, and step by step they carried on the work. By their noble efforts the hungry souls are fed.

We have with us Sister Anna Thordson and her good husband, and they with untiring effort, are cheering the sorrowing, feeding the hungry and giving sight to the spiritually blind.

We all have our faults, but the most unpardonable fault I know is unforgiveness, and I feel like Bobby Burns. "Was some power the gittle glass, to see ourself as others see us."

Brother Will J. Erwood was with us a few hours yesterday, and gave us all a new inspiration, and left for Sheridan, Ind., for a few meetings. He will be with us again later on. May his work among us instill in all who hear him to say the least, and work heart and hand for the unfolding and uplifting of this most beautiful inspiring truth. Take courage, toilers in the vineyard of spiritual progress; fall not, falter not, weary not in the work that brings so much of peace, love and joy, to the sorrowing one of earth.

NOTES FROM A WORKER.

The "Spirit" That Wanted Diamonds.

To the Editor:—I was greatly pleased to read Eva Cassell's article on the dematerializing of white garments, and greatly amused, especially wherein she speaks of spirits taking a white elephant. I say with Mrs. Cassell, "Why not?" Just as reasonable to think they could and would, as to suppose they would request goods of white, etc. This particular case reminds me of a medium who some years ago, visited a city in the northwest, and where I, too, was stopping. In this case the supposed medium was a young man. The "spirits" came one by one from the cabinet, and finally a beautiful young girl with two or three other persons recognized as a young girl of said city stepped out of the cabinet, looked around and then exclaimed, "Oh, mamma!" Then after a second she said: "Mamma, darling, we wear our diamonds and other jewels in spirit life, and I would like mine." Then that beautiful young girl took out two beautiful diamond rings and handed them to none other than this young girl confederate. This was many years ago, in the time of my early investigations, and yet the show with its nefarious work goes on. But thanks to The Progressive Thinker and its many true workers, the curtain has risen to drop no more.

I hope soon to be able to wing my flight into fields of labor, and go on in the good work.

W. E. COLEMAN.

The Recipient of One Hundred and Seventy-two Gifts.

The San Francisco (Cal.) Examiner says:

"The presents received at Christmas, 1906, by William Emmette Coleman, one hundred and seventy-two (172) in number, will be on view at the residence, the Newberry Hotel, 418 Sutter street, San Francisco, Cal., on Sunday, January 14, 1907, from 12 m. to 5:30 p. m., and from 6:15 to 9 p. m.—no later.

"They can be seen in the front room upstairs in the cottage next to the synagogue, in the rear of the main building of The Newberry.

"You are cordially invited to come and see them."

"N. B.—There will be no postponement on account of weather, unless there should be a very heavy storm, rendering travel disagreeable or impracticable. In that case the exhibition will be postponed to the next following Sunday or Monday, or to the next heavy storm. Should there be light or moderate rain there will be no postponement."

The foregoing document, scattered broadcast yesterday in printed copies, proved neither a practical joke nor an advertisement in disguise, but was exactly what its face recited—a serious invitation to a serious affair, extended by the recipient of the 172 presents, William Emmette Coleman, whose perfect seriousness will not be doubted when it is stated that he has not only written books with titles like "Essences and Therapeutics," "Spectrum Analysis" and "Paraxialisms Between Biology and Philosophy," but has been for twenty-six years a clerk in the Quartermaster's department in the Phelan Building.

The retreat of Mr. Coleman is at the top of a steep and winding stairway. Here he, lean, spare, spectacled, gray-haired, thin featured and long figured, sits in two or three dim rooms with three hundred photographs of his friends on his walls and twenty-two thousand volumes on his shelves. Here he studies Hinduism, Buddhism, Sanskrit and Pall literature for pastime in the evening. Although William Emmette Coleman has written many books and articles on a psychic and scientific subjects, his heart has not withered in the blighting atmosphere of cold abstractions. And in feeling a sympathy for the needs of humanity and in demonstrating the everlasting reality of the source of supply, he has lived such a life that at sixty-two years, one hundred and seventy-two presents and loving messages came to him from all points of the world on Christmas Day.

The little room where the exhibit took place was filled with friends of Mr. Coleman during the afternoon and evening.

CALLING FOR EXPLANATION.

Dr. R. E. Coon Desires Some Information From President Barrett.

To the Honorable Harrison D. Barrett—President of the National Association of Spiritualists:—I am writing you for the first time, and in using my name before the public. As you have made some statements in regard to me and my work through the columns of The Progressive Thinker, it is but fair for me to ask you some questions, which I hope you will not mind being asked.

In the first place, I will ask you if I understood you in your answer to Professor Loveland's queries, when you said that I am in no way connected with the National Association of Spiritualists. What I want to know is, if a man that has been ordained under the laws of Oregon, or any other state in the Union, and recognized as a minister of the Gospel of Spiritualism, is it not a fact that he is indirectly connected with the N. S. A., and if not, then what protection does the state association have, or its local workers, or its ministers, if there is no connection between the state and National Association?

Further, I wish to state to the public that I am not a missionary of the N. S. A. directly, but indirectly. I thought that as a local worker and a regular ordained minister of the Gospel of Spiritualism, I was privileged to work for the whole cause, anywhere and at any time. I do not say that I was the mouthpiece of the N. S. A. or any of its officers, and I will now ask pardon of the N. S. A. and its officers for stating that they constitute a Christian organization, if this will make it right, for I do not want to offend any of my brothers and sisters. I wish to say also to the public that, as Brother Barrett said he happened to know all about my qualifications and ordination, for he was there. That is perfectly correct. According to the usages of the N. S. A., the ordination was of a three-fold nature, and I will further state that he took part in my ordination himself, and performed the most sacred part of that of dedicating the charge. Rev. Harry J. Moore performed the ordination, and Rev. G. C. Love extended the right hand of fellowship for the Clackamas County Religious Association, whose pastor I am at present, and also the state of Oregon, as he was then the state president.

Brother Barrett, in delivering the charge which made the ordination complete, and in keeping with the usages of the N. S. A., said, while placing his hand upon my shoulder: "Brother Coon, at no time or place or under any circumstances whatever will you be privileged to attack a church, society, institution, lodge, or any kind of order that has for its object the uplifting of humanity, nor will you be allowed to attack a preacher, priest or pope, or any public person who is trying to make humanity better." This was right, and I did not object to it. And again, he said to me: "You will also remember at no time or place will you be privileged to take part or to endorse any kind of deception, false doctrine, or anything whatever that savors in the least of deception, be it what it may, even if it is for the government. If it is not just, you must not endorse it, and if you do, you will be accessory to the crime and meaner than the real culprit."

This is right, and I did not object to it. How well I kept the charge will be better judged by quoting from the little article at Pendleton, which reads as follows: "It was especially noticeable that Dr. Coon did not attack the churches or any thing else calculated to lift up humanity in any way. On the contrary, his kindly manner toward all things calculated to make humanity better greatly enhanced his plausible arguments." This certainly does show that I have kept the charge.

I will now thank Brother Barrett for passing one of the greatest and best compliments that could be passed on any man, and that is this: "Dr. Coon is an honest man." I would rather be an honest poor man in this world than a dishonest rich man, and I will try to keep this reputation the balance of my life. In this matter, I feel that I should not be honest if I had not written this article.

I ask one more question of Brother Barrett, and all the officers of the N. S. A.: Do you want honest men and women in the field? If not, I am willing to resign now, and I will not be offended if you will release me from my obligation to your cause and my cause as well, for I shall never give up Spiritualism whether I work for the National or not. I shall always be a Spiritualist. If I was empowered now to do so, I could organize societies, churches or temples, at Pendleton, Baker City, Grant's Pass, Gold Butte, and in many other places. Do you want more membership, more strength? It is left to you to say. I await your answer. I was ordained twice under the California state law, once as a local minister of the Gospel of Spiritualism, and last as an evangelist and missionary of the Gospel of Spiritualism. I have worked seven years for this glorious cause, and I have never received pay for my work from any society whatever. I thought I would have more protection by coming into the N. S. A., but if you do not need any more honest workers, I will go back to my old field of labor where I will be more than welcome.

As a parting word I would say to the N. S. A. and its officers and workers, we need more charity, and less criticism. Yours for a Spiritualist, REV. DR. R. E. COON, Spiritual Evangelist, Spokane, Wash.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.

B. Frank Schmid and His Will.

To the Editor:—Mr. B. Frank Schmid, who was president of the First Spiritual Church Association of Indianapolis, Ind., for a number of years, very suddenly passed to the higher life, Dec. 27, at Grand Springs, Colo. A funeral was held at 2 p. m., January 2, 1906, at his late residence, 1740 North Capitol avenue. Miss Harlow delivered one of the most eloquent and touchingly beautiful discourses I have ever listened to.

His will, which has been admitted to probate, makes his sister, Miss Lillie Schmid, a most estimable lady, executrix. The beneficiaries of his estate are: His wife, Mrs. Lillie Schmid, his only child, a son, and a daughter, his sister Lillie, and former housekeeper, Regina Obergfell. Then because of past kindness and advice given, the following friends are to receive $350 each: Mrs. E. Barrett, Asa Bagnelle, Elizabeth Coffman, Georgia Gladys Amadon, Anna L. Gillespie and Ada Hornum. The German Lutheran orphan asylum, Flower Mission, Free Kindergarten, Door of Hope and Rescue Mission, are named for $4000 each.

The managers of the Spiritualists named as beneficiaries of his will were undoubtedly wrong in having bitterly denounced Spiritualism if he had ever

REPLY TO DR. COON.

The President of the N. S. A. Makes a Comprehensive Explanation.

Dear Dr. Coon:—Your queries have been placed before me for consideration. I am greatly surprised that you should feel at all put out over my references to you, as they were all kind in spirit and fraternal in feeling. You and your friends had seen fit to refer to me on many previous occasions, to which I made no objection whatever, for I believed that you and they had only kindness and good will in mind for me.

When Prof. Loveland asked for an explanation, he was entitled to a courteous reply, and as you had figured in the first premise, you of necessity had to be mentioned in the last one. I meant you no ill-will, and thought I was speaking the sentiments of fraternity and kindness of heart when I wrote my response to Prof. Loveland's searching, yet considerate questions.

I did not mislead you nor the readers of The Progressive Thinker in any degree, so far as your personality is concerned. I said that you were not and never had been a missionary of the N. S. A. Your ordination as a minister of our Gospel in Oregon does relate you indirectly to the N. S. A., and I did not intentionally disclaim that relationship. All legally ordained ministers of the Spiritualistic faith are related to the N. S. A. when their papers have been properly filed and attested in due form. There is a direct connection between all State Associations and the N. S. A. Only state associations now have the power to confer ordination, save in cases of societies that were organized as Spiritualistic churches (church societies) and chartered as such under the laws governing corporations not for profit.

There is no disposition on the part of any officer of the N. S. A. to disavowship in any way whatsoever. You are held to be an earnest, honest man, trying to do your part to uphold the religion of your choice. When you have proved yourself unworthy of this trust, you will be told so in plain terms, and the public will likewise be informed as to the change found in you. Until then, every one of your co-workers will have a kind word for you and a warm hand-clasp to go with it as an earnest of his good will.

There is plenty of room for honest, sincere workers upon our platform. The N. S. A. welcomes all such in all loyalty of soul and will do all in its power to sustain them. We want more organizations and an ever-increasing number of people who attend our meetings. Every man and woman is expected to prove his or her worth. "By their works shall ye be known," the apostle to the workers in our faith as much as it does to the clergymen of other denominations. Go on, Brother Coon, do all the good you can, stand by the truth as it appears to you, and fight the good fight against wrong-doing with all your might. You will then not lack for friends, nor for words of encouragement from the N. S. A., or from any other body of reformers.

You will be received into full fellowship next August by the Society that ordained you qualitatively last year. No one has spoken a word against you or sought to undermine your influence. You can wear any label you see fit, and no one will say nay. You are asked to be true and loyal to everything that makes for righteousness. It is only when one attempts to fit his label upon some one else, that trouble is likely to occur. If Spiritualism is to you only a branch of Christianity, you have a perfect right to hold that opinion. The objection comes when you say that all others hold the same view.

We need not multiply words, for we now have a perfect understanding of the matter under consideration. The N. S. A. officials are your friends and no one wishes you any ill. We are all in search of the truth itself, hence should not stickle for terms or labels that are often used solely to conceal one's thought. There is truth in all religions, and in all faiths. Christianity, there is good in Shintoism, but we ought not to be so greatly overawed by names as to be unable to go in search of truth in all fields of investigation.

Principles are everything, because they are eternal. Individuals often count for but little because they are the instruments through which principles are brought to the good of others. They may be ground to powder, gibbeted, burned at the stake, and subjected to social ostracism for the sake of principle. True men and women never hesitate to face one and all of these conditions, provided they can, by their blood, seal the truth of what they advocate. "We need not come toward none, with charity for all" the N. S. A. seeks to do its work. Brother Coon, there is no platform of greater depth than this, and I do not believe you will object to our national body because it stands thereon.

Wishing you a full measure of success in all good works, I am, FRANKLIN D. BARRETT, President N. S. A., Kansas City, Mo.

during his earth life broached the subject to them.

The will has fallen like a chilly, wet blanket upon the Spiritualists of Indianapolis.

The general impression seems to be one of surprise, and disappointment because they thought he would have left, at least a small amount to the Mediums' Home, or the cause in general, if not a dollar to the association of which he was the honored president.

Of interest to the First Spiritual Church was ever owned by the First Spiritual Church Association. Individual members owned stock in it. I understand that Mr. Schmid had bought up most all the stock, and his interest in the First Spiritual Church he leaves to his sister, Lillie.

I understand that the Ladies' Aid of the church paid $400 or $500 for sidewalk, street improvements, etc. I was told by one of the trustees of the First Spiritual Church, who is a stockholder, that he understood that Miss Lillie Schmid was going to make over the interest she owns to the trustees of the First Spiritual Association.

The Progressive Spiritual Society is holding meetings every Sunday at 3 and 7:30 p. m. in the G. A. Hall, 222 East Maryland street. Mrs. Anna Thronson, who has recently moved here from Louisville, Ky., is the regular speaker. The hall is well filled every Sunday evening, and the audience lectures and readings given from the platform.

SPRITUALISM IN INDIANA. The Cause on the Top Wave of Successful Advancement.

To the Editor:—With your permission the writer is pleased to record the work being done for the cause of Truth in good old Indiana. Some time ago, the state association was fortunate in securing as missionary, Will J. Erwood, of Black River Falls, Wis., who is now touring Indiana and doing effective work for the cause he so honorably and ably represents. The first meeting for the state was held in Rochester, Jan. 11, and was continued each evening until after Sunday, Jan. 13.

Although the society at this city is small and had held no meetings for a number of months, the church was comfortably filled at each session with representative people, notwithstanding two religious revivals of the orthodox persuasion were in progress. Mr. Erwood has the happy faculty of winning friends to the cause as well as personally, and his lectures are appreciated and accepted as a consequence. We hope to have this young man with us again, as his efforts among us are productive of good.

The next day he visited was Peru, Indiana, the home of our state president, E. A. Schram. Glowing are the accounts given of Mr. Erwood's meetings in that city, and Spiritualism is alive and Spiritualists awakened to the call of duty.

At Muncie, the state mass-meeting convened January 13. Mr. Erwood was assisted in the work by Will V. Nicum, of Dayton, and Miss Elizabeth Harlow, of Columbus, Ohio. A more able trio of earnest exponents of our philosophy could not have been brought together. Erwood explanatory, laying the foundation, Miss Harlow, logical, rearing the structure scientifically, and Nicum crowning all by his esoteric teaching of spiritual development.

Every meeting was largely attended and of intense interest. The music was furnished by Misses Minnie Mendall, Carrie and Adalade Mickler of Chesterfield, and a coterie of young people of the Muncie society, and was highly appreciated.

The success of the meeting is because of the work of President Schram, Secretary Carrie Mong, and Treasurer Lou Swenson, together with the assistance of each member of the local society. The collections were large and proved the people were glad to donate toward the upbuilding of Spiritualism in Muncie.

Mr. and Mrs. Zack Mong were the host and hostess to the speakers and a number of friends and it can be truthfully said a more genial company never gathered around the table than those entertained by those hospitable people. Their guests were made to feel they were at home, and each speedily took advantage of the generosity extended.

Mr. Erwood lectured at Anderson, and from there went to Elwood, Alexandria, Evansville and the towns of southern Indiana, speaking at South Bend and again at Peru and Rochester on the return trip to his home.

The state convention convenes in March, and we hope to have the work on the move all over the state before that time. Let all secretaries of Indiana societies report the progress of the work accomplished in their locality, as it lends encouragement to others to make greater effort for the advancement of Spiritualism in Indiana.

OCCULT INFLUENCES. Articles Removed by Spirits and Afterwards Replaced.

I have been cognizant, more or less, of spiritual manifestations since 1850. This was before fraud was practiced in its name. I have seen and experienced much of later years. I have seen gross impositions, and I think no one feels more hurt than I do about it, and I thank you, Mr. Editor, for the active part you are taking to weed out those cursed tares from our midst.

How illogical Mrs. Cassell's reasoning when she says if hats, dolls, crosses, etc., can be taken to the spirit world, so also can stoves, furniture, houses, etc. Now this is about as logical as this statement: You can lift dishes, handle the broom and the pots. You ought to be able to lift the stove, etc. There is a limit to strength.

The articles were taken into the cabinet and then disappeared. Where were they taken? Only a few days ago an article was taken from its usual place, and no one about the room but myself and daughter. I thoroughly searched the room, and it could not be found. Twenty-four hours afterwards, there it lay at its usual place. Where was it taken? Is the question; not necessarily to the spirit world. Neither my daughter nor I pose as mediums, making it appear more difficult for spirits to move objects. January 26, I took the article referred to to Georgia Gladys Cooley, and after a very satisfactory sitting, I presented the same to the guide. The first remark made was: "The spirits have been monkeying with this." After several remarks about it, she said, "Take care of it. They are not done with it." This proves to me that spirits can and do move and secrete articles, and return them at some future time. Chicago. J. PEEFLEY.

PRAYER. Pray if you will, but prayer never can produce one useful thought in mind of man. Kneel to the great unknown, but learn to know. That man is never raised by bending low. Ask God to give, but learn that useful hands. Are ever more valued than God's commands. That one poor cot on earth is valued high. Above the greatest mansion in the sky. Sing! sing ye host! your God perchance may hear. Your long-sought Christ on earth may yet appear. Your God may speak; Christ condescend to give—To ignorance the power to think and live. Faith in a dream produces nothing good. Religious lies when they are understood. As nations rise and fall, creeds come and go—Each church is but a monument of woe. The fear of God will damn the truest heart. Which bends to think and play the many part; But love of truth will raise the living head. Above all creeds and failures of the dead. —Sylvanus in Agnostic Journal

A Little Pilgrim.

This is a charming narrative illustrating the beauty, grandeur and sublimity of the spirit side of life, the realms of souls, the immortal spheres of existence. Margaret O. W. Oliphant is the author. And while it has been read by millions in the past, it will prove refreshing and soul-inspiring to our readers to again peruse it and feel its thrills of inspiration, and enjoy its uplifting influence.

Chapter I.—Continued.

This was very strange to the little Pilgrim, and went to her heart. She soothed the stranger, holding her hands warm and light, and stooping over her.

"Dear," she said, "you must try and not be afraid."

"You say so," said the woman, "because you are well and strong. You don't know what it is to be seized in the middle of your life, and told that you've got to die. Oh, I have been a sinful creature! I am not fit to die. Can't you give me something that will cure me? What is the good of doctors and nurses if they cannot save a poor soul that is not fit to die?"

At this the little Pilgrim smiled upon her, always holding her fast, and said:

"Why are you so afraid to die?"

The woman raised her head to see who it was who put such a strange question to her.

"You are some one new," she said. "I have never seen you before. Is there any one that is not afraid to die? Would you like to have to give your account all in a moment, without any time to prepare?"

"But you have had time to prepare," said the Pilgrim.

"Oh, only a very, very little time. And I never thought it was true. I am not an old woman, and I am not fit to die; and I'm poor. Oh, if I were rich, I would bribe you to give me something to keep me alive. Won't you do it for pity?—won't you do it for pity? When you are as bad as I am, oh, you will perhaps call for some one to help you, and find nobody, like me."

"I will help you for love," said the little Pilgrim; "some one who loves you has sent me."

The woman lifted herself up a little and shook her head. "There is nobody that loves me." Then she cast her eyes round her and began to tremble again (for the touch of the little Pilgrim had startled her). "Oh, where am I?" she said. "They have taken me away; they have brought me to a strange place; and you are new. Oh, where have they taken me?—where am I?—where am I?" she cried. "Have they brought me here to die?"

Then the little Pilgrim bent over her and soothed her. "You must not be so much afraid of dying; that is all over. You need not fear that any more," she said softly; "for here where you now are we have all died."

The woman started up out of her arms, and then she gave a great shriek that made the air ring, and cried out, "Dead! am I dead?" with a shudder and convulsion, throwing herself again wildly with outstretched hands upon the ground.

This was a great and terrible work for the little Pilgrim—the first she ever had to do—and her heart failed her for a moment; but afterward she remembered her Brother who sent her, and knew what was best. She drew closer to the new-comer, and took her hand again.

"Try," she said, in a soft voice, "and think a little. Do you feel now so ill as you were? Do not be frightened, but think a little. I will hold your hand. And look at me; you are not afraid of me?"

The poor creature shuddered again, and then she turned her face and looked doubtfully, with great dark eyes dilated, and the brow and cheek so curved and puckered round them that they seemed to glow out of deep caverns. Her face was full of anguish and fear. But as she looked at the little Pilgrim, her troubled gaze softened. Of her own accord she clasped her other hand upon the one that held hers, and then she said with a gasp:

"I am not afraid of you; that was not true that you said! You are one of the sisters, and you want to frighten me and make me repent!"

"You do repent," the Pilgrim said.

"Oh," cried the poor woman, "what has the like of you to do with me? Now I look at you, I never saw any one that was like you before. Don't you hate me?—don't you loathe me? I do myself. It's so ugly to go wrong. I think now I would almost rather die and be done with it. You will say that is because I am going to get better. I feel a great deal better now. Do you think I am going to get over it? Oh, I am better! I could get up out of bed and walk about. Yes, but I am not in bed—where have you brought me? Never mind, it is a fine air! I shall soon get well here."

The Pilgrim was silent for a little, holding her hands, and then she said:

"Tell me how you feel now," in her soft voice.

The woman had sat up, and was gazing round her. "It is very strange," she said; "it is all confused. I think upon my mother and the old prayers I used to say. For a long, long time I always said my prayers; but now I've got hardened, they say. Oh, I was once as fresh as any one. Oh, it all comes over me now. I feel as if I were young again—just come out of the country. I am sure that I could walk."

The little Pilgrim raised her up, holding her by the hands; and she stood and gazed round about her, making one or two doubtful steps. She was very pale, and the light was dim; her eyes peered into it with a scared yet eager look. She made another step, then stopped again.

"I am quite well," she said. "I could walk a mile. I could walk any distance. What was that you said? Oh, I tell you I am better! I am not going to die."

"You will never, never die," said the little Pilgrim; "are you not glad it is all over? Oh, I was so glad! And all the more you should be glad if you were so much afraid."

But this woman was not glad. She shrank away from her companion, then came close to her again, and gripped her with her hands.

"It is your—fun," she said, "or just to frighten me. Perhaps you think it will do me no harm as I am getting so well; you want to frighten me to make me good. But I mean to be good without that—I do!—I do! When one is so near dying as I have been and yet gets better,—for I am going to get better! Yes! you know it as well as I!"

The little Pilgrim made no reply, but stood by, looking at her charge, not feeling that anything was given to her to say, and she was so new to this work, that there was a little trembling in her, lest she could not do everything as she ought. And the woman looked round with those anxious eyes, gazing all about. The light did not brighten as it had done when the Pilgrim herself first came to this place. For one thing, they had remained quite close to the gate, which no doubt threw a shadow. The woman looked at that, and then turned and looked into the dim morning, and did not know where she was, and her heart was confused and troubled.

"Where are we?" she said. "I do not know where it is; they must have brought me here in my sleep—where are we? How strange to bring a sick woman away out of her room in the night! I suppose it was the new doctor," she went on, looking very closely in the little Pilgrim's face; then paused, and drawing a long breath, said softly, "It has done me good. It is better air—it is a new kind of cure!"

But though she spoke like this, she did not convince herself; her eyes were wild with wondering and fear. She gripped the Pilgrim's arm more and more closely, and trembled, leaning upon her.

"Why don't you speak to me?" she said; "why don't you tell me? Oh, I don't know how to live in this place! What do you do?—how do you speak? I am not fit for it. And what are you? I never saw you before, nor any one like you. What do you want with me? Why are you so kind to me? Why—why—"

And here she went off into a murmur of questions. Why? why? always holding fast by the little Pilgrim, at times gazing round her, groping as it were in the dimness with her great eyes.

"I have come because our dear Lord who is our Brother sent me to meet you, and because I love you," the little Pilgrim said.

"Love me!" the woman cried, throwing up her hands. "But no one loves me; I have not deserved it. Here she grasped her close again with a sudden clutch, and cried out, "If this is what you say, where is God?"

"Are you afraid of him?" the little Pilgrim said.

Upon which the woman trembled so, that the Pilgrim trembled too with the quivering of her frame; then loosed her hold, and fell upon her face, and cried:

"Hide me! hide me! I have been a great sinner. Hide me, that he may not see me," and with one hand she tried to draw the Pilgrim's dress as a veil between her and something she feared.

"How should I hide you from him who is everywhere? and why should I hide you from your Father?" the little Pilgrim said. This she said almost with indignation, wondering that any one could put more trust in her, who was no better than a child, than in the Father of all. But then she said, "Look into your heart; and you will see you are not so much afraid as you think. This is how you have been accustomed to frighten yourself. But now look into your heart. You thought you were very ill at first, but not now; and you think you are afraid; but look into your heart—"

There was a silence; and then the woman raised her head with a wonderful look, in which there was amazement and doubt, as if she had heard some joyful thing, but dared not yet believe that it was true. Once more she hid her face in her hands, and once more raised it again. Her eyes softened; a long sigh or gasp, like one taking breath after drowning, shook her breast. Then she said, "I think—that is true. But if I am not afraid, it is because I am—bad. It is because I am hardened. Oh, should that I could walk."

not I fear him who can send me away into—the lake that burns—into the pit—And here she gave a great cry, but held the little Pilgrim all the while with her eyes, which seemed to plead and ask for better news.

Then there came into the Pilgrim's heart what to say, and she took the woman's hand again and held it between her own. "That is the change," she said, "that comes when we come here. We are not afraid any more of our Father. We are not all happy. Perhaps you will not be happy at first. But if he says to you, 'Go!'—even to that place you speak of—you will know that it is well, and you will not be afraid. You are not afraid now—oh, I can see it in your eyes. You are not happy, but you are not afraid. You know it is the Father. Do not say God,—that is far off,—rather!" said the little Pilgrim, holding up the woman's hand clasped in her own.

And there came into her soul an ecstasy, and tears that were tears of blessedness fell from her eyes, and all about her there seemed to shine a light. When she came to herself, the woman who was her charge had come quite close to her, and had added her other hand to that the Pilgrim held, and was weeping and saying, "I am not afraid," with now and then a gasp and sob, like a child, who after a passion of tears has been consoled, yet goes on sobbing and cannot quite forget, and is afraid to own that all is well again.

Then the Pilgrim kissed her, and bade her rest a little; for even she herself felt shaken, and longed for a little quiet, and to feel the true sense of the peace that was in her heart. She sat down beside her upon the ground, and made her lean her head against her shoulder, and thus they remained very still for a little time, saying no more. It seemed to the little Pilgrim that her companion had fallen asleep, and perhaps it was so, after so much agitation. All this time there had been people passing, entering by the many doors. And most of them paused a little to see where they went, and looked round them, then went on; and it seemed to the little Pilgrim that according to the doors by which they entered each took a different way.

While she watched another came in by the same door as that at which the woman who was her charge had come in. And he, too, stumbled and looked about him with an air of great wonder and doubt. When he saw her seated on the ground, he came up to her hesitating, as one in a strange place who does not want to betray that he is bewildered and has lost his way. He came with a little pretense of smiling, though his countenance was pale and scared, and said, drawing his breath quick, "I ought to know where I am, but I have lost my head. I think. Will you tell me which is—the way?"

"What way?" cried the little Pilgrim, for her strength was gone from her, and she had no word to say to him. He looked at her with that bewildered on his face, and said, "I find myself strange, strange. I ought to know where I am; but it is scarcely daylight yet. It is perhaps foolish to come out so early in the morning. This he said in his confusion, not knowing where he was, nor what he said.

"I think all the ways lead to our Father," said the little Pilgrim (though she had not known this till now). "And the dear Lord walks about them all. Here you never go astray."

Upon this the stranger looked at her, and asked in a faltering voice, "Are you an angel?" still not knowing what he said.

"Oh, no; no; I am only a Pilgrim," she replied.

"May I sit by you a little?" said the man. He sat down, drawing long breaths, as though he had gone through great fatigue; and looked about with wondering eyes. "You will wonder, but I do not know where I am," he said. "I feel as if I must be dreaming. This is not where I expected to come. I looked for something very different; do you think there can have been any mistake?"

"Oh, never that," she said; "there are no mistakes here."

Then he looked at her again, and said: "I perceive that you belong to this country, though you say you are a pilgrim. I should be grateful if you would tell me. Does one live here? And is this all? Is there no—no—but I don't know what word to use. All is so strange, different from what I expected."

"Do you know that you have died?"

"Yes—yes, I am quite acquainted with that," he said, hurriedly, as if it had been an idea he disliked to dwell upon. "But then I expected—Is there no one to tell you where to go, or what you are to be? or to take any notice of you?"

The little Pilgrim was startled by this tone. She did not understand its meaning, and she had not any word to say to him. She looked at him with some bewilderment, as he had shown when he approached her, and replied, faltering:

"There are a great many people here; but I have never heard if there is any one to tell you—"

"What does it matter how many people there are if you know none of them?" he said.

"We all know each other," she answered him; but then paused and hesitated a little, because this was what had been said to her, and of herself she was not assured of it, neither did she know at all how to deal with this stranger, to whom she had not any commission. It seemed that he had no one to care for him, and the little Pilgrim had a sense of compassion.

of trouble in her heart; for who could she say? And it was very strange to her to see one who was not content here:—

"Ah, but there should be some one to point the way, and tell us which is our circle, and where we ought to go," he said. And then he, too, was silent for a while, looking about him as all were fain to do on their first arrival, finding everything so strange. There were people coming in at every moment, and some were met at the very threshold, and some went away alone with peaceful faces, and there were mighty grins about talking together in soft voices; but no one interrupted the other, and though so many were there, each voice was as clear as if it had spoken alone, and there was no tumult of sound as when many people assemble together in the lower world.

"The little Pilgrim wondered to find herself with the woman resting upon her on one side, and the man seated silent on the other, neither having, it appeared, any guide but only herself, who knew so little. How was she to lead them in the paths which she did not know?—and she was exhausted by the agitation of her struggle with the woman whom she felt to be her charge. But in this moment of silence she had time to remember the face of the Lord, when he gave her this commission, and her heart was strengthened. The man all this time sat and watched, looking eagerly all about him, examining the faces of those who went and came; and sometimes he made a little start as if to go and speak to some one he knew; but always drew back again and looked at the little Pilgrim, as if he had said, "This is the one who will serve me best." He spoke to her again after a while and said, "I suppose you are one of the guides that show the way."

"No," said the little Pilgrim, anxiously. "I know so little! It is not long since I came here. I came in the early morning—"

"Why, it is morning now. You could not come earlier than it is now. You mean yesterday."

"I think," said the Pilgrim, "that yesterday is the other side; there is no yesterday here."

He looked at her with the keen look he had, to understand her the better; and then he said:

"No division of time! I think that must be monotonous. It will be strange, as have no night; but I suppose one gets used to everything. I hope though there is something to do. I have always lived a very busy life. Perhaps this is just a little pause, before we go—to have—to get to an appointed place."

He had an uneasy look as he said this, and looked at her with an anxious curiosity, which the little Pilgrim did not understand.

"I don't know," she said softly, shaking her head. "I have so little experience. I have not been told of an appointed place."

"The man looked at her very strangely.

"I did not think," he said; "that I should have found such ignorance here. Is it not well known that we must all appear before the judgment-seat of God?"

A DEFENSE OF MR. AND MRS. EMMER.

By Mr. Chas. W. Klee, of Washington, D. C.

A few days ago, witnessed the official abandonment of what appeared to be a most cowardly, irresponsible and unwarranted attack on two of the most upright and law-abiding citizens in this community.

On October 12 last, there appeared at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Emmmer, a public man of this city, a man by the name of Bode, by occupation a policeman, and, in the company of his parents, requested permission to attend the seance to be given on that occasion.

Although a stranger he was welcomed and extended the same courtesies as would be given to any seemingly genteel person, as these seances are attended by many of the most reputable citizens of Washington.

The seance had not progressed far when Mr. Bode, who had entered the house under an assumed name, was reminded of that fact by a voice from the cabinet. Not daunted by this exposure, the real purpose of his visit was made manifest a few moments later when he lifted time as a fitting declaration of that fact by a voice from the cabinet. Not daunted by this exposure, the real purpose of his visit was made manifest a few moments later when he lifted time as a fitting declaration of that fact by a voice from the cabinet.

He then left the house as he came, in the company of his parents, and about four days later preferred a charge of "larceny by trick" against Mr. and Mrs. Emmmer who had not accepted his money.

The record of this charge enabled him to secure the recognition of the local press, never unwilling to magnify sensations of this character as good Sunday literature.

This attack accomplished, the charge was immediately withdrawn, and another substituted, that of holding an entertainment without a license. This second charge met with the determined opposition of the prosecuting attorney who declined to accept the theory that a seance is an entertainment, and therefore refused to proceed.

The whole case was then filed away to stumple and fumble days ago when it was officially abandoned.

The charge made by the young man was absolutely without foundation, and is defied by every person who was present, as has been fully ascertained after a full and complete investigation involving every phase of the incident; and this explanation is particularly proper at this time as a fitting denunciation to what appears to have been an attempt to secure personal notoriety at the expense of good citizenship.

Mr. and Mrs. Emmmer have lived in this city for more than twenty years, and have the esteem and respect of all who know them.

Their names have been mentioned by federal and local government officials, and by members of congress; and the manifestations occurring at their seances are of a character which appeal strongly to the student of psychic phenomena.

The great variety of physical manifestations while eliciting the intensest interest of the investigator, have stubbornly resisted any explanation based on physical laws as understood by mortals.

As an instance which might appeal to those who frequently insist on the introduction of articles of current value to emphasize the importance of physical manifestations to the individual, I wish to state that some time ago Mr. Emmmer was visited by a spirit who gave the name of Fields, and who stated that he was in great distress, considering himself responsible for the recent death of his wife and child, and having taken his own life in the agony of remorse, stated that he could see his wife and child with outstretched arms in the spirit world, but could not reach them. He stated if the mediums would kindly sit for him a brief time he thought he would be able to reach them. They agreed to do so, and accordingly sat for him every Thursday for a period of several weeks.

On each occasion the spirit would appear twice, first to announce his presence and again to bid them good night, the time occupied being, in each case, about twenty minutes. After about four weeks the spirit announced his presence one Thursday evening and stated he had been greatly benefited and asked the indulgence of the mediums a few moments while he would go after some one. The spirit presently returned with his wife and child, all seeming greatly joyed at finally becoming reunited, and remained in conversation on the floor for more than fifteen minutes. On being bidden to ask the indulgence of the mediums a few moments while he would go after some one, the spirit stated that he would probably require about one hour sitting, as he was able to reach his wife but could not go with her, as they had yet to go in seemingly opposite directions on parting. At the next sitting the mediums were thanked profusely and were told they need not sit any more.

A short time thereafter a voice was heard in the room in which they were sitting, saying, "Go to the dresser and get your reward." On repairing to the dresser and unlocking it a strange envelope was found addressed "Your reward from Fields," and containing $45.00, and verified by witnesses present.

On another occasion Mr. Emmmer expressed intense interest in the general elections, and wished to go to the National Hotel, in this city, where his club was to receive telegraphic reports of the returns. A voice was heard saying, if they would repair to the seance room and place a tablet and candles in the cabinet, it would not be necessary for them to go to the hotel to await the returns. This was done. During the evening the writing and tearing off of paper could be heard constantly. Shortly after 2 o'clock more than 200 messages had been received which proved, on comparison the following day, at the hotel, to be exact copies of telegrams received by the operator at the key the night before.

I might add, it is only a few weeks ago that a seance was held at my own house with these mediums present. There were but five persons in the house and they were in the seance room, all outer doors and the seance room door being locked, making it impossible for anyone without our knowledge, the utmost order prevailing, and quiet conversation being engaged in, the mediums taking part. Presently loud knocking was heard on the outside of the seance room door, which was then opened and there appeared before us a full form illuminated from the lips to the head, wearing straight towards us, across the room. The form was recognized as the brother of one of the sitters, and talked with us at considerable length, and was positively not either of the mediums, who could not have reached the door without coming in personal contact with the sitters.

I merely make these brief references to illustrate how easy it is to vilify one who is worthy of better treatment, and the weakness of the argument which points the finger of scorn and skepticism at the unexplainable.

For nearly ten years Mr. and Mrs. Emmmer gave public seances without charge, until their circumstances became such as to make this necessary. They are opposed to the principle of making a charge of any kind at seances, and did so at the earnest solicitations of their most intimate friends.

CHAS. W. KLEE.

CHEER FOR THE DEPARTED.

We must sometimes pause from labor and our all-absorbing thought, To look out upon the future, and to glimpses we have caught, Of a life beyond the mortal, where our friends are waiting for our aid. Often tell us in faint whispers, "All will meet some future day."

Of when life seems bathed in sweetness and our soul its zenith finds, Swift a gleam of light above us, and our mortal vision blinds, Then it is we are reminded of our weakness unto woe, Though we know when all is over, Light and darkness make us grow.

When there passes from the vision to that higher, brighter sphere, An old kindred or companion, who has been so long so near, Even tears will fail to fully ease the pent-up throbbing heart. For though knowing it were better, It were bitter thus to part.

When the spirit and the body can no longer live as one, When the soul immortal, yearning, finds its earthly labor done, It were wise to be transported to a higher plane of life.

There again in active labor to resume the round of strife.

It were wise to be uplifted from a worn-out form of life, To be wise to have soul-freedom in a higher form of birth, And no matter how we miss them from our lonely earth abode, We should hail the soul's transition, and give cheer along the road.

As upon the surging ocean, unnumbered by the forms, They are drifting quite securely from this life's tempestuous storms, All their faults of earthly nature will in time be gone, unknown; It will be swept away eternal, when the spirits are full grown.

Let us follow them in silence and in love unto the door, And then send along our blessings and good wishes to the shore, And assure them, in the spirit, of our pleasure unexpressed, For their freedom from the bodies they have worn and laid to rest.

DR. JULIA M. WALTON.

She is a Prominent Worker in the State of Michigan, and Gives Her Views of Mrs. Margaret Spencer, a Medium Arrested Lately in Grand Rapids, Mich.—Spiritualistic Association Does Not Take Kindly to the Average Materializing Medium.

"What do I know about Mrs. Margaret Spencer of Grand Rapids? Well, not very much," said Dr. Julia M. Walton to the Patriot last evening. "It is certainly difficult to account for Mrs. Esther M. Bolman's action," she continued in speaking of the mysterious Grand Rapids mediumship case. "I have not followed it very closely."

"I know Mrs. Spencer, and attended one of her seances, and it never occurred to me that she was overly endowed with intelligence. She hardly seemed subtle or ingenious enough to play the tricks credited to her, but, then, I don't know a whole lot about the case."

"So far as I know Mrs. Spencer does not hold papers from the State Spiritualistic Association, and is not recognized by the association as a medium. Never since I have been president of the association, or been on the board, had she made application for papers."

"We seldom recognize such mediums as Mrs. Spencer. Our association has but very little to do with these Spiritualists or mediums, who claim to be able to bring about physical manifestations, such as she is claimed to have done. Such people have to pass a vigorous test and there are very few of them in this state who hold papers from our association."

"We deal in psychic research and mental phenomena and pay but small attention to these physical manifestations, because there is so much opportunity for fraud and chicanery in this kind of mediumship."

"Do you think the police of Grand Rapids are persecuting this woman in prosecuting their investigations?" was asked.

"If all that has been said is true, I do not blame the police for following every possible clue. It is their duty. An honest medium does not go into commercialism. Honest labor is worthy of its hire, but graft is different. However, I don't think the rest of us should be punished for what one has done."

"From what I learn of the case it is just possible that Mrs. Spencer is a ventriloquist and that the alleged voices of spirits were only her own utterances, but of course I don't know. If those auger holes were in the ceiling there is good reason for suspicion."

"Does our association countenance such business? Emphatically not. We are just as interested in the elimination of frauds from the ranks as the police. If Mrs. Spencer is a fraud, it is to the interest of our society to denounce her. We don't want to be held to account for any such chicanery and it is not just we should. Why should we be held responsible for what she or any other renegade medium does? We are not to blame. If a minister turns out an evil man it is not the fault of the church. The banks are not responsible for the spending of money in speculation. No one thinks that and why should we be held to account for what is not our fault?"

"We are not in pursuit of gain. We are not robbers or tricksters and are not in sympathy with those who are. I have attended trumpet seances in which the voices of the departed have been heard, and I know the mediums were honest people who didn't even know who it was that spoke to me. I recognized the voice, and was the only one who did. I have attended few of these physical manifestation seances."

"This woman's friends claim she was dominated and controlled by a stronger will than her own. Do you suppose she was under hypnotic influence?"

"Well, of course that might be. It is a very strange case. It seems funny how Mrs. Bolman was so attracted to Mrs. Spencer in the first place. It may be she was a believer in true Spiritualism and had faith in Mrs. Spencer, not suspecting there was any fraud in what was done, otherwise it is difficult to determine why a woman in her right senses should do what she did, unless, as it is claimed, some power or force was exercised over her which she was unable to resist."

"A reasonable explanation might be," said Dr. Walton, "that if the auger holes were really bored in the ceiling, that a confederate was employed to assist Mrs. Spencer. It is a peculiar matter whatever way you look at it."

"Let me tell you I know many honest mediums that have refused great gain when they have had the opportunity to seize it. We seek neither notoriety or profit. We don't want people to persecute us because they don't believe as we do. We simply want justice done by us, as any person does and we don't want to be held responsible for something some knave does or says. It is not fair; it is not just. We want honest treatment and should receive it from the press as well as individuals."—Jackson, Mich., Morning Patriot.

The Don'ts and the Donothings.
Don't is a word easy to express, but it is not always a safe one in practice.
Had the occupant of the dug-out observed it in his day, and continued until these times to "don't" there would be no steamship plowing the ocean; Algeria would still be a wilderness peopled by savages. "Don't" generally observed, would find ignorance universal, and all the arts and sciences unknown.

It is in disregard of the command to "don't" civilization dawned on the earth.

Those who are so anxious the errors and wrong teaching of the Bible shall not be exposed may "don't" all they please, the truth is destined to prevail and the right will be victor.
Don't can't stop the wheels of progress, or suppress a single honest thought. Imagine an assassin grapple at your throat, and screaming at the top of his voice "Don't" when you are in the act of releasing his hold to hurl him headlong to the earth. That modernized couplet:

"Honor and fame on no condition
wait,
It's your get up and git that makes men great."

is applicable in every relation of life.
It is by thinking and doing; the discarding the errors of the past, and ever advancing, the race has become what it is to-day.

Let the "Don'ts" live on in ignorance and folly, if they will; but give us the shock, and the storm, and the heat of the day. It will result in a higher and better development, making humanity wiser, better, and more observant of the good and the true.

The sooner the whole tribe of "Don'ts" and "Donothings" shall be come extinct the better for all of us, and that whether in the physical or in the religious world.

The Christian Clergy.
The good Mosheim seems to have entertained a low opinion of the early Christian clergy. In century 3, part 2, chap. 2, sec. 4 of his Ecclesiastical History is found the following:

"Though several yet continued to exhibit examples of primitive piety and Christian virtue, yet many were sunk in luxury and voluptuousness, puffed up with vanity, arrogance, and ambition, possessed of a spirit of contention and discord, and addicted to many vices that cast an undesired reproach upon the holy religion of which they were the unworthy possessors and ministers. This is testified in such an ample manner, by the repeated complaints of many of the most respectable writers of this age, that truth will permit us to spread the veil, which we should otherwise be desirous to cast over such enormities among an order so sacred. The bishops assumed, in many places, a princely authority, particularly those who had the greatest number of churches under their inspection, and who presided over the most opulent assemblies. They appropriated to their ecclesiastical function the splendid en-signs of temporal majesty. A throne, surrounded with ministers, exalted above his equals the servant of the meek and humble Jesus; and sumptuous garments dazzled the eyes and minds of the multitude into an ignorant veneration for their arrogant authority. The example of the bishops was ambitiously imitated by the presbyters, who, neglecting the sacred duties of their station, abandoned themselves to the indolence and delicacy of an effeminate and luxurious life. The deacons, beholding the presbyters deserting their functions, boldly usurped their rights and privileges, and the effects of a corrupt ambition were spread through every rank of the sacred order."

In sec. 6 of this chapter our author tells of the clergy abandoning marriage, and forming relations "with those women who had made vows of perpetual chastity." Should we quote with English translations of the Greek and Latin. Comstock would have business in Chicago.

He who seldom speaks, and with one calm, well-timed word, can strike dumb the loquacious, is a genius and a

We should be as careful of our words as of our actions, and as far from speaking ill of men as of doing ill.—Cicero.

The Baldersdash of a Journalist.

In a Chicago weekly paper, evidently made up from the columns of one of the great dailies under the head of "A Queer Minister of the Gospel," Rev. Minot J. Savage is taken to task for declaring in a late sermon:

"I would rather go to hell with my friends, than to heaven without those I love."

The editor, who must be one of the orthodox fraternity, after saying Rev.
Savage "is merely an echo of a French scoundrel of the 17th century who said he preferred hell to heaven, because the former had a better climate and a more agreeable society," then asserted:

"Such an echo is merely blasphemy without wit."

If that is "evil speaking of God," as blasphemy is defined, then there are a great many blasphemers in this magnificent country of ours, and they are multiplying every day.

Who are the occupants of hell, as preached by believers in that "sacred place," as the learned editor seems to suggest it is? Why, it is "the good and true of every race and clime" who repudiate such an infinite prison house; who have devoted their lives to the service of man. It includes the great statesmen, the philosophers, the scientists, the inventors, the thinkers; they who love father, mother, sisters, brothers, children, and their own lives, more than a dream-begotten son of a Jewish peasant girl. The fathers of our great Republic, Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, the Adamses, with the "nearly hero of the revolution," and nearly every one of the presidents, including Lincoln, Carter and probably McKinley, are all there. Yes, all the mothers of all the ages who loved their children more than Jesus, are there.

And who are they in heaven who Rev. Minot will not be associated with, if he goes to hell? First, all the babies, "for of such is the kingdom of heaven"; the idiots, whose want of hands exempt them from sin; and all the heathen who have never heard the name of Jesus, and the murderers who have paid the penalty for their crimes because they had an abundance of time to repent and be forgiven, and hence were graciously permitted to swing from the gallows to glory.
Ah, and all the preachers are there.

The victims of the assassin, cut off without time to prepare for the great change, are all in hell to greet Rev.
Minot when he arrives.

After censuring the heretical preacher for his, to us, commendable utterances, the learned editor informs his readers that the conception of hell which Rev. Minot referred to, "no longer exists among Christians of education and intelligence." That is just what The Progressive Thinker has asserted for years; but we are shocked when the editor declares:

"One may question whether it might not usefully still exist—whether it would not conduce to social quiet and human decency on the part of persons who are now unrestrained, because so many preachers are willing to abolish hell, and by ignoring it inspire fatally false ideas about the justice of God."

If falsehood is better than truth;
if deception should be practiced that good may come; if in place of love hate should be taught, and men should be lightened by darkness by means of error, then, possibly the damnation theory should be revived again. Otherwise not.

Psychology.

Here is incontrovertible evidence that the secret of the revivalist is contingent on his hypnotic powers. Rev.
O. F. Jordan, of the Central Christian church, of Rockford, Ill., has been "telling tales out of school," though he did not intend to be bad. In his evening discourse of the 28th ult., his theme, "Conversion a Normal Experience," he is reported in The Star as saying, very truthfully:

"Modern psychological research has shown that conversion is a natural experience in the development of the religious nature of man. We discover by careful research that there is a period in life when the change of character called conversion is most apt to occur. This is from the ages of 12 to 18. The men of to-day are many of them outside of the churches, because their religious teachers failed to give them the guidance they needed in one of the most critical periods of their lives. The evangelism of the future will be directed primarily to those who are in the adolescent period, and not to adults, whose habits are frequently so fixed both in thought and deed, that they are scarcely capable of radical change."

Who does not know that the hypo-notist selects the youth "from 12 to 18" as his subjects, and how almost impossible it is to gain influence over those much advanced above that age, unless he has previously become a victim of psychology?

Here is an admission from the evangelist, that the same law holds good in gaining victims for the church.
They who are already under influence are held there by regular attendance on church service. A preacher with but little or no magnetic power soon loses his hold, then, the backslider, who falls from grace for want of that vital stamina, is soon lost to the church; and seeing how he was first controlled, he rarely or never permits himself to come under the influence again.

Discouraged from reading other than church literature, and carefully surrounded by the faithful, a person may pass through a long life, and credit his conversion to the miraculous interference of the heavenly powers as his religious operator taught him.

Yes, fetter the mind in its forming stage, and we have the unthinking churchmen who believe everything the preacher teaches. To see how this influence is exerted attend one of the entertainments given by the Flints. Were it not for meddling with "sacred things," they could manufacture converts to any creed by the wholesale, and become revivalists quite equal or superior to Rev. Billy Sunday.

To the Memory of Jean d'Arc.

A memorial tablet to Jeanne d'Arc is to be placed in the dungeon which is said to have been her prison in the tower of Chateau d'Eu. According to tradition, the Maid of Orleans appears to have been incarcerated here on her journey from Crotoy to Rouen, in December, 1430. The present owner of the chateau, le Comte Gaston d'Eu, a nephew of the Emperor Pedro of Brazil, acquired the property by purchase from his cousin, the Duke of Orleans.

spiritual plane of existence. Rev. M.
J. Savage, one of the most brilliant of liberal minds now before the public, has four chapters of logical, soul-elevating facts which will do you good to read. He is followed by other master minds illustrating the NA-TURE OF DEATH and the grandeur of the SPIRIT REALMS. It will do any one good to read it. Its contents of 350 pages banish the STING OF DEATH and portray the beauty, the loveliness, the fascination of the LAND OF SOULS to which all are tending.

This book is elegantly and substantially bound in cloth, and externally will be an ornament to any center table, while its contents can not fail

BEHIND THE BARS.

JOHN F. MAYBEE BEHIND PRISON BARS.

One of Michigan's favorite materializing mediums was detected a few days ago in Lansing, that State, DRESSED IN ARTIFICIAL TOG-GERY, and posing as a "spirit," trying to palm off his cruel deception on an intelligent circle of Spiritualists.

For twenty-five years such exposures have been going on, one after another, until a nauseating feeling has permeated the rank and file of Spiritualism.

What think you of a medium who will array the body in a crude wig and other paraphernalia, and present the same as a spirit right from the celestrial regions? If a medium, a favorite at camps and private homes, thus de-ceives the people for years, carrying on his nefarious work of cruel deception, what conclusion can be drawn of those who might after night attended his seances, "recognizing" some "spirit" friends? They are simply intellectually blind in not exposing the fraud!

Spiritualists all along the line are awakening, and they find themselves

FACE TO FACE with an evil of GI-GANTIC DIMENSIONS.

This Michigan materializing medium is now behind the BARS OF A PRISON at hard labor, and scores of others not a bit better ought to be with him.

They are birds of illomen; they are the vultures of Spiritualism; they are corrupters of morals, and villainous all the way through.

This medium, like the whole gang of disreputables, was opposed to The Progressive Thinker, which is doing its best to suppress fraud and promote HONESTY, MEDIANSHIP AND A PURE SPIRITUALISM. With a corrupt fraud organ to sustain them, the fakes have considered themselves safe from arrest and imprisonment.

We will at no distant day give full particulars of the exposure of Mr.
Maybee.

SPIRIT RETURN IN ITS ANGELIC
PURITY TRANSCENDS IN IMPORT-ANCE every other reform movement on this earth to-day. It is the ONE TRUE LIGHT that betokens the millennial dawn, and it is too bad to have it handicapped by human vultures and degenerates who pose as spirits and practice deception.

THE SPIRIT WORLD.

As Seen and Described by One Who Has Visited It Frequently.

"In my visions and dreams the bright Jasper walls I can see," sang the poet of "The Home of the Soul."
But C. W. Leadbeater, in full waking consciousness, sees all that eye hath not seen or ear hath heard on earth, or the glories of the heaven world. He has seen and known "the seventh heaven. And what he has done he says all can do.

It is only our lack of development, affirms Mr. Leadbeater, only the limitation imposed upon us by this robe of flesh, that prevents us from fully realizing that all the glory of the highest heaven is about us here and now, and that influences flowing from that world are ever playing upon us if we only will understand and receive them.
"Do not complain and cry," said a great teacher of old, "but open your eyes and see. The light is all about you, if you would only cast the garments from your eyes and look. It is so wonderful, so beautiful, so far beyond what any man has dreamed of or prayed for, and it is forever and forever."

Heaven Is All About Us.

Mr. Leadbeater, as a trained occul-tist, has cultivated his higher senses, his occult faculties, whereby are visible to him the heavenly spiritual regions which are shut out to carnal eyes. These heavenly regions are worlds of subtler substance than the physical world, interpenetrating it, and therefore all about us. Heaven is the world of thought, the mental plane, as the occultists term it, supremacily a state of consciousness, the "kingdom of heaven" being "within you."

The astral plane is the world of feeling; the physical plane, the familiar earth of the senses, is the world of action. His body of action is his physical body, his body of emotion is his astral body, his body of thought is his mental body—his immortal soul, which lives forever in the heaven world and communicates with the physical world by means of physical impacts transmitted to the physical brain, thence to the astral, and thence to the mental body, the soul, the immortal thinker and actor.

Scientific occultism trains the faculties of the higher bodies which enable the man to see these heavenly regions lying all about us. It was thus that Mr. Leadbeater learned to journey up through the seven heavens. A radiant sense not only of the welcome absence of all evil and discord but of the persistent, overwhelming presence of universal joy is the first and most striking sensation experienced by him who enters upon the heavenly world, reports the heavenly visitor. And it never leaves him so long as he remains there, and the man who has once experienced it in full consciousness will regard the world with widely different eyes for ever after.

Beauties Viewed by Mind-Body.

Let a man imagine himself with these feelings of intense bliss and enormously increased power floating in the sea of living light, surrounded by every conceivable variety of beauty in color and form—the whole changing with every wave of thought that he sends out from the mind, and being as he presently discovers, only the expression of his thought in the matter of the plane and in its elemental essence. For that matter is of the same order as that of which the mind-body itself is composed, and therefore when that vibration of the particles of the mind-body which we call a thought occurs, it extends itself immediately to this surrounding mental matter and sets up corresponding vibrations in it, while in the elemental essence it images itself with absolute exactitude. Concrete thought naturally takes the shape of its objects, while abstract ideas usually represent themselves by all kinds of perfect and most geometrical forms.

If the visitor wishes to observe the plane upon which he finds himself it will be necessary for him carefully to suspend his thought for the time, so that the greater influence of love, the readily impressible matter around him and thus alter the entire conditions so far as he is concerned. He begins to realize that all this magnificence is not a mere idle or fortuitous display; he finds that it all has a meaning; a meaning which he himself can understand; and presently he grasps the fact that what he is watching with such ecstasy of delight is simply the glorious color language of the angels—the expression of the thought or the conversation of beings far higher than himself in the scale of evolution.

By experiment and practice he discovers that he can use this network of thought for expression, and by this discovery he enters into possession of another great tract of his heritage in this celestial realm—the power to hold converse with and to learn from his loftier nonhuman inhabitants.

Places Shell Around Mind-Body.

If the visitor wishes to carry his analysis of the plane still further and discover what it would be when entirely undisturbed by the thought or conversation of any of its inhabitants, he can do so by forming round himself a huge shell through which none of these influences can penetrate, and then, holding his own mind perfectly still, examining the conditions which exist inside his shell. He is now able to perceive another and entirely different series of regular pulsations.

These evidently are universal. They cause no change of color, no assumption of form, but flow with restlessness regularly through all the matter of the plane, outwards and in again, like the exhalations and inhalations of some great breath beyond our ken.

There are several sets of these, clearly distinguishable from one another by volume, character of vibration, and by the tone of harmony which they bring, and grander than them all sweeps one great wave which seems the heartbeat of the system, a wave which, welling up from unknown centers on far

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that the Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, and other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE.—That all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so-and-so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES OF YOUR POEMS sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Julian P. Johnson is now located in Waterloo, Iowa, and will answer calls for lectures, funerals, marriages, etc., as a Spiritualist minister, in any part of this or surrounding states.

On Sunday last Dr. Juliet Severance delivered before the Anthropology Society, a lecture on "Thomas Paine and the American Revolution."

Mrs. Nettie Pease Fox, well and favorably known in this city, is now located at San Jose, Cal., where she is lecturing and doing a good work.

Secretary writes: "The Spiritualistic Society of the Students of Nature, at 415 West North avenue, corner Hobey street, was well attended Sunday evening. There was a masterly discourse by the pastor. Subject, 'Confidence of David,' followed by Dr. L. G. Koehler, the assistant pastor. At 8 o'clock Mr. Mason gave very convincing spirit messages. March 11, Dr. Geo. B. Warner will be with the society. All are welcome."

Gustave Wilms writes about the North Star Spiritual Union, Sunday evening services, February 4: "Visiting mediums, Sister H. Hild and Sister Miller, both gave short lectures and messages. Sister Lester gave us a beautiful lecture, full of genuineness and spirituality, following with spirit messages which were recognized. We are having large audiences and the people seem to be very much interested. We cordially invite all mediums and co-workers to visit our hall, 1546 Milwaukee avenue."

First Spiritual Temple, South Side Turner Hall, 3147 State street. Meetings every Sunday evening at 8 o'clock. All are welcome. Mrs. Lucille de Loux, pastor.

Mrs. F. C. Rouse of Minnesota, tells how her spirit husband came to her while she was sleeping, and awakened her, placing his hands upon her shoulder, and thus saving the house from burning down. Truly a most remarkable event. Mrs. Rouse prizes highly The Progressive Thinker in the glorious work it is doing.

Mrs. G. Williams writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "The Ladies' Spiritual Temple Fund Society of Fullerton street, Cleveland, O., have the pleasure of having with them for the month of February, Mr. W. J. Colville. Last Sunday's services at the temple were largely attended, both afternoon and evening, and Mr. Colville is pleased to answer all questions put to him at the close of the services. He is a very intelligent, and give the people plenty of food for thought. He will lecture every Sunday afternoon at 2:30, and every Sunday evening at 7:30; also during the week on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30 p. m., and 7:30 p. m., on different subjects. Admission 5 cents during the week. Sunday services free. Everybody welcome. Seats free."

G. S. Klock writes from Lincoln, Neb.: "I wish to inform the many readers of the excellent success we have had here in Lincoln, Neb. We are now recognized as a religious people, in police and district court. The Spiritualist have defeated the city ordinance requiring license to practice as a spirit medium and clairvoyant, in the two above named courts. Now we can work for Spiritualism in all its phases without fear anywhere in this state. The work of Professor Lingard has never been equalled by any one in Lincoln. He has done the cause of Spiritualism a great deal of good. He is free from debt, and occupy a more popular standing with the people of the state."

H. W. Klein writes: "On Sunday evening, Feb. 4, Mrs. Clara B. Wagner received the ordination of licentiate minister of the gospel of Spiritism, by Rev. Fred D. Dunakin, president of the Spiritualistic Society. Brother Dunakin gave an excellent address, suitable for the occasion, followed by the ordination, which was very impressive and beautiful. Mrs. Wagner has been serving our local society here at Defiance, for the past two years and has given excellent satisfaction. Mr. Wagner is a good man, and with her in the good work has been doing. We wish to thank Brother Dunakin for the interest he has taken in our society, and may the work which he has been called to do in the state be a pleasure and success during his term of office."

Mrs. K. Childs writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "I hope and pray your paper may inspire and bless me to the close of my last earthly day dream. Long may you live and stronger may you grow to fight for truth against knavery and many other forms of wrong which at the present time are struggling to overshadow our beautiful planet. I hope to see the brighter the glow of your night."

Some one who forgets to sign his name, writes from Oklahoma City, Okla.: "I am pleased to inform you that through the efforts of the worthy president of our local Ladies' Aid, Mrs. D. M. Thorp, a Spiritualist society was organized at Perry, Okla., on January 24, with a number of members. Miss Mattie E. Smith was elected secretary. Mrs. Thorp's work as trance speaker and test medium is very good. Our home society has so far held no public meetings this winter. It is a pity so many Spiritualists are always looking for something sensational and startling, and always manage to have 'deserving ones' to play. There are many successful home circles held here and the work will go steadily on. Spiritualists really ought to take more interest in our press and the voluminous occult literature, if they want to learn and progress. Many think they can do without that, but they are making a serious mistake."

E. R. Fielding writes from Washington, D. C.: "Mr. Oscar Edgar, formerly of Lynn, Mass., is speaker and message bearer for the First Association. The Temple League meets at the Pythian Temple; W. J. Nigh is the speaker for the society, and Mrs. A. M. Zoller the message bearer. Mrs. Jaquet speaker at Woon's Hall, and Mrs. Julia V. Smith is the constant bearer. Mr. Mason and Alfred J. J. minister to the Educational Society on Ninth street. Mr. Wan, the Chinese minister, received startling demonstrations at P. L. O. A. Keeler's seance. These demonstrations were in the light. Mrs. Collins holds circles at her home, 702 H street N. W."

J. A. Toren writes: "The Society of the Psychic Forces, Wilcox Hall, 361 East Forty-third street, is constantly favored by able mediums and speakers. On Sunday evening, Feb. 4, besides an address by our speaker, Dr. J. O. M. Hewitt, we were favored with the attendance and able assistance of Dr. J. H. Randall, whose earnest efforts were heartily appreciated. Prof. Lester gave a beautiful lecture, full of genuineness and spirituality, following with spirit messages which were recognized. We are having large audiences and the people seem to be very much interested. We cordially invite all mediums and co-workers to visit our hall, 1546 Milwaukee avenue."

Maggie Henry writes: "At the Spiritual Mission Chapel, (Old 77) we had good attendance, afternoon and evening. In the afternoon our conference on 'The Law of Psychic Phenomena' was very interesting and always psychics give messages. In the evening our speaker, Prof. F. M. Stoller, was at his best; his lecture was fine. Our meetings are especially interesting to skeptics and those interested in the philosophy, as they have the privilege of asking any question pertaining to the philosophy or the science. Sunday evening questions and answers are given. The Professor answers a personal question for every one."

J. E. Shappell writes: "There were three Spiritualists at Shelbyville, Ind., who felt it their duty to place Spiritualism before the public. When we started there were but twelve; now there is about one hundred attending the meetings. We have the G. A. R. hall in which to hold them. Mrs. Clara Shappell is our lecturer and test medium. She has given some fine lectures, and all her tests are recognized. Mr. Martin Millison has given three good lectures. We have a developing circle of fourteen; three have been controlled. One of them is a crystal reader. She can take a glass and look in it and see and describe spirits, and give names of same. We have a magnetic healer, Thamy Rhoades. He has cured several bad cases. We feel that we are doing a good work here, as we have some of the best class of people attending our meetings. The young people are interested, and there are taking part in singing. We solicit good thoughts from the readers of The Progressive Thinker, and if any medium comes this way we will welcome him."

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "Sister E. Briggs and Brother Chas. Thompson of the Rising Sun Mission, 378 S. Western avenue, entertained our congregation Sunday afternoon, Feb. 4, at 2:30 p. m. They delivered another of their ever interesting inspirational lectures here. Our society is well organized with 30 members on the enrollment. We hope to increase our membership and become permanently organized under the state laws of Pennsylvania. We are meeting with a very great success. We think the cause is bound to grow in Meadville. We are desirous of getting in communication with lecturers and mediums who may be passing through this way, with the view of having them stop off and hold meetings with us, for we will liberally pay. A. Gaston, secretary. Committee: A. F. Lee, chairman; A. B. Gaston, secretary; W. W. Kline, treasurer."

N. H. Eddy writes from Buffalo, N. Y.: "At the First Spiritual Church, Prospect and Jersey streets, Feb. 7, the Wednesday evening seance and services were of more than usual interest. Prof. Lockwood gave a short

Books by Carlyle Petersilea.
Owing to the great demand for these books, we have republished a new edition of Mary Ann Carrow and Occandies. We can now supply the friends that have long wanted these books. Occandies, 50 cents; "Mary Ann Carrow," $1.

Phil J. Scholz writes from Evansville, Ind.: "We are having very interesting meetings in our temple at present. We have with us Mrs. S. E. Pierce from Camp Chesterfield. She, assisted by local talent, is doing good work. Our temple is crowded each week. Mrs. Pierce is an excellent test medium."

Eva L. Stewart writes: "Nothing being heard from the Hyde Park Occult Society for some time, does not signify that we are at rest, for we have lively times every Thursday evening, and on Friday, Feb. 23, Mrs. Wilson will celebrate her birthday by giving a social dance at their hall, 319 E. 55th street, for the benefit of the society. She invites all her friends and others to be present and enjoy a pleasant evening. Admission same as usual. Refreshments served. The interest in our socials has been kept up as has been shown by the attendance. Last Thursday evening at the Hyde Park Social all had a fine time. Our lectures are of a high order. By Dr. C. S. Tisdale are enjoyed by all. He will be with us during the month. Mr. Hillis has been with us for a few nights past, and given some wonderful messages which were all recognized. Mr. Dierkes was with us last Sunday and gave messages, and his controls convinced many of spirit return. The closing out of business firm we lose two of our members, Mr. Bostedo, our recording secretary, and Mr. Renner, one of our auditing committee. They go to St. Paul where another one of our members is, Mr. O. E. Kropf. Our society extends to them the best wishes from all. We are also very sorry to learn of Mr. Hans, another member, removing to Mobile, Ala. Don't forget to come to Mrs. Wilson's party, and ask her how young she is."

Mrs. E. F. Jay Bullen is now on the way to perfect recovery, having left the hospital where she had been treated for a severe case of bronchitis. J. K. Dillon writes: "We cannot all see alike. The sculptor will say to me, 'Look that image of man in the rock, I will carve it out.' I will see rock, and that is all I see. I will see chisel and mallet will bring out the almost perfect image. The immortals in spirit life do not all agree in regard to their experiences, but do not quarrel or censure each other. One of the main pillars in the temple of Spiritualism is the brotherhood of man. If it is weakened the structure may collapse, and will have to be built over. It is said thoughts are things and pass along through vibrations in air. How far-reaching their influence for good or evil. They not only affect us who live on the earth plane, but our loved ones in the celestial world are first to be impressed with our thoughts."

Radical League, organized for free discussion of religious subjects, every Sunday at 2:30 p. m., Leavitt Hall, Southeast corner 9th and Spring Garden streets, Philadelphia, Pa. Thomas Griffith, president; J. B. Elliott, secretary. This League is doing a most excellent work."

N. H. Eddy writes: "Prof. W. M. Lockwood, the noted scientist, commenced two months' engagement with the First Spiritual Society of Buffalo and Jersey streets, Buffalo, N. Y., Feb. 6. A good audience greeted the Professor. Sunday evening the discourse was a very able one on 'What is the Continuity of Life and What Its Scientific Tests?' The audience listened with marked attention and interest. Sunday evening, Feb. 7, the ladies of the society gave him a grand reception at the temple. President Hoyt gave the speech of welcome in a very able manner. Prof. Lockwood responded very kindly to the same. Short speeches were made by several who were present, after which all sat down to a bountiful repast prepared for the occasion. It was a very pleasant and enjoyable evening."

H. W. Middleton writes from Smithville, Texas: "My wife is a staunch Spiritualist, and cannot live without the paper. I am also a firm believer, both of us being converts of Mrs. Isa Wilson Kayner, who was among us some eighteen months ago and to whom we are indebted for doing some excellent work. We had twice with us at our home, President Hanson D. Barrett, a truly able and conscientious man, one whom we think is truly fitted for this grand work. We only wish we could have him among us again."

E. de Yongh, writing from Portland, Ore., says: "The First Spiritual Society of Portland, Ore. (the mother church of the Oregon Spiritualists) has, during its ten years' existence, done a grand work for the upbuilding of true Spiritualism in this city and state. There are few societies that have done more for the advancement of the Harmonical Philosophy than it has. But it has only laid a solid foundation as yet, and from it will be reared a splendid superstructure of Spiritualism. The attendees at its four meetings each Sunday—conference at 11 a. m.; children's lyceum at 12:30 p. m.; musical and dramatic club at 2:30 p. m., and at 7:45 p. m. lecture and messages—are never indifferent, but are full of the enthusiasm of spiritually enlightened people, and visitors from abroad say that they have never seen a more progressive society in their travels."

A. F. Lee writes from Meadville, Pa.: "We organized a society here, December, and had for our first meeting, Mrs. Clara Watson, of Jamestown, N. Y. She handled her subject with great ability, proving that she is a master hand in the cause of Spiritualism. We held our meetings every two weeks on Sunday evenings, at 7:30 p. m., at Odd Fellows' Temple on Center street; each alternate meeting to have one speaker or test medium present. Dec. 31 we had Lyman C. Howe, who gave the best of satisfaction. January 20, Dr. B. F. Austin commenced a series of meetings, six in all. He has awakened very great interest in Spiritualism. A Noble Spiritualist, Gone to His Reward.

Gen John S. Harris, one of the most prominent citizens of Butte, Mont., passed to his heavenly home after a brief illness, Feb. 4.

For many years he has been an ardent advocate of the spiritual philosophy, the friend of mediums and ever ready to contribute money and influence in support of spiritual truth. A man of sterling integrity in business and life, and humanitarian in the broadest sense, he would be missed from earth where urgent demand exists for practical philanthropy in things spiritual and temporal. His active life of 81 years was a noble record of loyal citizenship crowned with honors from United States Senator to the simple walks of domestic life. His life was a waking in spirit for knowledge of truth. I prized his friendship of many years and shall study the vast problems of life with such noble souls in the beautiful beyond. E. F. JAY-BULLEN.

lecture on the basic principles pertaining to Spiritualism, mediumship and the laws of life. This lecture was very instructive and interesting. The large audience present paid marked attention to the illustrative points of the discourse, also to the seance that followed. Mrs. Staley, the noted spirit message bearer and test medium, was present, and at the close of Prof. Lockwood's remarks, she gave up to the influence of her guides, occupying her time the rest of the evening. A large number of messages were given, some of which were exceptionally remarkable in points of correctness, and were acknowledged by the recipients. Your correspondent has been in Buffalo over 8 years, and has been a constant attendant at the meetings under the auspices of First Spiritual Church. I can truthfully say that the audience Wednesday evening, Feb. 7, was the largest that ever was in the Temple on a Wednesday evening, there being fully 300 people present of the intellectual and cultured class. Much interest was awakened in the cause of spiritual truth, through the philosophy as presented by Prof. Lockwood, and the demonstrated facts of spirit return as presented through the message bearer and guides of Mrs. Staley."

AN EVER-REMEMBERED PATRIOT.

Thomas Paine Memorial Service at San Jose, Cal.

On Sunday, January 28, the Spiritualists and Liberals of San Jose, Cal., held a memorial service in memory of the birth of Thomas Paine, one of America's distinguished patriots and eminent authors. The services were held during the day at the pleasant and beautifully decorated hall occupied by the First Spiritual Union, and in the evening at the Unitarian church.

At the hall, a large picture of Thomas Paine hung back of the rostrum, between two large gracefully draped flags. It attracted the attention of all, and we were grateful to Mr. A. R. Woodhams for bringing it to the occasion.

The exercises of the day commenced at 10 a. m., by the Sunset Lyceum singing a song, "Paine's Anniversary," followed by quotations from Mr. Paine's writings. No doubt the Lyceum children learned more facts in regard to Mr. Paine's life and teachings in that one day's meeting than for any other day in the text-books in the schools.

At 11 a. m., Mr. J. Murray, vice-president of the society, called the conference to order, and the time usually spent in discussion was occupied by Mrs. McMeekin, Mr. Tucker, Gordon J. Harter and other speakers in eulogizing Mr. Paine and the great work he had accomplished for humanity.

At 12:30 a. m. were invited to partake of a bountiful lunch provided by the ladies of the society. We all understand when Mesdames Barker, Ringler, Hambley, Merrell, Muntz, Book, Trevet are at the helm the dinner will be a success.

The first of the afternoon program was a song by the lyceum children, followed by a brilliantly executed piano solo by Miss Linda Zink. The writer then gave the opening address of the afternoon, in which was portrayed something of the magnitude and significance of the great work accomplished by the noble American patriot, and his higher and fearlessly advocated of human rights.

Miss Marie Muntz recited an original poem with such enthusiasm as to inspire the entire audience. Miss Muntz is but sixteen years of age, but her face is luminous with the great wish to help on the cause of truth, to help "Ring out the old, ring in the new, Ring out the false, ring in the true."

Mrs. May Muntz's orchestra then furnished excellent music.

Mr. A. R. Woodhams gave instructive quotations from Mr. Paine's writings, prefacing his reading with some pertinent remarks. He said, for years the Spiritualists of San Jose have celebrated the birthday of Thomas Paine, but he has never before seen so large an attendance at the meeting, nor so much enthusiasm manifested.

Mr. Allen Brant, a popular young lawyer, gave a brilliant and stirring address.

Mr. John Harker presented a clear and condensed statement of the life conflicts and achievements of Thomas Paine; he traced his historical record so lucidly that all could see the noble purpose of his efforts, and also see the light of truth and justice transforming the crown of thorns, so long his heritage, to a laurel wreath.

Mr. D. W. Hambley gave a short talk on the philosophy of Mr. Paine, closing with some amusing incidents relating to the position of educators and their opinion of Thomas Paine.

The services at the hall were closed by music and benediction. In the evening hundreds of people thronged to the Unitarian church and listened with interest to the speaker, Rev. Anthony Mills, and Allan Brant. Mr. Mills' subject was "The Religion of an Infidel." Mr. Brant spoke on "An American Patriot and Citizen of the World." I will give but one quotation from his brilliant address:

"Among the sons of liberty who were to strive for human rights, France gave Rousseau, born 1712 in America were born Franklin in 1706, Samuel Adams in 1722, Washington in 1732, Jefferson in 1743; but among all these not one deserves to be more gratefully remembered than he whom we commemorate to-night, 'born in England in the midst of monarchic gloom, and in the year 1727. I am sure his meeting must bring good results."

MARY ANN CAREW, Wife, Mother, Spirit and Angel. By Carlyle Petersilea.

This most beautiful story of the experiences of a young wife and mother taken from her home on earth to her home in the spirit world, is told in such a realistic way, that one is carried away with the sweet beauty and naturalness of it. It makes the other world appear very near to us. This book has been a great comfort to many weary hearts who have lost mother, wife or babies. Price, neatly bound in cloth, $1.

WEDDING ANNOUNCEMENT

Of a Prominent Spiritualist, Physician and Lecturer.

The well known specialist and lecturer, for many years in the Spiritualist field, Dr. A. B. Spinney, was married Sunday, Feb. 4, to Miss Lessora A. Wade, at the Burdick House, Kalamazoo, Mich. The parties present at the function were Mrs. Seymour of Belding, the bride's mother, Miss William, a friend of the bride, and Dr. Julia M. Walton, the officiating minister. Other friends called later to offer congratulations. The bride was daintily and becomingly robed in white silk voile. A column and a half was devoted to the event of the marriage by the Kalamazoo Telegraph the next day. Dr. Spinney has been so long and favorably known throughout Michigan that nearly every Michigan paper of any importance contained several paragraphs concerning the union. DR. JULIA M. WALTON, Jackson, Mich.

HELEN STUART-RICHINGS.

Her Excellent Work in Baltimore, Md.

It gives me pleasure to record Mrs. Richings' successful work in this city of monuments and churches.

Prejudice and ignorance concerning our beautiful philosophy are still rampant here, and lecturers upon the liberal platform find it strenuous work to fill our auditorium that will seat 500 people.

They need not be discouraged, however, as the seeds they are sowing fall upon fertile ground; they will germinate in time and bring results.

The Spiritualists in this city do not support nor appreciate organized effort as they should; they still dwell largely upon the phenomenal plane, and do not conceive of the great and inexhaustible fields of useful and helpful knowledge that are open to all for the asking.

Mrs. Richings is a worker in the true sense of the word. As a versatile writer upon many subjects, a dramatic artist of a high order and a successful lecturer, she embodies such energy and ambition. As a psychometrist she has few equals; her delineations are short but come rapidly and to the point.

Mrs. Richings' engagement with us terminates the last Sunday of this month. Let us hope our best wishes for a busy and successful future.

Mrs. Fisk had been for many years a firm and consistent advocate of the cause she held so dear, being 69 years old at the time of her transition, and no more fitting epitaph could be given than in the remembrance of those beautiful lines: "Only remembered by what I have done."

MRS. A. G. ATCHESON.

Geo. Porter Godfrey passed to spirit life from Elkhardt, Ind. He was one of the staunchest Spiritualists and most esteemed, and oldest pioneers of the vicinity of Springfield, Mich., where the funeral services were conducted by Julia M. Walton.

Passed to spirit life, Jan. 26, Mr. B. F. Marsh of Rochester, Mich., in the 76th year of his age. He was an earnest Spiritualist, always defending its truths. Services conducted by Mrs. Stein of Detroit, Mich.

Mrs. Ortha A. Clark, a native of Aiden, Ingham county, Mich., born June 28, 1854, passed to spirit life, January 8, 1906, at her home, 2329 Providence avenue, Spokane, Wash. At one time she lived in Lansing, Mich. She was married to G. H. Clark, twenty years ago, and has been his faithful wife for many years. These years were more faithful or true than she. She leaves two daughters, Mrs. G. H. Willoughby and Mrs. William Barrett, both residents of this city. Rev. Dr. R. E.

Coon preached her funeral sermon, Thursday, Jan. 11, at her home. He took for his text the 15th chapter of Corinthians, 44th verse, which reads: "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body." From this text he preached a beautiful sermon. G. H. CLARK.

SOME HELPFUL THOUGHTS.

By One Who Is in Love With the Beautiful Cause of Spiritualism.

After over forty years' experience with Spiritualism in its many phases, from the A B C rap to a positive knowledge of their return, yet feel that I am ignorant of much that I would know, and yet the realizing of that ignorance leads me to wish for more knowledge of that life beyond this mundane sphere, and is it possible that those beautiful, pure, loving spirits that can ascend so high that they can feel the loving influence of those that are still higher? Can they come back to earth and mingle with this world's likes and dislikes, hatred and malice, and not be contaminated with its influences? It seems as though there must be a dividing line where things pure and things impure cannot mingle without impairing those pure and living angels.

Is it possible that my loving angel mother can and does come to me and tell me of her life, soothing hand stroke the forehead of her eldest son, and call me by my pet name and say, "No, no, Homer, not so, but this way," and then in her loving, gentle way tell me what to say? Yes, I know there has been for years a something influencing me to put away my vindictiveness. "No, no, Homer, be more considerate of others' thoughts and feelings, for you are mortal and do err." Then you are considerate of others' errors and mistakes, and when possible so to do, help them to see the way of truth and happiness, and in so doing you will better your condition as well as theirs."

But the question I wish you to answer is this: How is it possible for pure and loving spirits to mingle with us of this gross and impure world, without being contaminated? Milk and water can't be put together with out spoiling both. Or, maybe I have it, those in the higher spheres teach those in the lower spheres and so on, down to earth, for I believe the future is an endless progression, and for us to advance we must be doing some good always and at all times when we see and find it to do.

Then we should practice those teachings here now in our everyday life, so that when we discard this body for good, we should have no regrets. We can go on teaching those who have not been so fortunate as to see the way of eternal life and progression, as we have, and thereby be doing our holy mission of helping one another, and do as we would be done by.

Oh, what a beautiful, beautiful thing it is to be the open door between the seen and the unseen, and holy mission that is, to stand and clairvoyantly see and read for mortals here what our spirit friends wish to show and make us understand, and if there is a crime, an ungodly crime, it is to have that power to do so great a good and then abuse it. Thank heaven and our spirit friends that it is being purified. Jesus said, "I've come into the highways and by-ways and preach the truth to every living thing, without money and without price," but oh, how far short of that do many of our mediums fall. Many that are able to give to the poor and needy words for what they give. How long, oh, how long will this state of things exist? Surely, our spirit friends are at work hard to influence us to do aright.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to the forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby terse, which of all things is to be deplored. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

J. S. Harman: Q. Are we free agents, or is fatalism true?

A. The argument made in favor of fatalism is plausible, and has satisfied whole races of mankind, and some of the greatest thinkers of all races.

It is said that as all things are controlled by law which is unchangeable, all effects must follow in unvarying sequence. The planets in the heavens are thrown by the waves, not by their own volition. Plants push their stems to the light and their roots into the ground, seeking for moisture, according to environment and the laws of their growth. Man is the result of all conditions which precede him from the beginning. He thinks he is free to think and act, but it is a delusion, for he is bound by the decree of fate. As the sum of all the past, he is controlled by that past. At his birth he has no choice as to race or condition. He is like the planet, impelled by forces and cannot leave its orbit. He is a pebble on the beach of time, and the waves of fate are beating on the shore of his life. Do what he may, he can change nothing—absolutely nothing. The will instead of being free, is a servile slave, and its assumption of freedom is the egotism of ignorant folly.

In its theological form this doctrine is called preordination and predestination, which declares that God from the foundation of the world decreed the order of events, and man is a puppet dance for divine pleasure.

The only difference between fatalism as advocated by some free thinkers, and those dogmas of theology, is in the words in which they are clothed. The argument in support of both is plausible, but things so unlike that they are incompatible.

True man is the sum of all conditions, which have preceded him, and as such is amenable to the laws and conditions which originated and sustain him. He is a treasure house of ancestral experiences superimposed by his own. Does he choose to be a slave? To certain point a slave, but beyond he is free. In the evolution of thought, he touches the spiritual kingdom, and is enabled to reach independently on his environment. This vortex of effects, individualized in the human spirit, becomes a cause, free and independent, because it is no longer the foot-ball but the player.

Against fatalism the objection has been urged that it was vicious in its tendency because it destroyed human responsibility, and all motives for action. If things are ordained to be, there is no use trying to change them. If we are to be faithful, prosperous and happy, or to be sickly and stricken with poverty, so will it be. One may be righteous or sinful, and there is no merit or blame. No one should be censured, no one praised, no more than a pebble on the sands for being of more beautiful form or being cast higher on sands by the waves.

The dogmas of pre-ordination and fore-ordination are sustaining, but this has been counteracted by the egotism of the devotees who always believe that they are the effect. Nations and races of fatalists have reached a high level of prosperity and warlike renown, their belief imparting more than human courage. In all cases, no matter what the belief, the capability of the individual to act independently and free is implied.

Really the question of morality has no relevancy for or against any proposition. The only concern is, is it true? We never need fear the consequences of lighting the torch by which truth is revealed.

L. S. Curtis and several others: Q. Will any of the promised "airships" be successful?

A. At the time the great prize was offered by the management of the St. Louis fair, many inventors were confident that they could win it, or at least so professed to be. Many inquired the spirit of the subject to this department, and the answer was given that there would be failure; that sometime as a toy, an air-ship might make a flight, but that as a means of manipulation, failure must be expected.

Since that time, many eager inventors have had their crude schemes exploited by reporters. The public have expectantly waited, to be disappointed, or join in a laugh at the ludicrous outcome of the pretentious promises.

Prof. Langley knew he would succeed because he had tested his principle of construction with models, and the built on "aerodrome" as long as it touched the ways made to launch it, and beyond, until the starting force was exhausted; then it came down very much after the fashion of Darius Green's flying machine.

The Professor's machine was more perfectly constructed, but it had no advantage over that of Darius made of "straps and strings." The correspondents who now inquire have their curiosity excited by the report of a Chicago man, who will have ready next April an air-ship in which he is to make the trip from that city to Washington in twelve hours.

This ship will have the indispensable to buoy it, and be propelled by wings like those of a bird, which are flapped by a six-horse-power engine! As pictured, the machine resembles a monstrous bird. Of all contrivances to lift a body from the ground, and propel it, mechanical wings are the worst, from the fact that the wing motion is so difficult to imitate. It may be said to be impossible, for it is varied by the desire of the bird to direct its flight. A bird has the power in its muscles, without the dead weight of the engine and other machinery. In proportion to its body its wings are many times larger than it would be possible for an air-ship to carry.

Even the toy air-ship, as long as its buoyancy is made dependent on a great gas bag or balloon, is at the mercy of the wind. The large surface exposed cannot be lessened like a sail, and it cannot sustain a motive power strong enough to overcome a gale; hence it is at any moment liable to be wrecked on the coast, or blown into the sea. It will be a success when propelled by the long-sought (and impossible) perpetual motion.

Prof. F. L. O. Roehrig: Q. Where can books on Spiritualism, in the German language be obtained?

A. Of Wilhelm Besser, Leipzig, Germany. He has quite a large list of valuable works, and is the publisher of such books. As money orders can be drawn on Leipzig, orders may be sent direct to him, as readily as to a nearby town, it only requiring a little more time for returns.

A. B. Cox: Q. What is the difference between soul and spirit?

A. These words are loosely used by most writers as synonyms. In fact there is no word in the English language which is a perfect equivalent of the German word, "Seele." A. Of Wilhelm Besser, Leipzig, Germany. He has quite a large list of valuable works, and is the publisher of such books. As money orders can be drawn on Leipzig, orders may be sent direct to him, as readily as to a nearby town, it only requiring a little more time for returns.

Susan C. Lindell: Q. What colors are most restful for the eyes, as in wall paper, interior painting, etc.

A. Of all colors green is the most restful. The prevailing tones which nature offers in landscapes are green, blue, soft purple and grey. A softened blue, pearl, shades of but are all pleasing, while red in all its shades and orange are irritating and exciting. Deep blue is depressing and quieting.

It is needless to say that all colors in a room should harmonize. A slight dash of antagonizing color may spoil the effect, for the eye involuntarily rests on the discordant note, and the mind is disturbed although it may not recognize the cause.

TRICKSTERS NEED NOT APPLY.

A Determination to make the New Era Camp a Grand Success.

To the Editor:—It is my desire to make the New Era camp-meeting of 1906 a grand success, and I wish in all ways possible to assist in the work, and realize the fact that to do so one must always act up and doing to accomplish anything.

I also find that the way to reach the people is through a valuable paper, hence I send you this and kindly ask space to get in touch with those interested in our camp work for this year.

We certainly have one of the best camp grounds anywhere in the world for its size. It consists of five acres and is shaded by some of those mighty monarchs known as the fir trees of Oregon.

You would be surprised at the difference in the temperature of the atmosphere beneath those shading branches and the sunshine just outside the grove.

While the heat of Oregon's summer days is not excessive or severe, the shade of those grand old trees makes our lovely camp-ground a paradise indeed.

We have some of the best water to be had in wells in the state. With these natural elements to assist in making good conditions, we have always kept our grounds free from evil characters that would hinder spiritual unfoldment in the higher aspirations of those who may attend our meetings from time to time.

We also want it distinctly understood that in engaging our talent, frauds and tricksters need not apply, as we only employ honest workers on our rostrum.

Harrison D. Barrett, Harry J. Moore, Mrs. Eva McCoy, Dr. Espanto and wife, Mrs. Lapworth and many others who attended our camp-meeting last year, all became enthusiastic over our grounds, and their declarations were many that Rev. G. C. Love was the right man in the right place.

Let me add, virtually speaking we are having the services of Brother Love for the fifth time as president. Always promptly on time, ever ready for the duties of his office, willing to render assistance in all ways to his subordinates in office, and ever forgetful of self in his endeavors to benefit the cause, we always find him kindly disposed, and his greetings to the strangers in our gate, makes them feel they are welcome.

The official board is a unit with our audience in all that pertains to the success of our next camp-meeting, and will work earnestly and devotedly to that end in order that our cause may be one of truth and justice, and in accord with the wishes and teachings of the higher and more advanced spirits who are working in the interest of humanity.

Spiritualists of Oregon and all other states, get yourselves in readiness during the coming months to attend the camp-meeting of this year, and I feel sure you will at its close say, "truly, it was good to be there."

DEATH DREAM COMES TRUE

Son Awakens to Receive Telegram Father Has Expired—Neil Palmer Has Vision While Sleeping in House in Sterling, Ill., That Parent Is Dying in Chicago—Receives Message an Hour Later Confirming It—Declares He Is Unable to Explain the Coincidence—Comes Here for Funeral.

During an after supper nap in his home in Sterling, Ill., Neil Palmer dreamed that he saw his father dying in Chicago. An hour later he received a telegram reading:

"Father died at 9 o'clock last night. Funeral Sunday."

The funeral of the father, Charles B. Palmer, was held yesterday from his late residence, 1495 Whipple street. The son came to Chicago to attend the services. He declares, according to all information, his father died Friday night at the exact minute that he dreamed the former was dead.

"I never put any stock in mental telepathy," he said, "or mind reading or anything of that sort, but it is a fact, as near as I can make out, I dreamed my father was dead the exact time he died."

News of Death Not Surprising. "My wife and one of our three children had gone to church, and I remained home with the other two. About 8:30 I laid down on the sofa and took a nap. I woke up shortly after 9 o'clock, when my wife returned."

"I told her of the dream, but she said, 'Dreams never come true.' The dream left a strong impression on me, however, and I really was not greatly surprised when the telegram was received. I knew my father was not in the best of health, but until I had the dream I never entertained the thought that death was near. As I said, I put no stock in dreams, but these are the plain facts."—Chicago Tribune, February 16.

ECHOES FROM CALIFORNIA.

"The World Is My Country, to Do Good My Religion."

The grand Paine Memorial Lecture delivered by Miss Mae Hunt in Odd Fellows' Hall, San Francisco, Cal., to an overflow audience, was a great success and admired by all. Even the skeptic had to admit it was the greatest lecture he ever heard.

It was a memorial service commemorating the 169th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine. "The World Is My Country" was the theme of the lecture. An hour the speaker held the audience spellbound to the sublimity of the logic so eloquently expressed. Miss Hunt always speaks under total trance, and on this occasion Thomas Paine himself announced his name in the start and delivered the lecture. It was a masterpiece of the great Paine thinker and patriot. He explained all about our country's early struggle in labor and birth, and why he wrote the "Common Sense," "Rights of Man" and "The Crisis" to achieve an independence, and break loose from the two great powers, Monarchy and Romanism. He also claimed that it was the seeds of our independence which grew up and ripened into the Declaration of Independence. He gave important information not recorded in history, claiming the church power had done much to suppress the facts of his struggle for our progression. Miss Hunt also delivered an able address on the Paine thought, and concluded at Scandia Hall, 161 City Hall avenue, last Sunday afternoon, on "Paine on Preachers." This society meets every Sunday at 2 o'clock. In the same hall Sunday evening meets the Philosophical and Ethical Society, and together the two associations gave a grand Paine Memorial.

It was also a great and patriotic assembly. Although Dr. J. L. York is a Paine thinker and the prime mover of this meeting, it turned out that the other four men taking part were Spiritualists.

The famous oil painting of Thomas Paine, from the artistic hand of Adelle B. Ballou, the well known spiritual lecturer, decorated the rostrum. This painting is valued at $500 and will decorate Scandia Hall, the home of the Free Thought Association in the future.

Last week we had a spiritual symposium each day a mass-meeting, visiting and dividing the honors with Oakland.

MRS. ELIZA CONE BEALS.

What glorious vision greeted your eyes When the river of death you had crossed? Was it his face whose hand so disengaged you from the gloom of death? You did not know, through pain storm-tossed?

Have you found the home you left for there, With portals in "Joy" all covered o'er? Did you find friends and dear ones where, Their welcome gladness could o'er their pour?

Was there a light in the window, the curtain flung back, With a star-gem of "Israel's" soul? Were the waves glinting bright on the ocean of love, As happiness eternal over these rolled?

Did you find flowers unfading, all brilliant with dew, Your favorite bower near your love's rest? Did you look into eyes that were ever true, With rapturous joy were you clasped to his heart?

As your weary feet have found rest at last, Your busy hands from toil found repose; Have all of earth's longings you deemed the best Come to thee, darling, in bloom of the rose?

Oh, tell me, dear one, is happiness where Earth recedes when death opens the door? Beloved, have you found mansions so rare Made of crystal and pearls, and flowers, "over there"?

I'm waiting, Eliza, the promise you made, I long for thy spirit's low sweet refrain. "Although you are dead, you never have died."

You live, love, and are your own self again. The mists have all been cleared from your eyes; You can see and be seen as you truly are.

All hopes, aspirations, friendships in disguise, Will show themselves now, plain as a star. Rose L. Bushnell Donnally, Summerland, Cal.

BRACING WORDS.

The Thoughts of an Honest and Earnest Spiritualist.

I am glad there is an eye-opener in the way of a special Thought-Channel concerning materialization.

I am sure that there is no such thing as what is termed "materialization." It has been a word (or rather easy way) for such mediums professing that power to make a livelihood. To think that a disembodied being which signifies that their body has gone back into their elements from which it came, and nothing being left but the spirit—to think this spirit can be clothed with flesh, bones and blood, and with earthly garments, and to be handled with mortal hands, produced at stated times, places, and for money, is more than my mind is able to conceive; nor will all the testimony of mortal man make me believe it.

I must see with my own eyes. I must see the word materialized for material, and that it come to us at any time and place without money, price, or medium, then I can understand it. Neither are these seen with our natural eyes. All we get from the spirit world is through our spiritual intellect, our spiritual sight, hearing and feeling.

An etherealized body once appeared to me, and I saw it with spiritual eyes, and it came with such force and power, as of a mighty rushing wind, that it turned me half-way around as I was walking on the sidewalk; and the communication I received through the avenue of spiritual hearing, called to my attention the message just suited the occasion. It was full of comfort and consolation.

Let us remember that silly communications often come from or through silly people. When a loved one comes to you with a message, either in mortal or spirit life, knowing their time is limited, don't you suppose they will deliver it first? They do not say, "I am glad to see you, and anxious to communicate, but I am losing strength and must go. Good bye."

Communication between the two spheres is a fact, but Abraham Lincoln, Robert Ingersoll and Thomas Paine would never deliver a lecture through a dead person who reads no studies, the philosophy of Spiritualism. I am acquainted with mediums to whom that get mad at the true doctrine of Spiritualism. They are mediums, but not Spiritualists.

A Spiritualist loves and seeks the truth. Some I see are inclined to think if one believes that there is life beyond the grave, and that they can hold converse with the mortal, that such characters are Spiritualists. I admit that is good far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. There are thousands and thousands who believe that, and yet claim that Spiritualism is the work of evil influences, and they do all they can to antagonize the doctrine that true Spiritualists love and cherish above all else. "They hang on to the personal God idea; to a vicarious atonement; to the resurrection of these mortal bodies; to a six-days-creation story, and that we were conceived in sin and shaped in iniquity; that part go to hell and part to heaven; that I can never be saved differently from any other being, etc."

Now I am inclined to think such Spiritualists (if Spiritualists they are) will never do the cause of truth one bit of good; but rather are a detriment. Nine out of ten such are not spiritual-minded. They would rather talk about the "big bang," "the end of the world," "the time of their prospects for peace and happiness."

Those who are "spiritual-minded," they seek those things that are above. They are always anxious to be engaged in conversation on this subject. It becomes their meat and drink, and without it they would perish or be spiritualists.

I know when I was converted to this glorious cause that it was only a day or two until I began to see things in a different light. The new ideas that came to me were glorious! How I loved them! I could not get my old ideas without shedding a tear or getting offended. To-day I am still anxious to know more about the deep truths that underlie all things. My daily and hourly prayer is that I may know more truth and less error.

Brother Francis, if I thankfulness with any good you have my sincere thanks or getting out such a good paper. This week's number is worth many times a year's subscription. Blessed be the power of true Spiritualism!

Now one word about materialization. The true has never been exposed. On all the so-called cases that I have heard and read of, there has never been a spirit dismantled; the "spirit" always proves to be the medium, an accomplice, or a dummy.

There is no fraud in spirit power; it is in those professing to produce it. Go on, my brother; in this glorious work you will meet with opposition.

You say, but how have my own spirit forces are behind you, and that the truth travels very slowly. A lie runs like wild-fire!

The truth does not come to us in the wind, in an earthquake, or the fire, but in a still, small voice. Elwood, Ind. J. L. FOSTER.

A REMARKABLE TEST.

A Medium's Statements and Their Explanation.

About three months ago I attended a public spiritual meeting. A man unknown to me said, "A spirit gives me his name as Caspar, do you know him?"

"Yes."

"Also John?"

"Yes."

"Now Caspar takes me on the water."

"I am rocking and going up and down—do you understand?"

"Yes."

"Now Caspar shows me a gun—do you know what this means?"

"Yes."

The explanation is as follows: From 1869-1870 I included I was on a trading vessel (Meta) on the Brazilian coast, Captain Caspar, Boetger in charge. While going from Porto Alegre to Rosario we passed through a pamparo (typhoon) lasting forty-eight hours. This accounts for the rocking and going up and down.

In 1869 while at anchor in Parana-gua I and others got into a fight with John Caspar, the captain, went into the cabin, brought up a gun and threatened to shoot if we did not stop fighting.

I explained all this to the medium and he said, "Well, Caspar tells me he would not have shot any of you, because the ship was loaded."

About twenty-five years ago I was told that Caspar and all his crew died of the yellow fever in Rio De Janeiro, in the winter of 1870-71.

Psycho-Magnetic Healing as a Spirit Manifestation.

In No 839 of The Progressive Thinker Bro. Tuttle calls attention to the little attention given by investigators to the manifestations in spiritual or magnetic healing.

It is somewhat strange that so important a manifestation of spirit force or power should have been so long attracted so little attention. Perhaps it is, first, because it is generally, even by Spiritualists, not properly understood; and, second, because a large majority of those who are posing as magnetic healers neither recognize nor know anything of spirit influence, force, or power in their treatments, but depend alone on the manipulation of nerve centers to arouse an increased nerve force and a better circulation in their patient.

And even among Spiritualists, many suppose this to be about all there is to any so-called "magnetic treatment." Others who recognize a spirit force believe it to be simply a magnetic or electric current generated by a spirit power and passed through the medium to the patient, the sole object and effect of which is to increase and regulate the circulation.

While this may often be the object and all that is needed, the more important manifestation of our best healers, is the powerful medicinal or chemical properties with which the magnetic currents and emanations are charged as may be required to produce the sought-for results, and applied directly to the parts affected. This claim for true psycho-magnetic treatment will undoubtedly be questioned by many, and even new to some Spiritualists. As one however who has long been in the hands of a spirit hand for this phase of manifestations, and one who has given the matter much study and careful consideration, relying on absolute facts in my own experience, I have no hesitancy in asserting that this phenomenon in spirit manifestations is an established fact, and one which I can personally demonstrate whenever the opportunity offers and the occasion requires.

This is perhaps best witnessed and appreciated in the immediate effect produced in the treatment of highly inflamed, and bad external sores and in severe and dangerous cases of pneumonia; the change and effect on the sores being plainly shown as the treatment progresses, the treatment being given without physical contact with the affected part—while with the congested lung in pneumonia, the change and marked change is so instant as to permit of a reasonable doubt of the application of a medicinal or chemical remedy, and this not in its crude, but in spirit form.

With Brother Tuttle I believe that more attention should be given by Spiritualists and investigators to this phase and phenomena of spirit manifestations. It is a practical and very useful manifestation, that will carry with it more real good to humanity and to the cause of Spiritualism than any other one of the many phases of manifestations given to us from the spirit world.

Here however we have the "fakes" and partially developed mediums to contend with—and posing as magnetic healers, many who are not Spiritualists and know nothing of spirit influence, seeking and obtaining a patronage under a reputation that has been established for the practice of magnetic healing by the genuine psycho-magnetic healers.

Among Spiritualists and those who are honest in the matter, many are recognized as having healing power or naturally endowed with the "gift of healing"—and are often relied on, who have given so little time and attention to the development of this gift that they are not attended with or have an organized spirit healing band.

Certainly no one can expect intelligent, scientific spirits to co-operate for a great work on this earth plane unless the medium through which they may work gives them the time and proper conditions. This idea will apply to all phases of mediumship, and should afford a matter of serious thought to those who, I think, have thoughtlessly condemned what they have styled commercial mediumship.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

The Excellent Results That Flowed Therefrom.

To the Editor:—I wish to join in the praise of the good work The Progressive Thinker is doing. I am only one of the late subscribers, but have been an earnest reader and investigator for some four or five years.

I have positive truth of the genuineness of spirit return, having investigated it in our Home Circle, with grand results, and with many thanks to my dear old uncle whose untiring efforts aided me in my search for the truth.

I know of no other Spiritualists in this place except my sister, a child of fourteen years. We receive many messages in the Home Circle, and while others look on us as being misled, I feel glad to know I am entirely free from the orthodox Devil that ingersoll pictured so plainly in his lecture that has recently been published in The Progressive Thinker.

This little mining town is fourteen miles west of Danville, Ill. I do hope the Spiritualists there will arouse and the society be a blessing to the cause.

While I am not a public medium I have that remarkable gift of clairvoyance at times, and have many wonderful experiences.

I wish to mention Mrs. M. A. Burland of your city as she aided me in her lectures given in St. Joseph, Mo., three years ago.

I will in the future tell you of some of my experiences in broad daylight, with the sun shining brightly in the seance room.

THAT CAT HAS A SOUL.

A Good Degree of Intelligence Is Manifested in Its Actions.

The adored cat of a Boston family was taken ill. He pined, refused to look on milk, and turned away in disgust from fish, and the beauty of his black coat grew less day by day. Catnip was offered, but to no good end, and it was deemed best to have a doctor. The veterinarian, however, it was, relieved the sufferer, who was soon turned out as good as new, but shortly after the doctor came to the house again to see some one else. The cat at once appeared and, taking a seat beside him never stirred until the visit was over. Each day brought him a doctor, and every time his former patient, hearing the familiar voice, rushed out to greet him, evincing every sign of joy and welcome. Now, who shall say that cats don't think?

CREATES GREAT INTEREST.

Ionah Medium Produces Sensational Letter—Alleged to Be From the Late Dr. S. M. Bayard, Who Communicates Through Her to Dr. T. R. Allen, of Ionia—The Secular Press Is Stepping to the Front to Aid in the Dissemination of Spiritualism, as the Following from the Ionia (Mich.) Sentinel Proves.

The following accompanied the Doctor's message:

The Spirit of S. M. Bayard. In the world where spirits dwell, Far from pain and death and care, I am happy in the thought, We shall know each other there, Never more to part from friends, Whom on earth we learned to love, In that land of peace and joy We will live in realms above.

World of light and love so fair, In the regions of the blest, I now dwell, all free from care, S. M. Bayard is at rest.

Written by the spirit of Dr. S. M. Bayard by the hand of Mary L. Delano.

The following letter "from the spirit of Dr. S. M. Bayard" was brought to the Sentinel by E. H. King, at the request of Dr. T. R. Allen, to whom it was written. The letter is that Mrs. Delano, who is a medium of barely six months' experience, wrote the communication at the dictation of the doctor's spirit, while seated at a table.

The medium was writing some other matter at the time and without stopping took down the message with her hand four minutes.

It is something of a feat to write on two subjects at once with both hands, and the problem becomes more involved when a ghost is whispering in one's ear and one must listen. Dr. Allen and others vouch for the truth and the genuineness of the communication.

Readers of the "grab bag" will look forward with interest to Dr. Bayard's story of his life over the river.

"Dr. T. R. Allen:—I come from the world to let you know that I am still alive and am able to communicate to you by the hand of Mary Delano, a medium of no small talent. I am now with her, and have been here for quite a time. She is beyond ordinary mediums in point of truth and fidelity to the cause in which she works. She is a most wonderful medium, and I say so more than once, for you will be compelled to admit it before you are done with it. She can do what I never in my earth life saw a medium do, and I stand behind her to defend her by her own hand.

"Do not try to think this is not S. M. Bayard, for no other than the same old friend whom you used to have good times with. We were great pals, and we used to have a great talk on this subject. Now, I tell you how I came to find her: I was in Chicago with a friend of my early days, and he started to go to the electric chair, which same is the pride of all spirits who wish to go from any place to another. Well, I followed that line, not knowing where it led, till I found myself in the home of Mary L. Delano, and her writing was the same as the line of her uncle, Wm. B. Leach of St. Louis, Mo., and he was there, too; so you see, I just happened to find her, and I truly can say that she can do what few mortals have the gift to do.

"I knew her when a child and saw their family doctor, and saw her later by her husband's father. I used to send her papers to help develop her mind. I'm glad I did; she is no ordinary thinker, and I am in a position to judge for I can read her innermost thoughts. So, now, I say to you, don't ever dare to accuse her of a lie. "Now, I think this is a very convincing thing, because she is a woman above lying and deception. Now, I will tell you, Allen, I have a little scheme in my mind in which I propose to put her before the public in a way that will not be denied. I will write to the Sentinel, and I will write to the Ionia Sentinel. I will write a short piece fresh, which I wish you to take to the office of the Sentinel and see that it is printed for me, not her. "I want the citizens of Ionia to know that Dr. S. M. Bayard is not entirely dead, but just asleep, away yonder across the stream that divides you from me.

"Now, as an old friend in social and medical sense, I ask of you this favor. I cannot compel you to do it, but if I am not afraid to put my name beside of hers, you need never be afraid to take it to a printer. It is bona fide truth that none can dispute, and they must not for she has written behind her that the world has known on earth, so I say again, not to dispute her truth. Now I will close and come again to you by her hand. I will write you a description of my life in the spirit world next time. Now I will close, and your spirit friend, Allen, the spirit of Dr. S. M. Bayard, Spirit World.

"Good-bye till I come again."

Sentinel Interviews Medium.

The publishing of the above letter has caused much comment both for and against. There are among those who have read it a great number of believers who have absolute faith in the Spiritualistic belief and it is for these that the Sentinel has interviewed Mrs. Delano, the Eastern medium, and secured the story.

Mrs. Dwight Delano, by whose hand Dr. S. M. Bayard is alleged to have written to his friend Dr. Allen, lives in Eastern township, three-quarters of a mile south of Dilline corners, and both she and Mr. Delano are well known in that section. Mr. Delano's farm lies on both sides of the road, is a good place of land. On the east of the road is the dwelling house, it is a frame structure consisting of upright and wing. A low vine-covered porch gives it an air of comfort and a row of trees shades it in summer from the rays of the western sun. Within the house is very comfortable furnished and Mrs. Delano lives there in peaceful and unassuming quiet.

Both are Spiritualists. It is only within the last two months that Mrs. Delano has become convinced of her power to translate messages from the dead to the living. In fact, it is only within that time that she has become converted to her belief. Her story of her conversion is an interesting one.

PERSONAL SUNSHINE.

Its Vivifying Influence Upon the Person.

It presupposes a mind clear and sunny, free from fretting and not disturbed by ill winds and cross purposes, that only act as factors in arousing innate powers, and when the personal and divine sunshine is directed thereon, then there is speedy growth of those personal graces which so delight the angels and secure for the person so building fine spiritual bodies and fine mansions in the upper realms for them to inhabit when freed from the earth encumbrances and mortal form.

The Sun of Love, Truth and Wisdom thrills the person blessed with a sunny disposition.

This divine vitality does so vivify any being that comes in rapport with it by being meek and humble in spirit and devoted to truth and duty, that he counts labor a privilege and all that falls to his lot as means for unfolding and being useful, thus happy.

From this vitality which is truth, love and wisdom spring, comes the support of all who draw near in soul and spirit and ask as directed.

It is healing balm for all ailments of mind, soul and body. It dispels all gloomy shades and ill conditions and creates wholesome environments in which it is restful to dwell, and to cheerfully comply with every duty.

The soul needs this sunshine for its unfolding and a healthy complexion; also for strength to wing its way upward to realms eternal and bring rich treasures of love, truth and wisdom to this individual center, the brain, to furnish and beautify every cell and chamber thereof.

Oh! the riches of the wisdom of God to which all are entitled in proportion to developed fitness for receiving. Could there be a nobler aim in life than the acquisition of this wealth which is also portable to the realms immortal? We think not.

Earth's wealth is stationary; it is but for a day and must be left when soul and spirit are called up higher, but truth, love and wisdom abide, to ornament the soul and spiritual body, and also the heavenly mansions in many beautiful articles which are the outward expressions of this personal sunshine and referred to graces which so beautify the spirit form, and command such great and lasting wealth.

If it not better, then, to think more lightly of things material, and not to crave more thereof than for need, and think all else is given in trust for others, so that the heart is not centered thereon to become thereby a means of keeping the real individual in the shadows. MRS. M. KLEIN.

with Mrs. Delano and while they talked much about her belief. The time for her return came and the usual sorrow at parting was expressed. Mrs. Delano also spoke of the loneliness she would feel after her departure. The daughter is stated to be possessed of a medium's power and for her mother's comfort after she should be gone undertook to procure a message from her deceased grandfather to her mother. She took her writing materials and sat down. In answer to her wish the spirit of Mr. Leach began to write. The message was not finished, as the medium was compelled to leave for the train. Only part of the name was on the paper.

After her daughter had gone Mrs. Delano found herself wondering again and again why she could not finish the letter. "Try it, try it, try it," something kept repeating to her. Mrs. Delano tried it. Taking paper and pencil she sat down and waited. Previous to this time Mrs. Delano had no experience in the work. Patiently she waited and at last the pencil began to make faint tracings on the sheet and the letter was slowly finished. Mrs. Delano then became aware of her power as a medium. Since that time she has often written at the dictation of the spirits of those who have gone before.

This is the story as given by Mrs. Delano.

On Tuesday a representative of the Sentinel drove to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Delano and had a long and interesting visit with them. They were both at home enjoying the warmth of a roaring fire and protection from the north wind that raged outside.

When the object of the visit was given and Mrs. Delano was informed that Mr. Bayard's letter had been published in Monday's Sentinel she expressed the conviction that the letter itself was not intended for publication, but merely the ordinary correspondence accompanied it. Both Mr. and Mrs. Delano were evidently sincere.

"There is nothing of the supernatural in it," said Mrs. Delano. "That is where the mistake is made. Purely natural causes are responsible. If people would look at it in that light it would not seem improbable. It is all electricity." Mrs. Delano thoughtfully believes that it is this element that makes her a medium through whom the spirits of the dead may converse with the living.

Mrs. Delano's manner is one of distinct avoidance to the notoriety which the publication of the communication to Dr. Allen has given her, and Mr. Delano is of the same mind. They expressed the utmost regret that the letter had been printed.

"We will come in for a good deal of scorn and scoffing now," said Mr. Delano, "but speaking of the situation, but although that seems to be the feeling of both himself and his wife, nevertheless their faith and sincerity appear unquestionable.

"BARBARISM OF HUNTING."

Captain L. W. Billingsley Takes a Prominent Stand Against It.

The best thing that has been contributed to current literature of late is from the pen of Captain L. W. Billingsley on the "Barbarism of Hunting." It ought to be read and re-read, and it is destined to be in the public schools until the children have learned it by heart. Mr. Billingsley says: By many men and nearly all boys it is deemed great sport to display skill in taking the lives of birds and animals. To follow hounds and other dogs of the forest through field and woods and to bring to earth victim after victim with unerring shot, is deemed a fascinating achievement.

All hunters often witness the killing of innocent victims, and see the suffering and agonizing death of birds and animals who dearly love their lives, and have done the hunters no harm. Most hunters of kindly nature tell you that at times a feeling of self-reproach has passed through them as they stood by the dying victims of their skill. Hunters of elk, deer and antelope can tell you of seeing the horror-stricken eyes of these animals, filled with tears, gazing at them with mute reproach while they sobbed their lives away, and deprived of all power to wreak vengeance on their human aggressors. Such memories should haunt men who are not hardened or calloused with savagery.

Time and again we have seen lordly animals in their native state, peaceful, happy and seemingly enjoying to the full the gifts of life wounded or killed at the pulling of a trigger. If such animals are wounded they are relentlessly pursued and may for hours or days suffer agony before death comes to their relief.

Hunting is a relic of barbarism in man's nature. One of the most pitiable of sights is to see life pass out of the innocent, quivering, helpless grouse, quail, dove or other bird. Often these scenes are garnished with the cheer and laughter of a great nation can dignify the mock heism of killing "big game." Only a hard-hearted man can derive pleasure in such barbarous sport. The man of genuine sympathy and kindly disposition can only feel disgust at the thought of killing the unoffending innocents.—State Journal, Lincoln, Neb.

MESSAGE FROM JOS. JEFFERSON.

I have touched the heights of the great divide, I have seen life's shadows pass, I have stood on the slopes of this wonder-land Where no tolls or pains harass.

I am drinking in the heavenly airs Of this soft, eternal June, I am holding converse day by day With minds to joy atune.

I would not if I could retracte The steps already climbed; I see too many lights ahead, And I know my way has rhymed.

With all that blent my life with joy, With all that came to me Of earth or of the ether land, This country fair and free.

I know no loss, no chill, no want, My cup is flowing full, My cravings only are for peace, And for the beautiful.

By what has come I know that more Will be vouchsafed to me, From that my eyes each day behold, More shall I waiting see.

Oh, man! Earth holds the lesser far; Endless Eternity Awaits each tollworn, wearying soul That far from life would flee.

From life! Why life is everywhere, And joy is waiting too;— Lift up your head and list the song That Nature sings for you.

Kind Nature! like a mother she Folds each in warm embrace, And if you'll only let them go, Will all your faults efface.

Faults are but offerings of the years, And as you pass along They fall away like withered leaves The grass and dust among.

Time was when I could weep and pray, Then I have no better ken, But now I have no tear or prayer, 'Tis only LOVE and DO.

Doing is LOVE enough for me, 'Twill be the same for you, And if you need another's help My strength is ever new.

Call not while you can find the way, Your powers are wondrous great, INQUIRE WITHIN, then—alm and work.

Leave nothing unto fate. You are the Great High Priest—and King, Your own Redeemer, too, Shake off the shackles termed your faith.

And hold yourself to view, God manifest are all that live, On earth, in heavens above, And the one great force that makes you God.

Is Love, forever Love, JOSEPH JEFFERSON, The Actor.

Religious Tyranny.

The world is not yet relieved from religious tyranny. Only a short time ago, and the whole world was crushed down by burdens under the tyranny of fear, of persecutions which were horrible. In England, men were harried and persecuted and driven out of the country, if they did not conform to the popular religious faith. In every country in Europe the same thing was true. Men were liable to be put to death for holding a particular opinion. Are we free yet? In France there is a great struggle going on, which is shaking the country to its center, the attempt to throw off this tyranny and be free. In England the clergy are still grasping at the matter of popular education, so that the man who does not wish his children to be educated after the ecclesiastical type must be a rebel against the laws of the kingdom. Are we free in this country? Free in a certain way, yes. Not because ecclesiasticism has changed, but because it is not strong enough.—M. J. Savage.

SPIRIT RETURN A SUBlime FACT.

A Touching Spiritual Vision During the War of the Rebellion, Illustrating the Fact that the Spirit Survives the Death of the Body.—In Vision Saw Father Shot, and for Years Suffered From Shock, Which Finally Killed Her.

To see in a vision her father shot dead in battle, hundreds of miles from where she was, and then to learn that his death had occurred precisely as she had witnessed it with her mind's eye, was the extraordinary experience of Mrs. Mary King, Newhall, a well-known and socially prominent woman, who died at her home in Galena, Ill., after years of acute suffering of a malady affecting the heart, which was caused by the great nerve shock to which the vision subjected her.

Her maiden name was Mary King and her father was Captain Edward A. King, of the regular army. He was a brave and gallant young soldier and won distinction in the service of the north and the south between the north and the south.

His wife and children were living in Ohio in the war time. From Cincinnati they went to Dayton, in that State, where they resided for many years. Letters came to them frequently from the husband and father, telling them of his daily duties on the field and in camp. The letters always were full of hope and good cheer, but they did not serve to dispel the cloud that hung over the home, wherein his loved ones waited with heavy, aching, anxious hearts for his return from the cruel war.

Mary King was a highly bright, winsome, sensitive girl, and between her and her soldier father there existed the strongest, tenderest ties of affection. The daughter was passionately fond of her father, cherishing for him a deeper, warmer love than that of a daughter's fondness for her father, and the dangers to which he was exposed were a source of constant grief and fearful anxiety to her.

For her there was no peace of mind, nor could there be any so long as the war should continue. Every day was to her a day of gloomy foreboding. Every night was a night of brooding, anxious unrest. It was feared that she would suffer a complete nervous collapse as a result of the acute mental strain to which she was subjected.

Vision of the Battlefield.

One day, after a restless, sleepless night, she was at her home with other members of the family when she suddenly sprang from the chair, pale and trembling, and cried:

"Look! Look! My father has been killed."

With these words she fell unconscious to the floor. She was picked up and carried to her bed, and a physician was summoned. When she was restored to consciousness she said that her father was dead, and described minutely the circumstances of his death. She said that she had seen him lying on the ground, and that her father was not dead, that he had been killed. Every possible effort was made by members of the family and her physician to quiet her fears, to dispel the delusion from which she appeared to be suffering. But she would not be comforted, and she believed that her father was dead—that he had met his death precisely as she had witnessed it in her vision.

Within a few hours the family received word that Capt. King was dead. A few days later a letter came to the grief-stricken wife, telling her that her husband had met his death at the battle of Gettysburg.

He had been shot dead at the moment his daughter, pale and trembling, had sprung from her chair and cried: "Look! Look! My father has been killed!" And he had met his death precisely as his daughter had witnessed it in her vision.

The war, with its heart-breaking tragedies, its blood and its tears, finally came to a close. But Mary King never completely recovered from the cruel hurt it had given her. Time softened her grief, but it left her a grief, but the nervous shock to which she had been subjected by her father's tragic death left her broken in health and made her a life-long sufferer.

In 1872 she was married to Dr. Edward G. Newhall, and the couple soon afterward removed to Galena.

COOL ROBERT INGERSOLL.

His Lecture on "The Devil."

To the Editor: In your late issue we were favored with a reprint of Mr. Ingersoll's lecture on "The Devil." Although we read it some time ago, it is, like all truth, still beautiful, and it will bear repeating many times.

There is one sincere regret, however, in regard to the reproduction of the lecture of Mr. Ingersoll's greatest exponent of free thought, and that is, it is yet so biased and ignorant regarding matters "religious," that the great masses cannot be prevailed upon to read them; or, if they do so, it is with a biased mind, and more out of curiosity or respect to the expressed wish of some liberal friends than it is with a desire to hear and know the truth for truth's sake.

We have succeeded at last in arousing somewhat of interest in, and respect for Col. Robert Ingersoll's writings among a small circle of friends in this vicinity. For the most part, they are men of honest and ordinary intelligence and who, if once convinced, will be potent factors for good in the community.

SPENCER M. DE GOLIER, Bradford, Pa.

SO IT GOES.

If virtue were as gay as sin, How easily might goodness win?

If right went laughing by, like jongs, The devil would lose half his throng.

If day sought pleasure like the night, Dawn need not blush to take the light.

But virtue seems so cold and proud That merry sin attracts the crowd.

And right has such a solemn air, Men follow wrong, the dearest care.

And care so eats the day-time up— At night they seize the devil's cup.

And drink forgetfulness till dawn, And so the queer old world goes on.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

Every man truly lives, so long as he acts his nature, or some way makes good the faculties of himself.—Sir Thomas Browne.

ANIMALS ARE IMMORTAL.

University of California Professor Finds Proof That Beasts of the Fields Are Men's Real Kin.

"Immortal man," they used to say. Now it is "immortal animal." Prof. Howison of the University of California at Berkeley, Cal., argues that since intelligence is eternally existent, and since animals have intelligence, ergo the beast of the field is immortal.

Furthermore, the professor thinks it passing peculiar that any one in the twentieth century should be started at the idea. For startled many were, who gathered in his class in ethics, where animal immortality was declared, and who lingered long thereafter to discuss the sensation.

Those who are startled by the declaration, suppose Prof. Howison, perhaps, are the least fitted to comprehend what is signified thereby, all that it entails on what it is founded. He bases his argument for the immortality of animal life on the same considerations that he would use in proving the immortality of mankind.

And these considerations are so complicated, involving so many ramifications over so large a territory of science and philosophy that nothing less than many volumes would be required to give it a sufficient statement.

Mind Symbol of Immortality.

But granting immortality to man as based on the fact that it is his intelligence that lives forever, what is amazing in affirming that intelligence in an animal is immortal?

It is the result, says the venerable philosopher, of the old religious superstition that has its foundation in such language as "the beasts of the field that perish." And what is considered commonplace by men who occupy their minds in research along these lines comes as a startling innovation to other classes of people who are unaccustomed to such study.

"Wherever mind is found, the immortal, unchanging mind, the mind which is not the result of processes but is part of that mind which is absolutely unchanging, and so makes man responsible legally wherever that mind is found in man or beast, there is immortality. To this mind death is merely an experience, and, like all other experiences, serves simply to remove hindrances to the intellectual faculty."

Man is the mental superior of the animal simply because a greater number of these hindrances to intellect have been removed. This removal of hindrances constitutes evolution. Not an adding to but a taking away from. Animals are gifted with intellect, as are men. The difference in intellect is measured by the difference in the obstacles to the intelligence. For intelligence comes as an increase of control, a perfection of control.

Has animal life the reflective faculty of mind? Without doubt they have. Here is the basis for the argument that a simple change of life, the transmigration of souls. For the reflection must be there if the power of reflection is present. "Once it is granted that animal life has intelligence the recognition follows that it must exist eternally just as men will exist eternally. Are animals capable of overcoming the hindrances to the free exercise of the intellectual faculty?"

The savant at California answers yes, which scuttles the materialistic idea of the soul as a product of matter.

Buddhists Recognize Animal Immortality.

Reverting to the age of California, the religion of the Buddha was cited as an example of recognition given by a great religious teacher to the low or animals. Alone does the doctrine of Buddha embrace a recognition of the dignity of the lower order of animals.

The Buddhist forbears to slaughter animals, be it for food, sport, or scientific purposes; he discards the theory that they have been created for the use of man, and that he has any right over them. The Buddha sat and taught that every human being, high or low, animal or human, while transmutating in any of the material, semi-material, or non-material worlds, is subject to alternate misery and illusive happiness, and that lasting bliss is found only in Nirvana. He saw that the will to live was the cause of transmigration, with its miseries, and that when through enlightenment this will ceases, Nirvana is attained, and transmigration or incarnation in earthly bodies ceases.

Meaning of Reference to Sparrows.

While Buddhism does pay more attention to the animals than Christianity, observes the professor, yet the spirit of Christ toward the animals was the same. Christ's reference to the sparrows that fall denotes the kindly, sympathetic relation in that regard.

Buddhist or Christian, the world do move toward a recognition of the dignity of the animal kingdom, toward its claims for sympathetic treatment at the hand of man. Christian and Buddhist appreciate the presence everywhere of that divine life.

DEATH-BED VISIONS PIERCE THE SPIRIT VEIL.

Dying Said to Get Glances Into the Other World That Comfort and Support Them in Passing From This Life.

The greatest question before the world has been in the Chicago Record-Herald, one that should receive the most attention from men of science, is this—If a man die, shall he live again? This spoke the great statesman, Gladstone.

After years of study and observation at the bedside of the dying, I think I know that a man never dies, in the case of the spirit is no more. Notwithstanding that I have passed the Oshipe age, I cannot agree with him that the dying do not see through the veil—do not feel comforted at what they see on the other side of the mortal sphere. For I have seen many go and heard many tell what they saw, and have witnessed some phenomena.

I have known men—truthful men, pure men, and holy men—who had experienced the spiritual conditions wherein they could say positively that spirits live freed from the flesh. They were not insane or troubled with delusions to induce delusions.

Spirits in Other World.

As I have experienced the same, I am not conscious of delusion, Oshipe the contrary notwithstanding. Dr. Oshipe would give one the impression that there is no future life.

Professor Huxley, one of the foremost scientists of the age, agrees with Frederick Harrison, the most learned of men, that when one can give reason for a belief which comes within the bounds of reason and common sense, it becomes scientific. There can be no quarrel between science and the higher manifestation of psychic phenomena.

To be a believer in the theory that we are living in a world within a world, one does not have to forsake the church, or become a disbeliever in the Christian religion. St. Paul claimed that there is a spiritual body, and from my observation and experience I fully agree with him.

One has to experience these phenomena before he can become convinced. No man living is free from delusion, and some may claim that an deluded, so I will make no attempt to demonstrate the whys of my belief.

Abiding Place of the Departed.

I can only say I am a firm believer in the unseen world, and in the theory that the luminous ether which scientists concede fills all space is the abiding place of those departed spirits who have thrown off the material body.

The people of the great Chinese nation are believers in this theory. There must be some reason for this belief, outside of simple chance, fate, and speculation. In the history of the European nations in which the Greek and Roman pantheons were found, they did not believe that this short life was man's only inheritance.

Most ancient, while not accepting the doctrine of metempsychosis, looked upon death as a simple change of life. The Greco-Romans did not believe in the transmigration of souls. Nor did the Aryans of the East, since the hymns of the Vedas teach another doctrine. The belief in magic, the meaning of which is wisdom, was carried to such madness as was time in Rome that under the consulate of Lucius Paulus many magicians were expelled.

Death Does Not End All.

When the idea that the soul remained fixed at the place where the body was interred was prevalent, food was carried to the tombs on festal occasions, which is described by Ovid and Virgil as being for the dead. The Chinese perform this ceremony to this day, so that the odors might be inhaled by the spirits of their ancestors.

Even the oldest of the oldest upon the earth; not like ours, to be sure, but is ours any better in fact?

Even eliminate the bible—the teachings of Christ and the apostles—and you will have enough evidence of the soul's immortality. So claims the great astronomer, Camille Flammarion.

No one as yet has been able to prove that death ends all. Even the great Herschel, after years of scientific research, is unable to give an opinion, and the great Darwin thought it probable that there may be a hereafter even for monkeys, while Alfred Russel Wallace, the co-discoverer with Darwin of the evolution theory, positively asserts that there is a spirit world.

As an English Journal Saw It.

Under the head of "Ignorance of the Future Life," the London Spectator, an English secular journal whose beginning dates back to "Ye Olden Time," discourages thusly, giving a very discouraging outlook for the Christian church which discarded and refused the only evidence vouchsafed the world proving an immortal life. It is the position long maintained in these columns, in regard to the church, and one which is sustained by the historic past. The fact that "there is no death" was a shrewd guess by the ancients, without any real base on which to build.

"We know nothing whatever about the next world," says the Spectator. "Given those who accept the Christian revelation most heartily and most completely must admit with St. John, that 'it doth not yet appear what we shall be.' Christ taught, and His disciples believed, that the soul of man is eternal and does not die with the body. St. Paul summed up his teaching on the subject of immortality when he said that He had 'abolished death.' Against this ignorance man has forever chafed. Upon the dark background of the future the religious imagination, helped by the inner light of conscience, throws beautiful and terrible pictures. But with each succeeding age the pictures dissolve, and change. Knowledge cannot pierce the visible darkness which divides this world from the next. As the years go on we gain wisdom, but not certainty.

"Wisdom that, becoming wise, meant making slow and sure advance. From a knowledge proved in error acknowledged ignorance.

"All popular ideas of heaven or hell are just now fading away. The conventional heaven failed to satisfy the aspirations of man, and all conceptions of the everlasting tortures of the damned fade before a new consistency of thought which cannot reconcile eternal punishment with the knowledge and love which are the basis of life.

"Our forefathers looked forward in some moods to everlasting rest and never-ending worship, in others to a happy and prosperous life in a perfectly governed and perfectly healthy city. At times, inspired by the love of nature, they Christianized the classic picture of the Elysian fields. To-day the normal man does not desire rest, when he asks himself what life he would choose. Rest suggests death, and we desire more abundant life. To most healthy bodies and healthy minds effort is in itself delightful. If men do not need to make an effort for their living, they will do it for their pleasure. Successful effort brings more happiness than anything else, taking life as a whole. The thought of everlasting worship satisfies fewer and fewer people to-day. It belongs to an age when men thought of God as a kind of king, who took perpetual pleasure in homage. We still sing of sweet fields beyond the swelling flood, and find refreshment in the thought, but no one desires to live forever wandering amid the beauties of nature. The thought of an ideal life is still attractive, but the heavenly Jerusalem brings thought of Utopia now rather than of the everlasting.

"We still pray against 'everlasting damnation,' and desire to get rid of the worm of remorse that dieth not, but our prayers, however earnest, no longer bring visions of the burning pit. Such visions would be called up nowadays rather by the 'Divine Comedy' than by the church service. Other hopes charm us to-day and other fears restrain. These, again, will change their form in the next generation. The conditions of this life alter, and consequently, the conceptions of that life to which we instinctively look for consolation and explanation; reward and retribution change also. Nevertheless, these pious opinions of the past, the outcome as they are of a spiritual pre-occupation more concerned than anything of which the present age is capable, are not without their value. Imaginary they may have been, but—

"God is also in sleep, and dreams advise. Which he hath sent propitiously, some great good presaging."

"We smile reverently as we look back. Crowns and dities, feasts and sweet fields all melt away together."

Thus a gloomy picture of the religion of faith and hate. While its passing will be welcomed by many, they can all rest securely in the revelation the spirit world has made to mortals, a revelation made none too soon for a despairing world.

A Few Pages From History, Let We Forget.

At the time the American Constitution was established the African Slave Trade was in full force. White and professed Christians incited negro tribes in Africa to engage in war, then bought the captives taken on either side, men, women and children. These were manacled together in long rows; were driven to the coast, placed on shipboard, confined in the hold of the vessel, the air was shut out, and nearly starved during a three months' voyage across the Atlantic, to a Christian slave market. As a compromise between the North and South this traffic in stealing human flesh and blood and transporting it to America was not to be prohibited until 1808.

The Inerrant Bible, which we have heard preachers declare time and time again in the sacred desk, is every word true, "for it came from God himself."

Well, here is that word, everywhere received by Christians as divine. See Leviticus 25: 44, 45:

"Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land; and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen, FOREVER."

Thus spake the Lord unto Moses on Mount Sinai, verse 1.

The dear Jesus was too much occupied in pronouncing woes on the Pharisees to reverse this authority, but the good Paul and his associate apostles to the front:

"Let as many servants as are under the yoke count their own masters as worthy of all honor."—1 Tim. 6:1.

"Exhort servants to be obedient to their own masters."—Titus 2:9.

Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling."—Ephesians 6:5.

"Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward."—1 Peter 2:18.

American churches of all denominations for a time sustained the accursed institution; but divisions arose; the churches in the slave states universally championed the Bible, holding slaves as chattels on the same footing with the brutes of the field, buying, selling, breeding as they.

The agitation set on foot by so-called infidels in the North, was first met by brick-bats, tar and feathers and like instrumentalities common to Christians. The division between North and South on the slave question widened. They of Southern churches denominated their brethren of the North infidels, because they discarded God's holy word. A person entering the South and expressing antagonism to slavery was mobbed, and frequently murdered because he rejected the plain teaching of the Bible, hence he had no rights the believer was bound to respect.

In due time the great question entered politics. Parties were divided along these lines. The anti-slavery element, discarding Bible teaching, uniting with freedom-loving Christians, became the strongest and elected one of the hated infidels president.

The South rebelled. A fratricidal war followed. Countless thousands went down in blood. Cities were destroyed, beautiful treasures were depopulated; the agony was seen and the groans were heard everywhere as the fathers, sons and protectors of families fell on the field of strife.

When both parties were nearly exhausted they who rejected Bible teaching as regards slavery, were defeated. Victory had passed; and as the war followed, then came the struggle to reinstate the arts of peace and good fellowship.

But go where we may the empty sleeve and leg greets us. Cripples everywhere, and every cemetery is filled with victims who fell in the contest. Forty years have passed; and as we write, Congress is acting on an appropriation of upwards of $140,000,000, as pensions for the ensueing year to some 900,000 destitute soldiers who were wrecked in the terrible strife. Multiply this large amount, wrested from the hands of toil and wealth, and appropriated each year since peace was declared to the surviving soldiers. Count up the misery entailed on the South; their pecuniary losses and their sacrifices; and add this to a like accounting in the North; then take cognizance of all the treasure that is to be expended for pensions before the last victim expires, and the total forms a sum it will require a profound mathematician to enumerate.

But all this gigantic expense of treasure, groans and blood is scarcely a drop in the great sea, compared with that mighty whole which that damnable text, "Thus saith the Lord, declared to have been proclaimed on Sinai, 3,369 years ago, amid the thunders and the lightnings of Omnipotence, has caused the oppressed of our race.

They who have tears should not withhold them as they recall these devilish outrages perpetrated on humanity in consequence of the cited passages of the Bible, libelously accredited to the mighty Ruler of the universe. Every Christian should go down on his knees, weep great scalding tears, and beg pardon for having blasphemed God's holy name for believing for one moment he could be guilty of such an atrocious wrong against the creatures of his creation. They should not rest night or day until the foul stain, a blot in fact, should be eliminated from the book.

In Java grows the Upari tree, whose exhalations for two centuries were reputed to destroy all to which it reposed under its noxious shade. Flowers may have bloomed there in great profusion; but if so he who stooped to gather them would have inhaled the deadly carbonic acid gas, and fell upon them. So the Bible may contain gems of thought of great moral worth; but which they are stored, is to believe so much that it is false that it is better to ignore the whole and cease sending it to an uncultured people, who are as liable to receive the evil as the good.

IN A GLOOMY PRISON.

We always have a deep sympathy for convicts—those confined in prison walls, for many times the crime for which they are sent behind the bars, was the direct OUTGROWTH OF CONDITIONS that are as lamentable almost as the violation of the law itself. Take the case of John F. Maybee, a materializing medium, now serving a term in the Work House at Detroit, Mich. The glibbie Spiritualists of that State are measurably responsible for his crime. Dressed as he was in artificial tongs, they have for a long time been willing to receive him as a "spirit," and thus encouraged in his nefarious work, he felt as if exposure were impossible—at least improbable. Finally, however, the awakening came on the part of the sitters—his paraphernalia was captured, and he is paying the penalty of his crime. He could have been saved from this incarceration, had some kind friend grabbed the "spiritism" years ago, and given him to understand that he must stop his deception at once.

Mr. Maybee can now have time to reflect on the course he has pursued, and perhaps he deeply regrets that others who are practicing along the same lines, are not keeping him company. He is only one member of a large gang now engaged in manufacturing bogus spirits. Through the course pursued by The Progressive Thinker, Spiritualists are gradually awakening to the true status of our cause, and IT IS ADVANCING TO A HIGHER PLANE ALL ALONG THE LINE.

The Sunrise Kingdom.

Hon. Wm. J. Bryan, traveling in Japan, and corresponding for the great dailies, in a late paper, mentioning the religions of Japan, relates the fact that Christianity was introduced to them some two and a half centuries ago by Catholic missionaries from Spain and Portugal; that the country was shut up against foreigners in consequence, and no citizen of Japan was permitted to go abroad until recent times. They even prohibited the building of other than small sail vessels in their desire to avoid intercourse with Western barbarians. Since the treaty made in 1853 with the United States, Mr. Bryan in substance says: "The army and navy have been reconstructed on European models, and a public school system, largely like that in the United States, has been established."

Buddhism and Ancestor worship are the prevailing religions in Japan. Christianity seems to meet with but little favor. The progress Buddhism has made during the last dozen years in ingratiating itself into American favor, if continued with equal pace for a hundred years, will migrate to outluncheon public thought in this country, and Buddhism will be as likely to gain a permanent footing here as Christianity will in Japan.

Because of the late contest with Russia the love of the Japanese for Christianity has not been increased.

Inciters of Disorder.

The Chinese minister to Germany is reported to have said a few days ago at Berlin, while talking about the disturbed condition of his country:

"The missionaries cause hatred of foreigners by their tactless proselytizing, and by the fighting between Protestants and Catholics."

In our own country we often witness conflicts which would lead to serious results were it not for the powerful police force in the great cities. If a Protestant exposes the practices of priests in the nunneries or the confessional the chances are ten to one a riot will ensue. The mother church is unwilling the doings of the priest-hood shall be publicly related. The members of the church are as exorable as were the slaveholders and their sympathizers in antebellum times.

Would it not be proper, indeed, is it not the duty of our government to withdraw protection from the disturbers of public tranquillity who go along with the priest-hood, knowing that discord and collisions must ensue? Expeditions to overthrow governments are met with the strong arm of the nation to arrest the belligerents and stay their power to wrong countries with which we are at peace. Should it do less than inform missionaries, without regard to their creed, that they have no right to protection from us when abroad on such expeditions, and that they must take the consequences of their own unwise acts?

A Monument for Dr. Slade.

No! a thousand times no! when there are hundreds of mediums now living who have reflected more light, more beauty, more grandeur on the world than he ever did. He will live grandly in history (his faults buried) in connection with a few striking manifestations of his mediumship, and that will constitute as impressive a monument as the man deserves.

These remarks are called forth by a movement on foot to erect a monument over his grave. It would be better by far to appropriate any money that could be raised for that purpose to properly caring for indigent mediums. For many years, he was in extremely destitute circumstances, and as a spirit, he would not care to have an imposing monument erected over his grave. The N. S. A. deserves great praise for its care of him in his old age. It is doing a grand work in that direction. Let history alone perpetuate the memory of Dr. Slade; that is sufficient.

The American Society for Psychical Research.

To the Editor:—I am just in receipt of the following letter from Prof. Hyslop, giving the glad announcement that the pledges secured now amount to the $25,000 desired.

"I have at last received pledges for the $25,000 which I have been seeking, and all pledges now become due. My plan is to make contributors to this fund members of the American Society for Psychical Research to the extent of their contributions. Those paying $5 will be enrolled as Associates, paying $10 as Members, and those paying $25 as Fellows. These are annual memberships. Those paying $100 become life members."

I. K. FUNK.
44 East 33d Street, New York.

We are glad that at last ample funds have been raised to establish on an enduring basis the AMERICAN SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH. With such men as Prof. Hyslop and Dr. I. K. Funk as members it certainly will become a prominent feature in connection with Spiritualism, investigating every phase of the phenomena in a manner that will attract the attention of the whole civilized world. The very fact that so many materializing mediums of late have been detected in the perpetration of the grossest and most cruel frauds, will cause every Spiritualist to rejoice that the AMERICAN SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH has at last been organized on a substantial foundation. It will prove of inestimable value to our Cause.

Prolific Source of Christian Sects.

The following brief quotation from the American edition of "Smith's Dictionary of the Bible," revised and edited by Prof. H. B. Hackett, and published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Vol. 3, p. 2401, first column, near the foot, is worth reading. The writer was discussing on the "Value of Paul's Epistles":

"They [Paul's Epistles] have been a most copious fountain of false doctrine. There has never been a heresy so absurd, or a vagary so wild, as not to resort to his proof texts chiefly, to this portion of the sacred volume."

Paul's Epistles constitute a little more than one-fourth of the New Testament, and this is the character a Christian teacher in an American University gives this production which Eusebius, the oldest ecclesiastical historian says:

"It is highly probable * * * the very gospels and writings of the apostles, and probably some expositions of the ancient prophets, such as are contained in the Epistles to the Hebrews and many other of St. Paul's Epistles," wherein the hands of the Eusebius and Theraputae, sects in existence long before the birth of Jesus, and of whom Philo the Jew wrote, was of whom before our era.

Origin of Language.

Prof. Quackenbush, in whose most excellent treatise on "Composition and Rhetoric," in his chapter on the "Origin of Spoken Language," says: "Language is beyond doubt a divine institution, invented by the Deity, and by him made known to the human race." Scripture informs us that this "means of communication" was employed by the first man and woman, as well as their immediate descendants; and we are hence forced to the conclusion it was the work of a direct revelation from on high.

The vocabulary of our first parents must have been very large, if we accept the Professor's idea, "for the Lord God brought every beast of the field and every fowl of the air to Adam who named them."

But the idea "forced" on the author is senseless. We see in the newborn infant of all races the first expression of language in a cry. The laugh follows to express pleasure. Love and hate soon find expression. And thus, through slow and easy stages, during countless millions of years, language, as variant as human needs, was developed.

Prof. Quackenbush, thirty years ago, to gain a sale for his book, was "forced to take the narrow position he did of the origin of language; but that 'force' has not the power to-day it had then.

Every animal has a language peculiar to its species. The "ki-ki" of the dog, the "bleat" of the calf, the "ba-a" of the sheep, the "wild scream" of the bird, or its gentle "chirp," each is heard and is understood by its mate.

Man, with his genius, has outstripped these methods of the lower forms of life; but he has been millions of years doing it, and has not yet got through.

Information Wanted.

That good Christian authority, Josephus, Book xix, chap. 8, sec. 2, says, Agrippa, near the close of his reign, "Saw an owl sitting on a certain rock, and he was immediately understood that this bird was the messenger of ill tidings, as it had once been the messenger of good tidings."

Eusebius, in His Ecclesiastical History, chap. ix, book 2, citing the same event, says: "He saw an angel sitting above his head. This he saw was the cause of evils."

The clergy tell us this angel, or owl, is identical with "The angel of the Lord" which "smote Herod," otherwise known as Agrippa, Acts 12: 23. Now what The Progressive Thinker desires to know is: Do the "angels of the Lord" sometimes disguise themselves as owls? and are they in such disguise when doing their infernal work? or when on their dark night when the faithful are abroad on missions of mercy? or is it the other fellow they are after?

THE ARCAEA OF SPIRITUALISM.

It receives Well-Merited Acknowledgment.

Judge W. Grabachoff, of the Circuit Court, Sofia, Bulgaria, says: "In reading several books on Spiritualism, I found the Arcaea of Spiritualism the best without comparison. It made me perfectly satisfied and happy. We use it as a reading and text book in our spiritual society in Sofia."

It Borders on the Miraculous

A VERY EXTRAORDINARY BOY.

He Seems to Talk With Animals—He Is Clairaudient and Some Mischiefous Spirit Is Stirring Things, and Creating Great Excitement by Apparently Making the Animals Speak—To Say the Least It Is a Most Remarkable Phenomenon and Will Excite the Attention of the Whole Occult World.

Perhaps the strangest case of communication and understanding between man and animals ever investigated by scientists has come to light in eastern Alabama—in the section of cotton country between Wedowee and Rockdale. The astounding reports of the case have startled the students of psychology and the possibility of the establishment of complete understanding between man and the lower animals is suggested by the facts of the case.

Howard Erwin, a six-year-old boy, is reported by competent authority, and the reports are substantiated wholly or in part by the investigations recently conducted, to be able to converse with, to understand, and to make himself understood perfectly by animals of all kinds. By some mysterious power—not yet understood and not understood at all by himself, this boy otherwise a perfectly healthy and normal lad, holds long talks with cows, with mules, with dogs, horses, sheep, cats—even with the barnyard fowls—and he understands and reports to his father or the others just what the animals want, all their grievances, their sicknesses, and their wants.

Acts as Their Interpreter.

How he does it the boy does not know. The power, it seems, was born in him. While fond of animals he seems not to be more so than any healthy child, nor do they seem especially attached to him, with the exception of Trace, his own dog, and the negroes who appear to bear to him the relation he appears to bear to them is simply that of a friendly translator—or intermediary between them and their masters.

Nor has any one yet been able to discover whether it is by spoken language or by some mystic transference of thoughts that they understand each other. It is known that when he is near an animal they both make sounds occasionally, but he speaks nothing that any one can understand nor does the alleged language sound in any way connected or to have any meaning whatever.

The discovery that the child is possessed of a strange power has thrown a veil of mysticism and superstition around him. The negroes avoid him and watch him with a strange mixture of fear and admiration. And also within the last six months it has been observed that his power of communicating with the beasts of the field appears to be waning—and those who have studied the case declare that within a few years this strange power will vanish entirely.

Could Read Minds of Humans.

When the child was just beginning to toddle around the house it was noticed that he was not the same as other children when he was in the presence of human beings. He was tremendously intelligent from the time he first began to notice things—and he read the minds of his mother and father and his sister Lizzie before he could talk. The mother, who worked hard, had little time to spend with him in play and his companions were his sister, three years older than he, and Trace, the coon dog. The mother noticed first that she did not have to speak to her child when she wanted him to do something. Often, she says, she started to tell him it was time to take a nap—and, before she could speak, he either cried in protest against being put to bed, or toddled towards the trundle bed and rolled into it.

She is not a particularly bright woman, and of much education, although she can read and write, but even she puzzled her brain about the child. And, when he learned to talk, she noticed it still more.

Dog Tells Him the Truth.

One evening she and her husband were sitting with the children on the porch of their little home, when Howard, who had been stretched out on the floor, with his head on the dog's body, wobbled to his feet and said: "Maw, Trace says the mule is in the corn patch."

"What will that child say next?" asked Mrs. Erwin. "He's all the time telling me what the dog says, or what the pigs told him. I never saw such a child. He must be crazy."

Half an hour later the mule was found in the corn patch. It took the child the dog told the kiddle the truth," remarked the father when he came back. "I reckon I ought to have gone out then. Shouldn't be surprised if old Jed had foundered here himself."

After that the child's strange power was watched with the greatest interest and with increasing amazement. The negroes vowed he had second sight.

At times the child would get up as if he had been called and trot out through the yard and into the barn lot—to some animal. Then he would come back and report. He always used the expression, "The horse says," or "the dog told me," or "the hens say," just as if he had been talking with them.

Told by Mule of Its Injury.

One evening his father, tired from the day's work, was lying on the grass, when Howard came trotting in from the barn.

"Paw," he said, "Jem told me her knee hurt her. She says she sprained it plowing to-day."

"I reckon that mule lied to you, son," remarked his father. "I reckon she's jes' powerful lazy and don't want to work to-morrow."

"She says she can't work to-morrow," said the boy. "Her leg is so sore she can't hardly touch it to the ground."

"I reckon she's just telling you that so's you'll tell me," remarked the father.

The next day Jem was put to work.

A GREAT ATTRACTION FOR LILLY DALE.

A Scientific Display That Will Astonish the Visitors.

Visitors to the City of Light Assembly, Lilly Dale, N. Y., are to enjoy a rare treat this summer. Professor E. B. Swift will give two grand scientific illustrated lectures on August 14 and 15. There will be fine spectacular displays of the Biocolor Cosmoscope, Projecting Microscope and Telescope.

In place of the mirror used in all compound microscopes, a few drops of water burn upon a crayon of lime, and giving an intense light, collected and concentrated by large lenses upon the objects, enlarged 5,000,000 times.

This is something entirely new and intensely interesting, showing drops of water, living insects, crystals, jasper, oak and many rare instructive objects, illustrating botany, chemistry, physiology and geology.

There will be rare views of heliotype from the world's greatest observatories, showing eclipses, hydrogen flames, milky way; also views of huge fissures and vast plains in the moon seemingly but a few miles away, concluding with lovely dissolving views of the world's greatest paintings, statuary and art treasures, music, and an immense collection of curiosities never exhibited before.

Spirit Power Did It.

I have worn an aluminum hair pin for four years; my hair is never dressed without it. This morning when I arose I removed it, laid it on my dresser as is my custom (I am a person of habit), but when I had brushed and combed my hair and made the usual French twist, the ancient and beloved hair pin was not to be found.

I knew I had removed it from my unkempt hair. I knew I had not stirred from the dresser upon which I had laid it, but thorough search failed to reveal the hair pin.

I recalled that before I owned it, three years in the "border land," and that the anniversary of her birth was near at hand. Was she testing my fidelity to her and to law? No answer, and still no hair pin. I was compelled to use a clumsy make-shift to hold my twist in place.

Two hours later, an artist friend gazed into my room found the pin suspended from some lace that hung over a picture that was on the dresser. How it came there, I have no means of knowing. B. S.

THE VETERAN WORKER.

Items From Meadville, Pa.—A. Gaston on Cuba—Theological Shivers.

Another trip to Meadville, on my birthday, (Feb. 11), and I enjoyed a good dinner and pleasant visit with Lynn Hollman and wife, and their charming six-year-old daughter, whose bright face is a promise for the future. I had a splendid audience in the evening—about three times as many, I think, as at my former visit, (and we called that a fine audience), and the most perfect attention throughout.

There appears to be a lively interest in Spiritualism in Meadville, and an uplooking intellectualism that gives a wholesome trend to the movement.

A MEMORIAL ADDRESS

Delivered in the Spiritualist Temple, San Diego, by Dr. J. M. Peebles, upon the Death or Departure from Mortality of Justin Hulburd, a Noted Actor, a Remarkable Medium, and Abraham Lincoln's Special Private Detective During the Civil War.

"He was clairaudient and clairvoyant. He had visions. He prophesied and was entranced, both consciously and unconsciously. His friends, E. W. Hulburd, Dr. F. D. C. Meyer, and others inform me that for several years, he was seldom free from the overshadowing influence in various stages of unfoldment."

While the Infinite Principle and Presence of the Universe may be considered as absolute Causation, manifest everywhere from atoms to oceans, and from sea-shore sands to the stars in the heavens, the minor causes and more important plans relating to human beings as moral actors, are doubtless first conceived above by great, invisible intelligences, and because of their innate humanitarian sympathies.

Death, an Incident.

Death, an incident in the line of evolution, is the leaving of the body with its limitations, and entering into a larger sphere of opportunities and conscious relations. The unshelling of the spirit through death affects neither the individuality nor the immediate moral status of human beings; they take with them beyond the casket, beyond the cypress-shaded cemetery, the cities of the dead, their tendencies and their great leading life purposes. VARIOUS ARE THE EMPLOYMENTS of the so-called dead. Scientists, in the territorial zones encircling us, further explore the mysteries of nature; astronomers cease not to count and weigh the circling, whirling planets that gem the starry immensities; philosophers peer into the depths of life, light, ether, the potency of thought, the transference of forces, and the relations of spirit to matter and motion; poets continue to sing in rhythmic measures the harmonies of the MANY-MANDED HEAVENS; travelers there traverse the strata of the lower spheres up to the celestial residences of the seers, and the palaces of the gods; actors, theatrical actors, in those regions supernal, continue their educational work of translating the ideal into the real, and the emotional of tragedy and comedy into soul-stirring manifestations of mirth, or of love and wisdom.

Justin Hulburd was the cousin of this intellectually able and excellent actor, W. Hulburd, originally from New York, and later well known, and esteemed for his business capabilities and moral integrity in Warren, Ohio; Morris, Ill., and Kansas City, Mo. He now resides in Des Moines, Ia. In 1872 he became a Spiritualist, and his interesting articles have often appeared in the columns of Spiritualist journals.

Strong were the affectional ties between Wallace and Justin. They were like heart to heart brothers in the work of spiritual unfoldment.

What the San Diego Press Said of This Deceased Actor.

The San Diego Evening Tribune and other journals said, in speaking of this death: "The theatrical world has lost one of its best known celebrities, and San Diego county one of its best known characters. To members of the profession and to the theatrical world, Mr. Hulburd was known under the name of Justin Robinson, a name which he assumed for stage purposes. Though a number of years have passed since he appeared behind the footlights, his name is still remembered by the older members of the theatrical profession. Up to the time of his retirement in 1879, he was considered one of the foremost actors on the American stage. He was very small in stature until after the War of the Rebellion, when, as reported, he grew in height, twelve or fourteen inches. He was considered in some directions a prodigy. Many actors as well as his special friends, looked upon him as a sort of mystic, with psychic phenomena peculiar to the Highlands of Scotland."

His Peculiar Origin—Hears Spirit Voices.

He was born in Perth, Scotland, to Justin Hulburd, a Jesuit priest, and Mary Elizabeth Stuart, a grand-niece of Prince Charles Edward Stuart, known in history as the pretender to the British throne. His father's mother was Margaret Hulburd, a lineal descendant of Robert Bruce, king of Scotland. Though knowing all this in his riper years, he cared nothing for his distant relation to royalty. He was, in fact, so intensely American in his nature, that he greatly disliked, even in his life's prime, to have his kingly blood descendancy mentioned.

When this child Justin was ten months old, he was taken for various reasons, to live with Sir John Robinson, a Scotchman of great wealth. He remained with Sir John until he was in his sixth year. Mrs. Robinson was a rigid Roman Catholic, and repeatedly called the little boy a "witch," because he "pretended to see ghosts" and describe them. He was considered premature and strange. When he described the scenes and the BRIGHT SPIRITS HE SAW IN THE AIR, he would be whipped for lying. Still he insisted in childish innocence, that he saw the sights and heard the voices. While Sir John Robinson, caring nothing for religion, made a pet of little Justin, Mrs. Robinson pronounced him a "freak."

As a sample of the physical manifestations occurring in his presence, it is related that when the family had arranged for a May-day festival, the carriage at the door, the coachman on his seat, Lady Robinson and little Justin seated, and Sir John Robinson stepping in and signalling the coachman to start on, the horses walked right out from under and THROUGH THEIR HARNESSSES, every buckle remaining firmly buckled. Lady Robinson screamed aloud, that this was another proof that boy was a "little wizard, and ought to be killed."

Sir John then, to save Justin's life, took him up into the mountains for a year, and later, this little waif was put in charge of Mr. John Fuller and family, Mr. Fuller being a cousin of the child's mother. These parties, solemnly promising to care for him, removed to New York. "Many times invisible influences would take him from the home of the Fullers, and he would be found in the streets, preaching or singing. He was taken up two or three times as a truant by the police, for obstructing the by-ways where the crowds gathered to hear him. It was said that he "was never two days alike." He was a mystery.

His Exceedingly Weird Career.

When eight years of age, he wandered, doubtless obsessed, from home, and went to the Five Points of New York (equaled in depravity only by the Seven Dials in London) where he was found by Mr. Fuller, staying in a cellar with low people, telling fortunes. Again, and later, he was found at the Five Points with the Rev. Mr. Pease, a Methodist preacher, exhorting and singing. His voice was as sweet and musical as a seraph's. He sometimes appeared on the rostrum as a girl and sometimes as a boy. He had the perfect delicate and well-rounded form of a woman, but was a man; two in one.

At ten years of age he made his debut at the National Theater in New York, as a singer and dancer. In future years he traveled this country, England, Wales and Scotland as an actor in different companies. And once, because of his high Scotch ancestry and clairvoyant gifts, he was introduced to Queen Victoria. He was often with the lesser royalty.

At times he was on the stage as an actor, with Edwin Forest, George Knight, Charlotte Cushman, Laura Keane, Hooley, Florence and others, and all this time he was conscious of influences from the invisible realms of existence.

He was Greatly Admired.

As a child, Justin was very high-tempered and yet, exceedingly affectionate. He knew nothing of restraint or fear. He was admired for his beauty, his wit, his wise sayings; his far-off gaze at times exciting inexpressible wonder. For years he was attired alternately as boy and girl, and when attaining the years of manhood, he was by actual measurement, but four feet, two inches tall. He had a sweet, attractive, and winning way; his eyes were deep blue; his skin a delicate white; hair, long and auburn colored, while his weird appearance and his temperamental tendencies made him understandable only upon the principles of mediumship.

He used to be asked, even by the etaid Quakers of Philadelphia, to go into "that state"—they did not say spiritual trance, but that "state"—and describe the visions or pictures that he saw.

Though small in stature, he did much to make the stage of the Anglo-Saxon world a great engine for amusing and educational progress—a stirring agency for culture and artistic education.

As an actor, he was gifted with great versatility, with the richest imagination, with marked intuition, and a most retentive memory. His life was one of these strange, yet conspicuous successes of the last century, and all this because of his high and worthy ideal, aided by inspiring invisible intelligences.

He Becomes a Private Detective.

When the rebellion broke out he was on the stage with a company of his own in the South, but ardently in love with American institutions and the glorious Union, he hurriedly left for Washington, where, knowing a number of statesmen and senators, he was introduced to President Lincoln, becoming after a little while, seemingly infatuated with him, made him his private detective, a trustworthy spy to cross and re-cross the lines leading into Southern camps, getting hold of maps, drawings and communications, and bringing them through varied wily devices to Lincoln. The White House was open to him at all hours.

He once got into Gen. Longstreet's headquarters in the guise of a poor little boy selling peanuts and searching for his poor father. Upon telling Longstreet in tender tones that he could sing and dance some, some officers were invited into the camp in the evening to witness an exhibition of his singing Scotch songs, and dancing. The officers were delighted; but during the night he slipped valuable papers and maps into his pockets, and hurriedly crossing fields, streams of water, and by-roads, LED BY A VOICE—MARK THIS, LED BY A VOICE—he escaped, reaching Washington. Prices were put upon his head—once twenty-five thousand dollars. He was several times condemned to be shot or hanged, but always escaped, aided by the "guiding voice." He was informed after the war that this directing voice was the voice of Washington.

Conceived and Planned in the Spirit World.

For centuries had angels, inhabitants of eternity, yet once mortals, seen the curse of slavery—seen human beings torn from their homes, separated and sold in slave markets like the cattle of the field. The sympathies of these exalted ones were touched. Their advanced natures, being aflame with the love for humanity, they said slavery must end; the colored man SHALL BE FREE, and we must inspire and raise up men and women to break the chains of the oppressed, and usher in the long-desired era of emancipation. Among those wisely chosen for this end was Justin Hulburd. Accordingly he was brought to this country from his Scotland home, and kept in that physical dwarf-like condition by these mighty intelligences, by invisible impelling forces which move nations, to be the better detective in aiding and hastening the Proclamation of Emancipation.

His Body Commences to Elongate.

This feat accomplished, and 4,000,000 of human beings made free by Lincoln's presidential pen-strokes, and Justin's work done as a stark detective, this wonder, this seeming miracle in his organization, began to manifest itself, though now nearly forty years old. His physical body began to grow, to literally elongate, till it lengthened upwards ABOUT FOURTEEN INCHES; and further, a full beard, becoming a vigorous manhood, made its attractive appearance.

Is there anything impossible? Who can set bounds to nature? Is there any limitation to spirit power, the proper conditions being given? There are no miracles in the sense of the seventeenth century churches, or the eighteenth century theological schoolmen.

Clairvoyant, Clairaudient and Had Visions.

After the closing of the rebellion, he returned to the stage for a few years, but failing health came, caused, as his best friends believed, by invisible intelligences, that they might do a more spiritual work through his finely tuned organization.

He was clairaudient and clairvoyant. He had visions. He prophesied, and was entranced, both consciously and unconsciously. His friends, E. W. Hulburd, Dr. F. D. C. Meyer, and others inform me that for several years, he was seldom entirely free from the overshadowing influences in various stages of unfoldment. Similar instances are confirmed by history. The distinguished Quaker, George Fox, FREQUENTLY HEARD SPIRIT VOICES. Upon the authority of Cleero, Scipio Africanus declared that he was guided by spiritual beings, and at times conversed with them. Mohammed, hearing the voice, spoke with an angel, when tarrying for a season in the deserts of Arabia. His mission, like that of Jesus and Gautama Buddha, was angel inspired. Socrates had his demon or spirit guide. Dante had his. Joan of Arc heard heavenly voices. These and similar manifestations, have been the demonstrations of immortality all along the fading ages.

A Book to Be Published.

In the early eighties Justin lectured upon Spiritualism in Kansas City for a year or more. While in this city, he was told by his guardian intelligences to move to California, where he would do his final work. They selected Des Moines, a lovely retreat, in a grove of live oaks in the mountains—a grove that would charm the Grecian gods. Here he received communications for two or three volumes, his cousin, E. W. Hulburd being his scribe. It has been my privilege to hear a number of these communications read. They are plain, positive, off-hand; in a word, unique. Now in preparation, they will appear in book form for personal and spiritual assimilation.

Unexpectedly, suddenly, this noted man passed from his material body, in Des Moines on his birthday, being seventy-three years of age; and agreeably to his expressed wish, his body was cremated.

Shall We Burn or Bury Our Dead?

During all the historic ages there have been but three methods of disposing of human bodies: Burying, burning, or exposing them in trees or upon wall-enclosed towers, "Towers of Silence," as the Persians of Bombay, India, term their consecrated places for leaving the perishing forms of their loved to be devoured by birds, or to be disintegrated by rains and storms, and then scattered by passing winds.

Personally, I am strongly in favor of incineration. Our oft-repeated burial services, plainly recognize cremation—"ashes to ashes." Poets have breathed in tenderness, "Peace to thy ashes." Gerald Massey, in a wailing moment, sings: "O! in "Set is the sun of my years,

And over a few poor ashes
I sit in my darkness and tears."
Tennyson, in a more cheerful mood, says:

"And from his ashes may be made
The hearth of his native land."

Ashes and dust, interchangeable terms relate to fire as the rekindling of burned matter. Fire is a symbol of both brightness and purification, hence the phrase, "the baptism of fire." Trees are the mausoleums of their dead leaves, which autumn fires and winds lift to the clouds. Life, conscious life, is comparable to a phoenix rising from the ashes of funeral pyres.

The human body, ever changing, lives largely by combustion. Diseases and fevers are mortal bodies on fire, the wastes constituting the ashes; and incineration at the crematory, literally gives "beauty for ashes," by freeing the spirit that it may pass unconfined into the endearing zones of earth or the higher Isles of the Blest.

If not wishing to regain the sealed ashes of the dead in the homes of the friends, the burying of them would diminish the area of our cemeteries, reduce the cost of grave-yard plots. Many, in our great cities are denied, because of their poverty, ownership in flower-broadened Mount Hope, Greenwood and Spring Grove cemeteries, and so are forced to lay the forms of their loved ones away in weed-grown yards or Potters' fields.

Burial of Human Bodies Unhealthy.

The moment that a human body is dead the soul-body elements and energies, having left the human-shaped shell, change, disintegrate, and putrefaction begins. The Jews were taught in the Talmud not to even touch a dead body. A corpse should never be kissed. Why kiss a cold cadaver, a shell from which the conscious spirit, like a bird, has flown? Many, the trances being mistaken for death, are doubtless buried alive each year. What can be more horrible? Cremation would obviate this.

We bury the dead, and yet, know that from their slowly decaying, rotting bodies there rises mephitic gases, which, floating over cities, poison the atmosphere the people are compelled to breathe—a most painful thought. Graveyards are most unsanitary visiting places. They should be made beautiful, with roses blooming and wild briars twining around the tomb-stones and then abandoned, only for repairs. None, aglow with the truths of the spiritual philosophy, would think of looking down graveyard, but rather upward, for those called dead.

It is said that over 5,000 acres in the vicinity of New York are used for burial purposes. Brooklyn is fast girdling her city with the graves of the dead, while busy, bustling New York is constantly encroaching on Woodlawn and Calvary by nearing Greentown Ferry. Cipinomat and other cities are reaching out towards the silent tombs of their buried dead. During heavy rains the waters percolate these graves, affecting if not filling cisterns, wells and reservoirs, precluding fevers and deaths.

The Putrefaction of Graveyards.

The air of thickly peopled cemeteries is loaded with germs of disease. The French Pasteur demonstrated that angle-worms lift to the surface countless bacteria from the putrefaction of the dead in graveyards. The mould and the effluence of the dead feeding and fattening the grassy turf, all too often ensnare the thoughtless living, leading to untimely disease and death. Often dead bodies, to increase building lots, are removed from their resting places, and every time a grave is opened a cloud of poisonous effluvia is freed to taint the air or poison the ripening fruits and adjoining waters.

Prof. Bianchi shows that the Mordian plague was produced by the excavations of earth from an old cemetery. In the fourth municipal district of New Orleans, 1853, 452 persons out of 1,000 died of yellow fever, double that of any other section of the city, because of cemeteries in the immediate vicinity. Inhaling poisonous air into the lungs taints the blood and breeds disease and death; therefore cremation, with neither smoke nor smell, nor poisonous vapors is infinitely preferable to the burial of the body.

Buried Alive.

Can there be anything more awful than for a rational mortal awaking to consciousness and finding himself encased in a coffin, breathing, choking with carbon dioxide? Statistics in this and foreign countries show that hundreds each year are being buried alive, the trances being mistaken for death.

Prof. A. Wilder relates the case of the undertaker at Millikan Hill, N. J., who, upon opening the grave of a boy six years old, for removal to a Philadelphia cemetery, found, when the crumbling coffin was opened, that "the body was drawn up in a manner that told the mute story of a horrible struggle. The arms were bent over the skull, one leg was drawn up and the other crossed in such a way as to afford unmistakable evidence that the little sufferer had been hurried off to the grave while yet alive."

An Extremely Sad Case.

Recently in Sandy Creek, N. Y., Mr. Case, a man thirty-five years old, supposed to have died of scarlet fever, was hastily buried. Breathless and seemingly unconscious, he had been pronounced dead by the attending physician. On the 29th of March his father died and when arrangements were made to dig the grave in the family plot, it was found necessary to move the son's coffin several feet. Upon disintering the casket, the grave-diggers found the glass front of the coffin shattered to pieces, and the bottom kicked out and the sides considerably sprung. The lid was then removed and the body of Mr. Vett Case was found resting on its face, with its arms bent at the sides, and in the clenched fists were hand-fuls of hair, showing that most terrible struggles had taken place.

No artist could transfer to canvas, nor tongue describe the anguished horrors of this man, confined and buried alive. Cremation prevents such terrible burial catastrophes. The new Pennsylvania law requiring graves to be dug two feet deeper, is causing the abandonment of cemeteries in favor of crematories.

Rising From the Dead.

The past, molding the weary years, converges in the present. "That which has been, shall be," said the Syrian prophet. Spiritualism, under different names, has illumined all the past centuries; the light increasing with the progress of the ages. The Babylonian soul-group chambers and the Biblical mansions of the old seers were real, substantial and wisely adapted, fitted for the abodes of spirits, angels and gods. These exalted intelligences, ever aflame with love, are continually active in some great educational and redemptive work. They condescend to descend to us to teach, as the professors graciously mingle with their pupils in universities. They delight to educate and uplift. Coming to earth enriches their experiences. They glory in self-sacrifice, knowing that in educating and lifting up others, they become still more highly and divinely exalted.

They delight to give. The infinite superiority of God consists in that he is eternally giving and never receiving. All is life—all in the inmost is energy. Heaven's rest is not idleness. The soul's activities are intensified by the translation from earth. The immortal life, then, is not a dissipating "shell" life, but a conscious social life, where the emancipated soul sweeps onward and upward in wisdom exceeding wisdom and in glory transcending glory through the measureless aeons of eternity.

Spiritualism does not say "good-night" in the hour of death, or in the day of cremation; but rather gives the glad assurance, the irrefragable demonstration, of a most welcome "good-morning" just across the crystal river—a cloudless morning whose sun never sets.

I am sure that I speak the wishes of the kind-hearted and royal-souled Justin, the medium, the actor, the honored detective of Abraham Lincoln, who was himself a Spiritualist, when I say that this gifted soul would see no mourning garments worn, nor would he see doors or caskeys draped in black; but rather would he see homes, cemeteries and crematories made as beautiful as groves in spring-time with the buds and blossoms and all resonant with resurrection songs of music—music that thrills and echoes along the evergreen shores of immortality.

"The world hath felt a quickening breath
From heaven's eternal shore,
And souls triumphant over death
Return to earth once more.

"Our cypress leaves are laid aside
For amaranthine flowers,
For death's cold wave does not divide
The souls we love from ours.

"From pain and death and sorrow free,
They join with us to sing:
'O Grave, where is thy victory,
'O Death, where is thy sting?'"

A CURIOUS PHENOMENON.

A Spirit Wears an Undervest on a Cold Night.

To the Editor:—I have just been reading an article in your paper of January 27, by Eva A. Cassell. She says that all rights and a few more like her might bring some of these OLD IDIOTS to their senses. I personally know an old man who attends these kind of seances often. He told a party he "never knew that the climate could affect a spirit, but on a very cold night, a spirit came from the cabinet to him and she had on an undervest." He was perfectly honest in his belief. I have acquaintances who go to seances and carry candy, flowers, etc., for the controls, and the medium has a fine time with the same. There is no wonder unbelievers ridicule us.

REFLECTIONS FROM DIFFERENT MINDS.

In Which They Allude to the Man Jesus—"That Forged Passage"—"Man by Nature an Atheist."

The Man Jesus.

The hundreds of volumes that have been written designated as the "Life of Christ," do not throw as much light on the subject as the following short paragraph written by Prof. Goldwin Smith of Canada in the New York Sun and contained in Secular Thought, published in Toronto.

"The mighty and supreme Jesus, who was to transfigure all humanity by his divine wit and grace—this Jesus has down. To my mind this fact has no terror. I believe the Legend of Jesus was made by many minds working under a great moral impulse—one man adding a parable and another an exhortation, another a miracle story—and so Jesus represents to us not a man, but the aspirations of many hearts. If one can create a Jesus another can. Our age can. You and I can help in the creation. We can join in making, not a legend, but a new ideal of human nature, figures of a new man, a new message, a new prophecy. All our better thoughts, all our wiser speech, and all our truer deeds shall form parts of this creation, which shall be a gospel to those who come after us."

That Forged Passage.

"Can you give me the reason infidels have for saying that the paragraph in the works of Josephus referring to Christ was manufactured after Josephus' death, or put in to bolster up the creed?" F. D. C. Meyer.

We can give the reasons. Infidels have for rejecting the passage. They are the same reasons which have led learned and intelligent Christians to reject it. Gibbon stated that the passage "was inserted into the text of Josephus between the time of Origen and that of Eusebius," and "may furnish an example of vulgar forgery." Dr. Nathaniel Lardner supports the view of Gibbon. The Christian fathers, Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen never cited this passage in their controversies, although they were well acquainted with the writings of Josephus and would not have overlooked such a favorable testimony to Jesus. The evidence against the passage is summed up by G. W. Foote in his "Crimes of Christianity" under the head of "Pious Forgeries." Mr. Foote says: "The inventive genius of Eusebius first lighted on the passage in the fourth century. He quotes it with an air of triumph, and says that those who doubt the Christian story of Jesus henceforth 'stand convicted of downright impudence.' Tanquill Faber maintained that Eusebius forged the passage himself. A little more care in the composition might have added to its plausibility. It is so foreign to the context that Eusebius was obliged to resort to the supposition that Josephus inserted it after he had finished the work. As a zealous and orthodox Jew, Josephus could not speak of Jesus as 'the Christ,' nor doubt whether it was 'lawful to call him a man,' for the Jews did not believe the Messiah to be God, and the statement that Jesus drew after him many Jews and 'gentiles' is inconsistent with the gospels. The passage is now generally abandoned. Bishop Warburton called it a 'rank forgery,' and a very stupid one too." Dr. Giles also condemns it as a 'forgery interpolated in the text during the third century by some pious Christian who was scandalized that so famous a writer as Josephus should have taken notice of the gospels or of Christ, their subject. And De Quincey, in his essay on the 'Essenes' emphatically says that 'this passage has long since been given up as a forgery by all men not bigotted.' This is a case where infidels do not have to give reasons for rejection or formulate arguments against a pious fraud. They are found ready at hand from the writings of Christians.—People's Press.

Man by Nature is an Atheist.

"After all that has been so plausibly written concerning the 'innate idea of God,' after all that has been said of its being common to all men in all ages and nations, it does not appear that man has naturally any more idea of God than any beast of the field. He has no knowledge of a God at all; neither is God in all his thoughts. Whatever change may afterwards be wrought (whether by the grace of God, or by his own reflection, or by education), he is, by nature, a mere atheist."—Wesley's Sermons, vol. 11, p. 309.

A SPIRIT VOICE.

It Saves the Life of a Little Child.

To the Editor:—I read your paper every week with interest. The many thoughts expressed therein give me new impressions and the glad assurance to delve deeper into that most beautiful of all religions, Spiritualism.

Years ago, before I ever knew anything of this beautiful work, my child lay dying of cholera infantum. The doctor said she could not live. After watching all night for some change, A VOICE bade me get up, and do as directed, and she would recover. I arose, and followed the instructions, against the direct opposition of my family and the physician. My child began to improve from that moment, and soon recovered, and to-day she lives, and joy fills my heart that I have a child who has spread so many beautiful things in my pathway, and who was saved by a spirit's voice.

I was in years past a strict Episcopalian. I lived as the church taught me. I feared a hell and dreaded death. There was a longing for something, I knew not what.

While strolling down the streets of Indianapolis one Sunday afternoon some few years ago, I was impressed to enter the First Church of Spiritualists in this city, and our good Sister Ropp (Amos now) gave messages. She called my daughter by name who had been in spirit life many years, and also the names of others. I was then convinced that spirits do return. My life, my home, my all, seems brighter and better for the thought. I now have no fear of death. I feel as if it will only be like beginning life anew, in a more beautiful and happier world.

Our Ladies Aid of the Progressive Spiritual Church doing nicely. We have a good membership and a few spare dollars in the treasury. On February 27 we will have a night-cap social, when we expect to net a few more dollars.

Brother Will J. Erwood will be with us next Sunday, and dispense the truth of Spiritualism in broadcast. Sister Frances Kuder, last evening gave many messages on slates, and Brother Kingsley a few remarks and messages that were well received. Both were gladly welcomed.

DEAFNESS AND CATARRH CURED

BY "ACTINA"

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. As the passages become clogged by catarrhal discharges, the action of the vibratory bones is stopped. All these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The throat ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of specialists to always cure these cases. Actina is a scientific cure for most forms of deafness and catarrh. It is demonstrated every day by the "Actina" treatment. The vapor currents generated by the "Actina" pass through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the catarrhal obstructions as they pass through the tubes and loosen up the bones, (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them responsive.

"Actina" has seldom failed to stop the ringing noises in the head. We have known people troubled with this distressing symptom for years to be completely cured in a few weeks by this wonderful invention. "Actina" also cures the griping, colic, indigestion, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headaches, and all other troubles that are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. "Actina" is sent on trial post-paid. Write us about your case. We will give free advice and a complete proof of cures. Now is the time to extend the circulation of The Progressive Thinker. It will contain Occult and Spiritualistic news with which every one should be familiar. No other paper published on this earth contains such a vast amount of matter so well adapted to

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best ascertained thereby. Many of the statements uttered in an article, however, are diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to be ready for insertion in the paper, should be written plainly with ink, on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE, that all items for this space must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. We will not do so that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

J. M. Address J. M. White, P. O. Box 66, Peculiar, Mo."

Mrs. L. A. Kilbuck writes: "The Golden Rule Spiritualist Society has been largely attended for the past three Sundays. January 28, Dr. C. A. Burgess gave a highly interesting talk, his subject being that everyone must stand on their own merits, for their own future life. Messages were given by Mrs. Susie Thompson and Mrs. Nora E. Hill, all of which were recognized. Sunday evening, Feb. 4, the speaker was our pastor, Mrs. Nora E. Hill, talking for her subject the first two verses of the Psalm of Life, which convinced the audience that life was an empty dream to read and earn. Owing to something unforeseen, Mrs. Alice Sexsmith, our assistant pastor, was detained at home on Feb. 11, and our pastor was compelled to fill the vacancy; and her subject was the 'Ship of Life,' and she held the closest attention of the audience. Convincing messages were given at the meeting, both afternoon and evening. The speaker for Feb. 18, will be the pastor, Mrs. Nora E. Hill, and on Feb. 25, will be the Hon. Charles Hughes. All are welcome to attend our meetings, at O'Donnell's College Hall, between Park Avenue and Washington Blvd. The society will also give a package party, Saturday evening, at Mrs. Nora E. Hill's, 705 W. Madison Street, March 3. No charge; only bring a package to be auctioned off. The society is steadily growing. The membership now reaches over sixty. All are invited to the package party."

On extending the right hand of fellowship to Rev. Mary Stein, recently ordained by the State Spiritual Association, Midwest Convention, at Detroit, Mich., Dr. C. W. Burrows said: "Dear beloved, only the angels in heaven can know with what anxious care and solicitude I have watched over your spiritual unfoldment these many long years, and rest assured that whatever has been my care, the joy of the present moment to me you have a thousand fold. The ancient custom now about to be observed and which has fallen to my lot, is replete with holy memories. I now, therefore, extend to you the right hand of fellowship, and greet you with a royal welcome into the holy ministry of the Gospel of Spiritualism. God bless you, and the word of the spirit, its light with unswerving virtue clad, its blade with justice tempered, and its point with love anointed. Go forth to light valiantly for the cause of truth and right. Defend, we beseech thee, Father of all mercies, this thy servant; guard, guide and protect her to her life's end. Amen."

Mrs. Lillie de Loux writes that the "First Spiritual Temple held its second meeting last Sunday evening, and it was very encouraging indeed. It is the desire of the management to make these meetings a grand success in every way. Visiting mediums are always welcome and invited. At our meeting last Sunday, two other mediums, and myself, presented what the spirits gave us and all of the tests were recognized. We shall endeavor to have some good speakers during the season, and always have good music. Sunday, February 25, we shall have with us a special feature, Miss Ella Carr, Hampton, Maine, who will read several classical selections, and Miss Shontes, who will give a reading fitting our cause. Both of these ladies are Spiritualists, and are a credit to the cause of Spiritualism. Everyone who comes to these meetings may expect that good evidence of the truth of the claims of Spiritualism will be given."

Harrison D. Barrett has been active at work in the West. He lately lectured in Kansas City. His address there is 1115 Cleveland Avenue, Kansas City, Mo., in care of F. D. Atkins.

Mrs. S. S. Rockhill writes: "I would not do without The Progressive Thinker for many times its price. How I wish that all Spiritualists would avail themselves of the benefit of it. It is a book that every Spiritualist should have. It would be educational and keep them in touch with the progress of the world in the realm of advanced thought."

Thos. S. Kizer writes from Decatur, Ill.: "Mrs. Lillie Bell who has been with us for a month returned to her home in Chicago the 10th inst. She is not only a gifted medium, but a devoted worker in the cause of Spiritualism. She will find a hearty welcome here at our city papers gave her that title in speaking of the funeral she conducted on the 8th inst. We feel that she has been a great help to our society. Her guides are certainly entertaining. We think any society will be greatly benefited by her ministrations. While here she endeavored herself to all with whom she came in contact. She will find a hearty welcome any time she may find it convenient to visit us again."

February 12, Harrison D. Barrett, President of the National Spiritualists Association, lectured at I. O. O. F. Hall, No. 938 Massachusetts Street, Kansas City, Mo.

The Davenport Times of late date, says: "Mrs. Sarah K. Henderson, 326 South Putnam Building, Davenport, desires to make the following statement regarding her recent arrest: 'The members of the Metaphysical Club, of which I am president, desire that I should publish this letter through your courtesy, in order to

The Ingersoll Edition.

The edition containing the celebrated address by Col. Ingersoll on "The Devil," has received widespread attention. Orders are still coming for it at the rate of about 2,000 each week. The lectures by Mrs. Longley, Judge North and Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, and the poems in the same paper will also be read by at least 200,000. Orders will still be received at one cent per copy. lift the stigma of my arrest by the police and forbidding taken before the mayor on the erroneous charge of fortune telling. My case was postponed, and evidently dropped. As a member of the Mississippi Valley Spiritual Association and a missionary of the Iowa State Association, both chartered societies, I say that my arrest was due to want of knowledge and false information; on that account I cast no reflection on the mayor, but humbly suggest that the police authorities make themselves better acquainted with the state charged against them, and the mistakes. I hope your readers will be pleased to know my position, and see clearly that I am innocent of any wrongdoing."

Charles Dawburn, the California philosopher, is rapidly recovering from his sickness, we are glad to learn. We now expect he will attain the age of one hundred, and continue to write articles to the Spiritualist press.

Mrs. E. M. Hull writes from Marvin, Kansas: "I would like to correspond with societies that need a speaker. I am also ready to make engagements for camp work for the ensuing season. Am at liberty after May 6."

Dr. Dobson-Barker writes: "The Spiritualists of San Jose, Cal., had a genuine treat last week, a seven-day visit from the veteran worker, Moses Hull, president of the Morris Pratt Institute, Whitewater, Wis. He was accompanied by his ever faithful and loving companion, Mattie Hull, who has given to the world many beautiful songs. Her life is full of inspiration and psychic work. The First Spiritual Union of San Jose held an all-day meeting at Hale's Hall, Feb. 11, in honor of Moses and Mattie Hull. The lyceum at 10 a. m., was very interesting, many of the children giving quotations from 'Wayside Jottings,' of which Mrs. Hull is the author, during the 11 a. m. conference. There were many short speeches in which worthy tributes were given to the two Ms. A banquet was served in the dining-room at 12:30 p. m. Then two hours were spent in social visit. At 2:30 p. m. the hall was filled to hear the world-famed Biblical scholar, Moses Hull. Again at 7:30 p. m. he spoke to a large audience. On Monday evening he gave an address at the parlors of the Unitarian church of this city in the interest of the Morris Pratt Institute. February 14, at 8 a. m., the above parties took their leave of San Jose, destination Portland, Oregon. They leave behind many friends who wish them a safe and speedy journey. Mrs. S. Cowell of Oakland, will fill the platform of the First Spiritual Union, Feb. 18."

BEAUTIFUL TRUTHS.

Rev. Minot J. Savage in a Late Sermon Gives Utterance to Truths in Harmony With the Teachings of Spiritualism.

To the Editor:—I have just read your editorial in a late issue of The Progressive Thinker, referring to a Chicago weekly paper on the quotation from a recent sermon of Rev. Minot J. Savage. A number of New York daily papers on Monday, the day after the discourse was given, made the same quotation, and in some cases transposed words so the wrong sense was given in each case.

The sermon was "The Companionship of Friends," the third in the present series of "Things Worth Living For."

I had the great pleasure of hearing that grand sermon, and I remember it well, for that Sunday it was very hard to get a seat, and camp chairs had to be used in the aisles. I will give the last few sentences of this sermon, and in Dr. Savage's own words: "A man can work better because he has a friend. If I know somebody expects me to do good work, I can do it. I will do it for his sake, for her sake. I will be worthy of my energy. I will be patient. I will toil. I will seek to the very utmost of my ability for the sake of the person who loves me, to do the best I can."

"Then it makes it easier to believe in the spiritual facts and forces of the world."

"Friendship—what is it? It is not money, it is not a house, it is not a horse, it is not a carriage, it is not a social position; it is none of these material things. It is invisible, it is spiritual, it is divine, and yet, it is the mightiest thing in the world. It is more than all these things. It is at the top. Spirit dominates, spirit shapes and controls the material. Spirit is, and spirit is divine. And then it makes it easier to believe in immortality."

"I cannot think that God would guide and lead this universe through millions of years until man appeared, and then take all the pains to lift him from the brute to where he has come to be today, give him all these fine and high qualities of love and pity, and then let us all go."

"I believe that friendship has the power in it to leap over the GULF OF DEATH and start out on endless paths, and then take all the pains to lift him from the brute to where he has come to be today, give him all these fine and high qualities of love and pity, and then let us all go."

"I believe that when set free in the hereafter that people who belong together, will be together; and if this is what heaven means I agree with it."

"Heaven does not mean getting inside of certain walls or past certain boundaries. Heaven to me means the people I love. Heaven means waiting for the companionship of the soul—waiting for a friend, and so, it seems to me that that alone is heaven."

I WOULD CHOOSE ANY WALL THAT THE WORLD HAD NEVER DREAMED OF WITH THE COMPANIONSHIP OF ONE I LOVE, TO BE SAFE WITH HER AT LAST I WOULD TURN MY BACK ON ANY HEAVEN OF WHICH I HAVE EVER READ COULD I NOT FIND HER THERE.

These would wander through the spaces between the stars for millions and millions of years, endure any sorrow, any trouble, any pain so I might feel at her feet at last and feel her hand touching my hand."

This was one of the most spiritual sermons I have ever heard from a churchman. It was a beautiful, orthodox busy-body can preach a spiritual discourse then it will be time for them to retire."

ATTACKS LICENSE LAW FOR MEDIUMS.

Attorneys Robertson and Connor Say City Ordinance Is Invalid—Dictationaries Are Quoted—Call Spiritualism Learned Profession—Justice Hinkle Reserves Decision.

In their efforts to free Mrs. Lundeen her counsel were armed with large bound volumes, which proved to be the Universal dictionary, law dictionary, and a formidable array of legal tomes.

"I will show that this city has absolutely no right to charge a license fee for any learned profession, and that its ordinance for such charge is invalid," said Attorney Connor when he gained the floor.

"I contend that this lady," pointing to Mrs. Lundeen, "is a professional person. There is no authority under our state law to license a profession. A profession, dictionary says, is a knowledge of the learned arts. The supreme court of this state has decided two cases ruling against such effort to collect license fees. One of these cases was that of a Christian Science nurse, who tried to compel a horse-shoer to take out a license and pass an examination, and the other case was where an effort was made to have a man running a dentist's business to take out a license, although the man running the business was employing men who had licenses. You cannot have a Christian Science nurse, cannot interfere with liberty of conscience, and therefore why should you try to interfere with this lady?"

"We contend that this woman is doing an illegitimate business," replied Mr. Edge. "This law is merely to protect the people against impostors."

Mr. Robertson Discourses.

"If this woman is an illegal institution the city can not tax her and take a profit from the illegal business she is alleged to be carrying on," declared Mr. Robertson. "My discourse, which is an answer to the one matter, will be both philosophical and legal."

"There is no such thing as witchcraft, and there being no such thing, witchcraft has no place before this court. If the business of this client is a profession the city has no right to collect a license from it, and if the business is not a profession and is unlawful, every one has a right to impose a license and profit by such unlawful acts."

"If this medium lady client possesses the God-given right of second sight no law can be passed to take away from her those faculties or to deny her the right of that higher intellectuality. I will not remember that I am a lawyer, but I will remember that I am a human being, and I will defend her as I would myself."

"Reading from the Universal dictionary, which I hold in my hand, under the head of spirit rappings, I find that there is such a thing as circulating mediums. The dictionary says: 'A person who claims to be a medium, and who does the complaining say whether this lady is a circulating medium. I guess she is a circulating spirit, if she sends back and forth messages between the dead and the living.'

Spiritualists Are Feeding.

"In the past centuries Spiritualists were punished severely, and I find by Anderson's law dictionary that James L., in 1603, caused a law to be passed that Spiritualists should not be fed. We have advanced from those days, however, and our Spiritualists are now feeding."

"It is not pleasant to say that this city has no right to pass a law licensing the job of communicating with the dead, and I say, from the days of the blue laws, such cases as this have been laughed out of court. What right has this city to fine this lady $5 every quarter for passing on the power of second sight. I am told that if a child is born with a veil over its eyes it is sure to have this power, and it should be respected; and I wish to say to this court that if a law like this were in vogue Dowd and 'Doc' McIntyre could be taxed out of business for their wonderful vision, and then come to them Joseph Smith told the United States senate that he had a vision that polygamy must cease, and you never heard of the senate fining him for having the vision. Some people of course, would believe women like my client a fake, but there is no more right for this belief than the belief of the allopah that the homoeopathy is a fake. This woman says she can aid persons by communicating with the dead. It would be absurd and wrong to make her pay a license for this wonderful ability."

The court, reserved decision until Monday. The Spiritualists packed around the courtroom with tracts and other documents at the end of the proceedings. Mr. Robertson asked the court to file the documents. Everybody looked happy but Major Gwydir. The Spokesman-Review, Spokane, Wash.

MARY ANN CAREW.

Wife, Mother, Spirit and Angel.

By Carlyle Peterslee.

This most beautiful story of the experiences of a young wife and mother taken from her home on earth to her home in the spirit world, is told in such a realistic way that the one is carried away with the sweet beauty and naturalness of it. It makes the other world appear very near to us. This book has been a great comfort to many weary hearts who have lost mother, wife or babies. Price, neatly bound in cloth, $1.

WORK AT BUFFALO, N. Y.

A Worker Expresses Her Appreciation of Kindly Attention.

Being at home again for a short time preparatory to beginning missionary work in Wisconsin, I have a little leisure that is filled with reflections of the past two months in Buffalo, N. Y., where my stay was made as one long holiday through the many kindnesses bestowed upon me by every member of the society I served.

I was entertained at the hospitable home of Mr. and Mrs. August Ey, where no means of comfort are lacking, but where to me could one know every comfort was doubled in value through their insisting that I send for my son from whom I had been separated since the first of October, 1905. Nor can I forget how my friends were welcomed, among whom were people from Watertown who visited me during this time. When I say that my entertainment there afforded me as much as I could have enjoyed in my own home, I do the matter but faint justice.

But all was kindness though shown in various ways. Presents, flowers, letters of congratulation and appreciation, among which was one from President R. A. Hoyt that I prize very highly because of its sincerity.

During the fair, many chances on different articles were taken by my friends in my name, and in one instance I drew a large bust of Hiawatha, the lucky number having been taken by Mrs. Nellie Whitcomb for my benefit. I was even spared the trouble of shipping to my home, by Mrs. Dr. J. R. Matteson, who had it crated to insure safe shipment.

The banquet at Mrs. Dr. Matteson's given in my honor and to which were present the entire official board and some friends of the society, with all its attending labor seemed no effort at all for our happy hosts, Mrs. Matteson, and her daughter, Mrs. Nellie Whitcomb.

At nearly every meeting in the temple, I was made to feel grateful to some one for special musical, literary or numbers of mediumistic ability, added to the regular form of service, while, flowers were always in evidence and to them attached cards on which were written the kind sentiment of the writer.

About the nicest thing I ever saw in flowers was a basket that was brought me to the temple the last Sunday night of my engagement, by friends of the society. Every touch of its design simply beggared description, and in this one matter alone I can draw from the memory of it fragrance for a lifetime.

I wish I could find language to express even a portion of the strength I derived from these forms of thought for if I could, the world at large would know how truly earnest are the people of Buffalo and how it all others could do likewise, they would be equally successful in keeping the banner of our noble cause pure and unstained.

The Grand Work The Progressive Thinker Is Doing Is Fully Appreciated—The Interest Is Great.

To the Editor:—I beg to acknowledge, with thanks, receipt of the 100 copies of your paper containing Ingersoll's lecture on "The Devil." As promised you, also, enclosed herewith, please find an order for four dollars to pay four yearly subscriptions. I shall continue to do some missionary work for you, and I hope to be able to send you some more names in the near future.

Those 100 copies went like hot cakes, and request was made with each one given, and how it is passed on to some one else good. One man walked four miles to see me in the evening, after his day's work, to ask if I could let him have two or three copies to distribute among his neighbors. He said that he lived in a Free Methodist district, practically hemmed in by people to whom he was a free Methodist, and he was a veritable revelation. I gave him four copies and he assured me he would do good work with them. I hope soon to add his name to your list of subscribers also.

I am pleased to watch the healthy GROWTH OF YOUR PAPER, to see it opening up new roads and liberating thought, exposing the cause of right and liberty; and while I am not blessed with an abundance of this world's goods, I wish to be counted among your earnest supporters and well wishers. If I may not be able to help as some others do, I can be like the girls had a foot-race and his sweatshirt entered the contest. He said: "Go it, Sal; I'll hold you back." I can cheer.

MORE FAKE MATERIALIZATION.

As Given in San Francisco, Cal.

To the Editor:—While people in many other parts of the country are being uncoined by bogus materializations, it is well to mention the possibility of there being one of that kind in the city of San Francisco, Cal., judging by what a friend of mine and one who is a staunch and old-time Spiritualist, has just been telling me. He and wife, at the earnest solicitations of a friend of theirs, attended a materialization seance lately in the above named city. This gentleman and his wife declare that what they saw under the name of materialization was nothing more or less than the alleged medium, "logged" up to suit the occasion, and that, too, in such a clumsy manner that most anyone could not help but see that it was fraud, pure and simple, and one of the darkest sorts of abuses upon our philosophy.

I am writing this communication with the hope that some interested Spiritualists in San Francisco may go and see for themselves, and try if possible to put a stop to such deceptive work. I will furnish anyone who writes, the street number, where and by whom they are being held. Address me at General Delivery, Oakland, Cal. D. SIBERT.

NOTES FROM A WORKER.

Who Is Now Lecturing in Hamilton, Ontario.

Several months have rolled around since I have written anything regarding my spiritual work. During January I lectured in Toledo, Ohio, to very good audiences indeed, which increased in numbers from start to finish, and with a "God bless you and come again," I left them for Hamilton, Ont., where I am now serving a two months' engagement. The society here is very active and convenient hall, centrally located, the best of officers, and the president is a gentleman who thoroughly understands his business, making it very pleasant for the speaker, as he assists in giving best conditions for good work, as do all connected with the organization.

Last evening I was agreeably surprised when the president of the First Spiritual Philosophical Society of Detroit, Mich., of which I was pastor for ten years, put in his appearance. He and his faithful wife were with me nearly two weeks in my own home before his departure for this part of the spiritual vineyard. I was more than delighted to meet them here among strangers, still working in his own way to aid and advance the cause of the higher spiritualism.

Yesterday I was reading Brother Hudson Tuttle's article regarding the transition of his daughter, and he will never know how that article cheered me in my loneliness since the departure of our daughter-in-law, who had taken the place of a daughter in my affections, and without doubt thousands of others were comforted in like manner.

God bless Hudson Tuttle in his efforts to enlighten humanity regarding Spiritualism.

Another thing I regret is that so few Spiritualists realize what they are losing by not subscribing for the best Spiritualist paper published in the United States, which gives the cream of everything to feed the soul upon. We may differ in opinion regarding certain things, but at last we know the agitation of the right is the beginning of wisdom, and we will agree to disagree; but one thing I am determined to do and that is to place in every home possible The Progressive Thinker.

I shall endeavor to do my spiritual work here as elsewhere with a view of co-operating with the forces for the uplifting of humanity.

From present indications we expect to celebrate the anniversary of Modern Spiritualism in Hamilton this year, so as to convince all that Spiritualism as a truth has come to stay, and with the aid of the best talent procurable in the society and the co-operation of the spiritual forces, I will succeed.

From here I go to Washington, D. C., for April, which completes my engagements for the season. Anyone desiring my services for future engagements will kindly write me during February and March, at 7 Nightingale street, Hamilton, Ont., or my permanent address, 411 Vermont Avenue, Detroit, Mich.

NEW ERA CAMP, OREGON.

An Announcement by President G. C. Love.

The First Spiritual Religious Association of Clackamas county, Oregon, will hold its camp-meeting at New Era, Oregon, from July 7 to July 28, inclusive.

The managers of the camp-meeting will do everything possible to make the meeting one long to be remembered as a grand, good camp-meeting in which lofty ideas of Truth will find utterance, and good proofs of spirit return will be given.

Come and visit our meetings during its session, and realize what true brotherhood means. You may catch the love message of some one dear to you in the realm of spirit.

We are in correspondence with the H. S. D. Barrett, president of the N. S. D. and hope to have him with us as our lecturer. He was with us during a part of the camp-meeting of the year 1905. We refer any inquirers concerning our camp work of last year to Brother Barrett, and feel sure the coming camp-meeting will be as good, and maybe better than the last one.

As president of the association, I shall do all in my power to make the meeting a success, for my soul is in the work. I shall have full charge of the hotel, and plenty to eat, and served in good style, will be my motto.

We will be in better condition to accommodate the people this year than we were last, and as it takes crowds to make a big meeting of any kind, we want them at our camp-meeting in July coming.

Surely no lover of camp ground is found anywhere than ours at New Era. The water is pure and healthy, shade—well, it can't be beat.

THOUGHTS FROM THE ROCKIES.

Does the Spirit Make the Body, or the Body Make the Spirit?

Metaphysics, in the treatise of Aristotle, is considered as a science which investigates the first principles of nature and thought; and as the question, whether the spirit is the maker of the body or vice versa, which was sent by J. T. Dow, and answered by our Brother Hudson Tuttle in the Progressive Thinker, is a vital question, although rather indefinitely stated by the questioner, as he presupposes that either must be the case, I will endeavor to state what spirits for the last thirty-nine years have taught me to the contrary.

In the answer of our worthy brother he states that "the spirit was and is an eternal entity, and is not a part of flesh," which is conceded by most able thinkers. The first definition of entity is "being," and the next, "a real substance." The definition of eternity is "throughout all times, everlasting, without beginning or end of existence." Now, a being without end of existence, and a substance without end of existence, cannot be a physical body in its changeable nature, which on an average does not reach the age of a third of a century. Investigation has also taught that whatever physical body a spirit has been clothed in affects the spirit for a time after passing on to spirit life, like the color of a fruit in a fruit tree, although nearly true to kind, still partakes more or less of the mother tree.

Next, we have tame as well as wild and vicious animals of the same species, so there are also spirits of all degrees engrafted into the physical forms. There are indeed spirits in strong physical bodies, and at times with grit and perseverance inhabiting ignorant or untutored bodies, whom earlier conditions have deprived of learning, but which spurs them on to study in later years; and often the noblest of statesmen have surprised the world with their knowledge and astuteness, which they have been deprived of early training.

Digressing for a moment, and taking a cursory view into phrenology, as an illustration: It is often said that certain organs rule the body, which is entirely a misstatement; but the spirit rules through what organs are most highly developed, like one would view surrounding scenery through a window, and through a clear pane of glass one naturally sees clearer than through an adjoining soiled one; and thus it is with the spirit—it acts out as best it may.

I have in years gone by made use of the expression that there are old, young and middle-aged spirits inhabiting the physical bodies; but I acknowledge was misleading; which I am unlearned as well as more advanced spirits inhabiting physical forms. Age in spirit does not necessarily make the untutored wise, nor the indolent energetic, any more than it does in the human body. The same conditions often cause seeming retrogression in the nature of man. The noble-hearted herder on the plains, the free-hearted sailor and miner, all may live in a country where the elements of war arise and where internal strife in a restless age pervades, and by continued soundings of martial music the gentle nature may be husked and the warlike and discontented element given control.

The dormant animal instinct inherited from ancestors of the remote past may become a ruling passion; and thus we find that age does not necessarily add to human or spirit advancement. As an outgrowth from a lower, by evolution, neither spirit nor man has ceased to be human, nor have we heard of importation of lesser gods from other planets ruling our destiny. Our physical body is but an earth production and ever changing in form and matter, and the spirit is the immortal which I will call soul.

In its spirit body is sometimes within, sometimes standing apart, and at other times surrounding our physical forms, but magnetically linked to said forms while earth-life lasts.

When we consider that neither time nor space is necessarily couched in the spirit world, and that aged spirits after leaving the physical body, even lose form to the clairvoyant eye, and that the same individuality that acts through the physical form here must have had a continuous individuality; and which also brings us face to face with the theory that pre-existence in former earth forms is a possibility.

Simply progressive changes in the destiny of the soul. The life of a tree is its soul or propelling power, which is clothed by cosmic elements. The life could not be clothed without matter, and matter could not grow into form without life; thus we find that the spirit or soul can make the body, although it may be force; and that the body does not make the spirit, but it may be earthly conditions and environments either warp it or add to its advancement.

Man may think himself "master of all he surveys," while in a tornado or seismic convulsion he counts no more than a feather or grain of sand, as the indwelling spirit cannot staunch physical cataclysms. Man is controlled at the present age more by vibratory thoughts from the spirit side of life and by the same force from the earth plane, than by any other surrounding conditions. Earthly conditions inimical to man's best interest can in a majority of cases be avoided, while the subtle unknown forces of vibratory thoughts, which may be felt but not seen, sway the trend of thought in mortal man to-day to a greater extent than understood or generally acknowledged.

A LAWYER'S OUTLOOK.

He Writes From the Wills of Idaho, on the Spiritualist Situation.

To the Editor:—I am still on a lonely island on the banks of the Snake River, and it reminds me of John on the Isle of Patmos, when he received those weird visions that have been so mysterious to our orthodox friends. I can easily imagine him sitting alone on some lone rock, looking out the future some two thousand years, reading the issues of The Progressive Thinker of 1906.

If he had so much pleasure in the anticipation as I have in the participation, he certainly was not only a very happy individual, but a very much amused one as well. It certainly is very amusing to one in "solitude," whose closest friends are the sweet singing birds, the plaintive howling of the coyote, the music of the surging waters of the Snake, to read some of the effusions from the pens of your many contributors.

How hard it is for some of us to get away from a materialistic mode of thinking. It amuses me, and no doubt yourself, to see grown-up people drawing the old apron string closely around them still. I see whole societies of people supposed to be Spiritualists, take a large number of articles from the old clothes or rags of their ancestors, and wearing them into what they call a creed or rule to guide them.

Let me suggest that if they are relic hunters and must have something to worship, that they take a whole chapter and not a verse or part of a verse here and there, a little is good, the whole must be better. Say they take the 38th chapter of Genesis. It is good from first to last, especially the last. Then this man Judah is the ancestor of their much worshiped idol Jesus, and no doubt that the natural law holds good in this as well as in all things in the universe, that like produces like.

Then for a second article in their creed I would suggest the 19th chapter of Judges. It is fine reading for a refined nature, and I would ask all Spiritualists to store up in their minds the last words of said chapter and use them when they read the book called the Bible, viz., "Consider of it, take advice and speak your minds."

I venture to say that not one in a thousand who call themselves Bible Spiritualists or Christian Spiritualists ever read the Bible through. If they did they have never considered of it, or taken advice, and have never spoken their minds, for at the last, you can see by his Satanic Majesty in a fiery pit. For it is certain if they did we would not have such a God as they maintain.

I would like to ask for my own enlightenment, for a definition of their God. I would also like to ask them, is not all worship idolatry? In order to worship must we create by ignorance and superstition in our imagination a being to be worshiped before we can worship? That being may be flesh, brass, wood, stone, or God, it is nevertheless an idol. No kind and loving father or mother wants or wishes their children to bow down and worship them. None but tyrants wish this, and if this is true of the finite, how much more so of the infinite Love. Do you find anywhere in the universe, such a thing as worship, outside of man? Yet everything in the universe moves in perfect harmony, save worshiping man. He and he alone, in various forms of worship, creates discords that are opposites of harmony.

I would like to ask mediums and so-called mediums, in whom do they put their trust? Is it in what they call God, or is it in their spirit guides and the eternal principle that is within themselves?

I add, Clara Watson, Channing Severance, etc., and most of all the editor of The Progressive Thinker. Bless their souls. Long may they live. Spiritualism has a noble, fearless friend in it, a true friend, and it has no adjectives to qualify Spiritualism by. Every adjective detracts.

Spiritualism is philosophy—not a philosophy, but philosophy from which all other supposed philosophies spring. It is the great fountain of truth from which all isms have come clothed in their adjectival garbs of error, ignorance and superstition. Spiritualism needs no clothing. It is truth. Adjectives degrade and enervate.

Let's have the definition of the Spiritualist God. R. GILRAY.

THINE OWN SHALL COME TO THEE

Wearily, so sad and lonely,
On life's dark and tolling way;
Though the path be strewn with sorrows,
And o'er head no sunlight ray;
Though the cheering hope you see,
Yet be sure there's light above you,
And thine own shall come to thee.

Is the sky overcast with shadows?
Dost thou seem to walk alone?
Are the waves of sorrow breaking
At thy feet, with dismal moan?
Is the darkness round thee closing,
Hiding mountain, vale and lea?
There is light beyond the shadows,
And thine own shall come to thee.

Is the heart well nigh to breaking,
With its load of grief and care?
Has the light of day faded,
Leaving nothing but despair?
Are the hours so sad and lonely,
That there's naught of joy to see?
Then a sweet voice says "look upward,
For thine own shall come to thee."

Yes, dear one, the day is breaking,
Shining o'er you distant hills;
Heaven's light the earth is flooding;
How the heart with rapture thrills.
Life's dark shadows fade before it,
As it falls on land and sea;
All thy griefs and sorrows vanish,
When thine own shall come to thee.

CLAIRVOYANT VISIONS.

Interesting Account of Mediumistic Experiences.

To the Editor:—I fortunately am a subscriber to and reader of your valuable paper, The Progressive Thinker, and being a Spiritualist as well, and experiencing at times somewhat strange and not fully understood clairvoyant visions, I believe a brief mention of some of those visions might be of interest to some of the readers of The Progressive Thinker. I will ask you for space in which to have them recorded.

As a preface to my experiences I will say, I am now 32 years of age; was born in Lithuania, coming to this country seventeen years ago, and seeing nothing particularly interesting or inviting in the doctrines of Christianity, and from childhood being a freethinker, as was my father before me, who died when I was six years of age, I naturally could not accept the faith of the Catholic church, a church in which my mother held a membership.

About five years ago I was, through a friend, induced to attend a trumpet seance held in Canton, Ohio. The experience had at this seance put me to thinking more deeply along spiritual lines. Later I visited a trance medium and got some useful information—the names of departed loved ones were given me to be followed with messages from them. Remember, these friends died in my native country and the medium had no means of knowing any of them.

Within two weeks after this sitting some of my spirit friends came to me about the hour of midnight and made their presence known by trying to control me. A little later I began to hear raps in my room and occasionally a voice, also saw forms at times. These manifestations usually took place about midnight. The manifestations were not nightly but periodically.

After a period of a few months I frequently saw spirit friends of a female, but I gave no name. Within a short time thereafter, and usually after midnight, I was shaken in my bed and told to sit up. I began to hear raps in my room and occasionally a voice, also saw forms at times. These manifestations usually took place about midnight. The manifestations were not nightly but periodically.

On one occasion my father and sister, also two others whom I did not recognize, came; my father to the left of the bed, my sister at the foot, and the two strangers at the right side of the bed. I have had many other visits from denizens of the spirit world but it would require too much space to make mention of them. However, I will speak of one more very strange manifestation.

On the night of March 17, 1905, and about 1:30 a. m., I was awakened from a deep sleep through a magnetic thrill or shock that went from my head to my feet. I then appeared to go into a hypnotic or clairvoyant trance seeing as plainly and distinctly as I ever saw an object. I saw a large, round, white object resembling a large spool or reel and was winding thereon a material that resembled white floss. After watching these visitors a short time, each instantly vanished. Then appeared a medium-sized white dog with a few brown spots and with collar and chain, but this, too, soon vanished as did the others. These mysterious manifestations, visions, or whatever you may call them, may have some significance, but as to an explanation of their meaning I am certainly in the dark.

TO THE PSYCHIC CIRCLE.

An Explanation From Dr. Alex Caird.

This effort to bring ourselves and others in closer touch with the spirit world and with each other has been greatly prospered and has accomplished much good. This circle has been established with the intention of publishing all matter pertaining to it in the Cadet Hall Messenger, a quarterly magazine issued by the Lynn Spiritualists Association, but it is evident that such was not the intention of its originators on the spirit side, as within six months it had spread from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and more applications for membership, having been received from Europe, Africa, Turkey, and many other foreign countries.

So many requests for help through thought concentration were sent in that it seemed desirable that some method be devised whereby the members could be informed of cases in particular need of mental assistance, and Brother Francis kindly offered space in The Progressive Thinker for that purpose, but the requests became so numerous that to publish them all was out of the question; it must be very evident to all that some plan must be provided whereby the members can make their wants known and thereby receive spiritual help.

To throw out thoughts in a general way as we are doing, will be tantamount to what O. V. LaBoyteaux has by the power of will we may direct a thought wave with renewed energy in any of all directions, but it is most forcible when directed to a given point, and as it is the mission of the circle to help its members, we wish to adopt some plan whereby our concentrated thought may be directed to those members most in need of its helping power.

As we are preparing to remove to our new home, the next best thing, the circle as at present until that time, when we hope to provide some way to meet all requirements. Please send all applications for membership (which is free, and every one welcome) to the writer.

SOME CRITICAL OBSERVATIONS.

On the Subject of Commercial Mediumship and Theism.

The Progressive Thinker of February 3 contained a most interesting article from Brother H. D. Barrett. I appreciate his kind references to myself, and this article is, first, to explain my position upon commercial mediumship, and second, to briefly review Brother Barrett's position upon Theism.

I take the broad ground that whenever there is a materialistic consideration passed from one person to another for services rendered, or for something of value received, there is commerce in the strictest sense of the word. Therefore, the preacher, lecturer and the medium, receiving compensation for their services are commercialists. And that commerce is perfectly legitimate, provided it is not for the purpose of injury to some one else. Hence, if the money, or any other valuable thing, was for the purpose of procuring a yard or other crime, though it would still be commerce it would be criminally wrong. Hence, mediumship can be perverted into a form of action utterly wrong, which should receive no sort of sanction or countenance from any truth and justice-loving person.

But when mediumship is used in promoting the temporal welfare of the seeker, without injury to any other person, the pointing out of a gold mine, or how to work it, is just as legitimate to true Spiritualism as to describe the glories of the spirit life and world.

But what I most wished to notice in Brother Barrett's article is his very extraordinary positions upon "Theism." He writes: "I think I can make my meaning clearer by contrasting it with Deism." Well, if he has made his "meaning clearer" to anyone, he certainly has not to me. Indeed, I am astonished that a man of his ability and learning should make such a statement as he does. I don't know but I have been an ignoramus all my life, but I don't think so. I have always supposed that I know that the Latin Deum and the Greek Theos meant precisely the same. They are the same. The only difference is the different mode of spelling the word. We use the Latin Deum instead of the Greek Theos, and hence our words Deity and Deism, and unless Brother Barrett is wiser than all the Lexicons, I shall insist upon the identity of their meaning.

The introduction of the names of some distinguished divines is especially inapplicable. Why did he not connect Jefferson, Franklin and Adams with Thomas Paine, their intimate friend and fellow worker, who was a Deist, and contrary to Brother Barrett's statement believed in personal immortality for man, and also that in the future we shall have the fruits of his conduct in this life. His idea of the future was substantially the same as that of the Spiritualists. He did not deny a revelation, but rejected the Bible as that revelation, and pointed to nature as the ample revelation of the Divine character. Impressionism is the Jefferson, Franklin and Adams agreed with him; and Lincoln most certainly did not go beyond him in those particular. To me, Brother Barrett's statement is a distinction where there is no difference.

Theism is not "an all-inclusive term," but one which includes only the belief in one, personal Deity, and has no relation whatever to "an Infinite Principle." What does he mean by an "Infinite Principle?" How can he define principle so as to apply the term "Infinite" to it as an adjective? Is a Principle a Being? If so, how does it "recognize revelation as demonstrated fact?" Is "recognition" possible to anything but a person? If so, how so?

Again, how does it "involve Infinite Intelligence?" Is a Principle intelligent? Intelligence means knowledge, or a being possessing or capable of acquiring knowledge. Does Brother Barrett's Theos "Infinite Intelligence" possess any knowledge? How did they acquire it? Did they know of things and events before they existed? Knowledge is, in itself, finite—limited. There are a great variety of items entering into a knowledge of any one thing or individuality. Are all these distinct items added up to constitute his "Infinite Intelligence?" Are the hairs of our heads all numbered? Can "Infinite Intelligence" number without counting?

Knowledge presupposes some form of sensation, perception and memory. And these are attributes of consciousness, and include a personal center. Has "Infinite Intelligence" these attributes? Does it feel? Does it will or possess volition?

But I must pause in these queries. They, and many more in the same line, show the extreme absurdity of all the pretensions of an "Infinite Intelligence" and of J. S. LOVELAND.

ANOTHER STRANGE OCCURRENCE

Illustrating in a Vivid Manner Spirit Power.

While reading the article in No. 846 of The Progressive Thinker, by Jos. P. Peffer, I was impressed to relate a strange occurrence that I experienced not more than a year ago.

One hot day in the summer I sat outside in a nice, cool shade, reading my favorite newspaper, (The Progressive Thinker). I got drowsy and dozed. I had put my spectacles on when I was seated, and dropped the old case on my side on the grass. In the closed end of the case was a bank check which was folded into a small square and put in there by myself as a safe and secret place, until I would need to cash it. It had been in its hiding place about three weeks prior to this date.

The first I noticed was that I did not doze long. When I awoke I was impressed to look for my check. I peered into the old case but could not see it. I began to feel fidgety, and opened my pocket-knife and split the old scabbard open from end to end.

The check was gone! I called my wife, and told her of my dilemma. She said do nothing for me. The party who gave me the paper was sought out immediately to learn just how the check fared. I had just turned to the phone, when my wife started to the well, saw the check almost directly in front of her, picked it up off the muddy ground—not rolled nor unfolded, but as clean and

IMPORTANT LETTER.

To the Spiritualists of Michigan.

As formerly noticed through the columns of this paper, the M. S. S. A. is now supplied with official missionaries whose time is devoted to the extension of the organization and the cause generally throughout our state. The wisdom of this action was made evident by the sentiment expressed at the mid-winter meeting of the M. S. S. A., just closed at Detroit.

We as Spiritualists cannot afford to lose any opportunity to advance the interests of our cause by placing its beautiful truths, both by precept and demonstration, before the bar of the good judgment of all thinking men and women. There has been too much lethargy among us in the past. We have been too content with the self-satisfaction gained from a knowledge of immortality, a knowledge developed from that hope which springs up in the breast of every child born of woman, a hope that death does not end all.

Every church in the land, the Roman not excepted, is honey-combed with doubt. The majority of those who patiently sit from day to day, and who contribute freely toward their support, are simply tolerant of the teachings of the church, they do not accept them. Where do these belong? What field of all affords the greatest play for these outreaching minds? What religion or science among all the systems in the world offers the greatest return for time, money and efforts expended? From those who are in a position to answer there can be but one response—Spiritualism!

The clergy are fully aware of all the growing doubt, and of the increasing demand for something more than dogma, and which will transcend a vague hope, and they are catering to that demand.

Why don't we Spiritualists respond more readily to this demand? We have been too self-centered. In a word we have been too selfish, gratifying our own demands and hiding our lights. Let us awake and grasp the opportunity that offers itself. If we cannot afford to employ the best talent, let us employ the best we can afford. The nobles of the earth and the churches afford for demonstrating immortality.

We have been employed by the M. S. S. A. for the object of aiding in carrying the message of immortality into the homes and hearts of your neighbors. We are at your service. We will hold public meetings, and also give seances for your friends who are loth to attend public meetings. We will help you to get upon your feet again as an organization; if you are not already so, we will help you to organize a society. We will interest your neighbors. We will go to their homes and ask them to come and see you, and attend your meetings, and they will appreciate it; they will receive us well, and many of them will come. If you want us, send for us and do it now, that we may arrange our dates to accommodate you. All mail addressed to our home will reach us wherever we may be. Don't ask us to stay more than one month, as others need us too. We prefer shorter engagements for the sake of others. Finally, will you co-operate with us in our efforts to advance the grand cause we all love so much?

bright as when I folded and put it away.

Take notice: The girl help we then said, while we were worrying, was innocently scrubbing off the porch, and had just finished when Mrs. C. picked the precious morsel from the wet and muddy clay where the dirty suds had been swept not ten minutes before.

The next communication we had from our unseen friends explained all. A dear aunt and two cousins of mine who had been on the other side many years, told me they had visited me as I snoozed, knew I enjoyed a friendly joke, and extracted the check, and had dropped it only a few seconds before it was found.

A critic may say it could easily have been drawn out of the case when I pulled out my glasses, and have been tossed by the wind to where it was found, and to have just lit there as my wife passed and saw it. Not so. To have got there in that way it must traverse from where I sat reading and dozing, 26 feet west, turn at right angle the corner of the house, then go 30 feet south, and turn another right angle at that corner, and proceed at least 15 feet further to where it was picked up off the wet ground.

A SPIRIT VISITS HIM.

Had Vision of a Relative at Time Latter Died in Germany—Frederick Wendt's Story—While Asleep, His Mother Seemed to Sit at His Bed-side at a Time Which a Letter From His Fatherland States She Died, in Preussen Pommern.

As related by a Utica (N. Y.) paper, early in a morning of the latter part of January, Frederick Wendt of 60 Hicks street had a dream. At least he now concludes it was a dream, although at first he believed that he had been awake and that the form of his mother came before him, and it talked to him as she did when he was a child, and back in his native home in Preussen Pommern, Germany.

He says he remarked to what seemed to be his mother how natural she looked, and that she didn't seem to have changed any since he had left his fatherland. Then he heard his mother say that she felt good, and that it was right that she should look well. He said to her, "What are you doing?" and she said, "I am doing nothing, but I am waiting for you to come." He said, "What field of all affords the greatest play for these outreaching minds? What religion or science among all the systems in the world offers the greatest return for time, money and efforts expended? From those who are in a position to answer there can be but one response—Spiritualism!"

The following day he told his wife and family of the strange vision of his sleep, and that he was sure that his mother's statement that she would never see him again, meant that out in Preussen Pommern, her death had occurred at the time he had the vision. Since then he has anxiously waited for mail which would bring him some news of his mother. Yesterday morning the news came from Germany. His mother had died early in the morning of January 24, the day on which Mr. Wendt is sure he had the vision.

Mrs. Wendt's maiden name was Helena Voll, and in this city she has a brother, Ferdinand Voll, who is the ticket agent at the West Union station of the Lackawanna Railroad. Just as soon as Mr. Wendt received the letter he went to notify his uncle, Mr. Voll, of the death. Mr. Voll did not seem especially surprised, and then Mr. Wendt told him of the strange vision. When he was told that on the night of about the time the death took place in Germany, he had a dream similar to that of his nephew, Mr. Wendt. He also said that he was visited by his sister and that she told him she was going to die. They compared the experience of their dream, and they were just alike. While both men claim not to be the least superstitious, they related their stories of their dreams to others.

THE OLD MAN DREAMS.

I wonder if my spirit, since my locks have grown gray,
Is now growing more impatient with this waiting day by day?
And I wonder if the worry and monotony of toil,
Is inclining me to curdle and my kindliness to spoil!

I call back those pleasant faces of my happy boyhood days,
When the whole world seemed to echo with the shouts of boyish play;
When the very sun seemed shining to greet me, and the clouds to smile,
And those days return to haunt me—days when I was but a boy.

I still climb those dear old hillsides, and play, grow old in a brook;
I still play in that old meadow and the same secluded nook;
I still "whistle up" my comrades, for a swim or game of ball;
But somehow I get responses only in a death-like pall.

I still hear the distant rumble of the mill-wheel going round,
As again I tread the furrow in the plowing of the ground;
I can hear the cow-bells tinkle out upon the grassy hill,
And I seem to catch faint glimpses of sweet faces round me still.

I oft hear again the murmur of the voices in the school,
And I see myself still sitting by the teacher on a stool;
I can hear the children reading and the "spelling down" as then,
And the visions close my eyelids, and I AM A CHILD AGAIN.

I am with my dear old mother, and can see the gentle care
Now, with which she mends my trousers and prepares my curly hair;
I can feel her gentle touches and can sense her motherly pride,
And somehow I feel her presence in the spirit at my side.

Is this seeming but a dreaming, or a part of one whole life,
When the pleasures of our treasures overshadow all the strife?
Is it but an empty vision or a meaningless array,
Or a mental panorama of the long-passed yesterday?

Am I dreaming, or just living over all the bygone years?
Oh, the pleasure in re-living, when the present disappears,
All the happy days of childhood in the golden long ago,
Makes my spirit lighter, better, while it lingers here below.

I know not the hidden future, but the past returns to me,
And I present all too plainly and too sternly I can see,
And I somehow feel down in me that the loved ones gone before,
Are still living and still loving, on some brighter, fairer shore.

And at night when gentle zephyrs fan my eyelids down to sleep,
All around me in the silence of the mighty spirit deep,
Loving faces, bright and smiling, float like sunbeams through the air,
Then I seem to be uplifted, as if floating with the there.

SOME TRENDANT THOUGHTS.

The Influence of Women Needed in Every Problem of Life.

Rev. J. S. Thomas pastor of the Howard Presbyterian Church in San Francisco, recently preached strong sermon on the rights of women in which he said:

"Man and woman should work together in every department of life, in the home, in the church and in the state. The influence of woman is needed in every problem of life. Commercial and social life in this city need the woman. If there was ever a city that needed a mother it is San Francisco. The truth is the home is not circumscribed by the four walls of the kitchen and the living room. The children are not in the house all the day. They are in the schools and in the streets. We need the woman, the mother, to aid in the management of the schools and the government of the streets. They are a part of the home in the larger sense. What right have they to say that she shall remain within the four walls?"

"If it is woman's duty to see that beautiful pictures are hung on the walls of the parlor, why is it not her duty to see that the pictures on bill boards and in the store windows of this city shall be sweet and uplifting, too? If children have to look at them. If it is a woman's duty to keep the children and the home clean, why is it not her duty to see that the streets are clean? San Francisco needs a mother to keep it clean. Life in all its undertakings is a problem for the solution of men and women working together. There is too much separation. We have separated the mission work in the church and given a special part of it to the women, and we have made a mistake. The men and the women in the church should work together. Dowry said lately that the curse of the temperance question in the United States was that it had been made a woman's question. There is no sex in the problems of life.

"For some time my own work about the way members of my own sex talk about the sphere of woman. If home is the place for woman, then home is the place for man. They are co-partners for life to work together."

A Little Pilgrim.

This is a charming narrative illustrating the beauty grandeur and sublimity of the spirit side of life, the realms of souls, the immortal spheres of existence. Margaret O. W. Oliphant is the author. And while it has been read by millions in the past, it will prove refreshing and soul-inspiring to our readers to again peruse it and feel its thrills of inspiration, and enjoy its uplifting influence.

There were two of them hanging together upon the wall, and at first it seemed to the little Pilgrim as if they represented the flames and fire of which she had read, and this made her shudder for the moment. But then she saw that it was a red light like a stormy sunset, with masses of clouds in the sky, and a low sun very fiery and dazzling, which no doubt to a hasty glance must have looked, with its dark shadows and high-lit lights, like the fires of the bottomless pit. But when you looked down you saw the reality that it was.

The country that lay beneath was full of tropical foliage, but with many stretches of sand and dry plains, and in the foreground was a town, that looked very prosperous and crowded, though the figures were very minute, the subject being so great; but no one to see it would have taken it for anything but a busy and wealthy place, in a thunderous atmosphere, with a storm coming on. In the next there was a section of a street with a great basqueting hall open to the view, and many people sitting about the table. You could see that there was a great deal of laughter and conversation going on, some very noisy groups, but others that sat more quietly in corners and conversed, and some who sang, and every kind of entertainment.

The little Pilgrim was very much astonished to see this, and turned to the painter, who answered her directly, though she had not spoken. "We used to think differently once. There are some who are there and do not know it. They think only it is the old life over again, but always worse, and they are led on in the ways of evil; but they do not feel the punishment until they begin to find out where they are and to struggle, and wish for other things."

The little Pilgrim felt her heart beat very wildly while she looked at this, and she thought upon the rich man in the parable, who, though he was himself in torment, prayed that his brother might be saved, and she said to herself, "Our dear Lord would never leave him there who could think of his brother when he was himself in such a strait." And when she looked at the painter he smiled upon her, and nodded his head. Then he led her to the other corner of the room where there were other pictures.

One of them was of a party seated round a table and an angel looking on. The angel had the aspect of a traveler, as if he were passing quickly by and had but paused a moment to look, and one of the men glancing up suddenly saw him. The picture was dim, but the startled look upon this man's face, and the sorrow on the angel's, appeared out of the misty background with such truth that the tears came into the little Pilgrim's eyes, and she said in her heart, "Oh, that I could go to him and help him!"

The other sketches were dimmer and dimmer. You seemed to see out of the darkness, gleaming lights, and companies of revelers, out of which here and there was one trying to escape. And then the wide plains in the night, and the white vision of the angel in the distance, and here and there by different paths a fugitive striving to follow. "Oh, sir," said the little Pilgrim, "how did you learn to do it? You have never been there."

"It was the master, not I; and I can not tell you if he has ever been there. When the Father has given you that gift, you can go to many places, without leaving the one where you are. And then he has heard what the angels say."

"And will they all get safe at the last? and even that great spirit, he that fell from heaven—"

The painter shook his head and said, "It is not permitted to you and me to know such great things. Perhaps the wise will tell you if you ask them; but for me I ask the Father in my heart and listen to what he says."

"That is best!" the little Pilgrim said; and she asked the Father in her heart; and there came over her such a glow of warmth and happiness that her soul was satisfied. She looked in the painter's face and laughed for joy. And he put out his hands as if welcoming some one, and his countenance shone; and he said: "My son had a great gift. He was a master born, though it was not given to me. He shall paint it all for us so that the heart shall rejoice; and you will come again and see."

After that it happened to the little Pilgrim to enter into another great place where there were many people reading, and some sitting at their desks and writing, and some consulting together, with many great volumes stretched out open upon the tables. One of these who was seated alone looked up as she paused wondering at him, and smiled as every one did, and greeted her with such a friendly tone that the Pilgrim, who always had a great desire to know, came nearer to him and looked at the book, then begged his pardon, and said she did not know that books were needed here. And then he told her that he was one of the historians of the city where all the records of the world were kept, and that it was his business to work upon the great history, and to show what the meaning of the Father in everything that had happened, and how each event came in its right place.

"The books are the records," he said; "and there are many here that were never known to us in the old days; for the angels love to look into these things, and they can tell us much, for they saw it; and in the great books they have kept there is much put down that was never in the books we wrote, for then we did not know. We found out about the kings and the state, and tried to understand what great purposes they were serving; but even these we did not know, for those purposes were too great for us, not knowing the end from the beginning, and the hearts of men were too great for us. We comprehended the evil sometimes, but never fathomed the good. And how could we know the lesser things which were working out God's way? For some of these even the angels did not know; and it has happened to me that our Lord himself has come in sometimes to tell me of one that none of us had discovered."

"Oh," said the little Pilgrim, with tears in her eyes, "I should like to have been that one!—that was not known even to the angels, but only to Himself!"

"The historian smiled. "It was my brother," he said.

The Pilgrim looked at him with great wonder. "Your brother, and you did not know him!"

And then he turned over the pages and showed her where the story was.

"You know," he said, "that we who live here are not of your time, but have lived and lived here till the old life is far away and like a dream. There were great tumults and fightings in our time, and it was settled by the prince of the place that our town was to be abandoned, and all the people left to the mercy of an enemy who had no mercy. But every day as he rode out he saw at one door a child, a little fair boy, who sat on the steps, and sang his little song like a bird. This child was never afraid of anything,—when the horses pranced past him, and the troopers pushed him aside, he looked up into their faces and smiled. And when he had anything, a piece of bread, or an apple, or a plaything, he shared it with his playmates; and his little face, and his pretty voice, and all his pleasant ways, made that corner bright. He was like a flower growing there; everybody smiled that saw him."

"I have seen such a child," the little Pilgrim said.

"But we made no account of him," said the historian. "The Lord of the place came past him every day, and always saw him singing in the sun by his father's door. And it was a wonder then, and it has been a wonder ever since, why, having resolved upon it, that prince did not abandon the town, which would have changed all his fortune after. Much had been made clear to me since I began to study, but not this; till the Lord himself came to me and told me. The prince looked at the child till he loved him, and he reflected how many children there were like this that would be murdered, or starved to death, and he could not give up the little singing boy to the sword. So he remained; and the town was saved, and he became a great king. It was so secret that even the angels did not know it. But without that child the history would not have been complete."

"And is he here?" the little Pilgrim said.

"Ah," said the historian, "that is more strange still; for that which saved him was also his harm. He is not here. He is elsewhere."

The little Pilgrim's face grew sad; but then she remembered what she had been told.

"But you know," she said, "that he is coming?"

"Is it well to suffer? Is it well to live in that dark stormy country? Oh, that they were all here, and happy like you!"

He shook his head a little and said: "It was a long time before I got here; and as for suffering that matters little. You get experience by it. You are more accomplished and fit for greater work in the end. It is not for nothing that we are permitted to wander; and sometimes one goes to the edge of despair."

"She looked at him with such wondering eyes that he answered her without a word.

And then it seemed to her that there was something in his eyes which she had not remarked before. Not only the great content that was everywhere, but a deeper light, and the air of a judge who knew both good and evil, and could see both sides, and understand all, both to love and to hate.

"Little sister," he said, "you have never wandered far; it is not needful for such as you. Love teaches you, and you need no more; but when we have to be trained for an office like this, to make the way of the Lord clear through all the generations, reason is that we should see everything, and learn all that man is and can be. These things are too deep for us; we stumble on, and know not till after. But now to me it is all clear."

She looked at him again and again while he spoke, and it seemed to her that she saw in him such great knowledge and tenderness as made her glad; and how he could understand the follies that men had done, and fathom what real meaning was in them, and disentangle all the threads. He smiled as she gazed at him, and answered as if she had spoken.

"What was evil perishes, and what was good remains; almost everywhere there is a little good. We could not understand all if we had not seen all and shared all."

"And the punishment too," she said, wondering more and more.

He smiled so joyfully that it was like laughter.

"Pain is a great angel," he said. "The reason we hated him in the old days was because he tended to death and decay; but when it is towards life he leads, we fear him no more. The welcome thing of all in the land of darkness is when you see him first and know who he is; for by this you are aware that you have found the way."

The little Pilgrim did nothing but question with her anxious eyes, for this was such a wonder to her, and she could not understand. But he only sat musing with a smile over the things he remembered. And at last he said:

"If this is so interesting to you, you shall read it all in another place, in the room where we have laid up our own experiences, in order to serve for the history afterwards. But we are still busy upon the work of the earth. There is always something new to be discovered. And it is essential for the whole world that the chronicle should be full. I am in great joy because it was but just now that our Lord told me about that child. Everything was imperfect without him, but now it is complete."

"You mean your brother? And you are happy though you are not sure if he is happy?" the little Pilgrim said.

"It is not to be happy that we live," said he; and then, "We are all happy so soon as we have found the way."

She would have asked him more, but that he was called to a consultation with some others of his kind, and had to leave her, waving his hand to her with a tender kindness which went to her heart. She looked after him with great respect, scarcely knowing why; but, it seemed to her that a man who had been in the land of darkness, and made his way out of it, must be more wonderful than any other.

She looked round for a little upon the great library, full of all the books that had ever been written, and where people were doing their work, examining and reading and making extracts, every one with looks of so much interest, that she almost envied them,—though it was a generous delight in seeing people so happy in their occupation, and a desire to associate herself somehow in it, rather than any grudging of their satisfaction, that was in her mind.

She went about all the courts of this palace alone, and everywhere saw the same work going on, and everywhere met the same kind looks. Even when the greatest of all looked up from his work and saw her, he would give her a friendly greeting and a smile; and nobody was too wise to lend an ear to the little visitor, or to answer her questions. And this was how it was that she began to talk to another, who was seated at a great table with many more, and who drew her to him by something that was in his looks, though she could not have told what it was.

It was not that he was kinder than the rest, for they were all kind. She stood by him a little, and saw how he worked and would take something from another, putting them ready for use. And it did not seem any trouble to do this work, but only pleasure, and the very pen in his hand was like a winged thing, as if it loved to write.

When he saw her watching him, he looked up and showed her the beautiful book out of which he was copying, which was all illuminated with lovely pictures.

"This is one of the great volumes of the great history," he said. "There are some things in it which are needed for another, and it is a pleasure to work at it. If you will come here you will be able to see the page while I write."

Then the little Pilgrim asked him some questions about the pictures, and he answered her, describing and explaining them; for they were in the middle of the history, and she did not understand what it was. When she said, "I ought not to trouble you, for you are busy," he laughed so kindly that she laughed, too, for pleasure. And he said:

"There is no trouble here. When we are not allowed to work, as sometimes happens, that makes us not quite so happy, but it is very seldom that it happens so."

"Is it for punishment?" she said.

And then he laughed out with a sound which made all the others look up smiling, and if they had not all looked so tenderly at her, as at a child who has made such a mistake as it is pretty for the child to make, she would have feared she had said something wrong; but she only laughed at herself too, and blushed a little, knowing that she was not wise; and to put her at her ease again, he turned the leaf and showed her other pictures, and the story which went with them, from which he was copying something. And he said:

"This is for another book, to show how the grace of the Father was beautiful in some homes and families. It is not the great history, but connected with it; and there are many who love that better than the story which is more great."

Then the Pilgrim looked in his face and said:

"What I want most is, to know about your homes here."

"It is all home here," he said, and smiled; and then, as he met her wistful looks, he went on to tell her that he and his brothers were not always there. "We have all our occupations," he said, "and sometimes I am sent to inquire into facts that have happened, of which the record is not clear; for we must omit nothing; and sometimes we are told to rest and take in new strength; and sometimes—"

And the others all looked up again at the question, and looked at her with tender eyes, and said to the man whom she questioned: "Speak!"

He made a little pause before he spoke, and he looked at one here and there, and called to them:

"Patience, brother," and "Courage, brother." And then he said, "Those whom we loved best are nearly all with us; but some have not yet come."

"Oh," said the little Pilgrim, "but how then do you bear it, to be parted so long—so long?"

Then one of those to whom the first speaker had called out, "Patience," rose, and came to her smiling; and he said:

"I think every hour that perhaps she will come, and the joy will be so great, that thinking of that makes the waiting short; and nothing here is long, for it never ends; and it will be so wonderful, to hear her tell how the Father has guided her, that it will be a delight to us all; and she will be able to explain many things, not only for us, but for all; and we love each other so that this separation is as nothing in comparison with what is to come."

It was beautiful to hear this, but it was not what the little Pilgrim expected, for she thought they would have told her of the homes to which they all returned when their work was over, and a life which was like the life of the old time; but of this they said nothing, only looking at her with smiling eyes, as at the curious questions of a child. And there were many other things she would have asked, but refrained when she looked at them, feeling as if she did not yet understand; when one of them broke forth suddenly in a louder voice, and said:

"The little sister knows only the little language and the beginning of days. She has not learned the mysteries, and what Love is, and what Life is."

And another cried, "It is sweet to hear it again; and they all gathered round her with tender looks, and began to talk to each other, and tell her, as men will tell of the games of their childhood, of things that happened, which were half-forgotten, in the old time.

A GRAND MID-WINTER MEETING.

Michigan Steps to the Front and Maintains Her Position Nobly in the Ranks of Spiritualism. The President of the State Association Showed Marked Genius in Conducting the Meeting and Making It a Success.—Dr. G. B. Warner's Address Captured the Audience.

The Michigan State Spiritualist Association has just closed the most successful and enthusiastic annual convention, commonly known as the mid-winter meeting. Its history as a state organization. The convention was held in Colonial Hall in Detroit, Feb. 9, 10 and 11. Central Spiritual Union and the Earnest Workers combined their efforts in the capacity of host of the convention, and right royally were their guests welcomed and entertained.

The meeting opened at 10:30 a. m. Feb. 9, and in the absence of President Walton, was called to order by the state secretary, Miss Rena D. Chapman. Mrs. Dr. Fish of Detroit, headed an invocation, after which the prayer of the association was read by the visitors from outside the city, and the glad hand was extended to all. A very active reception committee consisting so far as your scribe could see of every member of the two societies who acted as hosts, soon made every stranger within their gates forget that he was a stranger, for every heart and every house was opened, and no effort was spared to make each guest feel at ease.

At 2 p. m. the meeting was formally opened by the state president, Dr. Julia M. Walton of Jackson. Dr. Burrows of the Central Spiritual Union welcomed the guests in a very eloquent ten-minute speech. Our worthy president responded in one of her characteristic bursts of eloquence.

After President Walton's address, resolutions of sympathy and condolence for the widow of our arisen brother, G. M. Stanley, formerly of Jackson, but late of Detroit, were adopted. This was followed by a short address by E. Dent of Vicksburg, one of the wheel horses in Michigan, and one of the founders of the M. S. S. A., who gave us some very interesting scraps of the early history of the association and the early work.

E. W. White, state missionary, followed with some suggestions as to how best to reach our neighbors with our truth, and called attention to the fact that the younger element had been left to the teachings of the orthodox church, while we labored to convert their parents.

Mrs. E. W. White, state missionary, followed with messages.

The evening session opened at 7:30 with beautiful music and an invocation by Rev. Laura Crawford, pastor of the Church of the Soul. Following came the real treat of the day, an address by E. W. Sprague, subject, "After Death, What?"

Mrs. Marion Crowell followed with a beautiful recitation from Longfellow, "Phantom Ship." The evening session was closed with messages from Mrs. E. W. Sprague, Mrs. Nellie Metcalf followed with some beautiful readings, and the large audience dispersed amid smiles and congratulations.

Saturday, February 10, at 10:30 a. m., the meeting was called to order by President Walton. At the suggestion of the president the regular program was suspended and a symposium followed, led by E. W. White, Dr. Burrows, Mrs. Marian Crowell, and Dr. Geo. B. Warner, vice-president of the N. S. A., followed with very edifying remarks.

Mrs. Crowell, speaking upon "True Spiritualism," said "True Spiritualism is to be true, to be good, to be honest, to be pure, to be thorough and systematic purging of our ranks of all that would not bear the light of critical investigation. 'The public will not purify us, we must do that ourselves.' He also advocated the further recognition of the value of the family circle and of prior meetings as means of advancing the interests of the state organization and the cause in general, and gave us much needed advice.

Dr. Burrows said that he believed the time was near at hand for communion between the earth and spirit realms; that he himself was going to produce (he knew not how) an instrument to argue with the table, pepper shaker, that one could set upon their table and hear in it, or through it, an intelligible message ticked off, the same as in telegraphy. Session closed with benediction.

At 2 p. m., the meeting was called to order by President Walton. A beautiful solo by Miss Mammie Stein, daughter of Mrs. May Stein, "If You Only Knew." Mrs. Walton followed with a beautiful inspirational poem. Subject from the audience. "In dreams we dream, and dreaming know we dream," thus was the way paved for an excellent address by Mrs. May Stein. Among other good things she said, "It matters not whether a medium comes from the ranks of wealth or poverty, whether they have graduated from a college or from the street. If the angel world sees fit to use them, and the truth comes through them, we should receive it with gladness."

Mrs. E. W. White, Mrs. Lou Abby of Fenton, and Mrs. Laura Crawford followed with messages, which were well received.

Saturday evening, 7:30, the meeting opened with invocation by President Walton, after a vocal duet by Miss Mack and Mr. Metcalf, "Oh! Angel, Tell Mother 'I'll Be There'."

President Walton introduced Judge Calkins of the Jackson county Juvenile Court, who gave a very interesting and instructive address upon the theme, "Suggestion and Crime."

At the close of Judge Calkins' address, Brother Sprague and Dr. Warner, by a very earnest appeal, raised about $50 for the Goff well case fund.

At the close of the service President Walton announced that all the officers of the State and National Associations present, also all local and visiting mediums and workers and friends were requested to remain after the dismissal of the meeting, as some very important business of interest to all was to be transacted. They waited until the audience had dispersed. All who had remained were asked to arise to their feet and form in couples in the aisles in marching order, the company being headed by President Walton leaning upon the arm of Vice-president Geo. B. Warner.

The worthy officers left in a circuit of the hall, followed in good order by the smiling but much-bewildered company. As the second circuit of the great hall was completed, a sudden transformation occurred. By the portal of the annex opened as if by magic and a company, well led into the annex, where a delicious repast of surprise and delight they were lined up around a banquet table some one hundred feet in length, with covers laid for about one hundred and fifty, and groaning under such a repast of good things as would have made the angels themselves of Gounod's, to extend himself beyond his usual capacity. In a happy and appreciative manner, Dr. Warner, acting as spokesman for the Central Spiritual Union and Earnest Workers, made everyone feel welcome to this surprise party. Dr. Walton in her apt and pleasing way, responded, accepting the proffered hospitality on behalf of the guests, and so all were seated and enjoying a feast of things good for the physical man. And I opine that a more pleasurable and joyous hour will never be spent by that company.

February 11, at 10:30 a. m., the meeting was called to order by President Walton, who introduced Bro. J. White, who addressed the meeting upon the necessity of organization among the youths. His address was well received, and his views seemed to meet the hearty approval of the audience.

Miss Genevieve Spaulding of Lansing followed with a thrilling recitation of Will Carleton's famous poem, "The Bridge of the Ties." So perfectly was the thought of the great old man depicted in every gesture, and so clearly did it ring from every sentence, that ere she had ceased there were few dry eyes in the house. This young lady is a graduate of the Morris Pratt Institute, and continues in her finished work, an honor to the school and its able corps of teachers.

E. W. Sprague followed with a stirring address upon the education of Spiritualists.

Mrs. Lou Abby of Fenton, Mich., followed with messages which were well received. Session closed with benediction by Dr. Walton.

The afternoon session opened at 2 o'clock. The beautiful ceremony of floral christening of children was conducted by Rev. Laura Crawford, during which Mrs. Nellie Metcalf rendered a beautiful solo, "Take These." This service was followed by an address by E. W. Sprague, subject, "The Sweetness of Death." Mrs. Sprague followed with messages.

Sunday evening, 7:30, Fred J. White gave an address along the same lines of those followed in the morning, and arrangements were made for the perfection of an organization of young people representing every Spiritualist society in Detroit.

President Walton then introduced Dr. Geo. B. Warner, and the address which he delivered was one long to be remembered by those privileged to listen to it. Not less than seven hundred people listened with rapt attention, to one of the most scholarly and able addresses ever delivered in Michigan. Oratory, logic and rhetoric, backed by earnestness and an enthusiastic belief in the justice of his cause combined to make a profound impression upon his audience. An attempt to carry to the readers of this paper any idea of the force and power of this address would be futile, and I shall content myself with quoting from one passage. The speaker called attention to the fact that some years past all railroad companies united in adopting what is known as the standard gauge, so that in the remote sections of the West you may see cars from the Atlantic seaboard that have been run to their destination without transferring their loads, and the much vaunted reform teachings of the churches are but proof that today they are simply running their cars over the gauge of Spiritualism, and at the time in which they must adopt it as standard, and so in a burst of splendid effort, with enthusiasm at high tide, with new determination and new inspiration to nobler efforts, with old pledges renewed, with old loves closer cemented, with new loves formed, born of closer association, in a new courage developed from knowledge of the cooperation of all workers, with health, cheered by loving messages from loved ones, the convention passed into history, marking an epoch in the growth and advancement of the Michigan State Spiritualist Association.

HONOR TO THE FAITHFUL.

Mr. and Mrs. T. M. Locke Gratefully Remembered by Friends.

Mr. and Mrs. Thos. M. Locke, of the Philadelphia Spiritual Society, were made the recipients of a beautiful loving cup by the members and friends of the society, on Sunday evening, Feb. 11, 1906. The presentation speeches were made by Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Kates, who conducted the affair in a very unique manner.

Mr. Kates after a few introductory remarks, invited Mr. and Mrs. Locke to the platform, stating that he would like to see them occupy seats on the rostrum as an honor which he thought they deserved for their long and faithful services in the behalf of the society as president and secretary.

He requested Mr. Samuel Wheeler, president of the society, and Mr. Harry Shope, secretary, to escort them to the platform. Mr. Kates then produced the loving cup (which had been hidden from view) and passed it to Mr. and Mrs. Locke. They were both surprised and overwhelmed, and it was with great effort that Mr. Locke could master his feelings before he could respond, which he did with much appreciation and gratitude, and thanked the members and friends, and wished the society prosperity under its new management. It being Mr. Kates' birthday also added interest to the occasion.

The loving cup is of solid sterling silver and rests upon a beautiful ebony base, and was made by J. E. Caldwell & Co., Philadelphia, Pa., and bears this inscription:

Presented to MR. AND MRS. THOMAS M. LOCKE by the friends and members of the Philadelphia Spiritual Society, as an expression of appreciation for their long service in its behalf. Sunday evening, February 11, 1906.

The occasion will long be remembered as a very pleasant affair. Mr. and Mrs. Kates are trying very earnestly to build up the society during their engagement, and quite a number have enrolled their names. The meetings have been very well attended. They will return in March of 1907, to serve us again.

A Little Pilgrim.

This is a charming narrative illustrating the beauty grandeur and sublimity of the spirit side of life, the realms of souls, the immortal spheres of existence. Margaret O. W. Oliphant is the author. And while it has been read by millions in the past, it will prove refreshing and soul-inspiring to our readers to again peruse it and feel its thrills of inspiration, and enjoy its uplifting influence.

There were two of them hanging together upon the wall, and at first it seemed to the little Pilgrim as if they represented the flames and fire of which she had read, and this made her shudder for the moment. But then she saw that it was a red light like a stormy sunset, with masses of clouds in the sky, and a low sun very fiery and dazzling, which no doubt to a hasty glance must have looked, with its dark shadows and high-lit lights, like the fires of the bottomless pit. But when you looked down you saw the reality what it was.

The country that lay beneath was full of tropical foliage, but with many stretches of sand and dry plains, and in the foreground was a town, that looked very prosperous and crowded, though the figures were very minute, the subject being so great; but no one to see it would have taken it for anything but a busy and wealthy place, in a thunderous atmosphere, with a storm coming on. In the next there was a section of a street with a great banquet hall open to the view, and many people sitting about the table. You could see that there was a great deal of laughter and conversation going on, some very noisy groups, but others that sat more quietly in corners and conversed, and some who sang, and every kind of entertainment.

The little Pilgrim was very much astonished to see this, and turned to the painter, who answered her directly, though she had not spoken. "We used to think differently once. There are some who are there and do not know it. They think only it is the old life over again, but always worse, and they are led on in the ways of evil; but they do not feel the punishment until they begin to find out where they are and to struggle, and wish for other things."

The little Pilgrim felt her heart beat very wildly while she looked at this, and she thought upon the rich man in the parable, who, though he was himself in torment, prayed that his brother might be saved, and she said to herself, "Our dear Lord would never leave him there who could think of his brother when he was himself in such a strait." And when she looked at the painter he smiled upon her, and nodded his head. Then he led her to the other corner of the room where there were other pictures.

One of them was of a party seated round a table and an angel looking on. The angel had the aspect of a traveler, as if he were passing quickly by and had paused a moment to look, and one of the men glancing suddenly saw him. The picture was dim, but the startled look upon this man's face, and the sorrow on the angel's, appeared out of the misty background with such truth that the tears came into the little Pilgrim's eyes, and she said in her heart, "Oh, that I could go to him and help him!"

The other sketches were dimmer and dimmer. You seemed to see out of the darkness, gleaming lights, and companies of revelers, out of which here and there was one trying to escape. And then the wide plains in the night, and the white vision of the angel in the distance, and here and there by different paths a fugitive striving to follow. "Oh, sir," said the little Pilgrim, "how did you learn to do it? You have never been there."

"It was the master, not I; and I can not tell you if he has ever been there. When the Father has given you that gift, you can go to many places, without leaving the one where you are. And then he has heard what the angels say."

"And will they all get safe at the last? and even that great spirit, he that fell from heaven—"

The painter shook his head and said, "It is not permitted to you and me to know such great things. Perhaps the wise will tell you if you ask them; but for me I ask the Father in my heart and listen to what he says."

"That is best!" the little Pilgrim said; and she asked the Father in her heart; and there came all over her such a glow of warmth and happiness that her soul was satisfied. She looked in the painter's face and laughed for joy. And he put out his hands as if welcoming some one, and his countenance shone; and he said: "My son had a great gift. He was a master born, though it was not given to me. He shall paint it all for us so that the heart shall rejoice; and you will come again and see."

After that it happened to the little Pilgrim to enter into another great palace where there were many people reading, and some sitting at their desks and writing, and some consulting together, with many great volumes stretched out open upon the tables. One of these was seated alone looked up as she paused wondering at him, and smiled as every one did, and greeted her with such a friendly tone that the Pilgrim, who always had a great desire to know, came nearer to him and looked at the book, then begged his pardon, and said she did not know that books were needed here. And then he told her that he was one of the historians of the city where all the records of the world were kept, and that it was his business to work upon the great history, and to show what was the meaning of the Father in everything that had happened, and how each event came in its right place.

"The books are the records," he said; "and there are many here that were never known to us in the old days; for the angels love to look into these things, and they can tell us much, for they saw it; and in the great books they have kept there is much put down that was never in the books we wrote, for then we did not know. We found out about the kings and the state, and tried to understand what great purposes they were serving; but even these we did not know, for those purposes were too great for us, not knowing the end from the beginning, and the hearts of men were too great for us. We comprehended the evil sometimes, but never fathomed the good. And how could we know the lesser things which were working out God's way? for some of these even the angels did not know; and it has happened to me that our Lord himself has come in sometimes to tell me of one that none of us had discovered."

"Oh," said the little Pilgrim, with tears in her eyes, "I should like to have been that one!—that was not known even to the angels, but only to Himself!"

The historian smiled. "It was my brother," he said.

The Pilgrim looked at him with great wonder. "Your brother, and you did not know him?"

And then he turned over the pages and showed her where the story was. "You know," he said, "that we who live here are not of your time, but have lived and lived here till the old life is far away and like a dream. There were great tumults and fightings in our time, and it was settled by the prince of the place that our town was to be abandoned, and all the people left to the mercy of an enemy who had no mercy. But every day as he rode out he saw at one door a child, a little fair boy, who sat on the steps, and sang his little song like a bird. This child was never afraid of anything, when the horses pranced past him; and the troopers pushed him aside, he looked up into their faces and smiled. And when he had anything, a piece of bread, or an apple, or a plaything, he shared it with his playmates; and his little face, and his pretty voice, and all his pleasant ways, made that corner bright. He was like a flower growing there; everybody smiled that saw him."

"I have seen such a child," the little Pilgrim said.

"But we made no account of him," said the historian. "The Lord of the place came past him every day, and always saw him singing in the sun by his father's door. And it was a wonder then, and it has been a wonder ever since, why, having resolved upon it, that prince did not abandon the town, which would have changed all his fortune after. Much had been made clear to me since I began to study, but not this; till the Lord himself came to me and told me. The prince looked at the child till he loved him, and he reflected how many children there were like this that would be murdered, or starved to death, and he could not give up the little singing boy to the sword. So he remained; and the town was saved, and he became a great king. It was so secret that even the angels did not know it. But without that child the history would not have been complete."

"And is he here?" the little Pilgrim said.

"Ah," said the historian, "that is more strange still; for that which saved him was also his harm. He is not here. He is elsewhere."

The little Pilgrim's face grew sad; but then she remembered what she had been told.

"I know that our Father will never forsake him, and that everything that is being accomplished in him is well," he said. "Is it well to suffer? Is it well to live in that dark stormy country? Oh, that they were all here, and happy like you!"

He shook his head a little and said:

"It was a long time before I got here; and as for suffering that matters little. You got experience by it. You are more accomplished and fit for greater work in the end. It is not for nothing that we are permitted to wander; and sometimes one goes to the edge of despair."

She looked at him with such wondering eyes that he answered her without a word.

And then it seemed to her that there was something in his eyes which she had not remarked before. Not only the great content that was everywhere, but a deeper light, and the air of a judge who knew both good and evil, and could see both sides, and understand all, both to love and to hate.

"Little sister," he said, "you have never wandered far; it is not needful for such as you. Love teaches you, and you need no more; but when we have to be trained for an office like this, to make the way of the Lord clear through all the generations, reason is that we should see everything, and learn all that man is and can be. These things are too deep for us; we stumble on, and know not till after. But now to me it is all clear."

She looked at him again and again while he spoke, and it seemed to her that she saw in him such great knowledge and tenderness as made her glad; and how he could understand the follies that men had done, and fathom what real meaning was in them, and disentangle all the threads.

He smiled as she gazed at him, and answered as if she had spoken.

"What was evil perishes, and what was good remains; almost everywhere there is a little good. We could not understand all if we had not seen all and shared all."

"And the punishment, too," she said, wondering more and more.

He smiled so joyfully that it was like laughter.

"Pain is a great angel," he said. "The reason we hated him in the old days was because he tended to death and decay; but when it is towards life he leads, we fear him no more. The welcome thing of all in the land of darkness is when you see him first and know who he is; for by this you are aware that you have found the way."

The little Pilgrim did nothing but question with her anxious eyes, for this was such a wonder to her, and she could not understand. But he only sat musing with a smile over the things he remembered. And at last he said:

"If this is so interesting to you, you shall read it all in another place, in the room where we have laid up our own experiences, in order to serve for the history afterwards. But we are still busy upon the work of the earth. There is always something new to be discovered. And it is essential for the whole world that the chronicle should be full. I am in great joy because it was but just now that our Lord told me about that child. Everything was imperfect without him, but now it is clear."

"You mean your brother? And you are happy though you are not sure if he is happy?" the little Pilgrim said.

"It is not to be happy that we live," he said; and then, "We are all happy so soon as we have found the way."

She would have asked him more, but that he was called to a consultation with some others of his kind, and had to leave her, waving his hand to her with a tender kindness which went to her heart. She looked after him with great respect, scarcely knowing why; but it seemed to her that a man who had been in the land of darkness, and made his way out of it, must be more wonderful than any other.

She looked round for a little upon the great library, full of all the books that had ever been written, and where people were doing their work, examining and reading and making extracts, every one with looks of so much interest, that she almost envied them, though it was a generous delight in seeing people so happy in their occupation, and a desire to associate herself somehow in it, rather than any grudging of their satisfaction, that was in her mind.

She went about all the courts of this palace alone, and everywhere saw the same work going on, and everywhere met the same kind looks. Even when the greatest of all looked up from his work and saw her, he would give her a friendly greeting and a smile; and nobody was too wise to lend an ear to the little visitor, or to answer her questions. And this was how it was that she began to talk to another, who was seated at a great table with many more, and who drew her to him by something that was in his looks, though she could not have told what it was.

It was not that he was kinder than the rest, for they were all kind. She stood by him a little, and saw how he worked, and would take something from one book and something from another, putting them ready for use. And it did not seem any trouble to do this work, but only pleasure, and the very pen in his hand was like a winged thing, as if it loved to write.

When he saw her watching him, he looked up and showed her the beautiful book out of which he was copying, which was all illuminated with lovely pictures.

"This is one of the great volumes of the great history," he said. "There are some things in it which are needed for another, and it is a pleasure to work at it. If you will come here you will be able to see the page while I write."

Then the little Pilgrim asked him some questions about the pictures, and he answered her, describing and explaining them; for they were in the middle of the history, and she did not understand what it was. When she said, "I ought not to trouble you, for you are busy," he laughed so kindly that she laughed, too, for pleasure. And he said:

"There is no trouble here. When we are not allowed to work, as sometimes happens, that makes us not quite so happy, but it is very seldom that it happens so."

"Is it for punishment?" she said. And then he laughed out with a sound which made all the others look up smiling; and if they had not looked so tenderly at her, as at a child who has made such a mistake as it is pretty for the child to make, she would have feared she had said something wrong; but she only laughed at herself, and blushed a little, knowing that she was not wise; and to put her at her ease again, he turned the leaf and showed her other pictures, and the story which went with them, from which he was copying something. And he said:

"This is for another book, to show how the grace of the Father was beautiful in some homes and families. It is not the great history, but connected with it; and there are many who love that better than the story which is more great."

Then the Pilgrim looked in his face and said:

"What I want most is, to know about your homes here."

"It is all home here," he said, and smiled; and then, as he met her wistful looks, he went on to tell her that he and his brothers were not always there. "We have all our occupations," he said, "and sometimes I am sent to 'inquire' into facts that have happened, of which the record is not clear; for we must omit nothing; and sometimes we are told to rest and take in new strength; and sometimes—"

And the others all looked up again at the question, and looked at her with tender eyes; and said to the man whom she questioned: "Speak!"

He made a little pause before he spoke, and he looked at one here and there, and called to them:

"Patience, brother," and "Courage, brother." And then he said, "Those whom we loved best are nearly all with us; but some have not yet come."

"Oh," said the little Pilgrim, "but how then do you bear it, to be parted so long—so long?"

Then one of those to whom the first speaker had called out, "Patience," rose, and came to her smiling; and he said:

"I think every hour that perhaps she will come, and the joy will be so great, that thinking of that makes the waiting short; and nothing here is long, for it never ends; and it will be so wonderful to hear her tell how the Father has guided her, that it will be a delight to us all; and she will be able to explain many things, not only for us, but for all; and we love each other so that this separation is as nothing in comparison with what is to come."

It was beautiful to hear this, but it was not what the little Pilgrim expected, for she thought they would have told her of the homes to which they all returned when their work was over, and a life which was like the life of the old time; but of this she said nothing, only looking at her with smiling eyes, as at the curious questions of a child. And there were many other things she would have asked, but refrained when she looked at them, feeling as if she did not yet understand; when one of them broke forth suddenly in a louder voice, and said:

"The little sister knows only the little language and the beginning of days. She has not learned the mysteries, and what Love is, and what Life is."

And another cried, "It is sweet to hear it again; and they all gathered round her with tender looks, and began to talk to each other, and tell her, as men will tell of the games of their childhood, of things that happened, which were half-forgotten, in the old time.

A GRAND MID-WINTER MEETING.

Michigan Steps to the Front and Maintains Her Position Nobly in the Ranks of Spiritualism. The President of the State Association Showed Marked Genius in Conducting the Meeting and Making It a Success.—Dr. G. B. Warner's Address Captured the Audience.

The Michigan State Spiritualist Association has just closed the most successful and enthusiastic annual convention, (commonly known as the mid-winter meeting) in its history as a state organization. The convention was held in Colonial Hall in Detroit, Feb. 9, 19 and 21. Central Spiritual Union and the Barnet Workers combined their efforts in the capacity of host of the convention, and right royally were their guests welcomed and entertained.

The meeting opened at 10:30 a. m. Feb. 9, and in the absence of President Walton, was called to order by the state secretary, Miss Rena D. Chapman. Mrs. Dr. Fish of Detroit, delivered an invocation, after which the visitors from outside the city, and the glad hand was extended to all. A very active reception committee consisting so far as your scribe could see of every member of the two societies who acted as hosts, soon made every stranger within their gates forget that he was a stranger, for every heart and every house was opened, and no effort was spared to make each guest feel at ease.

At 2 p. m. the meeting was formally opened by the state president, Dr. Julia M. Walton of Jackson. Dr. Burrows of the Central Spiritualist Union welcomed the guests in a very eloquent and inspiring address. Our worthy president responded in one of her characteristic bursts of eloquence.

After President Walton's address, resolutions of sympathy and condolence for the widow of our ardent brother, G. M. Stanley, formerly of Jackson, but late of Detroit, were passed. This was followed by a short address by Dr. Dent, of Jackson, one of the "white" horses in Michigan, and one of the founders of the M. S. A., who gave us some very interesting scraps of the early history of the association and the early work.

E. W. White, state missionary, followed with some suggestions as to how best to reach our neighbors with our truth, and called attention to the fact that the younger element had been left to the teachings of the orthodox church, while we labored to convert their parents.

Mrs. E. W. White, state missionary, followed with messages. The evening session opened at 7:30 with beautiful music and an invocation by Rev. Laura Crawford, pastor of the Church of the Soul. Following came the real treat of the day, an address by E. W. Sprague, subject, "After Death, What?"

Mrs. Marion Crowell followed with a beautiful recitation from Longfellow, "The Psalmist." Then came messages from Mrs. E. W. Sprague, Mrs. Nellie Metcalf followed with some beautiful readings, and the large audience dispersed amid smiles and congratulations.

Saturday, February 10, at 10:30 a. m., the meeting was called to order by President Walton. At the suggestion of the president the regular program was suspended and a symposium followed, headed by E. W. White, Dr. Burrows, Mrs. Marion Crowell, and Mrs. E. W. Warner, vice-president of the N. S. A., followed with very edifying remarks. Mrs. Crowell, speaking upon True Spiritualism, said "True Spiritualism is to be true, to be good," and systematically purging of our ranks of all that would weaken the light of critical investigation. "The public will not purify us, we must do that ourselves." He also advocated the further recognition of the value of the family circle and of parlor meetings as means of advancing the interests of the state organization and the cause in general, and gave us much needed advice.

Dr. Burrows said that he believed the time was near at hand for communication between the earth and spirit realms; that he himself was going to produce (he knew not how) an instrument no larger than a table top shaker, that one could set upon the table and hear in it, or through it, an intelligible message ticked off, the same as in telegraphy. Session closed with benediction.

At 2 p. m., the meeting was called to order by President Walton. A beautiful solo by Miss Maile Stein, daughter of Mrs. May Stein. If you know Mrs. Walton followed with a beautiful inspirational poem. Subject from the Bible, "In Dreams we dream, and dreaming know we dream," this was the way paved for an excellent address by Mrs. May Stein. Among other good things she said, it matters not whether a medium comes from the ranks of wealth or poverty, whether they have graduated from a college, or from the street. If the angel world sees fit to use them, and the truth comes through them, we should receive it with gladness.

Mrs. E. W. White, Mrs. Lou Abby of Fenton, and Mrs. Laura Crawford followed with messages, which were well received.

Saturday evening, 7:30, the meeting opened with invocation by President Walton, after which Miss Mack and Mr. Metcalf, "Oh, Angel, Tell Mother I'll Be There." President Walton introduced Judge Calkins of the Jackson county Juvenile Court, who gave us a very interesting and instructive address upon the theme, "Suggestion and Crime."

At the close of Judge Calkins' address, Brother Sprague and Dr. Warner, by a very earnest appeal, raised about $50 for the Goff work case fund.

At the close of the service President Walton announced that all the officers of the State and National Association, present, also all local and visiting mediums and writers, and friends were requested to remain after the dismissal of the meeting, as some very important business of interest to all was to be transacted. They waited until the audience had dispersed. All who had remained were asked to arise to their feet and form in couples in the aisles for the marching order, the company being headed by President Walton leaning upon the arm of Vice-president Geo. B. Warner, the orchestra struck up a march and the worthy officers led off in a circuit of the hall, followed in good order by the smiling but much-bewildered company. A second circuit of the great hall was completed, and a sudden transformation, occurred, a sudden change of the inner opened as if by magic and the company were led into the annex, where amid exclamations of surprise and delight they were seated around a banquet table some of which reached in length, with coverings, and groaning under a load of good things as would have caused Porphyria, the Prince of Gourmands, to extend himself beyond his usual capacity. In a happy and appreciative manner, Dr. Warner, acting as spokesman for the Central Spiritual Union and Barnet Workers, made everyone feel welcome to this surprise party. Dr. Walton in her apt and pleasing way, responded, accepting the proffered hospitality on behalf of the guests, and with a good word for the physical man. And in spite of a more pleasurable and joyous hour will never be spent by that company.

February 11, at 10:30 a. m., the meeting was called to order by President Walton, who introduced Fred J. White, who addressed the meeting upon the necessity of organization among the youths. His address was well received, and his views seemed to meet the hearty approval of the audience.

Miss Geneva Spaulding of Lansing followed with a thrilling recitation of Will O'Connell's famous poem, "The Bridge of the Gods." So perfectly was the thought of the grand old man depicted in every gesture, and so clearly did it ring from every sentence, that ere she had ceased there were few dry eyes in the house. This young lady is a graduate of the Morris Pratt Institute, and continues in her finished work, an honor to the school and its able corps of teachers.

E. W. Sprague followed with a stirring address upon the education of Spiritualists.

Mrs. Lou Abby of Fenton, Mich., followed with messages which were well received. Session closed with benediction by Dr. Walton.

The afternoon session opened at 2 o'clock. The beautiful ceremony of floral christening of children was conducted by Rev. Laura Crawford, during which Mrs. Nellie Metcalf rendered a beautiful solo, "Take These." This service was followed by an address by E. W. Sprague, subject, "The Sweetness of Death." Mrs. Sprague followed with messages.

Sunday evening, 7:30, Fred J. White gave an address along the same lines of those followed in the morning, and arrangements were made for perfection of an organization of Spiritualists in Detroit.

President Walton then introduced Dr. Geo. B. Warner, and the address which he delivered was one long to be remembered by those privileged to listen to it. Not less than seven hundred people listened with rapt attention to one of the most scholarly and able addresses ever delivered in Michigan. Oratory, logic, and music, backed by earnestness and an enthusiastic belief in the justice of his cause combined to make a profound impression upon his audience. An attempt to carry to the readers of this paper any idea of the force and power of this address would be futile, and I shall content myself with quoting from one passage. The speaker called attention to the fact that some years past all railroad companies united in adopting what is known as the standard gauge, so that in the remote sections of the West you may see cars from the Atlantic seaboard that have been run to their destination without transferring their loads, and the much vaunted reform teachings of the churches are but proof that today they are simply running their cars over the gauge of Spiritualism, and the time is at hand when they must adopt it as standard, and so in a burst of splendid effort, with enthusiasm at the high tide, with new determination and with the higher efforts, with old pledges renewed, with old loves closer cemented, with new loves formed, born of closer association, with a new courage developed from knowledge of the co-operation of all workers, with health, cheered by conviction, passing into history, marking an epoch in the growth and advancement of the Michigan State Spiritualist Association.

HONOR TO THE FAITHFUL.

Mr. and Mrs. T. M. Locke Gratefully Remembered by Friends.

Mr. and Mrs. Thos. M. Locke, of the Philadelphia Spiritual Society, were made the recipients of a beautiful loving cup by the members and friends of the society, on Sunday evening, Feb. 11, 1936. The presentation speeches were made by Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Kates, who conducted the affair in a very unique manner.

Mr. Kates after a few introductory remarks, invited Mr. and Mrs. Locke to the platform, stating that he would like to see them occupy seats on the rostrum as an honor which he thought they deserved for their long and faithful services in the behalf of the society as president and secretary. He requested Mr. Samuel Wheeler, president of the society, and Mr. Harry Shope, secretary, to escort them to the platform. Mr. Kates then produced the loving cup (which had been hidden from view) and passed it to Mr. and Mrs. Locke. They were both surprised and overwhelmed, and it was with great effort that Mr. Locke could master his feelings before he could respond, which he did with much appreciation and gratitude, and thanked the members and friends, and wished the society prosperity under its new management. It being Mr. Kates' birthday also added interest to the occasion.

The loving cup is of solid sterling silver and rests upon a beautiful ebony base, and was made by J. E. Caldwell & Co., Philadelphia, Pa., and bears this inscription:

Presented to MR. AND MRS. THOMAS M. LOCKE by the Friends and members of the Philadelphia Spiritual Society, as an expression of appreciation for their long services in its behalf, Sunday evening, February 11, 1936.

The occasion will long be remembered as a very pleasant affair.

Mr. and Mrs. Kates are trying very earnestly to build up the society during their engagement, and quite a number have enrolled their names. The meetings have been very well attended. They will return in March of 1937, to serve us again.

STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

It Has Come to the Front With an Act Which, If Passed, Will Prove of Great Injury to Every Honest Medium.

Said Act Is the Direct Outgrowth of the Fraud Which Has Become Such a Prominent Factor in Our Ranks.

Section 1. The mayor and aldermen of any city except Boston, and in Boston the board of police, and the selectionmen of any town, may license suitable persons to carry on the business of clairvoyants, mediums, palmists, card readers, fortune tellers, and persons who claim to tell, give readings of, or reveal the past, present or future, and shall charge for said license a fee of fifty dollars annually.

Section 2. Every such license shall specify the street and number of the building, or give some other particular description thereof, where the licensee shall carry on said business, and said license shall not permit such licensee to carry on said business in any other place than so specified.

Section 3. Said license shall expire on the first day of February in each year.

Section 4. If in the opinion of said licensing board said licensee ceases to carry on the business which he is licensed to pursue, or if in the opinion of said licensing board it is not for the public good that said licensee should carry on his said business as aforesaid, it shall immediately revoke his said license.

Section 5. No person shall advertise or carry on the business of a clairvoyant, medium, palmist, card reader, astrologer, fortune-teller, or person who claims to tell, give readings of, or reveal the past, present or future, until he shall have first obtained a license from said licensing board.

Section 6. Whoever violates any of the provisions or any of the sections of this act shall be fined by a fine of not exceeding one hundred dollars for each offense.

Section 7. This act shall take effect upon its passage.

The above bill is the direct outgrowth of the fraud practiced under the name of Spiritualism. In Boston the fraudulent element is prominent;
so it is in New York, Chicago and St.
Louis and other large cities, and the HONEST MEDIUMS, THE EVAN-GELISTS OF LIGHT, OF LOVE, OF AB-SOLUTE TRUTH, have to suffer in consequence. Some method must be adopted to protect them from having to pay a license. They are nearer to God and the angel world than any of the orthodox divines.

A United States Court Said It Is Obscene.

There seems to be a constant struggle on the part of churchmen, to replace the Bible in schools, from which it has been removed, and to retain it where it is already in use. Do such persons know that a party in Kansas a few years ago was heavily fined in a United States court for having done nothing save making extracts from the Bible, copying them on a postal card, and mailing that card to a churchman who insisted the Bible is not an obscene book? The court decided to the contrary, and amerced the party in heavy costs additional to the fine.

And yet, with these well-established facts in their possession, there are Christians who labor in gossamer and out of season to place obscenity in the hands of youth, and wish a book filled with it used as a text-book in our common schools. Is not that insultation run mad?

They Disregard the Teachings of Jesus.

Now comes the report from Southern Illinois that there is an exodus of Methodist ministers from that region, to an extent that is really alarming.
And all this because of the meager salaries paid them.

We are apprehensive our clerical friends have not read their inerrant Bible as carefully as they should.
Jesus is reported, Luke 3:14, as saying: "Be content with your wages."
With this gospel ringing in their ears, no minister should enter on a strike, or abandon his pulpit because the salary paid is too small.

Why will not the "cloth" observe the teachings of their divine master?

Economy Demanded in Use of Bitter Epithets.

In a prominent editorial of February 2, under the head of "Buddhism—
Was It the Parent of Christianity?
Striking Parallels," we added some additional facts to the lengthy article of two weeks before by Baron Hickey, and gave it as our opinion, in closing,
that with "The press, free and untrammelled the truth must come to the front, and falsehood will retire from the field, crushed by its own exaggerated fabrications."

A correspondent in our issue of two weeks ago seems to have taken us to task, and while admitting a "Striking Similarity Exists between Buddhism and Christianity," yet, after pointing out peculiar features in Christianity, makes the discourteous remark:

"We can show Christianity was derived from Buddhism without resorting to untruths."

The writer clearly conveys the idea that the "critics," in the plural, which must embrace Baron Hickey and this editor, were guilty of "untruths." We do not propose to be captious, nor allow a controversy in these columns; but we must urge correspondents to be more economical of such expressions, as they do not become The Progressive Thinker.

With regard to the discrepancies pointed out between the two systems, learned scholars who have written voluminously on Buddhism, and have commented on the marvelous coincidences between the two systems have declared: "They could not have been accidental." The late lamented Max Muller, whose Oriental scholarship was unequalled in his "Science of Religion," p. 353, wrote:

"Between the language of Buddha and his disciples, and the language of Christ and his apostles, there are strange coincidences. Even some of the Buddhist legends and parables as if taken from the New Testament, though we know that many of them existed before the beginning of the Christian era."

This statement of Prof. Muller agrees with the quotation made by us from Eusebius, who claimed that the Essenes and Therapeutae had writings which "are the very gospels and writings of the apostles," such as are contained in the Epistles to the Hebrews, and many other of St. Paul's Epistles."

Next we open to "Bunsen's Angel-Messiah," page 50, and read:
"The most ancient of the Buddhist records known to us contain statements about the life and the doctrines of Gautama Buddha which correspond in a remarkable manner and in POS-SIBLE BY MERE CHANCE, with the traditions recorded in the gospels about the life and doctrines of Jesus Christ. It is still more strange that these Buddhist legends about Gauda-tama, as the Angel-Messiah, refer to a doctrine which we find only in the Epistles of Paul and the fourth Gospel."

That learned American scholar, Rev. J. Freeman Clarke, author of "The Ten Great Religions," in his first edition, p. 139, says:

"So numerous are the resemblances between the customs of Buddism and the Roman church, the first Catholic missionaries who encountered the priests of Buddha were confounded, and thought Satan had been mocking their sacred rites.
Father Bury, a Portuguese missionary, when he beheld the Chinese bonzes tonsured, using rosaries, praying in an unknown tongue, and kneeling before images, exclaimed, 'astonishment.' There is not a piece of dress, not a sacerdotal function, not a ceremony of the court of Rome, which the Devil has not copied in this country." (Transactions of the Royal Asiatic Society II, 421)

Speaks of the "cellary of the Buddhist clergy, and the monastic life of the societies of both sexes; to which might be added their string of beads, their manner of chanting, prayers, their incense and their candles." Mr.
Medhurst ("China," London, 1857, mentions the image of a virgin, called the "queen of heaven," having an infant in her arms, and holding a cross.
Confession of sins is regularly practised."

Thus we might continue at great length, confirming the statement that these parallels could not have been accidental. And as Buddha is a historical character, died 543 years before our era, confirmed by more than 900 monuments which still remain in the Bombay district, and more than 500 years older than the Christian era, the reader shall be the judge which was the plagiarist, and copied from the other.

It is the opinion of many scholars that the founders of Christianity collated the teachings of the various religious systems in vogue at Alexandria, Egypt, and formed out of them an eclectic system, which was later developed into Christianity, with a hero located in obscure Galilee.

It is the TRUTH we all want, and he who suggests the facts as last stated, is guilty of no "untruth" in giving his opinion on the subject.

The Oldest Human Skeleton.

A cavern at Metone, France, revealed to modern man the bony skeleton of an ancient man, in March of 1872. It was nearly perfect, and all that remains of a tall, well proportioned man, with an average skull and facial angle of 5 degrees of doubtless a cave-dweller in Europe while yet in its semi-savage condition. His bones are associated with those of the cave lion, cave bear and other extinct animals of the pre-historic age. All the bones were in place, surrounded by flint implements and the remains of animals. Twenty-two perforated teeth, which may have been worn as necklaces, lay by the head. These bones, as well as the skull found in a cave at Engis, are believed the oldest human remains now extant. The corroding hand of Time, with the world, the animals, and the elements shut out, was inoperative in their case, only revealing a great antiquity, and evidence that in the very remote past humanity had brain power capable of unlimited development.

If human remains had been buried in the earth as now it is very probable fossil bones of man, as is the case with other animals caught in landslides, would be abundant.

It is probable the center races went down with the continents they occupied, while the Indian ocean, and that vast region, of which the Polynesian islands are remnants, were possibly the home of primitive man.

"Materialization." By Mme. E. d-Esperance and Rev. B. F. Austin.
Excellent. Price 10 cents.

Really Interesting.

Prof. Geo. B. Foster, of the Chicago University, has published a handsome volume entitled "The Finality of the Christian Religion." We have not seen the book, but judge it a production of real merit from the severe criticisms it received from Rev. John B.
Straton, a Baptist clergyman, as related in the Record-Herald of Feb. 12.
Rev. Straton is reported to have said in a discourse on Sunday, the 11th:

"If Prof. Foster's views were immediately accepted they would close every church in Christendom."

Rev. Straton says:
"This author [Prof. Foster] who protests so loudly against 'dogma' makes the dogmatic statement: 'No man with common sense can believe in the miraculous stories portrayed in the Bible.' * * An intelligent man who now affirms his faith in such stories as actual facts can hardly know what intellectual honesty means." This is to say, any man who professes faith in the Bible narrative, or the church, or a rascal. * * I believe the Bible rather than Professor Foster and all of the infidel philosophers of the old world
who he marshals to his aid."

The attorney always believes his client innocent, however pointed and positive the evidence may be to the contrary. The preacher is only an attorney of the church. Bishop Grafton, of Fond du Lac, Wis., said, as heretofore cited in these columns:

"We of the clergy have been made by the church her ministers to teach NOT WHAT WE THINK IS TRUE, BUT WHAT SHE PUTS INTO OUR MOUTHS TO SPEAK."

The reader should always keep that declaration in mind when he hears sermons, or reads the Bible, or the Bible or dogma of the church, or a rascal. * * I believe the Bible rather than Professor Foster and all of the infidel philosophers of the old world
who he marshals to his aid."

Prof. Foster, interviewed in regard to the attacks of his critics is reported as saying:
"The Chicago University is one of the greatest in the world. It encourages free thought and free speech. I have uttered those things which I believe to be so. In my mind I have spoken only downright truth."

And so say all independent thinkers.

The Latest Hypothesis.

A new statement of the old and ever recurring question of the origin of life, is that set forth by Dr. H.
Charlton Bastian, in an article in The World Today. The Chicago Tribune in an editorial article under the caption, "Is Life Still Being Created?"
says:

"There is perhaps no question an authoritative answer to which would interest more people, learned and un-learned, than the old question as to whence came the living beings on the earth, and especially the human beings. The belief once held universally was that every species was the result of a special act of creation by supernatural agency. Darwin thought that 'all the organic beings that have ever lived on this earth may be descended from some one primordial form.' Dr. H. Charlton Bastian combines something from each of these theories with ideas of his own and produces an interesting hypothesis.
He believes living creatures are constantly going through a process of creation, but he denies they are all descended from one primordial form.
He thinks they are descended from many forms and that the creation of new forms—'archeoblasts,' he calls it —is still going on around us all the time."

No one ever saw a new plant or a new animal created. The reason is,
Dr. Bastian explains, that the creation can only be covered with a thin gray fog. My guide informed me that this is pertaining to the Christian church, that war will be all over Europe.

On the night of the last day in February last I saw the most remarkable vision I ever saw. I saw written in the heavens, with letters made of stars, the following: "Caution: The destroyed Mar. 25/1905." Now, as we know, the governor of the province
Caucasus was blown up the night
from the 25th to 26th of May last spring. Right in succession to the first vision, I saw the heavens in bloody red, and in the center I saw a white smoke, and a "shout" from his right hand and a burning torch in his left. This was before the revolution broke out in Russia.

THOMAS PAINE, THE PATRIOT.

His name is Highly Honored in This Twentieth Century.

Thomas Paine has many admirers
among the Spiritualists, and some of his ablest defenders are to be found upon the platform of the Spiritualists, and some of them are members of the Paine Memorial Association of the United States. It was through a series of articles in The Progressive Thinker, that Miss Harlow, of Columbus, Ohio, became acquainted with the work of Miss Jones, who has been constant in attendance at Independence Hall on Decoration Day, with her Laurel Wreath to decorate the portrait of Thomas Paine, placed there through his association in 1875, at a cost of $350, and sixteen years' constant attention, with many defeats, and success crowning our final efforts. We also presented the original editions of Common Sense, and The Crisis, published in 1776 and 1777, where they are now on exhibition, flattered and honored as they now appear after having done service by the camp fires at Valley Forge during that dreadful cold and dreary winter of 1777,
when The Crisis was read to every corpsal guard, by General Washington's special orders.

Marvelously Strange.

He who enters a court of justice and attempts to sustain his case by forged evidence, perjured witnesses, violence, or other unlawful means, the facts being shown, is usually amerced in a heavy fine with bill of costs, is frequently chided by the judge, and is dismissed with dishonor.

The burden of Catholicism throughout all of the centuries has been to compel belief in the character Jesus, commencing with believe or be damned, promising heavenly rewards to a thief for believing, and then, installed in power, instituting the Inquisition, with all its barbarities, to enforce belief.

If Jesus was the divine character they allege, and if the miracles credited to him were true, it would be supposed he left sufficient evidence of his divinity to not need extraneous aids to force that knowledge on the people.

The character Buddha: History tells us when, and where, he was born, and relates much of his doings.
This information is independent of those of his own faith, and is related by those who were contemporary with him, as by the immediate generations which followed; and, remarkable, is it not? his devotees twenty-five hundred years after his death, are found scattered all over those regions near where he lived, and taught, and died.
Can the same be said with truth of the reputed founder of Christianity?

A Prayer Which Will Be Answered.

Prof. Ernest D. Burton, of Hyde Park Baptist Church, says Dr. Harper, late president of the Chicago University, on his death bed, and among his last utterances, prayed:

"And may there be for me a life beyond the grave, and in that life may there be work still to do, tasks still before me."

ANOTHER ANNOUNCEMENT.

Dr. G. B. Warrne to Be at Lily Dale.

Dr. Geo. B. Warrne will lecture at Lily Dale on Sunday, July 15, subject, "ASPIRATION." July 17 he will speak on "TELEPATHY," and the 19th, on "THE VICTORY VAN-QUISHED."

Dr. Warrne's lectures are Gems of Thought. He is intensely in earnest in his speaking, skillful in appealing to the feelings; a superb orator, he gradually lifts his audience onto high planes and holds them there.

Saturday, July 21, will be National

PROPHETIC VISIONS.

Striking Clairvoyant and Clairaudient Experiences.

A have-before me a pamphlet in German, the name of the author is Benjamin, Germany, titled "Mein Geistes-Schau," and I have also read the article in The Progressive Thinker about the same person. It is very interesting to read all these incidents, how they occurred and how they were fulfilled, and the ability of Miss Fernheim is very remarkable.

I was induced by Prof. John George of Jackson, Mich., to give some of my own visions to be published in The Progressive Thinker. The visions I had in my early life I will omit, now speaking of disasters as Miss Fernheim does.

The night before McKinley was assassinated, I saw him lying under a white sheet, and I heard the shot when it was fired at him. I said to my wife, "McKinley got shot." She laughed at me. One-half hour later we got the news.

Another time I saw myself up in the air floating over Europe, and I saw a black cross over each city and town, and I saw a white cross over each thin gray fog. My guide informed me that this is pertaining to the Christian church, that war will be all over Europe.

On the night of the last day in February last I saw the most remarkable vision I ever saw. I saw written in the heavens, with letters made of stars, the following: "Caution: The destroyed Mar. 25/1905." Now, as we know, the governor of the province
Caucasus was blown up the night
from the 25th to 26th of May last spring. Right in succession to the first vision, I saw the heavens in bloody red, and in the center I saw a white smoke, and a "shout" from his right hand and a burning torch in
his left. This was before the revolution broke out in Russia.

THOMAS PAINE, THE PATRIOT.

His name is Highly Honored in This Twentieth Century.

Thomas Paine has many admirers
among the Spiritualists, and some of his ablest defenders are to be found
upon the platform of the Spiritualists, and some of them are members of the Paine Memorial Association of the United States. It was through a series of articles in The Progressive Thinker, that Miss Harlow, of Columbus, Ohio, became acquainted with the work of Miss Jones, who has been constant in attendance at Independence Hall on Decoration Day, with her Laurel Wreath to decorate the portrait of Thomas Paine, placed there through his association in 1875, at a cost of $350, and sixteen years' constant attention, with many defeats, and success crowning our final efforts. We also presented the original editions of Common Sense, and The Crisis, published in 1776 and 1777, where they are now on exhibition, flattered and
honored as they now appear after having done service by the camp fires at Valley Forge during that dreadful
cold and dreary winter of 1777,
when The Crisis was read to every
corpsal guard, by General Washington's special orders.

An Important Lesson.

Which Spiritualists Everywhere Should Carefully Consider—One of Michigan's Favorite Mediums Caught Posing as a Spirit while Dressed in Artificial Toggery.

A SAD, SAD SPECTACLE.

As we have often said before, Spiritualism is PASSING THROUGH A CRISIS which is shaking it from the very center to the circumference, and causing a commotion that is creating excitement among Spiritualists everywhere.

It has been found, we regret to say, that in the ranks of Spiritualism, all is not gold that glitters, and the fact that all materializing mediums exposed heretofore, were dressed in artificial toggery, some of it disgustingly dirty, imposing in a most cruel and heartless manner on their credulous followers, palming off on them bogus spirits for the genuine, and deceiving them in various other ways too numerous to mention, should set Spiritualists to thinking as never before. If anything can open their eyes to the enormity of the fraud being practiced in our ranks, this should.

The process of opening the eyes of Spiritualists to the GREAT WRONG BEING PERPETRATED IN OUR RANKS, has been long and tedious, but has at last been partly accomplished through the unremitting exertion of The Progressive Thinker.

To palm off bogus phenomena for the genuine; to dress as a medium in a wig and other artificial paraphernalia, and pose as a spirit before some one whose heart has been lacerated by the loss of a dear friend,—one who does such work or aids in it should be sent to the penitentiary. One of them has already been placed BEHIND THE BARS, in Michigan, and others will follow. He was a great favorite in that state, and to question his genuineness at one time would have brought down upon the head of the person so doing the anathemas of the host of insatiable gullibles who gazed with distended eyes on his bogus spirits. They would have hurled their choicest epithet or weapon at him,
"Oh, you fraud hunter, you despi-cable grabber of pure mediums!"

and they would have written at once to their rotten fraud organ in Chicago, extolling Maybee's many virtues, and condemning the one who exposed him.
Read the following from a prominent Spiritualist of Michigan:

ANOTHER BOGUS MEDIUM.

John F. Maybee, One of the Most Prominent Materializing Mediums
Before the Public, at Last Caught at His Tricks, Dressed in Artificial Toggery, Posing as a Spirit—He Is Arrested and Sentenced to the House of Correction for Sixty-five Days, Where the Whole Fraudulent Gang Ought to Be.

Two years ago I denounced John Maybee as an absolute fraud to the management of Grand Lodge Camp Mr. Divine, the manager of the grounds, became very indignant at me for daring to make a charge against Mr. M. Mrs. Russell, the business manager, admitted she knew he was a fraud, but says, "What can we do?"
He bound to come here every year; and then Mr. Divine swears by Maybee!

Mr. Erving, the president of the association, said he "always thought the manifestations were genuine." I then explained to them how I detected the fraud. Maybee has a nervous, defiant eye that an observer could pick out among a thousand; a "stubbly" touch to the hand that once felt always remembered. He is naturally thin in structure, but he resembled a stuffed toad at the opening of the séance I attended. The voices of the "spirits" were all the same, disguised husky hollowness; but in spite of this disgusting shallowness to his senses the management of the camp continued to book Maybee as their "materializing medium" from year to year.

"What can we do?" Do without a "materializer"—break up your camp, if necessary, in preference to putting before the investigating public, knowingly, such baseness as the juggling with the only sacred thing we have in life to give us hope of a future existence as a spirit, as on to better things in this mundane sphere. My opinion of John Maybee has at last been confirmed as will be seen by the following special to the daily press:

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the statements uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR articles.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that the Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all requirements being favorable, should be written plainly, with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE. that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

Maggie Henry writes: "Spiritual Mission Chapel (Old 77), our meetings are increasing in attendance. Conference meeting in the afternoon is very interesting. We were favored by some very convincing spirit messages from a visiting medium. In the evening as usual we had a crowded house, and the lecture by our speaker, F. M. Stoller, was especially interesting."

Emil T. Vaas writes: "The German-English society, Bund der Wahrheit No. 13, will give its second spiritual concert for the season on Sunday evening, March 4, 1906, at Brand's Hall, 152 E. North avenue, beginning at 8 o'clock sharp. A very interesting program has been arranged, with Mr. E. T. Vaas as lecturer in English, and Mr. Frank Joseph as message bearer in German and English. Our last concert in January was a grand success, as everybody was well pleased with the evening's entertainment, and a hall well filled, demonstrated the interest people take in Spiritualism, and the elucidation of its principles by the speakers, as well as the messages and tests as given by the mediums. Come, and welcome to all."

R. Haegs writes: "Sunday, Feb. 25, will be concert day at Temple Light and Truth, 370 Wabasha avenue, near Robey. We will have with us good speakers and mediums to give tests and messages. We hope to see all our friends for we know they will go home satisfied."

Dr. Beverly writes: "Wonderful manifestations of spirit power are attracting the people to visit Arlington Hall, Thirty-first street, and Indiana avenue, from 10 to 10 p. m. every Sunday. Last Sunday evening, Dr. Beverly sent a medium's astral body around the world inside of five minutes and made two stops, treating a patient in Benares, India, and one in San Diego, Cal."

L. S. Lowe writes from Clyde, Ohio: "On the evening of Feb. 18, our old friend and townsman, A. B. French, gave us one of the finest lectures we ever listened to. His subject was the 'Progress of Religious Ideas.' He did not confine himself to this thought alone, but followed the progress of man in all the walks of life. The only regret now is that this lecture could not have been reported so the world could have the benefit of it. A large audience listened, and marked attention from first to last."

Mrs. Grunwald writes from Lexington, Ky.: "The society, Church of the Soul, is progressing nicely. I am five years old in the work of Spiritualism, and from the start of my development have worked for the cause with no remuneration. When these spiritual gifts were revealed to me I realized that I had missed in the past, and the thought came to me, and thoughts are things—that all eternity is before me, and when the rapturous thought is ours, one should sing or speak it, and make it a part of the earth's atmosphere. How to reach the people was the question. It was not the spiritualist I wanted to reach; they were all right so far as I knew. It was the people who had never been made happy by the blessed spirit of truth. Well I went to work as pastor, organist and medium. The attendance was small at first but kept increasing. Miss Lizzie Harlow in a lecture delivered at Camp Chesterfield, said that nearly all the people who came into Spiritualism were church members once and brought with them souvenirs from the creeds. Spiritualism is as broad as the universe and each and every one can do a good work. I notice that every speaker and medium is different, but all are needed. Experience in my own city has taught me how to further the cause of Spiritualism and I am making good use of my time. During a discussion in one of the local papers as to what a minister of the gospel should teach, I was asked my opinion and what I taught. I answered that I mingled with the people and learned their needs and how to plead for them with a blessed assurance of everlasting life."

M. H. Terrill writes from Spokane, Wash.: "A fine of ten dollars was imposed on Mrs. Lundeen in last Friday's court. She appealed to the higher court. The arrest of Mrs. Lundeen was due from her not paying the license fee."

The Ingersoll Edition. The edition containing the celebrated address by Col. Ingersoll on "The Devil," has received widespread attention. Orders are still coming for it at the rate of about 2,000 each week. The lectures by Mrs. Longley, Judge North and Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, and the poems in the same paper will also be read by at least 200,000. Orders will still be received at one cent per copy. No order received for less than ten copies.

Mrs. G. Williams writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "The Ladies' Temple Fund Society of Fullerton street, Cleveland, Ohio, is progressing rapidly in their work for the fair to be held in March. Many beautiful articles are in evidence to be disposed of at nominal price. The proceeds are to go towards the temple fund. Prof. W. J. Colville will lecture for the last time this Sunday at the Temple. He will then go to Australia, by way of Cape Horn. His departure will be a source of great regret to the members of the Temple, for the reason that his earnestness, eloquence and erudition have greatly endeared him to them. He will be followed by Mr. and Mrs. Kates."

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "Sister Martha Price, after a long absence, was welcomed by the congregation of the Rising Sun society, 878 S. Western avenue, Sunday afternoon, Feb. 18. The large audience enjoyed her remarks. Sister Lake added her services as message bearer. In the evening Dr. O. B. Miller occupied our platform again and had for his subject, 'Diet and its Relation to Character.' Our full choir was beautiful. Sisters Dill and Kirchener gave some wonderful evidences of spirit return. Sunday, March 4, will be Mediums' Night, and devoted to our message bearers and short talks. Mr. and Mrs. Webb of Philadelphia, and Sister Hart, Ind., were welcome visitors, and they praised our work. The Rising Sun Mission held their third annual package party, at 378 S. Western avenue, Saturday evening, Feb. 17. It was a success socially and financially. The beautiful baritone solo rendered by Mr. Mount was appreciated by all. The six salsas who engaged in the wood sawing contest worked hard, and the on-lookers laughed till the tears ran."

The Brockways have moved to 2962 Prairie avenue. On Sunday, March 4, at 7:45 p. m., will commence a series of parlor test sances and electrical demonstrations, the link between the material and spiritual.

Will C. Hodge writes good news from San Diego, Cal.: "I wish the friends to know that I am once more in San Diego, having made the trip steamer comfortably, and am glad to report improvement in my health, though by no means 'out of the woods.' My physician is of the opinion that another month will find me quite well again, provided no new complications arise to prevent. I wish to thank the many friends who have written me words of sympathy and good cheer, and hope to be in the city to be able to resume my work."

Correspondent writes from Galveston, Texas: "The Spiritualist Temple, of Galveston, Tex., stands a power of influence in the City by the Sea. Its regular services are always well attended; its reading room is visited by many to read and study of the occult, and when special meetings are announced the public freely responds with a full attendance, for they have learned to depend on the judgment of the society as to the reputable workers. From Feb. 14 to and including Sunday, Feb. 18, Max Hoffman of Des Moines, Iowa, held sances for the purpose of testing mediums. Two meetings were held, one on Wednesday, the 21st, the Temple was packed with a most appreciative audience for the last sance, which Mr. Hoffman gave as a benefit to the Temple fund. People of every denomination and line of thought flocked to these meetings, and one Catholic priest sent Mr. Hoffman that he was perfectly satisfied, although dumfounded. Feb. 25 Miss Rosa Baumann and Arthur Behrens were married in the Temple, and March has promise of two other weddings. There are being elaborate preparations for the Anniversary of the last of March. Any one who will be kind enough to send articles for the bazaar to be held, will assist in the worthy work of the Temple. Address in the care of Spiritualist Temple, Galveston, Texas, Mrs. K. McGraw. Mr. John W. Ring, regular speaker for the society, because of having been appointed National Superintendent of the work, has decided to accept a few camp meetings dates for the coming season, although the society very much objects to Mr. Ring's absence from Galveston. Those desiring to secure his services should address him at the Temple, the dates may be arranged."

James Mulligan of Iowa, Wis., narrowly escaped being buried alive today. The funeral procession was on its way to the church, when the driver of the hearse heard groans from within, followed by smashing of the glass in the coffin. The coffin was opened and Mulligan, fully restored to consciousness, sat up and began to inquire where he was. He had been in a trance for three days.

Secretary writes: "The First Spiritual Religious Association of Chickamauga County, Oregon, will hold its annual camp-meeting on its grounds at New Era, from July 7 to July 29 inclusive. As we have not yet procured our mediums we will be glad to communicate with a good platform medium who wishes an engagement for that time. We have good hotel accommodations, tents for rent and one of the most beautiful grounds in the United States, as nature has supplied us with natural shade of the mighty fir, and good water. The nights are always cool and one who needs rest and a change cannot do better than to join us during this camp. All who are interested in the spiritual work are invited to attend. Address all communications to Little Quint Irwin, secretary, or Rev. G. C. Love, president, 427 Sixth street, Portland, Ore."

Mrs. John Lindsey, in past years a well-known medium, is at the Soldiers' Home, Grand Rapids, Mich. She is ill, and desires all her friends to visit her, or write to her.

Mrs. Carrie H. Monr writes: "Please add to the notice of recent date regarding the second annual convention of the Indiana State Association of Spiritualists, that Mrs. Josephine Ropp-Amos of Indianapolis, will assist in giving messages."

KANSAS CITY, MO.
Much Interest in Spiritualism Is Manifested.

To the Editor:—Spiritualism in Kansas City, Mo., is arousing much interest. We have some excellent general places of meeting here, and several places of interest.

Warwick Hall was crowded last Sunday evening. Mrs. Conolly gave a soul-inspiring trance lecture, followed by platform tests by Mrs. Inez Wagner, now of this city, being followed by a skeptic. Names of spiritualists were given with the platform names to the number of 40 at least, without a single failure. Then W. W. Avery was controlled by his guide, a lively and characterful German, in an inimitable style and idiom, gave about fifteen tests, giving names and accurate descriptions without a failure; followed by Mrs. Conolly, who was equally successful.

A lively interest was manifested and loud applause greeted all the tests. An article from the Kansas City Star was read from the platform in which it was stated that a private circle is being held in London attended by eminent scientists. Sir Oliver Lodge was the author of the article. The Queen of England in attending the sances persuaded the king to invite or rather command the medium to visit him. But orders were given for him to enter the palace by a secret door, and the medium flatly refused to do so.

The work in his possession a photograph of Prof. Crookes and the materialized form of Katie King, thus establishing the fact of materialization. It was presented by George P. Olmstead, 1024 Walnut street, Kansas City, Mo.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Passed to spirit life, from his home, Florence, Ohio, Marcus Cable, in the 79th year of his age. He was one of the early pioneers and had from his fifth year resided on the farm his parents selected, from his childhood. He was during his active life an exemplary neighbor and trusted friend. He was a man of high character and firm belief in himself, and firmly believed that this life is only the beginning of an immortal progress, and that from the spiritual realm the departed may come and manifest their presence. A large number of relatives and neighbors braved the storm to pay their last respects to one who had endeared himself to the circle in which he had passed his earthly life. The funeral services were held on the 14th, Emma Rood Tuttle reciting a poem written for the occasion, and Hudson Tuttle giving the address.

Passed to spirit life, Mrs. Garner Willette, aged 83. She had lived with her husband over sixty years, and was left to miss her gentle voice and tender care. The funeral was held at the Ridge Church, Fairfield, Mich., Mrs. G. B. Hoy of Morenci, officiating.

The infant son of Mr. and Mrs. John Miller passed away from the residence of his grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Hiram Lott, in Jacksonport, Mo., on the 14th of January. The writer officiated at the funeral.

Hiram Skinner passed to spirit life from his home in Orion, Mich., Feb. 17, at the advanced age of 75 years. He was a staunch Spiritualist, a worthy citizen, happy, cheerful and kind to all. For some time before his departure he longed for the change, knowing that death had no sting and the grave no victory over the spirit. He leaves a loving wife and daughter. Services were conducted by Laura L. Crawford of Detroit, Mich.

Andrew Johnson, a prominent Spiritualist living near Muncie, Ind., passed to spirit life recently under very distressing circumstances, having been the victim of the wrath of an insanely infuriated man who inflicted fatal injuries upon our ardent friend. Brother Johnson was generally loved by all who knew him, and leaves a host of friends and several near relatives to mourn his departure. The services were conducted by the writer at Maple Grove Church, near Muncie, Ind., on the 19th. The church was crowded with sorrowing friends and neighbors.

MARY ANN CAREW, Wife, Mother, Spirit and Angel.
By Carlyle Petersilea.

This most beautiful story of the experiences of a young wife and mother taken from her home on earth to her home in the spirit world, is told in such a realistic way, that one is carried away with the sweet beauty and naturalness of it. It makes the other world appear very near to us. This book has been a great comfort to many weary hearts who have lost mother, wife or babies. Price, neatly bound in cloth, $1.

WINTERING IN CUBA.
Mrs. Marian Carpenter Writes Notes of Travel and Enjoyment.

To the Editor:—It may be of interest to you to learn of our experiences since leaving home. Having spent two successive winters in Cuba, we find the desire to back in the balmy breezes of this most delightful climate too strong to be resisted. We thoroughly enjoyed the trip via St. Louis, Mobile, and the Munson Line to Havana, also the trip last year via Tampa, Fla., was very pleasant and interesting. However, we decided to try the New York route. Our party (consisting of thirteen persons) met in New York City at the office of the Munson Steamship line, on the morning of December 20, and completed the arrangements for sailing the same afternoon at 3 o'clock. Strange to relate, our good ship, the Olinda began to move slowly down East river promptly on time, presenting to those gathered on dock an interesting view of that section of the greater metropolis passing down along the battery past the statue of Liberty, and Staten Island, into the blue waters of the great Atlantic that was to bear us onward to our destination.

After the pilot had been taken off, we watched the shores of Uncle Sam's domain gradually fade into the fast gathering twilight. We were brought back to a realization of our immediate surroundings by the sound of the dinner bell, and we lost no time in making our way to the dining room, where we were quickly assigned our places. The festive board, for the time that we were to make the Olinda our abiding-place. We proceeded to do full justice to the good things set before us by our Spanish waiter, whose poor efforts to interpret our English, were lost sight of in his earnest endeavors to serve us bountifully.

After dinner we repaired to the upper deck, where we were better acquainted with our fellow-passengers, and incidentally got our sea-legs. All went well until about 9 p. m. The waves began to break about our good ship in a way that dispelled all hopes of a smooth voyage, and we land-lovers suddenly bethought ourselves of the fact that we were quite tired, and besides, we required the soothing influence of our berth to assist in retaining our equilibrium. However, notwithstanding all efforts, a large majority of us were forced to part with the sumptuous repast of which we had partaken.

After about thirty hours of this squally weather, interspersed with occasional upbreezings, we finally emerged into smoother waters, gradually the passengers began to appear on deck, all looking worse for the experience. The remainder of the voyage was delightful.

We saw a water-spout pass in the distance, and as we reached the more tropical waters of the Gulf Stream, and Bahama Islands, we watched the silvery flying fish, and schools of porpoises, as they leaped from wave to wave. On Christmas day, about 5 p. m., we steamed into Buena Vista Bay, where we were to remain for two days while the lighters came on from Port Cabaireen, to take off the freight, and allow the purser to go on to Cabaireen (about 17 miles distance) to obtain clearance papers, provisions, etc.

When leaving the cold North with its leafless trees, the slight of the green shores, the distant waving palms, and the delicately colored skies certainly go to make up a most beautiful and interesting picture.

After casting anchor we filed into the dining room to partake of our Christmas dinner, "naturally" turkey and cranberry sauce went to make up an important item on the menu card. While the ship was lying in the bay we were kept busy watching the sharks, that came to feed on the garbage thrown overboard. We saw some quite large specimens, among swiftness, sawfish, ray snapper, gray snapper, and many other varieties, that we failed to learn the names of.

On the evening of the 27th, we pulled up anchor and steamed down the coast for our destination, via Pt. Neuvitas. We arrived at the entrance of the channel the next morning, and under the guiding hand of the pilot soon came to anchor in Neuvitas bay, which is a land-locked harbor with an area of about 6,000 acres. It is one of the finest harbors on the island. There is deep water within 150 yards of the shore, allowing all boats to approach within this distance.

We lost no time in getting to shore, where after passing the rough customs inspection, we were fortunate enough to catch the train to Canet, situated 24 miles inland. The railroad passes by our very door, so that our transportation facilities are second to none on the island. The Puerto Principe and Neuvitas railroad (upon which we are located) connecting at Camaguey (a city of about 25,000 inhabitants, situated 21 miles further inland from Canet) with the Cuban Central railroad, the terminus of which is Santiago de Cuba, and Havana to the West end of the island.

We have twenty houses (American style of building) besides a two-story hotel, also a store where we can purchase almost everything we require in Books by Carlyle Petersilea.

Owing to the great demand for these books, we have prepared a new edition of Mary Ann Carew and Oceanides. We can now supply the friends that have long wanted these books. Price of "Oceanides," 50 cents; "Mary Ann Carew," $1.

the way of provisions, and general merchandise. We found our orange trees and other citrus fruits doing nicely. Some of the trees are in bloom. We set these trees out two years next March. We have fruit getting on the orange, lemon and tangerine trees, and we have had the pleasure of sampling some of the fruit, and must say that the flavor is unexcelled, the size large, color all that can be desired. The grape fruit here is delicious, and can scarcely be recognized as such, for we pay 15 to 25 cents for in the States. The grape fruit here is much larger, and more luscious. We pay 5 cents each for nice large, juicy ones.

We now have nine varieties of oranges, two varieties of lemons, one of the varieties (the American wonder) grows very large, will weigh from 2 to 3 pounds, and possesses all the good qualities of the ordinary lemon. They make excellent pies, which we frequently partake of. We also have growing and fruiting four varieties of bananas; we now have three bunches of as many varieties of fruit on the porch. We never saw some of these varieties in the States, as they are too delicate to stand shipment.

We have a number of grape fruit trees, also tangerines, satsuma, and kumquats, these are a species of oranges, and like coffee trees. The raspberry plants brought from home seem to be growing nicely. Besides all tropical fruits mentioned, we have potatoes, ready to eat, and some that we have recently planted, in fact we are daily partaking of all the green vegetables that we are accustomed to eat here in their season—onions, peas, beans, radishes, lettuce, tomatoes, cabbage, beets, turnips, cucumbers, etc.

You will see that we are enjoying the summer luxuries that we have in the North. Interspersed with social parties, and horseback rides, the time flies. We shall return home about April 1. My health is very much improved, and hope to be in a position to fill my eight weeks of continuous camp work. Our cause is recognized here, and is progressing slowly. We enjoy reading The Progressive Thinker, and wish you continued success.

A MEMORIAL TRIBUTE
To an Earnest Friend and Worker Passed On.

At the regular monthly meeting of Parkland Heights Spiritualists Home and Camp-meeting Association, held in Parkland, on Saturday evening, Feb. 17, 1906, at the residence of Mrs. August C. Volk, the secretary offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted by the society in recognition of the high esteem in which we held our friend:

In the passing to the higher life on the first day of February, 1906, of our dear friend and co-worker, William R. McGinnis, treasurer of Parkland Heights Spiritualists Home and Camp-meeting Association, the officers and members feel that the society has sustained a great loss, therefore, be it Resolved, That we unite in expressing our appreciation of the true worth of this good and noble man, who was so faithful in the discharge of his official duties.

Resolved, That we are deeply grieved that we shall no more have amongst us his mortal presence to help, sustain, and encourage in the great work we have undertaken of building up a camp-meeting at Parkland, Pa.—a work in which he was among the first to join with heart and hand.

Resolved, That we recognize the fact that he will be sadly missed in many ways in many places, we realize that the saddest loss of all is felt in his home. Therefore, be it Resolved, That our love and sympathy be tendered to his bereaved family, and may they be sustained by the higher influence through this trying ordeal; and have the best realization of his continued companionship.

Resolved, That we can honor the memory of our ardent friend and co-worker in no better way than by striving to exemplify in our own lives the principles of Spiritualism—the religion of Humanity—through the recognition of the Fatherhood of God, and the Brotherhood of Man; that we consecrate our lives to the upbuilding of Parkland, that it may become a center of high spiritual thought that shall radiate its light of truth far and near; that in this work we shall continue to have the co-operation of our dear brother, William R. McGinnis. Be it also

Resolved, That these resolutions be published in the Spiritualist press; also, that two copies be framed in oak, one to be given to his dear wife, Ida V. McGinnis, the other hung upon the wall at the place of our public services.

CONVENTION PROCEEDINGS.

The Mass Meeting of the Illinois State Spiritualists Association.

No true medium who attended the mass meeting can easily misconstrue the sense of the audiences regarding the difference in standing between the false and the true in mediumship, and the necessity for a general purging. The signs of the times point in that direction and the laws of spiritual growth demand it.

It makes one glad to see new faces, but there's something in the old that lends new life to social places. And brings warmth to hearts grown cold.

It is a noticeable fact that each year brings many new faces upon the scene of action at these meetings, until to-day the attendance from the world outside the ranks predominates at some of our meetings; but the staid and earnest workers of the state association still hold the reins.

President Warner, with his perfect familiarity with the affairs of the association, and his executive co-workers, are assurance of the success of the association, in all its undertakings.

Tuesday Evening, February 20.

In spite of the incessant downpour of rain up to the hour of meeting Tuesday evening, about 200 people gathered at Handel Hall to listen to the rendering of the excellent program arranged for the occasion, and which has been published in The Progressive Thinker, and the readers must consider it carried out, with the usual emergency changes, for we shall not refer to it often.

The music furnished by Prof. Jos. Singer was always rich and sweet—a poem of harmony—and it was appreciated by all who were in advance of any furnished on previous similar occasions.

Rev. B. F. Austin's address was a masterly production and carried great weight with the audience. Indeed, his presence on the spiritual rostrum has lent new impetus to the cause wherever he has been heard.

Mrs. Georgia G. Cooley did herself credit on this occasion in her work as message bearer, and received many appreciative demonstrations from the audience.

One of the musical selections that raised the vibrations of the poetic soul of the reporter to its highest pitch was the "cello solo by Paul Schoenling. It was simply sublime, and the thanks of the appreciative audience were due to Prof. Singer, the musical director, for the presentation of the same.

Wednesday, February 21.

Wednesday morning's brightness permitted a large attendance, the business session where many vital subjects were discussed, and reports of outside societies heard, and impressive words listened to. Mr. Willing spoke of the awful fight that the Iowa Spiritualists have recently been mixed up in with the charlatan element, and commended the position taken by The Progressive Thinker, also telling of how the false element is organizing to down this paper for standing up for truth. The applause given his remarks were plaudits for The Progressive Thinker, and the cleansing and purifying process should go on. He is vice-president of the M. V. S. A., and an able leader.

Mrs. Grimshaw said the St. Louis Spiritualists have troubles of their own and we all believe it, and extend sympathy.

The election of officers resulted as follows: Geo. B. Warner, president; Mrs. Ella J. Bloom, vice-president; Dr. H. A. Cross, secretary; A. M. Griffin, treasurer; Mrs. Carrie Francis, Chicago; W. E. Hammond, Rockford; Orrin Merritt, Genoa, trustees.

Wednesday afternoon, the address by Wm. V. Nicum was interesting and well received, as was that of Hugh S. Fraser.

Mrs. C. C. Pierce sang beautifully a soprano solo, "Sing Me to Sleep," accompanied by Jos. Singer with a violin obligato. Mrs. Burlingame, Mrs. Barbara Hilbert and H. S. Fraser, as message bearers, did good work.

In the evening, Rev. B. F. Austin's address upon "Can Any Good Come Out of Hydesville?" which he calls a quotation from the new bible—the spiritual bible—was an instructive, eloquent and forceful presentation of the many good things Spiritualism is doing and has done for the world. He wove in much of personal observation and experience.

Thos. Grimshaw started in slowly and deliberately, and rapidly and unqualifiedly denounced the fraud in the ranks and eulogized the truth. His subject, Weak and Strong Points in Spiritualism, gave him the license he accepted to crush many theological strong-points and elevate Spiritualism. He said he had been accused of being against mediumship but it is the "pretenders" he would wipe out of existence. Here is a speaker Spiritualists never can get enough of. His wit is sparkling, and his common sense very much in evidence. He kept his audience in an uproar until his last words were spoken, with his pointed sarcasm and method of putting it.

The violin solo by Miss Lida Hatch and the songs by Mrs. Pierce were charming, and the messages by Dr. Burgess and Mrs. Kirchner were appreciated.

Thursday, February 22.

The morning conference, in which about twenty speakers and mediums took part, was interesting and the conclusion to be drawn is that there is still a brilliant array of oratory, a stupendous measure of grit and a constellation of sparkling wit in the ranks of Spiritualism. Mediumship was well discussed by mediums, speakers and laymen, and perhaps a better understanding as a result. Even Dr. Warner's position ought not to be longer misunderstood. The subject was upon mediumship.

At the afternoon session, Rev. B. F. Austin delivered an address upon "Thought Power and How to Use It." The harp solo by Walfrid Singer was exceptionally good.

The messages by Mrs. Lichtig and Mrs. Schwahn were received with appreciation and the cornet solo by Mr. Ray Moffatt, nephew of Mrs. J. R. Francis, was exceptionally fine.

A resolution was offered disapproving of the hanging of Johann Hoch. Spiritualism is not in favor of capital punishment, and upon that ground the resolution was adopted.

Messages of cheer and congratulation were received from the Wisconsin, the Indiana and the Missouri State Associations, and from Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader of Philadelphia, Pa.

At the evening session, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond delivered an address upon "The Spiritual Outlook and Foregleams for 1906." She reached out into the whole world with the outlook and foregleams for the present year, showing the undercurrent of spiritual manifestation in all that science is finding and in the progress of religions and nations.

The duet by Joseph Singer and Mr. E. Carlson upon the violin and cello, was sweet and beautiful.

Thomas Grimshaw's address upon "Spirit Communion and What It Implies" was delivered in trance.

A song by Mr. Arthur Hooper, a few tests by Mrs. Georgia G. Cooley and Mrs. Isa Cleveland, and one of the most successful and most harmonious sessions of the association since its inception, came to a close.

These notes would be very incomplete without comment upon the noticeable aid the Sunflower Club rendered the State Association during the entire session of the convention. It seems like trying to keep house without a woman in it to think of getting along without this club. Each one worked with untiring energy toward the success of the meetings. It is an important auxiliary to the Illinois State Association. And these thoughts and the activity of these ladies of this important auxiliary inspire these lines:

The Sunflower.

The sunflower speaks to the human heart
Its message of love and life;
It tells of a germ, light and heat—a start;
Eternal struggle and strife.

It speaks from the great and mighty deep,
Of a force not understood;
It speaks of labor and a trance-like sleep,
Of Nature's motherhood.

It speaks of a past and future time;
Of the bloom of days gone;
It speaks of a wealth of sweets sublimed;
It speaks of another dawn.

It speaks of this grand old earth—the roll
Through space of this wee ball;
It speaks of the great eternal whole.
"Sunflower Club" and all.

[Advertisement.] SPIRITUALISTS, ATTENTION! Something About the Tricks of Illusion and Legerdemain, That Are Worthy of Careful Consideration.

Tricks of Illusion and Legerdemain are all right in their place as diversions, but are entirely out of place in the spiritual sciences. Spiritualism is a grand and beautiful science, a celestial truth, and its followers should use every effort to prevent its name from being smeared by the tricks of illusion and Legerdemain. A bogus test or a fraudulent manifestation of any sort is of NO VALUE, whatever it is to the Spiritualist or investigator, but an insult to them and to THEIR ARISEN FRIENDS. The book, "Mysteries of the Seance," written by a life-long Spiritualist and investigator, and endorsed and heartily recommended by the most able of our leading Spiritualists, will put you as to the methods of tricksters in producing every phase of bogus manifestations, and will enable you to detect and expose the fraud. The author has received hundreds of grateful letters from those who have had their eyes opened to the truth and who have thus been able to expose and drive out of the work many who had been doing a flourishing business among the gullible. The marvelous disclosures made in this book are positively startling and seem incredible, but every statement can be proven. Price 25 cents, or 6 copies for $1. postpaid. Special low rates for quantities. Address ED. LUNT, Station A, Boston, Mass.

THE WEEDS WILL CONTINUE TO GROW.

Ninety percent of humanity are unconsciously breeding and nursing germs of diseases in their systems, like neglected gardens growing weeds instead of flowers. Your system is like a garden. It is the natural bed for breeding millions of germs of disease. Did you ever see a garden where all the weeds were destroyed one year but that they also made their appearance again next year? If you could destroy the seed of every weed in that garden this year, the air if nothing else, will carry more seeds in it next year. Air is the agency that carries the germs of disease into the head and air passages and it must be the agency to remove them. Let the weeds grow in your garden and they will choke and ruin all that is good. Let the germs of disease continue to multiply in the air passages of your head, throat and lungs unattended and you are doing far worse. You are destroying the system of a noble human being worth more to you than all the gardens in the world. YOU MUST KEEP ON WEEDING. I am making a common sense offer to the readers of The Progressive Thinker. Carefully read it, ponder over it, then act quickly, confidently and be assured that you will be fairly, and honestly dealt with.

THE E. J. WORST CATARRH TREATMENT THE ONLY SUCCESSFUL TREATMENT FOR CATARRH ENDORSED BY THE UNITED STATES HEALTH REPORT.

Read What They Say. Washington, D. C., Oct. 13, 1900. We are constantly receiving letters from all over the country asking for information on the subject of Catarrh and the air passages of the head. We have been asked time and again to recommend some remedy which can be used with good results, for these diseases.

To benefit the public at large, and to answer their questions, we have recently commissioned our Board of Experts to investigate the subject of Catarrh and its cure, to find some remedy, which would successfully meet the conditions and be easy and simple of application. The report of the Board of Experts has been handed in, and as a result, we are pleased to recommend a treatment which was manufactured by the E. J. Worst Mfg. Co., Idea of Medicated Air treatment very successfully, and has designed the neat and efficient little instrument which is becoming so well known as the E. J. Worst Catarrh Mediator. It conveys the true principle of forcing medicated air as an agent into every cavity of the head.

As a result of this investigation, we are glad to certify to E. J. Worst's Catarrh Treatment the unqualified endorsement of the United States Health Reports. A. N. TALLEY, JR., M. D., Washington, D. C.

HAD ARRANGED A TEST.

Hodgson Had Code to Send Spirit Signals—Dr. Funk Doubts 'Messages' Because It Was Not Followed.

A code of signals [says the Boston American] to be sent from the spirit world was arranged for by Dr. Richard Hodgson, one of the foremost students of the psychic phenomena, and Dr. I. K. Funk of New York, shortly before the death of the former.

Two alleged messages from the spirit of Dr. Hodgson to Dr. Funk have been received through the mediumship of the Rev. P. A. Wiggin of the Unit Church of this city, but because they do not contain any of the identifying messages agreed upon Dr. Funk refuses to believe them genuine.

Dr. Hodgson had been president of the Psychical Research Society of London, and at the time of his death he was secretary of the American branch. He had devoted years of his life to the investigation of psychical matters and was a close friend of the noted medium, Mrs. Piper, many of whose most famous experiments were made under his direct supervision.

Before his death he agreed with Dr. Funk, one of his most intimate friends, that, if possible, he would send messages from the spirit world. So that Dr. Funk would know that the messages came from Dr. Hodgson certain signals were agreed upon.

"Hodgson Must Try Again."

On the evening of January 26 Mr. Wiggin announced that he had received a message from Dr. Hodgson for Dr. Funk. It contained certain statements in regard to the death of Dr. Funk's wife. Dr. Funk repudiated it because the circumstances cited were true in connection with the death of his mother, not his wife.

Now another message, explaining the mistake in the first, has been received by Mr. Wiggin and transmitted to Dr. Funk. This, Dr. Funk refuses to believe genuine, because it does not contain any of the signals agreed upon by Dr. Hodgson and himself.

"It is up to Dr. Hodgson to try again," said Dr. Funk after he had received the message. "The explanation of the mistake is very good. The mistake certainly was made, but whether by Dr. Hodgson or Dr. Wiggin I cannot tell. I have received many messages which have mystified me greatly, but I am not yet convinced that any spirit message sent me was genuine."

Agreed on Messages.

"Neither of the alleged messages from Dr. Hodgson's spirit that I have received are satisfactory. In this second message Dr. Hodgson is made to say that the mistake in the previous message was due to the faulty mediumship of the medium. No new message of identification is sent, however."

Before Dr. Hodgson died he and I agreed upon certain messages of identification, and he was business man enough to know that we would not accept any other messages as authentic."

"If Dr. Wiggin is really in communication with Dr. Hodgson's spirit, why don't they get down to business and give us the necessary messages?" The alleged message was delivered before a large audience in Jordan Hall. Another message received was from the spirit of Joseph H. May of Maine to a friend named Reynolds, who had recently arisen in the audience and identified himself.

The message from Dr. Hodgson, according to Dr. Wiggin, the medium, was to be delivered to Dr. Funk. The substance of it was later telephoned to New York by Dr. Wiggin.

GIRL'S DREAM OF DEATH TRUE.

What Was It, if Not Spirits, That Induced this Little Girl to Have a Vision of Her Tragic Death?—Wise Ones in Spirit Life Foresaw the Accident.

Two hours before the fatal street car wreck at One Hundred and Sixty-third street, and the Pennsylvania railroad Sunday night, a child distinctly saw the accident in a dream. She described it accurately to her parents, and had not recovered from the terror inspired by the vision when the collision occurred.

The vision of death, in which she herself and two others were killed and buried, came to May Warfue, the 11-year-old daughter of Jesse Warfue, 4934 Princeton avenue, Chicago.

"My wife, my little girl and I," said the father yesterday, "had gone to the home of my brother, E. R. Warfue, in Hammond, to spend the day."

"The little girl became sleepy and lay down on a couch in the dining-room. We were in another part of the house. At 9 o'clock we were aroused by a scream from May. Running in, we found the child lying on the floor and crying with terror."

"O, I had such a horrible dream," she said. "I dreamed we were in a street car, and we were run over by a railroad train, and I was under a big, heavy thing and was killed. You and mamma were hurt, and everybody was trying to help. I don't want to go home in the street car."

"I held her close and tried to quiet her, but she was hysterical for the rest of the evening, and soon we started for home. The child begged to be left behind with her uncle, and she was so nervous that I could scarcely keep her in her seat on the way home, and I had my arm around her when the crash came. The poor little girl's back was broken, and she never knew what killed her."

A BEAUTIFUL VISION.

It Occurred at a Revival Meeting Where Spirits Are in Attendance Just as Much as at a Seance of Spiritualists.

Lapeer, Feb. 22.—Falling in what appeared to be a faint as she started forward to the altar at the revival services in the Methodist Protestant church, Mrs. George Wurgess, wife of a Lapeer (Mich.) county farmer, avers she did not faint, but lapsed into a sort of sleep, wherein she says she saw a vision some fifteen minutes in length. Speaking of her experiences, she said:

"I saw the Lord (a spirit, simply standing on a beautiful hillside, and around him were multitudes of little children. Among them was my little brother, who died some time ago. I also saw my dead father standing with

A PLEA FOR HIGHER AIMS.

An Ardent Spiritualist Makes an Earnest and Comprehensive Appeal to Have Advance Along Religious Lines.

To the Editor:—I have just been reading President Barrett's communication in your issue of February 3. I have been a close reader of your paper for the past year, and I must say I have been deeply impressed by the narrowness of mind of some of its contributors. I have only been a Spiritualist for the last five years, but have tried earnestly to expand, grow, and develop spiritually, and I must say, I understand the teachings and vital points of Spiritualism, and I certainly do teach us to be broad and liberal-minded.

President Barrett rightly, to my mind asserts that there is a wide difference between religion and theology. Taking the many definitions of the meaning of the word religion given in his article, I want to ask if Spiritualism is not a religion, what is it? If it is to be pure and clean physically, morally and mentally, is not to be religious, then I am at a loss for an interpretation of the word religion; and that is what my spiritual guides teach me is the great object of Spiritualism.

From the general tenor of communications I have come to the conclusion that we cannot expect Spiritualism to become a WORLD-POWER until Spiritualists as a whole lay aside, to some extent at least, their positive, that faculty of—I am right, and all others are wrong; in plain English, become broad-minded and liberal in the true sense of word; and when we do become so, we will be more united, and instead of a great many small societies run by different mediums as a means of advertisement, we will have fewer places in which to meet, and larger audiences, and we will have times set apart for the instruction of the children in this great philosophy and religion.

I have been to a great many spiritual societies, and have invariably been struck by the absence of children.

Let Spiritualists unite as the Baptists, Methodists and Catholics do, and instruct the children in this beautiful work, and in one generation our cause will leap forward far beyond anyone's expectations.

I have found by experience that to benefit by Spiritualism, one must not rest at any stage of advancement, but must strive continually to grow in Spirituality and expand morally and mentally, for that is to be our eternal work—to try and perfect ourselves.

As we become more perfect we will be more able to see our own faults, and more able to correct them, which should be our life work—the mastery of self. So I say in conclusion, let us all lay aside our little jealousies and petty findings, have more charity, and above all allow each and every one the right to their respective opinions, for no two minds have the same receptivity.

FROM MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA.

The Good Work Being Done There by Mrs. L. E. Wulf.

To the Editor:—We are having very interesting meetings every Sunday afternoon at 3 p. m., and a full attendance, in the parlour of the Wulf home, Mrs. L. E. Wulf being the medium. Her guide, Aristotle, the great philosopher, speaks through her, and his lectures are fine. His subject has been for the last three Sundays, "The Increasing Tide." Last Sunday, Mrs. Wulf being a trance medium, gave readings daily. No fraud with her, but good, truthful and spiritual messages.

I think the need of the hour is to work diligently with our heart, soul and truth combined. Seek out those who need the comfort and solace of the truth of immortality.

The need of the hour is to be encompassed about and within the love, "God given," for our brothers and sisters who are groping their way in darkness and unbelief of the happy way of Spiritualism, being engrossed with the material things of life, their eyes being blind and the whole being absorbed with the trifling things of life. The need of the hour is for us to work with the angel world for humanity, leading the mistaken out of the paths of error and injustice one to another, where they can see and feel the power of the gospel of love to God and man; living in the spirit, being kind, not nagging nor deceiving; not living for the things of this world, but for the things of the spirit where one can come in touch with his own divine power.

HONEST MEDIUMS.

Such and Only Such Should Be Sustained.

To My Many Friends:—After a long and painful illness, lasting about five months, I am again able to be at work, and I take this way of informing my many friends from whom I received so many encouraging letters during my illness. I will try to answer each one personally as soon as possible.

I received an anonymous letter the other day, charging me with being an enemy to all mediums. I was greatly surprised, and will say now, I am a friend to all honest mediums, and any such coming to our place will receive a warm welcome and will be royally entertained. But only those that will go under strict test conditions need come—no honest medium will object to that.

A noted materializing medium wrote me and wanted to come to our city and hold seances at my home. I wrote him that we would be glad to entertain him providing he was willing to go under test conditions, and willing to have two officers of the law at the first seance. He wrote back he had made other engagements—so draw your own conclusions.

I am glad indeed to see the way The Progressive Thinker is coming out and trying to rid our ranks of fraud. Of course it gives a true lover of Spiritualism great pain to hear the constant cry of "fraud" by its opponents, and when to this disgraced word "fraud" is added the still more opprobrious term "fith" it requires some nerve to say unflinchingly in the face of those who revile the name: "Yes, I am a Spiritualist."

One of the most pernicious doctrines that has ever been sustained by Spiritualists is that the moral character of the medium is of no consequence. I have heard that constantly sustained by Spiritualists of long standing, and I have never heard it without dissenting from it in my own soul. I believe in making a moral character more important than mediumship.

In the first place let us seek communications only from high and noble spirits whose teachings can ennoble and purify our own character; opening the door to undeveloped spirits only with a view to aiding them by our own moral strength. And in the second place let us have no private sittings, attend no seances, and patronize no public test medium unless they are willing to go under test conditions and are sure that they make their own personal purity and truth their first object in life. We have many such mediums in our ranks, and only such should be patronized both in public and private.

SUCCESS OF A SPIRITUALIST.

A. P. Roberts, Clairvoyant, Told Where Body of Duncan McGregor Would Be Found.

The Milwaukee Free Press says that Mr. A. P. Roberts, the clairvoyant, has just achieved additional fame by the confirmation of his prophecy, given last August that the remains of Duncan McGregor, the Marinette capitalist, would be found under a log jam in the river near that city. Mr. Roberts made his prediction in face of persistent rumors that Mr. McGregor had been seen in different parts of the country. Mrs. McGregor came to Milwaukee in August last, consulted Mr. Roberts, who told her all the particulars of the death of her husband, where the remains would be found, and that while important papers would be missing from his person, that his pocket book, containing $13 would be found on the remains. All these particulars were confirmed. The clairvoyant informed Mrs. McGregor that her husband had been killed by a buggy with two men that when they reached a spot marked by three trees, one of which overhung the river bank, they had thrown the unsuspecting man into the river, that his remains would be found under a certain group of logs, as soon as the log jam was removed.

During the present week the log jam was broken, and at the identical spot indicated by the clairvoyant the remains of the unfortunate man were found. One of the peculiar features of the case is that Mr. Roberts has never been within a hundred miles of Marinette, yet he described the spot accurately.

An attempt was made to recover the remains before the log jam broke, so firm was the faith of some of the people of Marinette that the clairvoyant had solved the mystery, and Roberts advised Mrs. McGregor to withdraw her offer of $1,000 reward, and await the favorable opportunity for the recovery of the remains.

SPIRITS INDUCE A DREAM.

And the Result Is a Most Remarkable Invention.

A Pennsylvania woman, Mrs. Kate Dymond, has obtained a patent for a window curtain hanger, the idea of which came to her, as she says, in a dream.

Mrs. Dymond dreamed one night she was putting up curtains to her parlor windows. After the task was finished to the dream she suddenly noticed the hangers to which the curtains were fastened. They were little brackets at each side of the windows and were different from any curtain hangers she had ever seen. The dream had intense vividness, so that Mrs. Dymond remembered it perfectly on awaking.

She was so impressed that next day she took pieces of old stovepipe and reproduced with these the dream curtain fasteners. They were found to be an improvement and quite practical.

Mrs. Dymond obtained a patent on her invention and is manufacturing the fasteners.

His Portrait Found Imbedded in a Rock.

I have made a great discovery. I can prove the existence of the Devil, for I found his picture on a limestone; also that of Christ looking up into the heavens, and one dozen angel faces. One of them is Moses, or an Egyptian king. If the Devil is a fact—exists—let it matter our souls and conditions? Can truth hurt us, or is it better to grope in darkness?

There came our grand Dr. Peebles. God bless him! He proved the existence of bad spirits and showed how they can influence and ruin us, and also how to protect ourselves. Clara Watson and others claimed he ruined the "happiness" of our beautiful religion, and poisoned our lives. Some wanted to burn him, his books and type. What will they say, if I can show them the picture of the very Prince of Darkness made by his majesty, the Devil himself; also the likeness of Christ made by the same authority. The Devil, a great big man, yes, his very eyes, for his nostrils, and surrounded by a dozen angels, also a lion and a bear—all shown on a small limestone 6 x 8 inches. The fact is, I do not see these pictures; he is only visible at a specific distance of seven feet. No camera, no human being on earth can produce or reproduce a picture like this of the Devil to be visible only at 7 feet. All the camera could catch was the picture of Christ, and only one other angel face. Now do all these pictures come on a small bit of limestone? Every one who can see them will declare that they are made by intelligences, and not washed together by the elements, and called fraud of nature.

This is a great time we are living in. Ingersoll tried to kill the devil, but he failed; but on the contrary he raised the Devil by denying his existence. See the murders in Chicago and New York; six murderers in the Helena jail or on trial. Our clergy are powerless—and religion is a mockery, and its priests hypocrites. It is high time to stop the ignorant on their road to hell and destruction. I alone with my stone can do more to stop crime than all the clergy combined. I set the murderers in jail crazy when they see there is a Devil. The law, and its promises of reward and punishment can stop crime. It is only the fear of the Devil which brings them to reason. What a terrible religion we are drifting into. Those terrible crimes have to be met with a horrible fact, the Devil, to awaken people from the delusion that crime is washed away by blood, and they are at for heaven the next day after committing a murder, if they feel sorry. THE N. S. A. MISSIONARY.

He Rises in The Progressive Thinker to Make an Explanation.

To the Editor:—Brother George C. Day of Allegheny, Pa., in an article recently published in your splendid paper, called my attention to the seeming slight he and his society had received at our hands in our last missionary report, and I wish to explain the matter before it is too late. I am very thankful to Brother Day for calling my attention to it, as I had not discovered it before.

In hastily correcting my manuscript preparatory to sending it to the press, I inadvertently and unintentionally left out the good things that I had said about Brother Day and his society, and not a few of our friends kindly grant me space to rectify this miserable blunder.

I would not misrepresent any one intentionally, and certainly not one who is doing such excellent work as Brother Day is doing, nor a society of my own organizing, of which I was indeed proud. What was published in the article mentioned regarding it will prove this.

The following is what I supposed I had said, and what I am glad to say now:

Rev. Geo. C. Day has been the pastor of this society (the First Church of Spiritualists of Allegheny, Pa.) for several years. Under his ministrations the efficient labors of his board of officers with Brother S. B. Fetzner president, the members all supporting them, true Spiritualism in Allegheny is becoming better understood.

Mr. Day is not only a good speaker but he is also a good test medium. We witnessed some of his seances, and were glad to say that his psychometric readings, messages and tests, were of the best and in themselves were comforting to their recipients.

It is a pleasure to me to be able to say this and to correct the wrong impression my mistake caused.

HONEST MEDIUMS WILL SUFFER.

All in Consequence of the False Afflicting Our Ranks—Spokane, Wash., Is the City.

Major R. D. Gwydir, city license inspector, was burning up his spectacles yesterday afternoon, preparatory to starting on a hunt for clairvoyants, soothsayers, fortune tellers, mediums who go into trances, and those who fall to go into trances, Spiritualists, and seventh sons of seventh sons.

After the decision rendered in my favor by Justice Hinkle, this afternoon I propose to make this fortune teller come up with $50 a quarter license, said the Major. "I have about 30 on my private list and I believe others can be found. It is about time the town was getting some substantial revenue out of those of the forecasters who are telling about the future and the past for a monetary return. Business is exceptional good, and I judge by the number who bring it, and they can doubtless afford to give the city part of the profits." Spokane Review.

When Prof. Richard Hodgson, of the Psychological Research Society, fifteen or twenty years ago, commenced investigating the phenomena of Spiritualism, he wrote to me for any information I might be able to give on the matter. I at once sent him some genuine spirit photographs, which I deemed conclusive evidence of spirit return. He promptly wrote me that he considered them "of no evidential value." He sent the pictures to one S. W. Falls of Chicago, who, as he (Falls) admitted, was in the business of "initiating" spirit photographs, and of course was thoroughly versed and was an expert in the business. Prof. Hodgson was convinced that the photos were bogus and that settled the matter with him.

Now I see that Falls (the expert) has been arrested "for the production of false spirit pictures," a proceeding that should have been instituted fifteen or twenty years ago. Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond truly says, January 20: "Mr. Falls ought to know that there are people who remember and know exactly how he set himself to produce false spirit pictures. He has been doing it, it is time for somebody to remember that he knew how." Your correspondent does not remember and remembers how he convicted Falls at the time.

"Oh what a tangled web we weave, When first we essay to deceive!" Mrs. Richmond deserves the gratitude of all Spiritualists.

If there were no genuine spirit photographs, why the necessity for the production of the counterfeit article? Perhaps this shrewd counterfeit could apply was fully proved nearly forty years ago, as I remember, when Mr. W. H. Mumler was arrested at the instigation of the New York World, and charged with obtaining money under false pretences, for producing that class of pictures. Mayor Hall of New York, was suitably vexed that the good Christian people should not be deceived. Judge Edmonds, one of the most distinguished lawyers in New York, and a Spiritualist, deposed that he had two photographs taken. SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPHY.

Its Truth Was Fully Proven Forty Years Ago.

When Prof. Richard Hodgson, of the Psychological Research Society, fifteen or twenty years ago, commenced investigating the phenomena of Spiritualism, he wrote to me for any information I might be able to give on the matter. I at once sent him some genuine spirit photographs, which I deemed conclusive evidence of spirit return. He promptly wrote me that he considered them "of no evidential value." He sent the pictures to one S. W. Falls of Chicago, who, as he (Falls) admitted, was in the business of "initiating" spirit photographs, and of course was thoroughly versed and was an expert in the business. Prof. Hodgson was convinced that the photos were bogus and that settled the matter with him.

Now I see that Falls (the expert) has been arrested "for the production of false spirit pictures," a proceeding that should have been instituted fifteen or twenty years ago. Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond truly says, January 20: "Mr. Falls ought to know that there are people who remember and know exactly how he set himself to produce false spirit pictures. He has been doing it, it is time for somebody to remember that he knew how." Your correspondent does not remember and remembers how he convicted Falls at the time.

"Oh what a tangled web we weave, When first we essay to deceive!" Mrs. Richmond deserves the gratitude of all Spiritualists.

If there were no genuine spirit photographs, why the necessity for the production of the counterfeit article? Perhaps this shrewd counterfeit could apply was fully proved nearly forty years ago, as I remember, when Mr. W. H. Mumler was arrested at the instigation of the New York World, and charged with obtaining money under false pretences, for producing that class of pictures. Mayor Hall of New York, was suitably vexed that the good Christian people should not be deceived. CREDIT TO WHOM CREDIT IS DUE.

Dr. G. B. Warne Pays a Glowing Tribute to the Sunflower Club.

Some months ago, while considering with President Dunakin of the Ohio S. S. A., the ridiculously inadequate financial equipment for the necessary work (furnished by Spiritualists) several states to the official book of their jurisdictions, I remarked that Illinois officers were very hopeful of reaching far better results because of its new ally and auxiliary, The Ladies Sunflower Club of Chicago.

That young and growing body is entitled to a generous share of credit for the success of the Handel Hall mass meeting, just held in Chicago. Its members were indefatigable in labor for its promotion during the entire preliminary stage of effort. Their own reception committee was on duty at every formal seance, greeting strangers and seating the audiences, they planned the platform decorations, and the treasury of their club not only paid for the very tasty floral display at the meetings, but also for the entire musical talent, whose programme was the finest ever presented to the public in the name of Illinois Spiritualism. They further assumed the entire expense of Miss Harlow's services for the occasion, but were called upon with many others to mourn that lady's detention by sickness. The club voluntarily bore fully forty dollars of the expense of the rally. It is not an easy proposition to hold a mass meeting for financial profit in a hall that rent alone is one hundred and fifty dollars, to which must be added advertising, music, expenses of foreign talent and incidentals.

Loyal Illinois Spiritualists can all join with a will in wishing that the Sunflower Club may live long and prosper in its good work. Its income is derived from the membership dues of twenty-five cents per quarter, and next from tea parties given every fourth Tuesday afternoon at 70 Adams street, in the business center of the city. Patrons of the latter secure a reading from a medium of their choice then present, for each cup purchased at 10 cents. These afternoon gatherings are attracting many outsiders, even church members, and active missionary work is being done by them. Shoppers find there rest and refreshment.

May every one of our state associations enlist the co-operation of the women and each of the latter be endued with Sunflower hustle and devotion. GEORGE B. WARNE.

SAYS OLD CREEDS ARE BONDAGE.

Former Methodist Clergyman Addresses Convention of Spiritualists in Handel Hall.

Church members who have adopted the religion of their parents were pictured as slaves in bondage by Rev. B. F. Austin, a former Methodist clergyman, who spoke before the annual convention of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association at Handel Hall.

"Those persons," he declared, "who have inherited a belief or creed from their fathers, who have accepted the credit of others without thought for themselves, are in bondage. The time is coming when the whole world will desire direct communication with the spirits of deceased relatives to guide them through life, rather than the teachings of One who died 2,000 years ago."

A Little Pilgrim.

This is a charming narrative illustrating the beauty grandeur and sublimity of the spirit side of life, the realms of souls, the immortal spheres of existence. Margaret O. W. Oliphant is the author. And while it has been read by millions in the past, it will prove refreshing and soul-inspiring to our readers to again peruse it and feel its thrills of inspiration, and enjoy its uplifting influence.

Chapter II.—Continued.

After this the Little Pilgrim went out again into the beautiful city, feeling in her heart that everything was a mystery, and that the days would never be long enough to learn all that had yet to be learned, but knowing now that this too was the little language, and pleased with the sweet thought of so much that was to come. For one had whispered to her as she went out that the new tongue, and every explanation, as she was ready for it, would come to her through one of those whom she loved best, which was the usage of that country. And when the stranger had no one there that is very dear, then it is an angel who teaches the greater language, and that is what happens often to the children who are brought up in that heavenly place.

When she reached the street again, she was so pleased with this thought that it went out of her mind to ask her way to the great library, where she was to read the story of the historian's journey through the land of darkness; indeed she forgot that land altogether, and thought only of what was around her in the great city, which is beyond everything that eye has seen, or that ear has heard, or that it has entered into the imagination to conceive.

And now it seemed to her that she was much more familiar with the looks of the people, and could distinguish between those who belonged to the city and those who were visitors like herself; and also could tell which were the who had entered into the mysteries of the kingdom, and which were, like herself, only acquainted with the beginning of days. And it came to her mind, she could not tell how, that it was best not to ask questions, but to wait until the beloved one should come, who would teach her the first words. For in the mean time she did not feel at all impatient or disturbed by her want of knowledge, but laughed a little at herself to suppose that she could find out everything, and went on looking around her, and saying a word to every one she met, and enjoying the holiday looks of all the strangers, and the sense she had in her heart of holiday too.

She was walking on in this pleasant way, when she heard a sound that was like silver trumpets, and saw the crowd turn towards an open space in which all the beautiful buildings were, shaded with fine trees, and flowers were springing at the very edge of the pavements. The strangers all hastened along to hear what it was, and she with them, and some also of the people of the place. And as the little Pilgrim found herself walking by a woman who was of those last, she asked what it was.

And the woman told her it was a poet who had come to say to them what had been revealed to him, and that the two with silver trumpets were angels of the musicians' order, whose office it was to proclaim everything that was new, that the people should know. And many of those who were at work in the palaces came out and joined the crowd, and the painter who had showed the little Pilgrim his picture, and many whose faces she began to be acquainted with.

The poet stood on a beautiful pedestal all sculptured in stone, and with wreaths of living flowers hung upon it—and when the crowd had gathered in front of him, he began his poem. He told them that it was not about this land, or anything that happened in it, which they know as he did, but that it was a story of the old time, when men were walking in darkness, and when no one knew the true meaning even of what he himself did, but had to go on as if blindly, stumbling and groping with their hands.

And "Oh, brethren," he said, "though all is more beautiful and joyful here where we know, yet to remember the days when we knew not, and the ways when all was uncertain, and the end could not be distinguished from the beginning, is sweet and dear; and that which was done in the dim twilight should be celebrated in the day; and our Father himself loves to hear of those who, having not seen, loved, and who learned without any teacher, and followed the light, though they did not understand."

And then he told them the story of one who had lived in the old time; and in that air, which seemed to be made of sunshine, and amid all those stately palaces, he described to them the little earth which they had left behind—the skies that were covered with clouds, and the ways that were so rough and stony, and the cruelty of the oppressor, and the cries of those that were oppressed. And he showed the sickness and the troubles, and the sorrow and danger; and how Death stalked about, and tore heart from heart; and how sometimes the strongest would fall, and the truest fall under the power of a lie, and the tenderest forget to be kind; and how evil things lurked in every corner to beguile the dwellers there; and how the days were short and the nights dark, and life so little that by the time a man had learned something it was his hour to die.

"What can a soul do that is born there?" he cried; "for war is there and fighting, and perplexity and darkness; and no man knows if that which he does will be for good or evil, or can tell which is the best way, or know the end from the beginning; and those he loves the most are a mystery to him, and their thoughts beyond his reach. And clouds are between him and the Father, and he is deceived with false gods and false teachers, who make him to love a lie."

The people who were listening held their breath, and a shadow like a cloud fell on them, and they remembered and knew that it was true. But the next moment their hearts rebelled, and one and another would have spoken, and the little Pilgrim herself had almost cried out and made her plea for the dear earth which she loved; when he suddenly threw forth his voice again like a great song.

"Oh, dear mother earth," he cried, "oh, little world and great, forgive thy son! for lovely thou art and dear, and the sun of God shines upon thee, and the sweet dew falls; and there were we born, and loved and died, and are come hence to bless the Father and the Son. For in no other world, though they are so vast, is it given to any to know the Lord in the darkness, and follow him groping, and make way through sin and death, and overcome the evil, and conquer in his name." At which there was a great sound of weeping and of triumph, and the little Pilgrim could not contain herself, but cried out too in joy as if for a deliverance.

And then the poet told his tale. And as he told them of the man who was poor and sorrowful and alone, and how he loved and was not loved again, and trusted and was betrayed, and was tempted and drawn into the darkness, so that it seemed as if he must perish; but when hope was almost gone, turned again from the edge of despair, and confronted all his enemies, and fought and conquered—the people followed every word with great outcries of love and pity and wonder. For each one as he listened remembered his own career, and that of his brethren in the old life, and admired to think that all the evil was past, and wondered that out of such tribulation and through so many dangers all were safe and blessed here.

And there were others that were not of them, who listened, some seated at the windows of the palaces and some standing in the great square, people who were not like the others, whose bearing was more majestic, and who looked upon the crowd all smiling and weeping, with wonder and interest, but had no knowledge of the cause, and listened as it were to a tale that is told. The poet and his audience were as one, and at every period of the story there was a deep breathing and pause, and every one looked at his neighbor, and some grasped each other's hands as they remembered all that was in the past; but the strangers listened and gazed and observed all, as those who listen and are instructed in something beyond their knowledge. The little Pilgrim stood all this time not knowing where she was, so intent was she upon the tale; and as she listened it seemed to her that all her own life was rolling out before her, and she remembered the things that had been, and perceived how all had been shaped and guided, and trembled a little for the brother who was in danger, yet knew that all would be well.

The woman who had been at her side listened, too, with all her heart, saying to herself, as she stood in the crowd, "He has left nothing out! The little days they were so short, and the skies would change all in a moment and one's heart with them. How he brings it all back!" And she put up her hand to dry away a tear from her eyes, though her face all the time was shining with the recollection. The little Pilgrim was glad to be by the side of a woman after talking with so many men, and she put out her hand and touched the cloak that of the most beautiful texture, with gold threads woven in it, or something that looked like gold.

"Do you like," she said, "to think of the old time?" The woman turned and looked down upon her, for she was tall and stately, and immediately took the hand of the Pilgrim into hers, and held it without answering, till the poet had ended and come down from the place where he had been standing. He came straight through the crowd to where this lady stood, and said something to her. "You did well to tell me," looking at her with love in his eyes—not the tender sweetness of all those kind looks around, but the love that is for one. The little Pilgrim looked at them with her heart beating, and was very glad for them, and happy in herself; for she had not seen this love before since she came into the city, and it had troubled her to think that perhaps it did not exist any more. "I am glad," the lady said, and gave him her other hand; "but here is a little sister who asks me something, and I must answer her. I think she has but newly come."

"She has a face full of the morning," the poet said. It did the little Pilgrim good to feel the touch of the warm, soft hand; and she was not afraid, but lifted her eyes and spoke to the lady and to the poet. "It is beautiful what you said to me. Some times in the old time we used to look up to the beautiful skies and wonder what there was above the clouds; but we never thought that up here in this great city you would be thinking of what we were doing, and making beautiful poems about us. We thought that you would sing wonderful psalms, and talk of things high above us."

The little sister does not know what the meaning of the earth is," the poet said. "It is but a little speck, but it is the center of all. Let her walk with us, and we will go home, and you will tell her, Ama, for I love to hear you talk."

"Will you come with us?" the lady said. And the little Pilgrim's heart leaped up in her, to think she was now going to see a home in this wonderful city; and they went along, hand in hand, and though they were three together, and many were coming and going, there was no difficulty, for every one made way for them. And there was a little murmur of pleasure as the poet passed, and those who had heard his poem made obeisance to him, and thanked him, and thanked the Father for him that he was able to show them so many beautiful things.

And they walked along the street which was shining with color, and saw as they passed how the master painter had come to his work, and was standing upon the balcony where the little Pilgrim had been, and bringing out of the wall, under his hand, faces which were full of life, and which seemed to spring forth as if they had been hidden there. "Let us wait a little and see him working," the poet said; and all round about the people stopped on their way, and there was a soft cry of pleasure and praise all through the beautiful street. And the painter with whom the little Pilgrim had talked before came, and stood behind her as if he had been an old friend, and called out to her at every new touch to mark how this and that was done. She did not understand as he did, but she saw how beautiful it was, and she was glad to have seen the great painter, as she had been glad to hear the great poet.

It seemed to the little Pilgrim as if everything happened over for her, and that no one had ever been so blessed before. And to make it all more sweet, this new friend, this great and sweet lady, always held her hand, and pressed it softly when something more lovely appeared; and even the pictured faces on the wall seemed to beam upon her, as they came out one by one like the stars in the sky. Then the three went on again, and passed by many more beautiful palaces, and great streets leading away into the light, till you could see no further; and they met with bands of singers who sang so sweetly that the heart seemed to leap out of the Pilgrim's breast to meet with them, for above all things this was what she had loved. And out of one of the palaces there came such glorious music that everything she had seen and heard before seemed as nothing in comparison. And amid all these delights they went on and on, but without wearying, till they came out of the streets into lovely walks and alleys, and made their way to the banks of a great river, which seemed to sing, too, a soft melody of its own.

And here there were some fair houses surrounded by gardens and flowers that grew everywhere, and the doors were all open, and within everything was lovely and still, and ready for rest if you were weary. The little Pilgrim was not weary; but the lady placed her upon a couch in the porch, where the pillars and the roof were all formed of interlacing plants and flowers; and there they sat with her, and talked and explained to her many things.

They told her that the earth though so small was the place in all of the world to which the thoughts of those above were turned. "And not only of us who have lived here, but of all our brothers in the other worlds; for we are the race which the Father has chosen to be the example. In every age there is one that is the scene of the struggle and victory, and it is for this reason that the chronicles are made, and that we are all placed here to gather the meaning of what has been done among men. And I am one of those," the lady said, "that go back to the dear earth and gather up the tale of what our little brethren are doing. I have not to succor like some others, but only to see and bring the news; and he makes them into great poems, as you have heard; and sometimes the master painter will take one and make of it a picture; and there is nothing that is so delightful to us as when we can bring back the histories of beautiful things."

"But, oh," said the little Pilgrim, "what can there be on earth so beautiful as the meaneast thing that is here?" Then they both smiled upon her and said, "It is more beautiful than the most beautiful thing here to see how, under the low skies and in the short days, a soul will turn to our Father. And sometimes," said Ama, "when I am watching, one will wander and stray, and be led into the dark till my heart is sick; then come back and make me glad. Sometimes I cry out within myself to the Father, and say, 'O my Father, it is enough!' and it will seem to me that it is not possible to stand by and see his destruction. And then while you are gazing, while you are crying, he will recover and return, and go on again. And to the angels it is more wonderful than to us, for they have never lived there. And all the other worlds are eager to hear what we can tell them. For no one knows except the Father how the battle will turn, or when it will all be accomplished; and there are some who tremble for our little brethren. For to look down and see how little light there is, and how no one knows what may happen to him next, makes them afraid who never were there."

The little Pilgrim listened with an intent face, clasping her hands, and said: "But it never could be that our Father could be overcome by evil. Is not that known in all the worlds?"

Then the lady turned and kissed her; and the poet broke forth in singing, and said: "Faith is more heavenly than heaven; it is more beautiful than the angels. It is the only voice that can answer to our Father. We praise him, we glorify him, we love his name; but there is but one response to him through all the worlds, and that is the cry of the little brothers, who see nothing and know nothing, but believe that he will never fail."

At this the little Pilgrim wept, for her heart was touched; but she said: "We are not so ignorant; for we have our Lord who is our Brother, and he teaches us all that we require to know."

Upon this the poet rose and lifted up his hands and sang again a great song; it was in the other language which the little Pilgrim still did not understand, but she could make out that it sounded like a great proclamation that life was wise as he was good, and called upon all to see that the Lord had chosen the only way; and the sound of the poet's voice was like a great trumpet sounding bold and sweet, as if to tell this to those who were far away.

"For you must know," said the Lady Ama, who all the time held the Pilgrim's hand, "that it is permitted to all to judge according to the wisdom that has been given them. And there are some who think that our dear Lord might have found another way, and that, wait, sometimes with trembling, lest he should fall; but not among us who have lived on earth for we know. And it is our work to show to all the worlds that his way never fails, and how wonderful it is, and beautiful above all that heart has conceived. And thus we justify the ways of God, who is our Father. But in the other worlds there are many who will continue to fear until the history of the earth is all ended and the chronicles are made complete."

"And will that be long?" the little Pilgrim cried, feeling in her heart that she would like to go to all the worlds and tell them of our Lord, and of his love, and how the thought of him makes you strong; and it troubled her a little to hear her friends speak of the low skies, and the short days, and the dimness of that dear country which she had left behind, in which there were so many still whom she loved.

Upon this Ama shook her head, and said that of that day no one knew, not even our Lord, but only the Father; and then she smiled and answered the little Pilgrim's thought. "When we go back," she said, "it is not as when we lived there; for now we see all the dangers of it and the mysteries which we did not see before. It was by the Father's dear love that we did not see what was around us and about us while we lived there, for then our hearts would have fainting; and that makes us wonder now that any one endures to the end."

"You are a great deal wiser than I am," said the little Pilgrim, "but, though our hearts had fainted, how could we have been overcome? For He was on our side."

LEGERDEMAIN.

It Has Become a Prominent Factor in Spiritualism, and Our Sacred Cause Must Boldly Oppose the Same.

To the Editor:—There was given, Feb. 18, at Dixon, Ill., an "etherization," seance, so advertised, at the residence of S. S. Sills, corner Third street and Madison avenue. The medium was a man from Galesburg, whose name is Pembroke. He had a man with him whom he called his helper. I attended with three of my friends, and I can assure you we went home completely disgusted. It was a deception from beginning to end.

A small candle was placed in a cigar box, which gave a feeble light; but by that feeble light we saw more cheese-cloth and other paraphernalia than we have seen in our twenty years of Spiritualism.

The so-called medium and his helper took turns in parading the circle, and personating our spirit friends. I failed to recognize anybody but the medium, and his confederate, and those two we recognized plainly. Two overcoats that hung up on the cabinet, they would not allow us to inspect. Of course most of the paraphernalia was concealed in them.

Two illuminated trumpets were carried around the inside of the circle. My three friends and myself plainly saw the medium carry them around. He dropped one, and stooped and picked it up. Once in backing into the cabinet he stumbled over somebody's feet, and nearly fell to the floor. One in the circle said that was because he was in such a deep trance. They had a large music box, which they claimed the spirits wound up, and kept running. I think, Mr. Editor, the readers of The Progressive Thinker should be notified of this man Pembroke, so they can be on their guard when he visits other towns. We have a home circle in Dixon, and that is good enough for me in the future. We love The Progressive Thinker, and PURE SPIRITUALISM, and wish you everlasting success in giving the truth to the world. WILL W. CHARLTON.

ROYAL ROAD TO KNOWLEDGE.

It Is Found in the Active Co-operation of Mortal Mind With Spirit.

There is a more or less prevalent idea among a certain class of mediums, that the spirit of passive mediumship is the one really royal road to knowledge. It is the idea held by those mediums who—at least some of them—refuse to read a good, instructive, thought-stirring book or newspaper, because their "controls" tell them thus to do. Books and newspapers would only lumber their minds with useless matter; while their minds should be kept vacant, for the sole occupancy of the "controls" and their teachings, which would supersede and render needless and useless all knowledge gained by active thought and the study of books. Some of such mediums become fairly semi-idiotic by long and faithful continuance in this plan.

None but spirits of such character of ignorance, imbecility or perverse deception with intent to enslave the silly medium, would give such foolish advice.

Mental indolence, concrete laziness, inherent in the medium's mental mechanism, prepares the soil for the reception of such stultifying mandates by unwise or ignorant controls.

To sit supinely passive is not the way to grow in knowledge. Wise spirits love a thinker.

Unprogressive spirits want nothing, unprogressive mediums are passive receivers, not earnest thinkers.

It should be clearly understood by mediums—and all others—that reflection, earnest thought, is the highway to living, uplifting inspiration. The highest inspiration is not a one-sided affair, but the receptive mind must be in a receptive, not a passive, to take whatever may be given—like callow robins in their nest, with wide-stretched mouths waiting for bug, worm or what-not.

Not thus does the human mind open to receive that which is highest, best, and most helpful and uplifting. The highest inspiration comes when the mind is active, thought—not passive, but in positive and most active attitude, yet receptive comes into conjunction with the thought of higher spiritual intelligences, and is borne along in upward and onward mental flight by the conjoined forces of inspired and inspired working in union and active co-operation.

In this method is mental discipline, mental growth, intellectual development, gain in knowledge and capacity. Instead of the mind-stunting results of indolent passivity, there are the grand results flowing from genuine mental effort, enlarged vision, clearer and broader perceptions of truth, and expansion of mind powers, and increase of spiritual light and strength.

There is an uplifting, strengthening, and spiritualizing element in this receptive active method of inspiration, that is found nowhere else. As the kindling of a fire, the flame, so the conjoined action of the minds spirit and mortal, brings the glow and warmth of higher inspiration.

This process of inspirational experience and mental exercise is truly and beautifully educational. The combination of mental factors, not discarding or omitting active study and effort on the part of the student medium, constitutes indeed a royal road to knowledge, and mental and spiritual growth that can never be gained by the process of lazy passivity.

It is a sad mistake to harbor the hallucination that "controls" will furnish a short and easy railway to the acquisition of knowledge, whereby one can loiter in the listlessness of mental ease, while the "controls" engineer and drive the train to the destined station. Not thus are lazy souls "carried to the skies, on flowery beds of ease."

A mere passive machine might be operated by highest "controls" able to move it, without receiving more benefit than the mill-stones that grind the grain poured into the hopper above them. Mental culture is not acquired as a jug acquires the molasses poured into it. There must be active mental co-operation with the instructors, or the ignorant will remain ignorant.

And it must be taken into account that there are on the other side as well as on this side, densely ignorant beings, consummate rascals, wilful deceivers, without moral principle, and they take a low and base delight in practicing knavery and malice, often pretending to be some noted personage of history. I have a distinct recollection of one who took it upon himself to write me notes under the name of "Aristotle." As I took no stock in his genuineness, he soon ceased his attentions. I had no doubt that the real Aristotle spirit life—"Fogland" notwithstanding—knew how to correctly spell his own name.

There are conscienceless rascals in the borderland of spirit life, as there are on this side of the line. Why should there not be, when there are constantly passing over those who have schooled their faculties during their earthly life in the practice of vice and crime, in disregard of all dictates of morality and human rights?

I would be glad to believe, as some do, that the animal propensities that make men and women more debased than brutes are shed when the body is cast aside in death. Allowing even that there is an "objective mind" or "brain mind," and "subjective" or "spirit mind," in man, it is evident that these are intimately connected during earth life, that they mutually influence each other, and each molds the other in degree to its own nature and characteristics.

The "subjective coloring" of the "objective mind," and vice versa. And this coloring, characteristic of the animal "brain mind," is carried into the spirit world. The proofs of this are multitudinous, in the work of returning spirits.

There can be no doubt that the minds of those gifted with inventive faculty, while giving their closest and truest attention to the study of the laws of some invention, in many instances are aided by spirit suggestions and mind-leads to the solution of problems that culminate in wonderful inventions for the benefit of humanity. Their active thought and study prepare their minds for the reception of spirit instructions.

Passive indolence might have waited till doomsday, without avail. It might be thought that in the instances in which solutions of mathematical problems, and problems in inventions, have come during sleep or in dreams, were instances of passive receptivity; but in all such cases it was found that the minds of the recipients have been engaged in active, earnest thought, seeking the desired solutions. Such instances are not evidence in favor of mere passivity, but really prove the co-ordinate active mentality is an important factor in producing the result.

Thus it would seem that reason and experience join in a sublime that the royal road to knowledge lies not in supine passiveness, but in the blending of mind of mortal and spirit in mutual active co-operative thought. JAS. C. UNDERHILL.

A VERY CURIOUS CONCLUSION.

Rev. H. Clinton Hay, of Boston, Mass., Acknowledges That Spirit Return Is a Fixed Fact, But Says "Communication Therewith Is Not Needed."—Swedenborg and the Great Work He Did.

As John Fiske said, "The belief in a world unseen to mortal eyes is not only coeval with the beginning of the human race, but is also coextensive with it in all its subsequent stages of development. It is, in short, one of the differential attributes of humanity." Man appears to be the only primate who possesses this belief. The vast majority of mankind are in that unseen part of the universe.

The progress of natural science, with the gradual discovery of the ether, and the nature of heat, light and electricity, and of microscopic and telescopic objects, leads to the rational conclusion that a large part of the material universe is unseen and may still be unknown. As sound is unknown to the man born deaf, and color to the man born blind, so all our knowledge is limited by the sense faculties developed. "Given a new sensibility," as a modern writer suggests, "and there would be given a new universe. We say the data have passed away from us, but it is perfectly reasonable to conceive of them as nearer to us than ever, in a closer intimacy than any known to us."

Paul said, "If there is a natural body, there is also a spiritual body." Modern science and psychology explain this to mean that mind and matter are distinct organisms, one of spiritual and the other of material substances. In our present state of existence mind commonly acts in, and by means of matter. Nevertheless, its own specific activities are in its own world of spirits.

Our experiences in this world depend upon the activity of the senses where they terminate in the body. Let the activity terminate in the spiritual body instead of the natural, and the spiritual world instead of the natural world would appear. Then man could and would of necessity communicate with the world of spirits instead of this world. The senses of each body give communication with their own world.

In this way Emanuel Swedenborg explains his own experiences in the spiritual world. He had spent two-thirds of his life in becoming one of the most skillful natural scientists the world has had, when the senses of his spiritual body were opened, and he was enabled to extend his scientific investigations from the realm of natural to that of spiritual phenomena. And here we find the great difference between Swedenborg and all others who have had communication with the world of spirits. Others have sought spirit control—to be controlled by some spirit in the unseen world and to become a medium of his activities into this world.

Swedenborg never did this. He regarded it as dangerous to give up the exercise of one's own free will and rationality. Instead of trying to bring spirits back into communication with this world, he went himself, in spirit, into open communication with, and investigation of, their world. Thus he stood on equal footing with them, and they could not deceive him, as evil spirits and those who would gravitate earthward would be prone to do. Therefore he ascended even to the heavens and has described the wonderful things seen and heard there when in the full possession of a his carefully trained and definite faculties.

But all this was incidental to his discovery of the science of correspondences. By "correspondence" he means the relation which he found between things as effects. To illustrate: A thought is a spiritual cause of a word or deed as a natural effect. Swedenborg found this law of correspondence is a key to a spiritual meaning everywhere existing in the letter of the sacred scriptures which makes them the Word of God. So he was not asking, What do spirits and angels say? but What does the Lord say in his Holy Word? For he soon learned that the Word of God is the source of all wisdom to angels and men. When the deeper meanings of that Word can be reached, divine truth itself is known, communication with the Lord himself, the Creator and Savior, is established. Then all other communication with either world has a safe test and guide. But direct communication with the world of spirits, although possible is not needed until after the death of the earthly body. H. CLINTON HAY.

THOUGHT WAVE PICTURES.

Dr. Veeder to Demonstrate Photographic Discovery at Academy of Science, Pittsburgh.

Dr. M. A. Veeder of Lyons, N. Y., who claims to have successfully photographed a thought wave, has been invited to demonstrate his discovery before the Academy of Science at Pittsburgh, Pa. He will bring with him the same committee who watched his wonderful psychic experiment, and who will testify to the result attained. Among the committee is the Rev. W. N. Webbe of Lyons. The other members were William Holloway, H. R. Russell and Harold Webbe, all of Lyons.

Mr. Russell is a photographer, and the experiments were conducted in his studio. The committee and Dr. Veeder, standing around a table, placed the tips of the fingers of their right hand underneath a 4x4 photographic plate prepared in the ordinary manner and placed in a plate holder. The fingers of the experimenter's right hands lay on the top side of the plate.

Previous to assuming this attitude they had agreed to fix their minds on a common object, a ball of surgeon's gauze thrown down on the floor. The position was held for a few seconds.

When the plate was taken into the dark room and developed, although it had not been exposed during the experiment, there at the exact spot where the finger tips of the experimenter had centered was an object, clearly photographed, of the size, shape and general appearance of the ball of gauze on which the attention of the experimenters had been fixed.

The successful result of the experiment, Dr. Veeder says, may be looked upon as a stride in advancement of the X-ray process, the impression in this case being nothing more tangible than the emanation of brain force.

Journeys to the Planet Mars

Or, Our Mission to Eento (Mars)

A Narrative by Sara Weiss, Illustrated With Thirteen Original Drawings by the Authoress.

This strangely attractive narrative does not assume to be either scientific, philosophic, or as advancing any special religious creed. It is a plain statement of facts based upon the experience of a woman whose highest aim is to acquire a knowledge of the truth, to earnestly pursue to live it, and to offer to others a stepping-stone which may aid them, in their progress towards the light.

From the standpoint of Spiritualists this is a most interesting book, as Mrs. Weiss actually took these journeys in spirit and has given them in all sincerity, to the world. The book is uplifting and full of beautiful thoughts, 648 pages. Price $1.50.

SPECIAL THOUGHT CHANNEL. SYMPOSIUM.

The Question Before Spiritualists is this: Can a Spirit dematerialize a white dress, a white hat, a pair of white stockings, a scarf, fan and doll, and convey them to her home in spirit life, and then at will materialize them, and bring them back to earth, and continue doing so indefinitely?

This SYMPOSIUM is teaching Spiritualists an IMPORTANT LESSON. Those who are expressing an opinion therein are LEADING LIGHTS in our ranks. Many of them are in close touch with the denizens of spirit life, and what they state will carry great weight with the intelligent and thoughtful in our ranks. On the rostrum they are teachers, and behind them as inspirers are the wise sages of spirit life.

IS IT POSSIBLE?

J. Clegg Wright, Who is in Close Touch With the Spirit World, Expresses His Opinion in No Uncertain Manner.

Scientific investigation of the phenomena of Modern Spiritualism should answer all questions as to the genuineness of the manifestations in the seance room.

Any mere a priori statement can have but little value. There are certain rules laid down by science for the investigation of all natural phenomena, among which is one that a scientific fact is capable of demonstration at any time and place when the necessary conditions are present.

The phenomena claimed to have taken place at a seance are that certain articles of woman's apparel were dematerialized, and at another seance re-materialized and photographed.

The first inquiry is, what of the witnesses? Are they fit and authoritative observers of the phenomena described?

How often have the phenomena been produced? What were the conditions of view and the full facts of investigation?

As the description is given without the scientific conditions of investigation stated, and knowing the fallibility of human testimony, it is more logical to disbelieve the statement than to believe it.

Can a spirit dematerialize a white dress, a white hat, a pair of white stockings, a scarf, fan and doll, take them to the spirit world, bring them back, materialize them, and dress up as a spirit with them so that a photograph could be taken? Or can all these articles be taken bodily to the spirit realm and then re-materialized on earth again? NO! MOST EMPHATICALLY NO!

On the testimony, I do not believe that such events ever happened. The testimony is weakened in the face of so much PREVALENT FRAUD AMONG THE SO-CALLED MATERIALIZING MEDIUMS.

I would say, investigate such phenomena as these witnesses claim to have occurred in their presence. Apply proper methods of investigation. If not genuine, the fraud will appear.

My mind is in the attitude of disbelief—PROFOUND DISBELIEF. If I saw such phenomena every day for weeks, I would have the greatest difficulty in believing I would not deny, but the probability of some defect in my power of observation; some oversight in investigating the method and conditions; some practical deception beyond my power of knowing, would stand in the front ground of my thought. The balance of my judgment would be that the manifestations were fraudulent.

Supposing that there did happen the phenomena claimed. Then I would have to disband my belief in the theory of evolution. I would have to disbelieve the facts of chemical science. I would have to give up the order of nature as human experience sees it to-day. I would have to believe that Christ turned water into wine; that Aaron's rod turned into a serpent. I would have to believe that old political lie that Constantine saw the cross of Christ in the sky, and the declaration, "By this ye conquer." I would have to believe all the lies of ecclesiastical frauds in the ages past. I would have to believe that a dead man can be brought to life again. I would have to believe that a virgin can be a mother, and all the idiotic rot out of which the religions of the world have been made.

Superstition haunts the human mind. Men are eager to believe the wonderful, but science says stop. Give proof. Before I can believe, my mind has to undergo itself of all that it was ever taught, and that science has ever demonstrated. My reason would be readjusted to other and more unthinkable postulates. I would be turned upside down and the

I can only believe such claims when it is easier to believe them than to disbelieve them.

My pity regrets and my devotion weeps that Infinite Intelligence did not make honest men and women to live on earth, and further, why did Infinite Intelligence neglect making it clear to the intellect of man that beyond the duration of this sad and clouded life, is another where the sun is always bright, where the heart is never sad, where the tearful never falls and where babies never die. How sad to me that Infinite Intelligence shrouded this beautiful future, from man behind the opaque walls of material giving but faint gleams and doubtful shadows to the acute scientific brain.

HE DOESN'T BELIEVE IT.

Thomas Grimshaw, One of the Leaders in the Ranks of Spiritualism, Expresses His Opinion.

To the Editor:—You ask if I dare take a leap in the dark, and express my views regarding the wonderful phenomena said to have occurred in the presence of a certain materializing medium.

My opinion is that it is a fake. I have seen many things in Spiritualism that have made me careful in the use of the term impossible, but it strikes me as exceedingly improbable. I hail from Missouri, and would have to be shown; even then I would be slow to accept. It may be possible for spirits to temporarily materialize forms, (I believe it is) clothing, flowers, etc., but there is no evidence that any of these forms were permanent. Then again matter may be passed through matter, but in such cases the work is done instantaneously. Spirits may even cause articles to disappear; but that a spirit can dematerialize an object, take it to his or her spirit home, keep it there for days or weeks, then re-materialize it; it's too much—I don't believe it.

I am very busy just now, but I hope this discussion may turn to a consideration of the principles involved in the building of genuine materialized forms.

MOSES HULL TAKES A PLUNGE IN THE DARK.

Not Knowing the Medium He Freely Expresses an Opinion.

To the Editor:—You ask for an opinion on the dematerialization, the materialization again and then another dematerialization again of that white hat and other "toggery."

In this case I know of no better argument than is found in substance in Hume's irresistible against miracles.

1. Our experience is that people sometimes falsify.

2. That there are people who will lie.

3. But in all our experience there has never been a miracle, such as a dematerialization, then a re-materialization again and then another dematerialization.

Therefore experience teaches that men and women are more liable to be mistaken, or even to falsify, than that a suit of clothes is to pass through all these transformations.

You will discover by this that on the case mentioned I am either an agnostic or an unbeliever. I know good, honest, intelligent men and women who are prepared to believe anything provided it is big enough. I fear that that story will require to be enlarged before I can believe it.

MOSES HULL.

HOW WE LEARN.

Great truths are dearly bought. The common truth, Such as men give and take from day to day, Comes in the common walk of easy life.

Blown by the careless wind across our way.

Bought in the market at the current price.

Brad of the smile, the jest, perchance the bowl;

It tells no tales of daring or of worth, Nor pierces even the surface of a soul.

Great truths are greatly won. Not found by chance, Nor wafted on the breath of summer dream; But grasped in the great struggle of the soul.

Hard-buffeting with adverse wind and stream.

Not in the general mart, 'mid corn and wine;

Not in the merchandise of gold and gems;

Not in the world's gay hall of midnight mirth;

Not 'mid the blaze of regal diadems;

But in the day of conflict, fear, and grief.

When the strong hand of God, put forth in might, Plows up the subsoil of the stagnant heart, And brings the imprisoned truth-seed to the light.

Wrung from the troubled spirit, in hard hours Of weakness, solitude, perchance of pain, Truth springs, like harvest, from the well-plowed field.

And the soul feels it has not wept in vain.

LETTER FROM G. H. BROOKS.
Notes and Thoughts Connected With His Work in Milwaukee.

I have fully intended, long ere this, to write a book on the "white dress," that does so much for the work I am doing here in Milwaukee; but ere I am aware of it, time slips away, passing into weeks, and many things are neglected for want of time.

I did not think when I opened my meetings in October, that January would find me here; but here I am, and able to remain for the rest of the season.

From the first the meetings have been well attended, and by a thoughtful, intelligent class of people who are interested in the unfoldment of spiritual truths, who have outgrown the church, or whatever movement they were allied to, and have attained with their souls yearning for spiritual food.

I have had, from the first, free admission. While the meetings have not, perhaps, yielded me as much as they should have done had I charged the usual door fee, yet I feel that a better impression is left on the public mind and a greater good done by the free admission.

I have not been in harmony with the door fee or the workings of a society that weighed your worth by the sensational manner of presenting high spiritual thoughts, by what was taken in at the door. I have always felt, and still feel, that our movement must take a step in advance, and those who are connected with the society the willing to make sacrifices and lift up Sunday meetings onto a spiritual plane where they belong.

Milwaukee is one of the places where I have worked more in our cause than in any other city, and those who are among my strongest supporters are those who have known me for years; the first step is to-day as strong as ever, and they are always present at my meetings, thus making the work beautiful by the law of understanding.

After my address of the evening is over, I always close the meetings with psychometric readings, which as a rule are full of interest. Besides my Sunday evening readings, there is held once a week a social in the home of some of the friends. Sometimes I spend the entire evening giving readings; then, again, we have a church party or a musicale. At the close of each month a party is held in the hall, which is of benefit in more ways than one, and is well attended. Thus we have a gathering and a gathering of them of interest, so the friends will feel they have a most interesting and social time. It has always been my aim, at every place I ever spoke, to build up the social life, to get our people acquainted with each other, to visit each other in times of prosperity as well as adversity, for I fully recognize the fact that the spiritual life is a social life. People seldom come into Spiritualism unless trouble has brought them, and they come with their souls under the shadow, and need the sunshine of our philosophy and the love of our people, thus helping them to gain the mastery, and the soul to assert itself.

Whether my work has been appreciated or not, I do not know; but I feel that it is a part of the teacher's life—to lift up the world by love and pleasant greetings. Much I should like to say along this as well as other lines, but can now only say this, I shall be glad when we shall spend our time more largely in spiritual thought, looking for the highest and best, and not trouble ourselves so much about what other people believe, or what they do, for we shall yet recognize the fact that when the soul comes into the possession of truth, error, discord and darkness fly away.

There are various meetings held in different parts of the city, and one German society owns its own temple, but how well their meetings are attended and the character of their work, I am not altogether familiar with, but have heard some things about which I may, some day, have something to say (I should like to mention many by name) of the work of this beautiful, and I feel, that I must mention one who is well known to the readers of your most valuable paper by her poems and other writings; I refer to Mrs. Mary E. Van Horn, of 555 Fifth Avenue, whose life has been full of care and sadness, and now in her declining days is growing blind. I know that she knows all those who have been uplifted by her poems, to sit down and write her a good, happy letter. I tell you there is nothing that cheers one so much when in trouble like a good, hopeful letter, full of the spirit of good thoughts. Mrs. Van Horn has been a Spiritualist for many years, and has done much to help the world. I trust that out of the great heart of the public whom she has sought to help will come hopeful, cheerful letters, full of the spirit of good things.

I send my kindest thoughts and best wishes to one and all, in the hope that each day and hour we may all feel the need of helping our brother and sister, and that we may all feel the need of the spiritual thought that does so much for mankind.

MISSOURI STATE CONVENTION.
Brief Account of the Proceedings at Its Recent Session.

The Temple of Spiritualism of this city where the National Convention was held during the World's Fair, was opened this week to the state convention, Wednesday and Thursday, February 21 and 22. The forenoon were given to business sessions, but afternoons and evenings elaborate programs were rendered. Also a banquet each evening, in lieu of restaurants, was served in the temple parlors, and highly appreciated.

Prof. Thomas A. Greenwood, assisted by Miss Ida Gross and others, rendered a fine musical program at each session.

Following are the speakers of the convention: Harrison D. Barrett, C. Fannie Allen, Mrs. K. T. Harty, Dr. Herman W. Faber, Rev. Theresa Allen, Paul McArthur and J. B. Bates. Spiritual messages were given by the following: Mrs. I. Burger, Rev. Laura Jones, Mrs. Nelson Armstrong, Mrs. Sarah Anderson, Rev. Theresa Allen, Rev. Mrs. Price, Mrs. K. T. Harty and Rev. Mrs. J. C. Stevens.

Missouri has placed herself on record as one of the first states to enact legal proceeding against fraudulent mediumship.

Members of the retiring state board and others bore the expense of this public trial in which two hundred dollars were expended in lawyer fees alone.

But their decision, ratified by the N. S. A., has given us a purer Spiritualism in Missouri. Other states fall in line. Funds were contributed at the convention to reimburse the treasury which this trial depleted.

The colored people under the auspices of the colored Spiritualist society here were given one whole session of the convention, and acquitted themselves in a manner which did them great credit. Rev. J. E. Bates, their speaker, is a man of culture and education, and the two mediums who followed him with tests did good work.

At the last session of the convention there was congregational singing from Mrs. Mattie McCaslin's little book of Healing songs just published, and Fannie Allen rendered one of her inimitable inspirational poems. Also President Barrett read Mrs. K. T. Harty and Mrs. Laura Jones.

Following are Missouri's new state officers: President, Paul McArthur; secretary, W. F. Ferrelman; treasurer, Mrs. K. T. Harty; editor-at-large and press agent, Rev. Thomas Grimshaw; vice-presidents, L. F. Beauvais, Mrs. C. C. Stevens, and Mrs. L. L. Jones, Mrs. F. Wallace, C. O. Reel, Trustees, H. R. Gates, F. W. Goethe, R. Shackelford, Mrs. D. Cadman, C. A. Gilbert and Mrs. J. Corneliuss. Several of the officers are from Kansas City.

I cannot include all the names of our entertainers at the various sessions, but all were appreciated.

THE HOME AND THE BALLOT.
Their Respective Relations Pointed Out.

The home ideal of to-day is the best the world has yet known, and it will continue to develop as larger freedom and broader culture come to all who share its life.

To argue that woman's work differs from man's does not necessarily assume that she should be deprived of the tools with which to perform it.

It is not a question of whether men wish women to have certain privileges or opportunities, or whether all men agree in desiring them; but whether, in the performance of the duties women undertake, they need these privileges in order to obtain the best results for themselves and their vocation. Suppose that the sphere of woman's service is limited by the home, the question still remains: Do political conditions affect the home? Does its happiness, its highest well-being, or even its very existence, depend upon the character of the government in which it is located? And who can doubt it, in the face of such statements as this, taken from a recent Philadelphia paper:

"In this city alone there were seven thousand deaths of babies in 1903; nearly half from scarlet fever—a needless disease; and the other half from preventable diseases, all of whom could have been saved if public opinion and the city government gave health a sufficient protection. Councils willing to appropriate enough to enable our health department to suppress children's diseases would in a decade reduce these deaths probably by one-half."

This is but one of many statements which show conclusively that, from the beginning of life until its close, the government affects the home to such an extent as to imperil its very existence, and that women in the pursuit of home-making need political power to regulate the conditions which control its life, as much as do men in the business by which they accumulate the material substance which provides for its necessities.—From Annual address of Rev. Anna H. Shaw.

HOPES FOR FUTURE EXISTENCE.

Where There Will Be Opportunity for Development.

Do we ever stop to think that our death, that the death of every living being, simultaneously, would not change one iota the laws of the universe? Here we are small things of a great idea, but the passing of the former still leaves the latter and more, and we leave with the latter unknown.

Our striving to be and to do good evidently have an ultimate attainment because we know we fall short. When a man approaches his end he thinks largely of that which he has left undone. The law in us is to strive for something which we never obtain in this life. When we sleep at night our refreshment depends on what we have eaten, and we do not think during the day of it. It is a little play of life and bespeaks the possibility that the longer sleep is something similar.

Minds used to delving: fit deep thoughts almost universally escape the simplest things of life. But these minds must realize, as we do, that the time allowed for the attainment of knowledge is absurdly short. We only just begin to grasp big things when we stop short. Can it not be that the future life is very similar to this with its great motive, work and higher development under a more satisfactory environment? This means, of necessity, freedom from pain. One man has put it very simply and briefly: "In this world it is 'come in, in the next, enter.'"

To Friends and Co-Workers in the Illinois State Spiritualists Association, Greeting:—I regret that I cannot be with you at your gathering, and enjoy the inspiration of your deliberations and the pleasure of your companionship.

I am, however, with you in thought, waiting for you a blessed season, and that you may be baptized with the spirit of Love, Work and Sacrifice.

During the centuries of the past superior souls have worked and fought, lived and died true to their vision of help to their fellowman; but among all the scintillating stars sent to the world to redeem the race from the thralldom of ignorance and superstition, Spiritualism supercedes them all.

It has been the Star of the East to each mortal who has been guided by its glow, and in thousands of homes, the family altar has been erected—not to worship the Trinity, but to wait for the tiny ray, bringing its message of greeting and joy from the dear ones on the other side of the veil.

Beloved, that ray has sounded its message to each of us, and no roar of thunder could have impressed us stronger than this tiny small voice which convinced us that our dear ones lived.

Our ears have heard, our eyes have seen, and our investigations have proved to us beyond a doubt that the loved ones who went home are among the immortals and are among us to guide and comfort.

Great as our hopes have been, we have found the realities still greater; high as our inspirations have lifted us, we have found immeasurable heights beyond, waiting to be reached.

What manner of men and women ought we then to be? What manner of men and women is it possible for us to be? Have we even an approximate conception of our own possibilities? Have we correctly measured our responsibilities, or what our influence might be with the skeptic, if our daily walk were a living expression of our lofty philosophy?

What though we as little children stumble over the slippery stones in our path, are not the everlasting arms around us to help us on our feet again?

The hosts of heaven shall serve us, its great inspirers guide us, its mighty forces sustain us and no good thing shall be withheld from us.

Let us, then, start the coming year with a new courage, because of our stronger convictions.

Let us not be satisfied with our victories of yesterday, but let each day be a new revelation unfolded to our souls' consciousness. Let us live up to that revelation, and we shall ascend higher and still higher. Our feet shall touch clouds—not clay—and the worries and cares which seem so heavy to us, shall be made light, and we shall be lifted above the stumbling blocks in our way, which hinder our progress to-day.

Let us give stronger moral and financial support to our mediums. They are the pioneers of Spiritualism. When our forefathers blazed their way through the jungles of the forest, they had no use for the finer tools of the engraver. The saw and broad-axe were the tools needed. What though they were crude and rusty, they still served the essential need.

We need the crude with the more refined to-day, to penetrate the undergrowth of superstition and skepticism.

The coming generation will be more intelligent and progressive, and ready for a different class of instruments, and mediums higher developed on the mental plane. Let us surround the messengers we have to-day with better conditions, and an atmosphere suitable for the highest and best expression of mediumship, and we shall reap as we sow.

May each of us have a wholesome, helpful understanding of the things of earth, and a more intelligent comprehension of the law of the universe, thus we may be more perfectly in accord with it.

Struggle with courage, against every influence that tends to corrupt and weaken, or that will make you unjust or unkind. Strive for heaven's richest gifts. In Nature's storehouse there is plenty for us all.

If you earnestly desire divine gifts that you may more blessedly minister to others, you shall attain them. The great secrets shall be revealed to the soul of the one who is ready to use divine knowledge.

Follow the light within, and you shall unerringly find the way, though it leads you through thorny paths, and over stones which blister your feet; though it separates you from your whole, though your eyes are blinded with weeping, and your heart torn with grief, each grief has its own compensation; there is healing for every pain, and after you have passed through you shall find your exceeding great reward in your soul's greater majesty and power.

In the spirit of our universal relationship.

SPIRITUALISTS.

They Are In a Questioning Mood.

All along the line in the ranks of Spiritualism, intelligent Spiritualists are in a QUESTIONING MOOD. Spirit Return is UNQUESTIONABLY TRUE. There has been enough spontaneous phenomena through all the past to establish that fact without the intervention of a single medium. Prophetic dreams and visions, the levitation of articles without mortal intervention, haunted houses, the sudden appearance of the spirit of one dying in a distant locality, words of warning from unseen sources, etc., all tend to establish the truth of SPIRIT RETURN without any mediumship whatever.

But no sooner was SPIRIT RETURN established through the subtle laws of mediumship, than the base and rotten imitator stepped to the front to reap the reward that only belongs to HONEST MEDIUMS.

One place in this city has done a lucrative business in furnishing material and instruction to those who wish "TO PLAY" mediumship. Its illustrated circular is in our possession, and is gotten up in fine, artistic style, and the suggestions are diabolically ingenious, and also interesting in connection with the study of human credulity.

So prominent a part is LEGERDEMAIN playing to-day in connection with the phenomena of Spirit Return, especially at various camp-meetings, that we will soon publish several communications under that heading. Four of them will be from the pen of

Where Is Sambo?

In ante-bellum days it was said of a Southern planter, much given to drawing the long bow, that he always appealed to his body servant to confirm his narration; and Sambo, well up in story telling himself, would vouch for the truth of the master's yarn, and add such explanatory points as seemed necessary to make the fiction appear probable. On one of these occasions the master said he and Sambo were in the forest stalking for deer. A giant buck, with great antlers, head erect, came trotting towards him, when he raised his rifle, fired, the animal made a bound and fell to the ground dead. On examination he found the ball had passed through the animal's forehead, left ear and head. "Sambo, isn't that so?"

Sambo stammered for a moment, but recovering himself, he affirmed: "It am strictly true. You see it was jes' dis way: As Massa drew up his gun to shoot de deer, felt somethin' blin' his ear, so he dropped his head an' put up his foot to scratch, and den Massa fired, wid de result stated."

As soon as master and slave were alone the latter avowed: "Massa, you mus' make yo' stories more consistent. It was de hardest act of my life to get dat foot, ear and head in range for de bullet. A few careless stories of dat sort and de people won't b'lieve anything you tell, even if I swear to it."

Query: How would Sambo have reconciled these passages of the divine word?

"I [Jacob] have seen God face to face."

"And the Lord spoke to Moses face to face."—Exodus 33:11.

"The Lord talked with you face to face."—Numbers 14:14.

"And the Lord said to Moses, Exodus 33:10: 'There shall no man see me and live.'"

Which is truth? Where is Sambo?

War a Companion of Slavery.

John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, declared, "Slavery is the sum of all villainies." We cordially indorse that declaration, and are glad to hail his shade as a worthy ally. But, oh, how lamentable that the Bible we were taught to adore as the Word of God, should teach us that slavery was founded by that God, and he should teach his favorites that they might hold bondmen and bond women forever as slaves, as we showed two weeks ago, in a "Leaf From History" was the case.

Slavery the sum of all villainies, and God the founder! Christians, your Bible is NOT in error. The God we worship never authorized the accursed institution. The priest, who wrote that very errant record falsified, and you have been forcing a delusion on the world, and it is time to cease.

But slavery, gross, horrible, damnable as it was, and crushing out every virtue, as it did, blighting human happiness for thousands of years, had a powerful auxiliary in grim-visaged War! It was a companion, and aid to slavery. Captives made on the field of battle, were formerly enslaved, and the practice continued down to modern times. So late as the desolating wars between England and Scotland Christian captives, chanting the name of Jesus, were transported to Barbadoes, and were sold into slavery by the Christian conquerors in England. Deny it who dare!

And whence War? Go read your Bible, good Christian brother, and find long chapters with a "Thus saith the Lord," instructing his favored people to war on other peoples, and to save nothing alive but virgins! These were allowed to be held for purposes too vile to be designated by the term slave.

It is false, a base, shameless lie, to make the Eternal Father responsible for these heinous acts; and the book so dishonoring God should not be presented to the world for its glorification and guidance. We mean every word we write. The period is passed when the stake, the fagot, and dungeon may be employed to crush those who expose the true character of that book; and we hail with joy the services of the best thinkers and ablest scholars in the Christian pulpit in calling attention to these wrongs which human language is too feeble to denounce with the vehemence the subject demands.

SPIRITUALISTS.

They Are In a Questioning Mood.

J. A. Wertz, a prominent Spiritualist of Anderson, Ind., and they should be read by every Spiritualist. These Legerdemains or imitators feed off of the CREDULITY OF IGNORANCE, which is the bane of every progressive movement.

Look out for the articles under the head of

LEGERDEMAIN SPIRITUALISM.

They will interest you. They will educate you. They will ASTONISH YOU! You can not afford to miss reading them, unless you want to remain in benighted darkness, preferring darkness to light, Error to Truth.

We propose to let a FLOOD OF LIGHT flow in on Spiritualism. Those who do not want to see this LIGHT will not, of course, read The Progressive Thinker, and will remain in the darkness of credulity until their intellects are quickened. Those who want the light, the glorious UNTARNISHED LIGHT, will aid most strenuously to extend the circulation of the paper.

The educational process we have commenced will continue. The data we have on hand to illustrate the needs of the hour is astonishingly large and conclusive, and in many cases astounding. THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER LEADS in prosperity. IT LEADS in the search for the absolute truth. IT LEADS in its efforts to sustain and promote HONEST MEDIUMSHIP AND TRUE SPIRITUALISM.

Wesley Said It, Not Us.

The Progressive Thinker regrets it has not the means of verification at hand, but it would appear by the following clipping from an exchange, that the founder of Methodism, in the second volume, page 309 of Wesley's Sermons, declared:

"After all that has been so plausibly written concerning the 'innate idea of God,' after all that has been said of its being common to all men in all ages and nations, it does not appear that God has naturally any more idea of God than any of the beasts of the field. He has no knowledge of God at all; neither is God in all his thoughts. Whatever change may afterward be wrought, whether by the grace of God, or by his own reflection, or by education, he is, by nature, a mere atheist."

However much we may repulse the claim, that there is no supreme mind to guide and direct the vast machinery of the mighty universe, the idea is infinitely superior to that of a vacillating, repentant, jealous God, the author of evil, such as is presented us in the Old Testament scriptures.

An Inquiry.

Do our readers ever stop to think that the world's ablest scholars and thinkers, in every department of literature, are classed by the clergy with what they term Infidels? The ablest historians of any age, the Grotes, the Gibbons, the Humes and many others, are classed with unbelievers. And the medical world has no faith in virgin-born Gods. The scientists and inventors are almost invariably lacking in priestly faith. Yes, and the clergy. Since the statement of Bishop Grafton last autumn, of Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, that

"We of the clergy have been made by the church her ministers to teach, NOT WHAT WE THINK IS TRUE, but what she puts into our mouths to teach."—See editorial of Nov. 1, 1905,—we have the right to suspicion they, too, lack faith. As hired attorneys they, generally, are careful not to betray their clients.

It is they who are the best versed in history who are best qualified to trace the origin and rise of any faith. The average child, soon after entering on the journey of life, is presented with a Bible by a loving mother, and is instructed to study its sacred pages, because it is the Word of God, faultless in every line. He reads for a time, and absorbs it all. If he stops to reason, like the little girl who returned the book to her grandmother with the remark, she did not wish to read farther; that it lowered her opinion of God whom she had been taught to adore, so he lays aside the precious volume, and strives to forget what the book taught him. Hume, and Smollet, and Gibbon, and Grote were reared in the church, but broke away from it as they became learned. Most of the Liberals, like Voltaire, and Volney, Paine and Ingersoll, started life in the church. Voltaire published a translation which rendered, of Ecclesiastes and the Songs of Solomon. Says his biographer:

"Though he pruned the licentious language and imagery of the original, the work was burnt by the authorities as immoral and indecent. In this instance Christians condemned their own books and burnt them as obscene."

On another occasion Voltaire exposed the vices of the clergy of France. The authorities, under priestly influence, decreed the destruction of his book which was publicly burnt, and he had to flee to escape a similar fate.

To conclude we copy Voltaire's idea of Bibles and Gospels:

"The only Gospel we should read is the good book of Nature, written with God's own hand, and stamped with his own seal. The only religion we ought to profess is to adore God, and act like honest men. It would be as impossible for this simple and eternal religion to produce evil as it would be impossible for Christian fanaticism not to produce it."

The Glory of the Revivalist.

The title of a series of discourses about to be given by a Methodist evangelist, in an outside town in Illinois, has the old style familiar ring. Just fill out the discourses for yourself, good reader, provided you were ever fortunate enough to listen to a revivalist of fifty years ago, when he was at his best. Think:

"A Midnight Alarm," "A Twentieth Century Folly," "Satan's Best Bait," "The Tables Turned," "The Dead Life of the Soul," "A Fool's Bargain," "Fleeing from Justice," etc. The "etc." will include: The Horrors of Hell, the Eternity of Torture, the Goodness of God, The Joys of Heaven, Escape from Hell and Salvation Through the Redeeming Blood of Jesus.

We can hear the call for mourners; see the anxious seat; the rush to secure a front place; the weeping candidate for glory highly agitated on his knees, and the zealous evangel, joined by class leaders, and the good sisters, kneeled around, and each doing his level best with loud voice to gain the ear of Heaven.

The Progressive Thinker wishes the evangel great success; for so soon as the hypnotic spell is broken the neophyte will begin to think, provided he has brains, and whether he leaves the church or not with which he has become connected, will build up a new faith more in harmony with Truth.

Cursing the Wrong Personage.

Evil is defined, "morally bad; contrary to divine or righteous law; wrong and wilful; sinful and depraved."

Now open to Isaiah 45:7, and read: "I make peace, and create evil. I the Lord do all these things." Amos 8:6—"Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?"

Thus, instead of the Devil being responsible for the evil in the world, and particularly in cities, according to this inerrant Bible, it is the "Lord" who does "all these things."

That is the character the Christian's Bible gives the Lord, and then they curse the other fellow for it. Is that right? Is that as it should be? The author of evil is the one who should receive the curses, according to our philosophy.

But God is not the author of evil. The representation that he is, is another error of the inerrant word. We regret the necessity of correcting so many misrepresentations of that "sacred book."

The Spirit World. Rev. May S. Pepper

It Is in Close Touch With This, and Its Vibrations Are Constantly Being Felt.

"All of a sudden I started from my pillow, and there at the door of my chamber Wilkins was standing. He looked alive and there was nothing about him that was peculiar except the strange, sad look of pity on his face."—Miss Wheatley, the somnambulist, roams abroad in her sleep in compliance with vibrations from the Land of Souls, illustrating in a marked degree the potent psychic influences, startling the world to-day, proving the truth of Spirit Return, without even the intervention of Mediumship. Mrs. Addie L. Ballou says: "I enclose a clipping from to-day's Examiner, Feb. 28, showing the trend of the occult forces, and also the liberality of the press."

Lars Wilkins died when the steamship Valencia was wrecked, one of the victims of that terrible disaster on the northern coast, but in the dreams of Miss Mammie Wheatley he still lives, and in her sleep the girl hears him call to her for aid.

When she hears him shout to her across the water, Miss Wheatley, whose home is at 149 Jasper street, rises in her sleep and without waking she starts away in response to the plea for help. Twice, controlled by this weird somnambulist influence, she has been found walking and running about on the streets at night, clad only in her night dress. On the night of the wreck, she says, the vision first appeared to her, but at that time she did not leave her bed, so far as she is aware. The second sleep-walking experience occurred before daylight yesterday morning, when the girl was found by Policeman Furman at Eleventh and Mission streets about 4 o'clock. Here is the strange story as told by the girl herself:

"On Sunday night I went to bed rather early. We had been talking about Mr. Wilkins, who had stayed with us nearly two years, and who was a very good friend to the family. In every corner of the house there is some little trinket or gift to recall his memory. I must say that while he was with us I never cared much for him."

"It is this thought that makes me sad whenever his unhappy fate is recalled, and I often think that if he could come back again I would be sweet and gentle to him. Last night as I went to sleep I was dreaming of him."

"I do not know in what predicament my feverish fancy was picturing him, but all of a sudden I started from my pillow, and there at the door of my chamber, Wilkins was standing."

"He looked alive, and there was nothing about him that was peculiar except the strange, sad look of pity on his face. As I watched him he stretched out his hand towards me, and I could see that his lips were moving."

"Mammie, oh, Mammie! Save me! Get me a boat, he said, and then he beckoned to me to follow him. He waited at the door until I brushed by him. I did not look into his face as I passed."

"Down the stairs I crept in my night-dress. There was no time for delay. The wreck had just happened, and although I did not see him in the water, nor did I behold any ship, I understood that he needed help immediately."

"I opened the door and was out on the street. He was in front of me now, beckoning from the dim distance. We hurried along over the pavements. I was not conscious of the cold, nor did I experience any sensation that I can remember. When the spectre left me, I cannot say."

LIKE DADDY.

[Soliloquy of Robert Payson Fugitt, Washington, D. C., March 1, 1906, as interpreted by the author.]

I'm a little baby boy—
Only came one month ago
To this world of doubtful joy
Filled with strange things I don't know;

But I think I'll stay awhile—
Nothing seems so very bad;
Everyone gives me a smile,
And they say I look like Dad.

Daddy's eyes are very blue;
Mine are just as blue 'tis said.
Daddy's hairs are very few
On the front part of his head;
So are mine, as scarce can be,
For that, of course, I'm glad.

What's the use of hair on me?
If I'm going to look like Dad?
Mother wanted me with curls,
But that wasn't in the plan.
Curls are only made for girls
And I want to be a man.

Just like Daddy, big and strong;
So from him I pattern took.
Fast I'll grow, it won't take long Since like Daddy now I look.

Pink and white is Daddy's skin;
Mine is pinker, whiter, too,
And the dimple in his chin—
Well, I've got one right in view.
Then, like him, I'm always good;
Never cross, and never bad.

Sleep and smile as babies should,
Just because I look like Dad.
My dear Daddy says each day,
"Prettiest boy on earth is he,"
Funny thing for him to say—
Not polite, it seems to me.

Now when mamma says it o'er,
I don't mind, it makes me glad,
For I think she loves me more,
Just because I look like Dad.

Daddy loves her, so do I,
And she calls us each "Her Boy."
He and I will always try
Just to give her sweetest joy.
Oh, what a life we three shall be,
Always happy, never sad.

And I guess we'll all agree
That it's nice to look like Dad.

"In the morning I was awakened by the rattle of bolts being withdrawn. I started up in surprise, for I was in a strange room, and a woman I did not know was bending over me. My father called to me and I was happy then. They say that I was found by a policeman, that I ran as he tried to catch me, and that they locked me up in the Receiving Hospital. I do not feel sick to-day. I am very nervous, that is all."

"I had a similar experience a week ago. Then I was found by friends on Ninth and Mission streets and returned. I hope that I won't see it again. The third time might be much worse. On the night of the Valencia wreck I saw, or rather I dreamed that I saw, Mr. Wilkins for the first time. At the time I did not know that the ship had been wrecked. Along about midnight, I was startled from my sleep. Mr. Wilkins was in my room, and as I raised myself on my pillow, he came forward and touched me on the shoulder, saying the selfsame words that he uttered on Sunday night: 'Mammie, save me! Get me a boat!' He then went around the room, scattering bones, and pleading that I come and help him and his friends. I awoke with an awful shriek. My mother rushed into my room, and I told her what had transpired. She said that I was only dreaming, and she took me into my own bed."

In the whole field of psychical research, which has been carried on with a great deal of zeal in this country, no record of more interest than the story of this case could probably be found. The authenticity of the two sleep-walking incidents cannot be questioned. The account of the first dream, or vision, on the night of the wreck, and which is alleged to have awakened Miss Wheatley before she knew of the disaster, is, however, the one of chief interest to the promoters of research along these lines. Some scientists of very high standing would regard it as entirely possible that the mind of the Valencia victim could have influenced the mind of the San Francisco girl at the time of the wreck, and in the manner stated, but they would not accept any theory of direct mental influence occurring after the man had died. If, at the time of the first dream, said to have been experienced on the night of the wreck and before the news was received here, Miss Wheatley and her mother had established a record which would leave no room for skepticism or doubt, the case would have been one of the most remarkable in the history of psychical phenomena.

Miss Wheatley is an exceedingly pretty girl of fifteen years. Her hair is luxuriantly abundant and falls in fine delicate ringlets over her brow, and she has large blue eyes. Mr. Wilkins was a man of middle age, a druggist by profession.—San Francisco Examiner, Feb. 27.

Some strange stories began to be circulated concerning the old gentleman's former dwelling. It appeared that the property had not been left as the relatives wished, and there were unfortunate disputes over the will. The story, as it came to the ears of Mr. J., and his wife, was that every morning all the doors, however securely fastened, would be found open, and one special time it was stated that all the horses and vehicles about the place were found at the bottom of a distant field, the stables and coach-houses remaining closed and locked.

Mr. J. and his wife smiled at these stories, and remarked that it was probably very human, not spiritual, agency which effected these strange things.

But shortly afterwards Mr. J., returning as usual from his distant appointment, and nearing the house of which these uncanny stories were told, was surprised by his steady, so-called "strong" and "reliable" horse rearing violently and refusing to go on. Coaxing and stern methods were in vain, so the minister got down to lead the beast. To his surprise it was trembling violently, and turning his eyes to the side of the road Mr. J. was horrified to behold the figure of his old acquaintance calmly and meditatively strolling along as beforetime.

I have said that he was a practical man, but his nerves were not proof against this shock. He always confessed that he did not know how he got into the trap, and how he drove home, but his wife was surprised when which it has lived for nearly twenty centuries.

"For religion to become extinct is no new thing. It must have happened more than once in the night of time, and the analysis of the end of the Roman empire made us assist at the death of paganism. But until now men passed from a crumbling temple into one that was being built; they left one religion to enter another, whereas we are abandoning ours to go nowhere. That is the new phenomenon, with the unknown consequences, in which we live."

The writer erred in supposing the old creed-bound superstition would have no successor. Spiritualism, with its facts in regard to a continued life, is here to stay. It will overwhelm and crush all opposing religions, and become the universal faith of the world. The lake element, by which it is now cursed, will disappear with the corruption which incited fraud to stay in progress.

Maurice Maeterlinck, in a late issue of the Atlantic Monthly, makes this suggestive statement:

"We have arrived at a stage of human evolution that must be almost unprecedented in history. A large portion of mankind—and just that portion which is concerned with the part that has hitherto created the events of which we know with some certainty—is gradually forsaking the religion in progress.

A New Thing in History.

There is no use in antagonizing facts. The dominant religion is moribund—death struck. Every practical observer knows this; and churchmen are as conscious of it as any. A falling body increases in speed each moment of its descent, so as to be almost invisible as it nears the earth; and so with the disintegration of a religion; what was scarcely noticed twenty-five years ago, becomes a general remark to-day.

The New York Herald, of February 26, has the following:

The Rev. May S. Pepper, pastor of the First Spiritual Church, of Brooklyn, is considering an offer to go to Russia to take up her mediumistic work there, and she has planned to give up her pastorate on June 1. Her contract with the Brooklyn church expires at that time, and she said last night that unless there was a change in her plans she would not renew it, but would accept the Russian offer.

It will be as a private medium rather than the pastor of a church that Mrs. Pepper will go to Russia. She said last night after her service that it was work of a semi-political nature, but would not go into details, other than to say that persons high in Russian affairs were interested in having her go there. She will live at Moscow if she goes, as she now expects to.

Mrs. Pepper is finishing her second year as the pastor of the Brooklyn church, and although she has encountered opposition of the most bitter nature, the confidence of her followers has never wavered, and she has built up a large church. She stands high in the world of Spiritualism, and represented that religion at the Parliament of Religions held at Portland, Ore., last summer.

In her sermon last night Mrs. Pepper declared that the Rev. Dr. Isaac K. Funk had been misquoted in the report of his address before the Presbyterian ministers, in which he declared that he had never received absolute proof of messages from the spirit world. She declared that he had told her that he had been misquoted, and that she in fact knew that Dr. Funk had received many messages that could have come from nowhere but from the spirit world.

This highly gifted medium is seriously thinking of leaving the United States, having received an urgent appeal to visit Russia, the domain of the Tsar, from persons extremely high in authority. She is a most wonderful medium, and in that foreign land she will make an impression that will prove of lasting good to our cause. We most cordially congratulate the lady on this acknowledgment of the high esteem in which she is held by foreigners who are seeking light on occult subjects. She will keep the readers of The Progressive Thinker informed as to her future movements.

SPIRITUALISTS.

They Are In a Questioning Mood.

All along the line in the ranks of Spiritualism, intelligent Spiritualists are in a QUESTIONING MOOD.

Spirit Return is UNQUESTIONABLY TRUE.

There has been enough spontaneous phenomena through all the past to establish that fact without the intervention of a single medium.

Prophetic dreams and visions, the levitation of articles without mortal intervention, haunted houses, the sudden appearance of the spirit of one dying in a distant locality, words of warning from unseen sources, etc., all tend to establish the truth of SPIRIT RETURN without any mediumship whatever.

But no sooner was SPIRIT RETURN established through the subtle laws of mediumship, than the base and rotten imitator stepped to the front to reap the reward that only belongs to HONEST MEDIUMS.

One place in this city has done a lucrative business in furnishing material and instruction to those who wish "TO PLAY" mediumship. Its illustrated circular is in our possession, and is gotten up in fine, artistic style, and the suggestions are diabolically ingenious, and also interesting in connection with the study of human credulity.

So prominent a part is LEGERDEMAIN playing to-day in connection with the phenomena of Spirit Return, especially at various camp-meetings, that we will soon publish several communications under that heading. Four of them will be from the pen of War a Companion of Slavery.

John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, declared, "Slavery is the sum of all villainies." We cordially endorse that declaration, and are glad to hail his shade as a worthy ally. But, oh, how lamentable that the Bible we were taught to adore as the Word of God, should teach us that slavery was founded by that God, and he should teach his favorites that they might hold bondmen and bond women forever as slaves, as we showed two weeks ago, in a "Leaf From History" was the case.

Slavery the sum of all villainies, and God the founder! Christians, your Bible is NOT inerrant. The God we worship never authorized the accursed institution. The priest who wrote that very errant record falsified, and you have been forcing a delusion on the world, and it is time to cease.

But slavery, gross, horrible, damnable as it was, and causing out every virtue as it did, blighting human happiness for thousands of years, had a powerful auxiliary in grim-visaged War! It was a companion, and aid to slavery. Captives made on the field of battle, were formerly enslaved, and the practice continued down to modern times. So late as the desolating wars between England and Scotland Christian captives, chanting the name of Jesus, were transported to Barbadoes, and were sold into slavery by the Christian conquerors in England. Deny it who dare!

And whence War? Go read your Bible, good Christian brother, and find long chapters with a "Thus saith the Lord," instructing his favored people to war on other peoples, and to save nothing alive but virgins! These were allowed to be held for purposes too vile to be designated by the term slave.

It is false, a base, shameless lie, to make the Eternal Father responsible for these heinous acts; and the book so dishonoring God should not be presented to the world for its glorification and guidance. We mean every word we write. The period is passed when the stake, the fagot, and dungeon may be employed to crush those who expose the true character of that book; and we halt with joy the services of the best writers and ablest scholars in the Christian world in calling attention to these wrongs which human language is too feeble to denounce with the vehemence the subject demands.

An Inquiry.

Do our readers ever stop to think that the world's ablest scholars and thinkers, in every department of literature, are classed by the clergy with what they term infidels? The ablest historians of any age, the Grotes, the Gibbons, the Humes and many others, are classed with unbelievers. And the medical world has no faith in virgin-born Gods. The scientists and inventors are almost invariably lacking in priestly faith. Yes, and the clergy. Since the statement of Bishop Grafton last autumn, of Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, that

"We of the clergy have been made by the church her ministers to teach, NOT WHAT WE THINK IS TRUE, but what she puts into our mouths to teach,"—See editorial of Nov. 1, 1905,—we have the right to suspicion they, too, lack faith. As hired attorneys they, generally, are careful not to betray their clients.

It is they who are the best versed in history who are best qualified to trace the origin and rise of any faith. The average child, soon after entering on the journey of life, is presented with a Bible by a loving mother, and is instructed to study its sacred pages, because it is the Word of God, faultless in every line. He reads for a time, and absorbs it all. If he stops to reason, like the little girl who returned the book to her grandmother with the remark, she did not wish to read farther; that it lowered her opinion of God whom she had been taught to adore, so he lays aside the precious volume, and strives to forget what the book taught him. Hume, and Smollet, and Gibbon, and Grotes were reared in the church, but broke away from it as they became learned. Most of the Liberals, like Voltaire, and Volney, and Palmer, and Ingersoll, started life in the church. Voltaire published a translation which he rendered of Ecclesiastes and the Songs of Solomon. Says his biographer:

"Though he pruned the licentious language, and imagery of the original, the work was burnt by the authorities as immoral and indecent. In this instance Christians condemned their own books and burnt them as obscene."

On another occasion Voltaire exposed the vices of the clergy of France. The authorities, under priestly influence, decreed the destruction of his book which was publicly burnt, and he had to flee to escape a similar fate. To conclude we copy Voltaire's idea of Bibles and Gospels:

"The only Gospel we should read is the grand book of Nature, written with God's own hand, and stamped with his own seal. The only religion we ought to profess is to adore God, and act like honest men. It would be as impossible for this simple and eternal religion to produce evil as it would be impossible for Christian fanaticism not to produce it."

The Glory of the Revivalist.

The title of a series of discourses about to be given by a Methodist evangelist, in an outside town in Illinois, has the old style familiar ring. Just fill out the discourses for yourself, good reader, provided you were ever fortunate enough to listen to a revivalist of fifty years ago, when he was at his best. Think:

"A Midnight Alarm," "A Twentieth Century Folly," "Satan's Best Bait," "The Tables Turned," "The Dead Line of the Soul," "A Fool's Bargain," "Fleeing from Justice," etc. The "etc." will include: The Horrors of Hell, the Eternity of Torture, The Goodness of God, The Joys of Heaven, Escape from Hell and Salvation Through the Redeeming Blood of Jesus.

We can hear the call for mourners; see the anxious seat; the rush to secure a front place; the weeping candidate for glory highly agitated on his knees, and the zealous evangelist, joined by class leaders, and the good sisters, kneeling around, and each doing his level best with loud voice to gain the ear of Heaven.

The Progressive Thinker wishes the evangelist great success; for so soon as the hypnotic spell is broken the neophyte will begin to think, provided he has brains, and whether he leaves the church or not with which he has been connected, will build up a new faith more in harmony with Truth.

Cursing the Wrong Personage.

Evil is defined, "morally bad; contrary to divine or righteous law; wrong and willful; sinful and depraved."

Now open to Isaiah 45:7, and read:

"I make peace, and create evil. I the Lord do all these things." Amos 8:6—"Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?"

Thus, instead of the Devil being responsible for the evil in the world, and particularly in cities, according to this inerrant Bible, it is the "Lord" who does "all these things."

That is the character the Christian's Bible gives the Lord, and then they curse the other fellow for it. Is that right? Is that as it should be? The author of evil is the one who should receive the curses, according to our philosophy.

But God is not the author of evil. The representation that he is, is an error of the inerrant record. We regret the necessity of correcting so many misrepresentations of that "sacred book."

The Spirit World. Rev. May S. Pepper

It Is in Close Touch With This, and Its Vibrations Are Constantly Being Felt.

"All of a sudden I started from my pillow, and there at the door of my chamber Wilkins was standing. He looked alive and there was nothing about him that was peculiar except the strange, sad look of pity on his face."—Miss Wheatley, the somnambulist, roams abroad in her sleep in compliance with vibrations from the Land of Souls, illustrating in a marked degree the potent psychic influences, startling the world to-day, proving the truth of Spirit Return, without even the intervention of Mediumship. Mrs. Addie L. Ballou says: "I enclose a clipping from to-day's Examiner, Feb. 28, showing the trend of the occult forces, and also the liberality of the press."

Lars Wilkins died when the steamship Valencia was wrecked, one of the victims of that terrible disaster on the northern coast, but in the dreams of Miss Mammie Wheatley he still lives, and in her sleep the girl hears him call to her for aid.

When she hears him shout to her across the water, Miss Wheatley, whose home is at 49 Maple street, rises in her sleep and without waking she starts away in response to the plea for help. Twice, controlled by this weird somnambulist influence, she has been found walking and running about on the streets at night, clad only in her night dress. On the night of the wreck, she says, the vision first appeared to her, but at the time she did not leave her bed, so far as she is aware. The second sleep-walking experience occurred before daylight yesterday morning, when the girl was found by Policeman Furman at Eleventh and Mission streets about 4 o'clock. Here the strange story was told by the girl herself.

"On Sunday night I went to bed rather early. We had been talking about Mr. Wilkins, who had stayed with us nearly two years, and who was a very good friend to the family. In every corner of the house there is some little trinket or gift to recall his memory. I must say that while he was with us I never cared much for him."

"It is this thought that makes me sad whenever his unhappy fate is recited, and I often think that if he could come back again I would be sweet and gentle to him. Last night as I went to sleep I was dreaming of him."

"I do not know in what predicament my feverish fancy was picturing him, but all of a sudden I started from my pillow, and there at the door of my chamber, Wilkins was standing."

"He looked alive, and there was nothing about him that was peculiar except the strange, sad look of pity on his face. As I watched him he stroked out his hand towards me, and I could see that his lips were moving."

"Mammie, oh, Mammie! Save me! Get me a boat," he said, and then he beckoned to me to follow him. He waited at the door until I brushed by him. I did not look into his face as I passed."

"Down the stairs I crept in my night-dress. There was no time for delay. The wreck had just happened, and although I did not see him in the water, nor did I behold any ship, I understood that he needed help immediately."

"I opened the door and was out on the street, and he was in front of me, leaning from the dim distance. We hurried along over the pavements. I was not conscious of the cold, nor did I experience any sensation that I can remember. When the spectre left me, I cannot say."

Miss Wheatley is an exceedingly pretty girl of fifteen years. Her hair is luxuriantly abundant and falls in fine delicate ringlets over her brow, and she has large blue eyes. Mr. Wilkins was a man of middle age, a druggist by profession.—San Francisco Examiner, Feb. 27.

LIKE DADDY.

[Soliloquy of Robert Payson Fugitt, Washington, D. C., March 1, 1906, as interpreted by his mother.]

I'm a little baby boy—
Only came one month ago
To this world of doubtful joy
Filled with strange things I don't

But I think I'll stay awhile—
Nothing seems so very bad;
Everyone gives me a smile,
And they say I look like Dad.

Daddy's eyes are very blue;
Mine are just as blue 'tis said.
Daddy's hairs are very few
On the front part of his head;

So are mine, as scarce can be,
But for that, of course, I'm glad.
What's the use of hair on me
If I'm going to look like Dad?

Mother wanted me with curls,
But that wasn't in the plan.
Curls are only made for girls
And I want to be a man.

Just like Daddy, big and strong;
So from him I pattern took.
Fast I'll grow; I won't take long Since like Daddy now I look.

Pink and white is Daddy's skin;
Mine is pinker, whiter, too,
Than the dimple in his chin—
Well, I've got one right in view.

Then, like him, I'm always good;
Never cross, and never bad,
Sleep and smile as babies should,
Just because I look like Dad.

My dear, Daddy says each day,
"Prettiest boy on earth is he."
Funny thing for him to say—
Not polite, it seems to me.

Now when mamma says it o'er,
I don't mind, it makes me glad,
For I think she loves me more,
Just because I look like Dad.

Daddy loves her, so do I,
And she calls us each "Her Boy."
He and mamma try to make me
Just like the dearest boy I know.

Oh, what fun we three shall be,
Always happy, never sad,
And I guess we'll all agree
That it's nice to look like Dad.

Spontaneous Spirit Phenomena

SPIRIT POWER AND INFLUENCE.

Spontaneous Spirit Phenomena Are Occurring the World Over, and That, Too, Apparently Without the Presence of a Medium, Thus Establishing the Fact, That Spirits Can Make Their Presence Known to the Children of Earth.

The following collection of experiences appeared in the Methodist Recorder, England:

There are ghost stories and ghost stories. Many are explainable, and as such cease to be spiritual. As Methodists we possess records of strange things which cannot be explained away, and must be believed. Now-a-days few instances of spiritual visitations occur. It is a truism to remark that we are living in a high-pressure, hurry-along time, when most people are so busy that they have no time to get through before the end of each year. It is a practical age, too, and ghosts are not practical enough for most up-to-date people. However, the stories I relate were told by an eminently practical man, one of our well-known and beloved Welsh ministers, who has but recently entered "within the veil."

In one of his circuits he was on country appointment, which always involved a long and steady drive. About half-way between this chapel and his home was a gentleman's house, and almost invariably Mr. J. would see the owner of the house walking up and down under the shadow of the trees which skirted his garden, evidently enjoying an after-supper cigar or pipe. He would always nod to the Methodist preacher, and sometimes they would exchange "Good night."

So accustomed had Mr. J. become to the sight of this gentleman, as relieving the monotony of his long drive, that he was as sorry as if he had lost a personal friend when he heard that he was dead.

Some strange stories began to be circulated concerning the old gentleman's former dwelling. It appeared that the property had not been left as the relatives wished, and there were unfortunate disputes over the will. The story, as it came to the ears of Mr. J. and his wife, was that every morning all the doors, however securely fastened the night before, were found unlocked and thrown open, and one special time it was stated that all the horses and vehicles about the place were found at the bottom of a distant field, the stables and coach-houses remaining closed and locked.

Mr. J. and his wife smiled at these stories, and remarked that it was probably very human, not spiritual agency which effected these strange things.

But shortly afterwards Mr. J. returned as usual from his distant appointment, and nearing the house of which these uncanny stories were told, was surprised by his steady, sober-going Methodist parson's horse shying violently and refusing to go on.

Coaxing and sterner methods were in vain, so the minister got down to lead the beast. To his surprise it was trembling violently, and turning his eyes to the side of the road Mr. J. was horrified to behold the figure of his old acquaintance calmly and meditatively strolling along as beforetime.

I have said that he was a practical man, but his nerves were not proof against this shock. He always confessed that he did not know how he got into the trap, and how he drove home, but his wife was surprised when he began to think there was something strange about it, and he took a box of matches from the table by the bedside, and got one all ready to strike in case the mysterious visitor should return.

In a few seconds it entered the room again, and as soon as it seemed to be fairly engaged in its search, Mr. J. deliberately struck a match, and the figure instantly disappeared.

He jumped out of bed and ran out into the corridor. Nothing was to be seen or heard, and he resolved to find his host at once, and ask for an explanation. His bedroom was the only one in that part of the house, but after a little difficulty he found his way, and told his story. The gentleman looked troubled, but after a little hesitation said that his son had died in that room some twelve months previously from typhoid fever, and that the servants and others affirmed that he often came back to his old bed-chamber. Mr. J. was convinced in his own mind that on each of these occasions he had seen a spirit.

Some revival services which had proved highly successful had been held in one of the remote country places in Wales. Some ten or a dozen young men were returning from one of the evening meetings. They had to pass over a part where it was said a great and bloody battle had been fought in bygone ages. But the minds of these young men being full of the scenes of holy excitement which they had just left, their thoughts were from these legends, and as they walked they sang together one of the rousing revival hymns. But soon they were startled by a sound which rose above their singing, and seemed trying to drown it. They stopped and listened; it was a sound as if numbers of heavy chains were being dragged along the floor of a large hall.

With one accord they ran to the place from which the sounds proceeded, but nothing could be seen, nothing could now be heard. They continued their journey and started the Songs of Zion once more, when the diabolical noises began again, and were kept up (though they would not stop singing) until they reached the village.

A New Thing in History.

There is no use in antagonizing facts. The dominant religion is moribund—death struck. Every practical observer knows this; and churchmen are as conscious of it as any. A failing body increases in speed each moment of its descent, so as to be almost invisible as it nears the earth; and so with the disintegration of a religion; what was scarcely noticed twenty-five years ago, becomes a general remark to-day.

Maurice Masterlinck, in a late issue of the Atlantic Monthly, makes this suggestive statement:

"We have arrived at a stage of human evolution that must be almost unprecedented in history. A large portion of mankind—and just that portion which corresponds with the part that has hitherto created the events of which we know with some certainty—is gradually forsaking the religion in progress."

he asked for a light to go to the stable to put up the horse for the night, as he had always been accustomed to perform that office by no other light than that of the moon or stars. He did not tell his wife at the time what had happened, but related the story to his colleague, and often afterwards to his children, from whom I had it.

He also told that on another occasion, going to preach some special sermons for some other denomination (Primitives, I believe), his lot was to be guest in a large and old-fashioned country house. As he was about to retire for the night his host remarked that his lamp was well filled with oil, in case he might want to sit up late reading. Afterwards he imagined there had been another reason for giving him plenty of oil, and was inclined to wish he had left his lamp burning. However, such was not the case, for he was tired, and hastily undressed and got into bed.

He was just falling asleep when he was aroused by someone entering the room, passing over to the old chest of drawers, and apparently searching for something. This did not trouble my friend in the least. He thought probably someone wanted something for morning, and had imagined him to be asleep. So when the visitor had left the room he settled himself to repose again, but was disturbed in exactly the same manner.

When it happened for the third time he began to think there was something strange about it, and he took a box of matches from the table by the bedside, and got one all ready to strike in case the mysterious visitor should return.

In a few seconds it entered the room again, and as soon as it seemed to be fairly engaged in its search, Mr. J. deliberately struck a match, and the figure instantly disappeared.

He jumped out of bed and ran out into the corridor. Nothing was to be seen or heard, and he resolved to find his host at once, and ask for an explanation. His bedroom was the only one in that part of the house, but after a little difficulty he found his way, and told his story. The gentleman looked troubled, but after a little hesitation said that his son had died in that room some twelve months previously from typhoid fever, and that the servants and others affirmed that he often came back to his old bed-chamber. Mr. J. was convinced in his own mind that on each of these occasions he had seen a spirit.

Some revival services which had proved highly successful had been held in one of the remote country places in Wales. Some ten or a dozen young men were returning from one of the evening meetings. They had to pass over a part where it was said a great and bloody battle had been fought in bygone ages. But the minds of these young men being full of the scenes of holy excitement which they had just left, their thoughts were from these legends, and as they walked they sang together one of the rousing revival hymns. But soon they were startled by a sound which rose above their singing, and seemed trying to drown it. They stopped and listened; it was a sound as if numbers of heavy chains were being dragged along the floor of a large hall.

With one accord they ran to the place from which the sounds proceeded, but nothing could be seen, nothing could now be heard. They continued their journey and started the Songs of Zion once more, when the diabolical noises began again, and were kept up (though they would not stop singing) until they reached the village.

A New Thing in History.

There is no use in antagonizing facts. The dominant religion is moribund—death struck. Every practical observer knows this; and churchmen are as conscious of it as any. A failing body increases in speed each moment of its descent, so as to be almost invisible as it nears the earth; and so with the disintegration of a religion; what was scarcely noticed twenty-five years ago, becomes a general remark to-day.

Maurice Masterlinck, in a late issue of the Atlantic Monthly, makes this suggestive statement:

"We have arrived at a stage of human evolution that must be almost unprecedented in history. A large portion of mankind—and just that portion which corresponds with the part that has hitherto created the events of which we know with some certainty—is gradually forsaking the religion in progress."

For religion to become extinct is no new thing. It must have happened more than once in the night of time, and the analysis of the end of the Roman empire made us assist at the death of paganism. But until now men passed from one dominating temple into one that was building; they left one religion to enter another, whereas we are abandoning ours to go nowhere. That is the new phenomenon, with the unknown consequences, in which we live.

The writer erred in supposing the old creed-bound superstition would have no successor. Spiritualism, with its facts in regard to a continued life, is here to stay. It will overwhelm and crush all opposing religions, and become the universal faith of the world. The fake element, by which it is now cursed, will disappear with the corruption which incited fraud to stay in progress.

Where Is Sambo?

In ante-bellum days it was said of a Southern planter, much given to drawing the long bow, that he always appealed to his body servant to confirm his narration; and Sambo, well up in story telling himself, would vouch for the truth of the master's yarn, and add such explanatory points as seemed necessary to make the fiction appear probable. On one of these occasions the master said he and Sambo were in the forest stalking for deer. A giant buck, with great antlers, head erect, came trotting towards him, when he raised his rifle, fired, the animal made a bound and fell to the ground dead. On examination he found the ball had passed through the animal's forehead, left ear and head. "Sambo, isn't that so?"

Sambo stammered for a moment, but recovering himself, he affirmed: "It am strickly true. You see it was jes' dis way: As Massa drew up his gun to shoot de deer, felt somethin' blin' his ear, so he dropped his head an' put up his foot to scratch, and den Massa fired, wid de result stated."

As soon as master and slave were alone the latter averred: "Massa, you mus' make yo' stories more consistent. It was de hardest act of my life to get dat foot an' head in range for de bullet. A few careless stories of dat sort and de people won't b'lieve anything you tell, even if I swear to it."

Query: How would Sambo have reconciled these passages of the divine word?

"[Jacob] have seen God face to face."—Gen. 32:30.

"And the Lord spake to Moses face to face."—Exodus 33:11.

"The Lord talked with you face to face."—Numbers 14:14.

"And the Lord said to Moses, Exodus 33:10: 'There shall no man see me and live.'"

Which is true? Where is Sambo?

Wesley Said It, Not Us.

The Progressive Thinker regrets it has not the means of verification at hand, but it would appear by the following clipping from an exchange, that the founder of Methodism, in the second volume, page 309 of Wesley's Sermons, declared:

"After all that has been so plausibly written concerning the 'innate idea of God,' after all that has been said of its being common to all men in all ages man has naturally any more idea of God than any of the beasts of the field. He has no knowledge of God at all; neither is God in all his thoughts. Whatever change may afterward be wrought, whether by the grace of God, or by his own reflection, or by education, he is, by nature, a mere atheist."

However much we may repulse the claim, that there is no supreme mind to guide and direct the vast machinery of

Who Are the World's Greatest Educators?

A Discourse Given through Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Chicago, Sunday, January 28, 1906.

"My son, get knowledge and wisdom, but with all thy getting get understanding."

"Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal."

Technical education is sometimes the great barrier to getting understanding. There was eminently an age of great learning in Greece, but it was not an age of great goodness or exceptional understanding. There was an age of great learning and art in Italy, when Michael Angelo and his contemporaries rose to the heights of such perfect art, but among the people, and even among the learned, there was not an exceptionally high standard of morals or of spiritual exaltation. The Elizabethan age in England was an age of commanding cultivation for that period and condition of time, but with all the virtues of "Good Queen Bess"—who was very cruel—it was not an exceptionally virtuous age.

You are living in an exceptionally intellectual period of the world's history. Probably there never was a time when over all the "enlightened" world, as it is called, that which is commonly called education was at so high a standard as to-day. The United States of America takes the lead in her system of public schools. Even her universities more than compete with those of foreign lands. We are not particularly proud just now of the morality of your public men.

Great knowledge of men and things and methods certainly does prevail, but the proverb is not followed of getting "understanding," from the standpoint of "wisdom" it does not seem to prevail. At the same time undoubtedly there is a larger percentage of virtue in the world to-day than in any other given period of time. But it takes a very clever man to be a burglar. The man who would employ similar talent as a machinist would undoubtedly excel. May be he would have to work harder, and there would not be the same element of adventure. It requires an exceptional order of gigantic intelligence accompanied by genius to be a multi-millionaire. The reason that there are not more multi-millionaires is, that there are not many geniuses in a generation or century of time, these are eliminations. The intelligence of the masses is not unfolded proportionately to that which is called their education.

Now what is called their education? Intelligence means the awakening of that which is within by affording facility of expression; that is real education. While the schools have largely improved, there is still an oppressive thought in the world that education means largely what you learn in books, and that which will pass a certain crucial or critical examination, more or less lapsing by custom.

If a man proposes a trip in search of the North Pole he does not encumber his excursion with all kinds of things only valuable in the tropics; he does not take with him in his outfit more things than are reasonable. He must be, comparatively, a good navigator; he must be a good mathematician, and must be able to understand his position at any given point by his compass and chart; he must also have courage and endurance and broadmindedness. If he is too technical it will hamper him. The man who goes out on an exploring expedition by rule wholly will find nothing. But if he goes out like Columbus to find something he has dreamed of, having only the physical and mental adjuncts necessary to enable him to fulfill that dream, that vision, that prophecy, he will then succeed.

There are two kinds of educators in the world to-day—those who adhere very largely to the technical and classical schools; and those who have been either consciously or unconsciously imbued with the spirit of Froebel. Kindergarten is not only a child's system, it is a system for the whole world, and it means the bringing forth of that which is within, and giving a person the means wherewith to make it practical. You can see within the last twenty-five years that this system has more or less pervaded the schools. The Kindergarten has been adopted—too reluctantly, it is true—by the public school system. But the spirit of it has not pervaded the leaders in education. The universities for the most part have the curriculum of fifty years ago, with added departments for special and practical technical training. The average boy—and girl, for that matter—often prefers to attend special schools, or only those departments in the universities of the special branches they wish to learn.

This thought may have been presented to your minds in the past few weeks, especially in the past two or three years by the passing on of prominent people connected with the educational movement. There is no greater mistake than to call Dr. Harper a great "educator." He was simply a most stupendous organizer of ways and means. In other words, he was a good college financier. He knew exactly where to go for the money, which others do not always know. There were two things that aided him: He appealed to sectarianism and he appealed to the idiosyncrasies of the persons who aided him. It is NOT A GREAT EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTION, whatever its departments and ramifications are, that can be governed by any sect, denomination of religion, or theology. It cannot be great, however many great men may gravitate there. They generally gravitate out again to a larger center. Some professors, as you may know, have gravitated out of the Chicago University. But the fact that a man in the midst of all the financial possibilities of this age should have been able to grasp those financial possibilities to the bearing forward of a stupendous work, like the Chicago University, proves what is possible by a mind gifted in that direction with a large and liberal education and a liberal perception of what education should mean.

But many of you will lovingly and reverently recall a far different nature—Col. Parker, who was an educator in spirit, whose primal thought was the unfolding of the individual and collective minds and spirits of children of all ages. With all the reverence that is paid, and the tribute to the success of Dr. Harper, we know that the affections of this city and of all who knew him—and one never more completely dominates with the mind than with affection—followed Col. Parker into the other world. If we may make a comparison, and we do it with all respect: One represented the great possibilities of external power, power concentrated in wealth that may be used to carry forward the liberal branches of education; the other mind included the perception of the principles of what true education should be. Probably the latter's influence wrought a greater change in the public schools and the higher departments of those schools than any other mind ever did in this community.

Let us see, briefly, to what we must turn. If education, as it is called, is to be purely intellectual, then our friends, or enemies, in the Catholic church have every argument in favor of parochial schools.

We have carried the absence of religion to the extreme. WE DO NOT BELIEVE IN THEOLOGICAL TRAINING in public schools; we do not believe in it in the universities, though many of our most magnificent institutions of learning are dominated by sectarian influences. We believe in the pervading spirit of religion everywhere, which it does not seem possible to have at the present time without sectarianism. It would be possible in a system like that of some of the German schools, or the system adopted for the Kindergartens borne forward to greater practice, where "love and home and the children" are the theme of the students' song. In Germany and those schools that include the practical commonwealth, where princes' and peasants' sons know no difference in their rank or position; where the object is to equip the mind with whatever the intention of the spirit is in human life.

Most of times and places the children are ground out through the same mill at the public schools, and must be, notwithstanding the excellence of the teacher or the instruction after the plan of the world. The opportunity cannot be given for studying the personal peculiarities of the child or student. The idea is, to equip the mind with certain essentials and then let the students go forward to any special training they may seek or require.

The truth is, there is too much book learning; the mind is lumbered up, it is measurably hampered; children must dabble in this or the other thing before they arrive at the age to know what their peculiar idea or tendency will be. Poets in the blacksmith shop and plowing in the field, or with the precious volumes they loved to read secretly hidden away in the attic, illustrate the old-time idea, that every boy must toil in a certain kind of labor—because of the need of money, in fact, to bear forward the family, perhaps. Like your own Whittier and Longfellow, all those who started as New England poets. The only poets born in this country were those who had been farmer boys. Your dreamers and laborers in other directions are not numbered: the violinist that wants to play, but when the certain fingers of want were upon him his playing had to be surreptitiously introduced.

It is not so very much more than half a century ago that "fiddling" was forbidden by the descendants of the Puritans. It was with great horror to many when the bass viol was first introduced into the choir, so an old-fashioned parson who very much objected to it, said, when there was a little talk in the choir about the hymns to be sung, "When you get through with your fiddling and fiddling we will have a little singing." That was his idea of music in churches. Now you attend a church, a distinctly fashionable church, and you have a sacred concert—and therein there is a difference between then and now; the church has been educated in every direction, at least the long doctrinal sermons are not preached to the majority of the church members now. What they get in its place must depend. Sometimes it is music, sometimes it is a sensational sermon, sometimes it is a great flow of inspiration.

Harvard, Yale, all the colleges and universities, from lack of the spiritual wealth, which need not be called theological, are blossoming out into foot-ball and athletic sports, and you will see a great deal more about that in the newspaper reports than you will of the learning of the schools. We have had a rest from that of which Emerson was the fruition. Notwithstanding the narrow limit of the educational curriculum of his age, Emerson was the full flowering out of the protest against it. All the liberal clergymen including William Ellery Channing, Theodore Parker, Thomas Starr King and others are the result of other and deeper things.

To-day there is only one proposition possible as the sequence to that which is usually called education: the ever-increasing tendency to technical knowledge in certain directions which will make a treadmill of the lives of those adopting it. Technicality in mechanics; technicality in chemistry; technicality in illustrative art; technicality in whatever branch is taken up. This becomes like Europe, then we have simply those who know that one thing and nothing else. The great genius of American progress was, "Americans could do anything," could turn their hands to anything and learn with experience and the demands of the hour. The pioneers were the best educators; they were obliged to DO THE THINGS THAT WERE NECESSARY, and they found out the way.

We have told you this anecdote before: that the father of the one who stands before you lived in the West; a college graduate, who tried to be a minister, but could not make his home in the East on account of his health, came west and took a little farm. He owned a cow and a calf of course; one day his calf's head was caught between the boards of the fence and seemed to be choking to death. He tried in vain to extricate it. He had learned in some of his books that "that which goes into a certain place can come out through the same place," but he could not pull the calf's head through that place, so he called upon Mr. Scott to help him. Mr. Scott went over to his place with him, and quickly knocked one of the boards of the fence off with a stone and the calf was free. The college educated man was astonished; he had not thought of that way. That is the difference between the pioneers' way and the way of education, or those who rely wholly on books. Of course, there are plenty of graduates who have a little common sense left when they come out of the schools, but not so very much.

Of course you know what Elbert Hubbard says: that these universities are institutions for creating imbeciles. But, of course, if one is not an imbecile he probably would not become one just by going through college.

But the proposition is: shall the enlightened people of this country adopt that method of mere technical education or knowledge, or shall there be a larger conception that consists wholly in the incentive to do in the beginning, in what are known as industrial schools, i. e., schools that demonstrate. In that degree we believe in Christian Science; we believe that every step of progress should be "demonstrated." If it is mathematics, demonstrate it mathematically, then there will be something to do as well as to learn, and the result will be that which will not require football for an outlet for the growing young boy or young people.

Farms and workshops are places where form and idea can speedily find realization, which will not only be the status of education but will offer to humanity a more intelligent class of laborers. Some farmers have employed college students and have found a mutual benefit. Students working their way through college find in the summer's interval in this way the means of acquiring money to continue their college course. If this were followed out in all branches how much better it would be for those who must after a while go to the workshop or farm.

Then the large and seemingly ever-increasing class of young people who will fly to the cities; young boys whose fathers have a little fortune so they do not need to do anything. There must be some kind of public opinion introduced that will be compulsory, we do not mean compulsory in the sense of jails or the police, but in a moral sense, in an intellectual sense, for all these unemployed hands to do something. Those who must needs earn their daily bread to have the way provided so that when they come out of the schools or colleges they will find a place. For rather than be idle in order to find a place, they may learn to break open a bank safe. Whatever dynamite can do in one direction it can do in another. For one who is skillful enough to make an impregnable lock, some one has the intelligence to open it. The Mercury, as a god (who is also the presiding power on the planet Mercury) is gifted in these clever devices of art, science, mechanical skill, thievery and commerce. Read it in your books. That is what they say. It is certain that the intellectually endowed, the intellectually quickened will find an outlet somewhere.

If people have advanced enough to belong to a school like that of Plato, being taught by conversation in the groves. If there was luxury enough to own a grove, it was only luxury to the class who could listen to Plato; it was only because Plato did not have to earn his daily bread with his hands that he could afford to teach in that way. So in those wonderful illustrations and conversations, and assembling of kindred souls, either in those days or in the days of Michael Angelo, or in that wonderful period in Germany wherein, at last meeting, Schiller and Goethe led the thought of the world in the little court at Weimar, there were periods of the flowering out of the enlightenment of the age in certain gifted minds, who were geniuses also.

But the average human being must be cared for meanwhile, the one who is a million embodiments away from being a genius must find work. You do not provide for geniuses; you do not provide even for those that are talented, they can readily pick up the knowledge that is needed for any special work. Humboldt could readily learn a language after he was eighty years old, to bear forward a necessary work. Why hamper him with that when he was a child, which surely would have been forgotten?

The truth is, the hampering systems of the methods of education are being more and more abandoned, and the idea is to equip the intelligence of the intelligent child with the methods of doing things, in order that when the time comes, the mechanics, mathematics and language may be called into play, the faculties into exercise. The only value of words is to express ideas. If there are no ideas to express, the language is valueless. Frequently it is a good suppresser of ideas. You may have a few talkers among your friends, or among your acquaintances who talk a great deal but say nothing, that talk is simply "words." As said before the value of language is to express ideas. Of course Memnon, who was individually impressed with the letters of ancient language, invented them to express ideas. If there ever is a universal language, it will be when ideas are so universal that people can use that one language with perfect, simple harmony to express the brotherhood and sisterhood in the family of nations. Perhaps in that time there will be a futurity of nations, and it will not be until that fraternity seeks and finds a universal language that perfect expression of ideas will come: the Anglo-Saxon; or it may be the language as spoken and taught in this country is nearest to a universal language.

By and by sounds will be so harmonious, and syllables and words will be so adjusted that there will be no need especially for rhythmic verse; for poems, rhymes and metre were arranged in order that the harsh points of sound might be rubbed off to the expression of the higher emotions. But when we have no harsh points of criticism, of envy or revenge, when there is no need of any slander; the language will be perfectly musical. You do not often hear the notes of any slander in a song, even though music is sometimes perverted to unhallowed purposes. The barbed wires and satires of society are very rarely embodied in songs; be it satire here, be it criticism there, these are exceptional in song.

Whoever will make it possible for teachers to employ their best and highest ideals in teaching; whoever will make it possible for teachers to know in the adaptation of their teaching what is to be given, and what withheld, and whenever the public at large shall be sufficiently interested and keep education out of partisan politics and local squabbles, these will make the schools illustrate the principles of living. Then by and by, whoever will make it possible that children do not have to go to school but are always in school, for the school is life, whoever can answer the questions as they rise from infant lips every day will be the greatest of teachers. The mother, overburdened with domestic cares and the duties of providing for the family cannot do it. The father, perhaps, with his many hours of daily labor cannot do it. But by and by the time will come when the first question asked by infant lips will be answered by those nearest and dearest. The mothers are the great teachers of the race after all. The fathers are the great exemplars. Sometimes, unfortunately, the boys follow them almost to the letter; sometimes swearing, drinking and smoking. Of course that is a part of the boy's life; he may not do it later, but the little boy wants to be just like his father. The mother loves, works and teaches.

The future children will not be sent away to school because the mother has no time, and the father has no time. By and by the home, the neighbors and society will be the school; you will not have more institutions of schooling than you shall have talent. The masses of the people in the cities want the schools but cannot afford to send the children. Indeed we sometimes think the poor-houses and systems of charities are object lessons, for you become proud of the poverty. Now the time will come when you will not have those institutions. Every state will provide employment for those who will, and can and wish to work. The aged and infirm will be provided for. There are very beneficent institutions; there will be beneficence by and by that will not need any institutions; there will be knowledge, and for all the knowledge there will be "understanding." There will not be any schools, schools and institutions will be considered exercises; but there will be more education than there is now. There will be growth; that legitimate growth that comes from the knowledge that the parents are the guardians for all the needs of every particular child. The great garden of life is here to be cultivated. We have listened especially to the small child, the "prodigy" who have made monstrosities of them one way or another. The small in intellect and in size are being crushed, exterminated and expunged to see what can be done in "the survival of the fittest." Competition in schools, as in finance, is a misnomer. By and by equality of opportunity will take the place of size; we will not have giants in any direction, neither dwarfs.

Those will be the true educators who teach and illustrate that the child does not need so much book learning, so much technology. It needs to grow mentally and spiritually. The "Nature studies" are a step.

How many of you can answer the questions children can ask about God or the soul, or death or the future life? Even after listening here twenty-five and thirty years? And who else can answer as well as you? The great thing is for training in every direction so a question can be answered if it is asked upon the great mysteries of birth and death of the human life which the child does not understand. You do not want them to find it out in books or the mistaken ideas of this teacher, or that one, whether biased or prejudiced, but the truth concerning it. When this truth is abroad in the world, when children breathe it in their atmosphere; when it is in your food and in your drink; when the spirit of it imbues the home and your children are not afraid to answer to what they know about the other world, what they know about the spirit being the pervading life here, then there will be true education, then all the departments of life will be included according to their importance.

You know more about Plato than the masses did in his time; you know more about the poets than those who read their rhymes for the first time; you know more about music than did the musicians of any past period of time—that is the world does. So the world is growing into this great expression day by day, until at last the children will learn to talk and breathe it; people will know that to work and play together not knowing which is which will be the great education and privilege of childhood.

If you go out for a walk, how many questions can you answer that the children can ask in natural history. There are teachers, perhaps many of them, who go out with their scholars who can answer many of the questions from books. If you go out at night, who can answer all their questions about the stars? If you could, there would be no need of astronomers. Who in the home can answer the questions the child will ask about chemistry?

By and by, when the time comes to take up an especial technical course the mind will be equipped and ready to take it up for an especial purpose. Teachers there are in households, in schools, in churches, in academies and colleges, who imbue the whole of their associates with the divine spirit of imparting knowledge, not ostentatiously, not pedantically, not with the thought of knowing more than they do, but because imparting is as natural as to receive, and the fountain that overflows continually receives the pure water.

So in the light of this larger and more perfect knowledge you will by and by conclude that it is not a system of education that you need, but it is the spirit of getting knowledge and wisdom and "with all thy getting get understanding" and know how to impart it to others.

DO ANIMALS HAVE SOULS?

Much Evidence Extant to Indicate They Do—A Professor of the University of California Says: "Let a Man Pause Before He Crushes Out the Life He Can Not Give Back."

"I would not enter on my list of friends, though graced with polished manners and fine sense, Yet wanting sensibility, the man Who needlessly sets foot upon a worm."—Cowper.

Prof. Geo. H. Howison, head of the department of philosophy of the University of California, started his class in ethics recently by declaring that not only do animals reflect and reason but that every living thing is immortal, if man is immortal.

It is now very generally admitted that animals do reason.

Prof. Howison supposes the case of a cat that wants to get a dish of cream on a high shelf. It is far out of her reach, but she jumps on a chair, thence to a table, thence to a nearby cupboard, and at last reaches the cream in this way. HOW DID THE CAT KNOW SHE COULD DO THIS? Not by instinct as the old philosophy had it. The cat reasoned the thing out.

Moreover, it is plain that some animals are more intelligent than others. Some have a better quality of gray matter in their brain than others. They are better thinkers. There are more convulsions or WRINKLES in their brains. The more wrinkles in any brain—man or animal—the more brain force.

As to immortality of animals the argument, of course, is by analogy. Science does not undertake to say that any soul is immortal, but philosophy steps in to say that all life is from one source is alike; and that if one life is immortal, all life must be immortal.

In Cowper's day such a declaration would have been an absurdity. Cowper shrank from the man who would go out of his way to step on a worm because of the MEANNESS OF MAN who lacked mercy, not because the worm might be immortal.

To-day science teaches the immanence of life in all things and philosophy declares the sacredness of all life.

Shall we go back then to the Hindu's idea that animal life is so sacred that man has no right to take that life, even for food?

However that may be, the doctrine of the sanctity of life in all things is a growing one—and a needed one.

Let a man pause before he crushes out the life he cannot give back. How does he know? HE MAY BE RELEASING AN IMMORTAL SOUL BEFORE ITS TIME.

He is gentlest who gives even the worm a chance to live. He is greatest who is most merciful to all of God's created things.—Daily News, San Francisco, Cal.

DRIFTING.

His form was bowed and his eyes were dim;
The beauties of Nature were naught to him;
His face was furrowed by strife and tears,
And bore the sad impress of wasted years;
While the storm-wrecked bark, he sought to guide
Was drifting, rudderless, with the tide;
Drifting, drifting far out from the shore;
Wave washed and rudderless evermore.

Years in the past, when his life was new,
When ocean was calm and the skies were blue,
And music re-echoed its softest strain
In the dreamy murmurs of Love's refrain;
He launched his boat, and blithesome and young,
The peans of hope were the songs he sung,
As drifting, drifting beyond the bar,
He mounted the waves for an isle afar.

He freighted his barque for the Isle of Souls,
Unmindful of shallows, rocks and shoals;
Forgetful that tempests arise and sweep
The slumbering surges from caverns deep;
Till broken, rudderless, rudely tossed,
By wild waves shattered, the anchor lost,
He is now drifting beyond the bay,
To the fateful shadows not far away.

Eye Glasses Not Necessary.

Eye Sight can be Strengthened, and all Forms of Blurred Vision Cured without Cutting or Drugging.

That the eyes can be strengthened so that eye glasses can be dispensed with in the great majority of cases, has been proven beyond a doubt by the testimony of thousands of people who have been cured by the wonderful little instrument called "Actina." Actina cures all eye troubles, such as cataracts, glaucoma, etc., and removes all the causes of blurred vision without cutting or drugging. It has cured over seventy thousand eyes, and has been sold in every country of the world. It is not an experiment but an absolute fact. The following letters are but a few of those that have been received:

Mrs. M. E. Chappney, 224 West 18th St., New York City, writes: "The 'Actina' cured my eyes. After the doctors said I had to wear eye glasses for the rest of my life, I was cured by the 'Actina' in a few days. I have been well for over four months and can see as well as ever. I can honestly recommend 'Actina' for all ailments of the eye."

Miss J. Kapp, 1100 Madison Ave., Milwaukee, Wis., writes: "The 'Actina' cured my eyes. I had been wearing eye glasses for years, but after using the 'Actina' for a few days I was cured. I have been well for over four months and can see as well as ever. I can honestly recommend 'Actina' for all ailments of the eye."

Dr. E. H. Hildbrook, Deputy County Clerk, Fairbury, Neb., writes: "The 'Actina' cured my eyes. I had been wearing eye glasses for years, but after using the 'Actina' for a few days I was cured. I have been well for over four months and can see as well as ever. I can honestly recommend 'Actina' for all ailments of the eye."

Actina is sent on trial postpaid. If you send your name and address to the writer, you will receive a copy of the book "The Actina" and a list of the names of the doctors who have used it. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

This department is under the management of
HUDSON TUTTLE.
Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Profits have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby asseverative, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

R. S. Thompson: Q. What is the address of Edwin Markham, and what was his early life?
A. He was born in 1852, at Oregon City, Oregon; removed to California at the age of five years, and in boyhood worked on a farm; learned blacksmithing, and was a herder of cattle and sheep. His address is, Westerleigh, S. I., New York.

Critic: Q. Is science infallible?
A. This correspondent explains the intention of his question in the following note: "Science claims to be the demonstrated, rational interpretation of the phenomena of the universe, yet within the last twenty-five years it has undergone an almost entire change, and a change so great that it amounts to a revolution. There seems no guarantee that in the next twenty-five years it will not undergo again be completely changed. The definition of science that applies is that it is a continuous substitution of new theories for the old."

Those who have studied the textbooks of science, become impressed with the infallibility of their statements, and come to regard them as the impregnable basis of knowledge. In after years of digested thought, when many of these demonstrated propositions are no more than guesses, or at best "working hypotheses," the very base of science seems built on a quaking bog ready to sink into uncertainty. The textbooks have to be revised at least every ten years, and twenty-five makes them obsolete. Yet the substratum of facts that have been accurately observed remains. The new aspect such facts receive from the light of advancing knowledge, and the conclusions—therefore drawn therefrom, are ever changing.

Thence on the definition given to science. Perhaps no word in the language is more loosely used or more abused. It is in the mouth of every charlatan, from the exploiting college professor, to the street fakir.

Science is knowledge, absolute, demonstrated truth. Applied to the vast accumulation of books, writings, and speeches, labeled with that name, how little remains! Nine-tenths of all that passes for science is no more than speculations which have little more to support them than the names of their promulgators. The fact is, the theory of "vibrations" and the constitution of matter. It may be, perhaps, accepted as demonstrated, that light, heat and electricity are manifestations of force by means of vibrations or waves in an ethereal medium. Mathematics lends its aid to this conclusion. Applied to the atom, we are told that it is vibrating with inconceivable velocity, and the kind of dance it performs makes the difference between the elementary bodies. When they dance a cotillion it makes iron, and a schottisch is for gold! So certain are some of these scientists that this is true that they state the exact nature of vibrations in a second of time, and even in a minute. It is mathematically certain! True? Why it is all conjecture, and there can be no mathematical calculation, because there is absolutely no data on which it can be based. The problem would be somewhat like this: Nail a horse's shoe on with eight or ten many steps with the hammer. How many steps would it take to remove it? All the exploited theories of atomic vibrations, change of one element into another, have no more support than dreams.

No one has ever seen an "atom," no one ever can. All that is said of it, of the manner molecules revolve around each other, or of elements combining for their formation, is pure conjecture which to-morrow may be replaced by others equally speculative. Text-books of science are compilations of facts, records of observations and theories. As far as the facts go, there is certainty. Descriptions of plants, animals, etc., of plants, their methods of growth and relationship; of the members of the solar system and mutual relationship, are facts of observation and unchanging. In the comprehensiveness of mathematics there may be progress, but the field already won may be called infallible. There is nothing which shows in a more unmistakable manner the spiritual alliance of the human mind, its kinship with the forces by which the universe was evolved and is sustained, than its ability while confined to one whirling orbit, to compute the distance, size and periodicity of the planets and stars.

One step beyond this record of facts, and the mind stands on the threshold of causes, yet the effects are so closely connected that the immediate relationship is apparent. One step more and in the wider generalization the finite powers of the mind show their narrow limitations, and speculation is limited only by the activity of the scientific fancy. There is a constant succession of surprising "discoveries," put forth, not by ignorant pretenders, but by professors high in the ranks of learning; not from the unlearned, as would be inferred, but from leading lights in science have come the cranks theories of microbes inoculation and toxic and anti-toxin cures for disease; the poison-cure for diphtheria, fevers, cancer, rabies, etc. Not from the unlearned the heretofore discovery of the X-ray cure for cancer, tuberculosis. These discoveries have demanded the sacrifice of hundreds of victims to prove their folly.

Not from the unlearned the exciting statements of the marvelous character of "radium" and its cure-all properties, and its overturning of all preceding ideas of matter and force.

These are samples of the countless theories which have been heralded by noted scientists, which, had they been suggested by those who bear the hall-mark of science, would have been laughed at as vagaries of ignorant egotists and quacks.

If the books on science were subjected to the critical blue pencil, cancelling every passage not proven, cutting out all that is speculative, how narrow would be the remaining margin! And should the writings called "popular science," be subjected to the same treatment, the search for unmarked passages would be more arduous than that for a needle in a mountainous stack of straw.

Science is truth, and the truth never changes. There may be vital changes in its understanding, and its interpretation by fancy leads to confusion and doubt. In the field of speculation, there is, of course, swift changes and unrest, for little is known and beyond is the "unknownable." Really in this field speculation is as rampant as it was with the old "philosophers" and succeeding metaphysicians who counted observation of facts of no value, evolving their systems out of their own internal consciousness. It is asserting that in this field the dreams of one are as authoritative as those of another, and all of more intrinsic value than a nursery tale.

When the phenomena of the world are studied in the light of the spiritual philosophy, instead of from the dark, material side; when in every phenomena mind is recognized as the primary factor; the universe taken as a living whole, a spirit-permeated organism, and the world as the foundation of correct comprehension of the two worlds, which are one, the material and spiritual, be laid.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

The Cause There in a Flourishing Condition.

To the Editor:—That the movement is not stultifying here in Indianapolis was made manifest by the large and intelligent audience that assembled last Sunday evening, February 17, at the Progressive Spiritual Church, 222 E. Maryland street, to listen to the profound and logical discourse delivered by that most eloquent dispenser of spiritual truth, Will J. E. Wood. The sublimity of his thought and the earnestness with which he expressed it, goes direct to, and completely captivates every soul present who is hungry and yearning for spiritual food.

On this occasion the church was wholly inadequate to accommodate all who came. The regular speaker, Mrs. Anna Thronson, on this evening, gave a most interesting and instructive discourse. She is one of the most earnest and lovable characters that have ever stood upon the spiritual rostrum here. Her husband, Mr. Thronson, is a very fine vocalist, and he is always present to assist in harmonizing the audience by singing some appropriate solo.

One of the sweetest little vocalists I have ever been my pleasure to listen to is little Miss Doratha Beck, a little girl about seven or eight years of age. She has a voice as bewitchingly sweet as a nightingale, and sings before a large audience with as much composure as any of the noted singers before the public, and when Mr. Allen, the president of the Progressive Spiritual Society, announced on this occasion that it would be the last time we would have the pleasure of hearing the little vocalist, as she was going to Boston, I am sure that every one present felt a pang of regret.

I cannot refrain from writing about a meeting held February 10, at the Progressive Spiritual Church. On that occasion Mrs. Thronson, the vice-president of the society, made a short address which was well received. Then a Mr. Kingsley was invited on the rostrum to make a few remarks, which consisted mainly in roasting Mrs. Thronson. He gave two, and his manner of giving them was just about as antic as those he ridiculed. In my humble opinion he is a humbug. I enclose you an "ad" he has in the daily papers. You will see by it that he is only "it," the real thing! He tells you how to win the man or woman you love, and how to make your husband or wife be true to you; and how to overcome all your enemies, and how to develop personal magnetism. Such pretenders are the bane of the spiritual cause. What do you think of any one who will advertise in the manner set forth by the enclosed "ad"?

One says, "locates gold mines, oil wells, buried treasures; positively unites the separated and never fails." Only think, he will do it all for one dollar. Why don't such humbugs locate the gold mines and oil wells for themselves? Everybody who has sense enough to pound sand in a rat hole, knows that such people are humbugs.

A SUCCESSFUL MEETING.

Held in St. Paul by the Minnesota State Spiritualist Association.

To the Editor:—We have just closed the most successful three days' meeting that the Minnesota State Spiritualist Association ever held. People came from all over the state, and we had large audiences at all the meetings; we turned people away Sunday night; could not get into the hall. The signs are splendid; the dead are living and the cause of Spiritualism goes marching on.

The Pioneer Press spoke as follows:

"Not every one can become a spirit medium. The office of 'message bearing' is a gift, not an acquisition. The medium must have a 'sixth' and 'seventh' sense with which ordinary mortals are not gifted. These spiritual senses are entirely independent of the material senses. The brain of the medium can be without the use of eyes and hear without ears." This lucid explanation of the phenomenon of message bearing was given by F. E. Orville, secretary of the Minnesota State Spiritualist Association.

"This exposition was brought out in an open discussion yesterday afternoon at the meeting of the Minnesota State Spiritualist Association, held at the Odd Fellows' Hall, Fifth and Wabasha streets. A woman who is not gifted with the 'sixth' and 'seventh' senses inquired how it was that many people after years and years of study could not see spirits."

Mr. Irvine said that if the power did not develop in the student after three to nine months' study it was no use trying. "Only very finely organized natures can attain unto the office of message bearing. Better study how to heal your friends by the laying on of hands," was his advice.

At the morning session yesterday there was much interest in the discussion of "Soul Development," led by J. P. Whitwell.

The St. Paul Pioneer Press said: About 300 Spiritualists of the state gathered at Odd Fellows' Hall, Fifth and Wabasha streets, yesterday afternoon for the final afternoon session of the midwinter mass-meeting. Messages were given by the mediums. The address of the afternoon was delivered by Mrs. S. M. Lowell of Minneapolis.

Mrs. Lowell said that God represents everything on the earth and that all our blessings and advantages are due solely to him. She stated that the Spiritualists are in advance of others in the way of understanding the progress toward the spiritual side of life. God will aid those who petitioned him in a worthy cause, but God was not directly appealed to. The petitioner first communicated with his spirit friends, who in turn carried the message to the throne and added their entreaties.

Our departed friends are constantly with us, she said, and it given the chance will present themselves to us and help us. The Bible is replete with messages of Spiritualism and the best way to understand the belief is to read the Bible.

Mrs. Asa Talcott of Minneapolis then gave spirit messages. Mrs. Talcott acted as the interpreter, receiving the spirit messages and then transmitting them to those in the audience.

Following Mrs. Talcott, Mrs. Alice Wickstrom and Mrs. E. A. Sauer spent a few minutes in receiving messages from the departed.

Interpersed with the lecture and messages were the invocations, solos and congregational singing.

During the afternoon a considerable sum was donated by the different lycums for the purpose of sending a missionary throughout the state.

The children's lyceum was held from 1:30 to 2:30 o'clock. At 7:30 in the evening a supper was served by the ladies auxiliary.

MEXICAN GIRL DIVINE HEALER.

Santa Teresa of Cabara Wrought Wonderful Cures Among the Natives of Sonora—Exiled From the Land, Found Refuge in Texas, and Finally Died in Chagrin in Arizona.

El Paso, Tex.—Santa Teresa, once sainted by the people of her native town, Cabara, in the state of Sonora, Mexico, and later banished from Mexico by fraud and trickery, died here, having lived in this country for many years. She possessed superhuman power and was responsible for an attempt to incite a revolution, has just died an exile in Chagrin, Ariz.

With the death of Santa Teresa, of the saint of Cabara, as she was known in Mexico, passes one of the most wonderful characters of the past generation.

A few years ago in the little pueblo of Cabara, in the hills of Sonora, Mexico, Teresa Urrea, a plain-faced Mexican girl of lowly parentage and about eighteen years of age, began to attract attention of her people by her alleged wonderful healing powers.

She claimed that she was endowed with power to heal the sick and afflicted, and went among the poor people of her town demonstrating her power.

It was claimed that she accomplished some wonderful cures in the cases of people supposed to be incurably afflicted and wrought such apparitions in this line that her native people made her a saint, and from that time on she was affectionately known as Santa Teresa.

During the time that she was attracting so much attention revolutionists were at work trying to incite an insurrection in Sonora. Santa Teresa was accused by the officials of the state of being the controlling influence behind the stirring up of the revolution, and threats of banishing were freely made.

The sainted girl protested her innocence of any connection with the revolution, and she found a few champions among influential citizens of Mexico, some of them public officials.

Among these was the Aguirre of this city, then a captain in the Mexican army. Banishment was the punishment meted out by the government for his defense of the saint of Cabara, and he came to this city, where he has since died the Spanish paragon known as La Reforma Social.

Santa Teresa was also banished, and in the year 1894 came to El Paso where her fame as a divine healer had preceded her. She set up a small tent in the southeastern part of the city, and the Mexican people flocked to see her in great numbers. The blind, the lame, the halt, the afflicted in every form, crowded around her tent, and receive the healing touch of the alleged divinely appointed hand.

There are many Mexicans in this city now who believe that Santa Teresa was really possessed of some kind of healing power, and claim that she wrought cures that were nothing short of miraculous.

What this woman accomplished in the line of healing, was done, no doubt, through spirit power.

PHYSICAL MEDIUMSHIP.

A Correspondent Replies to Some Criticisms.

To the Editor:—In your most valuable paper, No. 846, Brother R. F. Little of Seattle, Washington, writes some of the most intelligent and most convincing article which appeared in your paper of December 9. I did not suppose all would agree with me, or I would not have written the article referred to. The things upon which we all agree need no discussing; it is those things upon which we differ, that need to be brought to the attention of the people.

Others take some exceptions to my position on physical phenomena. They all take special exceptions to my statement that the controls of all materializing mediums were from the lower plane of spirit life, or were earth-bound spirits. Now I do not intend to be understood as saying that all communications received through these mediums necessarily originated and came from this low class of spirits, for those spirits which are yet on the earth plane are the only means which some of the spirits who are on a higher plane have of communicating with their friends yet in the flesh, and they sometimes do so.

The best means presented to them for the purpose. Sometimes this is satisfactory, but more times it does not satisfy the better class, either on this or the spirit side of life.

As it is a known law that like attracts like, and birds of a feather flock together, the people on this side of life have to trust to the same class of beings that those on the spirit side of life do in order to get any physical phenomena. Hence unless the most rigid preventives are used, and the most exacting test conditions required, either the medium or the control will fool you, first one and then the other.

The medium may say to you, "tending to be one of your departed friends, or the control may claim to be some very high and refined spirit, but can give you only the most useless communication or a conglomeration of nonsense and foolishness; and I wish to say that no physical medium or the control is to be depended upon for the production of any phase of mediumship for the condition required for physical manifestations wholly unfit them for the higher phases of mediumship. By physical phenomena I mean the moving of gross material substances without any physical contact, such as materialization, moving tables, chairs, trunks, and any other ponderous body by the spirit without the hand of the medium or any other physical body touching it."

Now let me state my position again so that I can not be misunderstood. I claim that all physical mediums sometimes give fraudulent manifestations, therefore one person may go to a physical medium, and get some genuine manifestations, and another person may go to the same medium and get nothing but fraud; "one will declare that the medium gives genuine manifestations, while the other will say positively declare that the manifestations are fraudulent. I said there should be no quarrel between them, as they are acting on different planes. Brother Little asks, how shall we deal with the honest investigator, and suggests that my diet would repel rather than attract, and that the investigator would go away sorrowing. My answer is that truth will never drive away sorrowing an honest and persistent investigator. The fact which I stated in this article should be known by every one who undertakes to investigate Spiritualism, then they would never be disappointed, and will continue their investigation. The fact that Spiritualists have recommended physical mediums to the outside world just because they got superior by fraud and trickery, has driven thousands from embracing Spiritualism.

When an outsider goes to a physical medium who is recommended by a prominent Spiritualist, and gets nothing but fraud, and that is the diet they have been getting from a large majority of Spiritualists, and that is the diet that they get from the investigators, whereas if they had been instructed by Spiritualists to expect fraud from all physical mediums where fraud was possible, they would either have put the medium under such strict test conditions that they would have got the desired proof of the truth of Spiritualism, or if they had been told that they could not have laid it up against Spiritualism.

Brother Little says we receive that which we invite; but I would add that if we expect the invitation to be accepted we will have to invite those near our moral plane of development. Those who are progressing always attract spirits high above themselves. Those who are degenerating always attract spirits below them, who will help them on the downward road.

My brother also speaks of Dr. Hare and other scientific men drawing intelligence even more intelligent than themselves. That is strictly according to the law of spirit communion, and those who are progressive materialists, and those who are high in intelligence and want a physical medium, and if when they had a physical medium in charge they made such conditions that fraud was impossible, as it always should be, then physical mediumship would be of some use to the world. But while investigators are forced by the lack of proper proof of Spiritualism without understanding that it would be better for Spiritualism if there were no physical mediums.

Brother Little quotes what I said about mediums being forced against their will to possess a spirit. This is true, but where the medium is forced by fraud to appear as a spirit the medium's moral development will always be found to be in harmony with the moral development of the control. My brother seems to especially object to "my" using the word often in connection with the medium appearing as a spirit; did he ever know any of the mediums of this kind? I guess I might say thousands of cases where the pretended spirit has been grabbed and unmasked that it was not the medium. I think the word can be properly used in this connection. I would like to ask my brother if he knows of a materializing medium of any noteworthy name that is forced by fraud to appear as a spirit the medium's moral development will always be found to be in harmony with the moral development of the control. THE LAW OF CORRESPONDENCE

And Its Relation to Health and Happiness.

In the studies occupying the attention of thinkers to-day, there is none of greater importance than that which pertains to the law of correspondence. In life's great things, and in its small things, abundant evidence of this truth abides, and may be easily traced by earnest searchers.

Ever and always does it demonstrate the inter-relationship of the seen and the unseen, the inner and outer, the spiritual and the material.

It has been well said, that "the active plastic principle is the soul—the true man, of which the body is but the external expression and instrument."

This law has for us peculiar significance, when we consider the claims made for it by certain philosophers, claims which may all be proved by those who will search in the realms of their own spiritual nature.

Samuel R. Wells in a work on Physiology, says, "It is everywhere the indwelling life which determines the external form of things." Swedenborg, the Swedish seer, maintained the law of correspondence as existing between the mind and soul of man and his physical organism, extending to the minutest details.

W. F. Evans, an eminent exponent of this philosophy, says: "Every organ in our bodily structure is only the outward manifestation of a correspondent part and function of our spiritual nature. Consequently our mental states affect the condition and action of the body, and in fact are the body's health or malady. They first influence the spiritual body, then the brain and nerves, and then the various organs."

Every organ within the body serves the spirit of man. The brain with its cerebro-spinal centers, connected as it is with the entire body, is constantly sending and receiving messages from all the provinces of its kingdom, near and remote.

Not a thought, nor emotion, nor mental state, but is faithfully registered in its proper place.

If the inner attitude be that of grief, or depression, the body is bowed or bent; if joy and hope prevail, the body is upright and vigorous in attitude; whilst the functions of all the organs correspond to the ruling condition of the internal nature.

A wonderful instrument is the human face, adjusting its every fibre to the direction of mind, and reflecting every shade of human emotion.

Fear, jealousy, anger are all destructive forces, and affect the body, just as surely as a blow from the outside.

Sudden fright quickens the action of the heart and there is a sinking sensation at the pit of the stomach, caused by the relaxing of the diaphragm, all coming about by reason of the brain and its telegrams.

This proves beyond doubt that many diseases originate primarily from mental causes, and that good health may be secured through the harmony of the interior nature.

Prentice Mulford says: "Your thoughts shape your face, and give it its expression. Your thoughts determine the attitude, carriage and shape of your whole body."

The law for beauty, and the law for perfect health, is the same. Both depend entirely on the state of your mind, or in other words, on the kind of thoughts you must put out and receive. You are every day thinking yourself into some phase of character, and facial expression good or bad."

This is an eloquent sermon, on "beauty culture," and introduces a paper before which creams, lotions, cosmetics and "wrinkle eradicators" retire into obscurity.

The Auto-Suggestionists use the same law of correspondence, declaring thought to be a positive dynamic force, expressing itself through physical forms.

If we would change our condition for the better, we must head first of all, the truth that influx is always into forms that are correspondences.

To simply will a change, may in itself intensify the present ill by imaging it with added strength.

As is suggested by the Orientalists: If you would control a certain wave of feeling, think of its opposite; if you are angry, think of love, and anger will cease to exist. The same forces hold in all the relations of mind and body.

If you are nervous, agitated and impelled by the destructive spirit of hurry, assume the opposite bodily attitude. Let your movements be all slow and measured, and in a short time the interior excitement will cease, the intensity of body and mind, will be harmoniously adjusted, and you will be conscious of a victory over yourself, which becomes easier each time.

This law holds true of all emotions, and becomes of great hygienic value when used in the matter of wholeness or health, and is one of the ruling agencies in the restoration of strength and bodily vigor.

As forcefully said by H. W. Dresser, "Life itself becomes easier and happier when we make this grand discovery, that within each human soul there is a sufficient resource for every need, along the line of the individual career; and again, "Our deepest life is a continuous incoming of renewing, sustaining power, welling up from the heart of the universe into the spirit of man, a continuous divine communication, engaged in the rearing of a soul. The deepest Self is not physical nor even intellectual. It is spiritual."

By the application of this principle, we have it in our power to change, mend, and make our own lives what we will, and also in some measure, add to the universal world-betterment.

ALWAYS A GLEAM OF HOPE.

The Editor of the Toledo (Ohio) Times Expresses It in a Brief Editorial, Though He Alludes Despairingly to the Fraud in Our Ranks.

The most fascinating yet baffling questions of human existence are those relating to life beyond this world. Scarcely debatable any longer is the once mooted question, "If a man die, shall he live again?" This is almost universally accepted, even in the non-Christian world.

Efforts to pierce the veil of the grave have been many. And on grounds by which every other phenomenon of human experience is tested. All of them have been fruitless.

THE CLAIMS OF SPIRITUALISM ARE MANY OF THEM SO TAINTED WITH PALPABLE FRAUD AS TO CAST DISCREDIT OVER ALL.

However, it must be admitted that many phenomena, exploited by this cult, are beyond ordinary explanation at present. Achievements have been wrought that defy our understanding. It will not do to dismiss them as mere trickery and sleight-of-hand.

The recent death of Dr. Richard Hodgson, secretary of the American Society for Psychical Research, and the making of an ante-mortem agreement between him and a number of friends to communicate with them, has aroused fresh discussion. Among others, with whom the spirit of Dr. Hodgson is said to have communicated is Dr. Isaac K. Funk, one of the editors of the Literary Digest.

Even through Dr. Hodgson's spirit should, through some medium, as has been claimed, have made use of some prescribed formula to authenticate the communication, it is pointed out by the New York Tribune that this agreement necessarily being known to at least one living person, might have been gained by the medium by telepathy and hence not have come from beyond the grave at all.

We are pretty well agreed that we live in this world to undergo development. This development takes place along lines that are not only dimly conscious of and takes place regardless of time. We do not know whether we appear on this mundane sphere once only or many times. We do not know why we come or why death strikes as he does. Yet we cannot believe that he comes or we are born at random.

No man lives or dies before his time is a corollary to the axioms, God is good; His universe is law.

No one believes that our life was evolved out of nothing. Somewhere, sometime, some way, this being of ours must have been "existent" in a former sphere. Yet no one thinks of going backward to communicate here. The matter is manifestly absurd, impossible, inconceivable.

Perhaps, nay, more than likely, what we see as death is but the obverse side of a birth into a new, higher, freer sphere. We have the change of blind, helpless, ugly, larvae into beautiful winged creatures, the development of the caterpillar into the butterfly to give us a hint of what may be in store for us.

Does anyone suggest that the butterfly should talk to the caterpillar of an existence which must manifestly be incomprehensible to the worm?

ORDINATIONS.

They Should Conform Strictly to Bible Directions.

The controversy between Rev. Dr. R. C. Coon and President Barrett, which has been the theme of your excellent paper, No. 846, seems to be happily closed with diplomatic "distinguished consideration," to the honor of both contestants. In reading it, however, my thoughts were directed to the subject it treats—to some extent—ordination.

To a man whose Spiritualism has no pretensions to ceremonies group themselves into this: "The selection of certain men and women to ride on railroads at half-fare." To Bible Spiritualists and Christian Spiritualists it indicates the setting apart or consecrating certain persons to be priests, whose duties consist mainly in acting as attorneys for the Lord in all spiritual affairs. For the former I believe the best plan of selection is by vote, just as a chairman is selected at a conference or caucus. For the latter, I see no reasonable ground for departing from the ceremony and directions given in "holy writ."

You can read those directions in Exodus, 29th chapter. It is true, they are somewhat tedious and involve much expense, but all Bible believers know they are given by Divine inspiration, and hence should be scrupulously obeyed.

Briefly those ceremonies consist in washing the candidates with water and then greasing them with oil. They must wear peculiar belts and head-gear—the latter called "bonnets for glory and beauty." Two heaves and two rams must be slaughtered after the candidates have placed their hands on the animals' heads. The embowling process follows, and the kidneys, caul, and a large portion of the tallow must be burned.

The final act, however, is more solemn and impressive than all the rest. The officiating dignitary dips his fingers in the animal's blood and deliberately places a drop of blood on the candidate's right thumb, right ear, and the great toe of his right foot. It is presumed the beef and the mutton are to be given to the ordained ones.

Our friend, Rev. Dr. Coon, I judge, is a Bible Spiritualist, from some extracts of his speeches I have seen, and hence he is in line with the ordination from the requirements given to Moses has cast a shadow on the historic name he bears. In childhood nothing gave me greater pleasure than listening to the melodies composed to perpetuate the name and fame of the holy Zephaniah Coon, Esq. I wish his worthy namesake might find it wise to bury his name in the ordination business alone.

SUGGESTIVE STATEMENTS

With Reference to the Legendary Benefits Are Not Historical Facts.

One of the curious inconsistencies among otherwise intelligent Spiritualists, is the persistence of their belief in Bible stories and Roman Catholic legends attached thereto; and this in the face of the many exposures of their origin found in The Progressive Thinker in late and early numbers. W. S. Franklin's article, "A Glance at the Misty Past," in No. 846, is a striking example of this persistent willingness to accept unauthorized tradition for historical fact.

Brother Franklin recites the story of the death of those mythical personages, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and of John's remarkable "preservation in oil," as though they were historical facts, whereas, in contemporary history, we find no evidence that they or their leader ever lived.

I shall not be surprised, to learn that our credulous brother, also really still believes that wonderful, fake of all fake stories, the birth of a male child from the womb of a virgin mother in contradiction of a fixed law of nature, never abrogated before or since.

If he believes the legends he recited he must certainly believe the legend of all legends, the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary; and right here I am reminded that he has left out one important story in the list, to-wit: What became of the Virgin Mary?

I think Brother F. should read a little further in Roman Catholic literature and learn that her real earthly body left this planet and was carried into space, "up" into heaven—the same as was her fatherless eldest son's body.

A noted scholar and investigator, M. D. Conway, is the author of the following statement in regard to the story of Jesus.

"The world has been for a long time engaged in writing lives of Jesus. But when we come to examine them, one startling fact confronts us. All of these books relate to a personage concerning whom there does not exist a single word of contemporary information—not one. By accepted tradition, he was born in the reign of Augustus, the great literary age of the nation of which he was a subject. In the Augustinian age, historians flourished, poets and orators, critics and travelers abounded; yet not one of them ever mentions the name of Jesus, much less any incident of his life. Jesus we have not one notice—not the faintest, slightest sentence or word on which history can fix as certain evidence that he ever lived at all."

Spiritualists, Brother Franklin, pride themselves in a belief founded on facts derived from reliable history and personal experience. We need facts in this world.—D. W. BRAINARD.

SPIRIT MEDICATION.

Psycho-Magnetic Healing as a Spirit Manifestation.

Reading the article, "Psycho-Magnetic Healing as a Spirit Manifestation," by Dr. J. A. Marvin, I would like to say that what he has written is true, concerning psycho-magnetic treatment, and so little understood by all Spiritualists that it cannot be truly appreciated until they unfold the clairvoyant power so as to be able to see the powerful magnetic currents and emanations charged with chemical and medicinal properties that flow directly to the parts affected. Clairvoyance fully developed reveals this. As the currents flow through the medium they can be seen to flow from the ends of the fingers in a vapor, colored according to the conditions required by the patient. As for instance a patient suffering from inflammatory rheumatism and is one of material force has a crimson and merging into grey or black, has to be counteracted by a current of magnetic ether of pink and magenta color, which eradicates from this aura that dark crimson and grey by the electric forces of the divine healer's influences that are sent through the organism of the medium by the band of spirits which are formed to accomplish this work.

By the mediums or sensitive educating and unfolding their powers into perfect adeptship, they thus bring all phases of development into service in psycho-magnetic healing.

With Brothers Tuttle and Marvin I believe that more attention should be given to all Spiritualists and investigators to this phase of phenomena of spirit. It is a beginning more rapid in sufficing humanity than the manifestation of spirit. Influence, whereby those who suffer are also convinced by these divine powers and are brought to a realization of the truth of spirituality or true Spiritualism.

As to fakes or partially developed mediums who are posing as magnetic healers, I will say that they should be required to show their diploma for the practice of psycho-magnetic or divine healing, the same as any physician in the material plane or world, to show that they have given the time and made the true conditions required to perfect this phase of mediumship through the colleges of divine science.

Only through education in this philosophy of divine healing, and this phase of spirit manifestation, can spirit be made perfect. For it is true, as Dr. Marvin states, that no one can expect intelligent scientific spirits to cooperate for a great work on this earth plane unless the medium through which they may work gives them the time and proper conditions, and this can only be accomplished by persistent effort and a settled determination of will to have the best or none—the truth or nothing—thus drawing into the magnetic current forces that power of magnetism that will overcome all diseases and detach all obsessions, becoming a savior to all mankind as the Nazarene of old.

I am only a young medium in this work, but my labor is crowned with success, and I intend to devote my life to this divine psycho-magnetic healing through the co-operation of my spirit band of physicians and healers.

SPIRIT POTENCY.

It Is Beautifully and Comprehensively Illustrated in Homeopathy, as Set Forth in "Medical Talk."

The homeopaths claim that their drug, in addition to its gross, or material elements, has a spiritual essence. This spiritual essence they call its potency. By triturating the drug with sugar of milk they divide the gross or tangible elements of the drug, and this liberates the spiritual essence of the drug. The finer it is triturated the more the spiritual essence is liberated.

If the process of trituration is continued through the first, second, third, fourth and fifth potencies, there is still some trace of the crude drug left. But by continuing this process of trituration, each time dividing the original drug more and more, they will very quickly reach a trituration which contains no trace of the original drug.

But the homeopaths claim that the spiritual essence of the drug has permeated the triturated material, and now, instead of having the crude drug, they have the spiritual essence of the drug, which is the drug's real remedial efficacy.

In giving the thirtieth trituration or dilution of any drug, the homeopaths know that they are not giving drugs at all, they know very well that the drug disappeared entirely, before the thirtieth dilution was reached. They do claim that the potency of the drug has been preserved and even intensified, by the diluting processes.

A true homeopath, therefore, is not a druggist. He does not give drugs while he is practicing homeopathy. He may give drugs occasionally, on the side, in contradiction to the teachings of his school, but any homeopath who limits his prescriptions to the teachings of his school is not giving drugs. He never gives drugs. Any person could take with impunity an overdose of a homeopathic remedy. If one were to drink all the medicine a homeopath leaves for a patient, he would have effected nothing.

This is saying nothing against homeopathic remedies at all. It is only an attempt to explain what they claim.

The spiritual essence of a drug, or what the homeopaths call the potency, has no effect upon a well person. Its operation is only manifested when it reaches a diseased condition. If a person does not happen to have the disease for which any homeopathic potency is adapted the taking of such potency in unlimited doses would have no effect whatever. But if it happen to have the disease for which the potency is a remedy its curative effect would be manifest. It is a matter of common knowledge that if a person does not happen to have the disease for which any homeopathic potency is adapted the taking of such potency in unlimited doses would have no effect whatever. But if it happen to have the disease for which the potency is a remedy its curative effect would be manifest. THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

HON. R. A. DAGHE

A Vivid Pen-Picture of His Home and Life—"A Scholar of Polished Ability, a Lawyer of Great Legal Learning, a Philosopher Guided by Inspirational Knowledge,"

A few short months ago, I visited the home of this talented man, now living in one of the most beautiful cities of California, Alameda. I have known Brother Dugas for twenty-five years. He is a model of spiritual growth; rich in all the accomplishments that tend to master the undeveloped conditions of life. His soul life is a world of joy and beauty; his feelings are tempered with a kind and kindred spirit, which recognizes the fealty and claims of man's brotherhood. His actions are guided always by a motive of justice and fairness for all.

As an editor Mr. Dague stands foremost in the fraternity. As a writer upon miscellaneous subjects, he has but few equals and no superiors.

Mr. Dague is an orator of exceptional power, magnetizing his listeners with his clear, lucid enthusiasm. As a representative of the people, helping to shape legislative conditions, his voice and pen have been constantly

He is the author of a Socialistic novel, "Henry Ashton"; a book dealing with the fundamental principles of Socialistic government. He has been in the past, and is now a steady contributor to various publications, both secular and religious.

Brother Dague is one of those souls from out which the goodness of divine light can pour its blessings; manifesting in all sympathy for his fellowman. A scholar of polished ability, a lawyer of great legal learning, a philosopher, guided by inspirational knowledge, he is the embodiment of a world peopled with intelligence, whose sun of righteousness sends forth a healing balm of love, soothing the sorrowing, uplifting the weak and making of this life a heaven.

There is a charm in Mr. Dague's personality that leads you to love him. It is the spirit of goodness manifesting through his every action the ancestral Christ which voiced the sentiment, "Do unto others as you would that they do unto you."

embowered with roses, under a sky of perpetual sunshine, with an atmosphere redolent with the perfume of a thousand ever-blooming flowers, in sight of the great ocean whose wide expanse presents a panorama of never frad views, his surroundings are such that in communion, his soul-awing its flight may reach beyond the temporal realm and read the mystic language of the awe-inspiring silence.

Mr. Dague is very fortunate in his domestic life. He has for a companion a lovable wife of rare attainments. Mrs. Dague is in every sense a helpmeet and by her simplicity and spiritual development is of great assistance to her devoted husband. An orthodox son by a former wife, constitute Mr. Dague's family. "By their fruits shall ye know them," is exemplified in the child. The young man Dague is a master mind, possessing all the qualifications of his father. He is a leading student at the University of Oakland, and has won high honors in oratorical contests throughout the state of California.

Brother Dague has passed the noon-day of life. The shadows are falling towards the setting sun. That he may be permitted to continue many years in the mortal body, sowing seeds of goodness for others to reap, is my earnest hope.

BOWER OF BEAUTY LYCEUM.

Report for the Year Ending February, 1906.

Brothers and Sisters of the Lyceum Work:—Another year has rolled round and with pleasure I submit our fifth annual report of the Bower of Beauty Lyceum, Monson, Maine. Because as we did a small and very obscure corner, with many obstacles to overcome, I feel that our labors have not been in vain, for the interest has never been greater, and slowly but surely are we inviting the co-operation of all Spiritualists and thinking people in the good old "Pine Tree State."

The outlook for the Bower of Beauty Lyceum is full of promise, because among our number are some who never know the meaning of the word fail; their hearts are stout and their hands willing.

During the year our beloved Grand-to make, our best, truest friend, the love of our country has been called home. Sadly we miss her presence, yet we know she still meets with us, and the inspiration of her noble, self-sacrificing life falls as a sweet benediction upon us. Others of our members have been called to a better life, but they will not forget the lessons they still learn. Several new members have been added during the year, one being particularly worthy of mention owing to the fact that he comes with all purity, bringing the sweetest of lessons with him. Jan. 14, 1906, Baby Coy came, and was immediately voted a member of the Young Men's Society, so that a sweet personality hovering about the beautiful life will give to the power of Beauty Lyceum new strength. During the year we have elected as our foster mother the First Piscataquis Spiritual Association, and Foxcroft, Maine, thereby

The Progressive Lyceum has been of great value to us, also membership dues, plus and merit cards. As a whole the Bower of Beauty Lyceum appreciates the work done by the National Superintendent, John R. Rin.

We would not falter in our work, and we could not, if we would, for arisen lyceum members urge us, because the world needs children developed into manhood and womanhood under the purifying, broadening influence of the lyceum, which teaches the truth for the love of right.

One of our aged members, Mrs. L. E. Palmer, is now in the state of California and across the continent sends her "flowers" for the Bower of Beauty flower basket, her financial offering and her love. "We go on, girls, to the world, our hearts' best love, eternally, for the children."

SPECIAL THOUGHT CHANNEL. SYMPOSIUM.

The Question Before Spiritualists is this: Can a Spirit dematerialize a white dress, a white hat, a pair of white stockings, a scarf, fan and doll, and convey them to her home in spirit life, and then at will materialize them, and bring them back to earth, and continue doing so indefinitely?

This SYMPOSIUM is teaching Spiritualists an IMPORTANT LESSON. Those who are expressing an opinion therein are LEADING LIGHTS in our ranks. Many of them are in close touch with the denizens of spirit life, and what they state will carry great weight with the intelligent and thoughtful in our ranks. On the rostrum they are teachers, and behind them as inspirers are the wise sages of spirit life.

The time has arrived in our ranks for action! action! ACTION!!!

IS IT POSSIBLE? Too Materialistic for Him—Impressive Views of the President of the N. S. A.

The question of materialization and dematerialization is and will ever be, so long as unscientific methods of investigation are pursued, an open one. Sir William Crookes has given the world about the only reliable data—in fact the only genuinely scientific demonstrations in respect to materialization, while Count Alexander Aksakof has been a painstaking student of dematerialization, and has furnished the only data worth considering on that side of the subject.

If Crookes secured such splendid results with Florence Cook and Katy King, if Aksakof obtained such astounding manifestations with Madame D'Esperance, then it is shown that there is a spiritual law behind both of these expressions not understood by people on this side of the River of Life.

The fact that Florence Cook has been detected in fraud in Berlin and Vienna, within the past seven years, and the further fact that Madame D'Esperance (since the reputed partial dematerialization of her body at one of Aksakof's seances in full light) has also resorted to trickery may cause many intelligent people to question the verity of those phenomena to which Crookes and Aksakof gave such painstaking attention, and made such crucial tests.

If, as alleged, the notorious Anna Eva Fay, who is not a Spiritualist (much less a medium), never has been, and is only a trickster, self-confessed, who glories in her sham, succeeded in hoodwinking Sir William Crookes, once again the question arises as to the possibility of deception in the case of Florence Cook.

For my own part, I think Prof. Crookes' most careful preparations, his absolutely fraud-proof conditions that he exacted of Miss Cook, precludes the possibility of deception and establishes even more than a working hypothesis in respect to dematerialization. There is a law there that will yet be determined and made plain to all the world.

In regard to dematerialization, the very same questions arise and conditions appear. If flesh, blood, and bones can be manufactured out of nothing in ten seconds, or ten minutes, for forty or one hundred different "spirits" (?) in the course of an evening, why cannot the same number of bona fide human forms be made invisible in the same evening? The process is simply reversed, the "automata" simply have to "counter-march," as it were, and lo! what were once a hundred human forms have vanished!

If Madame D'Esperance could have a portion of her body vanish, as if by magic, yet retain all of her vital organs including speech, why cannot a more powerful medium (?) cause a white hat, a white dress, shoes, stockings, etc., to do the self-same thing? Isn't the one supposition as reasonable as the other? Does not the same "law" (?) obtain in both cases?

In the case of Madame D'Esperance, however, her body came back after an hour's invisibility, and I have not heard of her repeating the experiment. In the case of the solid garments for the "dear spirit" who requested them, it seems they were taken to the realm of the spirit and kept there. Were they more "spiritual" than the body of Madame D'Esperance that they could be kept there at infinitum, to be used by the spirit in her invisible home, while the poor Madame had to become solid again, whether she wished it or not?

Are we not taught by our angel helpers that spirit is sublimated matter, so highly refined as to be beyond the coarser vibrations of this mundane world? If this be true, how could such coarse material become so suddenly sublimated and refined as to vibrate in perfect harmony with the spirit who is alleged to have wanted these earthly garments?

Spiritualists have commenced earnest to investigate Spiritualism. It makes the fakes and insatiate gullibilities shudder. Artificial toggery, dirty wigs and dresses illuminated with phosphorescent paint will not do in the dark cabinet. One business house in this city which has grown rich by furnishing toggery of various kinds to mediums to deceive the public, will have to close its doors for want of patronage. HONEST MEDIANSHIP AND A PURE SPIRITUALISM will effectually do the work.

To the writer, the spiritual is higher than the material, hence the higher could not desire to express intelligence, anything less than itself, nor could it be otherwise than painful for a refined spirit to assume material garments, even though they were "dematerialized."

There are several conclusions possible in settling the question asked by our valiant editor. First, that the whole story is a huge joke, gotten up by the so-called medium, to have some good natured fun at the expense of her willing victims. Second, that they were all playing the fascinating game of "Illusions," and saw what they really did not see. (No hypothesis in this, thank you.) Third, that the medium (?) or her confederates, or both, wanted some new clothes, and took this means to obtain the same. Fourth, that it was a clever attempt to secure some free advertising.

No sane person can believe that earthly garments per se are ever wanted or required, in spirit life. If clothing is wanted at all, the spiritual counterpart of the material is what the spirits must have, otherwise there is inharmonious, which is unthinkable in respect to a plain proposition like this. The whole story is sordidly materialistic, so materially gross as to be senseless, hence too absurd for credence except possibly, on the part of the over-credulous ones of earth. It is too materialistic for me. Any event, and I must class it with other attempts to obtain gold, silver and diamonds from heart-broken mortals for their dear spirit friends, with the result that the so-called medium is suddenly flush with money, or his wife blossoms out in diamonds in some city a few hundred miles away.

Is it the dodge of trying to get something out of our mourning ones, other attempts to obtain gold, silver and diamonds from heart-broken mortals for their dear spirit friends, with the result that the so-called medium is suddenly flush with money, or his wife blossoms out in diamonds in some city a few hundred miles away. Is it the dodge of trying to get something out of our mourning ones, other attempts to obtain gold, silver and diamonds from heart-broken mortals for their dear spirit friends, with the result that the so-called medium is suddenly flush with money, or his wife blossoms out in diamonds in some city a few hundred miles away.

The alleged spirit photograph is too palpable to require argument. The so-called materializer and the so-called photograph "stood in" one with the other in the trick, and sought to continue the deception in the manner described. They succeeded in doing so, it seems, else the party who wrote Editor Francis would not have said that this very trick, as it is in reality, had convinced him of spirit photography and dematerialization.

No one prizes phenomena of a genuine character more highly than does the writer. No one is more desirous of having palpable proof of life beyond the grave furnished for all honest investigators. Such things as these under discussion cannot fail to cause reasoning people to turn from us in despair, if not disgust, with the feeling that our beloved Spiritualism offers them only hushes in place of the sweet and wholesome bread of the soul.

Let me ask in closing: If clothing can be dematerialized for spirits to wear, why cannot the philanthropic spirits cause garments to be materialized for mortals to wear? Then the shivering poor in our large centers of population, our aged and infirm brethren, and some of our speakers and mediums now at work for Spiritualism in an honest and upright manner, would be warmly clad, and possibly could have food enough to eat.

Brethren let us be rational men and women. Let us spend our money where it will do good, and cease throwing it away upon tricksters, mountebanks and knaves.

HARRISON D. BARRETT.

SHOULD FORNIE THEMSELVES

Immovably Against Every Temptation to Deceive.

Concerning certain phenomena reported, you ask several questions which do not seem to apply to the case as stated. Perhaps they were not intended to. "If a dress and other toggery can be dematerialized at will, then materialized again in a flash, what prevents any dress or other article of clothing from being materialized and worn by mortals?" After careful reading and re-reading of the report of said seance, I find nothing that implies that anything was "materialized again in a flash." It appears from the account, that the spirit could not manufacture the things she wanted for a Christmas present, but required the help of earthly friends to furnish earthly goods—hat, dress, shoes, stockings, scarf, fan and doll—made from nature's materialized products, which were not "materialized" in a flash, but by a silent process continued for many months, and then reconstructed by mortal hands into garments adapted to this world's uses.

The spirit of the seance was materialized "at a flash," is the photograph, representing the spirit clothed in these Christmas presents. But that is no proof that those identical articles were materialized and worn by the spirits in the spirit world.

The goods may have been "spirited away" and lost to the beholders, without being taken by any "spirit" home, or away from the earth. Photographs of forms have many times been taken when the object was not visible to mortal eyes. Photography catches and holds stars whose light has been hundreds of years in transit, and cannot be detected by the natural eye, with the aid of the most powerful telescopes. From all things of spirit phenomena, we have abundant reason for believing that spirits can so manipulate the psychic atmosphere, in the presence of a good medium, as to produce the appearance of human forms, with any clothing they choose, which may "dematerialize" in a flash, but such apparel could not be utilized, and even if it would not follow that spirits could without a "proper medium," supply clothing this way for the poor mortals of earth.

But I suspect that "ye editor" is suspicious that the phenomena reported are not of super-human origin. There is a hint of doubt about the genuineness of the whole affair. Thus far I have written by most of the case was correctly reported, and the phenomena indisputably genuine. Undoubtedly the reporter, so regards them. He (or she) may have stated all the facts he observed, and as they appeared to him, and we, at this distance, cannot determine that matter. There may have been a score of happenings too trivial to appear, and engage his attention; or, if observed, they may have seemed to him of no consequence in estimating the seance. Yet these very insignificant appearances, may have been the open door for the introduction of fraud.

I have witnessed hundreds of cases which seemed to satisfy nearly all present, that no deception was practiced, when it seemed me that deception was easy and a thorough analysis of the whole affair convinced me that spirits in the flesh were responsible for 60 per cent of all we had there witnessed. But if 60 per cent was fraud, why not the other 40 per cent? Here is the "stumbling stone" of most investigators. But I am convinced that in many cases, spirits meet in co-operation in producing phenomena, which neither could accomplish alone.

That spirits can cause solids to disappear, in defiance of the watchful senses, and elude the most vigorous search, and then reappear, as mysteriously as they vanished, I am thoroughly convinced. But I have an idea that they left the earth, and set up business in a "spirit home," to be utilized as clothing for angels. As this case is reported there is a lack of definite detail, that leaves it open to many queries and suggestions.

Thus: "The articles were presented to her for a Christmas present, and were taken away somewhere by the spirit messenger, most of them being left in the seance room." This may seem sufficient to those who witnessed the same but an outsider needs to know more before he can decide. Was the seance room light all of the time? Were all the acts of the medium open to inspection and carefully watched? Was there any possible chance for confederates to help spirit things away? Under what conditions were they conveyed to the seance room, and by whom? Where was the medium immediately before and immediately after the goods were placed at her disposal? But the limits allowed me are exhausted, and I must leave much to be inferred. I consider the greatest of this matter seems to me to be expressed in about these words:

1. None but those who witnessed the phenomena are qualified to determine the value of the facts as evidence.

2. If any part of the seance had conditions that made fraud possible, skeptics are justified in suspecting that fraud was practiced.

3. Any seance representing extraordinary phenomena to be accepted as evidence, should have conditions in every detail that render fraud impossible.

4. But fraud produced by the co-operation of spirit and medium, may be of a deceptive nature, while the appearances may be such as to cause critics to charge it all to the dishonesty of the medium.

5. Hence, the importance of all true mediums fortifying themselves immovably against every temptation to deceive, and defiantly resist all influences and persuasions from spirits that lead to any kind of fraud.

6. Allowing all of this account to be strictly true, and the facts all of spirit origin, they only prove that spirits can so manipulate solids as to cause them to disappear from a room, and can make up a cabinet-form to represent them, but not to convey solids to their spirit home to be worn by them forever.

In the Dear Propitious Now.

Do you know what you are gaining by your work for truth and right? Do you know what you are gaining by your valor in the fight? Do you know what you are gaining by your ardor and love, And your labor for upliftment, in the justice courts above?

Do you know what you are losing by not holding to the vow? To build up the cause you love so, by your strongest effort now?

Where the gold the wealth substantial in the future as the now, It were better to obtain it and no matter where or how; But the roll of evolution, and the many changes here, Tell us plainly that such riches, at the border disappear.

And the good that folks accomplish by their thought and word and deed, Will be wealth to them in spirit when from earth possessions freed.

Oh, how foolish seem the creatures who are loaded down with gold, And who know the time is coming, as the form is growing old, And they fully know the passing is a thing so sure to come,

Do you still cling to earthly riches, and to be in spirit dumb? If they know the veil is falling o'er their lives on earth today, They should use their means while with it let its virtue fade away.

Build a temple, build a college, or a home for helpless ones, Build a home for mothers, fathers, or the daughters and the sons Who are victims of misfortune, of disease or accident, And in conscience in the future know your money is well spent.

Do not wait in will to leave it till you make your final bow, Would you use it for good purpose, you should use your money now.

There are ways prepared by schemers to destroy a capital, But they can't prevent your present use of money as you will.

There are ways and means for doing with your wealth a mighty good For the cause you hold so highly, and the fact is understood, That to do a thing with money without fuss or legal row,

Is to do it while you're with it, in the dear propitious NOW.

DR. T. WILKINS.

"EXPRESS YOUR VIEWS." It Is Done in a Clear and Impartial Manner.

One's "views" on an unseen manifestation cannot settle its truth or falsity. Only the X-rays of unprejudiced investigation can do this.

Part of my views are: If the medium was in her own residence, subject to the conditions she made, and not under inspection—her cabinet and surroundings unexamined, then it seems an unproven demonstration. If it was possible for the audience to leave the room unseen, it is a story based on faith. To me it would take its place with the three angels who are reported to have eaten roast veal (or was it stewed or fried?) with Abraham and Sarah. I have not believed we needed earthly garments in the place that "flesh and blood does not inherit."

I trust they will not be needed where I go, and if they are, I shall have to have abscesses ones or none.

Those who witnessed the "demonstration" told of, are evidently honest. It does not follow that they are not mistaken. If this is a "demonstration" of spirit power, it will increase in power and scope, and as Editor Francis suggests, can be utilized for the benefit of the poor.

I want to see it and be absolutely sure that spirit power was the only way of accounting for the phenomena. Francis suggests, can be utilized for the benefit of the poor.

I notice materialization is even less than it was in the earlier days. Then, we were told of those who came and could eat, dance, sing, be weighed, and married, and sat at meat.

Believing it is important, that the truth should be known, I have held that Spiritualism is too sacred to be introduced by frauds as impostors—believing that it has enough eternal laws of Nature and Truth to uphold it and uplift the world, I am, yours for investigation, O. FANNIE ALLYN, St. Louis, Mo.

AN IMPORTANT MESSAGE. It Comes From the Realm of Souls, and Is Given Through the Hand of That Remarkable Medium, Carrie M. Hinsdale, President of the Texas State Association of Spiritualists.

I send a communication which came to me in rather a peculiar, or unusual way. Years ago when mediumship first manifested itself through my organism, I used to write automatically, but after a year, perhaps, clairaudience and clairvoyance made writing unnecessary. It has been nearly or quite ten years since my hand has been used for communicating. Two days ago I was conscious of a peculiar sensation in my arm all day. After retiring my hand moved and finger wrote on a sheet, "I want to write." Yesterday all day I had the same sensation in my hand and arm. I sat down later in the day to write a letter, when I began to write that I had not intended to. I had been talking of the Temple and society in this city, and this was written: "The Temple will stand, but in the society, disintegration has already begun. A few earnest souls will hold it together. Galveston will come into the wave of reform, and old things will be swept away. The earth is coming into a great spiritual upheaval, but before it comes the evil must be uprooted, a giant, menacing all spiritually. Then men will awake to the seriousness of the situation and see the menace to progress, and a reaction will come. We are working with all the forces at our command to bring about the change. To the few unfolded earnest souls on earth we look to us to help in the work of disintegration and to root out the evil in the ranks is evidence of rebellion, though so deeply hidden are the motives, that men may not understand. It is a portent for good. When men question authority, when individuals reason for themselves, 'Lift up your hearts! Be glad, for the day of deliverance draweth nigh.' In strife and in the midst of the chaos will float away on the bosom of that great ocean you call cause and effect, and the clear water of the River of Life will flow serenely, sparkling under the sun of spiritual knowledge, in whose rays man may warm his soul after the chilling blasts and cold comfort of superstition and lies. Greeting to Galveston, Queen of the South—Island City of my love, Greeting! Greeting! "TOM KEATS."

"It is well! Already the bell has begun its tolling for the mountebank displays and sleight-of-hand performances that have worn the cloak of Spiritualism. Already have the heavens begun their work. Already are the forces of earth combining with the forces of spirit, and as they unite more and more they will sweep these things out, into eternity's great sea, there to mingle with other flames and jetsam till in the by and by they reach that end when progress begins. I bid you goodnight." "THE KEATS."

Mr. Keats was at one time president of the state association, and was drowned in the great storm. I knew him as an acquaintance. In my travels I have heard much complaint which makes the message seem timely to me. The mention of the temple and local society is a purely personal thing, but the message should help us to keep up the fight against fraud till the last vestige has been swept away.

IS PATRIOTISM IMMORTAL?

An Appeal for a Higher Plane on Which Spiritualism Can Stand.

Some have asked in their minds if the character of the individual does not change through the process called death. Why do not the great men and women of the past come back, and assert themselves as when in the mortal?

I will answer: Many of them have come back, and although they speak, the world hears them not.

When this republic was launched into the world its founders were desirous of a government that would best advance the welfare of the nation as a whole.

Their principles were right, and will never become obsolete; but governments change; they have, like a child, period of birth, infancy, youth, maturity, decay and death. We can no longer regard it as having passed through all its phases except the latter, and that I predict is not very far off.

But the child pines for immortality, and a newer, higher form of government takes place.

Our own government is pretty ripe already, and disintegration has already set in.

Yes, our ascended patriots do come back, and they long ago foresaw the dangers that threaten our country today. Being aware of this, they, with others, have formed an organization in spirit life, styling itself "The Association of Governmentalists."

What we may ask, would be their attitude towards the government of Russia today? They answered this question in four brief words, and gave it verbatim as follows, which applies to all nations:

1. When a government has done its work, has arrived at old age, become decrepit, superannuated, that is a good and sufficient reason for a revolution.

2. When a government becomes so corrupt that only the more crafty and designing can be elevated into power, that is a good and sufficient reason for a revolution.

3. When a government becomes palpably false to its own affirmations or declarations and tramples these manifestly beneath its iron hoofs, that is a good and sufficient reason for a revolution.

4. When a government becomes so oppressive that it disregards the interests of any considerable number of its constituents, and crushes man to protect itself, that is a good and sufficient reason for a revolution.

They further declare for a higher form of social or industrial conditions, and as one of the grades must not continue, Man must love his fellow-man. He must sooner or later arrive at a condition of equitable commerce or exchange. Unless man can reach that condition, all other efforts for social improvement, will be comparatively useless, ending in mortification, sorrow and disappointment. One might as well expect to dip out with a little pitcher the mighty waters of Niagara as to expect success in fully introducing a new social state on this planet, while the tyrant Trade exists. Thus, though the labor may be great, though the mind stagger when it considers the greatness of the work, yet that which clearly must be done, will sooner or later be accomplished.

I sincerely hope that Spiritualism nor Spiritualists will ever go on record as the Christian church has done, in siding with despotism when the crisis for an economic change in society comes.

Wage slavery is the greatest evil that afflicts society today, and when it is abolished, with private capitalism replaced with public capitalism, then will humanity progress spiritually as well as materially.

I would also add that Andrew Jackson Davis has long ago pointed out the way by which fraud may be eliminated from our ranks.

The principal motive that frauds have for infesting our ranks is financial gain. The present economic condition of society is in a large measure responsible for this. They must have bread, and when we deprive them of their profession, we take bread out of their mouths, and pauperism stares them in the face.

While it would be better to die a pauper than to live here and be a swindler, I would also remove the cause instead of blindly striking at the effect. I know of a commercial necessity that costs the capitalist $7 to get it manufactured, and he sells it in the market for $80, making a clear profit of $73 on each one sold. Thus we can see that swindling afflicts society in the commercial world, as well as in our spiritual ranks, and I hope every Spiritualist will memorize the following immortal words of Mr. Davis:

"When distributive justice pervades the social world, virtue and morality will bloom with an immortal beauty, and the sun of righteousness will arise in the horizon of universal industry, and shed its genial rays over the fields of peace, plenty, and human happiness." A. C. FISHER, New Haven, Conn.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. It Is Well Received on All Sides.

While the Ingersoll address in The Progressive Thinker is good, there are several other articles that to my mind are equally valuable, notably Baron Hickey's comparison of Buddhist and Christian basic teachings, and also the San Jose judge's article on the failure of Catholic infallibility teachings of the past on many subjects.

APPRECIATION OF OUR WORK.

The Good Results Arising From the Course Pursued by The Progressive Thinker.

To the Editor:—Having had to write you on business, I cannot resist the temptation of writing a few lines for your valuable paper. First, words fall me to express the high esteem I place upon it and you. You are fearless and liberal. You allow your correspondents to express their minds. A great many take exception to the "way" you run the paper, and with the sentiments some set forth in it, I think it and you are doing more good than any other means I know of TO ADVANCE THE TRUTH AND SUPPRESS IGNORANCE AND SUPERSTITION.

I have done all I can do reasonably to get people to subscribe for it. There are other good papers, those that I highly esteem; they are all filling their places; but to my knowledge and observation you are wielding an influence that is felt in MORE HOMES THAN ALL ELSE.

I know it is not pleasant to have the hatred and enmity of the world, but just as sure as one takes the side of truth, and embraces a new thought, the world at large concludes him to be crazy or a fool. But for me, I would rather have the approval of one true, honest person than the applause of the whole universe. People can use deceit and artificial toggery in this present life, and sail through flowery beds of ease, but in the never-ending life, that will all be cast aside as rubbish, and will BECLOUD THEIR SPIRITUAL VISION for years and years.

So we reasonably conclude the truth will eventually surmount all difficulties, and in the end conquer. We must remember that in spirit life there is nothing but what is uncovered and open to the eye. All the dark cabinets will be as light as day. There will be no one TO STAND GUARD at the base of a mountain to exclude anyone from going up into the clouds where there is a trumpet sentence being held.

What is the truth WILL ILLUMINATE the noble and grand, and bring them to the front in the same proportion that it will exclude the false and ignoble. So, my brother, I sincerely congratulate you on the great search-light (The Progressive Thinker) that you have turned on the present generation.

But I know what ignorance is. It is sin. I know how it lurks in my body. I know and acknowledge the secret desires of the mind. We can wash and whitewash these old bodies and yet they can not be cleaned. They are but earthly bodies, subjects of decay. The life is the infinite and survives the shell of the earthly.

I am sure there are many who are entirely honest, but who are most wonderfully deceived. Now if they are honest, why can they not be liberal, and grant others to act and believe according to the dictates of their conscience?

You may take man's freedom from him, and what has he left? He becomes a cowering cur. You crush out all that is good and noble and grand.

When man becomes a mere tool in the hands of others, what has he left to live for? There is no one who is so vile and debased but what there is some good somewhere in him; so let us try to crush out that spark; rather fan it so it will the sooner enlarge.

Let us remember that all the imperfection and dross must be consumed before we can enjoy perfect peace, which signifies heaven or ultimate glory.

Every wrong will be recompensed, and so will every good. Let us endeavor to overcome the evil with good. I have often heard it said that no one was so ignorant as the one who rejected the light. Now I can't see how one can reject something he cannot see. Light and darkness are opposite elements, and are of such nature that they cannot be mixed.

One of the greatest songs we Spiritualists sing is, "The Truth Shall Make Us Free." Now if the truth has made us free, we surely are not in bondage, nor can we be put in bondage; nevertheless there are those who would rejoice of the downfall.

The ultimate end is on and upward. I know as well as others do, that all those who are fearless enough to advance the higher and most advanced thought, do suffer, as all have done in the past. Look at Columbus, Paine, Ingersoll, Lincoln, and all reformers—see how the poor souls have been persecuted. How it makes my heart ache to think of them. In contemplating their griefs and persecutions I am moved to my own often wonder why they will take the places of J. R. Francis, Hudson Tuttle, J. M. Peebles, B. P. Austin, Lizzie Harlow, and scores and scores of others; yes, I wonder! But I trust in this perfect law that rules and governs the universe.

We cannot put thought where there is no receptacle to receive it. Thus the mind is not educated, but developed.

The great fountain head of all things is knowledge. He that knows it all is not susceptible of teaching, for as the scriptures hath well said, "He that thinketh he knoweth anything, knoweth nothing yet, as he should know it." I am glad that no man or set of men, no creed nor set of creeds, can control the minds of men.

My prayer is that we may all be properly developed, and that we may grow up into a more perfect state, a unit, a oneness, where all envy, malice, hatred and ill will will be eliminated, and that we may be united into that halo of light and joy where the hosts of the angel world dwell.

Elwood, Ind. J. L. FOSTER.

since scientifically demonstrated as entirely different from those formerly taught by that church.

I consider that one number of your paper is worth a full year's subscription.

I cannot understand how you can give so much meat for so little money. I do not keep my Progressive readers, but after reading them send them to an old mining acquaintance in the mountains, and after he is done with them he gives them to another party in his neighborhood whom he has interested in the philosophy they represent. He has written me frequently how anxiously he looks for their coming, and how he reads for ever and over to feed the hunger of his soul for manna from the heavens above. So you see, Brother Francis, the number of your papers as shown by your subscription list, is not near the measure those doing good work for the cause we both love so well.

A NEW GATECHISM BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

Fourth Edition.—Six Additional Chapters.—260 Pages, Bound in Cloth, $1.00.—Containing Likeness of the Author.

"A New Catechism" has enjoyed a remarkable sale both in America and England. George Jacob Holyoake, in his introduction to the English edition of "A New Catechism," says: "No Catechism" is the boldest, the brightest, the most varied and informing of any work of the kind ever written. The principal fields of human knowledge, which the churches have fenced round with supernatural terrors, the Catechism breaks into, cherishing what is fair and showing what is deformed. The dogmas, which have many both ancient and contemporary, are as striking as the text. The book is a cyclopaedia of theology and reason in a nutshell.

SUSAN H. WIXON,
Author of "Apples of Gold," "All in a Lifetime"

This book gives an admirable course of study in ethics, and supplies a long-felt want of an ethical text-book especially adapted to the comprehension of children, as well as older persons whom it is wisely and sympathetically designed to interest while teaching their valuable ethical lessons.

The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principles of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes which make the book more interesting and more easily comprehended.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often, brevity is sacrificed to the fullness of the answer. The style is necessarily terse, and the style becomes thereby as terse, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. Some correspondence of this department has become excessively long, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

RODNEY SEEVER: Q. Dr. Adam Clarke was referred to in an article in a recent number of The Progressive Thinker. How long since he departed this life?

A. Adam Clarke, the great Methodist divine and commentator, was born in Ireland in 1740, and died in 1832. He was a voluminous writer and was a power in the ranks of Methodism. He took the Bible as the foundation of knowledge, and ignorant that there ever had been any other religion in the world, wrote from the narrow viewpoint of his limited knowledge. His writings are uncritical, and to the student of religious faith have no value.

E. B. Young: Q. What are the primary forces of nature?

A. The word "force" is not now used, energy being accepted as more expressive. There is but one primal "energy." It is always manifested as motion. Whether as heat, light, electricity, or chemical action, the essential rapidity of vibrations—motion in waves—is the primary cause. There is a tendency of the most advanced thinkers to resolve matter itself into energy, the elements being simply forms of expression of this energy, and really all one, and there are distinguished chemists who go so far as to affirm that if the processes of nature were known, the elements would be mutually converted into each other, and all resolved into one.

In common speech the expressions are used, "Force of the wind," "electric force," "force of steam," etc., but even a superficial comparison will show the common source of all is motion, which is to us the tangible expression of that incomprehensibility, which for want of a better word is called "energy."

A. C. Priest: Q. By some the Japanese are reported as immoral. What is the fact?

A. It is indeed hard for the Christian missionaries to admit that in the religion of Japan they have found a faith as pure and clean, as pure as the faith of the Christians of their own country. Some critics have gone farther and hold that the ancient faith of the Japanese is superior to Christianity. As a matter of fact, it is the most polished, devoted, kindly and brave nations the history of the world has ever known.

The affection for children is proverbial, a strange child may go from one end of the kingdom to the other, and never receive other than smiles and endearing words. Harsh and vindictive words are said to be unknown in conversation. The family home is ideal. Friendship akin to fraternity.

There is, however, one thing that distresses the puritans of the Japanese, the practice of marriage differs from theirs. It is not such an absolute tie-fast institution, as the ministers demand it should be. Their moral standard is not the same, and hence must be wrong. Yet the homes are ideal; no one suffers, but all get on well with their own methods.

The degraded outcast—the creature of the slums, is unknown in Japan. A series of crimes growing out of puritanism is unknown there. Trusts, syndicates, grafts, and exploiting the working poor are unknown.

The grandest spectacle of the war the Japanese waged with Russia, was presented not by hurling themselves in great battle against their foes, but at the close of the struggle, when with humility they assembled to pay tribute of grateful hearts to the spirits of those who had fallen in the conflict. Nor were they content with praise and prayer for their fellows, with gratitude to the horses which had fallen in the combat, they gave them merited recognition. No Christian nation has ever gone thus far in humane endeavor.

After a victory, has said one word in praise for the torn and shattered horses that brought victory to the banner.

Set it down that the Western world will be converted to the religion of Japan, before this people adopt Christianity.

If strict obedience to the national laws and customs constitute morality, the Japanese are the most moral people in the world.

Bryan in his swing around the world, writes home a glowing story of the conversion of the Japanese to Christianity. He is looking out for Christian votes at some time when they will do him the most good, and it is a pity that he is so ignorant of the missionaries in luxurious style, and pay their numerous attendants.

It is undoubtedly true that the Japanese are as eager as children for everything new. They have just awakened and their old life is rapidly changing. They are intently desirous of becoming educated in the ways of the Western world. Hence the numbers who attend the free schools established by the missionaries of the various denominations, does not imply conversion to the religion of those sects. Shintolism, the prevailing faith, was never stronger in Japan than it is to-day. Under its banner, the people have fought a great world power, and times its strength, and gloriously vanquished. Led by its teachings, in the hour of its strength, it arrogated nothing to itself, and granted the prostrate foe terms of peace such as no Christian nation would have done.

And yet the meddlesome impudence of Christians wants to oust this religion which is an outgrowth of the people who accept it, and give them another which its fruits are evidence, is no better, and has not in 2,000 years made the moral conquest that the Japanese faith has accomplished. Its nations are armed camps, and the warriors the chief men. The countries over which it extends are filled with prisons, penitentiaries, asylums for the insane, and homes for the poor. The wealthy oppress the poor, and millions have hunger never appeased. Millions shiver in rags that a few may waste. Glorious Christian country! When it is patronizingly said, "See what Christianity has done!" would it not be more in keeping with the facts to say: "See what it has not done?"

H. M. Q. Was the eruption of Mount Pelee, three or four years ago, different from the ordinary in regard to the sudden extinction of life in and about the place, when it was said that only one person escaped destruction and he was a prisoner confined in an underground compartment, and the heat of short duration was such as to melt metals, like columns to buildings, fences, etc.

A. All volcanoes during eruptions, throw out volumes of poisonous gases, and Mt. Pelee is not an exception. Volcanism, in the year of our era 79, overwhelmed the splendid cities of Pompeii and Herculaneum with ashes, scoria, and lava. The elder Pliny, in his eagerness to observe the stupendous phenomenon, was suffocated by the gases which swept down from the summit.

The eruption of Mt. Pelee was unique in the vast volumes of gases thrown out, and the intensity of temperature at which they were emitted. The sulphurous gases which escape from all craters are destructive alike to animal and vegetable life.

LAKE HELEN CAMP, FLA.

The Writer Voices Her Appreciation of the Southern Cassadaga.

Having just returned home after a week's stay at Southern Cassadaga camp, Lake Helen, Fla., I feel it but just and right to speak of the kind welcome which was extended.

We pulled out of Union depot, Jacksonville, Fla., 54 minutes late, making up part of the lost time between stations, reaching New Smyrna about 1:30 p. m., where we met Mrs. Curran and husband, also Mrs. E. Clark of Syracuse, N. Y., waiting to make connections for Lake Helen.

Mrs. Curran looked as though she had done a great deal of work. We had hardly entered the hotel before the sound of old familiar bell for supper greeted our ears, and as we were very hungry we did justice to the tempting viands, as all Spiritualists should. After supper we were invited to Laura G. Fiken's cottage, where we received a hearty welcome from her guides and spent a very pleasant evening.

The following morning being Sunday, we put on our best bib and tucker and repaired to the Auditorium, where Prof. Peck gave a fine discourse on the history of the Christ of the past; it was well worth listening to.

In the afternoon Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twine, in her kind, motherly way, gave us another fine feast on Prayer, showing plainly that there was prayer in the prayer, explaining the difference between prayer and devotion, and the lecture Miss May Hedrick, a very young and gifted psychic, gave tests from the rostrum, each test being recognized, myself being the recipient of one which I also recognized.

Monday morning each one was up bright and early prepared for the day's doings. The different mediums were kept busy ministering to the needs of the different visitors between the lectures, and among those I met for the first time personally were Mrs. and Mrs. Norman, whom I shall hold in memory dear. They are both doing a noble work, which I can testify to.

As something is going on continually, such as conferences, card parties, also the dance it takes so much time and space to give detailed accounts, so will only touch on the more important ones.

Wednesday afternoon we listened to another fine discourse on Spiritualism, delivered by the German Stumpf, who serves the German Society, and is one of our shining lights.

The Florida Minstrel Show, Prof. Peck acting as general manager. Well, I will not tell any tales out of school, but from a psychic point of view the members of the company did not live very far from the grounds, but it was a grand success and was highly enjoyed by everyone present.

I cannot recall everything of importance, my time being very much taken up trying to crowd a three-weeks' visit into one week, some things will be better explained by those who give the weekly notes, although I must not forget to mention the memorial services held Friday afternoon in honor of Mrs. Carque, a resident on the grounds, who passed to the Great Beyond; nor to mention the fact that we were all much disappointed in not having our class conducted by Prof. Clegg Wright, he having a severe attack of sickness, and owing to the fact that he is only getting his best work in now, we felt the loss of the lessons.

It is needless to mention all the good friends, such as Mrs. Haddenburgh, Mrs. Pratt, Mrs. Nutting, Mrs.

Ringing Words.

They Emanate From the President of the Missouri State Spiritualist Association.

"Again, many" of us have got discouraged on account of the fraud element in our ranks, and instead of standing up for purity and cleanliness, and fighting for it if necessary, we have lain down, and let fraud and trickery get the upper hand and show the public the false side of our beloved philosophy; we have slept at our post of duty, and allowed the enemy to take possession of our strongholds. Why is it that many of the most intelligent thinkers, who are at heart Spiritualists, are outside of the ranks? Because you and I have not done our duty; because we have allowed Spiritualism to be so misrepresented, that the public think the word "Spiritualist" is synonymous for either fake or dupe.

THE TRUTH OR NOTHING.

Be Clean, Be Virtuous, Be Pure-Minded, Be Honest.

Christendom has always claimed that the day of revelations is past, that the only genuine brand of spirit communion stopped two thousand years ago. Now as far as I am individually concerned, I am willing to admit that they are right, for people that reject and refuse to investigate the phenomena that are attracting the attention of some of the brightest scientists and scholars of the day, simply because it does not dovetail in its entirety, with a two-thousand-year-old theology, are apt in their narrow-minded self-sufficiency to close the door willfully and as the legal fraternity have it, "with malice aforethought."

But this being the case, we in rebuttal have the right to close the door to-day is not an honest search for truth, but a search for that which will uphold and support preconceived theories.

History will bear me out, when I say that whenever anything has been discovered by the scientist that has conflicted with the theologians' theory of what truth should be, it has been rejected with scorn. As a result, there has been built up a narrow, one-sided, distorted code of morals, that have been termed, or rather mis-termed, a religion. Its teachers are (as a whole) rooted in all that supports their side of the question, but are hopelessly ignorant in all that opposes it.

The angel in revelation, said, if I remember right, that the man who would hear, let him hear. The man or woman that closes his or her ears willfully to facts, simply because they are not in accord with their preconceived ideas, are so narrow, so bigoted, that the greatest punishment you can administer is, "To go away and let them sleep."

Truth is so pure, so sacred, so pure, that it is not to be trifled with. I mean by investigation, the ADAMANT, as well as the FOR, the more its truth is clinched. Truth needs no props, no defense, because as the old saying goes, "Truth is mighty and will prevail."

The great trouble has always been that when some little one-horse prophet received a revelation, it swelled him to such an extent that he might as well have been a giant. He might as well have been a giant, and about the time the revelations ceased, and he woke up wondering what was the matter.

He was unworthy of what he had received, and could not be used for more. Then when some more worthy instrument was used, for the further enlightenment of mankind, the unworthy prophet began to cry out, "Fool! He that is elected to the power, he not only slandered and vilified, but he killed the other instrument as well."

Thus Catholicism denounced Luther; Luther denounced Ulrich Zwingli; Calvin had Servetus slain; the Jews crucified Christ.

History will bear me out when I claim that the Jews, by bigotry have been the curse of religion. I mean at least one-half of the converts of Luther and Calvin back to Catholicism. It is to-day causing many of the most intelligent workers and speakers of the orthodox churches to desert the ranks. It is emptying the ranks. It is emptying the ranks to such an extent that the greatest problem that confronts the churches to-day is, "HOW shall we reach the masses?"

Friends (I write this in all kindness) it is beginning to blinder, and obstruct the spirit world in its endeavor to communicate with and uplift humanity. Many of the instruments and speakers instead of co-operating with each other, or at least wishing one another God speed in their work of uplifting, are hating the people of earth to the higher plane, are knocking, especially if the other one has the largest crowd. I have heard comments like this, "Oh, yes, Mrs. — is pretty good, if you like that kind of speaking or that kind of tests." I tell you, friends, the only kind of test we have the right to apply is, are they giving genuine phenomena? Are they lifting mankind to a higher spiritual plane? Do they practice what they preach?

If these questions can be answered in the affirmative they are entitled to every honest Spiritualist's co-operation and sympathy. If they don't give it, you had better change the brand, it's bad, there is something the matter

Thompson, and a score of others whom I had a most pleasant visit with before leaving the grounds, not to mention a lovely class of visitors at Hotel Cassadaga who will live in memory for time to come. Everywhere the grounds seemed filled with peace and harmony which was added to by the sweet song of birds and perfume of climbing jasmine all profuse with blooms and sending their yellow shower of discarded blossoms to the ground to help enrich and fertilize the soil for another return of their beauty next year.

Before leaving the grounds I tried to do justice to all, but found a few had to be left. I met a lady and wife (who will forgive me this time) were among the number, owing to the fact that when I found time to call they were among the missing, but I take this way through the columns of our paper to be kindly remembered to all, feeling that I had left a place where the sense of vibration seemed like a nasal Subliminal to be remembered. LOTTIE COLLEEN, Jacksonville, Fla.

with you, and you will lose as sure as fate (if you have not already lost) what little power you ever had, because you are unworthy of it. If Spiritualists spent half the time fighting fraud and fakery, they use kidding worthy workers, the movement would be cleaner.

Mediums and Lecturers! get broad-minded! Throw aside your petty bigotry and jealousies; they are unworthy of you and the great cause you represent.

Be clean, be virtuous, be pure-minded, be honest, give out only what you receive, no more, no less, and the inspirations you will receive from the spirit world will come so thick and fast that you will be the wonder of the twentieth century.

Our spirit friends are more anxious to give than we are to receive, if they can only get the right kind of instrument. We have not the enthusiasm we had in the ranks twenty years ago, and we do not get the genuine phenomena we had formerly; is it not because we, like the churches, have grown narrow-minded and jealous?

Have we grown weary in well doing? Have we not become material to such an extent that we are like the actor in the story? An actor named that he died, and knocked at the gates of heaven. "Who is there?" called out St. Peter. "Mr. —, an actor from St. Louis," replied the actor. "Go down below," no actors need apply," called back St. Peter, and the poor fellow sorrowfully began his journey below. He had gone but a few steps when he noticed before the gates seeking admittance a friend of his, an actor, who was waiting to be taken in by the gates. "Who is there?" called out St. Peter. "Mr. —, an actor from St. Louis," replied the actor. "Go down below," no actors need apply," called back St. Peter, and the poor fellow sorrowfully began his journey below.

TWO WORTHY PROJECTS.

Henry Slade Monument and Other Important Matters.

To the Editor:—Fraternal greetings are extended to you and to the readers of your valuable journal, from N. S. A. Headquarters; we highly appreciate the privilege of keeping our beloved association in touch with the Spiritualist public through the good offices of your publication.

At this time I desire to call attention to the subject of a fitting memorial stone over the remains of Dr. Henry Slade, as projected by Dr. A. B. Spinney in a former communication through the spiritual press. Certainly such a project is worthy the regard of all at least who have been instructed in or comforted by the Mediumship of Dr. Slade. It is not thought necessary or in good taste to place a pretentious monument over the decaying form of one whose last years and even funeral expenses were covered for from the pension fund of a public association, viz., this N. S. A., but it does seem suitable to have some simple tablet to mark the resting place of the form of one who for many years was a remarkable medium in the ranks of Spiritualism. Since the fall of Dr. Spinney some months ago, we have only received twelve dollars towards this object, namely, Chas. Pratt, $5; J. O. McGrath, $5; Caroline A. J.; W. Miles, 25 cents. We are thankful to these contributors, and ask others to emulate their example.

Pension Fund.

It seems fitting to call attention also to the Mediums' Relief or Pension Fund of the N. S. A., and its good work in saving as many as possible of the disabled mediums from absolute want and its attendant anxieties. Do not forget, friends, that we have no endowment fund, and that the Relief Fund is steadily being drained each month; any contribution towards this worthy work will be gladly received. Could the public read each month the grateful letters we receive from our pensioners, few would hesitate to occasionally send a mile towards our fund. Here is an extract from the writing of an aged pensioner, over seventy years old, written March 2: "Dear Sister:—Your very kind letter with the $12 for March from the N. S. A. received, with many thanks to all. My son and myself are about the same. I tell him that we have but one good hand between us; his two hands helpless, and my one hand crippled, but I think there are others in a worse condition than we are, and I feel thankful to friends in earth-life as well as to those I have in spirit life." The writer of that letter is a veteran speaker and medium; she fully deserves her monthly pension from the N. S. A.

Societies and other workers in Spiritualism are reminded that printed reports of last N. S. A. convention can be had postpaid from this office for four cents per copy. Those delegates who pledged to take a certain number of copies when at last convention if we would but print the same, are called upon to send for them—most of them 35 cents, but a little over cost of mailing.

SPIRIT RETURN A FACT.

The Highly Gifted Medium, Mrs. Mary T. Longley, Controverses the Position Assumed by the California Philosophers, That "No Medium is Benefited by Spirit Influences."—She Says: "I Know That Many Mediums Are Benefited by Spirit Influence, and Many Homes Are Better for Having Ghosts or Spirit Ministers Therein."

In a January number of The Progressive Thinker, I notice that my esteemed friend, Charles Dawbarn, in his efforts to prove or to emphasize his opinion that no de-carated spirit can possibly give to mortals any authentic or satisfactory description of spirit life and its affairs, makes the assertion that no "Home is better for having a ghost," and that "no medium is benefited by spirit influence."

To well experienced mediums and Spiritualists, these statements must seem a little wild, and I wonder that our Editor-at-Large, or some other veteran medium or Spiritualist has not employed a trenchant pen in calling Brother Dawbarn down from his position at that point. Perhaps our writers have thought they would not do so because of the attack of illness, the author of those remarks recently experienced; but as Brother Dawbarn writes me in a valued personal letter that he is well again, I feel to criticize his statement as mentioned in the foregoing.

By the term "ghost," our philosopher means spirit—de-carated spirit, individually, and it will be seen by reference to his article, that no home is better for having a spirit loved one in it when we are conscious of the presence of that beloved being, is untrue. Some homes may not be better; but by my personal knowledge there are several scores of homes that have been made better, sweeter, more pleasant and comfortable because the mortal inmates have learned of the presence and helpful influence of their beloved spirits—"ghosts," if Brother Dawbarn prefers that word.

That no medium is benefited by spirit influence, is also a wild assumption. What, if the medium who has given fine music, poetry, inspiration to the world, and spirit influence, had these talents latent in the organism, ten chances to one, without the inspirational force from individualized spirit helpers, those latent talents never would have been stimulated or in the least encouraged to expression. I can point to a number of mediums who have been greatly benefited by the guidance and influences of spiritual—though unseen—friends and teachers, and I claim myself to be of the number.

If friend Dawbarn chooses to believe that all is "Fog Land" where spirit intelligence and mortal consciousness meet, and that no reliable statement of spirit life and doings can ever be received by mortals, I am willing he should find comfort in his theory, but I submit that his points have never been proven, and that to fairly meet all statements contrary to his ideas on this subject it would be necessary for him to listen to and calmly weigh every experience of investigators and advocates of Spiritualism on this important matter.

I have no time to write a lengthy article on this theme. My words are simply to say that I KNOW that many mediums are benefited by spirit influence, and that many HOMES ARE BETTER FOR HAVING GHOSTS—OR SPIRIT MINISTERS THEREIN.

A Wonderful Medium.

Mollie Fancher belongs to Brooklyn—to New York—to America—to the world. She may be called, truly, the most famous invalid now living, and she will always remain on record as such.

MOLLIE FANCHER.

A Living Monument of Patience and Spirituality, an Angel of Light in the Chains of Bondage of the Flesh, Mollie Fancher illustrates the Beauty, Grandeur and Sublimity of Spirit Communism When Conducted Along Lines of Absolute Purity, Honesty and Charity.

Half a century ago (as set forth in the Kalamazoo (Mich.) Gazette), the Brooklyn part of what is now Greater New York, was already a flourishing city on its own account, and long continued so, and until the great consolidation took place. One of its most prosperous citizens was Mr. James B. Fancher, a manufacturer and capitalist, who owned a great deal of property in the vicinity of what is now Gates avenue and Downing street.

His only daughter, Miss Mollie, was a young lady of marked individuality and pronounced atypical of the average of the time. She was a promising pupil of the famous school of Dr. West, upon the Brooklyn Heights, and a favorite with the good doctor, who often prophesied great things for her in scholastic achievement. She early became engaged to a worthy and prosperous young man, and life seemed very gay and fair to her, until one day, without any warning, she was stricken with a most sudden and fatal accident. In an instant she was no longer, she was a young woman lying on a stretcher, and was dragged for a block along the rough way, before the vehicle was stopped, and the sufferer released.

Physicians did all that was possible, but without beneficial result. Her case became a celebrated one, and puzzled the whole medical world. She was a study to the physiologist, the psychologist and the student of human nature.

She became known all over the planet; scientists dissected her, only to get still further into the mystery which was the subject of their studies, and she was a hopeless invalid, unable to leave her bed of pain, and, praying for the mercy of God to take her to Himself.

Living Monument of Patience. But this, for his own good reasons, he was not ready to do. What those reasons were, we do not know, but it was apparently from the fact that the world needed an object lesson of patience and endurance. At all events, it has had it, and it is still.

For ten years—for twenty years—for thirty years—five and now for forty years this sufferer has lain in that same room, upon that same bed, upon the same side of that bed, and upon the same side of the body—living because it is God's will that she should live.

Not vegetating, not existing in a drowsy, or stupid, or brutish way; oh, no! but as a cheerful, brave, industrious woman; full of love, sympathy, kindness, and all the better qualities of her sex.

One by one she has outlived the relatives that once soothed and comforted her long days and nights. Mother and sister long ago went to the great far-away land, where they now await her. An idolized aunt, who had cared for the invalid as she would for her own child, was called from her side by the grim hand of death. Her aged father who had been a great pride and comfort to her, went on to join the wife and mother that had preceded him. Her only brother was taken from her by a fatal accident. One by one her favorite physicians and nurses have preceded her into the land where disease is unknown. Old friends by the score are dying every year.

Mollie Fancher belongs to Brooklyn—to New York—to America—to the world. She may be called, truly, the most famous invalid now living, and she will always remain on record as such.

Testimonial to a Martyr. It is in the hearts of many of her friends to unite in a testimonial to her, to be presented during February of this year, to the having just completed her fortieth year of captivity to the grim helplessness of disease. If all her friends and acquaintances (and they are legion) will join in this testimonial, it can be made so large as to place her beyond all financial worry for the remainder of her life.

Let everyone who desires feminine bravery under the most distressing and frightful of circumstances, every one who loves patient, unflinching, brave Christian resignation send Mollie Fancher a word of cheer and a gleam of financial encouragement, some time during the eventful month of February, during which her long sentence of pain and captivity!

This is her own idea; she is too proud to ask help of any one. But her friends can see that the life of an invalid is very expensive, even under the most favorable circumstances; and her earning capacity, which she has exerted to the utmost, has not met the want. Indeed, she has earned more than the world can ever pay her—by the example she has set in, in brave patience and heroic endurance.

THE FAKES MAKE THREATS.

The Same Condition of Affairs Exists in England as Here, as Set Forth by Light, of London.

The Progressive Thinker publishes a particularly odious specimen of rancorous abuse, ostensibly from a medium who resents stern criticism and inquiry. As a matter of fact, the abuse takes the form of a threat to murder. At a late meeting of the Chicago Spiritualists League, the president, Dr. C. A. Burgess, read the following anonymous letter which he received soon after his election:

"Chicago, Jan. 2, 1906.
"Dr. Burgess:—We understand that you have been elected president of the Chicago Spiritualists League, and we also understand that the object of the League is to interfere and run out of Chicago all mediums who are not members of the League, or work in accord with it. We belong to no meeting, and are making our living by the aid of our departed friends, and do not want to be interfered with. Just a word of advice, Mr. Burgess: If you stir up any more, look out for a piece of lead under the first rib of left side; so be careful!"

The speaker for the evening, Dr. Burgess, said that this letter did not surprise him. He was familiar with such letters, and that very day it had been communicated to him that a Chicago materializing medium had boasted that a member of her family had taken an oath "to get even with Dr. Burgess."

We might regard all this as grim jesting, but for the fact that we have something like it at home. Our readers have, of course, perused the letter from Mr. Ellis (Mr. Eldred's manager) which we printed February 8, and, if we mistake not, they were startled by the concluding paragraph threatening to "deal blows for blows," and adding, "We enter into no explanation re weapons to be used, but you may rely on them being sharp." This is perhaps capable of a semi-innocent explanation, but it bears a sinister resemblance to the Chicago letter, and the spirit of it is the same, and is as wicked as it is detestable.

"Thugery and Spiritualism are not companionable," says The Progressive Thinker, and so say we. We go further and say that any mediumship, even if entirely genuine, which goes hand in hand with an evil temper, is not worth having. But can any mediumship be thoroughly genuine which so violently resents doubt or disbelief? Truth and veracity are calm and strong—Light, London, Eng.

General Booth classes criminals under three headings.
"There is no doubt that many criminals are mentally diseased, almost semi-imbecile," the General said.
"These people are weak in their will and easily led astray by the temptations of the devil."
"A more difficult class to reclaim is the habitual criminal. From the age of 4 or 5 he has been taught to steal, until small larcenies are second nature to him."
"The third class consists of the people who conclude that a life of crime is easier, more exciting, and more profitable than hard, honest work."
"Our plan is to make these people see, not only the wickedness, but also the folly of their lives; and to produce a change of nature, which shall make them hate their present evil ways."
"They must be removed compulsorily to conditions under which they cannot do evil, and these conditions must not be the atmosphere of the prison."

CRIME A DISEASE.

The Exalted Ideal of the Leader of the Salvation Army in Reference to Criminals—It Shows an Exalted Spirituality—General Booth is Convinced Something Can Be Done With Everyone, No Matter How Wicked He May Be.

London, Eng., At the headquarters of the Salvation Army, the handling over of criminals released by the Home Office to the army's care is regarded as an important step toward the recognition of crime as a disease with a possibility of cure under proper conditions.

This week's edition of the London War Cry has a large illustration of a convict at work. On the left of the picture stands a taller, heavier man, printed the word "Watching." On the opposite a Salvation Army captain is depicted with "Waiting" as his legend.

SPECIAL THOUGHT CHANNEL. SYMPOSIUM.

The Question Before Spiritualists is this: Can a Spirit dematerialize a white dress, a white hat, a pair of white stockings, a scarf, fan and doll, and convey them to her home in spirit life, and then at will materialize them, and bring them back to earth, and continue doing so indefinitely?

Letter From a Washington Spiritualist.

To the Editor:—A fine demonstration of spirit power took place at Mrs. M. A. Keeler's some time ago. A short time before Christmas Clara Collingwood, Mrs. Keeler's cabinet messenger, expressed a wish for a full outfit of earthly clothing. ONE LADY GOT HER A NICE WHITE HAT; ANOTHER MADE HER A WHITE DRESS; ANOTHER PROVIDED HER WITH A PAIR OF WHITE SHOES; ANOTHER WITH A PAIR OF WHITE STOCKINGS; AND OTHERS WITH SCARF, FAN AND DOLL. These articles were presented to her for a Christmas present, and were taken away some where by the spirit messenger, not one of them being left in the room. When inquiry was made, Clara said she took them to her spirit home. A few weeks after Christmas, Mrs. Keeler, who is a materializing medium, requested her husband, Dr. Wm.

Keeler, who is a spirit photographer, to take her photograph while entranced in the cabinet in the dark. She seated herself in the cabinet, the curtain pulled a little to one side, the camera placed in position, the room made dark, and the photograph was taken. To one side, and in front of Mrs. Keeler, stands Clara Collingwood, the spirit messenger, clothed in Christmas presents of earthly clothing. I send you the photograph; also a photograph of myself and spirit wife and son, and also one of myself and Spirit Dr. Holland, who controls the materializations, and the face and head of Clara and others supposed to be relatives, and whom I do not recognize. This demonstration proves to me that spirits can be photographed and that they can take solids to their spirit homes. RUFUS SUMERLIN, Washington, D. C.

The Symposium Concluded.

As an appropriate CLIMAX to the investigation that has been carried on in connection with the letter of the venerable Mr. Sumerlin, of Washington, D. C., we present a most interesting and suggestive article by Prof. W. M. Lockwood. It will certainly make a deep impression on thinking Spiritualists everywhere. His vast range of scientific knowledge, his thorough understanding of photography in all of its most minute details, and his sincerity and earnestness in promoting all genuine spirit phenomena, make him a model investigator. This discussion in The Progressive Thinker has been strictly confined to the phase of the phenomena alleged to have occurred in the presence of Mrs. Keeler—the dematerialization of certain wearing apparel, and the taking of the same to the spirit side of life, and then materializing them again by spirit Clara Collingwood, who wore them while a photograph was being taken. The only object we have had in view in this investigation is to arrive at THE EXACT TRUTH.

THE ART OF PHOTOGRAPHY.

A Scientific Examination of So-Called Spirit Photography, by Prof. W. M. Lockwood.

Photography is the art of developing and making visible on paper, parchment or other surface, the reflected image or similitude of some scene, landscape, person, design, model or perspective, through the lens of any camera obscura, by the radio action of light focused upon a sensitive chemical surface or film. The philosophy and analysis of the process briefly told, is this:

All colors and combination of colors belonging to the thing to be photographed, are radio chemical energies, and their affinity for the sensitive chemical surface of the plate or film, upon which their rays are focused, depends upon their respective molecular rate of vibration. White, water color, blue violet, pink, or any of their combinations possess a high vibratory or molecular activity, while red, yellow, black, brown, scarlet and any of their combinations, are of lower molecular activity.

Each and every color found in nature, possesses its own individual vibratory rate, and each makes its own molecular or chemical impression on sensitive photographic surfaces. This being a truth, it will be seen that the reflections of the colors of anything chemical physics and natural philosophy, spirit photography has a solid scientific basis, and its data will be known to the inquiring mind, and used successfully, when people are willing to search for it in the laboratory of nature's treasury of invisible cosmic forces, rather than accept the maudlin assertions of some PHOTOGRAPHIC TRICKSTER, WHO DOES NOT KNOW WHAT THE TERM, "CHANGE OF CHEMICAL SPECTRUM" MEANS, IN ITS APPLICATION TO CHEMICAL REACTIONS.

To understand how we may be able to know real spirit presence in photographic productions, it will be necessary for us to have some knowledge of the science and mathematics upon which the art is based. This includes chemical optics, or the relation color motion holds to chemical action, the law of relative focal distances called "the law of inverse squares," also what is to be understood by the term "change of chemical spectrum" in chemical combination, or the change occurring by which invisible modes of chemical reactions induce visibility of form.

As the great mass of the public mind do not understand any of these terms, or comprehend the subtleties of the changes of chemical and optical character obtaining in photographic process, it will be seen that they may become an EASY PREY TO THE WILES AND CAPRICES OF THE CHARLATAN PHOTOGRAPHER, WHO WITH A FEW ME-CHANICAL DEVICES, CAN SIMULATE ON THE PHOTOGRAPHIC FILM, PLATE, OR PRINT, LIKENESSES WHICH HE CLAIMS ARE SPIRIT PICTURES OF DECEASED FRIENDS OR RELATIVES.

The multiple ways in which these counterfeiters are produced, and the adroitness with which many of them are executed, could not be practiced if the entire formula of the art did not depend upon the invisible relations obtaining between the article or thing photographed, and a reflection of it which can be materialized into visibility by a change of its optical and chemical spectrum.

The charlatans who are engaged in this kind of spirit counterfeiting, are mostly "formula" workers—they work a process they have learned, hence are not schooled either in the optical or chemical principles involved in photography, and this ignorance causes many blunders by which the careful investigator detects the crudeness of their counterfeit, and notes to what extent they depend upon public gullibility and individual credulity for financial support and patronage.

To bring these data into practical analysis we will point out some of the glaring tricks and bungling work found in three specimens of counterfeit spirit photographs sent us from the office of The Progressive Thinker. As two of the three photos contain the same central figure, we will schedule them A, B, and C; and we will name the central figure, Mr. S.

In photo listed A, is seen Mr. S. in two-thirds length sitting pose; standing by his left shoulder, and partially behind it, is a lady which Mr. S. claims to be a spirit photograph of his wife; and by her left side and a little in front, is a gentleman in standing pose, claimed to be a spirit photo of his son.

First Test.

With a powerful aplanatic convex lens the standing figures are seen to be in-prints (printed in) on other negatives, the lines of what is called the "masking out process," being plainly discernible. The hands of the lady in the picture resting on the shoulders of Mr. S. are also "in-prints" from some negative taken in that pose, since it is plainly to be seen that in the original from which the lady's photo was copied, she stood with her right forearm behind her back. The picture of the gentleman standing in this group, which Mr. S. claims as his son in spirit, is also an in-print from another negative, in which the son has hold of a heavy curtain with his left hand. The curtain had been masked into a deep shadow, so as to make room for the spirit wife's picture, next to that of Mr. S. in the group, otherwise the curtain would have filled the entire space between son and father, if this picture of the son had been made at the same time or sitting as that of Mr. S.

Second Test—Made With an Area-meter.

This instrument is calculated to measure the area of surfaces by lines—one thousand lines to the inch being the standard for measurement. It is a thin transparent disk, lined with microscopic exactitude and is employed to measure signatures and heads of portraits on bank bills, etc., when there exists suspicion that they have been reproduced by photography. Hence it is an important detective for determining the relative size and focal distance of pictures in a group, whenever it is thought that an in-print has been interpolated from some source foreign to the picture or negative under investigation. It is a well-known principle in photographic process, that objects of the same size, occupying the same distance from the focal center of the camera used, will be of the same size in the picture made. It is also a fact that the nearer the camera is to the object, the larger the picture, and the farther away the camera, the smaller the picture. Not understanding these mathematical principles applicable to the "law of inverse squares," or depending upon the ignorance and gullibility of his customer, there frequently is found in these counterfeiters, faces in the background that are twice and even four times as large as that of the party who is sitting for spirit manifestations in the foreground, while, on the lapel of his coat is a face of his supposed wife, sister or dear friend, that is from four to six times too small to conform to this law of relative focal distance.

With these data in view, we will apply our instrument in measurement of the faces in the picture under trial. The face of Mr. S., the visible sitter, measures, head measure, about 1,000 lines; that of his spirit wife less than 500 lines, being too small by 300 lines. The spirit son's face measured 600 lines, being too small by over 200 lines. Applying the same test on relative perspective, the spirit wife's right arm must have been short by six inches, while the left arm was about four feet long, and unless it can be shown that the spirit wife and son stood on air, the wife's body from her waist to the floor was nearly six feet long, and the son's legs were about five feet long.

Third Test Polariscopic.

While this instrument is used to trace the varying degrees of transparency and density of films and microscopical filaments, it is an infallible indicator of the density of photographic negatives, films and semi-transparent surfaces, made under different formulas of development. Applying this test, we find that in this group of Mr. S. and his spirit wife and son, no two people in the group were taken originally at the same time or developed by the same process. The original negative of the wife and son did not have the same density as the negative of Mr. S. from which this group is claimed to have been made, nor did they have similar densities, hence we affirm that this group was made up of three different negatives by a process known as "combination printing," and the work was done in a most crude and bungling manner.

Another feature revealing the spurious in-printing character of these foreign pictures is this: The spirit-clothing in the picture of the wife and son appear as opaque to the eye, and also in the polariscopic projection, as does the clothing in the photo of Mr. S., which being in evidence, the clothing of the spirits would have been visible at the time Mr. S. had his sitting, whether the spirit faces, were or not. Still another trick readily understood by the practical photographer is this: To give the faces of the spirit pictures an ethereal look, the photographic printer placed a piece of transparent celluloid, mica, or other substance between the negative from which the spirit photo was made, and the paper on which it was made. This inter-placement threw the print out of focus, but it made the face of the spirit appear to be MORE ANGELIC! It will be noted that nearly all of the pictures of faces interpolated as spirit faces, are out of focus.

EXHIBIT B.

This photo consists of Mr. S. as the central figure, and around him and in the background are several in-prints, large and small, of faces claimed as those of spirit friends. One face containing five times the area of that of Mr. S. is to his left and a little behind him. This face, however, is in fairly good focus, and if as a spirit he had his picture taken at the same sitting and time as Mr. S., he must have had "the swell head"; for applying the law of inverse squares and taking the picture of the head of Mr. S. as the unit of measurement in optical distance, the head of this spirit must have been at least three feet in diameter, and it is doubtful if any of the faces seen in this combination are in keeping with this law of "inverse squares" and "relative focal distance," taking the size of the face of Mr. S. as the basis of mathematical calculation.

A STEREOPTICON EXHIBIT OF THIS PHOTO WILL REVEAL ITS SPURIOUS CHARACTER AND BUNGLING IN-PRINTING MAKE-UP. It must be noted that all of this class of photos have a dirty black background. This is done to cover up the lines made by printing in from more than one negative; since these lines are easily blended out by "solarization and masking."

This photo shows a common photographer's hastily made up semblance of a cabinet; at the curtain of which is seen a woman in "pose as a medium." In the foreground and a little to the right of the woman, is a full length picture of a little girl (said to be a spirit) presumably six or seven years old, dressed in white—with white hat, white shoes and stockings, and what is said to be a doll, also dressed in white. This photographic angel, like most angels of this make, is badly out of focus. Not only is the face out of focus, but the entire picture is; but as the focus is of "receding type," sometimes called "vanishing focus," it may be claimed by some that the spirit was on the point of leaving at the time the exposure of the plate was made.

Mr. S., above referred to, says that the entire suit of white hat, dress, shoes, stockings, doll, etc., were made for this spirit by friends of the medium, and presented to her. He also says, that soon after it was delivered, it dematerialized and was taken, as he thinks, to the sky attic of this spirit, and then rematerialized on this occasion, when after the picture had been taken it again dematerialized and disappeared with this child spirit.

As dematerialization in nature's forms means the disintegration of spectra supporting the phenomenon of visibility, and the resolution of these into their respective etheric elements, then in these sudden transformations he affirms two miracles, that of materialization being quite analogous to that of the "Mosaic Creation" as recorded in Genesis, while that of dematerialization is like the sudden withering away of the "fig-tree" by Christ's curse.

If a spirit or any combination of them, could instantly change the visible contour of a complete suit of clothing, and dematerialize the fabrics into their etheric elements, and then as suddenly recall them stitch by stitch and thread by thread into their former contour representing the individual workmanship of those contributing to this suit in its making, then THE FINAL RESURRECTION AND RESTITUTION OF THE DEAD BODIES AS TAUGHT BY JESUS, AND BELIEVED IN BY MANY, HAS ITS PARALLEL IN THIS CLAIM OF COSMIC IMPOSSIBILITIES.

We are asked by Brother Francis our opinion of this statement of materialization and dematerialization "as set forth by Mr. S., the author of the photos under analysis."

We think that the intellect that has a tendency to court the miraculous and to seek in the realm of supernaturalism for data to explain natural phenomena, has no place in philosophy as a consistent thinker, and no ability to trace the unknown through the channels of the known. Their opinions upon cosmic processes are illusive, their judgment and reason under the blight of a transcendentalism that IGNORES COMMON SENSE, and the inductive and deductive methods of reasoning. Spiritualism and its philosophy can receive no lasting support through such aid, however well meant.

In an article of analytical character, soon to be offered to the columns of The Progressive Thinker, we will point out and demonstrate by nature's own data, that spirit photography and materialization have a solid basis in cosmic process which scientific analysis fully substantiates.

LET ALL UNITE

To Demand a Higher Standard of Spiritualism.

To the Editor:—In reply to your request to express my opinion as to materialization and dematerialization, I will say first, I have never been able to study this phase of phenomena in a systematic manner. But I firmly believe that it can and does sometimes occur. Because of what I do know the invisible people have done in other lines, I firmly believe in law, order and nature, thus my belief in this. I have very carefully read Prof. Crookes' experiments with Florence Cook and the spirit Kate King. And these results are entirely different from the average so-called materialization. And I have confidence in the ability of such a mind as Crookes.

On the other hand, I have visited many circles for this phase and have seen most if not all of the best in the profession, and I have yet to see one that is satisfactory. I do not believe it is possible to trot out spirits at $1 per head at any time and in any place, because the laws of nature are not promiscuous.

Again, I do not believe any spirit or spirits ever induced a medium to get toggery for them. If they have, the quicker we shut the door on such the better. The world can lie and sham enough now without being helped on in it in this way.

Again, I do not believe spirits have any need or use for articles from this plane, such as you have referred to, as shoes, dresses, etc. I know of a case that occurred at Onset when the noted Berry sisters were in full trim, where the spirits asked an old man, 70 years of age, for a check of $100 to take to the spirit world for his wife, for she had given birth to a baby in the spirit world, and she wanted to buy a carriage to wheel the child out in, on the streets of heaven. ROT!

Now, if all such trash had a shadow of truth in it, we would find it necessary to carry all our bank accounts, stocks and bond on with us. And the burden of the message from spirit life has been that such things do not count there.

This idea that spirit or mortal can charm things so they can produce something from nothing is a remnant of the most superstitious past. And if spirits claim they can do it, we know they are of the class and order that need educating, instead of posing as teachers. Demand as much from them as you do from mortals. The trouble is, we have put the truth on such a low standing. To think that the doorway through which such great light has and can come should be reduced to such depths of shame and degradation is awful.

To believe that spirits can produce flesh, blood, muscles, bones, and breath tainted with tobacco, onions or cloves! And then these creatures to entertain like any other juggler in making lace, producing banners, bowle-knives, and dancing skirt-dances, is to prostitute our intellect and show we do not understand the first simple laws of natural production, or the great mission of spirit communication.

The sooner we are done with these things, and demand that each and every seance shall be an hour in which we can be enlightened in some department of life, the sooner will these things cease to satisfy.

Let all Spiritualists, mediums, speakers and laymen unite in demanding that the public shall raise their standard of demand on the spirit world if they wish us to serve them. And in turn the public demand that Spiritualism shall become what it was intended to be—a fountain of education in the laws of physics, morals and soul. ELIZABETH HARLOW.

Newspaper War Cloud.

The reader opens his morning paper and the first thing that greets his vision is a column news dispatch from Washington, with frightful headlines, displayed in large letters, and a multitude of exclamation points, announcing:

"May Invade China With 25,000 Men! Preparations Are Made at the War Department to March on Peking! Every Soldier in the United States Will Be Sent to the Front! The Great Christian Powers Are Invoked to Join in the Invasive War on China!"

Almighty God! What is the occasion for all this display to arouse the war spirit against China? Why, at the instance of the unscrupulous hoodlum element in California many years ago, we closed our ports to Chinese emigration, and to the oldest empire on earth, even excluding her men of letters, her merchants, and her scientists from passing through the country without the most insulting exactions! We have sought to overrun that great empire, with its 400,000,000 population, by emissaries of Christian churches, to foment a hateful religion on them. These intruders have been repulsed by the native population, the most turbulent of whom have shown their hatred by acts of violence.

After some fifty years of continuous insult by our government, and the action of numerous mobs in our own country directed against Chinese who had settled among us before the passage of the exclusion act of Congress, China, as a retaliatory measure, has set out to convince this government that "there are other hearts to ache" beside theirs. They have determined to boycott us; to use no goods of American manufacture; to have no dealings with us until the hateful restrictive legislation is repealed.

China desired to do, and be done by, as has been done by Japan. She wished to send her youth to us to be educated in the arts of peace. She wished to join in the grand march of progress, until she could claim a position as an equal with the Western powers; but she has been repulsed at every step, and now the great Christian powers are invoked to overwhelm her in ruin.

The movement is analogous to those of the early ages of Christianity, when, gaining control of the Roman empire, they invaded nation after nation, and continued their aggressive acts until all Europe was involved in desolating wars.

The founders of this government abjured religious questions. They sought to avoid the fruitless cause of national strife by discarding the God question, which found no place in the Declaration of Independence, or in the federal Constitution.

In preceding governments kings and emperors were crowned were anointed, christened, made christ; but our presidents derived their authority exclusively from the people, to whom alone they were responsible for their acts. In the treaty with Tripoli, signed by Washington in 1797, it was expressly declared: "The United States is in no sense a Christian nation," but demagogues in all subsequent years have been laboring to make it what its founders never contemplated, and are ready to plunge us in a war of indefinite duration, to sustain Christian missionaries in China.

Neglect of Bible Reading.

President G. Stanley Hall of Clark University, a Massachusetts institution, deprecates the very general abandonment of Bible reading in families. He claims to have conducted a quiet inquiry to ascertain how Bible reading in these days compares with the custom of forty or fifty years ago. From numerous replies to his question Dr. Hall reaches the conclusion that reading the Bible in the family has fallen into disuse; the knowledge of Bible literature has declined during the past two decades, and that there are relatively fewer family altars upon which the fires of devotion are kept burning than ever before since Christianity became firmly established.

We have no doubt Dr. Hall is correct in his statement, and we think there is ample cause for the change. The Bible is not so much a fetish as it was fifty years ago, and its errors are better known by the masses. When the people shall become conscious that war, slavery, polygamy, and all the great evils were practiced by the patriarchs, whom we were taught to emulate, the book will pass into innocuous desuetude, and be placed on the shelves with others treating on mythology.

Some Categorical Questions.

Though pressed with other duties and devoting hours to reading that should have been given to sleep, we have just concluded the re-perusal of Prof. Millard's "Journal of Travels in Egypt, Arabia Petrea, and the Holy Land," the tour made in 1841-2. Though a rigid sectarian, accepting the Bible account of the regions through which he traveled as of God, yet his description of the barren desolation he everywhere met with, including an account of the wandering Bedouins and their ignorance and barbarism, it seemed to bring vividly before us the nomadic Hebrew tribes, and their conceptions of life, of God, and of the starry heavens, as given in the Old Testament, which Christians teach us to be received as divine.

The professor had the escort of some thirty Arabs with their camels and dromedaries, and tents, and was journeying across the desert from the Gulf of Akabah, on the Red Sea, to Petra in Idum, a region over which the children of Israel are represented to have wandered in their forty years' march from Egypt to the land of Canaan. He had told us, page 177, "All the Bedouins, throughout Arabia, are entirely ignorant of letters. I saw but one Bedouin scribe (the head man or chief of a tribe or clan) who could read or write."

An eclipse of the moon occurred as they camped. We quote, page 187: "Casting my eyes over the face of the bright, full moon, I perceived an eclipse was just coming on. What astronomer had calculated this eclipse for Arabia? It was, indeed, a privilege to witness one in the bright sky that overspreads the lonely mountains of Seir. Soon we were seated in a circle, with our Arabs seated around their watch-fire, inquiring of them their views of an eclipse, and explaining to them ours. They appeared to have no idea of its real cause, regarding it as a judgment from God, a sign of a bad season and little camel-fodder. When we undertook to explain the theory of the earth being round, turning over every day, and sometimes getting between the sun and moon (as was then occurring) they seemed to look upon us as telling strange tales. The eclipse was nearly total. I gazed on it with interest, and then eyed the dreary scene around. The wild, lonely landscape of rocks and sand—the camels kneeling around the bivouac—the wild faces of the Arabs, reflecting the red light of the fire—their wild voices and guttural sounds, all combined to produce an effect so startling, I felt till then I had never seen so fully sensible of our complete separation from the civilized world."

Now, good reader, with the learning and the glad light of the twentieth century beaming on us in full effulgence; with your knowledge of astronomy, geology and history, transfer yourself from Allegheny College, at Meadville, Pa., where Prof. Millard was an instructor in theology and Biblical Antiquities, to this wild, desolate and barbarian camp of unlettered Arabs, possibly one of their number learned enough to read and write, but wholly ignorant of all the sciences, and all the literature and wonderful learning of these modern times, and yet acquainted with the traditions of their equally ignorant ancestors; and imagine him, this elementary scholar, a Moses, attempting to write his ideas of God, of creation, a history of the world, and the people in it. How different do you suppose would be his narration from that now presented us in the Bible, which sordid ignorance, or mean avarice credits to Infinite Wisdom? Giving that wisdom unlimited power, and ignorant Arabian man speaking words into being; making a sun to illuminate the earth; hanging stars in the sky to twinkle by night; creating animals and men out of clay; opening the windows of heaven to make it rain; exhibiting a rainbow to show he would not get angry and drown the world again. Leaving his feet on earth, resting on pillars, don't you think he would build a heaven with golden streets, and an ivory throne on which he would seat his God, while all his subjects in that horrible guttural would join in an effort to please him with their rude melody? Ah, don't you think they would make a ladder, reaching from earth to sky, on which angels would ascend and descend, such as one as Jacob saw? Tell us, would he imitate Babel Tower, in his boyish exaggerations and make serpents and donkeys talk, and converse with mortals?

If so, if ignorance would do all this, tell us if you would not think it wise to withhold the dishonored Infinite Wisdom by making that uncultured barbarian the author of a book, filled from cover to cover with equal Munchausens, and credit the authorship to the Almighty Ruler, and threaten you with endless punishment if you refuse to accept it as divine?

And again, should that book, here and there, be adorned with an occasional gem, gathered from the learned of later ages and injected into its pages, do you think they would have sufficient merit to make the whole collection worthy the title of Sacred Scriptures?

We pause for your reply.

Practical Buddhism.

Again Mr. Bryan wrote from Japan: "I have never seen a more quiet, orderly, and self-restrained people than I have met in Japan. I have not seen one drunken native, or witnessed a fight or altercation of any kind. It is said in the city of Tokio there are over 1,100 public baths, and it is estimated 500,000 baths are taken daily at the bath houses. This does not include the baths taken at home."

If Mr. Bryan's observation corroborates the report of other travelers, he heard no profane or cuss words while in the Sunrise Kingdom. Profanity is a Christian vice which follows in the trail of missionaries and sailors, as does whiskey, New England rum, and civilized vices generally.

The Disgrace of It.

Considerable comment has been made over the fact that a woman who was convicted of a capital crime was recently hanged in Vermont.

We thoroughly coincide in the view that the hanging was a disgrace to the state of Vermont—a bitter, stinging disgrace, to hang a woman.

At the same time there is room to ask the question: Has not a woman as good a right as a man, to be hanged? Yes, we agree that it was a deep, dark disgrace, a blot on the fair name of Vermont, to hang a woman.

Further, we declare that it is a dark disgrace to any state, to hang a man! Hanging is a barbarous punishment—a crime against human nature—of the same quality except the legality, as the crime of the murderer who is hanged.

It is a disgrace to our boasted modern civilization, that such punishments as hanging, electrocution, etc., are still in vogue.

It is a burning disgrace that no better way of managing or disposing of such convicted criminals has not been found and put into effect—some method of humane and humanizing tendency, which would at once protect society and at least tend to bring the bad to a better state of mind.

Surely it is a disgrace to hang a woman; it is also a disgrace to hang a man—a deep, dark, damning disgrace. And Vermont is not alone in bearing the burden of disgrace. The time is coming when civilized people will find some better way to do with criminals than to murder them.

The shock caused by the hanging of a woman will have a tendency to bring about sooner the abolition of hanging, altogether, as a barbarism. The time is surely coming when the growth of ethical humanitarian sentiment will set aside entirely the old Mosaic code, based on vengeance pure and simple, of "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth," death for death, murder for murder—cruel vengeance wreaked under the formal sanction of legal procedure.

In place of the old barbaric idea of punishment, will be substituted methods of humanizing the criminal, but humane ideas, with the object of both reformation and the public protection. Spiritualism with its grand philosophy will have much to its credit in bringing about the beautiful reform.

A Friend Wants to Know.

"Do you mean to insinuate that the Bible represents God as guilty of jealousy? You say the denial of a Supreme mind is less offensive than a vacillating, repentant, jealous God. So I would say if the Bible represented him as such."

Our friend who asks the question, will open his Bible to Exodus 20:5, and read:

"For I the Lord thy God am a Jealous God," etc.

If not yet satisfied that inerrant book misrepresents the character of him we are taught to adore, open to Exodus 34:14, and find:

"The Lord, whose name is Jealous, is a Jealous God."

If not yet satisfied with the mean character the Bible gives to God, read Nahum 1:2, and cease your search for "God is Jealous," and the Lord is Jealous, and is furious; the Lord will take vengeance on his adversaries, and he reserveth wrath for his enemies."

The Bible makers and the prophets blasphemously credited God with the meanest passions of the human breast, and in sending the book to school boys and students, and the Lord is Jealous, and is furious; the Lord will take vengeance on his adversaries, and he reserveth wrath for his enemies."

Evil Seeds Produce a Like Harvest. Paul was correct when he wrote the Galatians 6:7—"Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." If he sows "hate," as Jesus taught his disciples, Luke 14:26, an abundant harvest of hate may be expected. If he wastes his substance by giving all he has to the poor, Matt. 10:21, the residue of life will be spent in poverty and wretchedness. If nations sow to the god of War, ruined homes, desolation and death must follow. If he sows to peace, and to the cultivation of the many virtues, he may expect to reap a harvest which will glorify the mortal and bloom in perpetual verdure when the turmoil of earth life is over.

Weeds, briars and brambles should be exterminated, not cultivated; and so with evil passions, and all the incentives which lead to vice and crime. A religion which teaches the almshouses with victims; that furnishes the inmates for our insane asylums; that fills our cemeteries with suicides; our prisons with convicts, and the galleries with their repulsive fruit, should not be cultivated. And this is just what Catholicism and her daughter churches are doing, if trust can be placed in statistical reports, furnished by the caretakers of those institutions.

The Criminals Are Churchmen.

The Oregonian, one of the oldest and most prominent secular papers on the Pacific coast, published at Portland, in a late issue is reported to have said: "There is one infidel and eighty-one Catholics in the penitentiary at Salem, Oregon." Wonder how many clergymen, and how many persons representing other Christian churches there are? Will some good patron in Oregon supply The Progressive Thinker with this desirable information?

As the wardens in the penitentiaries are in the habit of classing Spiritualists with infidels, otherwise "not in the faith," this information of the Oregonian is a proud mark for Spiritualists.

Against Women Inspectors.

Percy L. Hedrick, chief sanitary inspector of the Chicago Health Department, has announced his intention of dismissing the only three women inspectors, and replacing them with men. He says women cannot do the work properly.

Women have been highly successful in such work in other cities, and his action has aroused much indignation among the settlement workers and club women of Chicago. A recent meeting of women has been held to protest, and representatives of Hull House, the Northwestern University Settlement, the Armitage Avenue Settlement House and the Henry Booth House went before the council finance committee to urge that the women inspectors should not be removed from the staff.

Jane Adams said: "It is the tendency in all cities to increase rather than diminish the number of women inspectors." New York has 48 inspectors, and of these 24 are women. Inspection in houses usually has to do with the interior arrangements, and it is a woman's work.

Mrs. Herman Falkenstein, head of the Armitage Avenue Settlement House, said: "Politics, pure and simple, is behind it all. Women have no votes, therefore they are to be removed. This must make us, as women, realize that it is high time for a suffrage clause in our city charter."

Other prominent women workers are reported as saying the same thing. The Chicago Tribune predicts that Inspector Hedrick's action may lead to a concerted effort by the settlements and the women's clubs to secure a municipal woman suffrage clause in Chicago's new charter.

ALICE STONE BLACKWELL.

The Christianizing of the State of Iowa Through Its State College.

The Iowa State College is maintained by the state, where 1,200 young men are annually enrolled as students, as stated in a circular sent out to those who are supposed by the acturaries of the Christianizing movement to be in sympathy. How many young women are not so fitted. Perhaps it is thought the latter are already Christians, or of no consequence. This college is maintained by taxes which fall on every citizen of the state, at least half of whom do not belong to any church, and if they sent their children to this college, would do so because it was free from sectarian influence. The Constitution of the United States, and of the state, prohibits the introduction of sectarianism into the public schools.

Now in defiance of the laws, an attempt is being made to make the Iowa State College a hot-bed of religious bigotry, and a nursery for the churches. It is done through the specious pretensions of the Young Men's Christian Association, which is the Jesuitical order of Protestantism. We use the word, advisedly, for with the pretensions of giving its members social and moral advantage, its true object is to make church members.

By subscriptions, a Y. M. C. A. building is under way and ten thousand dollars more is wanted to complete it. An urgent appeal is made to the interested. The circular says: "Where in all Iowa, or elsewhere, is a field for Christian work so open, so strategic and so easily taken?"—meaning the conversion of these 1,200 students to churchianity.

It is in the program, for ex-President Patton of Princeton University, says: "The Y. M. C. A. has well nigh the religious monopoly of the religious culture of our universities and colleges."

A splendid building is wanted for the home of this religious order, which the State ignores. The circular says: "There is great need for a building to be the center of religious life and activity." The Y. M. C. A. has worked its way in without a building for a "Home." It has "Religious meetings," "prayer meetings," "Bible Study," "Mission Study," it has "organization of the religious forces," and helped college men to stand by their early religious training. What may it not do if it has a magnificent "Home" to attract those who now are not inclined to swallow the religion to get the privileges? With the "Home" and all the Social and alluring incentives of social position, with ostracism of the "religious" students and professors, the Iowa State College will be to all intents and purposes a church school, maintained by the State, and for which the churches pay nothing at all.

The promoters, in their circular acknowledge that they are acting in defiance of the law. The reason they give for asking donations is thus given: "Being a State Institution, the faculty are restrained by law from giving any religious instruction." If this is the fact, why do they burden themselves with the conversion of the students? Why do they become outlaws? The people of the State ought to know what they want as well as these preachers, to support whom they are taxed.

The Catholics have just the same right to establish a building for the propagation of their religion by the side of the Iowa State College as the Protestants. If they should do so, the probabilities are that the sensibilities of the people would be that shocked, that it would be torn down by mob violence. If allowed, the Mother Church would gladly erect a building, a "Home," for the students, and the Lord is Jealous, and is furious; the Lord will take vengeance on his adversaries, and he reserveth wrath for his enemies."

The register for last year shows about 8,000 persons who visited the cabin in the valley, and the daily average this year is something like forty per day.

Mrs. Forbes Story.

Speaking of her gift, Mrs. Forbes said: "I know nothing of my power except what the people tell me, as I do not remember anything of what was said or what I have done since I was in this supernatural state. One thing that embarrasses me, though, is, they tell me that when I am in that condition I play with dolls just as a child does, and that I say I am only six years old. This is very embarrassing to me, and I would do anything to be relieved of the wonderful power they say I possess."

"It seems, from reports, however, that I am doing lots of good, and of course I am glad of that; but now that so many people come here, this place no longer seems like home. When I come out of the supernatural state it seems as if I had just awoken from a refreshing slumber. My husband tells me that I never sleep till about 3 o'clock in the morning, and that when I go in this 'spell' at supper I never leaves before 3 o'clock."

When asked why she did not move to some town easy of access she said: "This place has been home to me for so long that I would be lost in a city or town, and maybe if we stay here the people will soon get tired of coming, because it is so hard to get here. The whole thing is distasteful to me. We have had several offers to go to cities, and people have offered us money to make the change, but I don't want to go. We were in Fort Smith a few days ago, and Mr. O. B. Galloway offered my husband $100 if he would get me to talk for two nights in that city, but I would not permit him to accept the money, for I believe that God has given me this power, and it would not be right to charge for doing anything for the people."

Mrs. Forbes is of the Southern type—dark with black hair and eyes. She weighed 125 pounds before this miraculous change, but now weighs 155. She talks intelligently, is a member of the Baptist church, and, according to the custom of her neighborhood, smokes a cob pipe.

W. E. Forbes, husband of the "Wonderful Woman," said: "I can't understand what is the matter with my wife. I have had several physicians to examine her, but they cannot determine the cause of these changes any more than I can. She certainly tells things of great value, judging from the letters I have received from people in different parts of the United States, who have been here, telling me of the good she has done."

"I have a letter now from a man in California, who was here last year, which is written in Spanish. As soon as it is possible to do so, I will get my wife, in her supernatural state, to translate it, and answer the questions asked for the San Francisco Standard. I can give easily then. However, it may be some time before I can consult her about this matter, as there are always several persons here to consult her, and they should have the time before anything else."

The Change to Infancy.

Mrs. Forbes sat the supper table not long ago. When about half through eating the whole expression of her face changed; her eyes became wide open and staring, her appetite changed and she adopted the vernacular of a child. Immediately after supper Mrs. Forbes retired to a room, where she has twelve or fourteen dolls that have been given to her by visitors. She took each doll and kissed it, talking as a child does and calling them by name. After thirty minutes, she replaced the dolls and, facing the people in the room, said:

"My mission here is to tell the people there is a hell, and there is a heaven, and that the Bible is not crooked, but that the people read the Bible crooked. I will play two songs if the people will sing, and then I will talk to them about business."

After the music, which is another gift of her supernatural state, Mrs. Forbes continued:

"God gave me this power six years ago. I am now told everything by a little boy, but in another year I will be a woman who will have me to teach Sunday-school, then I will not talk on business, but will teach day-school every day. After I have been with the Sunday-school woman four years, I will leave her and go with another woman who will cause me to talk to thousands of people to where I now talk to one, and I will go into the world and talk to the people and tell them where there is a standing, 'The people to-day,' said Mrs. Forbes, 'are on the brink of a precipice, and as are one who is in a house that is on fire, and have been warned, but make no attempt to escape.'"

Lansing Staats, a real estate dealer of Dexter, Mo., when seen at his office in Dexter, said:

"Yes, I want to see the 'Wonderful Woman of Taskee,' a few days ago, and while I do not know whether her power is supernatural or not, I do know that she told me some things which were true, and I do not know how she knew them. She told me the kind of house I live in; that I was an unmarried man, and that in a short time I would receive a letter from a woman that might cause me to make a change. I asked her about Southeast Missouri, the country I am interested in. She told me that she saw not far in the future the country known as Southeast Missouri dotted with thriving towns, connected by electric railways, hills that have been torn into mines from which the richest ore is being taken. 'I see straggling towns that have become commercial centers and swamps that have been turned into waving fields of wheat,' said Mrs. Forbes."

"I asked her what would be a good investment for me to make on which I would realize a good profit, said Staats, 'and her answer to that question almost made me believe in her. She said: 'If you want to see your dollars grow and become many, plant them in the soil of the country you have been asking me about.'"

Three Other Visitors.

E. J. Duncan, a blacksmith, living two miles from Dexter, Mo., said that he went to see the "Wonderful Woman" and that she told him how many members his family contained, what his business was, described his family, and answered questions that he asked her. He asked Mrs. Forbes to describe a peculiar tree, near where he lives, and she did so, even describing a mark that he did not know of himself, but on looking found it was as she had said. "If there is anything you do not want to know," said Mr. Duncan, "you had better not ask this woman, for she can certainly tell you anything you ask her."

Charles Liles, a well-known politician and lawyer of Dexter, and chairman of the Twenty-second Judicial Democratic Committee, when asked what he knew about Mrs. Forbes, replied:

"I think that she can tell you anything you want to know, for she told me about some things that I believed to be unknown to anyone but myself. She seems to be both philosopher and reasoner, for she offered suggestions regarding some law cases I have that will win. I am pretty sure. Anyway, what I learned is worth the visit."

Stephen P. Bailey, who came up from Sherman, Texas, to ask Mrs. Forbes about some matters, said:

"Mrs. Forbes is certainly a wonderful woman. She described the parts of Texas where I have been, as well as other places, and her descriptions were correct. I asked her about several business matters and her knowledge of my business affairs certainly astonished me. I do not regret my trip up here, as I think I have been

Truth Is Marching On!
Woman of Prophetic Vision Puzzles All Wayne County, Missouri.

"Wonderful Woman of Taskee," while in a state resembling that of an infant, foretells things to come, locates lost articles and gives advice on all matters of business. Peculiar gift came to her after an unusual illness following the sting of a strange worm. Eight thousand persons visit her cabin in one year, and prominent persons tell of her gifts. Verily the world is moving gradually to that point when Spirit Return will receive almost universal recognition. The secular papers are now doing far more to call people's attention to the fact that spirits can communicate with mortals, than all the Spiritualist papers on earth combined. They reach the skeptic, the agnostic, the one who looks upon spirit phenomena as the result of legerdemain alone, and in that respect they are powerful agents for good. In the country, on a secluded farm, Spirit Return is established, and thousands are converted to its belief, without an "ism," without a flourish of trumpets, and without any effort to proselyte. The medium in this particular case is a Mrs. W. E. Forbes. She resides in Taskee, Mo., and is known as the "Wonderful Woman of Taskee," because of her peculiar gifts in divining future events. When in the prophetic state she becomes as a child.

Taskee, Mo., March 11.—In a log cabin three miles from this village, in the rough Wayne county foothills of the Ozarks, lives Mrs. W. E. Forbes, a woman with a prophetic instinct, who is known as the "Wonderful Woman of Taskee."

Mrs. Forbes is just 35 years old. She is the wife of a farmer, and, until 1896, was as any other woman, as far as future happenings are concerned.

Early in that year she was stung by some species of worm that was a stranger to the farmers and physicians of Wayne county. From this sting she almost died.

In November she was attacked by an illness resembling epilepsy. In 1899 came another attack, and the spell left her as a child of six years.

These attacks became frequent after awhile, but they were not of long duration. While under the spell it was noted by her husband that she could see things, though the room was in absolute darkness, and could answer questions relating to things of which she knew nothing.

The neighbors learned of this, and at night would congregate at the Forbes home and ask Mrs. Forbes about lost articles, strayed stock, the proper time to plant, and many other things. Invariably they received answers which proved to be correct.

The fame of the "Wonderful Woman of Taskee," as she now came to be known, spread far and wide, and persons came from all parts of the country to consult her on various subjects—to get information concerning lost articles, future prospects, business ventures, or anything the person was desirous of knowing. The Forbes family makes no charge for any question that may be asked.

The register for last year shows about 8,000 persons who visited the cabin in the valley, and the daily average this year is something like forty per day.

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can best be served thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that no space is made available to publish anything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that the Progressive Thinker is set up on a high plane of truth and must make appeal equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they must generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many things that would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE. that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

Mrs. Henrietta L. Lichtig writes: "The Illinois Sunflower Club will celebrate its first birthday on March 23, at the old Tremont House, corner Lake and Dearborn streets. The afternoon exercises will consist of a game of progressive euchre, beginning at 2 o'clock sharp, and six prizes will be given. Some booths will also be arranged for the purpose of giving readings to those who desire them. Supper will be served at 6 o'clock, after which there will be a short but interesting program, followed by dancing. Vogel's orchestra will furnish the music for the dancing. Tickets can be purchased of the members of the club. Come, friends of the Sunflower Club, and swell the crowd and help the young child to celebrate its first birthday."

Dr. C. H. Figners of Cleveland, O., gave a call to The Progressive Thinker office while in Chicago en route to Texas in search of health. Nervous prostration is the trouble. He will be near DeKalb, Texas.

Frank T. Ripley, of Tipton, Ind., who has been here for two weeks past the guest of his friend, Dr. Will Clough, left last night for St. Joe, Mo. Mr. Ripley is a lecturer of note and states that his time is all taken up to the first of September.—Republican News, Hamilton, Ohio.

A. A. Smith writes from Anadarko, Okla.: "Is there not a good test medium and speaker who would take pleasure in coming here in the near future and give this city a waking up? Arrangements will be made to have a hand to meet the requirements of the medium, providing the time of arrival is given a few days before."

M. A. Leonard writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "Dear brothers and sisters, I have been an invalid for many years, and will soon go to a hospital to be operated on. If it is not asking too much, will you give me your best thoughts, and thus oblige a suffering sister?"

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "In the absence of President Kirchner, Sunday afternoon, March 11, the services of the Rising Sun Mission, 378 S. Western avenue, were conducted by first vice-president Chas. Thompson, who made a few remarks at the temple. Dr. Hager also favored us with a brief but interesting address along scientific lines that left no room for doubt. He is a very interesting talker. A few messages were given by Bro. Thompson's guides, which gave the usual satisfaction. In the evening Dr. J. H. MacFarland read the Creed. At the close of the services he was congratulated again and again by friends and strangers for his clear interpretation of the word 'creed.' Sister Dill gave messages which were wonderful for their accuracy. 'Heaven' will be the subject of Dr. Randall, our speaker for Sunday evening, March 26. We will see the largest congregation of Spiritualists ever assembled on the West Side on the occasion of our celebration of the 58th anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, Sunday, April 1. Our large hall, 378 S. Western avenue, will be fittingly decorated, and our program will include some of the most popular exponents of Spiritualism on the platform. An appetizing lunch will be served in the afternoon as usual, to accommodate those who wish to stay for the evening service."

"The Globe-Democrat publishes the following: 'Wichita, Kans., March 12. W. E. Hart, the Spiritualist charged with defrauding Mrs. M. A. Price of Greenup, out of $325, was discharged in the federal court here to-day.'"

N. J. Jones of Unity Spiritual Society, Milwaukee, Wis., writes: "Mr. George H. Brooks has served the Unity Spiritual Society during the last six months. His work here has taken the form of a progressive series of lectures along advanced spiritual and metaphysical lines. His teachings have been highly appreciated by all earnest aspirants for spiritual truths. His work is far above the regular lectures generally heard on the Spiritualist platform. Mr. Brooks' earnestness of purpose, sincerity in his efforts toward the elevation of humanity, and sublimity of character, have endeared him to the hearts of his audience and his many students in the Cream City."

Benj. F. Atherton writes from Portland, Oregon: "Under heading of 'Optimistic View of Spiritualism in Portland, Oregon,' you have made me unintentionally the president of the First Society. The president of that society is Bro. E. F. Staley, an earnest, energetic worker for good, clean Spiritualism. His friends and supporters would not allow even the state president to rise in his stead, hence this correction."

Fond Du Lac, Wis., March 9.—Following a remarkable dream that he would be run down by the cars and fatally hurt, Station Agent Mulvany was struck and killed by a train here to-day.

Geo. B. Perrie writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "Plans are being made for holding of a highly entertaining anniversary day service by the Grand Rapids Spiritual Society, March 25. The North End Spiritual Society, the Psychic Circle and the New Thought Spiritual Society, have decided to unite for the occasion, and the joint services will be held at 2:30 and 7:30 p. m. The Rockford, Mich., society has also been invited and it is hoped will also take part. The program has not yet been fully determined, but it is known that there will be lectures by Mrs. May Cecil Lincoln and Mrs. D. A. Morrill; musical numbers and recitations by many others; and messages will be given by capable mediums."

W. Hagemann writes: "The North Star Spiritual Union in its hall, 1548 Milwaukee avenue, greeted an interested audience on Sunday evening, March 11. The hall was crowded to its full capacity. Sister Lester Krueger opened the meeting by invocation, followed by a short address by Brother Aarncke. His words made a great impression upon the audience, especially so as the speaker referred to the Bible, which is endorsed by the North Star Spiritual Union to be the teacher of Modern Spiritualism. After Bro. Aarncke, Sister Burdick made some very impressive remarks, and Sister Lester Krueger gave spirit messages which brought tears of joy to many. The Progressive Thinker was advocated as a medium of the education of the teachings of Spiritualism, truth, and the demand for same could not be supplied with the copies on hand."

Sardou asserts that he is a highly sensitive and effective Spiritualist medium; that he has had frequent interviews with spirits of friends who are dead, and that he has received messages, spirits guiding his hand to write them as they were communicated to him. He has a collection of many drawings he has made, the spirits guiding his pencil—strange faces of angels, of demons, human figures aloft in the air, and many other things of them supernatural beings. He says he sees obstacles in the path. The playwright says he can not and does not attempt to explain these visitations, this guidance. But he is convinced of the objective reality of the spirit world and of its desire and power to enter into relations with humanity.—Chicago Chronicle.

Bro. Woodward writes from Montgomery, Mich.: "I have read your paper about six years and I enjoy it very much. I am proud of you for the stand you are taking for truth and right. We had some fine tests of spirit power through the medium C. J. Barnes, at our home. We are holding home circles once a week with very good results."

Correspondent writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "The society known as the Ladies Temple Fund Spiritual Society is doing a grand, good work. They bought an old Baptist church, taking possession some time last September, and putting workmen upon it at once, remodeled, repainted it, and have now holding meetings of their own for holding masses and other uses. They have a nice kitchen which they use in connection with the large annex room, and each Sunday afternoon they serve lunches for many who stay from the afternoon to the evening services. Yesterday fifty or more took their lunch at the temple. Geo. Kates and wife are the speakers for this month of March. They are well liked and draw good houses. Last month W. J. Colville was with us, and his masterly discourses and lectures received the highest praise from all. The cause is steadily but surely growing and improving in this city and throughout the state. The course of The Progressive Thinker is slowly but surely weeding the weeds of Error from the garden of Spiritualism. The fakes and frauds, whoever they may be, will yet learn the better way by being left alone as people have knowledge of their trickery. The Progressive Thinker is a great dispenser of that knowledge."

Dr. Beverly writes: "The meetings at Arlington Hall, Thirty-first and Indiana avenue, are growing in interest every week. We have something new and up-to-date, for progressive people demand the truth in its latest unfoldment. Many mediums are present every Sunday and are always free to demonstrate their phases. Mme. L. Nerve furnishes fine music and sings the latest songs. Free healing is a prominent part of the exercises. All meetings free to the public. Come and bring your friends."

W. J. Colville has been having crowded houses at St. George's Hall, Toronto. He takes a temporary farewell of America in San Francisco and Oakland, California, March 25, 26, 27 and 28. He sails for Sydney, on the Sonoma, March 29. He is in demand as a speaker the world over.

FRIENDS OF THE CHURCH OF THE SOUL TAKE NOTICE!—There will be a Progressive Euchre Party under the auspices of the State of Michigan, at the home of Mrs. Minnie Allen, 5522 Pershing street, on Thursday evening, March 22. Score cards 25 cents. Playing will commence promptly at 8:30. Prizes. Those who wish to assist the church and do not wish to play, can contribute price of score cards.

John Rober, secretary, writes: "The Elkhart (Ind.) Spiritual Society has engaged that able lecturer, Mrs. Nellie S. Baade of Detroit as its speaker for the month of May."

Bro. Herron writes from Hornellsville, N. Y.: "Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds, New York State Missionary, has held here three very interesting meetings. There was a large attendance, and all were well pleased with the messages. We had a beautiful solo each evening by Rollo L. DeWitt. Mrs. Lee of Canisteo, played the accompaniment. Our society is now harmonious. New members are being added, and we are progressing. Our sister, Mrs. S. Coston, keeps the light burning in her home every Wednesday and Sunday evening."

W. E. writes: "On Wednesday evening, March 14, at 7:30 p. m., 3514 Vincennes avenue, there will be an entertainment given which every Spiritualist should see. There will be fifteen numbers on the program, and every one exceptionally good. Artists of high professional rank have given their services for the evening. There will be moving pictures, illustrated songs, music, etc. 'The Holy City' will be sung to moving pictures made especially for this occasion. This feature of the program is one that has required years of experience, and promises to be one of the most educational and amusing as well as interesting exhibitions that have ever been given. Elmo, assisted by six professional artists, will present a Black Art Exhibition, with all its mystery. The cabinet requires 150 yards of material, also 60 strong electric lights. A few features represented in this work will be the instantaneous appearance and disappearance, the decapitation, and the living talking head, the production of articles and people from space, etc. We start at 8:15 sharp. Come early and get front seats. Tickets 35 cents. Don't forget the date. Thirty-fifth street and Cottage Grove avenue, near the door."

Thos. Hornbeck writes: "A Spiritualist meeting was held at 11:15 a. m. at the residence of Mrs. E. J. Finch. Mrs. Stanner-Adams was present and rendered valuable assistance. We hope that our next meeting will be in a public hall on Davis street, when we expect to organize under the auspices of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association, and work earnestly for the cause that is so much needed in humanity. Spiritualism teaches them whence they come and where they are going in no unmistakable terms. It satisfies our every material need, advances us far into the spiritual realms of life. It absorbs and practices the occult. No one can thoroughly investigate Modern Spiritualism without being made better, and there is no better place for investigation than in the home circle; at least one hour in a week should be sacredly devoted to the communion of spirit between the visible and the invisible members of our families. Then the occult is taught, and we extend our hands with us and teach us how to live right and be good. Let us ever aspire for the true and the beautiful and our lives will always be radiantly bright."

Correspondent writes: "Don't forget the anniversary service and farewell meeting of Georgia Gladys Cooley at the Independent Church of God, corner 47th street and Grand Boulevard, Sunday, March 25, at 7:30 p. m. The program is varied and interspersed with fine music. Short speeches by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Mrs. Lucinda B. Chandler, Dr. Juliet Severance, Dr. H. C. Cross, messages by Mrs. C. L. Hamilton of St. Louis, Mrs. Belle Weakley, late of Omaha, Mrs. Hannah Lichtig, Georgia Gladys Cooley, Mrs. A. C. Cowan and others. An original poem written for the occasion is to be given by Mrs. Siebold. The lecture at the evening service will be given by Mrs. Cooley. Be on hand promptly as we wish to open the afternoon meeting at 2:30 o'clock sharp. Those who are invited to bring their lunch and dine with us will be to a happy family together. While preparing your luncheon it will be well to put in an extra bite, for should there be any one present from out of the city who has failed to provide for themselves or anyone not having learned our plans, we will be able to make them welcome guests."

W. P. Clifford writes from Ironton, Iowa: "I have been an investigator of spiritual phenomena since 1873. I have paid out a great many dollars in investigating, and found many frauds, which at times almost discouraged me. However I was continually impressed to keep on seeking and investigating, and I have done so for many years. I finally formed a home circle, sitting weekly for almost two years, with the desire that we should have the best of influences in our home, and be made better by our spiritual friends, so that we might do all the good we could for the elevation of humanity. Our home circle has been a grand success, and of much solace and support to us. While at Joplin, Mo., a few weeks ago we had the pleasure of attending the South Joplin Spiritual Research Church, under the management of strong and earnest workers. The services were conducted by Dr. J. R. Brown, Mrs. Sara Sovell of Galena, and C. M. Fann. The services were splendid. All is harmonious at Joplin in the spiritual ranks."

Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie, whose lectures are always of a high order, will be with Brother Grimshaw's society in St. Louis, Mo., April 1 and 2, when they hold anniversary services. She is to address the Chicago League April 4, and will be glad to hear from Ohio or Michigan societies for May and June. She has some dates in those states at that time, and a few there are still open. Address her at 4227 Berkley avenue, Chicago, Ill., care of Mrs. Field.

Mrs. Bushnell Donnelly writes from Sumnerland, Cal.: "In your second volume of The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, you speak of Rev. William Tennent's escape from Fane Grove. 'It was my mother's grandfather. All the particulars are not quite correct, yet in the main they are true. Believe me most happy in a visit from my cousin, Mrs. Dilla Cone Beals. Her words were, as she promised, 'Rose, it is as we thought, and I am happy beyond all expectations with my guests. My wife was not on her way to anything spiritual. It happened to put my hand to my head and closed my eyes for a moment, and I saw into another room, as it were. I saw her and heard those words: 'My soul went out to her. G. Love and thanks. Her coming settled the question that there is no death.'"

OCCANDIDES.—Occandides is a psychological narrative by Carlyle Petersilea, author of The Discovers Country. This book deals with the question of soul mates, or of the completed ego. It is intensely interesting. Price, paper cover, 50 cts.

After a long life's journey death has claimed John D. Munger of Macomb, Ill. On Monday, March 12, he was taken to the hospital, where a difficult surgical operation was performed. For years Mr. Munger has been a firm believer in spirit return. He had built a fine hall with the intention of having lectures in his town. Mrs. G. G. Cooley was to have dedicated it on April 22. She will now say the last words in it over the form of its noble founder on Thursday, March 22. Mr. Munger would have been 82 years of age in April.

Brother Cole writes from Black River Falls, Wis.: "The corporals of Spiritualists here have enjoyed for a few days lectures from W. J. Burrows on the philosophy of Spiritualism, and tests and trance lectures from Mrs. A. Coffman, each doing the work in a satisfactory manner. Mr. Erwood has been with us at several different times and is always welcomed. Mrs. Coffman was a stranger, and remained in my home while here. Outside of her platform work she has made quite a few happy. Both are earnest and hard workers, and have the best regards and wishes of us all in their endeavors to build for Truth."

Mrs. O. Fonda of Independence, Iowa, has many book numbers of The Progressive Thinker, which she will send to anyone who feels able to pay postage thereon.

R. Mitchell writes: "The Spiritualist Society, Students of Nature, had an interesting meeting, Sunday evening at North Robey street and Milwaukee avenue. The pastor and assistant, Dr. L. C. Koehler, gave an educational lecture followed by the vice-president of I. S. S. A., Mrs. E. J. S. S. S. McIntyre, who has been a member of the society since 1891, and has been a flower social was held at Sister McIntyre's parlors for the benefit of the order of Hephzibah, which is an auxiliary to the society Students of Nature. We thank all attendants for the kindness."

Church of Spiritual Forces meets every Sunday evening at 8 o'clock, 4400 Good speaking, tests and music. Kenwood Hall 4308 Cottage Grove avenue.

President H. D. Barrett has been creating great interest in Kansas. His lectures are enthusiastically received.

Mrs. N. O'Neill writes: "The Spiritualist Society of Clear Lake was held March 13, 14 and 15, by Max Hoffman, of Des Moines, Iowa. His lectures were most convincing, and were appreciated by all present. He leaves directly for Goodell where he has an engagement, and very soon for Galveston, Texas, his second engagement there. We desire to thank our good friends, the Spiritualists of Mason City, for their presence here, and loyal support."

Maggie Hilly writes: "At Spiritualist Mission Chapel (Old 77) in the afternoon we had fine conditions. In the evening we had a very short lecture, but to the point. At the close there was a recitation by Little Miss Leena McAvoy, entitled 'My Shadows.' It was followed by spirit messages by the many visiting mediums. We surely had a spiritual feast, and we extend our heartfelt thanks to the willing workers who took part in the meetings. The messages were all satisfactory. All are welcome at our meetings both afternoon and evening."

Mary B. Hill writes: "March 15, 1906, was an unusually interesting day with the members and friends of the Band of Harmony, but the crowning of our afternoon session came when Mrs. Richmond and her inspired voice gave a most beautiful and well-earned tribute to the 'Grand Old Woman,' who had recently passed on, Miss Susan B. Anthony. With a clear understanding of the pioneer work of our American heroines, we were all moved by the noble and heroic life of our country. It was an early day, in our reform work, on any advanced idea or progressive thought, none knows better the courage it required than does Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond. Miss Anthony having been on the Spiritualist platform where Mr. and Mrs. Richmond have been, both had an opportunity to meet her personally, and did so. Mrs. Lucinda B. Chandler, each being alike interested in all reform work, and none could pay tribute better than they, and the friends who were present will long remember the spirit of sisterhood which prevailed on that occasion."

"Mrs. J. Sowerby, secretary of Psychic Circle of Grand Rapids, Mich., writes: 'Our society meets every Wednesday afternoon. We are having a good attendance, and are very interesting, meetings and are prospering. We recently had the pleasure of having Mrs. Amanda Coffman, our talented and I have done so for many years. I finally formed a home circle, sitting weekly for almost two years, with the desire that we should have the best of influences in our home, and be made better by our spiritual friends, so that we might do all the good we could for the elevation of humanity. MARY ANN CAREW, Wife, Mother, Spirit and Angel. By Carlyle Petersilea.

This most beautiful story of the experience of a young wife and mother taken from her home on earth to her home in the spirit world, is told in such a realistic way, that one is carried away with the sweet beauty and naturalness of it. It makes the other world appear very near to us. This book has been a great comfort to many weary hearts who have lost mother, wife or babies. Price, neatly bound in cloth, $1.

THE ANNUAL CONVENTION Of the Ohio State Spiritualists Association Will Be Held Friday, Saturday and Sunday, May 25, 26 and 27, 1906, at the First Spiritualists Temple, Fullerton Street, Cleveland, O.

SHAGREN SCHOOL OF MAGIC.

It Is Not What It Is Claimed to Be.

To the Editor:—I have just come across your kind letter of July 25, 1905, in which you gave me the address of the Shagren School of Magic, with the request that I communicate you the result of my correspondence with them. I sent for a trick which they claimed was used by Anna Eva Fay, in which the operator makes a handkerchief borrowed from the audience do some very wonderful things, such as lie down, walk about the stage, bow to the owner, etc.

I have seen Miss Fay do all this, and more, with a handkerchief, but it certainly was not done in the way the Shagren School describes, so that my efforts to get some good trick from them was an entire failure.

The Shagren idea is to have a helper on each side of the stage operating a black thread. You tie the knot in the handkerchief, and at the same time tie the thread in the knot, and of course the operators obey your commands to the handkerchief.

Miss Fay, on the other hand, walks out among the audience, and the handkerchief follows at her command. It doesn't always have a knot in it. One lady sitting close to the writer in one of Miss Fay's entertainments, loaned her handkerchief, and when it was returned to her it was so full of electricity that it would not remain on her lap, but kept moving around until it finally fell on the floor. The lady called the attention of several persons sitting near her to the continued queer conduct of her handkerchief. When being the case I have little faith in the alleged school of magic."

Anniversary Celebration of the German Spiritualist.

Under the auspices of the Searchers' Publishing Company of Chicago, a strong association of many German Spiritualists, organized to unite the German speaking Spiritualists of this country, will celebrate the 58th anniversary of Modern Spiritualism on Sunday, March 25, 1906, at Flynn Hall, 461 W. North avenue, corner Robey street, Chicago, commencing at 2:30 p. m. sharp.

One of their foremost and best known writers and excellent speakers, Dr. George von Langsdorff, a prominent retired physician of Germany and America, will deliver the opening address, followed by Max Getzke, editor of "Lichtstrahlen," the German Spiritualist paper, and Miss Ida von Langsdorff. Messages will be given by Mrs. Anna Dodge, message bearer of Lichtstrahlen, and by Mrs. Marie Patschke, Mrs. C. Schwann, Mr. Frank Joseph, Mrs. Marie Obrock, Mrs. Bertha Zander, Mrs. Annie Schirmer and others. Messages will be given in German and English. An excellent musical programme will be rendered. All are welcome.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

It Is Directed to the Spiritualists of Iowa—Charges Preferred Against the State Association.

Since writing my last item of our appointment as missionaries for the State Spiritualist Association of Iowa, I learned that charges have been filed against the S. S. A. of Iowa, and Mrs. Noyes and I will not work as missionaries for that association until all disputes are settled satisfactorily to work as S. S. A. We will continue to work as field workers for the cause in Iowa.

Letter From a Kansas Worker. To the Editor:—"The death of Sister Nancy Coles of Weir City, Kansas, has cast a gloom over this vicinity, but our hearts are rejoiced that she was a faithful Spiritualist to the end. She died as she had lived, doing and counseling good. The Pittsburgh society owes much to her for her devoted efforts in their behalf."

This society holds local meetings three Sundays in the month with myself to hold service the first Sunday in each month. The society has arranged for a two weeks' meeting commencing next Monday night. The Sunday night service will be a considerable enthusiasm and the friends yielded to the wishes of the public, and arranged for every night. Bro. Harrison D. Barrett was there a few weeks ago and all were delighted with his lecture and hope for his speedy return.

D. Wesley Travers and two sons, of New York City are at Galena, and will assist in organizing a society. My engagements are such that it will necessitate a Sunday afternoon service, but even this will be a start toward a church edifice. There is also a movement on foot to establish a school of astrology under the auspices of our charter, with D. W. Dunkin, city surveyor of Galena, as the teacher. Mr. Dunkin is well qualified to educate in this branch of psychic development, possessing as he does the power of clairvoyance, physical manifestations added to his knowledge of the science of astrology.

At the local meeting at Joplin Sunday night, Mrs. Cyrus Paul gave some remarkable psychometric readings and received deserved praise for the same. The lecture by Dr. Brown was one which touched all with its pathos and practical application of our teachings. I trust The Progressive Thinker may never cease to wave.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Since returning to Canton from Western Ohio, where I was called to officiate at a funeral of a life-long Spiritualist, I have, between the friends of Canton and Massillon, been kept quite busy. The deceased was a brother to whom I refer in Mr. Benjamin Southworth who resided about five miles from Delphos, Ohio. Brother Southworth passed to spirit life from his late home, Feb. 13, his funeral taking place on the 15th. He has been a Spiritualist for years and was devoted to the cause of Spiritualism. He was born in Clark county, Ohio, near Springfield, Jan. 28, 1823, but came to Allen county when 8 years of age. He was married to Elizabeth Sakemiller in the year 1849. He is survived by his wife and three children, two children having preceded him to the spirit side of life. He was a veteran of the Civil War, having served three years in the army, and was honored and respected by all who knew him.

MRS. NINA D. CHALLENGE, Canton, Ohio.

The transition of John Stillwell of Port Huron, Mich., occurred March 6. He was a thorough Spiritualist and psychic. This was a very falling comfort to him through the torture of six years of suffering, caused by a fall, and consoling his wife, Mary Stillwell, with the knowledge of re-union. Dr. Julia M. Walton gave the funeral address, March 9.

Passed to the higher life, March 4, 1906, at Madison, Maine, Flavilla Abey, wife of Henry J. Abey, aged 74 years.

MRS. LENA M. JONES, South Windsor, Conn.

Passed to spirit life from the home of her daughter, Mrs. Martha Laing, East Otto, N. Y., Feb. 23, 1906, Mrs. Sally Eddy, aged 83 years, who had been a widow nearly fifty years. She was reared a Methodist. After marrying my father she joined with him the Universalists. That was not broad enough, for the writer well remembers the seances held in the home prior to father's passing away, May 14, 1856.

Faithful till the last. Her children reverence her memory. Rev. Cephus B. Lynn, Universalist, officiated at the funeral. Never was the philosophy of Spiritualism more clearly defined.

MRS. RUTH EASTMAN, Mancelona, Mich.

Passed to spirit life, Mrs. W. J. Piehl, of Marion, Wis. She was at the home of her brother, Mr. Ervin Hemmenway, of Carter, Wis., at the time of her departure from the mortal form. She was an ardent Spiritualist and looked upon death as but the passing from one room to another. Her absence is mourned by her many friends and by a husband and three daughters and several sons. Services were conducted in the Methodist Church at Marion by the writer.

WILL J. ERWOOD.

Mrs. Julia (Danforth) Paul passed to spirit life at Joplin, Mo., March 11, 1906, aged 85. She loved the Spiritual cause, and loved to sit in the circles conducted by her daughter, Mrs. Fannie Paul, a well known medium of Joplin. The Danforth family of which she was a member dated their family back over two hundred years. Rev. Sara C. Sovell conducted the services at 8 a. m., March 12.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.
Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to brevity. Books have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby as terse, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and there is an unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will be omitted. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

E. N. Beecher, Cleveland: Q. In your book, "Mediumship and Its Laws," it is said that spirits materialize to the extent of being apparent objects, reflecting light, but materialization to the extent of formation of bones, muscles, etc., is impossible. What do you mean by this passage?

A. I understand the writer of this passage in "Mediumship" to mean exactly what is stated. It was written before the flood of exposures had been made, all of which confirm its truthfulness. Attention was first called to this phase of manifestation by "etherization," which cannot be simulated or counterfeited. The "materializations" which imitate it with the aid of a cabinet and darkness, are the most easily performed tricks of fakirs, and there has not been a single instance of these "bone and muscle" spirits that has not been exposed. This conclusion may well be reached unflinchingly. These bungling "materializations" that make the floor creak and press down the scales with their avoidances may be wonderful manifestations, but they do not belong to Spiritualism, but to mountebanks, like Kellar and Herrmann. They have been a prolific source of disgrace to the cause, and have been accepted, when made no attempt worthy the name, to guard against deception.

There are higher forms of etherization possible, even to the full visibility of the spirit form, and use of voice, or power to produce sound. This is as possible in a mild light, as in total darkness. These have been seen in the seances given by D. D. Home, in lighted parlors. Mr. John C. Bundy, while sitting at his library table with Henry Slade, saw a spirit form enter the room and come up under the chandelier. "It is in this form all the recorded appearances of spirits in the past have been recognized. The investigation phenomena, no manifestations have been given with less safeguards against, or more complete preparations for deception. What is now demanded is perfect test conditions surrounding every manifestation. Then there could be no doubt, and the result would have value. I have not the least doubt about a residuum remaining after the most careful tests, and that residuum would be more valuable.

Elizabeth S. Buchanan: Q. Is it just and humane to protect ourselves, while permitting another to be sacrificed, unless we have given them warning, and opportunity for self-protection?

A. The full meaning of the writer is difficult to clearly determine. If she means the right of self-defense, we regard it just and humane for every one to protect himself and unless he is a moral as well as physical coward he will do so. If a man is attacked by a ruffian, he is justified in defending himself in any way he can. Such self-defense is not a moral code to give warning that he will do so. Self-protection is the first consideration. The warning rests with the attacker. He is not making a sacrifice for us, but for himself.

It is entirely different, if we allow others to, at their own cost, sacrifice themselves for such ends. Such self-devotion is the noblest trait of human nature, and when received with the same returning devotion, carries the selfish relations of earth into the sublime realizations of spiritual life.

The doctrine of abject submission to evil; of turning the other cheek to the brute who smites you, is that of the weakling and the slave. The purest life, the highest principles, are powerless, unless backed by resistance, in the midst of selfishness. The truth has in the world's history gone down in ignominy, countless times, before the brute strength of tyrannous wrong.

Peace may be desirable above all things, but peace can only be maintained under present conditions. The wild beasts are not restrained by moral suasion, and the wild beast, the lingering remains of the tiger and wolf, inherited from the primeval man, is no more subdued by gentleness. The exalted principles of morality are comprehended by the lower stratum of mankind, as dimly as by the brutes above which they scarcely rise.

History furnishes not one example where "non-resistance" has conquered opposing evil. The laudation of the peace policy of Penn is one of the most baseless fictions of history. In his case it resulted in the extermination of the Indians and in the branch through off Canadian tribes in Ohio, the converted Indian tribe trusting in non-resistance were ruthlessly massacred. Civilization, the triumph of right over wrong; of the spiritual over the brutal, paradoxical as it seems, was made possible by the superiority of the means of defense, by which the gains in that direction were preserved; against the antagonistic but more poorly armed surrounding barbarians. Had Rome been armed with rifles, cannon and galling guns, the Northern hordes would not have overrun the fair fields of Italy. Because the sword, the bow and spear were opposed to the same weapons in stronger hands, her world-power was destroyed.

L. B. Lyman: Q. A distinguished Agnostic is credited with making this statement: regarding man in nature: "Nature has neither pity nor hatred; her forces act without the slightest regard for man; she produces without intention, and destroys without regret." Is that the lesson of nature to mankind?

A. It is not true that the winds are tempered to the shorn lamb, or the weakling cared for by the remorseless elements. The migrating birds allured by unseasonable warmth to the North, are frozen in the drifts of snow, or starved. The flowers which are pushed into bloom by the warmth, are blighted by the frosts. The hopes of the orchardist, the labor of years, is blasted in an hour. If man builds his cities around the base of volcanoes, they at any time may destroy him. Vesuvius and Mt. Pelee are not held in leash by the thoughtful people who venture their habitations on their slopes. The torrid wrecks the labor of years, and rebuilding proceeds with the dumb complacency which seems to accept destruction as of the same value as growth.

Nor in animals is there mercy, right, justice. The strong feed on the weak. There are claws to hold, and fangs to tear. Mercy would mean salvation to the whole race of flesh-eaters.

The universe is governed by law; by fixed and unchanging rules, and everything proceeds with the certainty of a machine. At times causes running to their effects interfere with each other, as in storms, but equilibrium is soon regained.

Pity, charity, mercy, justice, love, are not manifested in nature, until moral intuition reaches the mind of man. They are strictly human qualities. This is a proposition so clear and axiomatic, it scarcely requires argumentative support.

As for "intention" a purpose and plan revealed by the phenomena of the world, the other matter, and demands profound consideration. If we confine our view to the narrow bounds of antagonisms, we are confused and dismayed by the seeming blindness of the forces which surround us, and their purposeless activity. If, however, we seek higher grounds, where we can overlook the widest horizon, we shall find that this antagonism is an important factor in advancement. When the series of living forms from the protoplasmic cell of the beginning through the eons of the geological ages to the present is reviewed, an "intention" is everywhere apparent. As the fin of the fish was a prophecy of the hand of man, so the blind and groping and groping attraction of animals presaged the blossoming of love in the human being.

In the realm of nature, from the lowest being to spiritual man, is a never-ceasing conflict, to the death struggle of brute force against brute force. Might prevails. The strong fatten on the weak, and the "fittest" live and prosper. Among savages, this conflict grows more intense; more merciless and cruel with the gaining of cunning by the dawning intelligence. When the savage, with increasing intelligence and morality, becomes civilized, a new order is introduced. Right is substituted for might, and love takes the place of hate. It is the dawn of the spiritual kingdom.

When an animal becomes weak from disease, it falls behind the herd that leaves it without concern, or with some species, it is gored or trampled to death. Savages kill the disabled, who cannot contribute to the common support. In the dawn of the spiritual faculties in man, this reign of brute force was reversed. The weak were protected by the strength of the strong. Self-devotion was prized more than self-assertion. Charity came in place of hate and indifference.

The spiritual man evolved from the animal man, and evolution from a new point of departure began the task of perfecting a spiritual being, the realization of the angel, and elimination of the beast.

WHY CALL ME BACK?

[Response to Rose Bushnell Donnell's poem, by her friend, "spirit" Lizzie Come Beals.]

Why call me back from scenes of rest
My eyes behold on every side
And mingling with the loved ones
Once more, I see them all.

'Neath healing palms and glades of peace,
I bask in heaven's sun-kissed smiles,
And pain and sorrow forever cease
My earthly life no more beguiles.

This one lesson I would teach
All earth's children sick with fear,
That within the mortal soul of each,
In God's sight all are dear.

None should fear the great divide,
For it is but a little stream,
And as you reach the other side
The past seems a troubled dream.

You have asked me what I saw
As I reached the other shore,
And obedient to love's magic law
I relate to you what I over.

To my soul's expectant view,
All was beautiful and grand,
And in strength I quickly grew,
Touched by some magic wand.

Oh, it was a joyous upward call,
When my spirit found release,
When sweet silence brooded over all,
In an atmosphere of peace;

And the pangs of anguish fled,
As my soul rose in power,
Then I knew I was not dead,
But had found my spirit dower.

Call not spirits back to earth,
O ye mortals weak with pride,
For the soul's immortal birth
Is a door that opens wide.

Through earth's fog and mists and fen,
On the wings of joy I bring
An answer to your call and pen,
I will hear you when you ring.

"Materialization." By Mme. B. d'Esperance and Rev. B. F. Austin. Excellent. Price 10 cents.

"A Strange World This."

"Cannot the world learn that the true way to serve God is in working for humanity? Cannot the church learn that the highest service one can render unto the Infinite is in loving service unto humanity, and not in wordy prayers and vain petitions; not in outward forms and ceremonies, in rituals and repetitions, not in costly show or spacious temples. 'Pure and undefiled religion before God and the Father is to visit the widow and fatherless in their affliction,' and keep yourselves unspotted from the world," or, in other words, be good and do good."

"A STRANGE WORLD THIS."

Its Religious Conditions Pointed Out and Most Skillfully Analyzed by a Master Mind.

A strange world this, to be sure, and the deeper one thinks and the more one studies into things the stranger it seems. We have in this city an institution known as Christianity, with twenty-five or thirty branches, or churches, and in the world there are thousands upon thousands of other branches of the same kind, and in all these churches the claim is made and the teaching is emphasized that an all-wise, all-good, all-powerful, all-merciful, all-just God rules the world, and this God is represented as a person—a man.

This great institution of Christianity teaches that this God made all things—spoke all things into being. Had His own way in the manufacture of everything he created; there were none to dispute His right to have created a true and noble humanity. There were none to dispute His right to have created a mankind in which humanitarianism would have been a cardinal trait of his character. There were none to dispute his right to have created humanity pure and clean and upright and true, for surely an all-powerful God could have created a sinless humanity just as readily as he could have fashioned sinful humanity. This institution has held away nearly two thousand years and claims to have within its system all truth, all revelation, all inspiration. It claims to be the "only system" through which humanity can be saved from sin and wrong; it claims to have the sanction and power of Almighty God behind it. And let the world be emphasized.

Almighty means all-powerful. THEN WILL COME THE EXPLOSION. WHAT STANDS IN THE WAY OF THIS ALMIGHTY GOD, EVEN AT THIS LATE DAY, TRANSFORMING SINFUL HUMANITY INTO SINLESS BEINGS AT HIS FIAT IN THE TWINKLING OF AN EYE?

Any good man or woman that had love for humanity and that hated wrong, that recoiled at cruelty and that deplored the degrading influence of poverty, that sympathized with suffering—any such human person, if they had power, would change present conditions at once—would make all humanity loving, kind and good.

After nineteen hundred years of teaching by a system that claims to be the "Way of the Truth and the Light," what a picture is revealed to us! Look at the awful condition of Christian countries. Behold Christian Russia in the throes of revolution, with oppression and tyranny and degrading poverty and ignorance, with the fiercest cruelty and barbarism rampant everywhere. Behold Christian Spain and Italy with their terrible conditions of poverty and military despotism; of squalor and ignorance and poverty on the one hand and enormous wealth of church on the other. Look at Christian England with its pomp and pride and splendor and power of church and state; its royal reveling and its vast wealth and the great mass of people that support all this splendor of gaudy show living in poverty, working for a mere pittance with no opportunity to rise from their condition of servitude; with pauperism and insanity constantly on the increase.

And then look at our own great country. What a religious and tolerated here, the Christian religion is the dominant one, and this country is claimed to be Christian. And what have we confronting us as a people? Corruption everywhere! Fraud, deception, intrigue, thieving, crookedness on every hand, in high places and in low places, and the vilest and the most heinous of crimes. In our domestic animals are subjected to the most terrible torture until merciful death puts an end to their sufferings; with cruelty to children, with abuse to wives, with cruelty to animals coming in as reports from every quarter; with the hunting down and shooting of our wild animals in the name of sport, with the chief executive of this great nation taking the lead—with all this, and much more that could be cited, surely we have our full share of barbarity.

And then as a nation we have other methods or refined cruelty under the name of food adulteration. Indeed, to such an extent has this process been carried on that adulteration of food products is now claimed as one of the "fine arts" of our Christian civilization. At the present time a great hue and cry is being raised about the "Beef Trust," and to the shame of this people is allowed to exist; but it is with us, and charged with poisoning and adulterating processes, with selling diseased meats and using the carcasses of dead animals dressed up nice for the market.

And really, kind reader, is not the gigantic beef trust carrying out a portion of Christian or Bible teaching? In Deut. xv:21 we read: "Ye shall not eat of any thing that dieth of itself; thou shalt give it unto the stranger that is in thy gates that he may eat it; or, thou mayest sell it unto an alien; for thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God." Maybe after all the Beef Trust ought not to be censured.

Again, another sad picture that presents itself upon the canvas of our life, that drunkenness is prevalent in all Christian countries. "And, oh," the awful misery and woe that flows from this one sin. And a sadder picture is that the Christian church uses "strong drink" in one of its claimed sacred symbols.

Another side of the picture of Christian America tells the story through statistics, that crime, insanity and suicide are steadily on the increase.

And really when we study and read the history of the world, at the present state of things, for by its own claim the very foundation of Christianity rests on crime—on cruelty, torture, murder, barbarism and blood; and it is claimed, too, that only through this method could an all-powerful, all-wise, all-merciful God save the world. "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin." And, oh, the horror of it! In the name of God what does it all mean? Look at the millions and billions of money piled high in fashionable churches throughout Christendom, much of it wrung from the poor, and then contrast the awful poverty that festers and fester and breeds vice, crime and misery. It is said that in one of the Russian cathedrals at St. Petersburg the word "Almighty" blazes in diamonds from a cloud of beaten gold, under which are solid silver doors twenty feet high, this alone representing wealth enough to have lifted hundreds, even thousands of people out of poverty and degradation.

And what cares Almighty God for all this gaudy show and splendor? What cares this mighty power that could call into being, embody and sustain this wondrous universe of things, for the vain pomp and pride and glitter of tawdry display? Will he will humanity awaken from the awful nightmare of an angry God for whom all this hollow mockery of pageantry must needs be, to enhance His glory or to appease His wrath? When will ministers awake to the true needs of humanity? When will the clergy learn that candor, honesty, truthfulness, integrity, kindness, and love are the true needs of humanity? Will they instead of servile devotion to God as expressed in outward forms and ritual, or the adherence to any particular creed of church or institution.

True manhood and noble womanhood towers infinitely above any or every religious creed or dogma ever dreamed of by the fakir, mountebank, or than an "faith" or "belief" that ever had birth in the feeble brain of the theologian, priest or pope.

In this city at the present time a great revival of religion is in progress. Noted "revivalists" are among us working up the enthusiasm, and if the time and money and energy expended in such effort everywhere would result in purifying the moral atmosphere of the community, if it would broaden and deepen and quicken the spiritual perception; if it would raise higher the ethical standard of life; if it would rid the community of low-down vice and high-up debauchery; if it would lift the moral door of the brother; if it would debase the saloon with its terrible influence for evil; if it would clear the political horizon of the dark clouds of infamy that hang over it; if it would cleanse governmental corruption; if it would help wipe out poverty—then how gladly would all good people aid the movement.

But alas, the tide of sin and wrong sweeps on as before. Of course those engaged in the "evangelistic" business are benefited financially, and the churches represented here in the movement (sixteen in number, I believe) will be the gainers in numbers and their strength and power increased, but the sad and sad conditions of the world will remain all unprogressed.

Again, if the meetings now in progress could become a school of instruction along the line of practical questions that confront us pertaining to human betterment; if the doctrine of "regeneration" could be laid quietly in such effort everywhere would result in purifying the moral atmosphere of the community, if it would broaden and deepen and quicken the spiritual perception; if it would raise higher the ethical standard of life; if it would rid the community of low-down vice and high-up debauchery; if it would lift the moral door of the brother; if it would debase the saloon with its terrible influence for evil; if it would clear the political horizon of the dark clouds of infamy that hang over it; if it would cleanse governmental corruption; if it would help wipe out poverty—then how gladly would all good people aid the movement.

Cannot the church learn that the true way to serve God is in working for humanity? Cannot the church learn that the highest service one can render unto the Infinite is in loving service unto humanity, and not in wordy prayers and vain petitions; not in outward forms and ceremonies, in rituals and repetitions, not in costly show or spacious temples. "Pure and undefiled religion before God and the Father is to visit the widow and fatherless in their affliction," and keep yourselves unspotted from the world," or, in other words, be good and do good.

How simple, then, to be religious, and yet how complicated is the machinery of that great religious institution known as Christianity. How strange it all seems, in the name of humanity, what does it all mean? Will not the evangelists here give us light on the strange situation? People who think and study and reason (and there are many such in Jamestown) are in the "fog" regarding the matter. Will not Reverends Ostrander and Elliott or some of the noted clergymen clear the atmosphere? Indeed, is it not the duty of those who pose as religious teachers to enlighten those in darkness? Gentlemen, give us a clear, rational, reasonable, philosophical, scientific exposition of the religious enigmas.

"Success and How to Win It." A

THE DIVIDING LINE.

No Flesh and Blood Materialization in the Dark Cabinet Is Possible, She Claims.

To the Editor:—I am glad that you are trying to stir up Spiritualism and out what is truth in regard to the power of spirits to do what to the mortal is impossible; to find the dividing line between fraudulent or mundane operations and the genuine or mediumistic power.

I am sure as Mrs. Cassell says that business matter cannot pass into the spiritual world, and that no "FLESH AND BLOOD" materialization in the dark cabinet can be possible. I also think no trickster under the name of medium should be allowed to continue to deceive the people. I am glad this great wrong is about to be ventilated and if possible wiped out. All thanks to you for leading the crusade against fraud in mediumship. I have no fear of "hurting the cause," as some think; truth cannot be hurt, while right and justice through progress will ultimately prevail.

We as students of the occult know but little of the law which we see operated in genuine physical mediumship, and while we are condemning the trickster we should be careful not to deny the real, the true phenomena that do occur. There is the fact of levitation. As reported D. D. Home was taken out one window of a second story room and returned through another in plain view of many witnesses.

One of the Davenport brothers was taken across the country and set down in a field where the snow was several inches deep, with no tracks to show of his coming—only of his going.

A. J. Davis was carried several miles, as his writings testify by spirit power.

I remember our beloved sister of long memory, Mrs. F. O. Hyzer, told of a young man, and that a "FLESH AND BLOOD" materialization in the dark cabinet was there. The lights were put out while the physical phenomena were taking place, and when the light were brought in the medium was gone, and a search instituted. He was found lying between the straw and feather beds in a room where the people who came to the circle had lain their wraps, and the bed covered no sign of having been disturbed or disarranged. She said the boy was troubled to know whether he passed through the door or the door passed through him. She also told of the same person being at the station when a party of his friends were going to another town or city to a picnic or celebration. They urged him to go with them, but he laughingly bid them good-bye when the train moved out. He was on the platform to receive them when they arrived at their destination. The spirits had carried him there, Mrs. F. O. Hyzer believed.

Now I will tell of something marvelous that occurred in this house where I am writing, but before I become an inmate of the same. My husband and family were the witnesses. The hired girl was the medium. As she was washing the dishes in the evening in the room above, the spirits were making a noise with some loose boards on a box. Mr. R. asked questions which were answered by the intelligences who manipulated the board. After the work was done they all went into the other room for a circle, and as the lights were about to be taken out, the young lady medium said to Lulu, the daughter, six years of age: "Come here. I am afraid to sit alone. Come and sit on my lap." As soon as the room was in darkness the lights were lifted from the chair to the ceiling and dropped to the floor. Of course the girls screamed and laughed, but as the act was repeated several times Lulu grew to like it, and as she touched the ceiling with her head and hands, cried out, "Up in a balloon, boys." I have heard this so often and by so many told, including Lulu, that I cannot doubt it. There was no crowd and no money to pay, and nothing to suggest fraud.

There were many more wonderful physical manifestations, such as rope-tying and untying, floating of guitar while playing. I know there are genuine independent voices, as I had the opportunity to know at the time of the first National Convention of Spiritualists, held at Cleveland, Ohio, where I saw many of the then prominent workers—A. J. Davis, Henry T. Childs, George Bacon, E. V. Wilson, Moses Hull, Dr. Underhill, Juliet H. Stillman and a host of others. I tied the young woman medium several times, and the truth was securely closed and hands tied to the chair legs, and as soon as the lights were out a heavy voice spoke, and even sang "Poor Dog Tray," in a clear high tone, which was impossible for the medium to do. The invisible friends must have materialized vocal organs to use. We cannot tell how, but perhaps Bro. Leachester knows, as he is said to have materialized a body for the spirit of his nephew who set the broken limb for the boy who had an accident on the mountain side. Brother L. and the nephew both left their physical bodies to perform this humane act, but the younger person had to be materialized to come into physical contact with the boy to help him, and when he saw his shining garment, he said, "Be you an angel?" He replied, "No, I am only a boy come to help you." If this is a real fact, we have much to learn of the laws of the higher science. I feel that in weeding out the spurious we should not forget the genuine.

While I am on this theme, let me tell of an incident that occurred a few years ago. There had been a materializing medium near our door at a camp-meeting several seasons, who did a good business at a dollar a head, two or more evenings a week, with about twenty sitters. She invited our little girl to sit in the first evening of the season. In the morning I asked them what they thought of the seance, and they said, "Why, Trixy was Mrs. A. on her knees." Her manager (a lady) came out with her as far as she came, and then went back with her. She said this so we should not see Mrs. A.'s dress as she was on her knees.

Such things have been allowed too long and we blush to think that the gullible Spiritualists are in great measure to be blamed. Because some things we know are true, we should not lose our reason and good sense and swallow all that comes under the name of Spiritualism.

I know that the knowledge of a conscious future state of existence and our contact with that sphere through mediumship, has come to many who are not unforgotten morally, but are on a plane with the selfish and dishonest. They are our brothers, and we may aid their advancement, but we must not lose sight of the fact that the Spiritualist is to the world, I conclude, however, that the most of the tricksters are not even believers in spirit return.

The Little Pilgrim in the Seas and the Unseen.

As she came forth again comforted, she found the Sage standing with his face lifted to heaven, smiling still at the sound, though faint and distant, of the children all calling to each other and shouting together as they reached the gate. "Oh, hush!" she said; "let not the mother hear them! for it will make her heart bitter to think she can never hear again her child's voice."

"But it is her child's voice," he said; then very gently, "they are to blame; but no one will be found to blame them either in earth or heaven."

The earth pilgrims went far after this, yet more softly than when they first left their beautiful country—for then the little Pilgrim had been glad, believing that as all had been made clear to her in her own life, so that all that concerned the life of man should be made clear; but this was more hard and encompassed with pain and darkness, and that which is in the doing is always more hard to understand than that which is accomplished.

And she learned now what she had not understood, though her companion warned her, how sharp are those thorns of earth that pierce the wayfarer's foot, and that those who come back cannot but suffer because of love and fellow-feeling. And she learned that though she could smile and give thanks to the Father in the recollection of her own griefs that were past, yet those that are present are too poignant, and to look upon others in their hour of darkness makes His ways more hard to comprehend than even when the sorrow is your own.

While she mused thus, there was suddenly revealed to her another sight. They had gone far before they came to this new scene. Night had crept over the skies all gray and dark; and the sea came in with a whisper which sounded to some like the hush of peace, and to some like the voice of sorrow and moaning, and to some was but the monotony of endless recurrence, in which was no soul. The skies were dark overhead, but opened with a clear shining of light which had no color, towards the West—for the sun had long gone down, and it was night.

The two travelers perceived a woman who came out of a house all lit with lamps and firelight, and took the lonely path towards the sea. And the little Pilgrim knew her, as she had known the father and mother in the darkened house, and would have joined her with a cry of pleasure; but she remembered that the friend could not see her or hear her, being wrapped still in the mortal body, and in a close enveloping mantle of thoughts and cares. The Sage made her a sign to follow, and these two tender companions accompanied her who saw them not, walking darkling by the silent way.

The heart of the woman was heavy in her breast. It was so sore by reason of trouble, and for all the bitter wounds of the past, and all the fears that beset her life to come, that she walked, not weeping because of being beyond tears, but as it were bleeding, her thoughts being in her little way like those of His upon whose brow there once stood drops as it were of blood; and out of her heart there came a moaning which was without words.

It words had been possible, they would have been as His also, who said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." For those who had wounded her were those whom in all the world she loved most dear; and the quivering of anguish was in her as she walked, seeking the darkness and the silence, and to hide herself, if that might be, from her own thoughts. She went along the lonely path with the stinging of her wounds so keen and sharp that all her body and soul were as one pain. Greater grief hath no man than this, to be slain and tortured by those whom he loves. When her soul could speak, this was what it said: "Father, forgive them! Father, save them!" She had no strength for more.

This heavenly pilgrim saw—for they stood by her as in their own country, where every thought is clear, and saw her heart. But as they followed her and looked into her soul—with their hearts, which were human, too, wrung at the sight of hers in its anguish—there suddenly became visible before them a strange sight such as they had never seen before. It was like the rising of the sun, but it was not the sun. Suddenly into the heart upon which they looked there came a great silence and calm. There was nothing said that even they could hear, nor done that they could see; but for a moment the throbbing was stilled, and the anguish calmed, and there came a great peace.

The woman in whom this wonder was wrought was astonished, as they were. She gave a low cry in the darkness for wonder that the pain had gone from her in an instant, in the twinkling of an eye. There was no promise made to her that her prayer would be granted, and no new light given to guide her for the time to come; but her pain was taken away. She stood hushed, and lifted her eyes, and the gray of the sea, and the low cloud that was like a canopy above, and the lightning of colorless light towards the west, entered with their great quiet into her heart. "Is this the peace that passeth all understanding?" she said to herself, confused with the sudden calm. In all her life it had never happened to her before—to be healed of her grievous wounds, yet without cause; and while no change was wrought, yet to be put to rest.

"It is our Brother," said the little Pilgrim, shedding tears of joy. "It is the secret of the Lord," said the Sage; but not even they had seen Him passing by.

They walked with her softly in the silence, in the sound of the sea, till the wonder in her was hushed like the pain, and talked with her, though she knew it not. For very soon questions arose in her heart. "And, oh," she said, "is this the Lord's reply?" with thankfulness and awe; but because she was human, and knew so little, and was full of impatience, "Oh, and is this all?" was what she next said. "I asked for them, and Thou hast given to me—then the voice of her heart grew louder, and she cried, with the sound of the pain coming back, "I ask one thing, and Thou givest another. I asked no blessing for them. I asked for them, my Lord, my God! Give it to them—to them!" with disappointment rising in her heart.

The little Pilgrim laid her hand upon the woman's arm,—for she was afraid lest her Lord might be displeased, forgetting (for she was still imperfect) that He sees all that is in the soul, and understands and takes no offense,—and said quickly, "Oh, be not afraid; He will save them, too. The blessing will come for them, too." "At His own time," said the Sage, "and in His own way."

These thoughts rose in the woman's soul. She did not know that they were said to her, nor who said them, but accepted them as if they had come from her own thoughts. For she said to herself, "This is what is meant by the answer of prayer. It is not what we ask; yet what I ask is according to Thy will, my Lord. It is not riches, nor honors, nor beauty, nor health, nor long life, nor anything of this world. If I have been impatient, this is my punishment,—that the Lord has thought, not of them, but of me. But I can bear all, O my Lord! That and a thousand times more, if Thou wilt but think of them and not of me!"

Nevertheless she returned to her home stilled and comforted; for though her trouble returned to her and was not changed, yet for a moment it had been lifted from her, and the peace which passeth all understanding had entered her heart.

"But why, then," said the little Pilgrim to her companion, when the friend was gone, "why will not the Father give to her what she asks? For I know what it is. It is that those whom she loves should love Him and serve Him; and that is His will too, for He would have all love Him, He who loves all."

"Little sister," said her companion, "you asked me why He did not let the child remain upon the earth."

"Ah, but that is different," she cried; "oh, it is different! When you said that the secret was between the child and the Father I knew that it was so; for it is just that the Father should consider us first one by one, and do for us what is best. But it is always best to serve Him. It is best to love Him; it is best to give up all the world and cleave to Him, and follow wherever He goes. No man can say otherwise than this,—that to follow the Lord and serve Him, that is well for all, and always the best!"

She spoke so hotly and hastily that her companion could find no room for reply. But he was in no haste; he waited till she had said what was in her heart. Then he replied, "If it were even so, if the Father heard all prayers, and put forth His hand and forced those who were far off to come near—"

The little Pilgrim looked up with horror in her face, as if he had blasphemed, and said, "Forced! not so; not so!"

"Yet it must be so," he said, "if it is against their desire and will."

"Oh, not so; not so!" she cried, "but that He should change their hearts!"

"Yet that, too, against their will," he said.

The little Pilgrim paused upon the way; and her heart rose against her companion, who spoke things so hard to be received, and that seemed to dishonor the work of the Lord. But she remembered that it could not be so, and paused before she spoke, and looked up at him with eyes that were full of wonder and almost of fear.

"Then must they perish?" she said, "and must her heart break?" and her voice sank low for pity and sorrow. Though she was herself among the blessed, yet the thorns and briars of the earth caught at her garments and pierced her tender feet.

"Little sister," said the Sage, "to us who are born of the earth it is hard to remember that the child belongs not first to the parents, nor the husband to the wife, nor the wife to the husband, but that all are the children of the Father. And He is just; He will not neglect the little one because of those prayers which the father and the mother pour forth to Him, although they cry with anguish and with tears. Nor will He break His great law and violate the nature He has made, and compel His own child to what it wills not and loves not. The woman is comforted in the breaking of her heart; but those whom she loves, are not they also the children of the Father, who loves them more than she does? And each is to Him as if there were not another in the world. Nor is there any other in the world,—for none can come between the Father and the child."

A smile came upon the little Pilgrim's face, yet she trembled. "It is dim before me," she said; "and I cannot see clearly. Oh, if the time would but hasten, that our Lord might come, and all struggles be ended, and the darkness vanish away!"

"He will come when all things are ready," said the Sage; and as they went upon their way he showed her other sights, and the mysteries of the heart of man, and the great patience of our Lord.

It happened to them suddenly to perceive in their way a man returning home. These are words that are sweet to all who have lived upon the earth and known its ways; but far, far were they from that meaning which is sweet. The dark hours had passed, and men had slept; and the night was over. The sun was rising in the sky, which was keen and clear with the pleasure of the morning. The air was fresh with the dew, and the birds were waking in the trees, and the breeze so sweet that it seemed to blow from heaven; and to the two travelers it seemed almost in the joy of the new day as if the Lord had already come.

But here was one who proved that it was not so. He had not slept all the night, nor had he slept at all; his eyes were red with fever and weariness, and his soul was sick within him, and the morning looked him in the face and upbraided him as a sister might have upbraided him, who loved him. And he said in his heart, as one had said of old, that all was vanity; that it was vain to live, and evil to have been born; that the day of death was better than the day of birth, and all was delusion, and love but a word, and life a lie. His footsteps on the road seemed to sound all through the sleeping world; and when he looked the morning in the face he was ashamed, and cursed the light.

The two went after him into a silent house, where everybody slept. The light that had burned for him all night was sick like a guilty thing in the eye of day, and all that had been prepared for his repose was ghastly to him in the hour of waking, as if prepared not for sleep but for death. His heart was sick like the watch-light, and life flickered within him with disgust and disappointment. For why had he been born, if this were all?—for all was vanity. The night and the day had been passed in pleasure, and it was vanity; and now his soul loathed his pleasures, yet he knew that was vanity too, and that next day he would resume them as before. "All was vain,—the morning and the evening, and the spirit of man and the ways of human life. He looked himself in the face and loathed this dream of existence, and knew that it was naught. So much as it had cost to be born, to be fed, and guarded and taught and cared for, and all for this! He said to himself that it was better to die than to live, and never to have been than to be.

As these spectators stood by with much pity and tenderness looking into the weariness and sickness of this soul, there began to be enacted before them a scene such as no man could have seen, which no one was aware of save he who was concerned, and which even to him was not clear in its meanings, but rather like a phantasmagoria, a thing of the mist; yet which was great and solemn as is the council of a king in which great things are debated for the welfare of the nations.

The air seemed in a moment to be full of the sounds of footsteps, and of something more subtle, which the Sage and the Pilgrim knew to be wings; and as they looked, there grew before them the semblance of a court of justice, with accusers and defenders, one. Then was put forth that indictment which he had been making up in his soul against life and against the world; and again another indictment which was against himself. And then the advocates began their pleadings. Voices were there great and eloquent, such as are familiar in the courts above, which sounded forth in the spectators' ears earned as those who plead for life and death.

And these speakers declared "that sin only is vanity; that life is noble and love sweet, and every man made in the image of God, to serve both God and man; and they set forth their reasons before the Judge and showed him mysteries of life and death; and they took up the counter-indictment and proved to him how in all the world he had sought but himself, his own pleasure and profit, his own will, not the will of God, nor even the good desire of humble nature, but only that which pleased his sick fancies and his self-loving heart; and they besought him with a thousand arguments to return and choose again the better way. "Arise," they cried, "thou miserable, and become great; arise, thou vain soul, and become noble. Take thy birthright, Oson, and behold the face of the Father." And there came a whispering of lower voices, very penetrating and sweet, like the voices of women and children, who murmured and cried, "O father! O brother! O love! my child!"

"The man who was the accused, yet who was the Judge, listened; and his heart burned, and a longing arose within him for the face of the Father and the better way. But then there came a clang and clamor of sound on the other side; and voices called out to him as comrade, as lover, as friend, and reminded him of the delights which once had been so sweet to him, and of the freedom he loved; and boasted the right of man to seek what was pleasant and what was sweet, and flouted him as a coward whose aim was to save himself, and scorned him as a believer in old wives' tales and superstitions that men had outgrown. And their voices were so vehement and full of passion that by times they mastered the others, so that it was as if a tempest raged round the soul which sat in the midst, and who was the offender and yet the judge of all. The two spectators watched the conflict, as those who watch the trial upon which hangs a man's life. It seemed to the little Pilgrim that she could not keep silent, and that there were things which she could tell him which no one knew but she. She put her hand upon the arm of the Sage and called to him, "Speak you, speak you! he will hear you; and I, too, will speak, and he will not resist what we say."

But even as she said this, eager and straining against her companion's control, the strangest thing ensued. The man who was set there to judge himself and his life; he who was the criminal, yet august upon his seat, to weigh all and give the decision; he before whom all those great advocates were pleading,—a haze stole over his eyes. He was but a man, and he was weary, and subject to the sway of the little over the great, the moment over the life, which is the condition of man. While, yet, the judgment was not given or the issue decided, while still the pleadings were in his ears, in a moment his head dropped back upon his pillow, and he fell asleep. He slept as a child, as if there was no evil, no conflict, nor danger, nor questions, more than how best to rest when you are weary, in all the world. And straightway all was silent in the place. Those who had been conducting this great cause departed to other courts and tribunals, having done all that was permitted them to do. And the man slept, and when it was noon woke and remembered no more.

The Sage led the little Pilgrim forth in a great confusion, so that she could not speak for wonder. But he said, "This sleep also was from the Father; for the mind of the man was weary, and not able to form a judgment. It is adjourned until a better day." The little Pilgrim hung her head and cried, "I do not understand. Will not the Lord interfere? Will not the Father make it clear to him? Is he the Judge between good and evil? Is it all in his own hand?"

The Sage spoke softly, as if with awe. He said, "This is the burden of our nature, which is not like the angels. There is none in heaven or on earth that can take from him what is his right and great honor among the creatures of God. The Father respects that which He has made. He will force no child of His. And there is no haste with Him; nor has He ever been fathomed among us how long He will wait, or if there is any end. The air is full of the coming and going of those who plead before the sons of men; and sometimes in great misery and trouble there will be a cause won and a judgment recorded which makes the universe rejoice. And in everything at the end it is proved that our Lord's way is the best, and that all can be accomplished in His name."

The little Pilgrim went on her way in silence, knowing that the longing in her heart which was to compel them to come in, like that king who sent to gather his guests from the highways and the hedges, could not be right, since it was not the Father's way, yet confused in her soul, and full of an eager desire to go back and wake that man and tell him all that had been in her heart while she watched him sitting on his judgment seat. But there came recollections that crossed her mind as by breezes of the mist, and she spoke without avail, when she had said all that was in her heart and failed, and done harm with it, and meant to do good. And straightway came upon her that her companion spoke the truth, and that no man can save his brother; but each must sit and hear the pleadings and pronounce that judgment which is for life or death. "But, oh!" she cried, "how long and how bitter it is for those who love them, and must stand by and can give no aid!"

Are We All Immortal?

A Critical and Comprehensive Analysis of the Question.

To the Editor:—No matter how unpalatable a truth, we must accept it.

Now comes Dr. Cross and challenges Dr. Peebles to his proof of the statement that some leading exponents of Spiritualism advocate the doctrine that not all human beings are immortal. This statement is quite likely true, although I do not at this moment feel to mind any such teaching among Spiritualists. Years ago Elizabeth Stuart Phelps broached the same idea in an article published in the Atlantic Monthly, entitled "Spiritual Selection," wherein she applied the doctrine of natural selection, or survival of the fittest, to the spirit of man, and maintained that unless the individual spirit possessed qualities worthy of preservation the law of spiritual selection would not preserve it in the spiritual world, and the individual would become extinct at death.

I also remember to have heard William M. Salter, lecturer for the Chicago Ethical Society, some years ago, in a public address, declare that he saw in reason why the essentially bad should be preserved and perpetuated in a spiritual world, and no doubt the same thought has been expressed by many others.

If we accept Prof. Drummond's doctrine of Natural Law in the Spiritual World, and apply the law of natural selection to the individual, it would seem highly probable that a few mortals would become extinct at death. But the question is, Does the doctrine in either or both the natural and the spiritual world? Herbert Spencer takes issue with Darwin on the sufficiency of natural selection to account for the origin and perpetuation of species, although giving it a certain important influence therein.

There is, says the former, a law of heredity which is needed to assume an existing in order to more fully explain the origin and perpetuation of species. Here, then, is standing ground for the Spiritualist of naturalistic tendencies to maintain that all souls continue to live in a spiritual realm after the death of the body, that there are inherited faculties, that the spiritual nature of sufficient vitality to bridge the chasm, and this without reference to moral quality.

It is, or exists, a false evidence that it is in great measure in harmony with its environment, and thus far good. That the environment may be imperfect is no fault of the individual. When there is inharmoniousness between the individual and his environment, one of two things is true, either the individual is better than his environment, or his environment is better than he. If the former, the object of nature can only be attained by a change of environment.

As nature's laws and operations have some purpose and meaning, the improvement of the individual and his environment can only be reconciled by the assumption of a higher and more adaptive environment for such individual. Such environment we possibly, and probably, have in a spiritual realm; the question being, in what measure the superiority of man consist in should happen along in April before even the blossoms appeared, and because it had not ripe fruit or a showy course and kill it, you would probably have him arrested and fined. If he should compel you to go with him a mile, would you voluntarily go another mile? What Christian, even among clergymen, taking no thought for the morrow? If all followed this injunction they would all starve.

What or who is a familiar spirit? Christians talk to God as if He were quite familiar. Was Samuel a familiar spirit? He was a prophet, honored and loved by all the people; and his post-mortem prophecy brought the medium of Endor was fulfilled. He was at least truthful, and had been a bad man would all Israel have mourned when he died? Is such a spirit entitled to be called a devil?

Spiritualists do not call spirits up. They are already up. But no medium can command them.

It is never safe to follow human authority, ancient or modern, when reason and moral sense rebels. Chas. Freeman was a devout Christian. He believed every word of the Bible as divine authority. Abraham was his ideal of faith. He thought God called him to sacrifice his daughter, as he called Abraham to offer up Isaac. He believed God had power to rescue at the last moment. If no substitute was provided, he would raise his child from the dead and destroy all skeptics. After protracted prayer, pleading with God to spare him the terrible ordeal, and no release from the command, no substitute provided, he plunged it into the heart of the sleeping child.

Spiritualism would have saved this precious life. It would have said to the presence commanding him to kill, "Get thee behind me, Satan, thou art worsted not of the things that be of God." He believed in the infallibility of the Bible and the sacredness of bloody sacrifices, doubtless was responsible for this terrible tragedy.

All persons who are susceptible to spirit influence should clear the mind of such morbid contemplation, and gain a moral balance, rational faith, high ideals, and elevating thoughts. Then it will be difficult, if not impossible for evil influences to approach them for harm.

By their fruits ye shall know them. Spirits through mediums have cured thousands of invalids deemed incurable by the physicians. They have restrained the violent, reformed inebriates, rescued the insane, ministered to the afflicted and sorrowing, and brought life and immortality to light as it was never done before in the history of the world.—Daily Messenger, Meadville, Pa.

order that he may avail himself of the higher environment provided by nature? Does it consist solely of the ethical quality, or does it lie in something other and different? Let us see. No one is morally perfect here in this mundane sphere. All are imperfect in both an intellectual and a moral point of view. They have the moral test be justly applied? Moral growth is needed and had by all in this earthly environment. Why should nature cut off the less perfect death and grant further opportunity for improvement to those who need it the least in the higher, or other, environment? I fall to see why.

Further, we notice in the natural world that there is a law of evolution in the lower kingdoms—that species are created and preserved without reference to any moral quality whatever. Why should nature stop at man and make the test radically different than that imposed on her works below? Nature is rightly consistent in all her works. A great law dominates and governs everything, the law of evolution, growth, development, and as Spiritualists denominate it when applied to man, the law of Eternal Progression. Nature provides new environments for those creatures in the physical domain that need them. Is it any harder for her to provide a new environment of a spiritual nature for those who need it than it is to provide a new physical environment? I for one do not believe it.

But let me suggest a test of immortality for man. The reasoning of the brute are all confined to external facts and their immediate effects upon him. His memory is of objects around him and of the sensations within him. No brute, so far as yet observed, reflects upon the fact that he exists. He does not inquire into his lineage or his destiny. When he sleeps he does not say "I sleep," and when he runs or fights he does not say "I run," or "I fight." His consciousness does not extend to self-consciousness, because a self-consciousness necessarily is a consciousness of the self, the ego, the subject in contradistinction to the external, the objective, and is the stepping stone to reflective and abstract thought, that is, the consideration of ideas independent of the objects which provoke them. We have no evidence that the brute possesses this power. Can we not well imagine that the lowest man, or creature in human form, possesses some slight degree of such power?

So that, is this not the test, self-consciousness, the power of imaginative, reflective, abstract thought, or ideation? Morality, however, it must not be forgotten, is all essential to a happy and appreciative life in the spiritual. The ethical is the objective of the intellectual. Of what use or good is knowledge except it be applied to the moral as well as to the intellectual improvement of the individual and of the race? But it would be a sad religion if the test of human existence in view of the common moral weakness and shifty standards of morality revealed by the history of mankind.

The Jews and Their Fictitious History.

It is reported a Spanish translator of "The Rise of English Culture," has announced he is fully satisfied the so-called Hebrew Scriptures are really comparatively modern productions.

Only they who have turned their researches in that direction, and have investigated the many questions involved with the desire to know the truth, can form any idea of the defects in the current history relating to those people, the special favorites of Heaven. How strange that the Phoenicians, of the Semite race, a great, powerful and prosperous nation, the fathers of the world's commerce, with ships on every sea, and her traders in every port, their language and literature identical with that credited to the Jews, having the same manners and customs, and worshipping the same gods, should wholly disappear from history, not a trace of them remaining in any country, while the Jews are scattered everywhere, and are the most populous in those regions where the Phoenicians were the most numerous when authentic history was written.

In all classic history Phoenicians are mentioned; but the Jews are not named in any ancient work which is not believed to have been forged by scholarly monks in the interest of Catholicism.

The pseudo-Jews, wherever found, are ignorant of their true history. Conquered by other nations and held in servitude, they have constructed their own history on Christian fabrications. They have been victims of persecution by every Christian nation but the American.

Though the Phoenicians had colonies all along the southern coast of the Mediterranean, with populous cities in Spain, yet they were called Jews when expelled by Christians in 1492.

The Mohammedans entertain very nearly the same religious views as did the Phoenicians, and as now do the Jews. These people have no quarrel with each other. They are thrown together they live in harmony, worshipping but one God, and rejecting any duplication of that God.

The learned men of the Jews cling to their fraudulent history with the same tenacity the Christians cling to theirs. Scholars on either side who make discoveries in the direction we here suggest, are ostracized and censured with heresies who are false to the faith in earlier years with Christians the dungeon, stake and fagot closed all controversy, and those who learned or suspected the truth were silenced by death.

Not until within the last twenty-five years has it been prudent to write on these questions. And even now he who calls in question the ecclesiastical history is maligned, in some cases by the less informed of his own faith. Instead of lending a friendly hand to unravel the tangled thread of history, they throw obstacles in the way.

There is a concealed history which will be opened in due time, and will illuminate the "dark ages." Instead of antagonizing the scholars who have turned their attention in that direction let us give them friendly aid.

Indignantly Denied.

"God is angry with the wicked every day."—Psalms 7:11.

"The Lord was very angry with Aaron."—Deut. 9:20.

"Anger resteth in the bosom of fools."—Ecclesiastes 7:9.

A reader will probably inquire if The Progressive Thinker intends to say God is a fool?

No, No, No. It is that "Inerrant" Bible that says it. We are laboring to vindicate the divine character against the vile calumny of that very faulty book.

A Discouraging Experience.

A celebrated French cynic is reported to have said: "If I ever lose my purse I will pray it may not be found by a theologian." His experience had made him incredulous as to the moral honesty of that class of the genus homo.

Bible Degradation of Woman.

Next to War, which is only wholesale murder by nations, and Slavery, its twin brother, both of whom derived their inspiration from Bible authority, as we have shown in previous issues of The Progressive Thinker, stands Polygamy, the degradation of woman, which also gains its support from that general fountain for our great evils and crimes.

Good Christian reader, don't stand aghast with holy horror, and censure us for calling attention to the source of all the great ills which have cursed humanity for long centuries, but we pray you to join us in ridding civilization of one of the fruitful causes for the prolongation of barbarian error into modern times. We know you are shocked with the idea that a book you have been taught and have received as of divine origin is responsible for our great ills; but read and think before you condemn.

Open that record of ignorance and crime where we may, and we are met with the fact that the people over whom God had special care, and whom Christians present as their exemplars, were polygamists. All the patriarchs were such; Abraham, Isaac and Jacob leading the van; while Moses and Aaron follow in the rear; and King David, "a man after God's own heart,"—Acts 13:22; I. Samuel 13:14—and Solomon with his 700 wives, lead the procession.

Neither priest, prophet nor "Son of God" has a word to say in denunciation of this outrage on woman. Some of the leaders of the Protestant reformation favored the institution, while Mormonism, a par excellence Christian sect, made polygamy its corner stone and defended its practices with Bible quotations. That the Christian churches in late years have made war on polygamy all know. While we honor them for doing so, sad to relate, it is in opposition to fundamental Bible examples. They are better than their inspired book; better than the "man after God's own heart," who placed Uriah at the front of the fight, and who might get killed so David could gain his wife. Incest and adultery can find patriarchal examples in the Bible in justification of these vile practices, strengthened with the declaration of the dear Jesus: "Neither do I condemn thee," addressed to the woman taken in adultery.

The Mohammedans justified their brutal practice and the debasement of woman, by saying: "The old patriarchs, the favorites of the Lord, they who received his special care, with whom he wrestled as an athlete, and talked with face to face, practiced it without reproach. As the Lord knows no change, is the same yesterday, to-day and forever; therefore they imitated the glorious example in full confidence that they have his loving approbation. They say Jesus did not condemn polygamy, although it was common in his time, and as he hoped to finally rest in Abraham's bosom, he of the good Sarah and Hagar gave, therefore they 'sealed' as many wives as they could support, to enjoy in eternity of bliss with them, when the calm and turmoil of earth life are over.

To us it seems the charter for Mormon wrong, as given in the Bible, should have been obliterated, then the war on practices borrowed from the old book could have been waged with greater force.

It has been attempted to destroy the force of patriarchal example by saying "God only made one wife for Adam." But observe, Gen. 6:2—"The sons of God saw the daughters of men, that they were fair, and they took them wives of all which they chose."

It was at this period, when the Lord was hob-nobbing and holding tete-a-tetes with our primal ancestors, that these things were done, and it is regretful he had not suppressed the accursed habit at its first inception, before it had acquired a prescriptive right to continuance.

But observe! It matters not whether polygamy quotes the conduct of saints, patriarchs and prophets, the consent of the Lord, immemorial usage, or priestly appropriation. It is a degrading, a barbarian custom, which should be everywhere suppressed. Our mothers, our sisters, our daughters, have just cause to rebel against the practice; and Bibles, however multiple, never made the usage a right. And the Great Ruler of the Universe is labeled when he is represented encouraging or justifying this worse than heathenish institution.

A Reported Conversation.

A friend reports hearing an advertising medium say the other day:

"I don't like The Progressive Thinker, and don't take it."

"What are your objections to it?"

"It wars on mediums."

"Only on fake mediums."

"The editor does not know who are fakes."

"The evidence is conclusive when materializing mediums are caught personifying spirits clothed in artificial togery, with cheese cloth and other paraphernalia for simulating spirits."

"Well, the editor has no business meddling with such matters, then he won't know these cheese cloth and other togery are used."

"As a Spiritualist, most earnestly believing those we term 'dead' can communicate with mortals, and his paper devoted to promulgate those truths, he would be justly charged with being a party criminal to these frauds if he did not expose them."

There is an old maxim to the point:

"He who keeps back the truth, or withholds it from others from motives of expediency, is either a coward, or a criminal, possibly both."

"For myself, I hope Mr. Francis will continue the exposure of pretended mediums, until the last one retires from business. No honest medium has any occasion to complain because of the exposure of dishonesty."

"Well, I don't care; I won't take the paper."

A Well Known Fact.

To know what will be we must know what has been. History repeats itself. The same conditions, and the same results will follow. Give a religious sect supreme power and it is an oppressor, tyrant, and a denigrator of all others shall think the thoughts and do the deeds it shall dictate. Refuse, and it will enforce its demands by violence. Trust none of them, for they are all scions springing from the same noxious root.

ELSIE REYNOLDS.

This Notorious Woman, Known From the Atlantic to the Pacific, Has Again Been Exposed—She Was Evidently Dressed in Artificial Toggery, Posing as a "Spirit."

A telegram of March 22, from Robert T. Hale, a prominent Spiritualist of Los Angeles, Cal., says:

"ELSIE CAUGHT TO-DAY. HER PARAPHERNALIA IN OUR POSSESSION."

The particulars of her last exposure will be given as soon as received.

New Theory of Electricity.

Did our scientific readers peruse with care, "A New Theory of Electricity," by Dr. J. W. Dinsdale, of Los Angeles, on the third page of our issue of March 3? It is worthy of several readings; and we apprehend gives the true solution of the great speed of electricity. As with water—

"The wave behind impels the wave before."

The pressure on one side of the globe propels forward the vibrations so it is almost instantly felt on the opposite side.

There is much that is yet to be learned in regard to electricity, and much that is known by those who have diligently studied the phenomenon which is not yet familiar to even scholars. Formerly we were taught the magnetic needle pointing north, was attracted in that direction by a mountain of magnetic oxide of iron, otherwise a loadstone, located somewhere in the arctic regions; and strange enough, the late explorer who made a north-west passage into the Pacific, in his report, said he had discovered that great mountain, and the press has heralded the information world-wide.

We hear the reader inquiring: What does give polarity to the compass if not a magnetic mountain in the north? It is caused by the electric current ever circling the earth parallel with the equator, and right angles with the poles. That current is ever slightly varying, and because of this variation the magnetic needle is ever changing its polarity, as is seen in all surveys made with the compass. Columbus, in his first voyage across the Atlantic, met with that variation and was shocked because of it. It is met by all voyagers who plow the watery deep, and is so universal it no longer excites surprise.

The fact we state may be demonstrated by any person who has a galvanic battery and a pocket compass. Connect the electrodes with the battery, one end attached to the positive post, the other to the negative, the other end joined. Wind this several times around a small bar of iron or board, place the compass within the circle, and without regard to the natural law in the use of the needle, it points at right angles with the immediate circling current. Change as often as we may the direction of the current, and the needle changes its polarity so as to be at right angles with the current.

Many persons familiar with this natural law obey its mandates, by arranging their sleeping rooms so as to have their heads to the north, thereby escaping many nervous ills which, otherwise, disregarding the law, experience. Persons sleeping with their heads to the electric current circles their heads, and, in the reverse, will be delighted with the effect a change of position during their sleeping hours will effect in a few months.

HOME CIRCLE MANIFESTATIONS.

If It Was Not the Work of Spirits, What Was It?

Allow me a little space in answer to Dr. Morrison in The Progressive Thinker. I agree with the Doctor as far as materialization is concerned, as I have traveled from coast to coast in search of truth and materialization, and have certainly seen lots of it, but I would not vouch that they were genuine. But will the good Doctor explain to me how the following was produced in my own family circle, where we used to sit once a week and we had all kinds of appliances such as planchette, Slade's trumpet, etc. in order that "any of the spirits wished to manifest they could do so." Well, it is nearly three years ago since my good wife passed over. She died on May 1, 1903, was buried May 3, and came to us in our circle on May 7 following, and talked to us nearly 30 minutes through the trumpets, and the first words she said were: "Charles, I am good as your father." Was this thought transference? And where from? I have talked to my wife dozens of times since then and in the same manner. If it is not her spirit that returns and talks to us, what is it, doctor?

And again time and again I have felt the touch of hands on my face, my head, and held of the hand on my knee and could feel it the same as I would feel the hand of a person in the body, and this also in the home circle.

Some years ago we sat for development, a few of my friends and myself, and we used to get flowers of all description, during the time we were seated, shells, and lots of other stuff were brought to us and usually dropped in my lap. Will the good Doctor please explain how these things got into our little circle? We certainly did not get together to humbug ourselves, and if there is a power besides spirit power to do this, I should like to know. Hundreds of manifestations we had, of all kinds and of the most convincing nature, but if not of spirit forces, where from? I realize only too well that many of the so-called mediums are fakes and do this work for the money there is in it, but we held our circle for the sake of knowledge or learning, but have not found out how we could produce any one of all the many manifestations it always depended on our mental and physical conditions to get results, and they were never alike, and we could never tell what was coming. When I was thrown off a table which I tried to hold because it raised such a racket, and I weighed 165 pounds then, by what force did I take place? And still I am a skeptic to a great extent, but cannot deny facts.

If there is nothing but this world of trouble and strife, what are we here for? I would rather a thousand times I had never been born than to know this life ends all. I have been humbugged hundreds of times by these fakes, and I don't care to regret it, but I do hope that every fake medium will be driven off the face of the earth.

The Invisible World.

A Notable Essay Published in Everybody's Magazine.

To the Editor:—I wish to call your attention to an article in the March number of Everybody's Magazine, by Vance Thompson, on the "Invisible World." I would like to have it come under the eyes of the editor of the Question and Answer department, for comment. I would kindly suggest to the editor of Everybody's Magazine, to also procure a number, if possible, for I think it might furnish evidence, "scientific evidence," which will afford him some light which he cannot obtain by looking through his telescopic tube. In this connection, let me remind the professor, who decries so much at the various conditions ruling in the investigation of the occultism of Spiritualism, who are also believers in like manner as himself, and for the same reason, namely, because of the very many preparatory conditions required before even passing over the threshold of inquiry into nature's hidden unknown laws, that he, the professor, and his friends have to peer through a darkened tube from which the light is excluded, except at one end, in order to pursue the profession to which he and his friends are devoting their lives; and this not from any invention of mechanism of their own, but effected by the keener perception of a Galileo Galilei, that person, who was impressed with the "Holy Office" of his native land for daring to assert the truthfulness of the Copernican system, and for using the same darkened tube to discover the rings of Saturn and the moons of Jupiter.

If any one, whether a doctor, a reverend, or a professor, is not prepared to make many disappointments in the realizing of his preconceived opinions or theories as to how certain phenomena of nature should occur, they had better not start upon the road of inquiry.

As to the objection made to the evil communications and obsessions likely to be met with, and that only one in about nine hundred and ninety-nine are productive of benefit to humanity, let me remind again, the professor, that, in that, or a far less proportion, that good mortals are passing over the great "divide."

The whole purpose of adventure into the occultism of Spiritualism is

BUDDHISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

They Are Alike in Some Points, Antagonistic in Others.

I think the discussion of Buddhism vs. Christianity in your columns is somewhat obscured by a misunderstanding of facts which are familiar enough to educated Buddhists, but are perhaps not very accessible to Western students, and certainly not, unless one has time to do more than dip into a few translations.

Permit me to give a few points which have been overlooked by the various writers. My authorities are: Prof. Rhys-Davids, Sir Charles Eliot and some others who are high up in the Buddhist philosophy, including Gautama, who has been somewhat neglected.

It seems to me that those are right who say Buddhism is very much like Christianity; and also those are right who say it is unlike and antagonistic. It depends entirely upon what sect or school of Buddhists we look at.

Buddhism is nominally the religion of one-third of the world, but it is not the same religion in all these different countries. The main cleavage line is between the Great Vehicle, and the Little Vehicle. The form of Buddhism called the Great Vehicle (because it has an immense canon) is professed by all the Northern Buddhists—Thibet, Northern India, China, Japan, Mongolia. It seems to be an aggregation of all kinds of native religions, ancient and modern mythology, united with a little Buddhism.

A large part of it dates back to prehistoric times, and much of it has been added since the Christian era. In Northern India Buddhism is connected with Sivaism, and with Ganesha, and with Yogaism. This degraded Buddhism was carried to Thibet in the seventh century of our era, and blended there with the native Bon religion, a system of devil worship, and the Lamaism of Thibet, is so much like the Roman Catholic church, that the public service is almost the same. In this case Sir Charles Eliot thinks that the Lamaism borrowed from the Catholic mass of China.

Thibet, and the Buddhism of Mongolia and China comes very largely from these perverted sources.

Almost every Chinaman is a Buddhist, but he also worships at two or three other temples, and he is quite ready to add Christianity to his religious hash. In the end he is John Chinaman, and always will be.

The Buddhist sects of Thibet and Japan, have a Redeemer, and a plan of salvation, like Christianity. Perhaps sometimes one religion borrowed and perhaps sometimes the other, yet of course the Catholic church was the most prodigious borrower the world ever saw, and absorbed everything in the way of secret and subterranean tricks and wiles, and ceremonies that the ancient empires had to show.

But the Little Vehicle, or purer form of Buddhism, is still professed by Southern Buddhists, especially, I think, the Burmese, and by many who are scattered all over the world.

The point I wish to make is that all the so-called religious beliefs which have been briefly indicated above, have nothing to do with that Buddhist philosophy, which has been such an attraction to many like Sir Edwin Arnold, and many more, who have begun as critics and ended as disciples of the great Indian sage.

The traditions about his birth and external life are not any part of his teachings, but belong rather to the popular Hindu mythology. However, Gautama himself held guiltless of one great evil, for he did establish the order of mendicant priests, though he himself, like Sir Edwin Arnold, was not vowed to celibacy for life, but may return to the world at any time.

It was my purpose to recapitulate what I think to be the chief points of difference between Buddhism and Christianity, but I have already written too long a letter.

"Talmagean inanities, incongruities, inconsistencies and impertinences," a Review of Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, by De Witt Talmage, of late published attacks upon Spiritualism, by Moses Hull, Price, 10 cents.

as to the truthfulness of phenomenal occurrences tending to prove that there is a continuance of life of the individual, and if there is, can that individual communicate with mortals yet in this life here, now.

The part of the aforesaid article in which this scribe is mostly interested, is to be found on pages 338 and 339 of Everybody's Magazine for March. I have thought somewhat along the line of which those pages treat, and have hoped it might be possible to stop for the blind carping and ignorant, so-called instructions of reverends and priests who are keeping in abject mental slavery the people of earth, by proof, positive proof, of that personal, individual magnetic consciousness or aura, in its vibratory state of thought, by photography; thereby affording means by which individual judgments of the affairs and experiences of everyday life here on earth might be compared, one with another; opening up a field of research showing the effect of thought upon other thinkers, showing the beneficial effects of enforced erroneous so-called religious psychological instructions.

I quote from those pages the following: "Major Dargat of the third curators, stationed at Jours, discoverer of the N-rays, has proved by his experiments the possibility of photographing human thought; has forced its acceptance by his experiments to the satisfaction of the French Academy of Science." In a dark room by pressing to his forehead a photographic film, and even without contact, he has produced a picture of the object on which his thoughts were bent. Also, when he laid upon a photographic film, he has been touched by his magnetic fingers a photograph of the coils has been produced.

The writer of the aforesaid article says: "I have seen a very strange photograph of anger, like a gray and swirling storm."

And now, what is acquired by this discovery? This is the question. If vital fluid makes its mark on a photographic film, when laid upon the dead film is unaffected, and in this way by use of the N-ray test premature burial is done away with.

The vital fluid seems to have its reservoir, as it were, in the brain, thence it circulates through the body by the great canals, and out to the fingers; it seems to be both positive and negative, it envelops the body as mineral magnetism does steel, etc.

ANOTHER ATTRACTION!

The Ladies' Schubert Quartette at Lily Dale This Season.

Lily Dale will enjoy an unusual musical treat this season, as the LADIES' SCHUBERT QUARTETTE of Boston, has been engaged by the Assembly, beginning Sunday, July 29, and remaining the balance of the season.

THIS QUARTETTE is unsurpassed by any ladies' musical combination in this country. Their voices are finely attuned and beautifully trained. The FIRST SOPRANO has a specially sweet, clear and melodious voice, while that of the second alto is of admirable weight and power, with the other two just rightly attuned to form a correct whole.

THE NORTHWESTERN BAND of Mendville, one of the finest orchestras in Pennsylvania, has been engaged for the entire season, so that the musical features will be of the same high order as the platform talent.

W. M. IVANS' RINGING SPEECH.

Women Who Seek Nothing but Privileges.

Mr. William M. Ivans, the late Republican candidate for mayor of New York City, in his speech at the luncheon in honor of the 86th birthday of Susan B. Anthony, said in part:

"I am here to-day because I believe every man to have a right to the ballot for the protection of his life, liberty and property and wishes to deny to his wife, the mother of his children, an equal right in the maintenance of her liberty, property and prosperity. Such an attitude of mind is inconceivable to me.

And if I cannot conceive of the denial of the ballot by man, still less can I understand its denial by woman. Of all inconceivable things on earth, the woman anti-suffragists are the most so. They consider themselves qualified to discuss these questions, but not qualified to cast a ballot. They organize societies to clean our streets and promote good government of all kinds, yet refuse the ballot, which would enable them to choose servants to do these very things. They prefer privileges to duty. Let them do their duty by the side of men and women and not be so supremely unwomanly as to seek nothing but privileges.

History shows us that women are the civilizers of society. They are the beings who make the characters of men, and to assert that they have no right to vote by the side of men is the absolute negation of reason."

Important Notice From the Illinois State Spiritualist Association.

The official board of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association is ready to issue a call to all readily accessible points in the Prairie State, where an earnest effort is to be made to spread Spiritualism by holding Parlor, Hall, Grove, or District Meetings. It also aims to establish stated neighborhood circles, charter permanent societies and aid by counsel and visiting agents, local organizations now in existence. Write what and whom you want; and when you want it. The earlier calls will be given priority of co-operation, but it is hoped to reach all within a reasonable time.

Some Excellent Suggestions.

And Strong Proofs of Spirit Existence, Given at a Trumpet Seance.

After reading Vance Thompson's able article on French Spiritualism in the March number of Everybody's Magazine, I am thoroughly convinced that we are greatly in need of the same kind of this country. Paris, the city of unbelief in religious illusions of the day, is "dotted over with Spiritualist temples," so says Mr. Thompson; and he further adds that Spiritualism there has been reduced to an absolute science—that all mediums are required to pass an examination, such as to preclude the possibility of fraud, the examiners being persons of intelligence, and thoroughly equipped for their work.

We are in need of just such persons—persons who are unbiased—persons who are competent to weigh the evidence and arrive at correct conclusions.

While many able articles have been written to demonstrate the continuing existence of the human being after death—while able lectures are being delivered to show the reasonableness of man's immortality, yet there is no absolute proof of it outside of Spiritualistic phenomena. Then we must ever be indebted to the mediums for whatever we may know of a future life. That absolute proofs are possible, need not be argued. And neither is it necessary to add that communication between the two worlds is a fact that has been clearly established as any fact in science. In this connection, I will give a few examples of what constitutes absolute facts as to the existence of spiritual human beings: A medium accompanied by his wife came to my home to give a private trumpet seance. There were four persons in the room—myself and wife and the medium and his wife.

The seance had not proceeded far when something out of the ordinary—a voice singing through the trumpet—was heard. But whose voice? The skeptical would readily answer, "The medium's, to be sure." But it wasn't, for at that moment the medium joined in the music, singing bass, while his wife sang the soprano. Neither my wife nor myself joined in the singing! Three parts were being sung, and only two persons singing. What could be the explanation? Was the medium to sing bass and tenor at the same time? To both questions, certainly, no.

Then whence came this third voice? Who was this individual who sang in that lusty voice—whose tenor rang out stronger than the other two parts? This was settled beyond question—that tenor voice DID NOT BELONG TO ANY HUMAN BEING IN THE FLESH. There is but one conclusion, and that is the voice came from an intelligent, thinking, human being—a being who once lived, and who, through the laws governing mediumship, was able upon that occasion to give utterance to the words and music of that song. And not only did he sing, but gave us, later on, a whole lecture.

And there are some other facts quite as startling to be mentioned in connection. At the beginning of the seance the medium felt impressed to begin his work under test conditions, and this is how he did it: First, I took a large handkerchief, and having tied a knot across the center, placed the knot in his mouth. Then I tied the ends together around his head.

In three minutes the trumpet was floating around overhead, striking the ceiling and floor, and at the same time, the guitar got busy, floated to the farthest part of the room, and resting itself for a moment on the sofa, began an accompaniment to the song we were singing. And right here something happened—something I shall remember—something weird and startling.

The guitar had subsided with the close of our song. There was a moment of silence which was abruptly broken by a voice—not a whisper, you understand, but a strong, audible voice and this is what it said: "Are you satisfied now? If you are, please take that handkerchief from my medium's mouth—it hurts him!" and glanced at the direction from whence came the voice, and projecting through the curtains which separated the room where we were sitting from an adjoining room, I beheld the trumpet. A dim light burned in the adjoining room, and when the control had placed the trumpet at, or near the top of the curtains where they were joined together, a small space was thereby opened, permitting a sufficient amount of light to make the trumpet visible. Having uttered the words

OUR GLORIOUS HERITAGE

Delivered Through the Lips of Mrs. Gora L. V. Richmond, Chicago, Sunday, February 25, 1906.

If you had inherited one of the fairest kingdoms of the earth, and there were all the material things that your physical nature desired and your mind coveted, and you had not there the companionship of those whom you loved, would you go there? Some of you would, and some would not. You would go and try it, but it would be barren. For contrast: If you were thrown into a desert with those whom you loved, whom you LOVED, you would accept it and either take life or death with them, and would not feel wholly deserted.

The heritage that people covet is not really what they want, but it is that which they think they want. They want the heritage of perfect happiness, and perfect happiness means that which is enduring. Of course there is but one enduring power, and that is Love. We may call it by many names; you may call it justice, you may call it truth, you may call it peace, as many names as you choose, but the ultimate is found to be love, that perfect, unqualified, unselfish and only Love. But people do not want that to-day—the majority of them. They want something else, and the seeking and getting of what people think they want is, of course, the measure of testing what they ultimately need; yet both the seeking and the getting are stages of growth, stages of conquest, stages of victory.

People have talked about inheriting, possessing, of having the gift of immortality. The ultra orthodox theologians tell you you have that by virtue of the gift of a Divine life sacrificed that you might be saved, but you must also acknowledge that factor you cannot have it; "Glory, honor and immortality, eternal life." "Eternal life" is the test.

Now "Eternal Life" is something different from immortality. A person may be immortal and still not be living to-day in true consciousness of life. (That is what Jesus meant: "Let the dead bury their dead.") Eternal life is the essence, the ultimate of fulfillment, of living. What matters it if you are immortal a thousand or a million years hence if you are not doing anything to-day? This is "life" that is going on all the while, and if you do not know it, that does not affect the fact of your immortal soul, that ever continues to be. You do not have to win it, you do not have to inherit it, that is. Now, to-day is the time to live, to do the thing that is nearest to you, to fulfill that which your hands find to do.

"Oh! but I am so anxious to insure my happiness, my position in the other world." You cannot do it; there are no insurance companies that issue policies in that direction. They used to do it in the churches, but they do not do that any more. The thing that you are here for, is to do the thing that the earth life is intended for you to do in all directions; that which in itself is a part of eternity, of immortality. Elbert Hubbard has a society of "immortals"; you have to subscribe to it to be a member, though it does not make you immortal. But there is a subtle meaning in it—it means those who know, those who know things and do things. There is no immortal idleness, there is no eternity of not doing things. Rest is the exact equivoque of work. It is in the absolute state of soul where there is realization instead of preparation, where there is rest instead of labor; the state of being, instead of the state of doing. But these must exactly balance one another.

The Nirvana of the Buddhists is not simply idleness; neither is that "Kingdom of Heaven" of which Jesus spoke—which is within, but they are the counterpart, the complement to the state of activity and doing, which is manifest always in contact with time and space, and the senses. You must do something or you cannot live.

Now every animal has the knowledge of what to do; instinct stamps upon the animal the knowing. Man has it not, showing that he was expected to rely upon his intelligence, he was expected to employ his mind. When he went to work to fashion tepees, to build houses and to conquer physical life, it was because he has some other source of intelligence than that which is stamped by instinct upon the animal. Undoubtedly the birds who build their nests to-day do not build any better than the first ones did in the Garden of Eden, or wherever they might have been; nor does any animal provide better for its young.

The human being alone expects to make the most out of physical surroundings, and he proceeds to do it while here, he must do it. He must do and conquer everything for the purpose of knowing how valuable they are, all these things. Besides the provision for physical existence, there is a certain intellectual satisfaction in doing it. There is a great artistic satisfaction, if you please, in that which represents what is called the highest civilization; not simply to have tables and chairs in the house, but to have the tables match the chairs and the house so that they seem a part of the house, to have the chairs and furniture correspond, in fact, to have something that satisfies what you call your artistic sense. Then you abandon them and go and sit on the crooked limb of an old tree and have a rich seat fashioned by a freak of nature. You abandon even your fine dwellings and make new ones scarcely discernible from the rocks and leaves and trees, as if they were a greater creation, a part of some ante-natal dream.

The purpose of this life is to do the things and find how utterly useless they are. But you have had the satisfaction of doing them, of exercising all these powers. When you spoil the world, then you go to work and try to reconstruct it. Just think of those savages, your Puritan ancestors who went into New England and the Middle States and then into the West and cut down all the trees, not a part of them, not cutting them judiciously, not having intelligence enough to know that they would want the trees by and by for the modification of the climate, but cutting down all the trees. Now here comes the great Forestry Department of the nation instructing people to plant trees. You begin to understand why the climate rebels, and certain sections of the country are not adapted to produce what was once cultivated there, and once seemed to thrive. You understand now why the fruit trees have nearly all died in the Middle States and New England, because the forests no longer protect them from the encroachments of the blasts in winter, and the droughts in the summer. So you reconstruct the world that has been destroyed by the hand of man. It is a great thing to do, that sort of thing. Of course, each age a crop of lives is harvested that has had that experience.

There is a great deal in doing things well that you do. If you want to do a mean thing, do it just as well as you can, because there is a certain kind of reaction that does not come when you do it only half-way, you never have the great, glorious and sublime realization of actual repentance. Those people who want to do bad things and do not are in the very worst state, because they do not consider themselves sinners, though they know they are not sinners. Undoubtedly, the poor man who was hanged the other day has a good deal better time than if he was not such an absolute sinner; because you know it is a glorious thing to know oneself to be actually incapable of doing any more or worse in the direction that one does a thing. When there is a culmination there is a reaction, and that is why Jesus said the publicans and sinners were nearer the kingdom of heaven than the scribes and pharisees. They were only sinners, while the "scribes" and "pharisees," "hypocrites," and others in the garb of righteousness were posing as saints, and all the time they had these sinful desires.

"But," say the people, "if you advocate that, people will be doing all kinds of wrong things and justify themselves because of what you say." Do not be alarmed; nothing we can say will make people do any worse than they are doing now; the world is doing pretty nearly its worst, so there is some consolation in the thought that it must soon be better. There are many people on the earth to-day who are turning their thoughts outwardly than simply to succeed selfishly at any cost. Whether a man invests in an enterprise to get money for himself alone, or whether he invests in it to get money for the purpose of doing good, of course there may be a difference in the motive, but the truth is the slaying of people by one another is continuous; even if you do let that poor woman eke out a scanty half-starved subsistence by washing your clothes to support her invalid husband and her little children.

The great light of the world is, not how you or anyone else are to possess this spiritual heritage without doing anything, but how you are to arrive at the state of knowing. Some people think they are going to get it just by selfishly opening up communication with their friends and talking to them in the other world. This has no more to do with heavenly happiness or the immortal heritage than the postoffice has. It is a part of the great intelligence of the world, and the great happiness and unhappiness of the world, to have means of correspondence. But if there were no means of correspondence you could not have so many letters from your friends at a distance to make you feel happy, and no one could send you anonymous letters to make you feel terribly. Of course you do not blame the system, on that account, of communication between yourself and friends on earth.

The spirit state is only an attainment of another state of selfishness, if you make it so. You want to hear from your spirit friends; that is a great and wonderful thing, so is the telegraph. You know that you are going to exist after the change called death. But if you know, if the world knew the paucity, the poverty of the average spiritual possessions of the world, and that nothing else can do there, not the cottage, nor the farm, nor the palace, nor the rentals, (these vast rentals that come from houses, and stores and lands), nor ships, nor what you think you have, and that all the wealth thus gained parts company with you at the grave; you harvest only your spiritual state. If you really knew that accomplishment and achievement will be something else, and that does not mean that you are to get a circle together with a few friends and stand on tiptoe, and say: "Now I am growing spiritually; every day, we are getting more and more messages, and they tell us how exalted we are, and when we go to spirit life we will be in such and such a sphere." And certain people call that spiritual growth.

Go down on your knees and scrub the floors; go out in the yard and dig; do the thing that is needed this day and hour. You do not suppose you have to "sit" and wait for your spirit friends? They are there uplifting your hands in your daily toil, out there on the street with the baby digging up the dirt; they are with that mother with her starving children, that person who is weak, and that one who needs them all the time; with this one helping the poor, and that teacher teaching the children how to grow in thought and telling them how this work is to be done; and then the great Boards of Education preventing you from doing it! That is often the discipline for the teacher, if somebody is gifted and has the genius of teaching. The time will come when no Board of Education shall tell you what not to teach or what to teach. Illumination will come in all these directions.

But the one thing is, that you cannot go amiss of the Kingdom of Heaven, you cannot go astray from it. You pierce nature anywhere and you find life; touch the Soul anywhere and you find God; penetrate human life anywhere and you find immortality, Eternal Life. Men do not hesitate to go down into the earth to find coal mines, or send other people; they do not hesitate to dig for gold in the earth; they do not hesitate to tunnel your cities, to the great imperilment of buildings like this (the Masonic Temple); they do not hesitate to drill for oil; they do not hesitate to seek for the North Pole; they do not hesitate to get all the whole oil they can and when that is exhausted to get all the petroleum there is; they do not hesitate to steal the lightning from the skies; they do not hesitate to use all they can of the power of thought. Undoubtedly they would intercept the great thought of an archangel if it was on its way to form a new solar system, if they could tap the wire.

The truth is, that this heritage which people are hunting for high and low, sifting the atoms, crucifying and murdering rabbits and dogs and chickens to find, is here and now, and everywhere. Somebody said that Elmer Gates was going to prove the existence of the soul by experimenting on rabbits. He will be several million years older than he now is before he does it. He will not do it in that way. The soul answers for itself; it is not a chemical or mathematical equivalent; it does not make its escape from the visible human existence by certain tests; it often makes its escape spiritually from the body under the hands of physicians and surgeons. But that is about its only refuge. Who would not rather fly from the body than be experimented upon by a dozen doctors?

So pierce the cloud of human life anywhere and you find immortality. The consciousness of it comes into human existence and the human consciousness by antithesis. Someone said, "You know more about goodness if you go down to Joliet for a time." If you spend several hours in the criminal court you will know more about goodness than you do now. You know more about the light just because in ordinary days Chicago is so dark and smoky. You know more about immortality because everything else is transient, is fleeting; because "things" do not remain, do not satisfy you, very long at a time. When they do remain, the more palaces you have, the more you weary of them; the more external things you have the more you worry for their care.

The simplicity of the Japanese nobility is apparent, for an American appointed to a high office went there and resolved to live as the Japanese did and, fortunately, leaving his American furniture behind when he went there, he engaged a competent native to provide everything needed for house-keeping, with instructions to get everything required. When he went into the house it looked very bare to him, there did not seem to be any furniture, when he inquired about the lack of furniture and ornaments, the native explained, that there was a bed to sleep in, there was a low ottoman to sit upon, and when not needed in one room it could be taken into another, for he could not sit in both rooms at the same time, and he said, "Why have so many things and never use them? The nobility do not use their houses in Japan to make a show like a bazaar." Americans, please take lesson.

So do people build and get ready for the Kingdom of Heaven, for the great heritage of immortality. They think it is a stellar bazaar, they think they must buy and furnish it; and they consider that in this "inheritance" there is going to be something so glorious that all the world will marvel, and will say, "Now just look at me," when you enter this immortal company and this kingdom of heaven.

But it is not so at all; it is by the "unfrequented way," it is through the silent pathway of tears, it is the "attainment" and "conquest," that peaceful state that flaunts not itself nor its achievements to the world. It does not cry out either at Guaya or upon Olivet, "Behold what I have done!"

Beneath that wondrous tree when Buddha saw the light, when he reached the attainment and knew of eternal life, silence and wonder were around him there, and though with ministering presences and angels of glory, he did not go into the world thereafter and say, "I have attained it"; but he knew the meaning of sorrow, and he knew the need among the people of ministrations, so he taught and ministered all along the way. When his father, the king, heard of him and sent out his retainers and courtiers to escort him in royal style he said: "I have no need of all this, I will walk." He went to the palace, not as a prince, but as a lowly teacher, ministering to the multitude, and the sorrowing and sick people as he went, a wanderer and a vagrant as far as the world is concerned. But he knew what he had found.

So the goodly life passing to this wonderful realm does not come with the sound of trumpets, with great blazoning upon banners, with music marching along the streets to herald that the one is there that has attained immortal life, that has attained the knowledge of eternal life!

As said before, you cannot miss immortality, the continuity of existence. That which you can do is, that when the steps are taken that show how futile are all these earthly conditions, that the real life is there, you understand that the real life is there. It is in the sinews, the muscles, the nerves of the man who toils for bread for those he loves; it is in the heart and brain of the one who does the thing for humanity that he thinks highest and best; it is in the life of one who serves because loving service is the highest and best.

When we are talking about this glorious heritage, this great theme of immortality, we are not trying to lighten one of your burdens, or take from you one step of your experience, or declare to you who are on the way, that by going this way or that way you can evade or avoid them. We are simply explaining to you that these experiences are for you, that they are in the pathway of your victory, and that you are the one to conquer and to know, and that if you pierce this shadow anywhere you will find the Infinite. If you probe this great mystery anywhere you will find answer.

Seek for the divine beneath the surface of human conditions and you find the immortal soul.

Therefore, here and now, every day you may enter into the "joy of the Lord" by doing the thing that to the hands and thought is the nearest duty; well knowing that ministering angels attend; well knowing that the spirits of your loved ones bend near; well knowing that all souls, whether tethered by earthly circumstances, or free and fearless in the dominion of the soul, are helping and aiding you.

When Saul, the king of Israel, heard the sweet music of David, the great attainment and adjustment came to his spirit, for his pride was melted, his stubborn heart gave way, then there were angels to the right and angels to the left of him; not because he was the King of Israel, but because the stubborn heart and the false pride and rebellious spirit had yielded to the great love of the Infinite, and he found he was one of God's children.

"WHAT ARE THE WILD WAVES SAYING?" "LIBERTY."

Impromptu Poem by Mrs. Richmond, the Subjects Being Given by the Audience.

The wild waves along the ocean's shore
Are saying what you think they say;
Either that the storm is there and nevermore
Will it be calm, or that at the break of day
The voices of the sounding sea
Will be a beautiful symphony.

If you are a lover, they are speaking
With the voice of love unto your soul;
If you are peaceful and calm they are revealing Peacefully and calm their blent control.

If you are in the midst of the storm
Of passion and of anger and strife,
The waves are telling all the while
Of the conflict and the storm of life.

Nature tells you what you are,
And the voices of flower and shrub and tree,
The song-bird and the ocean wave,
Each is like your soul in its harmony.

Sometime, when you are ready to leave,
The ocean waves along this shore
Will lead you to the harbor of light,
And the safety, that forevermore,
Like the beacon light to the sailor, that's seen
To show the light that hath ever been.

True liberty does not consist
In violence and aggressive strife,
In that which makes human life resist,
Full of its conflict to make life
With strenuous efforts day by day
Each with his fellow man upon life's way.

True liberty means to live your life;
But that every soul in heaven and earth
Is co-related to your own;
Which shows, within this human birth,

You cannot selfishly pursue
Any pathway that hinders another's feet;
That you must keep within your view
The lines of life where all must meet.

If you your own work truly fulfill
It is free and true to the extent That the same liberty is known to all;
Following love's blessed commandment.

The Influence of the Zodiac Upon Human Life, With Character Readings of Persons Born Upon the Cusp.

The principles found in this volume are both a science and a religion, for a better and a happier humanity. It points to the planets as an index to the human character and liability to disease; also gives the remedy and cure suited to temperaments evolved under certain planets. A NEW CATECHISM

BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

Fourth Edition—Six Additional Chapters—200 Pages, Bound in Cloth, $1.00.—Containing Likeness of the Author.

"A New Catechism" has enjoyed a remarkable sale both in America and England. George Jacob, Holyoake, in his introduction to the English edition of "A New Catechism," says: "A New Catechism" is the boldest, the brightest, the most varied and informing of any work of the kind extant. The principal fields of human knowledge, which the churches have fenced round with supernatural terrors, the Catechism breaks into, cherishing what is fair and showing what is deformed. The notes, of which there are many, both ancient and contemporary, are as striking as the text. The book is a cyclopaedia of theology and reason in a nutshell.

This book examines the evidence for the historical existence of Jesus, and finds it quite meagre to prove that such a man as Jesus ever lived. It is a most important contribution to Modern Thought. PREACHERS PROGRESSING.

Two Striking Instances Occur in the State of California.

It is a common remark that clergymen are, as a class, less liberal than their congregations. I do not know if the saying is correct. I personally know a few preachers who are soundly "orthodox" ones, who have become broad-minded, progressive, non-orthodox teachers. I will name but two in this communication. The first, Rev. Benjamin F. Wilson, of Berkeley, Cal., an educated, eloquent, noble man, who has a life of great usefulness yet before him. Several years ago, he was stationed in a mining town where several hundred miners were employed. The conditions imposed upon the workmen by the mine owners became intolerable and a strike followed. Mr. Wilson saw the destitution among the men and their families, and the cruel tyranny of the coal barons. Being a man of keen sympathetic nature, his heart ached for the poorly-housed, half-starved, ill-clad, often sick women and children. He took an active interest in them. He talked with the mine owners, pleading with them to grant better terms to their employees. As many of the men were members of his church, he preached a sermon on the subject, but did not say anything of an offensive nature. He quoted from Jesus, and emphasized the doctrine of brotherhood, justice, mercy and the Golden Rule.

Some of the capitalists were also members of his church, and were liberal contributors to it. These were highly offended, and made the demand that their pastor refrain from expressing any sympathy for the families of these strikers. Wilson replied that his duty as a minister of Jesus Christ required that he should sympathize with the suffering poor. The mine owners then sent a message to the presiding elder of the district to come down and shut his mouth or remove him from the pastorate. The elder came and told the pastor that these mine barons were rich and influential, that they had, in fact, contributed largely to the erection of the church building, and it would not do at all to offend them.

When Wilson replied that as he understood his duty as a Christian minister to be to preach fair play and the brotherhood of man, the elder said, "Oh, never mind that; you just go ahead and preach Methodism and diplomatically refrain from meddling in this dispute."

Mr. Wilson declined to act "diplomatically" part, and of course soon lost caste among the barons and the elder. His idea of the life and teachings of Christ did not seem to meet with the approval of the high church officials, and in due time he gravitated out of the church. He is still preaching as an independent, and his theology has broadened and deepened, and he is gaining power and is doing a thousand times more good than he could have done as a regular Methodist pastor.

This incident reminds me of the boast of an old, humorous doctor, whose wife was a member of an Episcopal church. The doctor asserted that "the Episcopal church was the very best church." When asked why, he replied, "Why, the Episcopal church does not dabble with politics nor religion."

The other broad-minded preacher I wish to name in this letter, is Rev. Burt Estes Howard. Fifteen years ago he was pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Los Angeles, Cal., the leading church of that city. He broadened in his theology and was so active in good works outside of the church, that he was expelled from the Presbyterian denomination, that the rich, narrow, and self-righteous old fogies of his flock began to scold and lecture him, and threaten him, but Howard kept right on preaching progress, and lending his aid to reform movements outside of his church. Something had to be done, therefore the church authorities held a meeting and drew up a letter addressed to the pastor, telling him what he must and must not preach, and even dictating his political action. This letter they sent by a brother to the pastor, asking for an immediate reply. Mr. Howard read the epistle, and wrote out and returned his reply in substantially the following words and form: To the Trustees of the First Presbyterian Church, Los Angeles, Cal.: Dear Brethren:—Your communication of this date, is at hand. My reply is, "Damn you."

Yours in brotherly love, BURT ESTES HOWARD.

The old fogies were shocked, but the younger members approved the letter. As for the pastor, he kept right on preaching broad humanitarianism, filling his church to the doors every Sunday. But he encountered so much opposition, and had to deal with so much bigotry, that one fine Sunday morning, he announced that he would withdraw from the society, would resign the pastorate of the church, but would continue to preach at the theater building. About half the church membership followed him. Later they erected a beautiful church edifice, the finest in the city, and installed Howard as their pastor. They still thought they were Presbyterians, but insisted they were liberal ones. Howard preached a broader theology than when in the old church, and the congregation grew, and the movement prospered, and the pastor was idolized. But one day, right at a time when the church was at its most prosperous career, the pastor tendered his resignation and went back to the theater where he preached to large congregations. These new admirers finally rented the Methodist tabernacle, having a large seating capacity, and for a year or two the meetings were held there. Every Sunday thousands poured into this great building to hear the eloquent speaker.

Again did Mr. Howard astonish and grieve his congregation by saying, at the close of one of his great meetings, that he had decided to resign the pastorate—in short had decided to stop preaching altogether, until he acquired more knowledge himself. We have too much preaching and too little practice," declared the speaker. "I have told you all I know, and I will stop now for a few years, and travel, and study awhile, and try and add to my store of knowledge."

That was six or seven years ago. Mr. Howard spent some time at Stanford University, went abroad, and a year or more ago filled, for a time, a Unitarian pulpit in Boston. Recently he was chosen as the pastor of the First Unitarian church of Los Angeles, and in drawing his meetings to the ablest thinkers of that liberal, progressive city.

Burt Estes Howard is learned, eloquent and honest. As a profound thinker and pulpit orator he has no superior on the Pacific coast. At one time no man stood higher in the Presbyterian denomination west of the Rocky Mountains than he. Being a young man, he was certain to attain a much greater prominence had he been a time-serving hypocrite and remained with that church. He was coaxed and importuned to stay in the Calvinistic camp, but without avail. Threats, slander and persecution followed, but he swerved not. He was poor in this world's goods, but rich in courage, in talent, in learning, and in good sense. Being still a man in middle life, I shall expect the world to know more of him.

It is said that the orthodox theological schools are complaining that fewer and still fewer young men, each succeeding year, enter them as students to be educated for the ministry. Clearly the reason is, that the young men of average intelligence no longer believe in the scientific fundamental doctrines of the Church. The public school, and science, and the printing press have so spread general intelligence, that the old dogmas of the fall, the Eden snake story, the personal all powerful devil, a disappointed and defeated God, total depravity, an endless hell, the trinity, and the "atonement" do not appeal to the intelligent members of the present generation. These doctrines are all the product of an ignorant age. The young man who has received instruction in astronomy, geology, chemistry and other scientific studies, if he is honest and is not constitutionally lazy, has little inclination to enter a theological college and have drilled into him a lot of pagan mythology.

All honor to the Wilsons and Howards, and the other clear-headed and lion-hearted young preachers who, if they cannot preach the brotherhood of man, and common honesty, and common sense, in the church, have the courage to leave the church. Alameda, Cal. R. A. DAQUE.

LIFTS THE VEIL.

C. Jinarajadasa, an Eminent Hindoo and Spiritualist, Lectured Late in New York, Giving Expression to the Following.

Attend, sahibs all, to the words of C. Jinarajadasa, B. A., who of the future know the A. B. C. From Colombo, Ceylon, he comes, and recently he addressed a large audience of Theosophists in New York on the theme "Heaven and Hell in Fact and Fancy."

He said: "It is one of the contentions that many persons walk about this world without knowing that they are dead. They have an unpleasant way of not paying any attention to doors, but still slip through walls without saying, 'By your leave.' At first, of course, they feel as though they are hampered by the body, but before very long they become accustomed to the new conditions and walk around with their former friends, and they do not have to stand in front of doors and say, 'After you.' It is possible for them to enter any room alongside the most rotund person who ever was, no matter how narrow the doorway."

According to the sage of Colombo, it requires several days for the person who has departed from the scene of his customary activities to realize that anything unusual has happened. "Then," resumed Mr. Jinarajadasa, "he sees his body put in the coffin and he cannot interfere. He realizes that he is in a different world and he cannot make himself felt. He sees others arranging his affairs in a way of which he does not approve and he does not like it, yet he can do nothing. Sooner or later he realizes that he is dead after all. His shape is the same as it was, yet he has no corporeal frame. He is not thirsty or hungry, nor does he suffer fatigue. For him there is neither sunlight nor darkness, although he is able to observe that, for those whom he sees on earth there is the alternation of day and night."

LIBERTY.

What man is there so bold that he should say, "Thus and thus only would I have the sea?"

For whether lying calm and beautiful, Clashing the earth in love or throning smile The smile of heaven from waves of amethyst,

Or whether, freshened by busy winds, It bears the trade and navies of the world To ends of use or stern activity, Or whether, lashed by tempests, it gives way

To elemental fury, howls and roars At all its rock barriers, in wild rout Of ruin drinks the blood of living things

And strews its wrecks o'er leagues of desolate shore, Always it is the sea, and men bow down Before its vast and varied majesty.

So all in vain will timorous ones essay To set the moles and bounds of liberty, For freedom is its own eternal law. It makes its own conditions and in storm Or calm alike fulfill it when it lies Still as a sleeping lion, while a swarm Of gnatlike evils hovers round its head,

Nor don't it when in mad, disjointed times It shakes the torch of terror and its cry Shrills over the quaking earth and in the flame

Of riot and war we see its awful form Rise from the scaffold where the crimson axe Rings down its grooves the knell of shuddering kings.

For always in thine eyes, O Liberty, Shines that high light whereby the world is saved, And, though thou slay us, we will trust in thee.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents that to give all equal prominence would be to make the most condensed form, and often clearness is sacrificed to brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style is thereby affected, while the things to be depicted are of great importance. Correspondents often weary of waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space available, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Louis Samuel Carroll: Q. Did Jesus Christ come in the flesh, and was he the son of God? I ask this as a Christian believer.

A. After once making ourselves sure that a personal Jesus Christ existed, the belief of the Christians appears to be the only plausible one, that he was a superior good man. He was the son of God, as every other man is the son. His miraculous birth man is the son. His miraculous birth man is the son. His miraculous birth man is the son.

J. W. Boyer: Q. How does one mind affect another, present or absent?

A. In precisely the same way that in wireless telegraphy, a transmitting instrument impresses its vibrations on the receiving instrument. Thoughts are sent out from the mind as vibrations in the spirit ether, and impinge on receiving minds.

J. M. Mathews: Q. Is it true that electricity is the power that builds all worlds and sustains all nature? What is the spirit or life of man or of the universe? Is it composed of corpusescles? If not what is the moving spirit of the universe—God?

A. These questions are all based on an article in the Examiner, one of the Hearst newspapers, entitled "Comprehensive Discoveries in Electricity." In the article the electricity is made of corpusescles, "they are about one thirty-thousandth part the size of atoms whence all matter is composed."

"These corpusescles are known to be centers of force." "Free, uncombined corpusescles, those not locked and hence free to move, constitute the life of the universe." "Every atom is composed of corpusescles of electricity."

As for the force in these corpusescles, "Suppose two one-grain masses of corpusescles are placed four tenths of an inch apart, then the repulsion of each upon the other will be twenty quadrillions tons!"

"One cubic inch of copper contains thirty atoms," and one-third quadrillion atoms. "Electric corpusescles give life to the entire universe by their attractions, repulsions and motions." "The problem how to tap nature's reservoirs is drawing nearer and nearer to a solution."

It is not strange that this correspondent hesitates in his acceptance of these statements, although made by one of the most advanced scientists. They are put forward with the bold assurance of demonstrated propositions. Recently the same author made a terrific onslaught on Spiritualism, his main objection being that it made assertions and failed to demonstrate. He wanted facts, and so discriminating was his analytical mind that nothing satisfied him.

This shows how different the receptivity of the best minds is to different fields of thought. He knows just how big one atom is, and the size of a corpusecle of electricity. He knows just as perfectly as though he had measured them with a foot rule. He knows how many atoms there are in a cubic inch of copper as we as if he had counted them and yet had he begun the task 6,000 years ago, he would have scarcely commenced the task at the present time.

I well understand the methods of computation by which these results are gained, and granting the data they have plausibility. But the data are problematical. They are all assumptions, and hence the conclusions are as unreliable as a cobble house, which will stand as long as no one will touch it.

The existence of the atom and corpusecle is hypothetical. The form, size and character of these are absolutely unknown, and the mathematical calculations which present such startling numbers, have no assurance of being accepted tomorrow.

As electricity being the life of the universe, why should it be more than light or heat? Electricity is not a cause, but an effect. The first cause is motion; the setting in vibration of ether and atoms. According to conditions, that motion appears as heat, light, or electricity. These are the revelations of that motion to our senses.

It would be just as consistent to speak of heat corpusescles or light corpusescles as electric. And if these are vibrations, why should electrons, or corpusescles, be called in to explain that which is better explained without them?

A calculation, however brilliant its methods, which arrives at the conclusion that two corpusecles would weigh only a grain each, at the distance of four-tenths of an inch apart, repel each other with a force of twenty quadrillions tons, should have made the calculator hesitate at its absurdity.

Have these corpusescles weight, or attraction, or is this a property of the atom? Do these theorists mean that an electric corpusecle travels with the velocity of 186,000 miles in a second, or in three lines of corpusescles, in every direction, the first being tilted, tilts the next, and so that a line of them 186,000 miles long is tilted in a second?

If the force exercised by a grain of electricity, equals twenty quadrillion tons, a pound of it would move all the machinery of the world, and all that there could be found room to place on its surface, and then so small a portion would have been taken that it would not be noticeable! No wonder these scientists are eager to "tap nature's reservoirs," and stand by and let the on-rushing "corpusescles" pay the freight!

Marconi and Edison have been continually feeding open-mouthed reporters with their ideas of "tapping" the central forces, but where they expect to insert the spigot, they have as little idea as Johnny Coal-Oil had of where money came from. It might be a dangerous affair, jeopardizing the existence of mankind and continuance of the present order of things, for one of these theorists to tap the central force. He is not certain of his ability to control the spigot, and enough "corpusescles" could get through an inch hole in a minute to blow this earth to atoms and land the dust on the coast-line of the stars.

It is horrible to contemplate, and if any one gets the "tapping" desire into his head, he should be cautioned. Nobody is safe with such scientists at liberty. They are a constant menace to all peaceful citizens. The anarchists will get on to their secret, and instead of bombs, which can be detected on their persons, they can equip themselves with the few "electric corpusescles" which are so small, that a mustard seed is bigger to them than the earth is to a mustard seed, and hence no detective can find them as evidence.

Thus armed they can throw a corpusecle at an enemy, police judge, or czar. No one could see them, but alas when the infinitesimal electron struck, ten thousand bombs would be more than a fire cracker in comparison.

This may be science—demonstrated knowledge—it strikes one more like a dream. Possibly it may be all true, and become established by confirmation of the hypothetical data on which the calculations rest. Possibly, tomorrow will see another theory making these corpusescles obsolete. As present theory is taken as a romance of science. Accepted as such, it is pleasant reading. As scientific truth having authority of the names of those who support it, it is extremely damaging.

A famous lecturer before the Chautauqua Association was applying his theory to every-day experience. He said the hardness of substance depended on the rapidity with which atoms or corpusescles moved. In the diamond they were more agile in movements than in glass, hence when the former was pushed against the latter, there was a warfare, and the swiftest-moving beat down the others and cut the glass. This was received with applause. It sounded profound, and as the lecturer was giving, he was in water beyond sounding, they gladly accepted a supporting straw. Fine sounding, apparently profound, but simply "rot."

The other inquiries, as to the nature of the spirit of man, and character of God, require a more lengthy treatment than is here possible. Only briefest outline can be given. We may assume that the spirit is not composed of "electric corpusescles," and God is not electricity. The scientists can readily admit of atoms no microscope can reveal, and electrons, which are an imaginary piece of nothing around which another hypothetical bit of nothing revolves; they see matter and blind force, but they do not see the spirit or the life in nature.

The manifestation of mind?—spirit? The application of evolution to the spirit its continuance from development of physical forms, leads to the conclusion that through man, there is fullest expression of this mind in nature, and its individualization. Man is the physical limit of evolution. By means of his spiritual being, it is transferred to the higher spiritual plane. The question of continuous life after the death of the physical body, is thus answered.

IN DEFENSE OF INCURABLES.

Woman Declares Physically Weak May Be Strongest Spiritually, Intellectually and Morally.—They May Be Beggars in God's Sight.

To the Editor:—After reading the article by O. L. Harvey on putting incurables to death, I wish to tell him I am convinced the majority of civilized human beings believe the same as he with heart and soul.

Some of the strongest, spiritually and intellectually, are the weak physically. If we believe in Christ and His teachings, it is the spiritual and consequently is of value to us and our Creator. There are many persons possessed of perfect physical health and a mind in condition to use, and are perhaps strong intellectually, who are morally and spiritually diseased and are far more worthy subjects for Dr. Osler than any that are or physically incurable could possibly make.

Thank God there are weak and helpless persons in the world, for it tests our hearts and lives. Christ said: "I am the resurrection and the life, and whosoever believeth on me shall never die." What we call death is simply translation. "This body is not mine, but the body that I shall have, and it shall be immortal." One thing is needed, divine and holy love for each other implanted in human hearts.

Sometimes I wish that money and property could lose their value. I think we would learn to prize other things of so much higher worth, even in this world. Why should we covet the so-called riches of this world, if in God's sight they may be beggars in the riches He desires men to have. We can thank God if we have a weak, helpless child or invalid to love and cherish, for Christ came to help them and heal them, not chloroform them, and He suffered pain and death.

Do we wish to prove such poor, weak cowards that we cannot face our duties, no matter what the future holds, for His sake? Courage, love and faith are what we need.—Mrs. L. Jenks in Record-Herald.

Two Little Lives.

An Impressive Lesson to Humanity, by Mary E. Blanchard.

Lizette that morning had been placed by an open window, it had a happy view of the sun, and against the sun-shine some of the leaves looked lighter than the others, which made a pretty contrast. The vine stirred a little to let the sunbeams through, and they fluttered to the floor like phantom butterflies and there danced in the shadows made by the hop. And thus it was that Lizette's poor cotton gown was draped with light, which looked like spectral lace ornamented with jewels. The apple tree, all radiant with blossoms, served as a fairy mansion wherein the bees were gathered as to a ball; and they wore their quaint livery of gold and black, and some danced merrily and others idly, and some watched the sport, as elderly folk might who have passed the folly-line and now are wise—or at least not in favor with Terpsichore.

And underneath were those wide-awake little workers, the sturdy grass-blades.

"Lizette!" said a voice, "O Lizette!" But the woman made no answer; she lolled her head on the high straight back of the little red chair, not larger than a child's, in which she had sat for years; never from infancy had she made use of her limbs; the joy of exercise, the glad leap of the blood under brisk motion, these she had never known. She had come into the world under the shadow of some prenatal ailment, and had stamped the mark of whole-body feebleness that maturity had not had strength to nourish.

At night her care-laden lifted her in strong arms and placed her among the pillows, and every morning she was taken out of them, clothed and led, and left in her little chair to wait the day. She never in all her life had uttered so much as one little word intelligibly; the sounds she made with those flabby lips of hers conveyed no sort of meaning to the stranger, but those who had the charge of her had learned to know her wants as we learn through sympathy to read the wishes of some dumb brute that loves us.

Looking at her now, and not seeing her face, one would have taken her for a child, she was so small; but the face told plainly that age was not far off, and that intelligence had never been of her blessings. And yet, into those eyes there came at times a gleam that was now part ferocity and now part derness; those who knew her best said that she was not insensible to kindness; that she had the power of recognizing one person from another; but this the stranger doubted. With that dwarfish body, and those little helpless hands that were like a child's, and that loling old woman's head, she seemed ever to outsiders, as she sat there, to be an Indian and scraggly; the forehead was low and flat, the cheeks large—an idiot dwarf and so weak in body as to be little less than a paralytic. Such was Lizette.

"Lizette! Lizette! O poor Lizette!" said the voice again, and the woman's vacant eyes drifted to the window; that part of the room from whence it came, and fell on Jaga's splendid green feathers, and the parrot face so comical in its meditative seriousness. Jaga dropped from his perch, grasped the wooden roost with his strong bill, and hung suspended, as fearless as an apple on its stem. He tried to get away, for passion, a trial he had brought, when a sailor, a kinsman of the mute, bought him of a dealer in a quaint old Spanish port and bestowed him on his sister, as a trophy of his roamings.

As the years drifted away, one after another, it was noticed that the dwarf, uneasy, savage, even, if by chance, got to be the custom of the family, it got to be the bird in the room in which she sat. He on his part showed a fondness for the silent little figure in the chair, that never rose on its feet and moved about like other people, from one place to another, and who never taught him anything to do with his beak and claws, and who only shrieked and gurgled and mumbled and nodded head when things went wrong. And now, at the close of many years of silent comradeship, between the woman with her pathetic dullness and the bird absurdly wise, there had sprung up an affinity, such as might exist between two animals. It was a pitiful thing, the parrot possessed more intelligence than only walk, but fly, feed himself, and talk, after a fashion, and as there was nothing about him that called for pity or produced repulsion, he was certainly the more companionable of the two. To him had been granted in larger measure the boon of being.

He now dropped to the floor and stood among the shadows and the sunbeams, then hopped onto the arm of the woman's chair, and so onto the window-sill. The dwarf took no notice of the bird but, rolling her head about, uttered an eerie sound that was part screech, part laugh, when upon a door opened and a woman of stout arms looked into the room.

"What is it, girl?" she drew the chair forward to where the blossoms showed through an oval of the vine, like a splendid picture in a simple frame.

Jaga, sliding forward on the sill, rumped his feathered neck and the woman gazed at him for a moment, then, opening the drawer on the seat, she took out a little stand that sat there, with on it a bowl filled with wild flowers, she bestowed on him a cracker. From a further room she next brought in a pitcher filled with a draught of clear spring water; this she held up to Lizette who, ducking her head like a drunken man, smote her cheek against the extended dish and spilled into her lap the most of the contents; whereupon the other staid her head, and the dwarf drank in a slovenly vacant way, biting the dish with her teeth, not, however, with any show of spleen, but as the parrot might have done in sharpening that strong bill of his.

And again the woman went away, and the sunbeams floated softly with the shadows, like insects about on lily pads.

Jaga ate his fill, pecked at the vido a bit and then, shaking his plump body, started on the return trip to the perch. It was a rather rude contrivance of home make, and consisted of two uprights attached to a circular board, and a big round roost and midway a slat to steady it. Up one of these uprights the parrot made his way, little by little, slipping one foot along, after the other, adding fashion. Half-way he paused, curved his body in towards the brace and, bending his head back over his shoulders, clung there by one foot.

It happened that day for two before Lizette had been carried out of doors and into the "little" orchard; there was a grape-vine there clinging to the wreck of an old arbor, and here, out of the heat, they had left her in her little old-fashioned chair to enjoy the sweet morning. And it came to pass that two young women, guests of the family, stepped down from the piazza shortly afterwards, not knowing what had happened, and walked about a while under the apple trees, their arms around each other. Jaga, among the blossoms overhead, watched them drowsily as they sauntered to and fro at a little distance, talking quietly of their own affairs, their light thin dresses looking cool and pretty about the glowing emerald of the grass. And Jaga's tiny ears, ever open, caught some careless words as they went by; and now, looking at the red, his head bent back and looking at nothing in particular, he said to himself, preceding them with the stereotyped sentence he had uttered so many times throughout the years that everyone in the house, with the exception of his mistress, had long ago forgotten. "The harvest is plenteous, O poor Lizette, if you say nothing, you'll have nothing to be sorry for!"

Then he went upward, got onto his perch, and, covering his feet over with his feathers, settled down quietly, and in due course dozed off into dreams. Whether his mistress noticed this or not he could have no idea. Looking at her but he did not long or sleep over her bowed head the sunbeams played at butterfly, and the old vine at the window wondered if she would ever guess their meaning—for they were saying something to Lizette.

And now another year has taken flight and again the radiant May has tossed over the apple tree its globe of blossoms, and again beside the window sits Lizette. The harvest is plenteous, the dash of scarlet in it, bears her company. Nothing has changed at all in any way; the vine rustles, the breeze steals in and out, bringing the scent of clover, and the sunbeams enter and flit about the room—on their old quest. Watching them, the eyes of the bird brighten, and though he thought had entered that old brain and then the light dies down into the dullness. And again they are fed and comforted, and sleep once more touches with his sceptre "the dumb dwarf." Gently, sleepily, for this is the last time; lingeringly, for that undeveloped soul now passing forth may be laid in the loveliness supreme; lovely, O Sleep, for mighty are the miracles of progression, thou knowest not what for guardian the heavens may yield; reverently, O Sleep, the human soul can climb to the archangel.

And now alone Jaga sits by the vine and climbs onto the back of the low chair and looks down onto the empty seat, as though in question of this thing that has happened to his mistress. And then there comes a day when the bird, bright and cheerful, sits on the floor, a pitiful little heap of tarnished feathers—and from the world two little lives have passed.

And the vine rustles and the sunbeams struggle through and dance once more the still dance of the butterflies, but none can read the meaning they would teach, but Psyche smiles in patience—and all is well.

KIND THOUGHTS.

Such Should Ever Be Sent Out Toward the Weak and Fallen.

If countenance speaks or manner counts for aught, the student of human nature can pretty accurately judge of the individuality of people. Our faces with the tell-tale lines of thought legibly impressed, are so many characters fraught with meaning to be defined by those who make a study of human nature. We all, consciously or otherwise, depend largely upon our individual judgment in reading the faces of people, and allow our impressions, right or wrong, to shape our opinions.

In order to become proficient in the study of human nature, we ourselves have to cleanse our bodies from the impurities and poisons of wrong living, so that reason, the monitor of mind, will be able to read character correctly. Because, if we, through habits vile, bedim the eye or cloud the mind, our distorted senses will lead us astray in causing censure where praise should be given.

In other words, the man or woman who allows his, but unfortunately trips and falls over the ropes of temptation stretched across their pathway, should receive every encouragement, while those who allow themselves to slip down the cliffs of debauchery and sin into the foul depths and putrid air of pollution, with no effort on their part, are to be pitied for their weakness.

In fact, our lives seem to be constantly up and down, stumble and fall, pick ourselves up to fall again, and so on, ad infinitum. If we instill in our minds the thoughts to progress out of the darkness, and ask God, the angel world to give us light, we will surely be carried into the bright and beautiful vibrations of purity and right living. If all we do is to let the evil weeds grow and pure, "we should do unto others as we would have them do unto us," and thus be a law of justice and honor unto ourselves, there would be no need for policemen as appointed guardians of the law, to patrol our streets and drag to jail the unfortunate who disturb the peace. Judges, juries and lawyers would lose their occupation, for the law would seek other employment, were our citizens pure and good, devoid of wrong. So, life, from the time the diminutive babe of humanity is ushered into this existence, sleeping or waking, crying or laughing, is a constant growth and unfoldment, which, if given proper care and attention will develop along the lines of progress from the small bud of infancy and grow into a beautiful flower to adorn the tree of human nature from which it springs.

Nature is an artist that reveals in variety, and her countless designs of beautiful productions seen upon all sides are a constant source of joy and wonder for the children of God, who, if we follow her instructions, and abide by her laws, will blend in color or be as a harmonious note of music to chord in the requiem of peace and joy she is ever singing to the ears of humanity. Surely, this earth is a beautiful place to live, if the feeling of selfishness and strife did not stalk forth in the land like a grim monster of greed and strength in appropriating everything for his share, and depriving the weak of their share.

If you are strong of body, bright in mind, and have an iron will impregnable to the temptations of the flesh, be all the more charitable and merciful when passing judgment upon the weak and fallen. Have a large heart of sympathy in proportion to your strength, and do it to the utmost to shield by word and deed those who are weak, and like the driftwood on life's ocean are carried hither and thither by every passing breeze, to be thrown on the high tempestuous waves of fierce passion, and be broken upon the jagged rocks of the cruel judgment of the world's opinion; and never lose sight of the fact we are all weak, and unable to err, and such were not the case, there would be no need for improvement or progression.

We, as mortals, are component parts of the great Supreme Spirit called God, sent out as living beings for a brief span, to reside for a short time upon this sphere, to receive our lessons of bitter experience, which at times, pierces our hearts with daggers of grief and causes tears of agony to well up in our eyes, and like the beloved Christ, we find ourselves crying out in loneliness and sorrow, "Oh, God! Why hast Thou forsaken me."

My friends, never, please never, talk ill or pass judgment upon others. Let the crime or weakness be ever so flagrant, a violation of the laws of God or man, no matter how strong and firm you stand upon the high and solid rock of will power and self-estimated purity, you know not the moment when you will be assailed by the fierce winds and storms of temptations to be blown from that lofty place of security and find yourself groveling in the dust of shame and remorse at its base, asking in vain for that healing balm of sympathy and pity which you, in your strength, refused to give others. Let your positions in life be what they may, high or low, rich or poor, we, as human beings, are struggling along on the same level of life's common roadway of progression.

Don't imagine yourself in the armor of self-righteousness, shut your minds in from sending out thoughts of sympathy and love, or allow your hearts to become calloused and hardened to the weakness and ills of your brothers and sisters. Be not envious of others, no matter how much they seemingly possess, be it riches, fine clothes or beauty, be sympathetic to your poverty and ill looks, for like the rose apple on the tree, perched high upon some topmost branch, conspicuous and leapingly luscious to behold in comparison to its neighbors of dull color, it may have a worm in its core gnawing out its vitals, causing it to prematurely fall from the high place to rot and decay.

Beautiful words like gems of brilliancy may be grouped to blend in harmonious color, to sound musically eloquent and pleasing to the ear; but if I can so arrange my words in plainness as to be able to forcibly convey and indelibly impress upon your minds this one thought—have love in your hearts for the weak—I will feel that my effort has not been in vain. Ever and always send out your love thoughts to God; and the angel world for all mankind, especially the fallen, for they most of all need your help and sympathy.

Every few days there comes from the church a more liberal and greater liberality, showing that the church continues to grow more liberal. It is seldom one hears the old-fashioned "hell and brimstone" sermons of even our childhood days. Religion is being held out to the people as something to be loved for its benefits, rather than feared. As the change progresses from a more conservative to a more liberal, toward "amusements that are in and of themselves harmless. While in towns remote from large cities there goes up a cry against Sunday games, there comes from the churches in the cities an approval.

Right Rev. M. J. Hoban, bishop of Scranton, Pa., recently came out in favor of the game of baseball and other athletic games. He reached his conclusion by viewing the privations of those who during the entire week devoted to labor are so engaged they have no time or opportunity to enjoy the sports and receive no recreation from their laborious tasks. He said: "I have often played football or football or any other kind of ball to their hearts' content. The good Lord will be pleased to see them do it, I aver, providing they are good boys."

Rev. Hoban is right! The churches would flourish more if they were larger congregations and do more good to humanity, as well as religious souls to the Master. If young people were not taught that religion was a constant denial and personal sacrifice. In the cities most ministers attend theaters, of course selecting those that commend themselves as worthy, and many of them even participate in select dances. It is to be regretted that to rail against these harmless amusements and endeavor to legislate people into the church. Recreation is rest, and Sunday is a day of rest from the labors of the week, and we see no good reason why harmless sports should not be engaged in at reasonable hours and with proper restrictions.—Medford (Vt.) LIFE and REMINISCENCES OF Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

By Edward C. Smith.

"The Record of a generous life runs like a vine around the memory of our dead, and every sweet unselfish act is now a perfumed flower."

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL was a great and brilliant man, he was the greatest genius of his age. His place is beside Shakespeare, Voltaire, Goethe and Shelley. He was a great Lawyer, Politician, Reformer, Orator, Critic and Philosopher. His wonderful gift of language touched with the spirit and charm of poetry aided by his powerful gift of wit and humor, made him the most formidable foe the church has ever had.

He was great because he was honest. He shook the world with his eloquence and reasoning. His arguments were never answered. As a Lawyer his arguments were always so convincing that he won his case.

He knew many things by learning and more by intuition.

He was an Intellectual Giant, and it is very probable that the wonderful combinations he possessed, the world will never see again.

The author who was a close friend and great admirer of Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, was assisted by near relatives who collected a great amount of valuable data, and in no other way could this information be obtained. The writing of the "Life and Reminiscences" was purely a labor of love; and it is useless to say has been written in the fairest and kindest spirit, every detail having been carefully recorded. Much of this data was collected and revised before the Colonel's death, and great care was taken in only recording after careful research.

This valuable edition has been aptly illustrated with many beautiful half-tone illustrations of the Colonel in different periods of his life. Also portraits of his sisters and brothers, family, father and mother, together with a genealogical chart, also many valuable reminiscences. The work is well written, handsomely bound, and beautifully printed. All admirers of the Colonel will welcome its publication.

SAVING LIFE BY HYPNOTISM.

Where There Is Life, There Is Hope.

Dr. John Duncan Quackenbos of New York, member of the London Society for Psychical Research, fellow of the New York Academy of Medicine, and member of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, announced lately a case of life-saving by hypnotism. The feat was based on the fact that at the moment of death suggestibility is at its maximum. Dr. Quackenbos said:

"In June last I was called to the bedside of a young woman who had passed through a series of infections culminating in pneumonia. Her condition equaled a death sentence—temperature 107½, pulse 160, respiration 60. The attending physicians had withdrawn from the case as beyond the pale of hope. As I looked at the girl an inspiration came to me. I took her by the hand, learned her first name from the nurse, and said with great emphasis:

"Adele! Where are you going? You can not die! Come back! You have work to do on earth! Come back at once!"

"In answer to the summons, the upturned eyes resumed their natural angle, and became riveted on mine. The voice that had for days uttered only the ravings of delirium, now spoke coherently.

"It is too late," I murmured.

"It is not too late!" I rejoined. "Do not say it is too late. Stay where you are. Assume immediate control of your physical functions, and get well. You are going to recover!"

"All this in an imperative, forceful tone. A change for the better supervened. Gradually the mental mist cleared away, the physical strength returned, and to-day the young lady is perfectly well, filling an important position in the choir of an uptown church."—News Item.

Experiences similar to the above occur in the practice of every person that uses mental and spiritual means for healing.

There is often a critical period in a patient's condition when the life forces are so low and the mind so passive that the spirit drifts away from the consciousness of physical life and loses its power to polarize life in the body. If at such a time a positive mind should be held by the spirit or audible voice, the spirit would be thrown out of the body and the patient would be called death. A passive mind can fuse a weak patient with great strength and often enable him to conquer disease and weakness to which he was alone and unaided he would succumb.

I have held the hands of those said to be dying and by infusing them with the strength of my magnetic force while I kept the spirit subject to my will, the life force in the body was so greatly renewed that dying for the time being was an impossibility.

The mind or spirit is polarized to the body subject to the action of magnetic and mental forces. If the body or mind becomes weakened by disease, then the spiritual entity is depolarized from the body and becomes polarized to a mental state of existence.

The knowledge of the power of thought has saved many lives by enabling someone at the critical moment to counteract the depressing effects of fear or drugs by awakening a living hope and arousing the dormant activities in the body. Where this knowledge is not understood the mental atmosphere which so often surrounds those considered seriously ill, have been saved very often by the potency of human love. Human affection has often held so tenaciously to the passing spirit that it could not break the bonds and was forced to remain in magnetic rapport with the body until the tide of life had changed and it was borne back to physical life and activity. There would be fewer persons buried alive were such love as the following story illustrates more common.

A young lady died apparently. She had a girl friend who loved her very dearly who would not leave the body. She magnetized it and called in love to her friend to return, refusing to eat or drink, remaining with the body for twenty-four hours. She was finally rewarded by the restoration to life of the one she loved. The story that that one told upon regaining consciousness illustrates the power of love and the magnetic connection that exists between the spirit and the body when from any cause there is a separation of the two. She said that she remained in the room in her spirit form and felt bound to the body by the force of her friend's love. She saw a fine cord-like force that connected her spirit form with the heart of the physical body, and in the heart she saw a small flame that was kept burning by the magnetic love of her friend. She felt that if her friend left the body the flame would no longer burn and she would be free. She was passively interested and did not care much whether she returned to the physical form or not because she was conscious that in either event she would continue to exist and be in mind all that she had been, at least. But the flame grew larger in the heart and she felt drawn closer and closer to it until she awoke to consciousness in the body.

Such might have been the experience of the widow's son, or Lazarus, or the daughter of Jairus, whom Jesus called back from the valley of the shadow of death. Conscious knowledge of his power to do, coupled with a mightier love, enabled him to command more immediate results, but such experiences as these teach us that the forces of mind, love, will and thought can often when used by the humblest, restore the sick, change destiny and conquer death.

DO YOUR DUTY HERE.

Leave Your Future in the Hands of Infinite Intelligence.

How many times the remark has been made by thoughtful ones, "I wish I knew for a certainty that my friends are happy." Dr. Hodgson will never establish that certainty beyond doubt. Why? Because he will not be permitted to do so. It would not be wise. No matter how much he may wish to fulfill his promise. The universal law is a fixed law, and neither time nor advanced thought can change it.

I am a believer in spirit return, but there is always a lingering doubt as to whether or not the manifestation may be, and it is a wise Providence that has made it so, because did I know beyond a doubt that I should live an intelligent individuality after I had laid aside this suffering weak body, I should be in a hurry to be gone, and not many hours would elapse before I should joyfully say good-bye to all care, sorrow and trouble. Others would do the same and this earth would become depopulated in a very short time.

What a lonesome desert this earth would soon become if we all knew beyond a doubt that the change would bring us unalloyed happiness such as we hope sometimes to obtain. Hence if we reason on this subject we can see how fallacious the thought or expectation that Mr. Hodgson or anyone else is going to be permitted to settle the question for us for all time.

Furthermore the incomprehensible Intelligence placed in every living creature the fear of death, that we might not seek death as a relief from trouble; were it otherwise His fixed laws would not be perfected. Would He at the same time establish a law whereby we might know these things, making it optional with ourselves whether we go or stay? Certainly not, for the two laws would conflict with each other and his plans be overthrown. They would be contradictory, therefore both laws could not exist at the same time. Dr. Hodgson himself, making a promise to return, in his ignorance of the result, would change his mind, even though it was in his power to return, when he, as a spirit, realized the disastrous results that would recur were such a wish carried out.

Just think of these things in a rational and reasonable way, my friends, and do not expect too much from the spirit side here. Be content to do your duty here by one another as you see it and as you are commanded, thus fulfilling your destiny, and leave your future to the All-wise, Omnipotent, Incomprehensible Ruler of all things.

ONSET, MASS.

LOVE, TRUTH, CHARITY.

These Principles Rule the World and Manifest God's Great Plan.

They are the foundation structure of all great and substantial work; without them we would have nothing to achieve, which is the power of love, truth, and charity.

By their analysis we find them inseparable in their manifestations; each depends upon the other for its existence. We cannot love except through truth, and with charity for our fellow man in his beliefs and disabilities.

We should feel and know that if we could both be constituted alike, and were both of the same mental training, our opinion would be harmonious, and our knowledge would be identical but this would mean mental stagnation. All nature is in a constant process of harmonizing. She is ever active and progressive. It is this difference in men's views and knowledge which brings about discussions and investigations. It is a law of nature which keeps us ever alert to harmonize opinions which seem so diametrically opposed to each other. This means mental progression, which is only another manifestation of God's will being done.

Truth is the balance by which all things are weighed; because of love for mankind, Truth sits at the bar of justice, which is the power of truth, and charity is the council.

Let us then seek the truth, and live by it, that our deeds may be good, that our works may be an eternal structure, and our lives a guide to assist others along the highway of right, for time and eternity.

And Charity. "If you have all the gifts, but have not charity, it profits you nothing." How true that is in earthly as well as spiritual things; charity stands ever ready to our cases, to compare the conditions and study the facts concerning our respective positions, that our knowledge and our deeds may be justly weighed in the balance of Truth.

Therefore let us not say, "Because I am an eye I am not of the body." All things are created by God and are good. All things are in a constantly changing state of evolution, undeveloped good we call bad. Undeveloped fruit is (not good) bad, we say. The boy whose spirituality and humanity are undeveloped is bad.

Let us then have charity to study and try to understand why things are which we call bad. For God is Good and controls all things.

Why Deacon Isaiah Backslid.

Brother Isaiah, what made you quit the evangelic fold? Nothing was ever meant by us to make you turn so cold. We can't imagine why it is you've stayed so long away. You're our good Deacon—absent now this many a Sabbath day. You're respectable, and honest, and fore-handed, and all that. You lead in every good thing you can get your fingers at; You make no low-down compromise with cowardice or greed. We're sorry, Brother Isaiah, 'cause you're just the man we need.

Well, Brother Obed, since you've asked, I'll tell you, straight and plain, Why I don't come to meetings, and why I won't come again. Domine Dogmatism says Christians must not know more'n a thousand years ago. By kings, and priests, and councils, that weren't any more inspired. To tinker Revelation, and tell what the Lord required, And settle for all time just what the Bible says and means, That we are to proclaim it true that cabbage is white beans.

I got tired out with being just a consecrated drone; And since I've done a little healthy thinking of my own, Theological back-numbers on their ancient mouldy shelves, I've listened to no end of rant and spleen on "being saved." Over that vital point more evangelic (?) cranks have raved, Than ever had a "call to preach," or any right to say. How we should understand the Bible-writing of the way.

Great many hundred years ago, some priests got up the fad, That folks with clean morality may still be worse than bad; While such as live life nearly out in moral bane and blight, By a mere aping of penitence are fixed over all right. To glide straight into that soft job where saints don't do a thing, But just sit down in robe and crown, and finger harps, and sing; And feel uncommon jubilant 'cause such a life without This evangelic (?) fixing up, are endlessly shut out.

They want you to believe, and join, and pose as their recruit; And give soul, body, mind and time, and several dimes to boot; They tell you some one "paid it all" long centuries ago. And yet, if you don't pay some more, you have no saving show. Their plan sends ninety-nine one-hundredths of the human race To scorch and screech forever down in Satan's firing-place; Notwithstanding millions of them never had a chance to know That saviors ever give men points on how to dodge the blow.

Or that there has been patched on to the evangelic (?) dream Eternal anger, calling for a substitute; Adam's and Eve's disgrace conceived and born in every child; Reprobation, total sin, and other notions, foul and wild. Some say that God could have all spirits reach their level-best; If He would, but then He won't; for that uncompromising test Of awful scorn dignity sets hard against the plan. And keeps His love forever back from doing all it can.

SPIRIT OF THE HUSBAND.

He Makes Lots of Money for His Wife, and She Devotes It to the Use of the Lord.

New York.—Declaring that she is advised by the spirit of her dead husband, who founded the bond investment and brokerage business she is conducting, Mrs. J. Alden Gaylord, head of the firm that bears her name, says she firmly believes that financial success can be gained in Wall street by godly business methods conducted through spiritual guidance.

"There is no place in the world," says Mrs. Gaylord, "where there are so many Christian and godly men as in Wall street. Otherwise, where would I be?"

Mrs. Gaylord's husband died in 1904 at his home in Boonton, N. J., at the age of sixty-two. A widow, to whom he had been married twenty-four years, took charge of the business that he had founded forty years ago. The concern occupies offices on the third floor of the Mills building.

"When my husband died," said Mrs. Gaylord, "he said he would not be parted from me for long. And now, whenever I am in doubt about anything I seek my guidance and advice from him. Yes, I am convinced that I can commune with him in spirit, although I am not a Spiritualist."

"We carry on our work here according to the teaching of the Scriptures, and business is coming in from every part of the country. Only yesterday two loans came in, one for $3,000,000 and another for $2,000,000."

"The deals will be closed to-morrow. I believe the Lord has educated me in all this. I know he is helping me, and the money I make will go to the Lord. I only want to provide for my grandchildren. All the rest will go to charity and the missions."

"Every morning after I arrive in this city, I spend a few moments in Old Trinity to pray. That was a custom of my husband, who was one of the most godly men that lived."

"Before we begin business here we have a prayer meeting in the office. I have a good many young men here to whom I am teaching the business. I conduct the services, assisted by my partner, Mr. Fletcher."

Mrs. Gaylord is conducting the business on original lines and expresses the confident belief that she will make several million dollars in a few years. Her friends in banking and brokerage firms in the financial district say she has displayed remarkable aptitude for business.—Los Angeles Examiner.

The first test of a truly great man is his humility.—Ruskin.

Others say God would bring things round to suit him if He could; But then He can't for human wills have obstinately stood, And will forever stand and block the saving wheels Of His desire and pleasure, and of love's divine appeals. Compromise, they declare, that God both can and will Have every soul repent and do its best to "fill the bill" Of His supreme and oath-bound choice that all shall yet be saved From all iniquity wherein they've ever misbehaved—

And so, sometime, all fit themselves to let eternal life Get better chances at them than the curse of sin and strife, Till Beelzebub is driven out from every poor lost soul, And God's dominion is given up to His entire control. Now if these folks would stand up more aggressive than they do For the name and church that make so plain what we all know is true, I'd join with those same people—yes, I'd join with them to stay— You'd not see me backsliding till the consummation day.

I'd help to freeze the musty, rancid dogmas all to death. With absence and starvation I'd choke off their poison breath. That Faith that says God's love and power have more'n an even chance In the eternal ordering of spiritual advance Is all the Faith that's worth a human being's while to seek; The only faith that's honest day by day, Month after month, year in, year out, eternally right through. Till God is All-in-all, instead of some-in-just-a-few.

"Reason together"—that's what makes stained souls as white as wool; "Prove all things"—out so fair, and clear, and easy that "the fool can read it as he runs," then get a grip on what is good. And hold it against false doctrine, and the rest of Satan's brood. Jesus' based pure religion on true love to God and man, And all of it that's fit for use, and clean enough to stand Square, "before God, the Father," and safe through good and ill. Is just "teaching to do evil, and learning to do well."

I know, some people in the (so-called) evangelic sects, Talk liberal in some slight insignificant respect, but still let leopards lose their spots, and Ethiopians bleach their skins, 'Tisn't wise to invest much in those sectarian out-and-outs. For when investigation makes a sure and searching dive Among the bottom elements that keep the masses in the mire, We find that liars and knaves have been invented as a blind To cover up some crested spook they dared not leave behind.

This craze of joining church-machines whose creeds you can't endorse Just for a ride on pious, popularity's high horse, Is worse than merely foolish; 'tis a crying shame and sin. I can live more God love truth outside of such than I can in. So now, dear Brother Obed, I do hope you plainly see— I left because their dogmas slander God, and Christ, and me! That man's a low-down knave who will religiously deceive. I won't help run "old wife's fables" that I don't and can't believe.

REV. GEORGE ADAMS.

A SPLENDID OPPORTUNITY.

It Is Presented for Solution by Mr. Grumbine.

Mr. Grumbine is out with a letter endeavoring to show that mediumship, and spirits acting by means of mediumship, has no advantage over the perfectly normal faculties of the human mind. This may be true, if the normal man has reached a plane that functions on the spiritual side as perfectly as any freed spirit can.

The claims for telepathy and clairvoyance are not the special property of occultism, as they have been among Spiritualists for over 50 years. But Mr. Grumbine in analyzing the terms and conditions for the solution to establish his post-mortem identity with Dr. Funk, maintains that the test agreed upon is no test at all, since it is easily accomplished by students of the occult, without any use of mediumship, or any unliberated spirit at all.

Now, it occurs to me, that this claim should be easily demonstrated, and not left to depend upon mere assumption. If Mr. Grumbine, as a teacher of the occult, can instruct any one so that he can easily penetrate the obscuring clouds of sense, and find, and explain the hidden things of the help of occultic mediums, surely he, the master of mystic, should easily find the key to the Hodgson-Funk agreement, and promptly give to Dr. Funk the exact facts, figures, letters, words or phrases, whatever they may be, as agreed upon, before Dr. Hodgson's death. This might not settle the question of the Doctor's identity; but it would do more to establish the high claims of the occult than all the extravagant advertising of professor liberal sums of money. It might not settle the claims of superiority over mediumship, for similar tests have been given by mediums in a variety of ways, but it would be a splendid advertisement for Prof. Grumbine, and his school of mystery.

Shall we have the test? Now is the accepted time. As nothing depends on spirits or mediumship, what is to hinder Prof. Grumbine giving this test at once, and so perfectly as to leave no room for cavil? Let us have the test.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

Fredonia, N. Y.

There is one word which may serve as a rule of practice for all one's life. That word is reciprocity. What you do not wish done to yourself, do not do to others.—Confucius.

AS WE THINK, SO WE ARE.

If Wrong Suggestion Has Wrought Havoc in Our Lives, Right Suggestion Will Work Success, Says Angela Morgan in the Chicago Daily Journal.

I wish every worker might read Morgan Robertson's article on self-hypnosis in the current number of the Critic. The writer has pointed out with great clearness how a worker may become hypnotized into believing any sort of detrimental thing about himself simply through the suggestions given him—directly or telepathically—by other persons.

He has shown how a man's abilities may become restricted, his habits spoiled, his health injured, or his prospects ruined, simply through an idea that is impressed upon his mind at a time when he is particularly susceptible. This idea, the writer contends, becomes an actual obsession, to escape from which the victim should "trace out and run down to its source every telepathic thought that has afflicted him, every harmful suggestion given him, and offset these influences by intelligent counter suggestions."

The drink habit, as indulged by literary men laboring under the delusion that they can not write well without stimulants, is distinctly shown to be the result of self-hypnosis.

Whereas the article is written particularly for authors and other creative workers, the principles set forth in it, I believe, applicable to the problems of every human being.

It is my conviction that not alone in the ranks of authors, artists and the like do we find examples of self-hypnosis, but that every member of the human family who is the victim of injurious habits, or who suffers from indigestion, unhappiness, disease or nervousness, is in the grip of an obsessing idea. And I believe such idea can be removed by the person himself, that through his intelligent and repeated use of powerful counter-suggestions which hammer and torment him.

I believe that none of us is the victim of actual limitations and deficiencies as he is of harmful beliefs and ideas. We hypnotize ourselves into believing we are restricted by such and such conditions; that we are handicapped by certain inherited traits, that we are kept from achievement because of environment or training, or lack of natural aptitude for the work lying nearest—the work imperatively ours to do.

In our blindness, many of us shift the blame upon fate or luck, complaining bitterly of the weaknesses, deficiencies and handicaps with which nature has cursed us. We forget to look for the cause in ourselves and do not see that in our own minds is the energy that will free us from the "conditions" that enslave us.

I have no doubt, if we would trace back to the respective beginnings the various evils and limitations that afflict us we should be amazed to find a large number of them are directly due to the false suggestions others have given us, or that we have given ourselves; suggestions which we, ignorant of our own dominion, have permitted to dominate our thoughts and hence control our lives.

I believed even our traits of mind and character are frequently established in this way. If a child is repeatedly informed that he is stupid he soon finds it impossible to be anything else. If he is told that he is ill-tempered and bad, he will become ill-tempered and bad. As we think, so we are.

It would be well for us all to ask ourselves just how far we are letting our erroneous beliefs injure our lives and the lives of those about us.

We should help ourselves and others greatly if we would stop talking about failure, weakness, limitation, and emphasize their opposites in thought and speech. For certainly if we can hypnotize ourselves to believe we are ill, or unhappy, or unsuccessful, or that we are the slaves of impulsive habits, we can just as easily "hypnotize" ourselves into desirable conditions.

That is, if wrong suggestion has wrought havoc in our lives, right suggestion will work beauty, harmony, health and success.

HE IS THROWN IN DOUBT.

But Concludes We Had Better Turn Our Thoughts Towards Heaven.

Once more we are thrown into doubt and vexation; Our teachers, the preachers, cannot agree As to whether or not we are doomed to damnation, And, if so, how, when and where this will be.

Some say that there is, others hold that there isn't.

A place down below for men who will sin.

Where forever and aye they will be imprisoned, Once ferried over and landed there-in.

Some tell us, also, that torment's eternal, Describing a place that does surely amaze us.

Deep under the earth in regions infernal Where they say it is hot, yes, hotter than blazes.

Others contend it's a place theoretic, Which means that it has no existence at all, And say it is used in the art homiletic For frightening folks who may be in sin's thrall.

So it is and it isn't; it's hot and it's cold, Where you may sizzle or where you may freeze;

Where you may undergo pain multi-fold, And where you'll find none but the devil at ease.

'Tis hard to decide, we all know very well, With the preachers at sixes and sevens.

But while they are fighting it out about hell, Let us turn our own thoughts toward heaven.

—Pittsburg Leader.

CONTINUITY OF LIFE.

Has It Been Proved to a Reasonable Scientific Certainty?

While there are many of the leading scientific men of the world, at the present time, who fully believe in the phenomena as well as the philosophy of Spiritualism, yet quite a majority of such men are inclined to believe that the phenomena of Spiritualism have not been proved to a reasonable scientific certainty. It is, however, frankly conceded by all honest investigators, that the evidence is very exact, but very many of them contend that it fails to meet the requirements of scientific proof. Let this be admitted, but is it not true that a large majority of the scientists adopt a more stringent rule of proof, in their investigations of Spiritualism, than they require in the examination of other phenomena?

There has hardly ever been a scientific truth accepted as absolute. Such truth receives only provisional acceptance. And certain it is that the phenomena of Spiritualism have been sustained by proof so persuasive and convincing, as to entitle it to be received as provisionally true. Most scientific truth is far from being conclusive.

Disraeli once said that "All we know is, nothing can be known." And Herbert Spencer has truthfully written, "The man of science sees himself in the midst of perpetual changes, of which he can discover neither the beginning nor the end. He realizes, with a special vividness, the utter incomprehensibility of the simplest fact considered in itself. He knows more than any other, knows that in its ultimate essence nothing can be known."

It is a simple matter to plant a kernel of corn in the rich warm soil of mother earth, in the spring of the year, to observe in due time its tender blade emerge into the world, under the light of God, and finally to witness the product of golden ears. But the scientific man has yet to be born who will understand the secret of its growth. We know but little and can know but little of the manifold environments which beset us on every side. Science is but a blind man's guess in the deciphering of the mysteries of the universe.

Humanity will never know, this side of the grave, what there is beyond, or what are the real purposes of the existence of man. The finite will never be able to comprehend the infinite. The less will never be capable of containing the greater. We may be able to see enough during our carnate life, to assure us that our lives are to be continuous, but we will be forever unable to solve the complicated problems which confront us upon the journey through the "bewildering masquerade of life." And none but the disincarnate may know the secrets of heaven.

The survival of the soul after death is better sustained by reliable proof than any important matter in which men are interested. The inborn consciousness of man since the dawn of his creation, that his life will survive the incident of death, is a most convincing proof of the immortality of the soul.

The whims of doubting Thomases cannot shake the belief of mankind in the continuity of life.

CARL C. POPE.

FIFTY-EIGHTH ANNIVERSARY.

How It Was Celebrated at Port Huron, Mich.

The fifty-eighth anniversary of Modern Spiritualism was celebrated in the most unique manner by the Occult Club, a Spiritualistic society of this city, which was organized October 8 last, by Dr. R. McL. Angus, and is now incorporated under the laws of the state of Michigan.

The hall was handsomely decorated with flowers, palms and bunting. The most unique part of the program was the marriage of two of its young members, Elizabeth May Simpson and David W. Losie. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Mrs. Belle Yost, the newly ordained pastor of the Church of New Thought. Many virgins and handsome presents were given the young couple by their large host of friends. The bride was handsomely gowned in pale blue and was attended by Miss Edna McCluskey, who wore white. The groom was attended by Henry Lauson, while little Irene Yost carried the flowers and ring, presenting them to the bride at the close of the ceremony.

After the couple were made husband and wife, about two hundred were seated at tables that were abundantly supplied with food, of which all partook and were made merry.

The banquet was followed by speeches, recitations, songs, and musical selections. N. B. Renwick acted as chairman, and with a few remarks on the articles of incorporation and its State charter, and made a few remarks on the incorporation which were received with applause.

Harry Howe, president of the club, spoke on the Objects of the Club and the Growth and Development of Spiritual Phenomena, and Harry Lakin addressed the members and guests on Occultism.

Everybody left the hall with the best of feeling, and the Club can look forward to a bright and prosperous future.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

The Excellent Results That Flow From It.

A deadly calmness prevails in the city of the Latter Day Saints in regard to Spiritualistic affairs. What is the cause of it? It is because of the Mormon Baptists, Catholics, and other saints and non-saints who whirl their denunciations as usual from their pulpits, trying to create the impression that if it were not for them the whole world would turn rascal. Besides the Arnold and Dixon Brothers and Mrs. Fontyn, who hold public seances for commercial purposes, we can not

WHISPERS.

The Chicago Tribune Poet Gives an Analysis of the Same.

There is a whisper in the trees That, faint and bare, Sway here and there, And time the songs the breezes bear— The foreword of the birds and bees. The trees that seemed as pulseless things Now shift and shake And are awake; The swelling buds are fair to break In answer to the whisperings. They whisper, whisper, all the day Of summer sun, Of fancies spun In twilight when the day is done And sunset shadows come and play. They murmur promises all sweet, That we shall wade Down through the shade Their heavy, bending boughs have made To soothe us in the drowsing heat.

They chant a haunting summer hymn Of skies all blue, Of doves that coo, Of nodding roses dipped in dew, Of white stars on the world's wide rim.

They laugh all softly of the scent Of apple bloom, Of the hum of bees, Of beetles buzzing in the gloom; Of wondrous dawns that bring content.

They stand as eager sentinels That hear the hum Of bees that come As armies at the rally-drum Whose rousing roll the echo swells.

And so the trees bend to and fro Against the gray Old sky, and say That summer hurries up the way— The mystic trees, they know; they know! W Interesting Biographical Sketch.

We copy from the American Cyclopaedia, Vol. 8, page 454, title Hardouin:

"Hardouin, Jean, a French Jesuit, born in Quimper, Brittany, in 1646, died in Paris, Sept. 3, 1729. He entered the order of Jesuits, and after teaching rhetoric for some time, went to Paris to finish his classical studies. He prepared Pliny's 'Natural History' for the Delphin series of classics, five volumes, and in his 'Chronologia ex Nummis Antiquis Restituta' maintained that of all the ancient classics none are genuine but Homer, Herodotus, Cicero, Pliny the Elder, the Epistles of Virgil, and the Satires and Georgics of Horace; and that with the aid of these monuments of the 15th century had been destroyed all the others and reconstructed ancient history. The Aeneid he regarded as an allegory of the progress of Christianity. His work was suppressed by order of Parliament, but was surreptitiously reprinted. He was COMPELLED to recant his opinions; and he reproduced them in subsequent works. In 1715 Hardouin published his great 'Concilium Collectum,' twelve volumes, embracing the concilia held from the year 34 to 1714, including more than 20 whose acts had not before been published. At the request of six doctors of the Sorbonne the Parliament arrested the sale of the work, and caused a number of leaves to be cancelled." Then follows a long list of books of which Hardouin was author.

Chambers, in his Encyclopedia, adds to this knowledge, by saying: "Hardouin was appointed Librarian of the College of Louis le Grand, in which office he enjoyed full leisure for the literary pursuits in which he delighted. Dupin places him among the very first scholars of his learned brotherhood. He rejected as spurious all the reputed works of ancient art, together with the inscriptions and coins which are attributed to classical times; nay, he extended the same skepticism to the Septuagint version of the Old Testament, and even to the Greek text of the New Testament, the original language of which he held to have been Latin."

Christian writers, to destroy the force of Hardouin's pointed criticisms, say: "There is some reason to believe they were put forward by him from a love of paradox." Was that the best defense churchmen could make to the declaration of a learned and voluminous author, who reaffirmed his assertions after being compelled to recant, but, like Galileo, as soon as at liberty reassessed them with still greater earnestness?

Other scholars, equally learned with Hardouin, have reached the same conclusions as did the Catholic Jesuit, though in consequence of living in a later and better age they were not forced to recant their discoveries, yet they have felt the full force of Christian "hate" in numberless ways.

A Poor Show for Christians.

Lieut. Lynch, in his "The Dead Sea and the Jordan," it being an account of his explorations in 1848 of these distant regions under the auspices of our government, he having a goodly number of Mohammedans in his service, in descending the Jordan from the Lake of Galilee, relates on pages 146-7 an interview with an Arab chieftain in his service, who was above the ordinary in intelligence. Lynch says: "The Mohammedans are all Unitarians, and believe in the interposition of angels in human affairs."

The Lieutenant inquired of Sheriff if he did not think a good Christian might go to heaven, and received for answer:

"How can you hope it, when you insult the God you believe in, by supposing he died the ignominious death of a criminal?"

That answer, properly considered, would make a text for an elaborate discourse, to the detriment of idol worshippers, including in that category all who worship anything less than the True God.

The Bible Paramount to Jesus.

"I would renounce Christ before I would doubt one syllable contained in the Bible."

Such is the reported language of Rev. Dr. Burrell, pastor of a Reformed Dutch church in New York, while addressing a few days ago a class of theological students at New Brunswick, N. Jersey. The dominion, in the guise of a church attorney, added:

"The Bible is true from beginning to end, including the story of Jonah and the whale; or the Bible is not true, parts of it are false like the alleged forgery of Deuteronomy, but Christ did not know it; or did not want to say anything. Do not affront Christ by saying he did not know as much as you."

Even if Jesus was anointed and made a Christ, after the manner of the age in which he lived, it added nothing to his wisdom. Born of woman, if a real character, he was human still. In that age, and for many preceding and after ages, kings, priests, idols, and even stones were christened with oil and made Christs, and this without adding a whit to their knowledge. And the endorsement of the Bible by any one of them did not add one iota to its truthfulness.

To a naturalist who knows of the construction of a whale, with a barred throat of bony structure, it would be as reasonable to say, Jonah swallowed a whale, as to assert a whale swallowed Jonah, the latter, deprived of air, living three days in its belly.

The author of that romance was ignorant of the fact that animal life can only survive a few minutes without being replenished with oxygen absorbed in the process of breathing from the atmosphere.

It is very probable there are physicians ignorant of the fact that Cheesden, in his Anatomy, originally written about 1713, and in general use among physicians as late as 1800, had no just conception of the use of breathing. The author struggles through several pages trying to discover its use, and concludes:

"The known uses of the air's entering the lungs, are to be instrumental in speech, and to convey effluvia into the nose, as it passes for the sense of smelling; but the great use of it, by which life is preserved, I think we do not understand."

This is copied verbatim, with the book in hand, from p. 173, of the Boston edition of 1795.

It would be instructive to some of our readers to state it was not until 1764 that the atmosphere was separated by Dr. Priestly into three elements, the vital part of which, oxygen, is taken up by breathing, passing into the general circulation, and imparting the red color to arterial blood. With this discovery to good physiological scholars, the story of a residence of three days in the whale's belly was relegated to the domain of myth. In the same class with virgins becoming the mother of either a God or a man. It used to be said: "A well told lie, adhered to, is as good as the truth," and the church's petfoggers are acting on that hypothesis.

If we have not already convinced readers of The Progressive Thinker that the Bible is very errant, we trust somebody will reconcile the grave statements credited to God with natural facts. We don't want any priestly cavilling to show when one thing is said the Bible means the opposite.

A Fortunate Event.

It was fortunate for the world, for truth, and for Spiritualism, that the churches repulsed spirit teaching, and clung with viper tenacity to their old and fast decaying creeds. Had they accepted the truth or loved from the other side of life taught, it would have been merged with all the errors and falsehoods of orthodoxy, including fallen man, total depravity, bloody sacrifices, a God drawn on a cart by bellowing cows over the plains of Palestine, an ever-burning sulphurous hell, a Redeemer to conditionally save humanity from that hell; an infallible Bible, with all the incidentals the preachers relate in their fervid zeal to extend their barbaric faith.

Because of this rejection of Spiritualism the teachings of those advanced loved ones are being received by the world's great thinkers, while the compilers of primal ignorance and superstition are hastening to decay and oblivion.

Instead of borrowing titles and customs from the churches, Spiritualists should have shown faith in their own movement by inaugurating their own methods and titles, with no regard to the "has beens."

Seventy-five years ago, we are assured, the title of Reverend was seldom used. Protestant preachers were known as Elders, while the title Father was generally in use by Catholics, as now. Do not modern languages furnish sufficient names for platform speakers without making drafts on the dishonored ones now in use by those who might in right report, in their own name of Christian was given them in derision by the witty Antiochians?

This reminds us: Ask a hundred average churchmen the derivation of Christian and each will answer, "It applied to the followers of Christ, they assuming his name. A friend asked an Episcopalian clergyman this question, and received for answer: "It was adapted from the surname of Jesus." The dominion was angered, and went off in a huff, when told Jesus had no surname; that it was derived from the bastard Greek christos, meaning to anoint; that this greasy habit of anointing their members with oil was extremely disgusting to the refined Antiochians, and they applied the name in derision, something as the natives of Mexico are now everywhere designated "greasers," because of their greasy, filthy appearance.

JUDGE NOT.

If you know a person well, And a fault you think you spy, Don't believe it—you can't tell—The black spot might be in your eye.

If you think a friend does wrong, Just decide to take his part; Sell not friendship like a song—The black spot might be in your heart.

The good book says, love one another, With deeds of kindness, and not grudging, Speak gently to your erring brother, Judge not, lest yourself be judged. MRS. JULIA BISHOP, Chicago, Ill.

The Bible on Divorce.

The clergy have been laboring for years to induce Congress to enact a uniform law for all the states in regard to divorce, and make the Bible-teaching on that subject the basis of such law. The lady readers of The Progressive Thinker have a right to know what kind of a statute they are asking for when they petition for such a law. Fortunately we have a "Thus saith the Lord" on the subject, and they who accept the Bible as divine may open to Deuteronomy 24:1, and read:

"When a man hath taken a wife, and married her, and it come to pass that she find no favor in his eyes, because he hath found some uncleanness in her; then let him write her a bill of divorcement and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house."

When Jesus was interrogated on the subject, and exercising the wisdom of God, according to trinitarian belief, he is reported, Matthew 5: 31,32, as saying:

"It hath been said, Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a bill of divorcement; but I say unto you, That whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery; and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery."

Dr. Adam Clarke, the learned Methodist Commentator, says, in his comments on these texts:

"The Jewish doctors gave great license in the matter of divorce. Among them a man might divorce his wife if she displeased him even in the dressing of his vitals! And Rabbi Akiba said, 'If any man saw a woman handsomer than his own wife, he might put his wife away; because it is said in the Law, "If she finds not favor in his eyes, Deut. 24:1."'

Dr. Clarke then quotes from Josephus, who he says wrote with great coolness and indifference: "About this time I put away my wife, who had borne me three children, not being pleased with her manners."

It is a well recognized principle of law, when a statute is adopted from some other state or nation, the ruling of the courts under it are brought along with the statute. If the Jewish law in regard to divorce is adopted by us, the divorce courts will have nothing to do; every man who sees a pretty woman than his wife, who he imagines not cleanly, or whose manners do not please him, or who does not tickle his palate by good cooking, will write her a bill of divorcement, of which Dr. Clarke gives specimens.

What a picture is drawn of the Jewish law had no divorce. She pledged herself in marriage to OBEY her husband. He became her lord and master. He could become drunken, licentious, a brute, beat and starve her, do everything and anything to make her wretched and life unendurable, and yet she had no redress. She was his wife and slave until he wrote that brief bill of divorcement and told her to "go."

King David, when he saw a pretty woman, the wife of another, he caused her husband to be placed in the front of the battle and killed. That is the kind of divorce this "man after God's own heart" acted upon to gain Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, through whose loins came our "blessed Saviour."

Dear, dear, what foul libels does that old Jew book teach us, and what a low estimate did its authors place on God! The 2d, 3d, 4th and 5th verses of II. Samuel xi, should not be read, for they detail events, other than a "dream" in the distant percentage of our junior Lord.

Not a Trivial Matter.

According to the daily press, Archdeacon J. Townsend Russell of Brooklyn, N. Y., made a speech at the dinner of the Hamilton club on February 19 last, on the subject of how best to extend the activities of the Protestant Episcopal church in Brooklyn. In speaking of the great number of people in Brooklyn who are not connected with any religious body, the archdeacon had something to say about Jews. He was quoted to this effect:

"They should be converted by us for our own protection. President Roosevelt, before he took up the matter of trying to ameliorate the condition of the suffering Jews in Russia, looked up some statistics and found that 82 per cent of the prisoners in the penitentiaries for crimes against morality were Jews, and that out of seventy-two pickpockets, sixty-five were Hebrews."

The archdeacon's remarks, as quoted, came to President Roosevelt's attention a few days after, and he wrote to Archdeacon Russell asking if he had made the statements attributed to him. The archdeacon wrote back promptly and said that he had been misquoted, but that he had said something to this effect:

"It is reported that certain facts are in the possession of President Roosevelt, and then went on to give the facts as he had got them. Then the President sent this letter to the archdeacon:

"Dear Mr. Russell:—I have your letter of the 27th inst. I am sorry to say that it is not merely the case of reference to me being misinterpreted, for it was in itself a misrepresentation. You stated that I reported that I have found that 82 per cent of criminals against morality and property were Hebrews. I do not know who made any such report, but I never made any such investigation and never made any such statement. I should be obliged if you would tell me who made any such 'report.' Meanwhile, I do not know there is anything you can do to correct the misrepresentation to which you gave currency, save, if the opportunity arises, by stating that I never made such an investigation or made any such statement as you allege. Sincerely yours,

"THEODORE ROOSEVELT."

"I have no desire to get into a controversy with the President of the United States," said Archdeacon Russell. "It occurs to me that the matter is too trivial to warrant further discussion."

It may be a trivial matter in the view of a church dignitary, but it strikes us that the charge of maligning a people so numerous and so law-abiding as the Jews, is not a matter to be disposed of as of no consequence. If the archdeacon's own religious family were slandered in this wholesale manner, we doubt not that he and his church people would feel intense indignation; it would be no trivial affair, and he and they would ask an explanation.

The President appears in an altogether more favorable light in this episode, than the church dignitary does.

THE ANTI-FAKIRS' SOCIETY.

It Has Been Organized in Los Angeles, Cal., and It Is Composed of Fifty Members, all Devout Spiritualists, and It Keeps Steadily at Work, Exposing the Tricksters That Have Fastened Their Poisonous Fangs Upon Our Beloved Cause, and Thus Aids in Sustaining Honest Mediumship, and Promoting Pure Spiritualism—Spiritualists, Is It Not a Curious Fact That Every Materializing Medium Thus Far Exposed, Was Dressed in Artificial Toggery, a Sad Commentary on the Status of Our Beloved Cause?—Is It Not Time That a Concerted Action Was Made to Rid Our Ranks of This Gross Deception?

To the Editor:—Once more a notorious fakir has been exposed, Elsie Reynolds, who has been fooling the Spiritualists for the past twenty-six years, has again had to face the glare of the FLASH LIGHT during one of her impersonations of a departed soul. We have in this city a society known as the Anti-Fakirs' Society, with fifty members. When some medium known to be a fakir, is slated for exposure, our president selects the members he thinks necessary to do the work, and each one is detailed to play a certain part. And each time the plan of exposure is based on different lines of work or tactics—no two alike, hence always successful. If more of these societies were formed, THESE IMPOSTORS AND BLOOD SUCKERS WOULD HAVE TO SNEAK OTHER WORK, AND OUR HONEST MEDIUMS WOULD HAVE A CHANCE.

We first exposed Elsie Reynolds two years ago, and it was a bitter pill for some of our members to swallow, as they had perfect confidence in her; but it is the truth we are after, and any medium that can't FACE THE TRUTH IS THE KIND OF GAME WE DON'T WANT.

Our next case was a Mrs. Fessier, a materializer and trumpet worker. Her spirit manifestations are wholly the result of deception. Then we went after Maud L. Von Freitag. She is a clever platform ball reader and it took a good deal of time and money to land her, but the job was beautifully done.

Mr. H. E. Crindle and his wife came to town. Crindle is a son of Elsie, well educated in the art of deception, by his mother. Their arrival caused a meeting of the society which unanimously voted to give them a run for their money. The same night Elsie woman that grabbed Elsie yesterday, was selected to do the work, which she did to perfection. We were six when the job, but when the crash came it was a matter of minutes. Crindle and two of his pluggers were knocked down, and the police had to break their way in. When the lights were turned on, the medium (Mrs. Crindle) was found crouched in the corner with nothing on but her underwear, and trembling like a whipped pup. The police wrapped her in a wet cloth and took Crindle and his wife to jail in the patrol wagon. The next day they were given twenty-four hours to leave town, which they very wisely did.

About as easy a mark as we have ever dealt with is John Henly. A letter was sent him from Boston, stating a very wealthy widow was coming to Los Angeles, and she being a gullible, who would give him her pedigree, John Henly wrote back he would give $5. We had a short exposure with him last summer, and when the ash light was turned on during a trumpet seance, Henley was discovered holding the trumpet, but instantly dropped it, saying, "McGinnis threw the trumpet at me." McGinnis is the comedian of John's stock company on the other side. The gullible swallowed it, but he was written up the next morning.

Next we had a little sport with Dr. Schlessinger and his side partner and guide Ben. The Doctor's main work of deception is in selling a powder for curing the tobacco habit. It is magicked by spirit Ben, which makes it a sure cure for (?) being a dupe. One night we had a victim was that old trickster, Elsie Reynolds. She arrived here about four months ago, but evidently scented exposure in the air, for she quietly withdrew and settled in Sawtelle, a small place 12 miles from here, adjoining the Soldiers' Home, where she cruelly deceived the old soldiers to her heart's content. Elsie's talents for fleecing such needed money were of great value to her, and she was a good deal of courage and came to Los Angeles. She secured a medium's license, advertised in all the daily papers, and has been doing a flourishing business ever since. Of course her display of nerve was the signal for "something doing," but the Anti decided to let her get good and ripe before the catching. Success in crime increases one's boldness, and this old fakir proved no exception to the rule. The gullibles have been bragging so of her courage and power to defy us, we decided it was time to put a stop to her gross deception.

ELSIE PROVED AN EASY VICTIM. We had anticipated a long siege, but it took us just two days to show her that success in crime increases one's boldness, and this old fakir proved no exception to the rule. The gullibles have been bragging so of her courage and power to defy us, we decided it was time to put a stop to her gross deception.

Mrs. Reynolds, when captured, had several layers of dress skirts of various styles and makes, two or three of them white, two black, and other toggery used in the make-up of her many and various characters from the other world.

The following letter of instructions written by Elsie Reynolds to Laura H. Hyland of Sawtelle, a former assistant, who has now turned the latter over to the Anti-Fakir Society of Los Angeles, makes interesting reading:

It is dangerous, but if you can't do any better you will have to, but for God's sake, be careful. Why don't you get Allan? Have your seances in the evenings. This in the bright robes. Never mind his 'tongue,' he don't mean anything. Let him suck. Don't take any halt for materialization. No, No, No. Allen could get a crowd at right, but it would hurt you. Mrs. Cobb was very anxious for him to come out as a platform test medium. I don't know their names. Tell her a young man by the name of Eddy Golding comes to her, a tall dark complexioned man. Looks as if he passed out with consumption."

This letter goes on in similar strains for about half a dozen pages, winding up with "Never let on you know me."

After her former exposure two years or so ago, Elsie Reynolds kept out of town until about two months ago, when she again took quarters here, at

Mrs. Elsie Reynolds.

This Notorious Medium Again Exposed and Her Artificial Toggery Captured, at Los Angeles, Cal.

It is an exceedingly sad spectacle to witness the charlatany in our ranks, and accompanying it the credulity of a certain class of Spiritualists, off of whom it constantly preys. Elsie Reynolds has been classed as an eminent materializing medium. She has found willing dupes on all sides, and has reaped a rich harvest in consequence. Two years ago she was exposed in Los Angeles, Cal., dressed in a wig and other earthly material, posing as the spirit of Aunt Betsey. At the last exposure a full set of Artificial Toggery was found on her person, which she used to carry on her diabolical deception. She is sustained in her satanic work by The Light of Truth, which is rotten to the core, and which is the acknowledged organ of the fraudulent element throughout the country.

EXPOSE FAKE OF SPOOKS.

Nervy Woman Drags Elsie Reynolds From Cabinet—Plucky Mrs. Savoy Brings Seance of "Medium" to Sensational End and Light Shows Strange Things—"Spiritualists" Letter Shows How Game Is Worked.

A sensational exposure of Elsie Reynolds, the notorious Spiritualist medium and fakir, was made at her afternoon seance yesterday in her apartments at the Grand Pacific Hotel. Elsie was dragged out of her cabinet by Mrs. Savoy, the same nervy little woman who made the expose a year or so ago, of Elsie Reynolds's son, H. E. Crindle, and Ethel, his wife.

A friend of Mrs. Savoy's, who was in the circle, instantly shot the bright light of an electric dark lantern into the cabinet and others rushed to her assistance.

The Reynolds woman is of large, heavy build, and her "protector," an old man with a long saffron beard, who is always present at the seances to guard against too inquisitive visitors, took a hand, trying to release the medium.

Mrs. Savoy is a slender, wiry little woman, and hung on, clutching her victim by the bosom of her gown. Others who were there for the purpose rushed to the assistance of Mrs. Savoy as she was dragged across the room by the powerful Elsie.

A shout of "Police! Police," rent the air, and two officers waiting outside for the alarm, battered down the door and rushed in, followed by a crowd of people who heard the racket. When the Reynolds woman found she was overpowered, she sank into a chair and exclaimed in tragic tones, as she threw up her hands dramatically, "Oh, I am dying, I am dying." Her face was livid with fear.

Her "protector" discreetly disappeared.

Say, there is a small old man comes with him who says: 'I know Dr. Nichols prolonged my life.' Mr. Little is his name. Wife in Pomona. Tell her also she has a gentleman friend in spirit by the name of Reynolds. He was her first husband, and he says, 'our dear girl is happy.' She is married and I believe living in Boston. Mrs. Cobb was very anxious for him to come out as a platform test medium. I don't know their names. Tell her a young man by the name of Eddy Golding comes to her, a tall dark complexioned man. Looks as if he passed out with consumption."

This letter goes on in similar strains for about half a dozen pages, winding up with "Never let on you know me."

After her former exposure two years or so ago, Elsie Reynolds kept out of town until about two months ago, when she again took quarters here, at

Mrs. Elsie Reynolds.

This Notorious Medium Again Exposed and Her Artificial Toggery Captured, at Los Angeles, Cal.

It is an exceedingly sad spectacle to witness the charlatany in our ranks, and accompanying it the credulity of a certain class of Spiritualists, off of whom it constantly preys. Elsie Reynolds has been classed as an eminent materializing medium. She has found willing dupes on all sides, and has reaped a rich harvest in consequence. Two years ago she was exposed in Los Angeles, Cal., dressed in a wig and other earthly material, posing as the spirit of Aunt Betsey. At the last exposure a full set of Artificial Toggery was found on her person, which she used to carry on her diabolical deception. She is sustained in her satanic work by The Light of Truth, which is rotten to the core, and which is the acknowledged organ of the fraudulent element throughout the country.

EXPOSE FAKE OF SPOOKS.

Nervy Woman Drags Elsie Reynolds From Cabinet—Plucky Mrs. Savoy Brings Seance of "Medium" to Sensational End and Light Shows Strange Things—"Spiritualists" Letter Shows How Game Is Worked.

A sensational exposure of Elsie Reynolds, the notorious Spiritualist medium and fakir, was made at her afternoon seance yesterday in her apartments at the Grand Pacific Hotel. Elsie was dragged out of her cabinet by Mrs. Savoy, the same nervy little woman who made the expose a year or so ago, of Elsie Reynolds's son, H. E. Crindle, and Ethel, his wife.

A friend of Mrs. Savoy's, who was in the circle, instantly shot the bright light of an electric dark lantern into the cabinet and others rushed to her assistance.

The Reynolds woman is of large, heavy build, and her "protector," an old man with a long saffron beard, who is always present at the seances to guard against too inquisitive visitors, took a hand, trying to release the medium.

Mrs. Savoy is a slender, wiry little woman, and hung on, clutching her victim by the bosom of her gown. Others who were there for the purpose rushed to the assistance of Mrs. Savoy as she was dragged across the room by the powerful Elsie.

A shout of "Police! Police," rent the air, and two officers waiting outside for the alarm, battered down the

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of
HUDSON TUTTLE.
Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby as terse, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be requested to be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondence is expected.
HUDSON TUTTLE.

A. R. Wright. Q. Does Spiritualism sanction divorce?

A. There is perhaps no better answer than that given by the spirit authors in "Ethics of Spiritualism" (see page 311 of Religion of Man, premium book of The Progressive Thinker, where that book is republished.)

After speaking of the evils attending ill-assorted unions, the question is asked: "Should these mistakes be remedied by divorce? We think as the lesser of two evils, both appalling, they should be. That divorce, however, should be granted for such reasons and in such a manner as not to weaken confidence in the marriage relation. What is wanted is not divorce, which is a bad remedy for a bad disease, but education in the broad and most liberal sense, and especially a deep moral culture, which shall present the purpose of life, its objects and destiny."

"Before such education can become general and effective, where mistakes have been committed, there should be the right of divorce, and that without prejudice to either party. The old superstition of making a sacrament, and because sanctioned by a priest in the name of God is indissoluble, is being strenuously maintained by the priesthood, who put forth every effort to prevent the enactment of laws favoring divorce."

"We have maintained that marriage rests on a more sacred obligation than a divine ordinance in the Constitution of Man; and yet there are many reasons for granting the right of separation. If the husband and wife are hateful to each other; if the old fable of the union of beauty and the beast is repeated; if refinement, purity and spirituality are limited to coarseness and brutality, there is no law of right and justice which should hold them together. It is a wrong not only against the suffering individual, but against society; for the latter cannot be benefited by the martyrdom and sacrifice of the individual to laws working injustice."

Why divorce should be the last resort is thus stated:

"Love is free to choose, but love means more than instinct. It means the affection, and all that vast sphere of unselfish qualities which has been aptly called benevolence. Having made choice, it incurs the most momentous responsibilities a human being can assume, and rights spring up which cannot be set aside. These can be properly met only by a life of mutual devotion between husband and wife. The fruit of love is an immortal spirit, coming unbidden into this world, and claiming as a right, inalienable, the affection and care of father and mother. No sophistry can answer the first law of humanity. Separation of parents is a deplorable event to their children, who thus lose the care and affection which is justly theirs. . . . When man and woman unite their lives . . . the chief consideration which actuates each, is that it will be permanent. They risk everything on this belief; all their plans are made in accordance with it. There is a trust and confidence which would never be bestowed if there was a shadow of a doubt. There are rights common to both. Purity and chastity are required by physiology as well as morality. Unselfish affection and devotion are also demanded, which will always regard the happiness and pleasure of the other rather than its own. These are duties which cannot be set aside; first truthfulness to the vows taken; mutual assistance, of yielding affection."

"Investigator." Q. I have read the article in The Progressive Thinker where a judge decided a medium not guilty for giving readings without license, as it was a part of the Spiritual religion; and I desire to ask: Is fortune-telling, or "readings," as it is more commonly called, the belief of a true Spiritualist?

A. I know nothing except from the article mentioned of the circumstances connected with the prosecution of this medium. There is, however a marked distinction between "readings" and fortune-telling, although the former term is sometimes used as a substitute for the latter. Primary "readings" are psychometric delineations of character, giving the past and present, and when the reader is also clairvoyant, some glimpses of the future and descriptions of spirit friends. Such readings would be in line with all psychic manifestations, and distinct from fortune-telling. That the latter forms a part of Spiritualism is quite incorrect, and were it accepted, then every advertising fakir, "seventh daughter of a seventh daughter," "born with a veil," who promises to reveal secrets of love, riches and unbounded gratification, would be a priestess in the spiritual temple and their rigmorale learned from cards, the position of the planets, or tea-grounds, a part of the religion of Spiritualism! When these "readers," "pastors," and "clairvoyants" place their advertisements with those of fortune-tellers, astrologers and mountebanks, it is confusing, and it must have been a clear-headed judge who could draw the line.

Spiritualist. Q. What is the remarkable gift of the medium Bailey, who is the protégé of Stanford in Australia, and wherein is his mediumship so far superior? He is mentioned in a recent number of The Progressive Thinker.

A. We expect the next news will be that this medium has had an elephant, and perhaps a whole caravan dumped into the room where the seance is held! This would be just as believable, and as a certain class think everything possible, it would not do to dispute it, or assert it impossible.

No such manifestation should be reported until absolutely proven. A stated portion have constantly "wrote up" the fakes in glowing eulogy, the Spiritual papers have published without comment, thus tacitly endorsing, and the widest advertising thus given. Then came exposure, and the sickening shame of it! In this discrimination, the true suffer with the fakes. The only manner by which the former can be vindicated, and the cause freed from this source of obloquy, is simply to demand satisfactory tests from all.

In the first place, let every Spiritualist decide not to attend a dark circle. It is an assured fact that darkness is not essential for the manifestations. The only reason for the performers, not "mediums," to ask for darkness, is because it is necessary for the success of their tricks. They want singing, or set a music box running, not to "produce harmony," but to drown any noise they may make in preparation.

When investigators submit to the dark circle, they do so with the knowledge that it is a prime condition of fraud, demanded by fraud and by a frauder. If the medium is to go into such circles, they should not expect those to whom they narrate the impossible things they see to believe them other than the deceptions they are. Let genuine mediums, for once and all keep out of the dark circle, and thus free themselves from even suspicion of wrong.

If Spiritualists and all investigators would demand light in the dark circle, and make refusal equivalent to confession of fraud, there would be an end of this trouble, and Spiritualism escape the odium and scorn it has patiently borne on account of this phase of "manifestation."

SOME IMPRESSIVE REMARKS.

"In the Final Analysis, It Becomes Not How Much of this Life's Goods We May Accumulate, but How Much Soul-Force We Have Learned to Acquire."

The simple life is the spiritual life. To be spiritual, one must live close to the soul of both animate and so-called inanimate things.

True understanding of Nature's laws comes from being natural, sincere, honest.

Have you ever noticed that the cheerful, unaffected persons enjoy far better health than those who are unquenchably egotistical and vain?

Health of both soul and body is merely the logical result of being at one with natural laws—the laws that govern the magnetism of the planet upon which we live.

THIS SUBJECTIVE MIND.

Its Work Often Ascribed to Spirit Influence—Any Organ of the Body Can Be Controlled by Suggestion.

Are psychometric demonstrations always an infallible proof of spirit communion, and is it possible to demonstrate this to the entire satisfaction of the average unbiased investigator? I for one, fear that this is a question which cannot be believed that these tests are always conducted, or even aided by spirit influence. I believe that these wonderful exhibitions of the unseen power of the mind, are many, many times simply the results of auto-hypnosis, or hypnosis induced by outside influences perhaps at times by spirit influence, but more often by suggestion. I have had a number of experiences myself along these lines, with patients undergoing psychopathic treatment, upon whom I have had to induce the hypnotic condition in order to reach the subjective mind for the purpose of making my suggestions effective on the organs that I wished to reach.

This is well known to many operators who have had an extended practice in hypnotism in connection with psychic healing. We do not know just how the operator or subject is enabled to take an article belonging to another, and after going into a deep state of concentration and passiveness, or auto-hypnosis, or hypnosis induced by other influences, is enabled to delve into the subjective mind of the owner of the article and unfathom secrets that are totally unknown to anyone else, and oftentimes forgotten for years by the person being read for, and at times foretell future events that come to pass, and many other equally astounding things.

As I say, we do not know the exact modus operandi of this, but we do know that it is done, and not only so, but it is of frequent occurrence, and we are led to believe that it is often done through human agency. We know that we can often find subjects that are amenable, after being placed under the hypnotic influence, to the process of suggestion, and that the self, or astral body, to distant points, and there glean information that is utterly astounding, and totally unknown to any one present with the medium or subject. This is very mysterious to one that does not understand this wonderful science, and we are ready to at once attribute the phenomena to spirit influence, but on the other hand, no operator has ever been able to induce any subject to give off any kind of incriminating evidence or information, that would in any way endanger the subject; no member of any kind of secret society has ever been prevailed upon to give out any secrets of their respective bodies.

Now, I do not attribute this to spirit influence at all, and yet it is precisely the same kind of work that is done by the clairvoyant, while they are under auto-hypnosis, or spirit influence, as you may be pleased to call it, and do this work and give the credit to the spirit world, fully believing that the phenomena take place through the aid of their spirit friends, or controls. Now these mediums are as a rule, perfectly honest in their convictions, and are above reproach as to character and reliability, but many of them I fear are mistaken in the agency that is demonstrating through them; it is simply the work of highly trained subjective minds, acting under suggestions of self, or other minds.

We know that the organ of the body can be controlled by suggestion given to the subjective mind by self or others, to act in accordance with suggestions given; we can dilate an artery, or accelerate or diminish the action of the heart to a considerable degree; we can have absolute control of all the organs of the body if we have a well trained subjective mind and can thereby control the action of our health to an astonishing degree. I cannot attribute this to spirit influence. The time was when I firmly believed that it was through spirit influence that this was done. Before Liebhaf made his wonderful discovery concerning the objective and subjective mind, and elucidated it so plainly, everything that was known as spirit influence, attributed to spirit influence, but since this discovery has been promulgated there are but few psychic demonstrations given that cannot be explained to the complete satisfaction of most unbiased investigators in a very rational way, scientifically explained on natural grounds that seem to be perfectly consistent and adjust to the present knowledge of suggestion, and its control of the subjective mind.

Now, I am well aware that this is a broad assertion, and I expect will call down upon me severe criticism, but for this I do not care, I want the light of truth, and there is no amount of criticism that is going to harm true Spiritualism. From my own experience, and I am not writing this for the critic, but for the true investigator.

If I can eliminate a falsehood, and plant a truth in its stead, I shall feel myself amply repaid. It is not that I doubt true Spiritualism in the least; God forbid, for it is the anchor of my soul, and I have absolutely nothing on which to rest my hope of a future existence. I consider it the grandest truth that has ever been promulgated, and in fact the only scientifically demonstrated proof of a future life. We as Spiritualists know whereof we speak, and we know that we are right. Spiritualism is destined to supplant orthodoxy and raise the human race to the high planes of manhood and womanhood as God intended they should be. The world is being leavened with the truth of Spiritualism, and all true Spiritualists should rally to the work of spreading this knowledge. Let us all come out into the light and let ourselves be known. We know that there is no death, then why not let our light be known to you? You let another light his torch from yours, it will not take a particle of light from you, therefore give forth what light you may, let it be ever so feeble, it will help in the illumination. Let us adopt the motto of our immortal Lincoln, which was this:

"Die when I may, I will be said of me by those that knew me best, that I always plucked a thistle, and planted a flower where I thought a flower would grow."

There is one word which may serve as a rule of practice for all one's life. That word is reciprocity. What you do to others, they will do to you. Do not wish domination.

ATTITUDE OF INVESTIGATORS.

Does It Tend to Produce the Best Results—Faith Opens the Portals of the Mind and Lets in the Light.

The hidden things of life are attracting more and more attention as time goes on, and thousands are learning to leave the beaten track occasionally and wander through the byways of meditation into the mountain paths of the soul. But many rush headlong on, heedless of dangers and disappointing brambles, who would do well to watch for the fingerposts along the way, that lead to paths of peace and beauty.

Faith is an indispensable guide. It opens the portals of the mind and lets in the light. Its opposite, doubt, closes them just as instinctively and securely as fear closes the shell of a clam.

Spirit communion is soul communion. And in order to gain any cognizance of its meaning, one must have at least a speaking acquaintance with his own soul. Otherwise test after test may be observed only to be almost immediately obscured by passing events. He must be able to draw up the impression from the subconsciousness at will, and ruminate over it until it becomes thoroughly incorporated with the mentality.

Investigators are sometimes disappointed because they expect too much and give too little; they think that a few dollars to a medium will throw open the doors of heaven and disclose all its wonders. But neither money nor curiosity is

"The golden key
That opens the palace of eternity."

Patient introspection and a spirit of thankfulness for what comes is the surest means of tracing a generous and lasting supply.

It frequently happens that the first intimation of communion with the world of spirit brings with it a sensation of awe and uneasiness; there seems to be something gruesome and uncanny about it. Unless one is willing to persist until such feelings are driven away with spiritualism, one will better be left entirely alone. It should be approached with a determination to overcome morbid suggestions of death and disaster, and studied until a full realization is reached of its beneficence and blessedness.

There are many who undertake to investigate the phenomena much as boys sometimes investigate a hornet's nest with a long stick. They are careful not to probe too deeply, for they know "there is something in it," and they are mortally afraid of being found out while investigating.

Others might be compared to the California tourists who were delighted by the warbling of a wild canary hidden in a thicket of leaves. While they were endeavoring with much ado to discover its whereabouts and devising some means to entrap it, the sweet singer had flitted away.

Some, too, have not the libraries where they pursue the ignis fatuus through volume after volume of mystic and mystifying lore, only to see it receding still farther in the distance. What an appalling loss has the eminent astronomer of Echo Mountain gone through in a fruitless quest! Is it not enough to make the angels weep to see mortals search through dusty tomes for evidence of their existence when all that is necessary is to look up and be still. He will get to the goal first who stands still.

The hunter who watches for hours with every nerve tensed, alert, receptive; the astronomer with mind and eye focused on distant worlds; the naturalist who silently waits for nature's secrets to be revealed, these have mastered the art of being still.

To study the secrets of the spirit world requires a condition of mind more difficult to obtain. Here there is no visible object to hold the attention—except in clairvoyance. The imagination must therefore make up the deficiency. Then results follow, more or less satisfactorily, according to the attunement or receptivity of the individual.

Although spiritual perception may be cultivated to a certain extent, "it is better," as Charles Dudley Warner said of culture "to be born with it." Yet the faculty in itself is no indication of superiority. Unless coupled with desirable mental qualities it represents a sort of precociousness that is of little value. The minds of non-progressive mediums with no sense of the higher significance of spirit manifestation are like shallow pools filled with broken reflections.

Professor Larkin has undoubtedly heard the voice of spirit speaking in rock and tree and in the battles of the clouds, else he would be as indifferent to it as are the majority of people. He can focus his mind upon the stars and on the ever-changing panorama of visible forms, but evidently not on those that are invisible.

It is a scientific fact that "reading makes a full man," and so does viewing nature in her varying moods; the mind becomes filled with pictures like a camera. An English scientist, so it is reported, has caused poe and hypnosis to think backwards and so reveal their surroundings from old age to childhood; showing that scenes depicted upon the objective mind are indefinitely retained in the subjective. I have seen pictures clairvoyantly in the minds of others, that have been there in some instances a few minutes or hours, in others many years.

When the reading habit is over-indulged the investigating mind becomes clogged and paralyzed by the tyranny of print. The latter serves its best purpose when used as a stimulus to thought. Yet there are many who become so addicted to pre-digested mental food that nothing appeals to them unless it has percolated through some mortal brain and found its way into print. This weakens the power to grasp ideas as they are tossed from mind to mind and spring in pristine purity from the source of all thought.

Psychical research has trying difficulties to contend with, but the bane of the average investigator is fraudulent mediumship. It is indeed an ugly blot on the fair name of Spiritualism.

"The ornament of beauty is suspect, A crow that flies in heaven's sweetest air!"

and Deceit is its mate; they are seldom far apart. Searching for frauds, however, is a thankless and wearisome task, and the searcher is likely to have his labor for his pains. After all, dishonest mediums injure themselves more than they do the public. When a sincere investigator calls upon an unscrupulous medium—which seems hardly necessary

THIS DOG HAS A SOUL.

His Intelligence Is Manifested in a Most Remarkable Manner—Has a Unique Accomplishment.

Dr. Charles H. Loder of 3136 Indiana avenue, Chicago, has a dog with a unique accomplishment. His name, Duke, can sing. By "sing" is not meant the common canine ability to howl a couple of notes. Duke can carry an air and keep on the key as closely as the majority of singers with musical pretensions.

"The dog's gift is, to my knowledge, unparalleled, and not less than uncanny," said Dr. David Jordan Single, professor of physiology in the University of Chicago, who has known Duke for many years and who vouches for his extraordinary faculty. "I can best express its astonishing quality by saying that the first time we heard him both Mrs. Single and I thought for several measures that Dr. Loder himself was singing."

"This is no reflection on Dr. Loder's voice," he added, anticipating a possible suggestion, "for he is a notably excellent singer."

The dog's voice has had a compass of two and one-half octaves ranging up from lower D and would be called a baritone, but, unfortunately, some of his notes have recently become a little uncertain, for Duke is now 15 years old. His ear, however, is still quite as good as ever, and he feels keenly the fact that his voice has been out of tune. He has become diffident in consequence about singing before strangers, though when Dr. Loder asked him the other day to exhibit his accomplishment and played the introduction to a French barcarolle, which has always been one of the dog's favorites, Duke complied with the request.

Duke began to sing in early childhood. His keen love for music drew him to the music room whenever Dr. Loder struck the keys, and his master's attention was first called to the dog's gift by the perception of an unaccountable humming accompaniment to his own singing. The source of the humming accompaniment was soon found to be the animal, standing in rapt attention before the piano.

A little experimenting soon showed Dr. Loder, who is himself an accomplished musician, that the dog's harmony was not accidental. He changed his key as the pianist changed. It was at first a little hard for him to adapt his voice to another than the key of D, which has become the most natural to him; but after a little fumbling he was soon able to make the transition. His ear has always been perfect; false harmonies immediately distressed him.

Has True "Artistic Temperament."

After a little practicing, with Dr. Loder's assistance, Duke gained enough confidence to progress from humming to singing aloud. He "hums" with his mouth closed. When he sings out loud he sings with open mouth, clear and strong as any human being, everything but the words. Duke has always had the sensitive artistic temperament and is conscious of his audience.

"I have always had to caution people who listened to him not to laugh," said Dr. Loder, "because his feelings are easily hurt, and at the first sign of levity at his expense he would crawl under the piano deeply wounded. If he felt that his audience was appreciative, however, nothing gave him more pleasure than to be called upon to entertain them; and it is the cause of keenest regret to him that his voice now is failing."

Greatly Attached to His Master.

"Isn't that so, old man?" queried the doctor sympathetically, addressing the subject of his remarks, whose gentle eyes sorrowfully acquiesced.

Between the doctor and his dog exists the closest attachment. The latter is habitually addressed in conversation as if he were a human being. His gentle master deeply regrets the wasting of the rare talents of the gifted animal.

"It is a matter of common observation that nearly all dogs respond in key to one or two notes sounded for them, particularly on a violin," said Dr. Loder, when asked whether he had ever known of any other similarly gifted canine. "It would seem that this habit harks back to the time when they were wild, and certain notes may recall to them the howls of their fellow animals and move them to respond in kind. Duke, however, is the only dog I have ever known with a perfectly developed ear for music, as music."

LIFE'S MYSTERIES.

I know it seems injustice, In this strange world of ours; When some live dwell 'mid sunshine, And others darksome showers; But, as a compensation,

What vital lessons learned— May spring from shadowed places, More happy hearts had spurned.

Some live in ease and comfort, 'Mid fashion, wealth and show; Some drain the cup of sorrow, And bitter dregs of woe.

Some rule as kings and masters, Their brothers toil as slaves; But death knows no distinction, Time level makes all graves.

Some souls are born, inherit, A nature pure within; While others blindly struggle With discord, doubt and sin.

What varies these conditions, From joy to grief and shame? Who made their paths to differ? And who shall bear the blame?

Sometimes amid the turmoil, Half-doubtingly, we dream, Of life made fuller, richer, Across death's mystic stream.

For all is growth, eternal, The tangles of to-day May be trailing vines of beauty, Still farther on our way.

ARE WE ALL IMMORTAL?

Dr. Peebles Reinforces His Statement, With Apt Quotations.

Enriching the columns of The Progressive Thinker of March 31, is a brief essay from A. M. Griffen, which almost seemed like a voice from the tomb, such a long time having elapsed since I had seen anything from his sturdy pen.

Reading his article I was reminded of the long ago when in battle array there was a clashing of swords over the "political A. P. A. movement," which after a brief and restless life ended easily. In that discussion friend Griffen's arguments were weighty, and in a literary sense he was courteous and manly.

Reading his article of the 31st of March, reinforcing Dr. Griffen's pungent inquiry for the proofs of a statement of mine that "some prominent Spiritualists do not teach that all human beings exist beyond the grave, and if they do they are not necessarily immortal."

In proof of my statement, I could begin with the "Universum" now owned by the late Dr. E. B. Brittan, quoting now and then from articles by Prof. Cummins, Amanda Spence and others down the succession to Hudson Tuttle. Doubtless two or three unimpeachable witnesses will suffice.

1. Prof. Cummins, a philosophical Spiritualist of William White's time got the following in the Banner of Light:

"While it is a potent reality to all close investigators that some of the spirits of the dead communicate, the fact is no proof that all mortals consciously live hereafter; nor is it a proof that they are immortal, living eternally. As the spirit or soul is born from matter and the powers of nature, it is evident too that should it live after the shock of death, its component parts would under the law of atomic changes decline; and naturally disintegrate, matter returning back to matter, the force having been transferred. Souls are not and cannot be outside of law, and the dissolution of a dead soul would be just as natural as a dead wood," etc.

2. Spiritualists have had, but few, if any, more brilliant speakers than Mrs. Amanda Spence. Many were our conferences upon the existence of God and the non-immortality of some human beings. Her method of reasoning was purely inductive, and in running along this line: "There are millions more apple blossoms in the spring than permanently set; there are millions more that set but from frosts and chilly winds they wither and fall early, and millions more that are well grown yet do not mature, from worms, insects and worms, they become rot and decay and rot away into the tree by terrible winds to fall and rot away into the soil." She forcibly applied this and similar illustrations to false conceptions, to frail mortal life, to deformed or sickly children, to low savage races, and to semi-intellectual men of our age and lands that have never been outside of law, and the dissolution of a dead soul would be just as natural as a dead wood," etc.

3. Other Spiritualists have taken similar positions. But to come more directly to our time, I will cite the teachings of Hudson Tuttle, our "Editor-in-Chief," upon the origin and non-immortality of a portion of the human race.

His position that the human race was purely of animal origin, the two factors being force and matter, is well known. These are among his published words in his "Acanas" and "Ethics."

"The Caucasian did not originate from the negro, nor is the negro a degraded Caucasian, but both came from oranges of different color and character, but while one has remained stationary the other has advanced." In accordance with these principles the immediate ancestors were very different from each other. Some were black, some were white, some were brown," etc.

In his "Ethics of Spiritualism" he further writes:

"As the animal merges through intermediate forms into man, and the infant knows less than the perfect animal, the line of demarcation between the perishable and imperishable is apparently drawn with difficulty. Not so, however, a certain degree of advancement is essential beyond which immortality obtains. The line is not sharply drawn. A spirit is not necessarily immortal, but can become gradually extinguished after an indefinite time."

In speaking of "the process of formation from physical forms," he says: "If the true, we are to seek the origin of the individual spirit within the origin of the physical body. We are to place the growth of one with that of the other. The physical body is the scaffolding by which the spiritual being is sustained, and when matured sufficiently (mark the phrase) remains after that support is taken away. A certain stage of progress or perfection must be reached before this result, else all living beings would be immortal."

Again he writes: "A spirit is not necessarily immortal, but can become gradually extinguished, like a lamp burning for an indefinite time and then going out. Such is the condition of the lowest of mankind. They exist after death; but with them there is no progress, no desire for the immortal state, and slowly, atom by atom, they are absorbed into the apogee of the universal spirit essence, as the spirit of the animal is immediately after death."

If it be asked at what age the spirit retains its identity, it may be said in reply that no certain age can be given, for that varies with the development of the parents.

To make his position still plainer and more definite, he writes: "Not until a certain development is attained is individuality retained after the death of the physical body."

It is not necessary to say that I have not fully sustained my statement that there were prominent Spiritualists who disbelieved that all human beings would retain their identity, existing consciously beyond the grave, and if existing this existence would not necessarily be immortal. If I have not fully sustained a statement made nearly a year ago, then I will make search for further testimony. But I think that the foregoing is enough.

A BEAUTIFUL MIND.

A Comprehensive View of a Master Scientific Mind—"He Who Merely Is May Be a Dull Insensate; He Who Knows Is Himself Divine."

In No. 847 of The Progressive Thinker, under the title of "An Editor at Large," appears an article from the pen of Edgar L. Larkin, Lowe Observatory, Cal., in which Brother Larkin sets forth some brilliant reasons why he cannot believe in the accepted claims of Spiritualism, regarding the continuity of life.

Brother Larkin has a beautiful mind, a comet of reason flashing through the stellar sphere of action, blinding all inspirational knowledge by its dazzling trail of reasoning. He sees only the beauties of his surroundings through his constructive mind reasonings, and that which is truly spiritual and of the spiritual escapes his vision.

Reason is a Master Mason, working amid the debris of world-building, not knowing but eternally building and rebuilding air castles, so to speak, only to see them fall for want of knowledge in their constructive principle.

Inspiration is a fact. It knows, yet oftentimes cannot tell the whys and wherefores.

Inspiration furnishes creative conditions; reason grasps the elements of creation and formulates images, just in proportion to the capacity of the molds. Some are grotesque in structure, others beautiful in design, yet all crumbling at the touch of knowledge.

He who merely is, may be a dull insensate hind. He who knows, is in himself a god.

That reason touches the shores of knowledge is true—it cannot help otherwise, being constantly employed in the preparation of construction, is frequently led into sombre forest, where groping, aghast, hears the music of spiritual waters, and bending low, quaffs from the source of knowledge.

Reason, a child, wandering in the wilderness, unacquainted and without compass, oftentimes estranged from parents and friends, begging a morsel, gladly welcoming the raven that leads to knowledge.

Inspiration stands at the door and knocks. Open and it will come in and with all knowledge, and when tired reason has scaled the heights; gazed into the limitless sea of space; measured the velocity of speeding planets; computed the eclipse of suns, and then stopping on the brink, dazed, heart-sore, weary from toil, because of its inability to know by constructive reason, is awakened by inspiration, and he who rolls back the scroll, and behold the great drama of life is presented upon memory's brow.

Brother Larkin is a bright light. His article teems with honest desires. "His wish to know contains not always the faculty to acquire." I know of no royal road that leads to "Nirvana."—Be good, do good, and in so doing you will have attained your being so that the fraternal spheres will open to your sight the beauties that lie beyond.

Harsh and unkind thoughts are but constructive barriers, barricading the way to knowledge; and he who wills can lift his mountains.

Brother Larkin, you have tried to solve the problem of life and destiny by a process of reasoning. It cannot be accomplished. The most fertile brains of mankind have speculated and groped for ages, ransacked ancient and modern history, trying to solve the mysteries of life, all to no avail. The whys and wherefores are still uppermost, and only as knowledge comes by a gleam of inspiration do we know. The phenomena demonstrations are as mysterious to-day as were they two thousand years ago. We can reason on their cause and effect without any apparent knowledge, yet the mystery still remains—We simply walk the endless chain treadmill.

If the voice of inspiration speaks to thy brother, and he not act in accordance with thy views, he is not alarmed—or cruel. He may be doing the divine's will—who knows? Who is there that shall say, I am right and you are wrong?

THE DAY OF UNDERSTANDING.

I have no dread as time draws near When I shall leave you for a while; And well I know that sometime, dear, You'll look back to it with a smile.

When all these mysteries are clear, And you shall follow me above, I know you will be happy, dear, And there we'll find eternal love.

It seems so hard for us to part And leave this world of earthly care, But you will come to me, dear heart, Where everything is bright and fair.

And when you see Death's angels near, And hear them singing soft and low, You will be with me soon, dear heart, And like myself, you then will know.

Spiritualists may advance the positive fact remains that the spirits of once mortals (and I believe all mortals) exist in a conscious and progressive state hereafter, and as we have held converse with those who lived hundreds and hundreds, and I believe thousands of years ago on the earth, I have not the least doubt that they are immortal and that they will exist and unfold endlessly.

A MODICUM OF CHURCH HISTORY.

What the Church Has Done and Is Still Doing.

Many men who try to hoodwink the public by posing as the successors of the departed great, manifest none of the qualities of mind and soul that constituted their greatness. The power to string words together that have no soul back of them does not make a man great, even if he stands in the place of a former great man. A vast majority of minds that have been led through the theological mill are nonentities as far as individual thought and reason are concerned—mere repeaters of things they have been told. Some preach peace in times of peace, but stand ready to preach war in times of war—they are generally found on the side of the strong or popular, especially when it pays.

The Christian church offers no valid reason for its existence. It is not abreast of the issues of the day, and is behind the times on every vital question. Natural forces are at work bringing about its disintegration. If the church had to answer for its sins as it has preached the individual sinners must be eternally punished, the eternal punishment to which it so complacently commits the individual.

Where has the church stood in relation to any important reform that has been effected in our country in the last fifty years? Always obstructing and hindering the work of progress. Of slavery, civic reform, universal suffrage, the rights of women to think and act for themselves, the righteous distribution of wealth, the ownership of economic utilities by the people, the church has been the foe, or has acted as a clog upon public sentiment.

It has sent its missionaries to Hawaii, India and China, not to carry a gospel of peace and good will, but to stir up and foment disturbances. In Hawaii, when the missionaries "got through" "civilizing" the country, it was found they and their descendants had the largest part of its resources; and, not content with this, they were ready to hand over its people and whatever was left to a Government that the people neither needed nor desired.

In India, the inside history of the Sepoy rebellion would tend to show that missionary effort—the desire to proselyte, the means taken to do it, and the effort to suppress another people's religion—was largely responsible for that insurrection.

Few years ago Lord Salisbury, in addressing a missionary association, declared that within recent years the missionaries had brought about more turbulence and actual warfare than any other known cause; and the aged premier of England undoubtedly knew what he was talking about.

The troubles in China which have cost thousands of lives and millions of dollars are directly traceable to the influence of church organizations operating through missionary societies. I wonder what would be the consequence if a body of Spiritualists should claim protection to equal rights and privileges with "the Christian Denominations" in China. I wonder what would come to pass if "China should enact exclusion laws" against Americans entering China as "Our Christian Nation" has excluded them. Christendom has made for itself some dishonorable, disgraceful history by forcing upon the Chinese a religion they do not want—a religion dependent on legalized robbery and warfare for its propagation.

Whatever power the church has had, it has not been used to promote peace, but rather to engender hatred and strife. A few years ago the majority of ministers all over the land were crying for war—for the destruction of the unspeakable Turk. The state of affairs in Armenia was deplorable and cruel in the extreme. However, it was not at that time that the missionaries were responsible for this condition of things.

The only vitality in the church that seems to have permanent expression is the power to raise money; and even this is waning, for a body cannot go on indefinitely receiving all and giving nothing. Men that have made millions through the unblinking robbery of the economic rights as well as the products of manual labor have allied themselves with the church by contributing bountifully to its sustenance. And this is not to make their calling and election sure in heaven; most of them think that through an alliance with the church they will be better able to continue and perpetuate what without doubt is an unmitigated social and economic condition of affairs.

The robbery is made respectable, the pulpit is silent, the preacher is gagged and the unholy alliance goes on. Let the world once realize that the church is a dead institution; that it is made up of Pharisaical cant and theological hypocrisy—let the garment of respectability that covers its bloodstained robes be torn away, and there will be none so humble as to do her obsequies. We have only an external organization which exists for commercialism. The people have asked for bread and have been given a stone. External authority of book and church has kept human life in a state of bondage wherein symmetrical growth and development are impossible.

The church of to-day has nothing new or vital in it. One section of it is still quarrelling over "predestination," and is in doubt whether Jonathan Edwards was right when he declared that hell was paved with infants' skulls and that God for his own honor and glory elected the vast majority of mankind to abide eternally in a home of torment. Another section which had its origin in the teachings of John Wesley, is still trying to determine whether women have any rights in the government of a church of which they form the major part. This sect is still all arm energetic in passing the collection plate. A member of another section of the church announced with considerable satisfaction that he thanked God that his church never dabbled in religion or politics.

TIMES HAVE GREATLY CHANGED.

And in Changing the World Has Advanced to a Much Higher Plane of Thought, as Illustrated in an Editorial in the Chicago Evening Journal.

Those of us whose memories reach back to the time when Prof. Swing and Dr. Thomas were expelled by their churches for what was declared to be "dangerous heresy," or even to the time when Prof. Briggs was the center of a theological cyclone, can hardly believe our ears when we listen to the criticisms made by church authorities on Prof. Foster's treatise on "The Finality of the Christian Religion."

It is true that Prof. Foster's book has raised a good deal of vigorous protest in many quarters. But it has not attracted the widespread part of the attention that the churches that Prof. Swing or Dr. Thomas attracted, in their day, by uttering opinions which, compared to Prof. Foster's were as extreme in their old-fashioned orthodoxy as they were considered then to be extreme in heresy.

They merely expressed mild disapproval of certain purely doctrinal tenets, not in the least involving the question of Christianity's divine origin, to say nothing of the existence of a personal deity. But their opinions stirred the entire evangelical world, subjected them to something very like abuse and persecution, and ended in their ostracism by all orthodox Christians.

And now, only thirty years later, comes a man holding a chair in a Baptist university, and seriously questions the existence of a personal God.

The medieval view of the universe, says Prof. Foster, was that it resembled "an ocean steamer, intrusted to the buffeting of the winds and waves, but under the absolute control of its pilot, and that pilot God."

"This view," Prof. Foster asserts, "the modern scientist must reject. For him there can be no pilot. Force is not without the world, but resident within. The world is self-dependent, self-lawgiving, self-originating; and if it has any end, it is its own."

Such is materialism, says Prof. Foster. It does not go

That Council of Nicea.

The writer concedes his astonishment on reading Mosheim's Ecclesiastical

History, Century 4, Part 2, Chap-

5, Sec. 12, which we quote as follows:

"The Council assembled by Constantine at Nice, is one of the most famous and interesting events that are presented to us in ecclesiastical history; and yet, what is most surprising, there is no part of the history of the church that has been un-faded with such negligence, or passed with such rapidity. The ancient writers are neither agreed concerning the time or place in which it was assembled, the number of those who sat in the council, nor the bishop who presided. No authentic acts of its famous sentence have been committed to writing, or, at least, none have been transmitted to our times."

In a note Mosheim refers to Eusebius Ecclesiastical History, and then says, "THE HISTORY OF THE COUNCIL WAS WRITTEN BY A SYRIAN,

BUT IS LONG SINCE LOST."

This writer has maintained for many years, that if a Council was held at Nice, as claimed, convened and presided over by Constantine, a pagan, who died a few years later and was buried under pagan auspices, was a convention of bishops, otherwise overseers of pagan temples, of which in a laborious search he found upwards of 800 such temples, which, properly, would be represented in such a body; he found the Catholic

Council of Trent, some 1230 years later than the pretended Council of Nice doing exactly the same work in every essential particular, as was credited to the former body.

Eusebius, though said to have written his Ecclesiastical History in 324, is believed to have been a literary monk of the 14th or 15th century.

The work appeared in fragments about that time, and it was claimed,

as was Josephus, and Tacitus' Annals, and many other productions of the church fathers, to have been found under like conditions, to be an ancient production. They are all believed to be forgeries of the dominant religion, to strengthen the claims of the most corrupt hierarchy the world ever knew.

This is a good subject for persons

It is an easy matter for the fiction writer to make virgins the mothers of Gods and of men; but they are events impossible of realization. Botanists tell us the masculine and feminine element of even vegetable life must be blended to produce fruit and perpetuate its species by seed. If the masculine germ from the corn tassel does not fall upon the feminine silk, the cob will be barren of kernels. He who has any knowledge of animal physiology has no occasion to be reminded of this fact in regard to humanity.

The romancer can draw on an active imagination, revel in its delights, create men and monsters at will, pile glories on them mountain high, and in fancy make them Gods; and the loftiest panegyrics may be pronounced in their praise, while monks, priests and prelates for a hundred generations may exhaust their genius in extolling their virtues, but when truth, simple, unadorned truth is related, the tales were gross fabrications, whether pronounced by pretended prophets, or their modern representatives, the novelists.

It seems almost impossible that such stories, projected by ignorance, in a barbarian age, and believed by the unthinking credulous, can be accepted as a fact in the light of twentieth century knowledge. It can only be accounted for on the hypothesis of thoughtlessness, thereby enabling, as

They caused to be nailed to a church

such tests applied to the New Testa-

It is an old adage that "experience no other." At the risk of being considered shockingly profane, by some sensitive souls, The Progressive Thinker will amend the old adage by adding that, d—n fools will not learn even by experience.

For instance, one has only to read the published accounts of supposedly compos mentis persons who are robbed of big sums of money, and other valuables, by rank swindlers posing as mediums. We hardly need to say that these "dead easy" gullible victims of insatiable fakirs, are of the class that will not read The Progressive Thinker, "would not have it in the house," etc., "because it is opposed to mediums."

It almost seems a waste of human sympathy, to pity these unfortunate victims of fakirs' greed and of their own invincible stupidity and wilful ignorance. All such should turn to the

No one who reads and heeds the

SCINTILLATIONS

From the Pen of Henry Morrison Tefft.

“Life is full of contradictions—full of absurd conditions. The richer, the more cultured, refined and civilized a people are, the more artificial and corrupt they become. This is history. The highest virtues are often linked with the strongest vices. A man may be very moral on one side of his nature but very immoral on the other. Some people place all their affections on God and none on their fellow man.”

"Read Not to Condidect and Confute, Nor to Believe and Take for Granted * * But to Weigh and Consider."
Nature is not perfect in her work;
—it has to be subdued, cultivated, trained and civilized. In the melody and harmony of sounds, and in the perfection of form, art has excelled nature. The melody of the bird has balanced the beauty of the bird and the flowerist the tint and color of the flower. Man in his primal state is no more rough, uncouth and unfit for civilized purposes, than are the products of nature. The human mind, if unpruned, cultivated and brought to perfection under years of toil and care.

The claim that man has fallen from some high estate in which the Creator originally placed him, is a fiction.
Evolution is the law of life. Every thing tends upward. Perfection on any line cannot be attained,—and it were possible,—it could not be maintained. Reaction always sets in after action.

The right way but never going there themselves.

It is said of John Greenleaf Whittler that notwithstanding he was color blind he wrote beautiful poetry on flowers. Consistency is a sentiment very much honored and seldom practiced. The strongest friendship is up between persons of opposite tastes, feelings and temperaments. The moment we thoroughly understand a subject, people or object, that moment our interest in the subject begins to wane. Even "Men," says Emerson "cease to interest us when we find their limitations." Macaulay relates that in ancient times a man was to be tried for murder. He employed Lysias to write out his defense; when he did, but before the trial the defendant came to Lysias and said, "I was delighted with your speech the first time; but now I liked it less the second time, and still less the third time; and now it seems to me to be no defense at all."

definitely continue to rise; the law of gravitation finally pulls it to the ground. Full knowledge, completeness in the study of life's problems would be an end of effort and attainment. Even the perfect man of the philosophers and the monk and the saint would be a failure. Men, with even-balanced minds and temperaments are not the most powerful, neither are they necessarily the most useful to mankind. It needs strong, biased, prejudiced, unreasonable men to achieve a greater good, though it means a revolution affecting the morals, religion or social condition of the people.

"Where would the world be," says

My good friend," said Lydus, "you quite forget that the judges are to hear the case."

Speeches that have made the greatest impression upon assemblies would not bear the inspection of close reading. Lawyers form their argument according to the opinions and intelligence of the jury. Artists have been known to alter the appearance of their work to meet the approval of the public. The fit of a garment often has to be sacrificed for the sake of the style. This is a world of adaptability. Vegetation, animals and peoples conform to the country in which they are placed. Habits, customs, and institutions are moulded by climate and conditions.

one writer, "In thought, in words, in civilization, had there been no one-sidedness, no partial, critical view of partial views, half-truth, one idea? Where would Christianity have been? Under the flag of disinterested intellect, without disciples, without devotees, without saints and martyrs, without a faith, without a critic, without a prejudice, without superstition, without inflexibility?"

I pity the man who has never committed a sin, never shed a tear, never felt the meaning of the word regret. I pity the man who has never changed the soul that calm that repose that no other experience can produce.

"All of God's great values wear the drapery That most becomes them."

Everything is mutual. There is no such thing as independence. The citizen surrenders a portion of his liberty to the state—the individual to his neighbor. The king is dependent upon his subjects, the master upon his tenant, the master upon his servant. The domestic circle is held together and made happy by a continual surrender of private opinions and individual preferences.

How Ruskin, "is the conception, how faint, in the pursuit of Tears wash away sorrows. The true prophet, philosopher and scholar sees man as he is—not as the artist would like him to be, nor as the poet and the novelist writes him—but he sees man with all his primal instincts—an animal—covered with just enough veneration of truth, justice and patriotism, so as to enable him to think and act as a human being. The state chain that holds communities, social classes and nations together, and no more.

Selfishness is one of the primal factors in human nature. Whether it be religion, religion or politics, it is the selfishness that directs the movements of mankind.

are largely governed and controlled by its direction. There are thousands of people in the world, respectable in the daily walks of life, meeting their obligations according to the letter of the contract, fulfilling the ordinary duties of citizenship, who never knew the value of a moral question, nor ever met or weighed an issue from the standpoint of right or wrong. The single act is a social praise word. Society is unstable. The selfish propensities of our nature, as well as our most noble and generous impulses are always ready to assert themselves. Either the good, or the quits balance. The barbarian, of the moral element, can be made to kick the beam. A little change along moral and religious lines and a Reform movement breaks out; a sufficient foundation is laid for the new period. The government and social conditions of a Revolution blaze forth. Disappointment, calamity, adverse fortune, bring out either the best or the worst elements of the individual, whichever is uppermost in the heart, blossoms into full fruitage under great pressure. Men are nothing but pawns moved here and there by the hand of mentally. The person that we would call a one-day man, is one who cannot enjoy with pleasure. The landscape, the scenery, the picture, the song, the man or woman, that cheers, inspires, and strengthens us upon one occasion depresses or weakens us upon another. The quality of life is a question, object, or condition makes upon the mind, depends more upon our mental state, or spiritual mood, than upon the facts presented. The man that feels but little bearing as to the quality of his life, is one who is either false, beautiful or ugly—the latter is made up from a different standpoint.

There are conditions of the mind when every sound is a dirge, every sight a funeral procession, every action, when laughter is sacrilegious and humor strikes a discordant note in the soul. There are times when nature seems eternal and every living thing a shadow. That the world is full of things to which we are unresponsive is plainly in evidence. Music that speaks to the saddest thought is always popular. Literature that appeals to the heart's deepest experience lasts the longest. I doubtless say, my productions must be the product of the understanding, and spring from my sorrow; those only which are the product of pain seem to please the great world best." "The highest and the noblest of all conditions is that of absurd conditions. The vulgar, the more cultured, refined and the clever, the more cultured, and the more corrupt they become. This is history. The highest virtues are often linked with the lowest vices. A man may be very moral on one side and very immoral but very immoral, on the other. Some people place all their affections on God and none on their fellow man. Experience teaches that a large portion of the greatest wrongs of the world are meaningless. Never expect too much philanthropy from a man hotel and my food does me not a particle of good because the cook or the chef that is handling it gives only to the food the thought that he has to feed a hungry mob. But when I go into a home where I am a welcome visitor the food that I take affords me the greatest possible amount of pleasure. My mind is keenly alive to the good thoughts about me; the very thoughts of the hostess have been cooked with the food."

love even to think that we hate; and we thought love in the food that we were cooking and sent that food out into the world, we would bring love into our lives; if we thought hate into the food we were cooking and sent that food out into the world, hate would be the result.

Thought. What are they? I have said to you forces that we have said are not things. Thoughts are more than that. Thoughts are subtle forces that emanate from the mind of man for good or for evil. It was the thought that enabled the jeweler to place into position the wheels of the watch, the spring, the dial and the hands, but although it was his thought that enabled him to do that, the watch is not his thought, only the thing expressed. Thoughts are subtle forces." Let us send out those subtle, energizing forces that will make us felt by all who come in contact with us. Thought! What are you thinking. What do you think, and why do you think? Sometimes believe that thoughts are not things, but that they are subtle forces, but that thoughts are really the LANGUAGE OF THE SOUT.

There was a prince who was at one time stolen from his people by a rock tribe of men in the mountains, where he was fostered and grew up believing that he was one of these savage men. He was just a savage and a mortal as they were. But one day he came from the far-off land where his father dwelt, and it was revealed to him that he was the son of a king. What a wonderful transformation took place! He at once commenced to hold up his head and to walk like a king. His thoughts were changed. At one time his soul was dragged down because he believed he was a savage, but almost immediately afterwards he held his head up because he

What are you doing? Dragging the soul down or are you striving to lift it up?

Again I would say, it is for you to answer, not for me. Again must I say it is for your benefit in the future that you think properly, that you build strongly, that you do not rely on "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." It is not for me to say it of you. I have all I can do to take care of myself, to overcome my weaknesses, to whistle in the dark to keep the ghost of fear away.

I talk to you to-night, not as a teacher, not as one who dares to say,

"I know." I talk as one that must tread the path with you, as one that finds that although the way is illumined that illumination comes from within and not from without. And I would ask that you find that illumination that you might climb up to the mountain where you find that temple of learning—not by the circuitous path—but by the straight path that leads to eternal life.

In conclusion, going from here to-night ask how you are building in that silent way, and to-morrow morning send out the thoughts that will bring men to you to get good from you. Send out the thoughts that will bring to you those successful conditions in life that are eternal and everlasting. No, my friends, I do not talk to you in theories that cannot be practically applied in this day and age. Not at all. Some one may say it is a castle in Spain built in the air. All things are built up there, my friends, every one. The architect builds his house in the air first. He brings it down and places it upon paper and then the plans are in the hands of the workmen and the house is built.

The novelist first forms his plot out there in the air, and then his hands bring it down and it is given to the press and the public have the

The poet artist sees his picture and the poet his poem. As-Thoreau has so beautifully put it: Some farmers show poets over their farms, and they do not realize that the poet has gained anything by the visit to that farm until later on they read the whole story in the poem.

I am speaking theories to-night. Take these theories home, place them before you in the atmosphere, bring them down a little closer, apply them to your own daily life and then see whether they are practical or not. I know it may be hard for some to understand—may be hard for some to pendent upon others—those who have been living conventional lives—those who are afraid to live any other life than a narrow conventional one. And to such I cannot appeal, because the hour has not come for your birth into the new life. You must go on a little further, living conventionally, being afraid of what your neighbor might think of you, living according to his point of view and therefore making great blunders and mistakes because you are trying to be something else than what your soul desires you to be.

LOVE AND SYMPATHY.

As Viewed by Mrs. Amanda Coffman.

Love is that sweet tie that binds souls in divinest harmony. Sympathy is the sweet influence that makes "the whole world akin." The sympathy between spirits and mortals establishes the medium through which communications are received. Love engendered in the heart is the motive power; the star of hope creates the longing for the positive evidence of a continued life; and how fares it with your loved

The knowledge gained makes us stronger for the battles of life. Lessons received make us nobler men and women. We glide down the stream of life toward the setting of our sun, carrying with us the blossoms of love and sympathy, leaving behind the lush grass of suspicion and rank weeds of sin, clinging to our unperishable possessions. And as our earthly sun sinks into oblivion, we shall view the dawn of an eternal morning.

Then let us study well the lessons of life, that we may know what is best for us.

Then the glint and glare of the false will have no attraction for us, and if we live truly the lessons given us each day, life will be more than a shifting scene. We should not marvel that sorrows and disappointments come and burdens are heavy. These are but lessons in soul culture. We should remember that out of darkest places beautiful flowers grow, and from heavy hearts highest and tenderest thoughts are born, and life's truest lessons are learned.

AMANDA COFFMAN.

Schiller says, "There is no such thing as chance, and what seems to us merest accident springs from the deepest sources of destiny." Yet the most trivial incidents have revolutionized or changed the current of long established opinions. The fall of an apple, the swinging of a lamp, the movement of a frog's leg suggest to the human mind ideas that resulted in the enlargement of human knowledge and the opening up of new avenues of scientific investigation. Along all the lines of art, of mechanical skill, and in the laboratory, nature has preceded us. Man does not invent, he copies. Na-

HOW THE BIBLE WAS INVENTED.

A New Lecture.—Price, 10 cents.

A New Book.—Price 25 Cents.
This book examines the evidence for the historical existence of Jesus, and finds it quite insufficient to prove that such a man as Jesus ever lived. It is the most important contribution to Modern Thought. It is prefaced by a letter to the Christian Clergy, and concluded by an answer to an editorial in one of the Chicago morning papers, attacking Mr. Mangasarian's position. General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to be inserted in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written in plain, simple, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do this they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE. that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

Mrs. Mary Hill writes: "On Thursday, April 13, in room 512 Masonic Temple, the Band of Harmony will celebrate Mrs. Richmond's birthday at the afternoon session, and in the evening will be given a literary and musical entertainment. Price of tickets, 25 cents for the evening, including coffee checks to those who are there to supper. Don't fail to be there, as excellent talent has been secured and a general good time anticipated."

G. W. Morris writes from Dallas, Texas: "Mrs. Isa Wilson Kayner's work is liked very much and a great many have been brought into the society through her influence." Mrs. Morris gives details of a remarkable test she gave to a lady, describing her spirit husband, and telling her accurately that the ring examined was not bought at a store, but was made from a nugget of gold. Mrs. Kayner is certainly doing a good work in Texas.

N. H. Eddy writes from Buffalo, N. Y.: "Tuesday evening, April 3, the members of the Ladies' Aid Society and a few friends, gathered at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Augustus E. By, 204 York street, to tender a few words of cheer and tokens of encouragement to Mrs. Eddy's sister Jennie, on the eve of her departure for California, where she goes to reside and make it her home in the future of earth life's experiences. A token of kindly remembrance was presented Mrs. Jennie by the members of the Ladies' Aid Society, also from her friends who were extended to her kind thoughts and wishes for a safe and pleasant journey to the Pacific slope, where we trust that new friends and kindly associations will help to make life brighter and more congenial for her."

J. Madison Allen writes: "Having finished my five months' busy labors in the Florida field, I proceeded northward by way of the wonderful St. Johns river to Jacksonville, thence to Brunswick, Ga., where I remained two weeks, and held meetings on March 16, 18, 20, 23, 25, 28. I would like to hear at once from those desiring my services at points in Georgia. Address Savannah, Ga."

Correspondent writes from Rockford, Ill.: "April 1, President Barrett addressed the Public Research Society of this city in the afternoon and evening, to well-filled houses. They were the best and most effective discourses to which I have ever listened on Spiritualism. Some twenty members were added to the society in the evening. Mrs. West, a genuine medium, from Elgin, gave very many spirit messages, and was recognized by those to whom they were addressed. The society has taken a new lease of life, and in a new hall to which they will have access in a few days, the members feel sure their progress hereafter will not be interrupted. The Progressive Thinker is constantly gaining new subscribers in this city, and its positions are universally sustained. The ringing editorials in the paper receive general applause."

Brother Craig writes from Clyde, Ohio: "The Spiritual Research Society of Clyde has had a very successful winter and much enthusiasm has been stirred up in this place. Last Sunday Mrs. Elizabeth Schuss of Toledo, one of the very best inspirational speakers, addressed our society; her lecture was well worth hearing. We have had such speakers as D. A. Herick of Akron, Mrs. Marian Carpenter of Detroit, Mr. Dunikan, Mrs. Schaus and Hon. A. B. French this winter, and our audiences have, as a rule, been much larger than any of the churches, and the people are being stirred up. New faces are seen each evening."

Correspondent writes: "One of the most enjoyable occasions in the history of the Psychic Research Society of Sandusky, Ohio, was the celebration of the 58th anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, held at Spiritual Science Hall, Saturday evening, March 31. After a number of musical selections, the mediumship of the gifted missionary worker, Mrs. Anna E. Baird, of Elyria, the members of the society and invited guests sat down to a bountiful repast, served by the ladies of the society. The ladies of the

The First German Spiritualist Society will hold a Banner Festival on Sunday, April 16, at Gartelman's Hall, corner Ashland avenue and 13th street, from 2 o'clock till 12 p. m. Admission 30 cents. All welcome.

R. Mitchell writes: "The Spiritualistic Society of Students of Nature celebrated the 58th anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, April 1, at No. 461 W. North avenue, corner Robey street. The hall was beautifully decorated with flowers. There was a large attendance. An interesting program was given. The pastor and Dr. H. G. Welkeke, and several prominent mediums participated. Sister C. Kohberger, Sister Bundrick and Sister Smith gave many spiritual messages. Vocal solo by Prof. V. Grims; piano solo by Miss English. All went home with cheerful minds."

Mrs. Bailey writes from Rochester, N. Y.: "Mrs. E. H. Messersmith has been conducting very successful meetings here for many months in the unique chapel, 180 William street. There has been much enthusiasm and interest manifested. This being the anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, Mrs. Messersmith held a floral meeting. Flowers were in abundance. The platform and many tables were beautifully decorated with potted plants and cut flowers, brought in memory of the arisen ones. Many persons were profuse in their congratulations. There was also a fine musical program. Thursday evening, March 29, a musical and literary entertainment was held at the same place. Spirit messages were given, refreshments were served, and a good social time enjoyed by a large assemblage gathered on both occasions. The work done by Mrs. Messersmith must be fully appreciated, judging from the audiences."

Ford C. Suhrer writes: "The Rising Sun Mission, 378 S. Western avenue, fittingly celebrated the 58th anniversary of Modern Spiritualism on Sunday, April 1. The large hall was profusely decorated with potted plants, ferns and cut flowers, which created a pleasing effect. Sister Martha Price lectured for us in the afternoon, and the large congregation expressed its appreciation by frequent words of approval. Brother Winters was with us again and his tests have the stamp and ring of the veteran. Brother Jones also came in for his share of recognition as a test medium. A number remained for lunch. The ladies had a bountiful lunch prepared by Dr. J. Macfarland, who was in the evening. He is a learned man and his lectures have a force that is exceedingly pleasing. Mrs. Mills, Miss Webb, Miss Fravel of Austin, and Prof. Mounts added to the enjoyment of the evening with recitations and vocal selections. As an entirety the day's celebration was a success. Our friends in all their kind and hearty congratulations to the Mission and its workers. Dr. L. C. Koehler, a learned scholar and speaker, will lecture for us Sunday afternoon, April 15, and Bro. O. E. Miller, Ph. D., will address us in the evening."

Lyman C. Howe writes: "I had a pleasant trip to Meadville, Pa., and met an intelligent audience, enjoyed social interchange with the Aetherealists in whose home I was entertained, and was surprised to learn that Miss Grace, whose attractive presence has illumined former visits in the Gaston home, has been and gone and got married!" She is now Mrs. Grace Holmes of Syracuse, N. Y., her husband a reputable merchant in hardware. He was also surprised to learn that B. C. Howe has deserted Meadville to try his fortune in hardware trade in a town about 10 miles from Meadville. Mr. Kincaid, the active treasurer of the new society, was full of light and spiritual interest. I found Mrs. Howe slightly improved on my return. She has had a severe experience with lumbago and sciatic neuralgia. She now begins to get about with the aid of a crutch."

The Spiritualists of Oshkosh, Wis., will hold meetings in the St. John's Universalist church on April 13 to 15, at 2:30 and 7:30 p. m., each day. Rev. Will J. Erwood and Mrs. Amanda Coffman, test mediums, will conduct the meetings."

Harrison D. Barrett hurriedly passed through the city last week on his way to Canada, Me., to visit his mother. He was dangerously sick. During his short visit to the West he delivered about forty lectures to deeply interested audiences."

Mrs. Alice Sexsmith writes: "The meeting of the Golden Rule Spiritualists Society on Sunday, April 1, both afternoon and evening, was largely attended. In the afternoon our hall was filled. Our pastor, Mrs. Nora Hill, read from flowers each one bringing a favorite flower. In the evening a large audience again was present to listen to our pastor who spoke along the line of the higher unfoldment, which was very interesting. Messages were given by our good sister Mrs. Mc"

Sunday, April 15, 1906: Do Not Say Dead,—Say Arisen.

Gem of Thought:—"There is no death." The flowers but fade, To bloom again, I'm sure, And all the wonders Life hath made, May change, but will endure.

be given later. Meetings as usual every Sunday afternoon and evening at 3 and 8 p. m. at Donnell's College Building, Paulina street, between Washington Blvd. and Park avenue. Open door. All welcome."

Benj. F. Atherton writes from Portland, Oregon: "On the 25th of March the anniversary services were held to commemorate the birth of Spiritualism. This was a notable event. Many parts of the state of Oregon were represented. The morning services, conducted by Bro. E. F. Staley, president of the First Spiritualist Society, were given over principally to the visiting friends—about 10-minute speeches. At noon a lunch was served. The afternoon service was given to the members and contributing friends. For the evening was reserved the most notable events. First came the ordination ceremony to Sister Sophia B. Selp. This ceremony was performed by Brother Staley in his quaint, harmonious fashion, followed by the hand of fellowship, according to the rules of the state association. This ordination was particularly impressive. At present Sister Selp is president of the State Spiritualist Association of Oregon, one of the trustees of the First Spiritualist Society, besides being in the field as a state association. The morning services, conducted by Mrs. Laddie Smith and Rev. G. C. Love. The future career of Sister Selp will be watched with keen interest as she is what is known as a Progressive Spiritualist. Her friends predict for her a strenuous life."

Corra Forbes Brown writes from 512 Warren street, Hudson N. Y.: "It is very gratifying to watch the stand of The Progressive Thinker. I can assure you, and realize how much sincere Spiritualists owe the editor for the wisdom, courage and honest effort put forth to clear away the rubbish and falsehoods presented in the name of Truth. All honor to you, Mr. Francis, and may you live to see the ship of Spiritualism sailing free from the banes that have been clinging to it."

N. H. Eddy writes from Buffalo, N. Y.: "Sunday, April 1, Mrs. C. Fannie Allen of Boston, Mass., opened the services at the Spiritualist Church, Prospect and Jersey streets. Our society will have Mrs. Allen as speaker for the month of April, and judging from the experience of the first Sunday, we expect a feast of good things, a treat in the line of the intellectual and spiritual philosophy of life in which Mrs. Allen is a gifted speaker. Her wit, wisdom, intellectual spiritual and psychic power, and the manner of expressing the ideas that are presented, give her the power of attraction which holds the marked attention of her audience. The subjects for lecture and poems are given by those who are in the audience, and the subjects which were treated by the speaker, both in the morning and in the evening, were handled in a very able and interesting manner. Your correspondent heard many kind remarks relative to the expressions given, pertaining to the subjects for lecture and poems. A very large audience greeted Mrs. Allen Sunday evening. Much interest was manifested by the marked attention which was given her by those who were present."

Dr. Beverly writes: "Easter exercises at 3 p. m., at Arlington Hall, 31st street, Indiana avenue, will be very special. Har Har Jaha, Master of Oriental Philosophy, will speak in Hindu costume. Special music and songs for Easter will be rendered by that talented artist, Mme. La Nerva. Dr. Beverly will give a new demonstration illustrating the resurrection. The mediums selected will be very fine in all their actions and we expect and have room for 500 people."

Lou E. Johnson writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "The Grand Rapids Spiritualist Society celebrated the 58th anniversary of Spiritualism, March 26, in its hall. An all day meeting was held. At 10:30 opened by singing. Invocation by Miss Emma Gibbs, followed by short address giving the history of the establishment of the anniversary date by Dr. Edison Titus. Remarks and messages by Dr. W. O. Knowles, and a lecture by Dr. Edison Titus, followed by Dr. Knowles with messages. It was a spiritual feast, much enjoyed by the good audience each service. Basket dinner was served. Music under direction of Mrs. Sackett. A sofa pillow was presented by Mrs. Dr. Knowles, of the scenery of the Fox home, for the benefit of the temple fund."

Wm. Hassmann writes: "A singular incident happened in the hall of the North Star Spiritual Union, April 1. Two young men walked in just as the president asked in any of the audience wished to make some remarks. Then these young men one after the other, made very beautiful remarks on the spiritual philosophy. They departed without leaving their names or addresses. We hope they may favor us again with their presence. Sister Lester Krueger's lecture made a deep impression upon the large audience. Several services were received spiritual messages given by her. The Progressive Thinker, which had gone astray for this evening by some mistake in the changing of addresses, was greatly missed by many, who felt as if they lost their companion during the coming week."

Rev. G. C. Love writes from Portland, Oregon: "The anniversary of Spiritualism was celebrated in this city awakening a new interest in the cause of truth, portending great good to the cause in the Pacific Northwest. The First Spiritualist Society held one of the best, most harmonious meetings in its history, and visitors were present from other cities to see what was doing along the line of progress in Spiritualism. The public workers seemed to be united in their efforts to make the meeting a success, and they performed their parts well, while the people seemed a unit in expressions of good will to all. May the spirit of unity continue its good work until the clouds of falsehood and distrust are banished, and the so-called death comes the open door to eternal life."

OCEANIDES.

Oceanides is a psychological narrative by Carlyle Petersilea, author of The Progress of the Soul. This book deals with the condition of soul matter, or of the completed soul. It is intensely interesting. Price, paper cover, 50 cts.

MARY ANN CAREW,
Wife, Mother, Spirit and Angel.

By Carlyle Petersilea.

This most beautiful story of the experiences of a young wife and mother taken from her home on earth to her home in the spirit world, is told in such a realistic way, that one is carried away with the sweet beauty and naturalness of it. It makes the other world appear very near to us. This book has been a great comfort to many weary hearts who have lost mother, wife or babies. Price, neatly bound in cloth, $1.

Then love to all will become the divine law, and in living it, we will know ourselves and all others whom we may meet.

Correspondent writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "Brother G. W. Kates and wife closed with last evening their engagement for March. Their work here has been of a very high order, and done much good. The attendance and membership of the Ladies' Temple Fund Society, which meets every Sunday at 3 and 7:30 p. m., and Thursdays at 7 p. m., in their temple on Fullerton street, has steadily increased. Indeed, the attendance the last two Sundays was very large. Prof. W. F. Peck of St. Louis, will speak for the society during the month of April. We expect a rich treat from him. The society thus far has had good talent, and is building solidly, attracting those who desire knowledge of facts, and the light of truth in doubtful frames. There has never been a more solid growth than this year has given the Spiritualists of Cleveland."

Eva L. Stewart writes: "At the social held last Wednesday evening at Mrs. Mann's, all had a nice time. We had with us for medium, Mrs. A. Moore, who helped pass the evening pleasantly. Mr. Lonnie Mann, a young man, was controlled by a Chinaman, and his demonstration of a Chinaman can not be found. If a Chinaman had been present he certainly would have recognized his countryman. He is capable of speaking only a few words in English as yet. Lonnie does not allow himself to be controlled in public, and only in their home circles has he developed. Mrs. W. are well acquainted with Lonnie and know him to be strictly honest."

Maggie Henry writes: "At (Old 77) Spiritual Mission Chapel, it being the 58th anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, our speaker, Prof. F. M. Stoller, read a portion of the 5th chapter of Daniel. We had no lecture, just music, recitations, psychometric readings and spirit messages from four or five mediums. Our room was nicely decorated with potted plants and cut flowers. The Prof. answered a personal question for every one in the audience. The hall was full. On Sunday, the 15th, we will have the pleasure of hearing a lecture from Dr. J. H. Randall, and we hope to have a large audience to greet him. Do not forget our conference meeting at 3 p. m."

W. J. E. writes: "The services given by the Chicago Spiritualist Alliance Society, held in Vincennes Hall, No. 3514 Vincennes avenue, are growing each Sunday. We are at present presenting a series of very interesting lectures on 'The Life of Christ,' ancient and biblical history illustrated, with stereoscopic views. The lectures are given by H. S. Fraser; also plenty of tests. Mrs. May Elmo, pastor. All are welcome."

Mrs. E. J. Jaquet, who is back in Chicago, writes: "It was my pleasure to get back to Chicago last Saturday morning, and still greater pleasure to be able to once more stand upon our good Sister Hill's platform, both afternoon and evening of Sunday, April 1, and take part in the grand work of being a being and her very worthy assistant, Mrs. Alice Sexsmith. I am now en route for Southern Illinois to serve the people there for four to six weeks. I notice in the hall of the Golden Rule Society, and hanging on their wall, a state charter with the names of 58 members of said society enrolled, and such should hang in the wall of every well organized society in all lands. On Easter Sunday, Mrs. Hill will perform a baptismal ceremony of two or four persons, showing the public that many converts are coming into our ranks. Spiritualism is making rapid strides in every town, hamlet and large city that I visit."

Eva L. Stewart writes: "At our last social of circle held in the hall we were joined by Mrs. A. B. Fraser in giving messages as well as singing. Instead of our dances we have concluded to give card parties at members' houses, alternating with our dime socials. We intend to have a medium present at these socials to give words of comfort and cheer from spirit friends. We will also have games and make it a social evening. The first card party will be held at Mrs. A. Ware's, 6226 Langley avenue, on Thursday evening, April 12. Hand-painted china will be given for prizes. Score cards 25 cents. Dr. Burgess was with us on the 26th and gave us a fine talk on Man and Woman. He will be with us again on the 15th, when he expects all the young people to be present to hear him on 'Love, Courtship and Marriage.' The Doctor always pleases his audiences. Mrs. Mary Weaver was present and gave many messages which were well received. Dr. & B. W. spoke for us on the 1st, and gave some new and wonderful things in regard to the rappings at Hydeville. Mrs. Jennie Stainer Adams and Mrs. Henrietta Lichtig gave a number of messages which were recognized. We are always glad to have new mediums come and visit us, and we appreciate the work of all who have been with us before. On the 8th, Mrs. McIntire will be the speaker and medium."

Georgia Glady's Cooley is serving the Philosophical Spiritualist Society of Lima, Ohio. Send all telegrams to 758 W. High street, until April 17. Permanent address, No. 567 East 62d street, Chicago, Ill.

Mrs. George Williams writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "The Ladies' Spiritualist Temple Fund Society of Fullerton street, Cleveland, Ohio, held their 58th anniversary on Sunday last. The church was filled to its utmost capacity. In the morning they held a conference meeting. In the afternoon Rev. Dell A. Herick of Akron, Ohio, was speaker, assisted by Prof. W. F. Peck of St. Louis; also had the pleasure of having with us Dr. Haines of Bedford, Ohio, and D. M. King of Mantua, Ohio. In the evening Prof. Peck delivered an eloquent sermon on 'All Religions are One.' Rev. J. A. Sollinger, secretary of the society, read the annual report of the

Our anniversary day will long be remembered with great rejoicing. Prof. Peck will be with us for the month of April. The society is preparing for a fine entertainment to be held this month, due notice of which will be given. On Thursday evening of this week Prof. Peck will lecture on 'How to Be Happy, Thoughtful, Married.' A large attendance is expected."

H. D. Morgan writes from Washington, D. C.: "The First Association of Spiritualists of Washington, D. C., celebrated the 58th anniversary of Spiritualism Sunday evening, April 1. The following program was presented: Hymn by congregation; invocation by Mrs. M. T. Longley; vocal solo, I Shall Be Satisfied, by Mrs. F. R. Krueger of Chicago; anniversary address by Rev. Nellie S. Baade, who is serving our society for the month of April; vocal solo, Lead Kindly Light, by Mrs. Krueger, followed by spirit messages from Mrs. Baade, Mrs. Longley and Mrs. Collins. Benediction by Mrs. Baade."

Anniversary at St. Louis, Mo.

The First Spiritualist Association of St. Louis, celebrated the 58th anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, Sunday, April 1, extending over to Monday and Tuesday evenings. The attendance was large. The children of the Lyceum gave an interesting entertainment under the leadership of Mr. and Mrs. L. P. Beauvais. Mr. Beauvais is an enthusiast in the Lyceum work. He urged the need of children whose parents were thinking along these lines to bring their children up in this thought from the beginning. He cited the incident of his young son, five years of age, talking with another child, and in speaking of a storm that was raging, young Gordon Beauvais said, "that is just natural law."

How many of us are thinking thus? Correct thinking is what we need, and the Lyceum will do much for the coming generation. It is the strong foundation stone on which Spiritualism is built.

It was our pleasure to have with us Mr. and Mrs. Sprague and Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie, of San Francisco, Cal.

Brother Sprague was filled with enthusiasm as usual. He and his estimable wife gave many messages of love from dear friends gone to the higher life.

Mrs. Gillespie occupied our rostrum for the first time. She is indeed a light set upon the hill-top. She is an inspirational medium of high order. She brought to us the message of the need of higher culture in Spiritualism. We were impressed with the thought that modern phenomena of the soul's return was only the material part of true Spiritualism; that higher spiritual culture was needed in order to go on making Spiritualism of practical use.

How beautifully she blended the thought of what mediumship meant to the world; that it was an illumination across the threshold of life and death, where we shall find expression for all the beauty of our poor minds have known but could not tell of here. Surely this will not be the last time we shall hear the inspired words of our sister. Thus do our people here send forth love and strength to her in her noble work.

CAMP ETNA, MAINE.

Furnishings for the Hotel Aro Solicited.

The many friends who desired to contribute furnishings for Camp Etna Hotel are requested to do so during the months of April and May, as we desire to have the hotel in perfect readiness for the June meeting.

Director Forrest H. Coy will be at Etna completing the necessary repairs, and all articles can be addressed to him at Etna, Maine. Camp Etna Hotel will be a great addition to Etna camp-grounds. It has already received a coat of paint and each room will undergo a complete change and we hope to have a model house, conducted in the most perfect manner. The friends of camp Etna will, I know, be glad of this. Any gift will be gratefully received and acknowledged through the press, with name of donor. We want to make the hotel a real home where the souls as well as the bodies may rest and drink in the sweet inspiration, so we hope for beautiful articles, fashioned by loving, noble hands, as well as the more substantial articles.

Let us all lend a helping hand to this good work, for the growth of Etna camp means much to the sorrow-stricken of earth. A good pull all together will write success upon our banner. Let us all do what we can. Although the offering be small, it will be valuable if freighted with love. Our co-workers in other states are solicited to help us also. Remember, brothers and sisters, that lights of truth set along the way are a well-spring of joy both here and there. Do not forget the opportunity set before you, of extending the usefulness of Camp Etna. F. H. COY, Monson, Maine.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Mary Donner passed to higher life in Portland, Oregon, March 22, 1906, at the age of 68 years, 4 months and 15 days. She was born in Joe Davis county, Illinois. Rev. G. C. Love conducted the services at the residence of her sister, Mrs. Sarah Lucas, on Saturday, March 24, at 3 p. m.

Passed to spirit life at the home of Mrs. Orr, at Orton, Harrison county, Iowa, on March 23, Mrs. Ann Eliza McKenney, aged 81 years. She was a Spiritualist for 51 years, and was beloved by all who knew her. Services were conducted by the writer.

C. O. KEMPSTER, Council Bluffs, Iowa.

Passed to spirit life, March 28, 1906, Flora B. wife of J. H. White, aged 55 years. She was a life-long Spiritualist and died strong in the faith. E. S. GARDNER, San Diego, Cal.

Passed to the higher life, March 23, 1906, John Eyerard, in his 84th year. He leaves six sons and one daughter, all living in this city. He became a Spiritualist some fifteen years ago, and his family are all Spiritualists. The grandchildren rendered beautiful music upon stringed instruments. The first place was "Nearer, My God, to Thee." It was extremely sweet. Brother I. W. Pope officiated, and spoke from the music, "Nearer, My God, to Thee." The thought sublimated was that mankind comes nearer to God through the knowledge and understanding of the laws controlling the universe, and without fear it leads all nearer the Infinite Intelligence, yet will never be fully reached as the law of eternal progress ever leads us onward and upward. COR. Cleveland, Ohio.

FUTURE LIFE

In the Light of Ancient Wisdom and Modern Science.
BY LOUIS ELBE.

BY LOUIS ELBE

This is the authorised translation of the famous book which has been creating so wide an interest in all religious circles throughout France, under the title "La Vie Future." It will be received with equal interest here, and will arouse very general discussion, as the subject is one engaging not only scientists but laymen in ever-increasing numbers.

The fundamental question of the "Immortality of the Soul" has divided our thinkers for centuries, and for the solution of this eternal enigma humanity still seeks in vain.

This volume offers for the first time a complete presentation of all the available evidence hitherto to be found only in the most scattered and inaccessible forms. With great care and exactness, M. Billeh has arranged a plain statement of the discoveries, theories, and ideas of the greatest investigators together with his own illuminating views and comments, and a mass of authentic information regarding the beliefs of the primitive races.

The book is divided into two parts, the first part being devoted to the discovery of the Survivors, as considered by the Primitive races, and the second to the Deductions drawn from the Fundamental sciences. With Portrait of the author. Price $1.20; postage 10c.

spirit, every detail having been carefully recorded. Much of this data was collected and revised before the Colonel's death, and great care was taken in only recording after careful research.

This valuable edition has been aptly illustrated with many beautiful half-tone illustrations of the Colonel in different periods of his life. Also portraits of his sisters and brothers, family, father and mother, together with a genealogical chart, also many valuable reminiscences. The work is well written, handsomely bound, and beautifully printed. All admirers of the Colonel will welcome its publication.

THE SPIRIT REALMS.

The Mystic Ether Thereof—Rev. W. F. Peck Locates the Abode of the Disembodied—Gives the Spiritualists' Views of the Hereafter.

Rev. W. F. Peck of St. Louis, president of the Mississippi Valley Spiritualists Association, lectured at Cleveland, Ohio, April 8, on the following: "The Spirit World, What and Where Is It?" In part he said:

"Although the belief in immortality is almost universal among mankind, yet there are few questions upon which men have differed so widely as those having regarding the character, conditions and location of the spirit world.

"While it is true that a majority of mankind believe in immortality, there is a large and respectable minority who not only doubt, but actually disbelieve in it, and these skeptics are, for the most part, among the most intelligent of the race. To convince such will require the soundest logic, backed by scientific facts. To that class we speak particularly to appeal.

"The difficulty of conceiving of a realm or sphere fitted for the existence of the disembodied spirit has always been a stumbling block in the way of the thinker, hence the question propounded to the priest has ever been: 'If there is a spirit world where is it located? Where is heaven?'

"Before the birth of science that was not a difficult question. Judging by appearances man conceived the universe to be a sort of three-story affair. The sky was solid, it was the ceiling of earth, the door of heaven. God and his angels dwelt there, while he was immediately beneath the surface of the earth. Heaven was above because the sunshine, the rain and all blessings came from there. Hell was below as was proved by earthquakes, hot springs and volcanoes. But when science was born these theories were dissipated.

"Some have surmised that at death the spirit goes to inhabit other planets or the sun, but modern science demolishes that theory by showing that the sun and planets are constituted of practically the same elements as the earth and so are no better fitted for the abode of spirits than is this world.

"Some metaphysicians maintain that the spirit world is subjective and not an objective reality. That heaven and hell are merely conditions, states of consciousness. This, if it is true, but these states of consciousness must exist in space somewhere, hence they must have locality, but where?

"It is the opinion of scientific authorities that the trend of events, past and present, point to the final extinction of life in the visible universe. Not by heat, but by cold. The sun and planets are constantly losing heat, and their motion is growing less rapidly. The celestial clockwork is running down. In course of time—too great for figures to measure—the entire visible universe of suns and worlds will be cold, barren, dead, even as the moon is supposed to be today. But will that be the end of conscious existence? Will nature conclude her marvelous work by such a miscarriage as that? No scientist agrees that it exists.

"The conservation of energy is no longer a theory, it is a demonstrated fact. As matter is indestructible, so is force. Force may change its method or mode of action, but it cannot be destroyed. Where then have those wonderful forces gone that manifested themselves in a thousand ways in the living universe? It is universally agreed that there is no empty space anywhere. Filling all space between suns and worlds, all the interstices between the atoms, pervading and permeating the universe to its remotest bounds is a subtle form of matter or substance which is apparently independent of the laws which govern all other forms of matter. For want of a more specific name it is designated as 'ether.' All scientists agree that it exists. In no other way can they account for the various phenomena of light, electricity, gravity, etc. What this substance is they do not pretend to know.

"May I venture to supply the information? What the scientist calls 'ether' we call spirit, or spirit matter. It is the universal substance of which all visible forms are temporary expressions. It is the substance of which the spirit world is composed.

"Can anyone believe that this limitless field of matter is a lifeless, barren waste? And that brings us back to the question, What have become of the mighty forces which have escaped from the dead worlds? I answer: Back into that mighty field of space, the source from whence they came, have they gone.

"With the mighty expanse of space filled with this wonderful substance, with the active forces of light, heat, electricity, and many other forms of force permeating it, what logical reason have we for doubting that the spirit world is in the depths of space? No narrow and confined 'city of gold' can contain the emancipated souls of men and women. That idea of heaven was conceived before science had demonstrated that the little world is only one of countless millions, most of them probably populated as densely as ours.

"Nothing less than the whole expanse of space filled with it, and there it is, in infinite fields of space, inhabited by beings of immortal loveliness, warmed and unified by the breath of the divine spirit, the eternal Father."

Spirits Lift Her From Her Chair.

I sit here in the hospital by the bedside of Mrs. Lindsey. I wish to say that she just received a most remarkable manifestation of healing powers. She has been helpless, not able to help herself in any way. The first demonstration came last Friday. After calling on the higher powers, and her spirit husband and spirit guides, she was lifted from her bed, wheeled chair and laid upon her bed again. This time, however, I was an eye-witness. She was lifted from her chair and laid upon her bed again, without the aid of any hand except spirit. She is now rejoicing in the great love of the spirit powers. All hail to the grand truth that they are doing throughout our land. They shall bring peace on earth and good will to man. With her thankful heart she is enjoying a feast of life to-day. We hope and take up her good work, which she has at heart, for the cause of spiritualism.

MRS. CAROLINE A. SMITH.

Religion and Business.

Can They Be Combined in the Affairs of Earthly Life.

An article appeared in a late morning paper, from the editor's viewpoint, based on some late press dispatches, to the effect that Alexander Dowrie, the self-styled reincarnation of Elijah the prophet of the ancient days, was in the throes of an entanglement from trying to combine religion with business, in the management of a religious organization, an institution which is employed, prescribed or founded by authority of law, to practice certain rites and ceremonies in compliance with the laws of the state of Illinois, worded the title of the Holy City of Zion, a religious institution.

Be that as it may, press readers are families with convulsive upheavals and cyclonic storms, the result of high-pressure steam, emanating from the point of a pen in the hand of a competent scribe, a master of the art, which on first impressions eclipses Dowrie's, but later proves only a mirage or vapory mist. In the above case, the writer deduces his conclusions from said dispatches, that the two will not mix for they are two distinct things of entities, they cannot be combined as co-operative agencies for success or achievement to higher attainments in struggling for the necessities incident to human life.

It seems to depend largely on the definition or interpretation of the thing called religion. In contradistinction to the thing called business, in the sense in which the word religion is employed, it means the peculiar beliefs in form and essence of God, and the ceremonials used in his worship as entertained by any particular people, any class of people or set of men, by organizing and evolving on different lines of mentality and a varied code of morals, answers the question after their own interests. Where to draw the line, has been the conflict of the past centuries in manifold definitions in conflicting opinions, from varying emotions dominating the mentality of the ancient cave-dwellers to the cliff-dwellers of the Rockies, up to the most refined and cultured Anglo-Saxon blood. Each sanguine of superiority, and as yet no standard has been found to calm the surging tempest of the differentiated mentalities, and the sanctuary of the soul of each individual, consciousness alone can give response to the true definition.

"For this, the lonely Mayflower spread her white wings to the breeze, And bore the Pilgrim Fathers across the stormy seas;

"Go not, O Soul in search of it, But to thyself repair. Await thou amid the Silence dim, And thou shalt find it there."

The verdict rendered in the above case, though emanating from a mind of erudition and luminosity, occupying an editorial chair, yet is not an advance in the line of spiritualism. Simple reliance upon instinct carries us back to the beasts, not forward to the heavens.

Man's future problem is the difficult one of rationalizing and spiritualizing his life and all that it contains. This is the work of angels, and means the essential betterment of humanity everywhere.

Those who have no guide but their animal instinct enlist themselves among the beasts that perish through them.

WALLACE RICE.

Spiritualist Meetings Should Be Decorously Conducted.

To the Editor:—Mrs. Augusta C. Volk put her pen on a pertinent point in a recent Progressive Thinker. It will be the longest stride toward the high plane which we all foresee Spiritualism is to occupy when all public Spiritualist meetings shall be decorously conducted. I dare to say that such demonstrations of mediumship in public, as she portrays, are to-day the greatest drag Spiritualism has to endure. Who of sound mind and manners, could be favorably impressed by such manifestations?

We are informed that a garden was prepared and it was planted with trees and vines to yield fruit to gladden the eyes, and also pleasing to the taste of the forth-coming occupants, also aromatic odors emitted from blossoming fruits and the roses of Sharon, also the aroma of the night-blooming cereus, lingering in the soft evening air, and it was in this garden of Edenic purity and loveliness that a man was made with hoe and spade in hand and commanded by the "Infinite Father" to dress it, to take proper care of it, with pride of a shrewd horticulturist, ever keeping in view that the only sure way to climb the Alps of Success, is by alertness and toil. As a knowledge of the laws of causation is better understood, it will enable us to account for, and more fully realize, the seeming failures and reverses, the blasting of fond hopes, the better understanding of environments and resignation to meet them. When we contemplate Nature's marvelous workshop, in her process of building an atom, or an individual, she seems to establish an intelligent principle of co-operation in the process of evolution. The finite mind is unable to disprove the fact that all movements of Nature are intelligent, whether governed by a universal principle, or by an individual will, or desire.

"All green, and bitter, and hard and sour,
The fruit on the tree of Life is growing;
But the genial sunshine, with quickening power
Will sweeten its juices, like nectar flowing;
Then labor and wait, both early and late,
For the seed-field of earth yields the harvest of heaven."

THE SPIRITUAL SIDE OF ONE'S NATURE.

Animal Instincts and Self-Denial on the Part of Human Beings.

One of the most inspiring of my correspondents says that he is in trouble through arguing with his friends about the gratification of their instincts. He says he is given to tell us when we must eat; that when we must drink, and so of all the other impulses in the human breast which are rather animal than intellectual or spiritual.

Man, it seems necessary to repeat, certainly has three sorts of mental processes—the intellectual, which implies the exercise of reason; the sentimental and instinctive, which carry on the vital processes of the body, cover all the passions and feelings, and occupy by far the greater part of the brain; and the volitional, which exercises the power of restraint upon both intellectual and sentimental operations, and are themselves rather intellectual than instinctive.

This classification, it will be noted, takes no account of what by most persons is regarded as the highest of all—THE SPIRITUAL SIDE OF ONE'S NATURE, which is partly intellectual and partly sentimental, and is capable of lending the strongest possible support to the volition, or will.

Now, if instincts are gratified us for no other purpose but gratification, we are at once placed upon a level with the lowest beasts, which, denied volition as it is known to mankind, and spirituality as well, are certainly right in taking their sentiments as their only guide.

Human idiots, who represent an early stage of man's development when he was still more of the animal than the human, are in like plight. So far as brute beasts and idiots are concerned, they have quite as many instincts as man, and most of those in a better state of use and preservation. Our superiority to them consists solely in our intellectual and volitional supremacy.

The solutionists point out that the sentiments, when sufficiently intellectualized—brought under control by the will and made reasonable, that is—represent the sole direction in which man can advance. His body has reached as high a state of development as possible.

Pure intellect is stifling and contains the seeds of its own dissolution. Simple reliance upon instinct carries us back to the beasts, not forward to the heavens.

Man's future problem is the difficult one of rationalizing and spiritualizing his life and all that it contains. This is the work of angels, and means the essential betterment of humanity everywhere.

Those who have no guide but their animal instinct enlist themselves among the beasts that perish through them.

I dare to say that such demonstrations of mediumship in public, as she portrays, are to-day the greatest drag Spiritualism has to endure. Too Broad for a Church.

Shall Spiritualists Found a Church? "The World Is My Church."

So far as history relates, either "profane" (so-called), or "Holy Writ," the writer has been unable to discover any church ever founded except on dogma and tradition. There is no base in truth and fact for them to stand upon which can be proven by any known history of undisputed authority, or by any of the methods or system of thought classified as science.

And this error seems to have been particularly the possession of Theological institutions in all times past and up to the present; for we have record of some institutions in the past, which have had for a base, logic and truth have been understood it, at least. We can find dogma, tradition and the self-arranged chronology, having been claimed to have come direct from Omnipotence and to have been "plenary."

But now we have progressed, and we have Spiritualism—a religion, if you will, but better still, a science (according to proper definition) which asserts no authority from the dark and misty past, but is demonstrable by truths which can be, and are, found in the universe today, which appeal to man's deeper and higher thought and which compel him to admit its truth.

Its followers and devotees, an ever-increasing host, feel the need of organization for the purpose of spreading the truth abroad over the world; and naturally, for a name and name which shall carry on the work of moment to all concerned. Shall they borrow from Paganism, Christianity, (which is merely Paganism revamped) the names symbols, rites and ceremonials which have held sway in the past; or shall they build of a newer, better material which shall clearly distinguish between the old, the false, and the new and true? That is the question; and it is up for discussion and will not down until a majority at least are satisfied.

D. W. Brainard, in a short but excellent article appearing in No. 351 of The Progressive Thinker, concludes with the remark, "Spiritualists pride themselves in a belief founded on facts derived from their own knowledge and personal experience, and not on 'dogma' or 'lore.' We need facts in this world—proven facts." It would seem that all thinking, earnest seekers after truth must agree with this sentiment, while we must at the same time agree that no one man may speak with authority for all. It would thus follow that our Spiritualists should be the sum total of all the best thoughts and wishes of our best minds.

History, Science and observation all show us that the general trend of all schemes, whether of Nature's or man's making, is toward harmony; and while it is to many minds a lamentable fact there is such a diversity of opinion as regards organization, still we believe that therein lies one of the greatest promises of the ultimate triumph of Spiritualism over other systems of thought and belief. It gives breadth of scope.

It seems difficult for many to break from early religious teachings, even after they have come out openly and declared to have experienced a conversion from them. They are clinging to those legends and myths found in the Bible whence they first were taught concerning the immortal. Those are Bible Spiritualists—devoted, no doubt, and sincere; but they would rather prove that the Bible is true because of its many references to Spiritualism than to give Spiritualism its just and true place and value as a part of the great scheme of things. And it is no time nor country, it is necessary follows that some things in the Bible are and must be true; for, since the race of men began it has never been without some light—some truth; and the weight of ecclesiastical authority which attaches to truths found in the book does not make them any more true.

Spiritualism, as we have it today, with all its known truths and all its future possibilities, could (and probably would) be, had the Bible never been written. The churches have done all in their power to kill it.

Spiritualism is so vast, so broad, so true that it can and does take in all men of all religious shades; for man has a common following of spirituality. In whatever denomination chance has cast his lot, he will stand opposed to any of the truths of Spiritualism; nor will said truths injure him or his church, but on the contrary make both better.

And, although I am not deeply enough read nor widely enough traveled to safely venture the opinion, yet I feel sure, from what I do know, in presenting the same spiritualist must be true as regards followers of other religions than those founded on the Bible. It looks reasonable.

In our own day and country, we can but too plainly see that the churches have become "commercialized"—or, perhaps, to speak more exactly in accordance with truth, they have never been an example of the few dominant, keeping them in ignorance of real truth, giving them dogma and tradition in place of facts, thereby keeping them down both in the social and financial scale of life, while the few lived in luxury and ease.

Who knows the man who prefixes to his name "Rev." that is seriously worried about tomorrow, what he shall eat, drink, or where with he shall be clothed and housed? Who knows one that has ever given the coat of his back or the meat from his table to succor some poor fellowman in his distress, while himself would, for the time, go without. He may preach the doing of charity to his congregation, or even solicit from them the means for doing it himself; but the cases of his self-abnegation are few and far between. Why? The church has elevated him above the masses, he is distinguished and his name is famous among them, and like a parasite, feeds off them. He lives not for them more than to be the expectant recipient of their gifts, and to make his particular denomination the one most patronized in the community where he dwells. Thus he is led to become arrogant, seeking his own, and too often he becomes an interested meddler in partisan politics, using the influence of his high position to unworthy ends. Read history and deny this who may.

When we hear the word "church" there is instantly conveyed to our minds the idea of narrowness, creed-bound dogma, inconsistency, intolerance, etc. Most of the early church, and also, he is of the church churchy. The former state is a material one, therefore consistent with his being, and is right; but the latter state he finds himself in by reason of the wills of his fellowman who styles himself the clergy. The former condition finds him a child of God with chance to grow and develop in the earth life; the latter sees him a serf, hampered and circumscribed, dwarfed and degraded. We must do all we can to elevate man's condition and to free him from that which has in past ages kept him down.

Now, therefore, since Spiritualism is as broad, deep and high as God's Universe, and cannot be bounded by a creed (nor any number of dogmas), and since it is its object and destiny to grow and encompass the entire race of man, what could be more inconsistent or unthinkable than to make an obvious attempt to define, or confine it by the term "Church?" It must be like its source from above; it must not be the particular right or possession of any class, clique or cult, but belong to all the children of men throughout the world. It must have "The world is my church; to do good is my religion; I believe in One God" for its motto. Then it will embrace the world, and the churches will come out of their shells into the Light of the world (Spiritualism) which enlightens every man that cometh into the world; one man will not be revered (or Reverend) more than another; all men will be brothers, the children of One Almighty Father; Love will be the One Great Law, each man seeking his brother's good rather than his own; Liberty of Thought of Action, of Speech—"to do good"—will be the undisputed inheritance of every child of earth; Church potestates and tyrannical monarchs will be things of the past, and the people will be ruled by those placed in authority by their own sovereign wills—ruled with Love, Equity, Justice and Wisdom. And Truth will be preached for Truth's sake alone.

Association is a good word, for the present, at least. I think the National and the several State organizations have the right term by which they employ the word. It sounds brotherly, warm, cordial, harmonious; but "Church" never!

The day of churches is fast passing—the day when man, or a class of men, may stand up and, for so much preach and pray, point out the way of life to their brethren; and, like the brethren do not "stand and deliver" the price, then, no preach—the brethren may go to hell for aught "Rev." cares. In other words, the days of ignorance and slavery are passing—nearly gone, thanks to the upper shelves—the New Sun of Righteousness has dawned upon earth, with great effulgence and irresistible power in His rays; He is destined to fill the whole earth with light and happiness. Then, let us not attempt to catch and confine Him in a church, as did Rome and all sects before us; but open the doors and windows of God's living temples, the hearts and minds of men, and let Him into the whole world. Then men shall know the truth; and it shall make them free.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

A BEACON LIGHT

Which Is Worthy of Great Admiration.

We welcome your paper weekly, not only as a progressive thinker, but teacher also, every number containing instructive lessons. We read its pages with eager eyes, knowing that in following the instructions we can not go astray. We are glad to know it is growing in the hearts of the people, it being the best paper for the South in the East, West, North or South. Every Spiritualist should rally to its support. It is a beacon light that consoles us in our hours of darkness and despondency. One and all should come forward and assist The Progressive Thinker in its exertions to put before us the philosophy of life, here and hereafter, that Spiritualism adorned in all its beauty. Its able articles are the finger posts that direct us how to prepare ourselves for that higher life. Spiritualists know our cause to be the comforter promised us by our Elder Brother while in earth life.

In my seventy-eight years of age, and forty years of Spiritualism, I am still searching for light more light, and I am not looking in vain as long as I can read The Progressive Thinker. With Spiritualism enthroned, and our progressive teacher leading the hosts, we will surely march on to victory.

The resolution you have formed to cleanse our cause of the mighty incubus that has its grasp upon the great truth ever given to man, is one that the spirit world will help you to win, for justice must prevail, though the heavens fall, and the Spiritualists must work for the salvation of our noble cause, to bring it spotless before the world. When the spirit world opened up their communications with the mortal world it was not on their program that their teachings should be trailed through mud and mire by a lot of money-grubbers and frauds. So, I say, lay off Macaulay, until the traitors cry, Hold, enough!

SPIRIT MESSAGES.

Through the Mediumship of Mrs. Nellie Davis, Kewanee, Ill.

Moses Baldwin.

To My Dear Wife:—I am pleased to be able to come here and see if I can reach my wife and children. This is not my first attempt. But this is a new medium to me. I have never been here before, and I hope I am not taking up the time from some one that has an important message to send out.

I know this will make my dear wife happy, for she is always anxious to get a word from the spirit world, and she would be so glad if the others could be convinced of the truth.

I would like to say to my son, Llewellyn, that I can come very close to him at times, and I know what is worrying him and wife. But please tell them not to worry, the boy's eyes will be all right soon. Rest is what they need. I have tried to manifest myself to you many times in such ways as this, but I only partially made myself known, not fully, I could not give my name.

There has been sadness in the home since I left and some things I think it not best to speak of here. But if they will give me an opportunity in private, there is much I would like to say to them. I bring love and affection and expressions of sympathy from the dear ones who are with me. Billy is here and wants to send love to mamma. Please give me an opportunity, for I have much to say to you in private.

My son that I speak of lives in Iowa, but my dear wife lives at Streator, Ill., where I passed away, and where I will be well remembered. I send my love and best wishes to all.

MOSES BALDWIN.

Streator, Ill.

Leonard O. Wheaton.

My Dear Children and Wife:—I take this opportunity to reach you if possible, for I find some of you are becoming interested. It is all new to me, but as I stood here and listened to others sending out their messages of love, I thought I would try, and if I cannot do as well as some, please do not criticize me.

I was quite a young man when I passed away, not quite forty years old, and I left a dear companion and six small children, not very well provided for, but will say to Cora, my wife, I am well pleased with the way you have done, and I wish now I could throw more happiness around you in your declining years. Charlie, please take good care of your mother. She has suffered and sacrificed much for you all, and she worried much about Joe. I am sorry that he is so wild, and I hope if he sees this and knows that I am watching him, that he will try to mend his ways. I am glad you still keep the old home where I left the body; it is very dear to me. I often visit Annie—she is my daughter; she was once a baby when I passed away, now she is almost thirty-two. I can come very close to her and she is very meddlesome, but seems afraid to give us conditions to come to her. Please tell her that I see she called her boy after me. I feel very proud of him.

James and Thaddeus have joined me since coming here. They are my sons, and their mother can't seem to give them up; they are right by my side now.

James Watkins is here, too. He is no relative, but an old friend of the family.

I must not hold control too long. You will find my folks still at Kansas City, Mo., where I passed out. Good-bye, all.

LEONARD O. WHEATON.

Frank W. Jones.

My Dear Friends:—When I am in my spirit world, I rejoice in the presence of good friends who are busy at work for human welfare, and in beauty and peace, which environs me to know that I am in heaven, because all its conditions are harmonious and sweet. And harmony or order is heaven's first law, and when I return and feel the influence of Spirituality that abounds, I know I am still in heaven, and I am therefore not a locality, but exists wherever we or others exercise an influence of peace and comfort which of itself generates a happy and heavenly state.

Although it has been many years since I passed away I should judge a dozen or so of course we don't count time as you do, but I know I am not forgotten at the present time. It is indeed pleasant to know we come upon the earth plane, to know we are not forgotten.

Friends, true mediumship is a God-given talent possessed in a larger or lesser degree, developed or dormant, by all mankind. Like all other gifts, it may be rightly used or abused, according to the motive by which its possessor is actuated; and like all other gifts, its possessor will be held accountable for its use or abuse. True mediumship is indeed a blessing to the inhabitants of both worlds, and all true mediums should be encouraged and upheld in their work. Their position at present is a trying one at the best.

I lived a good while, I was near 70 when I passed out, but I was glad to go and to find myself awakening spiritually with renewed energies on the spirit side. I am at work still, and as I look upon Spiritualism and its progress, and realize how it has marched on for over fifty-five years without a sign of weakness or of failure, I feel that it is a giant of strength and that what the world has seen of its powers is only an instance of its possibilities which are unfolding year by year.

Spiritualism in the next few years will give such revelations of the immortal world to mankind that science itself will stand astounded and be obliged to recognize its claims, and its revelations that will be given through scientific methods of research and discovery.

Well, I tried to live an honest life, and I am glad of it. I think I left a clean record behind me, and if any of my friends around Boston see this I hope they will do me a favor by acknowledging it, and I will try to come again. I will go now. My interest is still with my friends and ever will be.

FADS, OLD AND NEW.

Not From Missouri, But Wants to Be Shown.

To the Editor:—Have you heard someone say he or she remembers floating around in the "azure blue," a spirit looking for an opportunity to be born into a physical body?

I know people who believe the spirit germ is intelligent and chooses its parents, and I am now prepared to hear from someone who remembers the incident; how he or she traveled up and down the earth, rejecting this one and that one until they found the parents desired.

In some instances they made a poor selection, as we have seen.

If transmigration and reincarnation of human soul or spirit is a truth, the same condition must prevail with the animal kingdom and in all other departments of nature, as all of nature's laws are general in application. Did it ever occur to you that the gentle horse was a ferocious lion in a former embodiment, that corn was beans not long ago, and the beautiful pine tree was a scraggy oak in the past?

It is just as reasonable to me as the transmigration and re-embodiment of spirit and as susceptible of proof. I know a man who says he remembers when he was a cat, and a lady who remembers being burned at the stake as a witch in a former embodiment.

They are bright, intelligent people, and have simply hypnotized themselves with this idea.

In my next embodiment I am going to be born in California in the central part of the state near the coast. I think that is the most desirable climate. I intend to return within thirty days after I leave the body, as I do not want to lose any time.

Now, my way of disposing of this question is thus:

1. Spirit form and intelligence is evolved from the germ as is everything in nature.

2. No germ can develop form but once.

3. No form can descend to the germ condition and come up through a second development.

A spirit must reduce itself to a germ before it can re-enter a body. This it cannot do.

If I am wrong in my conclusions I will gladly be set right, and I call on any disciple of the cult to please rise and explain.

I am not from Missouri, but I must be shown.

It is surprising how easy it is to get followers to any fad.

If a person should teach that by eating a certain kind of food three times a day everybody could grow wings and fly to the moon, he or she would get any number of followers.

And now we have a class of people who are going to prevent the natural change called death, and in a few years this old earth will be so overburdened with human beings that it will collapse and then "where will we be?"

This latest fad is the "Live Forever" society in your city.

By thinking and doing certain things they will live forever.

The result will be as it was with the drayman's horse. Just as he had taught him to live without eating, he "up and died."

THE SUNFLOWER.

Our Club—Our Emblem.

A Little Pilgrim.

This is a charming narrative illustrating the beauty grandeur and sublimity of the spirit side of life, the realms of souls, the immortal spheres of existence. Margaret O. W. Oliphant is the author. And while it has been read by millions in the past, it will prove refreshing and soul-inspiring to our readers to again peruse it and feel its thrills of inspiration, and enjoy its uplifting influence.

Chapter IV.—Continued.

And then at last he stirred, and turned around and opened his eyes, for the genial warmth had reached him. But his eyes were heavy and dazed with the light; and he looked round as if confused from beneath his heavy eyelids. "And where am I?" he said; "and who are you?"

"Oh, brother!" said the little Pilgrim, and told him in his ear the name of that heavenly place, and many comforting and joyful things. But he understood her not, and still gazed about him with dazed eyes, for his face was still towards the darkness, and fear was upon him lest this place should prove no more than a delusion, and the darkness return, and the anguish and pain.

Then he who had been her guide, and told her his tale, came forward and stood by the side of the newly come. And "Brother," he said, "look upon me, for you know me, and know from whence I come."

The stranger looked dimly with his heavy eyes. And he replied, "It is as a dream that I know you, and know from whence you came. And the dream is sweet to lie here, and think that I am at peace. Deceive me not, oh! deceive me not with dreams that are sweet; but let me go upon my way and find the end, if there is any end, or if any good can be."

"What shall we do," cried the little Pilgrim, "to persuade him that he has arrived and is safe, and dreams no more?"

And they stood round him wondering, and troubled to find how little they could do for him, and that the light entered so slowly into his soul. And he lay on the bank like one left for death, so weary and worn with all the horrors of the way that his heart was faint within him, and peace itself seemed to him but an illusion. He lay silent while they watched and waited, then turned himself upon the grass, which was as soft to the weary wayfarer as angels' wings; and then the sunshine caught his eye, as if he had been a new-born babe awakened to the light. He put out his hand to it, and touched the ground that was golden with those heavenly rays, and gathered himself up till he felt it upon his face, and opened wide his dazzled eyes, then shaded them with trembling hands, and said to himself, "It is the sun; it is the sun!"

But still he did not dare to believe that the danger and the toil were over, nor could he listen, nor understand what the brethren said. While they all stood around and watched and waited, wondering each how the newcomer should be satisfied, then suddenly arose a sound with which they were all acquainted,—the sound of one approaching. The faces of the blessed were all around like the stars in the sky,—multitudes whom none could count or reckon; but he who came was seen of none, save him to whom he came. The weary man rose up with a great cry, then fell again upon his knees, and flung his arms wide in the wonder and the joy. And "Lord," he cried, "was it Thou? Lord, it was Thou!—Thine was the face. And Thou hast brought me here!"

The watchers knew not what the other voice said, for what is said to each new-comer is the secret of the Lord. But when they looked again, the man stood upright upon his feet, and his face was full of light; and though he trembled with weakness and with weariness, and exceeding joy, yet the confusion and the fear were gone from him. And he had no longer any suspicion of them, as if they might betray him, but held out his trembling hands and cried, "Friends,—you are friends? and you spoke to me and called me brother? And am I here? And am I here?" For to name the name of that blessed country was not needful any longer, now that he had seen the Lord.

Then a great band and guard of honor, of angels and principalities and powers, surrounded him, and led him away to the holy city, and to the presence of the Father, who had permitted and had not forbidden what the Lord had done. And all the companies of the blessed followed after with wonder and gladness and triumph, because the great love of the Lord had drawn out of the darkness even those who were beyond hope.

The little Pilgrim saw them depart from her with love and joy, and sat down upon the rocky edge and sang her own song of peace; for her fear was gone, and she was ready to do her service there upon the verge of the precipice as among the flowers and the sunshine, where her own place was. "From the depths," she said, "they come, they come!—from the land of darkness, where no love is. For Thy love, O Lord, is more than the darkness and the depths. And where hope is not, there Thy pity goes." She sat and sang to herself like a happy child, for her heart had fathomed the awful gloom which baffles angels and men; and she had learned that though hope comes to an end and light fails, and the feet of the ambassadors are stayed on the mountains; and the voice of the pleaders is silenced, and darkness swallows up the world, yet Love never fails. As she sang, the pity in her heart grew so strong, and her desire to help the lost, that she rose up and stepped forth into the awful gloom, and had it been permitted, in her gentleness and weakness would have gone forth to the depths and had no fear.

The ground gave way under her feet, so dreadful was the precipice; but though her heart beat with the horror of it, and the whirl of the descent and the darkness which blinded her eyes, yet had she no hurt. And when her foot touched the rock, and that sinking sense of emptiness and vacancy ceased, she looked around and saw the path by which that traveler had come. For when the eyes are used to darkness, the horror of the gloom was no longer like a solid thing, but moved into shades of darker and less dark, so that she saw where the rocks stood, and how they sank with edges that cut like swords down and ever down into the abysses; and how here a deep ravine was rent between them, and there were breaks and scars as though some one had caught the jagged points with wounded hand or foot, struggling up the perpendicular surface towards the little ray of light, like a tiny star which shone as on immeasurable heights to show where life was. As she traveled deeper and deeper, it was a wonder to see how far that little ray penetrated down and down through gulfs of darkness, blue and cold like the shimmer of a diamond, and even when it could be seen no more, sent yet a shadowy refraction, a line of something less black than the darkness, a lightning amid the gloom, a something indefinable which was hope. The rocks were more cruel than imagination could conceive,—sometimes pointed and sharp like knives, sometimes smooth and upright as a wall with no hold for the climber, sometimes moving under the touch, with stones that rolled and crushed the bleeding feet; and though the solid masses were distinguishable from the lighter darkness of the air, yet it could only be in groping that the travelers by that way could find where any foothold was.

The traveler who came from above, and who had the privilege of her happiness, sank down as if borne on wings, yet needed all her courage not to be afraid of the awful rocks that rose all above and around her, perpendicular in the gloom. And the great blast of an icy wind swept upwards like something flying upon great wings, so tremendous was the force of it, whirling from the depths below, sucked upwards by the very warmth of the life above; so that the little Pilgrim herself caught at the rocks that she might not be swept again towards the top, or dashed against the stony pinnacles that stood up on every side. She was glad when she found a little platform under her feet for a moment where she could rest, and also because she had come, not from curiosity to see that gulf, but with the hope and desire to meet some one to whom she could be of a little comfort or help in the terrors of the way.

While she stood for a moment to get her breath, she became sensible that some living thing was near; and putting out her hand she felt that there was round her something that was like a bastion upon a fortified wall, and immediately a hand touched hers, and a soft voice said, "Sister, fear not! for this is the watch-tower, and I am one of those who keep the way." She had started and trembled indeed, not that she feared, but because the delicate fabric of her being was such that every movement of the wind, and even those that were instinctive and belonged to the habits of another life, betrayed themselves in her. And "Oh," she said, "I knew not that there were any watch-towers, or any one to help, but came because my heart called me, if perhaps I might hold out my hand in the darkness, and be of use where there was no light."

"Come and stand by me," said the watcher; and the little Pilgrim saw that there was a whiteness near to her, out of which slowly shined the face of a fair and tender woman, whom she knew not, but loved. And though they could scarcely see each other, yet they knew each other for sisters, and kissed and took comfort together, holding each other's hands in the midst of the awful gloom. And the little Pilgrim questioned in low and hushed tones, "Is it to help that you are here?"

"To help when that may be; but rather to watch, and to send the news and make it known that one is coming, that the bells of joy may be sounded; and all the blessed may rejoice."

"Oh," said the little Pilgrim, "tell me your name, that I may do you honor;—for to gain such high promotion can be given only to the great who are made perfect, and to those who love most."

"I am not great," said the watcher; "but the Lord, who considers all, has placed me here, that I may be the first to see when one comes who is in the dark places below. And also because there are some who say that love is idolatry, and that the Father will not have us long for our own, therefore am I permitted to wait and watch and think the time not long for the love I bear him. For he is mine; and when he comes I will ascend with him to the dear country of the light, and some other who loves enough will be promoted in my place."

"I am not worthy," said the little Pilgrim. "It is a great promotion; but oh, that we might be permitted to help, to put out a hand, or to clear the way!"

"Nay, my little sister, said the watcher, "but patience must have its perfect work; and for those who are coming help is secret. They must not see it nor know it, for the land of darkness is beyond hope. The Father will not force the will of any creature He has made, for He respects us in our nature, which is His image. And when a man will not, and will not till the day is over, what can be done for him? He is left to his will, and is permitted to do it as it seems good in his eyes. A man's will is great, for it is the gift of God. But the Lord, who cannot rest while one is miserable, still goes secretly to them, for His heart yearns after them. And by times they will see His face, or some thought of old will seize upon them. And some will say, 'To perish upon the dark mountains is better than to live here.' And I have seen," said the watcher, "that the Lord will go with them all the way—but secretly, so that they cannot see Him. And though it grieves His heart not to help, yet will He not,—for they have become the creatures of their own will, and by that must they attain."

She put out her hand to the newcomer and drew her to the side of the rocky wall, so that they felt the sweep of the wind in their faces, but were not driven before it. "And come," she said, "for two of us together, will be like a great light to those who are in the darkness. They will see us like a lamp, and it will cheer them, though they know not why we are here. Listen!" she cried. And the little Pilgrim, holding fast the hand of the watcher, listened and looked down upon the awful way; and underneath the sweep of the icy wind was a small sharp sound as of a stone rolling or a needle of rock that broke and fell, like the sounds that are in a wood when some creature moves, though not too far off for footstep to sound. "Listen!" said the watcher; and her face so shone with joy that the little Pilgrim saw it clearly, like the shining of the morning in the midst of the darkness. "He comes!"

"Oh, sister!" she cried, "is it he whom you love above all the rest? Is it he?"

The watcher smiled and said, "If it is not he, yet is it a brother; if it is not he now, yet his time will come. And in every one who passes, I hope to see his face; and the more that come, the more certain it is that he will come. And the time seems not long for the love I bear him. And it is for this that the Lord has so considered me. Listen! for some one comes."

And there came to these watchers the strangest sight; for there flew past them while they gazed a man who seemed to be carried upon the sweep of the wind. In the midst of the darkness they could see the faint white in his face, with eyes of flame and lips set firm, whirled forward upon the wind, which would have dashed him against the rocks; but as he whirled past, he caught with his hand the needful of the opposite peaks, and was swung high over a great chasm, and landed upon a higher height, high over their heads.

And for a moment they could hear, like a pulsation through the depths, the hard panting of his breath; then, with scarcely a moment for rest, they heard the sound of his progress onward, as if he did battle with the mountain, and his own swiftness carried him like another wind. It had taken less than a moment to sweep him past, quicker than the flight of a bird, as sudden as a lightning flash.

The little Pilgrim followed him with her eager eyes, wondering if he would leap thus into the country of light and take heaven by storm, or whether he would fall upon the heavenly hills and lie prostrate in weariness and exhaustion, like him to whom she had ministered. She followed him with her ears, for the sound of his progress was with crashing of rocks and a swift movement in the air; but she was called back by the pressure of the hand of the watcher, who did not, like the little Pilgrim, follow him who thus rushed through space as far as there was sound or sight of him, but had turned again to the lower side, and was gazing once more, and listening for the little noises in the gulf below.

The little Pilgrim remembered her friend's hope, and said softly, "It was not he?" And the watcher clasped her hand again, and answered, "It was a dear brother. I have sounded the silver bells for him; and soon we shall hear them answering from the heights above. And another time it will be he." And they kissed each other because they understood each other in her heart.

And then they talked together of the old life when all things began; and of the wonderful things they had learned concerning the love of the Father and the Son; and how all the world was held by them and penetrated through and through by threads of love, so that it could never fall; and the darkness seemed light round them; and they forgot for a little that the wind was not as a summer breeze.

Then once more the hand of the watcher pressed that of her companion, and bade her hush and listen; and they sat together holding their breath, straining their ears. Then heard they faint sounds which were very different from those made by him who had been driven past them like an arrow from a bow,—first as of something falling, but very far away, and faint sound as of a foot which slipped. The listeners did not say a word to each other; they sat still and listened, scarcely drawing their breath. The darkness had no voice; it could not be but that some traveler was there, though hidden deep, deep in the gloom, only betrayed by the sound.

There was a long pause, and the watcher held fast the little Pilgrim's hand, and betrayed to her the longing in her heart; for though she was already blessed beyond all blessedness known on earth, yet had she not forgotten the love that had begun on earth, but was forevermore. She murmured to herself and said, "If it is not he, it is a brother; and the more that come, the more sure it is that he will come. Little sister, is there one for whom you watch?"

"There is no one," the little Pilgrim said, "but all."

"And so care I for all," cried the watcher; and she drew her companion with her to the edge of the abyss, and they sat down upon it low among the rocks to escape the rushing of the wind. And they sang together a soft song, "For if he should hear us," she said, "it may give him courage." And there they sat and sang; and the white of their garments and of their heavenly faces showed like a light in the deep gloom, so that he who was tolling upwards might see that speck above him, and be encouraged to continue upon his way.

Sometimes he fell, and they could hear the moan he made,—for every sound came upwards, however small and faint it might be,—and sometimes dragged himself along, so that they heard his movement upon some shelf of rock. And as the Pilgrim looked, she saw other and other dim whitenesses along the ravines of the dark mountains, and knew that she was not the only one, but that many had come to watch and look for the coming of those who had been lost.

Time was as nothing to these heavenly watchers; but they knew how long and terrible were the moments to those upon the way. Sometimes there would be silence like the silence of long years; and fear came upon them that the wayfarer had turned back, or that he had fallen, and lay suffering at the bottom of some gulf, or had been swept by the wind upon some icy peak and dashed against the rocks. Then anon, while they listened and held their breath, a little sound would strike again into the silence, bringing back hope; and again and again all would be still. The little Pilgrim held her companion's hand; and the thought went through her mind that were she watching for one whom she loved above the rest, her heart would fail. But the watcher answered her as if she had spoken, and said, "Oh, no, no; for if it is not he, it is a brother; and the Lord give them joy!" But they sang no more, their hearts being faint with suspense and with eagerness to hear every sound.

Then in the great chill of the silence, suddenly, and not far off, came the sound of one who spoke. He murmured to himself and said, "Who can continue on this terrible way? The night is black like hell, and there comes no morning. It was better in the land of darkness, for still we could see the face of man, though not God." The muffled voice shook at that word, and then was still suddenly, as though it had been a flame and the wind had blown it out. And for a moment there was silence; until suddenly it broke forth once more,—

"What is this that has come to me that I can say the name of God? It tortures no longer, it is as balm. But He is far off and hears nothing. He called us and we answered not. Now it is we who call, and He will not hear. I will lie down and die. It cannot be that a man must live and live forever in pain and anguish. Here will I lie, and it will end. O Thou whose face I have seen in the night, make it possible for a man to die!"

PROGRESS.

A grain of sand upon the shore,
A bubble on the ocean wave,
A dream, and then this life is o'er,
A candle, a hammock, and a grave.

This is the situation here,
It is God's way, we know 'tis right;
Believing this we have no fear,
Death brings us nearer to the light.
Dismiss all doubt and trust the One
Who gives you life without a curse;
Look up and say: Thy will be done,
Author of this grand universe!

The pessimistic, creed-bound soul,
Dwells under shadow dark as night;
Our outlook is a home and goal
Among the stars in heaven's own light.

SPIRITUALISM AND OCCULTISM.

J. O. F. Grumbine Makes Reply to Lyman C. Howe.

To the Editor:—I was much pleased to read the letter from Mr. Lyman C. Howe, on the position I took relative to the Dr. Hodgson test. I yield to none my admiration for the beautiful character and noble work of Mr. Howe. He has been and is a Spiritualist worthy the name, a pioneer whose courage equalled his faith in the trying times when to be a Spiritualist meant social ostracism and popular persecution. He is not a coward, and is an earnest, sincere advocate of Spiritualism.

I am glad to know that he has challenged my position for it not only permits me to tell frankly and to his face what I have just written, but to state my position in unequivocal language. That I have been a fair advertiser and that it has cost me considerable money proves one thing, and that is that I have faith in what I advertise, and further, that others who, reading the advertisements and applying my system, have as much faith in what I do as myself. In as much as the N. S. A. did not see fit to give me a worthy cause, I like your good brother Lyman C. Howe had to paddle my own canoe. I knew the cost and bore it happily, and never sent my bills to the N. S. A. Well, the college and the system thrived, despite the calumny of its enemies and to-day numbers hundreds of students. This is a pretty good showing, if not an endorsement of a work done in the face of opposition, slander and persecution. Perhaps its success was to be, or the spirits were on my side, or hard work brought or forced the idea before the people. At any rate the college and its cause are here to stay, thanks to both its enemies and friends.

Now, Brother Howe, occult science is a branch of pure, universal Spiritualism, and is therefore not opposed to it, as is supposed. True, it stands for higher Spiritualism, rather than for lower, for the power of spirit rather than that of spirits, for possession and self-consciousness rather than for obsession and trance. This, however, is only a point of difference and not one of opposition.

Let me make that clear. Occult science not only teaches one the knowledge of the mysteries of life and death of the material and the spiritual world, but reveals the philosophy of expressing one's own powers; that is seeing clairvoyantly, hearing clairaudiently, feeling clairvoyantly, in fact, turning or subjectifying the ego in upon its occult self and so realizing and actualizing its supernatural powers. It may be disputed that certain phenomena called materialization can be done by one's own will under perfect concentration, as is claimed to be done by magicians (not sleight-of-hand performers) and fakirs of India. It would be silly to deny that it could be done, and so limit one's power, before the experiment is made.

I believe that it can and will be done and without any aid whatever from exorcise spirits and without resorting to mediumship as it is popularly explained. I have done it, and much, so much more than the most hopeful ever imagined could be possible, in the independent realization of occult powers and spiritual powers, natural powers which every human being potentially possesses, as clairvoyance, mind reading, inspiration, healing, hypnotism, telepathy, moving tables, psychometry, etc. I have written that who will lift the human spirit or say that slate-writing, materialization of flowers, faces and hands, or full forms may not be one of the possible feats of the future adept?

Does this disprove Spiritualism as a branch of Spiritualism? That spirits can, do and will continue to communicate with mortals and attest their post-mortem existence by such phenomena? Not at all. Remember, Mr. Howe, it is here emphatically stated that occult science does not disprove Spiritualism.

What does it do? It affirms that what exorcise spirits do, incarnate spirits can do. That is a pretty fair, rational, probable proposition, and that it can be demonstrated, I, with others, am ready to prove. Indeed, I go so far as to prove that as neither an owl, bat or cat see in the dark by mediumship, or because obsessed by spirits, and yet because naturally clairvoyant, so man can see, by unfolding or expressing his potential clairvoyant function.

Why does he not do it? Because, first, he did not know that he is clairvoyant, and second, because he did not know how. In 1893 I published the first book ever written on the subject of clairvoyance, which attempted to teach the philosophy of independent clairvoyant realization. Since then the book had a wide sale and a most favorable reception. It is now in its third edition. It does the work. I was taught how to see clairvoyantly and to enter into daily clairvoyant communication with spirits—not through the trance, or by control or obsession of any kind, but open-eyed, face to face, with my full self-consciousness and every faculty keyed to its highest pitch of activity.

Am I a medium? Well—I guess! I have had every phase from slate-writing and raps to clairvoyance and inspiration, but I am no longer permitting spirits to do my work. I am doing my seeing and hearing, smelling and tasting, eating, drinking or sleeping! In short, I am doing my own work, and they are co-operating with me. They know their place. I have learned mine! We understand each other.

To co-operate with the spirit world and not to be obsessed by it, is and produces a better Spiritualism, as Dr. Peabody shows in his great book on Demology of the Ages, than that form of it which handicaps the sensitive, stultifies his brain, atrophies his senses and makes him often a tool of their material, selfish, sordid will. They hold mortals to the earth as often as mortals hold them to the ether, my experience with the higher intelligences is that they never control but inspire, and such is the nature and form of inspiration that it cannot be construed to be obsession. That control of the medium's will and organism is necessary to produce certain phenomena, I will admit, but whether such phenomena should be made the corner stone upon which the structure of Spiritualism should rest, is to be questioned. They are abnormal and not supernatural results, and plagiarize rather than express normally the powers of the spirits, a medium becoming a vicar, rather than an independent agent of the spirit world.

Now, Lyman C. Howe is at fault when he implies that I boasted that I could secure the coveted test locked in a box in a safe in the rooms of the Society of Psychical Research in London. I said that it could be gotten by an occultist or one up in the science of the use of occult power, without resorting to the aid of spirits at all, proving it gotten that way, that it could not be received or accepted as proof of Dr. Hodgson's immortality. The fact is and I state it, insist upon the logic of its recognition, that such feats of mind-reading, clairvoyance, telepathy, psychometry, in which spirits are dismissed, at least are not operative, are done, and the securing of the Hodgson test would not at all be remarkable, not that spirits could not get it, but that Dr. Hodgson's spirit could not and will not give it, not that mediums are not able to make the test and succeed at it, but after the test is gotten who is there on earth can guarantee that the test is from Dr. Hodgson's spirit even though it is the very test he gave? That is my point, and since so far not even Dr. Funk's medium, Mrs. May Pepper, or Dr. Hodgson's psychic Mrs. Piper, have yet given the test it is not necessarily up to me or any other person to secure it. Such a test will mean nothing to the rabble and it will mean less to me.

Hundreds of scientists have published their researches on Spiritualism to the world, witness Zollner, Hare, Crookes, Epses Sargent, Wallace, Flammarion, Myers, Hugo, Hyslop, and yet do the ignorant and bigoted accept their unimpeachable proofs? No! They must know for themselves, and after a million seances, learning as men and women are taught by the exposure of such mediums as Elsie Reynolds and Winans, whom hundreds would even now swear by, and thousands would lose all confidence in mediumship, is it not best to have a man learn that he is now an immortal spirit, that now he can unfold and use occult and psychical powers, that in the sphere of life in which he is placed he can "temper the wind to the shorn lamb" by realizing that as an unfolded immortal soul he can pierce the veil of sense, commune with the departed, see spirits, and so satisfy himself in a normal, conscious way, that he is immortal, that death has no terror for him, and that life rounds out into the eternal spheres beyond?

Finally what I say in my advertisements I say now, that under my system I can help any man to unfold his divinity, express his occult powers, realize his immortality, without yielding to control, obsessions, spirits, or going into a trance. I can give proof and I stand ready at any time to only to demonstrate all that I claim here in Boston, but among my students. If a man will not follow my simple conditions I can do no more for him than an incubator could do for a stale egg, or Lyman C. Howe could do for the best medium who refuses to sit for development.

THE GROWING FAITH.

As Comprehensively Illustrated by Love.

I wonder how many of my brothers and sisters who enjoy your good weekly visits have ever read in Olive Schreder's little book, "The Growing Faith." The whole volume is inspired and is, most of all, a woman's book. The dream of the Hunter is for those who are seeking the bird of white plumes, the glorious bird of Truth.

I often think of this Hunter when I find ardent souls rejoicing in their faith, be it Spiritualism, Theosophy, New Thought, Christian Science or the older cults, Universalism and Unitarianism. Of the Hunter I say, "Ah! dear trusting, living soul, you have found your white feather." And as we go blazing our way up the Mountain of Spiritual Knowledge, we know by this sign that we are on the right path. We each have our own white feather, for I think none of us have found all the truth. We are such babes that we learn slowly—just a word or a syllable at a time. But I think we are all nearing the same dear home, and will find it by our own efforts, led always by that strong light of the God-spark within; and so I say, "Thank God for the growing religion of the future, for I think none of us will find what we will so long as it teaches Love." It is all patience, forgiveness, tolerance, charity and hope—all, all in one. And the one other great teaching of the new faith is the non-recognition of evil, knowing it is only the reverse, or wrong side of a shield that turned around to the light shows beautiful figures, and that the hand of Love can turn it.

I reverse our own high priestesses, Mrs. Richmond, and bless her as the interpreter of God's messages to us. The good that she and our other loved sister, Ella Wheeler Wilcox, is doing for the cause of the Growing Faith, cannot be estimated.

GOD'S KISS.

A little lad at Lady Henry Somerset's Home for Slum Children, after he had finished his prayers, put in another petition as a kind of postscript, "And, please, God, would you mind giving my mother a kiss?"

Please, God, I have finished my prayers.

But there's one thing I want to say, My mother lives up at the top of the stairs.

And she's lonely now I'm away.

You'll be sure to know her, because There ain't nobody half so good; And she's just the dearest that ever was.

I'd die for her if I could.

The neighbors are not very bad, But, of course, they aren't like me. I've got to think what will make her glad.

And to get her a cup of tea.

And sometimes, please, God, she ain't strong.

She has got such a lot to do, And it frets her so much when folks do wrong.

And she thinks no end of you.

When she's tired, she likes to sit On the floor and lean against me, For it comforts her aching head a bit To rest it upon my knee.

I sit all so still and don't stir.

And she calls me her bit of joy, And tells me I'm like a mother to her, As well as her sonny boy.

It does hurt me to think of her, And she ain't got me to comfort her, To love her and hold her tight.

So, please, God, I hope you won't mind.

If I ask you to do this—

I'm sure she'd take it so very kind

If you'd please to give her a kiss.

She'll miss me before going to bed, And she'll feel so lonely then; It will be nice if you'll kiss her in—stead,

And I'll thank you, dear God—

Amen.

Saw the Departing Spirit.

Michelet, the French historian, in his life of Joan of Arc, makes this wonderful statement in regard to her death at the stake:"Joan was made fast under an infamous placard, mired with a mitre on which was read, 'Heretic, relapsor, apostate, idolater.' * * * Then the executioner set fire to the pile. * * * Meanwhile the flames rose. * * * The unhappy girl shrieked for holy water. * *
Soon recovering, she called on God, her angels and her saints. * * * Yes, my voices were from God, my voices have not deceived me. * * * At the last, as her head sunk on her bosom, she shrieked, 'Jesus.' Ten thousand men wept. A few of the English alone laughed, or endeavored to laugh. One of the most furious swore he would throw a flagon of water on the pile. Just as he brought it she breathed her last. He was taken ill. His comrades led him to a tavern to recruit his spirits by drink, but he was beyond recovery.
'I saw,' he exclaimed, in his frantic despair, 'I SAW A DOVE FLY OUT OF HER MOUTH WITH HER LAST SIGH.' * * * The executioner repaired in the evening to brother Isambart, full of consternation, and confessed, in self, but felt that God would never pardon him."It is a regret we cannot spare space for the full description of this awful display of Christian "hate," as Michelet relates it. The same damnable Catholic church which burned the inspired girl, in a later age placed her on the calendar with their saints. But that is a poor atonement for such a damnable wrong. Millions of others the church slaughtered to establish the Christian faith were doubtless as worthy as the Maid of Orleans.

A Result Not Foreseen.

The writings of the Fathers of the church have lost their influence in the Protestant world. The efforts made within the memory of living men to awaken an interest in those ancient authors produced a result which was not foreseen.Thus said the Duke of Somerset, in his "Christian Theology," p. 158, whose work was published by Appleton & Co., in 1872.The Duke evidently had in mind the fact that the pretended works of the "Church Fathers" were collected a few years before, and were published in English in twenty-five volumes.
The books were eagerly procured by the learned, but were found utterly worthless, many of them comparatively modern actions, and none of sufficient value to merit a place on the shelves of scholars, so they soon disappeared, and now are found with difficulty.Those books were the most highly esteemed when least known.Is not the same fact true of the so-called "Holy Scriptures?" When the priesthood each Sunday were proclaiming from their pulpits that they had a direct revelation from Almighty God touching all the events in mortal life; that the books were still in the original language in which God gave them to the world, too sacred to be translated into other tongues, or placed in the hands of other than his own anointed, then were they not in highest respect? It was then the people flocked to the church to learn of God, and of his will to man. Now it is fashionable to have a nicely bound copy in every home, to be seldom read, and no longer idolized.The stories of creation, of the peopling of the earth with inhabitants, and of sweeping all but a favored few away by a universal flood, are known to be pious fictions. They are the exag-gerations and conjectures of an age when science was unknown; when ignorance was almost universal; when the little education was centered in the priesthood, and that little was employed to enhance their own priestly importance."A Conspiracy Against the Republic."
By Charles B. Waite, A. M., author of "History of the Christian Religion to the Year 200," etc. A condensed statement of facts concerning the efforts of church leaders to get control of the government. An important work. Paper,

Legislating for God.

How strange when one stops to think, and how ridiculous the idea of puny man enacting laws to protect the Mighty Ruler of the Universe, with countless millions of worlds subordinate to his will from insult! Imagine the inhabitants of an ant-hill, with a legislative body making laws to prevent its citizens from expressing anger at man when he treads on their little castle, the production of weeks of toil and thought, crushing their young, as well the laborer and the producer! The comparison is a feeble one, the difference between man, so insignificant, and the True God so infinitely great.
Remember it is not "the Lord" who was trundled over the desolate plains of Judea by bellowing cows, nor the one belittled by a nomadic tribe of barbarians inciting wars, pretending stopping sun and moon in their course to the end the slaughter could be protracted, and nothing left alive that breathes; but the True God who rules the eternal whole, and keeps the boundless machinery of rolling worlds, ever wheeling in space.Several years ago Hon A. B. Richmond, then of Meadville, Pa., transcribed and mailed us the statute law of Pennsylvania relating to blasphemy. It was enacted by the General Assembly in 1700, while our good Christian brothers in Massachusetts were lately banishing Baptists, whipping Quakers, and were then hanging witches. It was re-enacted March, 1860. We quote:"Sec. 32. If any person shall wilfully, premeditatedly, and despitefully blaspheme, speak loosely and profanely of Almighty God, Christ Jesus, the Holy Spirit, or the Holy Scriptures of Truth, such person on conviction thereof, shall be sentenced to pay a fine not to exceed one hundred dollars, and undergo an imprisonment not exceeding three months, or either at the discretion of the court."More severe penalties for the same offense are provided in nearly all the original thirteen states. The Western states have generally limited their legislation to the protection of humanity, instead of divinity.The British statute, the parent of American legislation on the subject, contained the addition: "If he shall maintain there are more gods than one, shall deny that the Christian religion is true, or that the Holy Scriptures are not of divine authority." * *
he shall for the first offense be rendered incapable of holding any office or place of trust; for the second offense be imprisoned for three years." Originally in Scotland, the offense was punished with death.For many centuries nations were compelled on the battle-field to accept Christianity. Then came the brutal logic of the Inquisition to force individuals to accept the faith. Gaining control of legislative bodies, then came fines, imprisonment, dungeons, the stake, the fagot, and death.It is only the tyrannous priest, or the unscrupulous bigot, or the vile hypocrite who will resort to such savage methods to propagate a religion, or who will favor legislation on the subject, other than to protect all persons in the enjoyment of their religious convictions.Though still disgracing so many statute books, the law is virtually obsolete. Only one case, and that of Abner Kneeland, of Massachusetts, has been prosecuted for the offense, so far as we have knowledge, within the last one hundred years, and that in 1833. That case aroused the press and the liberal pulpit into violent denunciation of the law and those who prosecuted under it.

Dates Worth Preserving.

Great efforts are made to make it appear a large number of editions of the Bible were extant in Europe during the 14th century. In re-reading
Bunsen's Life of Martin Luther, page 9, we met with the following:
"It was not till he [Luther] had been for two years studying at Eisenach that he discovered an entire Bible, having until then only known the ecclesiastical extracts from the sacred volume."Then on page 22 of same book, published 1880 in New York, by the American Book Exchange:"On the 21st September, 1522, the translation of the New Testament appeared in two volumes, folio, which sold at about a shilling and a half. The translation of the Old Testament was commenced in the same year."A ducat varied in value from 83 cents to $2.25, making the German New Testament to range in value between $1.24 and $3.37.On the title page of the Catholic English edition of the Bible, it is stated it was "translated from the Latin Vulgate, the Old Testament, at Douay, A. D. 1609, and the New Testament at Rheims, A. D. 1582."Our King James' translation was made in 1611, two years later than the Catholic rendering.
Prior to Luther's translation in 1522, if there were any translations out of the Latin Vulgate into any tongue, or if any copies were printed, it is believed they remained in possession of the Catholic priesthood only.The dates here given may be worth preserving for future reference, as churchmen are ever pretending there were a multitude of Bibles printed before Luther's time.

Facts to Remember.

A Bible, said to have been printed in 1407, has been found in Leavenworth. "This certainly ought to be a valuable relic," says the Horton Tribune, "as the art of printing was not invented until 1458. But Leavenworth is a good town for preserving Bibles." They ought to last there several thousand years.—Kansas City Star.The first book printed from movable type did not appear until 1469, hence any Bible bearing an earlier date is a fraud. No book printed by any process bears an earlier date than 1469.
If an earlier date is found on any book it is proof positive the title page on which it appears, is a forgery, as probably is the whole book.Though it is claimed the Christian chronology began to be used in the sixteenth century, a claim which cannot be authenticated, yet it did not come into general use until near the close of the fifteenth century, hence a good reason why books did not bear earlier dates, even had the art of printing been known.Gems of Thought

Mrs. M. T. Longley, entitled "The Spirit World, Where Is It? Its Conditions and Employments," and in which her guide separates the spirit worlds of the various inhabited planets as the planets themselves are separated, but explains with great precision the spheres or spirit worlds surrounding this particular planet.These spheres, it is claimed, "are creatable, that one can create his own sphere, and come in touch with others who are in the same rate of vibration, or who are in a similar sphere or condition."In this profound lecture is something highly educative to the spirit, and must be of value after transition.
It is full of comfort and information—comfort to those who long to be again with their loved ones gone, and information as to their source of employment when they get there.

Countess Wachtmeister.

The second lecture is by Countess Wachtmeister, and gives in a straightforward way the founding of and the purposes of the Theosophical Society.
Placing before the reader three distinct objects.First—To form a nucleus of a universal brotherhood without distinction of race, caste, sex, creed or color.Second—To study comparative religion, philosophy and science.Third—To investigate the unexplained laws of nature and the powers that lie latent in man.This lecture shows the difference physically and psychically between people, especially women of America and those of Europe; teaches how to unfold the psychic powers, and gives reasons why so many mediums in Spiritualism untold psychically, but so often into unreliable mediums, and how to avoid these dangers, and the dangers of obsession. It treats of crystal-gazing; the power of frenzy, indulged in by the dervishes; ceremonial magic; of unfolding through the imagination; the deep breathing process; lastly, giving the methods, to an extent, practiced and taught by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, in the unfolding of the power to enter the astral realm at will. Along the line of Theosophy it is interesting and instructive, and will enlighten anyone as to the objects and benefits of its teachings.

Cora L. V. Richmond's

lecture on the theme, "The Twentieth Century Fulfillments," is replete with prophecies. It gives a resume of the many prophecies of science that have in regular order been fulfilled; tells how the energies, mentally and physically, are being inclined to the invention of the most destructive munitions of war, and how this will lead to universal peace among nations; how the psychical unfoldments will raise the standard of true wisdom and morality, perpetuate the peace and harmony of the future human race. Mrs. Richmond is too well known as an instrument in the hands of highly unfolded spirits, as a lecturer, improviser and author to need any laudatory comments.She also has three other lectures in this book, one upon the subject, "God is a God of the Living, Not a God of the Dead;" "Spiritualism and Christianity;" and "Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage."

C. W. Leadbeater.

"Dreams and Their Significance," is the title of the fourth lecture in the book, and was delivered by C. W.
Leadbeater, the noted English Theosophical lecturer of London, to a Chicago audience.This is a very candid, logical and explanatory analysis of the causes and effects of dream impressions or waves, how received by the physical organism, the brain, and how it may be affected by conditions, disturbances, internal and external; the etheric part of the brain; the astral brain, etc.This is one of a series of interesting lectures delivered by Mr. Leadbeater in Chicago, others of which are contained in this book. For instance, here are their themes: "Man and His Bodies;" "Reincarnation;" "The Law of Cause and Effect;" "Life After Death—Purgatory;" "Life After Death—The Heaven World;" "Telepathy and Mind Cures;" "Invisible Helpers;" "Clairvoyance—What Is
It?" All these lectures must be taken as profound, logical and scientific from the Theosophical standard of reasoning, and whether approved in their entirety by the reader or not, something of deep interest, of instructive tendency, of elevating power will be found in them.

Prof. W. M. Lockwood.

"The Relation Science Holds to Natural Philosophy—Its Conflict with Every Form of Religion," is the title Prof. W. M. Lockwood gives to his lec-ture, and he recites many instances of the progress of science, and its popularity with the entire thinking, reasoning world, including advanced theologians, and the effect this progress is having upon the previously beclouded and befogged minds of credulous humanity. This production is in his usual deliberate, concise, analytical and instructive style of expression, and must be studied to be understood.

Prof. J. S. Loveland produces a profound criticism of the famous mathematical argument, "As to the Existence of a Soul." He takes a firm stand against mental or intelligent causation, and in favor of material causation; considering the phenomena of life from the vegetable and animal kingdoms. This is indeed, one of the Professor's strongest and most analytical lectures, and will be read with deep interest by everyone.

Mrs. Helen P. Russeque offers a lecture for our book on the subject, "What Has Spiritualism Given to the World?" which was delivered before a Boston audience. The lecture beams with spiritual thought from beginning to end, and states the relative position to this and the after life, of the spiritual teachings.

Rev. Minot J. Savage's lecture is a Comparison of Ancient and Modern Ideas, from the text, "And Death Shall Be No More." Herein he compares the idea in the Old Testament, that "death ends all," which presents such a gloomy, dismal prospect of any future state, to that of the New Testament, where Paul says, "To die is gain," and to the present day growing belief that it is only "transition." The lecture is one of his most logical upon a matter that will interest every reader.

Prof. Alexander Wilder, M. D., contributes his views, gathered from a careful study of the subject, "Burying Alive a Frequent Peril," and relates many incidents that have come before him in his life experiences, and those related by other people. Some very fascinating reading and precautionary suggestions are given in this essay by Dr. Wilder. It should prove remedial of present-day methods of interment without proper investigations of the deceased form.

Dr. J. M. Peebles.

"Watchman, What of the Night?
The Morning Cometh," are the first words of Dr. J. M. Peebles, in his lecture on "Spiritualism, in Its Relation to Life," delivered in London, Eng.
He gives an illustrative word-painting of the high moral standard to be attained by and through true soul inspiration, and cites the reader to Jesus as standing upon the "summit of moral science," and cites many other Bible characters who reached almost the same height; also the changing attitudes of science or the sciences.
This is a masterly discourse, and will be read with a warm degree of appreciation.

Ella Dare

presents an essay on "Our Finer Forces," and in it deals with the action of the unseen upon and in co-relation with the seen; the laws of vibration; psychological functions, etc.
She is known to the readers of The Progressive Thinker mostly by her beautiful poems, in which the "finer forces" are involved to their limit.
Her essay is a lesson in itself upon the necessity of right thinking and right speaking and how to subdue the turbulent spirit. It is a pleasing and instructive addition to the book.

Baba Bharata.

"Wonderful Spiritual Phenomena," is an article from the New York Herald, and tells of materializing of food; spirits from heaven; praying in the clouds; the most extraordinary phenomena of modern times, etc., by Baba Bharata, a "holy man" who came to New York to make converts to his faith, which is "Love for all men."
This is a fascinating production and a welcome bit of reading will be to all.

Rev. Daniel W. Hull's lecture on "Whence Our Christmas?"

delivered before an audience at Tacoma, Wash., is an analytical criticism, on search into ancient history for the origin of the day held sacred by all Christians, and celebrated in all Christian countries. The lecture is wholly from a biblical standpoint and to the Bible student will prove of value.

M. M. Mangasarian.

This noted liberal lecturer and traveler discourses upon "The Abyssal Monster," telling the story of his travels in Europe and the Orient, and of the human ignorance noticeable; gives his thoughts on prayer, liberty, churchianity, and degeneration. The lecture is full of interesting data and convincing thought.

Prof. Elmer Gates,

in an article from the New York World, gives some theories and some demonstrated facts relative to "Moral Sense, Colors, and Their Influence Upon Human Conduct," the results of experiments in Color Psychology.
This is a strictly scientific deduction and explanation of a matter all are interested in.Price 25 cents, when accompanied with a yearly subscription. See premium list on sixth page.

What Is Meant by Psychic Development.

"A little of the Infinite is projected into the consciousness by a little attention to the large subject of the Infinite, but excite the mind with a larger and more continued attention and meditation and there will be seen and felt, heard, tasted and smelt, the open fields of the Infinite expanse, of which no one may dream who has not vitalized his perception, his imagination (that prophet of the mind) and his entire mental force with effort for this finer life of the soul."

To the Editor:—I send you the with article on "PSYCHIC DEVELOP-MENT," from the Paragon Monthly, which seems to me to be of extraordinary merit on account of its clearness of comprehension. Of course the ideas have been revamped and revamped, and yet there are thousands who do not have any comprehension of its significance.I think there is more ignorance in understanding terms and their proper application, than there is in the nature of things the terms apply to.

There is nothing so grand in language, written or spoken, as its simplicity of expression, and impression, which must appeal more to the ordinary mind if for its lasting benefit, and like the "Old Arkansaw Traveler," when applied to the bow and string, it raises again the vibrations that once actuated our hearts to fly to the rafters in the old log house in the by-gone pleasures of the long ago, and our sweatheart looked like jewel-settings in their radiance of blooming youth and beauty, the queens to be of our future estates of weal and woe, and,
oh, talk about angel visions of to-day;
heavenly scenes and music! Why, every note of that old tune and violin was melodious and in-visioned with heavenly choruses of angels. Ah, but you know! But where am I at? I see, like the little boy, got to run back after my hat.But the article—like the Old Arkansaw—is the same tune that has gladdened thousands of hearts, but a master hand, that wields the pen to more comprehensive effects.

What Is Meant by Psychic Development.

Psychic development is the awakening of the intellectual consciousness to the "fact" of the superconscious power of the intellectual creature. It is the knowledge gained through interest and effort—without which nothing is ever revealed to the human understanding of the superphysical energy which lies hidden and secluded here on the "natural plane" of existence.IS THE DEVELOPMENT WHICH PRODUCES EVIDENCE OF A MORE ADVANCED STATE OF EX-ISTENCE AND A FINER DEGREE OF INTELLIGENCE than is the present condition of man's consciousness, and it is gained through the efforts and visions of the "credulous," by which all secrets are opened and made manifest to the "practical" doubting Thomases of the "fact" world.I have said the superconscious and super physical power and energy which lie hidden and secluded on the "natural plane" of Existence. Now there is no plane of existence which is not natural, whether it is the physical, mental, moral, psychical or spiritual, for they are all expressions of the One Law and it is the Natural or Spiritual Law.ALL MANIFESTATION IS EX-PRESSED BY THE NATURAL LAW OF THE SPIRIT, THE PRIMAL EN-ERGY, WHICH IS NATURAL AND SELF-EXISTENT. It is the law of the Essence, the Energy of all Intelligence, manifested or unmanifested.It operates on all the planes of existence, the known and the unknown and the unguessed.On the physical plane of its manifestation it works according to the need and nature of the adjustable compositions of material Substance.On the mental plane it directs the intellectual action of the attributes which separate and distinguish the lower or less reasoning creature from the higher or more reasoning creature;
here it is the Intellect.On the moral plane it works in accord with the intellectual expression and cultured observances whereby
"to civilize the rude, unpolished world,"
"to make man mild and sociable to man," and "MAKE HUMAN NATURE SHINE."This is called the moral law and is developed by men from their intelligence and refinement. It is here that man begins consciously to co-operate with the Higher Intelligence and the natural Energy of the Spirit where he finds the necessity of a discipline of the undeveloped "animal" nature.Is not this the state of the world, today, and is it entirely out of the "animal state" yet?But there is a "sign," many of them, in fact, that mankind has reached a point in its development where it is met with an apparently ENTIRELY DIFFERENT EXPRES-SION OF POWER and which is expressed in what is called "phenomena," something that transcends the natural plane of action and hints of another "world" outside of this natural world plane.Is it? Let us see. We find that we do not HAVE TO LEAVE THE BODY in order to secure evidence of the "superphysical," "supernatural," su-perhuman power; so it must be right here and now that the intellectual powers must be exercised for a knowledge of this new and unexplored region of capacity and "eternal measurement."Here is a new action of the Natural, Spiritual Law. Who is it that makes this discovery, and how is it done?The Intellectual Creature does it with the mental forces with which he comes armed into this manifestation of Existence, by the mental powers which lift him from one state of consciousness to another, on through the various Substances of his Eternal development, by which he develops his understanding of the hitherto unre-vealed, by which force he makes effort for his release from one state to another, aided by his curiosity, credulity and faith. By these does the SOUL KNOCK UPON THE DOOR OF THE UNSEEN, which opens its superconscious Intellectual Energy, its Spiritual understanding of Soul-Man, the flesh-man armed with superconscious power, superhuman intelligence, super-physical strength, supernatural energy; who has the capacity to unwrap the "coiled" forces within himself and discovers new and hitherto unused power, not only within himself, but all about him.On this plane of fresh experiences we find that the "faculties" must be DIRECTED TO A FINER INSPEC-TION than has been necessary in the plane of purely intellectual gatherings of information and purely materialistic searches.The operations of the Law here are superfine and subtle and act with the finer internalized "mentation" of the faculties, which prove the presence of the Intellectual Essence and reveal another department of the ever-expanding nature: A superconscious, super-conscious plane of phenomenal energy and ability; that is, something not known before or acknowledged.Here is where we come into contact with a new order of things, and so it is named the Psychic Law, or the Law of the Soul, which operates and is operated upon, according to the nature and purpose of its Creation.There are but two Orders of Nature, One Law. Within each of these is the manifestation of the One Intelligence in which are infinite revelation, unfoldment and manifestation.Development means "to open that which is wrapped up in an envelope"; through effort, either consciously as in man or unconsciously as in the animal or the plant.The psychic development IS THE SOUL'S EFFORT FOR MANIFEST-ING ITS CONSCIOUSNESS ON THE PHYSICAL PLANE, where everything must be manifested in order to become known and of "practical" service and use to the inhabitant who is to have dominion "over the whole earth."Now, is not this Inhabitant a natural production, as well as the natural producer? Is he not armed with internal powers for this evidence of production?What are these powers which cause him to produce evidence?They are his Faculties, nine "sacred heralds" of the greatest forces in the universe for opening the secrets of nature and developing its hidden and secluded resources.The plane is then within man himself, who is an eternal inhabitant of all the natural worlds in an eternity of existence and manifestations.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.
Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is sacrificed to brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby as terse, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence in this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.
Mrs. J. Ackenhead: Q. Please give the exact location of the church in Brooklyn where Mrs. May Pepper holds her services, and her address?

A. Aurora Gracia Cathedral, Bedford avenue and Madison street. Mrs. Pepper's address is 258 Monroe street.

Peter Thurston: Q. Where can I procure the books of Minot J. Savage? Where in New York is his church located?

A. Of Geo. H. Ellis Co., Boston, Mass., or at the office of The Progressive Thinker. They also publish his sermons weekly, at $1.50 per year. Church of the Messiah, 34th street and Park avenue.

Louis S. Carroll: Q. Do Spiritualists believe Jesus was the Christ and Son of God?

A. A great and exemplary man, such as the Unitarians believe Jesus to have been is possible. A son of God, virgin-born, is unbelievable. In this age when we know that everything is controlled by unchanging law, which never fails or allows of interruption, any past event which calls for a miracle—suspension or change of law—cannot be received.

Levi Wood: Q. Was there an arctesian well located by a medium in Chicago?

A. The medium was Dr. James. He told the depth to water, and the strata that would have to be passed through. The boring confirmed the spirit communication completely.

L. M. Champion: Q. Why is it that although we most earnestly desire to hear from our spirit friends, not one of them through other phases of mediumship, have notified us that they have; could or would, appear to us by materialization?

A. It is because genuine materialization is something no spirit can promise with assurance of success. It requires conditions difficult to induce and rarely met, and for a spirit to promise such a materialization is so small a chance of fulfilling it, would be almost equivalent to falsehood. This holds with genuine mediums, and there would be more urgent reasons why they do not offer to appear before the side-showmen, with their mountebank exhibits. That the spirit friends know full well the characters with which they deal, and their silence is more significant than words. The recent exposures of nearly every "materializer," those who have been giving the most impossible manifestations under "strictly test conditions," is the best answer to the question of this correspondent.

Mattie E. Hayden: Q. Will you please explain the difference between the "mortal" and "divine mind" as so often spoken of by Mrs. Eddy?

A. It is difficult to define Mrs. Eddy's meaning, for she does not appear to know, herself, or have any clear ideas on the subjects she treats. Perhaps this is left purposely obscure. Probably we are to understand all spiritual tendencies the divine part, and ordinary common sense, the senses and perceptions relating to this life, as the "mortal mind." But as everything is a part of God, or God is the whole, it is difficult to understand how any part can be separated from him, and made antagonistic. All religions have their mysteries, are founded on mystery!

Mrs. Alice Thompson: Q. I am very anxious to possess a magic crystal, as I think it would assist my development. Where can I procure one?

A. Such crystals or spheres are advertised largely in the English Spiritual papers. I could not give the address of any seller in this country. These "crystals" are advertised as having extraordinary properties. They are "Egyptian," "magical," "occult," and anyone can become clairvoyant by their means. The whole is as misrepresenting as a patent medicine ad. They are only glass spheres, such as boys use for marbles, and cost perhaps a cent each. If this correspondent thinks one would be useful, she can secure one at any notion shop. It will be wanting in the "suggestive" quality, of mystery, "Egypt," and the "occult," but otherwise the same. The usefulness of all such objects, as a bright coin, a set in a ring, or glass of water, is in fixing and concentrating the mind. A glass of water or a brilliant set, have just as much potency for this purpose as "magic mirrors," "crystals," etc., all duly "magnetized." It must be understood that the "influence" does not come from these objects, but the state which the mind attains by its attention. The object gazed at is secondary and inconsequential.

Highly recommended as this method has been it is by no means to be cultivated. It is the process by which the Hindu gains his "wisdom," and becomes the type of passive immediacy and hopeless laziness. The way to receive the highest spiritual gifts is to strive for spiritual strength. The way to become impressive to great thoughts, is to bring the mind up for their reception.

B. F. Graves, Attorney: Q. Please give a short sketch of Judge John Cleves Symmes, noted for his hollow globe theory.

A. In the accounts given of this eccentric character, I fail to find that he at any time was a judge. There was a judge of the same name, who presided over the Northwestern Territory in 1788.

Symmes of "Symmes Hole" fame was his nephew, born in 1780, in New Jersey. He served as Captain in the war of 1812, after which he removed to Newport, Ky. It goes without saying that he had only a smattering of learning, or he would not have conceived the fanciful theories for which he became notorious. No one versed in the laws of planetary motion would give such notions more than a passing thought. He believed the earth was a hollow sphere, with several concentric hollow spheres within it, one inside the other, and that the inner surface was inhabited as well as the outer. These spheres had polar openings, through which it was possible to enter. Symmes, after this idea had seized him, devoted his life to its public advocacy. He wrote and published his arguments, and gave many lectures. He even went so far as to petition Congress to fit out an expedition to find the north polar opening. Of course, no notice was taken of the matter. A great deal of fun was made of "Symmes' hole," which to this day preserves the memory of this ill-informed enthusiast.

He died in 1829, having given so much of his time to his visionary ideas, that he was in dire poverty.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

An Eminent Lawyer and Spiritualist.

In the dispensation of natural law our dear colleague and co-worker, Mr. Ernest H. Benn, has been promoted to the higher life, and by his translation we are bereaved and our loss is great and sorely realized.

We fully recognize his sterling qualities, his strong and abiding loyalty, and his ever ready assistance in all emergencies of whatever kind. In our association we have lost a strong link in the chain of progress and spiritual development. For many years our ardent brother served faithfully upon the board of directors of our association. Nothing short of an obstacle which could not be overcome kept him from the meetings and his wisdom, sanity and discretion, coupled with his earnest logic many times prevented us from straying into error or inharmonious. His genial words, his keen interpretation of all sides of a question, will linger in our memories until the day when we shall meet him beyond the river of Time. We hold in admiration his brave deeds and valuable assistance, and strive to emulate his example in the fearless and confident advocacy of the cause of Spiritualism.

We extend to his wife and children our tender sympathy, knowing full well how great is their burden of sorrow, how great the void in their home life and how sadly they must realize that the prop and stay upon whom they leaned so confidently, has been removed beyond their earthly vision. Spiritualism has lost an ardent worker and a staunch adherent.

We, the board of directors of the First Association of Spiritualism of New York City, in offering this tribute to the memory of Mr. Benn, feel the inadequacy of words to convey our loyal appreciation of, and our sense of bereavement in his transition.

The price, bound in cloth, is 75 cents. In strong board covers, 60 cents.

Marriage in Free Society. By Edward Carpenter. Stockham Publishing Co., Chicago, Ill. Paper, 25 cents.

Prenatal Culture. Systematic Method of Moulding the Tendencies of Offspring Before Birth. By A. E. Newton. Introduction by Alice B. Stockham. M. D. Stockham Publishing Co., Chicago, Ill. Paper, 25 cents.

"Seventy-Six Years Young." We have received a little brochure, from our author, Winslow Whitthrop Tucker, of Watertown, N. Y., with the above introduction. Mr. Tucker is a retired architect, and in his leisure amuses himself by writing as he feels inspired and inspired influences. On his last birthday he treated his friends to this souvenir in verse, which reminds one of the lines of Whittier. We quote a few stanzas as a sample of its flavor.

With many a faint and weary step,
Midst mortal hopes and fears,
I've climbed the mountain steep of life,
The pyramid of years.

And through the vast, ethereal realms,
That lie the world between,
Catch glimpses of the higher life
To outward eyes unseen.

I feel a strange, mysterious thrill,
Stealing my senses o'er,
And hear the voices low and sweet,
Of loved ones gone before.

The author has no fear of death. His knowledge of the great hereafter makes his song jubilant.

For death prevailing everywhere
Through nature's ceaseless strife,
Is ever still an upward step
To higher forms of life.

May the poet reach the ripest age assigned to man.

LEGERDEMAIN.

The Part It Has Played In Injuring Honest Mediumship, and Corrupting Our Ranks.

The Articles Published under this Head are Especially Directed to Camp-meeting Officials, Hoping there Will be a Decided Change for the Better in their Management.

When a devout and influential Spiritualist thoroughly investigates the Legerdemain side of Spiritualism, as MR. J. A. WERTZ, of Anderson, Ind., has done, and gives THE RESULT of his investigations to the world, it certainly can not fail to make a deep and lasting impression for good.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER is awakening Spiritualists everywhere, and they are beginning to realize the EXACT STATUS of our cause. Only those who read it are fully posted as to what is going on in our ranks. The data we furnish is invaluable to every reflective mind. Legerdemain in Spiritualism will receive an airing that will do honest mediums a vast amount of good. They are now rallying around this paper as their organ.

Letter Number Three.

Some years ago a man who traveled extensively, giving entertainments, would not say his work was genuine or otherwise. He gave what many Spiritualists believed was the genuine phenomena. He declared that if he was not a genuine medium, there were none genuine. His slate-writing tests and his WORK IN THE CABINET WERE WONDERFUL. The committee might be blind and the knots blind his hand and feet, and within twenty seconds after he entered the cabinet, he would toss the ropes out into the audience. All the knots WOULD BE INTACT.

The inference was, of course, that the spirits had released him. This man, who has been in the field under different names, admitted that he possessed no powers of the occult order. "With me," said he "it's simply bread and butterism."

He was, in other words, a dextrous sleight-of-hand performer. This incident is related here to illustrate the fact that many persons are always ready TO ATTRIBUTE ALL MYSTERIOUS OCCURRENCES TO SPIRIT MANIFESTATIONS.

Before entering upon the subject of this article, a word in regard to the term, medium. One writer says there is no such person as a fake medium; that if persons are endowed with the gifts whereby they may discern the presence of spirits they are mediums—nothing less, and that others who claim to possess such gifts are simply impostors.

Let that be as it may, we shall continue to speak of these impostors as fakes—or, if you prefer, as impostors. There are genuine mediums and counterfeit mediums, and so there are genuine and bogus or fake mediums.

But of all fake mediums who are doing THE CAUSE MORE HARM than all the other humbugs put together, are the platform test fakes, because their work is of such a character that it is difficult to detect them in their deceptions. The platform fake works hand in hand with all the other frauds, receiving names, incidents and other data necessary to give a platform test séance. When such information has not been previously supplied, the fake medium must rely upon his or her wits, as the case may be. Under such circumstances the performance would be very much like the following:

After a few shudders, the medium begins: "I get the name John—John—don't get the other name (?) clearly." Catching the eye of a lady who at this juncture gives, unconsciously, perhaps, an affirmative nod, she continues, "Yes, it's for you." And then comes the message, and the test is entirely satisfactory.

Another trick which never fails to make the performance very impressive is when the medium turns his face around and implores the spirits to speak a little louder—"A little louder, please!" and during the while the audience is patiently waiting for the message which is being whispered in the ear of the medium.

It is not strange that these fakes should sometimes make ludicrous blunders, but they usually manage to give a satisfactory explanation. But there are times when these blunders cannot be accounted for upon any other hypothesis than fraud upon the part of the medium. Here is an instance:

The medium: "Mister, did you once own a dog that you thought a great deal of?" pointing to a gentleman in the audience. He answered in the affirmative.

"I thought so, for a see a [spirit] dog approaching you at this moment."

"Large or small dog?" asked the gentleman.

The medium paused for a moment—"A small dog, sir."

"Not my dog, then. My dog was a great big fellow!"

The dog in question was well known and when he died an item to that effect was printed in a local paper; but the medium guessed and missed the mark. She was a fake pure and simple.

When a fake medium comes before a society she always knows the family names of a number of those present. With this information it is easy to work off a number of tests. The grandfather and grandmother racket is always a winner. Some elderly person in the audience is informed that an aged lady with the hair combed down smoothly, wearing a little white cap is anxious to make her presence known. Recognized! You have all heard these stock tests. It's always a safe proposition that the grandparents of elderly people are in the spirit world! Hence, the matter of securing their first names is not at all difficult.

Another smooth plan is not to give names, but descriptions. This, as a rule, is the safest. With no knowledge of the spirit friends of those present, the medium will be able to give descriptions which are recognized in part, or altogether.

Now, understand: When we use the term medium as we have done a number of times in this article, that we do not have in mind the genuine clairvoyant whose work is genuine, and who actually sees the spirits as they are described; who hears the voices of spirits and conveys their messages to friends in the audience.

It frequently happens that these fake mediums will scan the local papers in advance of their meetings in order to secure material for messages. One instance will suffice:

A well-known test medium began her engagement on a Sunday evening. On Saturday before a local paper contained an account of a fifteen-year-old boy who had suddenly disappeared. This was a good omen. When the medium was fairly under way, she suddenly paused—she felt as if she were struggling. And judging from her facial contortions she was evidently a heavy sleeper. At length she began to describe a young man who had lost his life in attempting to cross a swollen stream. At that identical moment his body was resting upon a pile of driftwood. Didn't know whether she could get his name or not. She would try. Another spasmodic action of the muscles of her throat, and then came the name! It was "John." It was not able to get the name of the location where the sad accident occurred. She might be able to do this later on. The poor old mother of the unfortunate boy secured a private reading with the medium in the hope of obtaining further information, but to no purpose. The medium was unable to get the exact location.

AND THAT BOY RETURNED TO HIS HOME SAFE AND SOUND IN LESS THAN TWO MONTHS AFTER THIS MEDIUM CLOSED HER ENGAGEMENT!

Are you surprised that the public is losing its confidence in the claims of mediums? Now this statement is true every detail. The local papers exposed this ludicrous test upon the return of the young man, and the society that employed the medium was made to suffer thereby.

But you will say, why not give the names of these fake test mediums? Simply because a multitude would rise up and defend them. It has been our object to expose their tricks—to educate the seance-goers in the ways of these tricksters, to the end that they may withhold their patronage, and eventually make it impossible for the fakes to make a living.

It is the Spiritualists themselves who are largely to blame for this deplorable condition of our cause. They extend sympathy and patronage to mediums who have been thoroughly exposed—mediums who have even confessed to the fact that their work is of the past HAS BEEN STRICTLY FRAUDULENT.

We will always have fraud mediums as long as we patronize them, unless the enactment of STRINGENT LAWS TO PROHIBIT FAKE MEDIUMSHIP BE SECURED. AND THIS IS JUST WHAT WE NEED TO PASS IN THE STATE OF NEW YORK. UNLESS, IN THE MEANTIME THE SPIRITUALISTS THEMSELVES DESTROY THE GROWING EVIL.

The very life of the cause is in the balance. That life must be preserved. And it will be preserved if all the sincere workers in the cause will unite in this movement to drive the frauds out of our ranks.

THE FRAUDS MUST GO! THAT EDITORIAL COMMENT FROM THE SPIRIT WORLD. There will come an era of education—an era of enlightenment, and Spiritualism will be the dominant religion of the earth, when peace shall be perpetual—when the great problem of life and its purpose, will be solved.

ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION.

First Association of Spiritualists, New York City.

The fifty-eighth anniversary of Modern Spiritualism was fittingly celebrated by the First Association of Spiritualists, New York City, in two services, at Lyric Hall, on Sunday, April 1. The attendance was large, and seemed interested, while the greater number were evidently eager for spiritual food.

Mrs. Henry J. Newton, president of the association, occupied the chair, and from time to time in introducing the speakers, mediums and musicians, and in supplementing their service, spoke words forcible, pertinent and comforting; thereby impressing upon the audience the dignity and value of Spiritualism. Especially welcome were her references to the host of notables who have been promoted to that other life of which we yearn to learn, that we may intelligently anticipate our own promotion to spirit realms. Although we had a fine musical program, congregational singing was an inspiring feature of the occasion.

Mrs. Helen Temple Brigham, at the afternoon service offered an uplifting invocation, and improvised several poems upon the subjects offered by the audience. These were listened to with rapt attention, and loud applause followed the recital. Mrs. Brigham is a wonderful instrument in the hands of the guides, and is so widely known, not only in America, but in other countries, there need be no description of her veritable gifts. She is justly welcomed with heartiness whenever she appears, and wears her honors with charming deprecation, void of affectation.

Mrs. Helen L. Palmer-Russogue, of Hartford, Ct., delivered two masterly addresses. Her language, pure English, and grammatical, was logical, convincing, in fact unanswerable, although the most sweeping claims were made for Spiritualism. Arguments sustained statements, and skeptical, the hit-or-miss indifference, and Spiritualists alike were held spell-bound under the magic influence of her powerful oratory. She, also, is too well known to require introduction or comment. The strangers to Spiritualism, however, asked: "Who is this marvelous woman?" "Where does she hail from?" The request was made so generally, and so earnestly, that Mrs. Russogue was prevailed upon to serve our association again on Sunday, the 8th, inst., afternoon and evening, at The Tuxedo, our usual place of meeting.

An able and carefully prepared lecture upon "The Dawn of Man's Infancy" was delivered by Mr. Floyd B. Wilson, the popular author and lecturer. He was closely followed by his hearers, who manifested their enthusiasm by applause.

Mr. John Templeton, an editor, and of newspaper fame, favored us with an instructive and versatile address; one moment provoking merriment by some witty recital or conclusion, which would be banished by the serious proposition put forth earnestly and so lucidly by this honest, earnest advocate of Spiritualism. The ring of courage in his clear voice without doubt, brought strength to many; would that there were more of his kind.

Miss Margaret Gaule, our regular spirit messages, at both services, with earnest appeals on behalf of our Cause in its well-being. She was, as always, received with hearty applause, and commanded the complete attention of the audience while she gave in clear, concise language, tests to the friends whose arisen beloved could control conditions sufficiently to manifest. Her descriptions were gratefully, and in many instances, tearfully recognized.

Miss Gaule is known so widely as a wonderful psychic, it is unnecessary to take time and space to recount her work. It is not, perhaps, so widely known that she and her good husband, Mr. Augustus T. Riedinger, devote much of their time and energies to the Cause, opening the doors of their spacious and beautiful home so often for the good of the Cause, one sometimes wonders if their doors are ever closed. Much of the prosperity of our association and of the Ladies' Aid Auxiliary to it is due to their continuous, and disinterested effort.

Messages from spirit life were also given, afternoon and evening, by Mrs. Robert Roughsedge, of Brooklyn, New York, and were favorably received. Mrs. Roughsedge is a new worker in the field; one unique feature of her mediumship is, that her messages are given in rhyme.

She has been largely instrumental in making the Ladies' Aid of great interest, as well as helping so much in increasing its treasury.

Mme. J. Keubner, who arranged and conducted the musical program, deserves much commendation for the music so carefully rendered.

Miss Cora De Anguera favored us most pleasingly with soprano solo. She was accompanied by Mme. Keubner, piano, and Miss Jessen, violin.

Great applause testified to the appreciation of the audience.

Mr. A. Scoonier, in a rich bass voice, sang: "My God, My Father" by Marston, so acceptably all hearts were captured. We venture to predict that his name will ever prove a "drawing card."

Miss Anna H. Jessen, besides the obligate already mentioned, favored us with violin solos.

Mr. Robert Roughsedge of Brooklyn, N. Y., rendered most acceptably a tenor solo.

Near the close of the evening session the president called upon Mrs. Milton Rathbun to represent the Ladies' Aid Society. Mrs. Rathbun occupied a few moments in setting forth the claims, objects, efforts and aims of said organization.

We were proud and happy to have with us upon the platform in the afternoon Miss Victoria C. Moore, secretary of the Freeville, N. Y. Spiritualist Camp Association, who, besides being a lecturer, is a talented elocutionist. She was pressed into the service for the evening meeting and charmed the assembly with a reading most impressively rendered.

When we had in closing the exercises sung the doxology, and received the benediction of peace pronounced by Mrs. Russogue, we agreed, one with the other, in happy assertion that our meetings were a success from all viewpoints.

FUTURE LIFE

In the Light of Ancient Wisdom and Modern Science.

BY LOUIS ELBE.

This is the authorized translation of the famous book which has been crisscrossed so wide a str in scientific and religious circles throughout France, and under the title "La Vie Future." It is a plain statement of the discoveries, will be received with equal interest here, and will arouse very general discussion, as the subject is one engaging not only scientists but laymen in ever-increasing numbers.

The fundamental question of the "Immortality of the Soul" has disturbed the great thinkers of all ages, and for the solution of this eternal enigma humanity still seeks in vain. This volume offers for the first time a complete presentation of all the available evidence hitherto to be found only in the most scattered and inaccessible forms. With great care and exactness M. Elbe has arranged under the title "La Vie Future." It is a plain statement of the discoveries, theories, and ideas of the greatest investigators together with his own illuminating views and comments, and a mass of authentic information regarding the beliefs of the primitive races.

The book is divided into two parts, the first part being devoted to the ideas of the Survival as considered by the Primitive races, and the second Deductions drawn from the Fundamental sciences. With Portrait of the author. Price $1.20; postage 10c.

"BUM," OF SAN DIEGO

A Story for Lyceum Band of Mercy Day,

Some sub-human individuals achieve fame on their merit. They are strong characters; intelligent ble, trusty and lovable. They make an impression on their human acquaintances and awaken the true spirit of comradeship. They live their noble lives, and sometimes go into history, as did Bum, a remarkable dog of which I write.

He was everybody's pet and everybody's friend. No doors were closed against him. When he was hungry he went to the nearest restaurant and received his rations. He was fed with pleasure and never denied.

When he lay on the pavement resting as, after he was crippled, was frequently his way, all pedestrians turned out for him, giving him a word of salutation. No one would disturb his rest. He kept his ambition and interest in the affairs of the city.

When the fire alarm was given Burns understood the signal and followed the

This remarkable dog was an independent traveler, and never made any mistakes in his goings and comings. By some method unknown to us, wise humans, he equaled us in the precision of his achievements.

when ready to return took the trail for San Diego and knew when he reached his destination as well as any other San Diegan.

One Fourth of July Capt. Friend, warm friend of Bum, decked him with flags and gay ribbons, placed him on the front seat of his carriage and joined the long procession parading the streets. Bum entered into the spirit of the occasion and expressed himself in true dog fashion.

Some years ago Mr. Magwood, a merchant, adopted Bum into his family and business establishment, and Spiritual Meeting at Niskayuna, N. Y.

Begging the Question. To assert that Jesus was a real character, born in Palestine some 1900 years ago, while that question is in controversy, no proof offered to support the assertion, is a mere "begging the question" as logicians term it.

Nothing is gained by prescription, or even long tradition in the case, for nothing has been employed through all the ages to prevent the presentation of facts. Additional to the arbitrary exercise of power by Catholicism through a thousand years to prevent a discussion of the subject, great nations made it a penal offense to deny the existence of such a character as Jesus, or deny that he was a member of the god-head.

Some of the American States have laws against blasphemy. We are glad to write Illinois has not disgraced its statute book with evidences of such sectarian legislation.

There has been no period since the claim of such a character as Jesus was set up when there has not been persons to controvert that claim. Paul made a wonderful statement, I Corinthians 1:22-23.

"For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom; but we preach Christ crucified; unto the Jews a stumbling block, and unto the Greeks foolishness."

The Jews of Jerusalem knew no such character as Jesus had been crucified; hence it was a "stumbling block"; and it was "foolishness" to tell such a fabrication to a Greek, who knew the Roman government tolerated all religions, and punished no one for entertaining or practicing any faith, so he was not guilty of crime. Palestine was a Roman province at the time it is alleged Jesus lived and died.

The descendants of the Jews in all countries—prominent always there are any REAL Jews—have contended there was no such person crucified. Because of that denial they have been subject to persecution and butchery ever since, even down to the period we now write.

In the name of persecuted Truth we beg to know why such strenuous efforts, and such generous offers have been made to induce belief in Jesus, that belief the sine qua non by which heaven can be gained. Every other good, lacking that one, and endless woe is the doom; possessing that faith and the credulous believer is rewarded with eternal life. "Believe or be damned" is not the only text. The New Testament is full of the like.

"If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved."—Romans 10:9.

"All that believe are justified from all things."—Acts 13:39.

"Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God."—1 John 4:2.

And thus we could quote like texts to fill a column, all species of bribery, to induce belief in Jesus. Why such bountiful offers to secure recognition of the hero of Christian faith if such character was genuine?

And why did the Catholic church, with its root in paganism, through all the centuries when clothed with unlimited powers, exhaust its resources in punishing heretics, their system had its foundation in truth?

Gross Hypocrisy. The Christian Catholic Church of Zion, has just suspended its founder, Alexander Dowie, charging him with "misrepresentation, exaggeration, tyranny and injustice, also, for polygamous teaching." That church, like all other Christian churches, takes the Bible for its guide, claiming it is inerrant in its teaching.

With prophets, priests and rulers after God's own heart practicing polygamy, without one word of rebuke, it is the grossest kind of hypocrisy to object to Dowie teaching this barbarous practice. Either away with your headless book with its false inculcations, else silence when your preachers advocate the practice which seems to have been approved of by "the Lord."

"Materialization." By Mrs. E. A. Spencer and Rev. B. F. Austin. 10c.

Christian Pilgrimage to the Holy Land.

Lieut. Lynch, of the United States Navy, who, in 1848, made an exploration of the River Jordan and the Dead Sea, in his "Narrative," published in 1850, describes a Christian pilgrimage he met with at a crossing of the Jordan. See pp. 167, 168:

"Tuesday, April 13, 1848. At 3 a. m., we were aroused by the intelligence, 'The pilgrims are coming.' Rising in haste, we beheld thousands of torchlights, with a dark mass beneath, moving rapidly over the hills. Striking our tents with precipitation, we hurriedly removed them and all our effects a short distance to the left. We had scarcely finished, when they were upon us; men, women and children, mounted on camels, horses, mules and donkeys, rushed impetuously by towards the bank. They presented the appearance of fugitives from a routed army."

Our Bedouin friends here stood in good stead, sticking their tufted spears before our tents, they mounted their steeds and formed a military cordon round us. But for them we should have been run down, and most of our effects trampled upon, scattered and lost. Strange, that we should have been shielded from a Christian throng by wild children of the desert—Muslims in name, but pagans in reality. Nothing but the spears and swarthy faces of the Arabs saved us.

"At 5, just at dawn, the last pilgrim made its appearance, coming over the crest of a ridge in one tumultuous and eager throng."

In all the wild waste of a disorderly, nomadic, and nomadic, Poles, Armenians, Greeks and Syrians from all parts of Asia, from Europe, from Africa, and from far-distant America, on they came; men, women and children, of every age and hue, and in every variety of costume; talking, screaming, shouting in almost every known language under the sun. Mounted as variously as those who had preceded them, many of the women and children were suspended in baskets or confined in cages; and with their eyes strained towards the river, heedless of all intervening obstacles, they hurried eagerly forward, and dismounting in haste, and disrobing with precipitation, rushed down the bank and threw themselves into the stream."

"They seemed to be absorbed by one impulse feeling, and perfectly regardless of the observations of others. Each one plunged himself, or was dipped by another, three times below the surface, in honor of the Trinity; then filled a bottle, or some other utensil, from the river. * * * Most of them, as soon as dressed, cut branches either of the agnus castus, or the willow, and dipping them in the consecrated stream, bore them away as memorials of their visit."

Tell us, good Christian reader, the difference between this howling, screaming, reckless mob, plunging in the Jordan, and the worshippers of Brahma plunging into the Ganges! Or the Mohammedans in his pilgrimage to Mecca. Each is observing and copying after older pilgrimages of pagan religions whose rites they inherit, without knowing the beginning of the custom, or for what purpose practiced.

We rejoice in the hope no such worthless rite will be engrained on Spiritualism. The name, Hydesville, will be ever remembered as the place where an alphabet was first used as means of communication between the mortal and the immortal; but shrines and altars, and bloody sacrifices have no place with us. And the God we adore wants no lambs, or bullocks, or doves, or the first-born of human kind, or his own and only son immolated on blazing altars; neither does he desire long journeys, disease and death-breeding, made to some holy city to keep alive our faith.

Fiction Not Eternal. In a doctrinal discussion represented by ecclesiastics to have occurred in the fourth century, between Bishop Faustus, a learned theologian, according to church authority, and the well-known St. Augustine, the Bishop asserted with great warmth:

"It is certain the New Testament was not written by Christ himself, nor by his apostles, but a long time after them by some unknown persons, who, lest they should not be credited when they wrote of affairs they were little acquainted with, affixed to their works the names of apostles, or of such as were supposed to have been their companions, asserting what they had written themselves was written according to those persons to whom they are ascribed."

On the surface it would appear from this statement that the New Testament was in being in the fourth century, and that Augustine and Bishop Faustus were living in that age. When the light of the critics shall be turned on these characters it will be found they did not live until during the fourteenth century; and that the New Testament was not known until A. D. 1198.

Squirm and ridicule the idea as much as the reader may, we put these dates on record as approximating the truth, which honest investigation will fully establish. The frauds of the world have not been limited to Spiritualism; but those of the church have been concealed by inquisitorial tortures.

Another Gem From Ingersoll. Do you know, sometimes I have asked myself the question: "Is it worth while to try to lift mankind from the dens and caverns of savagery and superstition up to the heights and places of civilization? Is it any use?" And when I read the creeds, and sometimes a sermon on Monday morning, I lose confidence, and say: "Well, is it worth while?" And then, maybe, I hear a great piece of music, into which has passed the soul of some great transfigured man; or I look at a painting filled with all that is noble and tender and beautiful; or I read a little from Shakespeare, a few pages from Darwin; and I say, These men were prophets of what the world can be and attain, and if you don't wish to keep on, and if you don't wish to civilize the world, you will civilize yourself."

"Continuity of Life a Cosmic Truth." By Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood. The work of a strong, logical thinker, on a deeply important subject. Price, cloth, $1.

Labeling God.

"And when the Lord thy God shall deliver them [the Hittites, the Girgashites, the Amorites, the Perizzites, the Canaanites, the Hivites and the Jebusites] before thee; thou shalt smite them and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, NOR SHOW MERCY UNTO THEM."

In the name of high Heaven, we deny that our God ever said any such thing to Moses, directing him to show no mercy. It was the voice of the murderer "who looked this way and that way, and when he saw there was no man he slew the Egyptian, and hid him in the sand," then, when suspected, fled to Midian where he remained forty years, and only returned to Egypt when he learned the reigning Pharaoh was dead.

The Great God who governs this mighty universe, making all its vast machinery wheel with unerring precision, never coming in contact with its fellow, has not human passions. He neither loves nor hates, he deputizes no one to voice his wish. It is brutal, debased man only, who, for vile purposes, represents him as having no mercy. It fills us with astonishment that the Christian world can tolerate a book which so grossly libels the Sovereign Ruler.

But Ingersoll, during a period of almost universal ignorance, gained control of the law-making power and enacted laws making it a crime, with severe penalties, to declare the Bible is not divine.

So late as 1833 Abner Kneeland, as related last week, for publishing, "The Universalists believe in a God, which I do not," he interpreting his own words by saying they believed in the barbarous God of the Bible, which he did not, was convicted of the crime of blasphemy, by a Massachusetts jury, and was sentenced to two months' imprisonment for the offense.

The Supreme Court of Illinois, to its everlasting credit be it said, has decided "the common law relating to blasphemy is not in force in Illinois;" and as there is no statute in this state on the subject we dare write and publish the truth, and vindicate God from the charge of having told Moses to observe no mercy when overrunning Palestine with his fugitives from Egypt, leaving nothing alive that breathed except virgins.

Oh, such a terrible record, and, pretending, the Word of God.

Not a Peace Maker. Think not that I am come to send peace on earth. I came not to send peace, but a sword.—Jesus.—Matt. 10:34.

He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment, and buy one.—Jesus.—Luke 22:36.

Trace history, written with a sanguinary pen, with its wars, desolation and slaughter through all the subsequent years since these words were spoken and it would seem the mission of this miscalled "Prince of Peace" has been a grand success. Is it not time the direction to Simon Peter, after he had "smote the high priest's servant, and cut off his right ear," "PUT UP THY SWORD," be observed?

Is it not quite time the muse, addressing the Genius of Science, in adapted verse, shall sing?

"To conquest and slaughter let Christians aspire, Whelm nations in blood, and wrap cities in fire; Thy reign is the last and the noblest of Time, Most fruitful thy soil, most inviting thy crime. Let the crimes of the church be'er engraven on thy name, Be freedom, and virtue, and knowledge thy fame."

Military Rule in Churches. A boy's "marine corps" will be established in connection with the Temple Baptist church.

It is to be semi-military. The purpose is disciplinary as well as social. The idea that the Sunday-school might be benefited, as a whole, and the boys in it, as individuals, by the organization was first suggested and put into practice in this city by Rev. Baker P. Lee, Christ Episcopal church. He has organized the Christ church cadets and says there is marked improvement in the discipline of the Sunday-school, as well as the interest. He advocates the organization as a means of instilling in the youth high ideas of honor, as well as an intimate acquaintance with self-control and self-government.

The Temple Baptist church "marine corps" will be another organization along the same line.

There is a movement among some of the most enthusiastic adherents of the semi-military organization for boys, to secure the co-operation of all ministers in the city in making a regiment, each church supplying its own company or companies.

This summer the "Christ Church Cadets" will spend ten days in camp at Santa Monica canyon.—Los Angeles paper.

"Semi-military" influence to get boys into the Sunday-school is a scheme worthy of the churches, which are ever plotting how to catch the young and increase their numbers. Well do they know if they cannot catch the children membership must decrease, as the old heads disappear and pass into the grave. If the new generations cannot be kept in line and made to walk as did their predecessors, then the church must cease to exist, so any kind of an effort to catch and hold the children is considered justifiable, though semi-military.

An Old Teaching Revived in Practice. Skepticism is not wholly a creature of modern birth. Evermore, an ancient historian of Greece and Arabia, and a great traveler, wrote a history of the gods. He maintained all of them were originally mortal men, and all religion "but the effect of the knave, working upon the fool."

It would be crediting the fakir mediums with too much learning to charge them with borrowing from and practicing what Emerson claimed, and yet their doings show they acted on his idea regardless of the source from whence it came.

A STUDY IN ORTHODOXY.

As It Was Expounded by an Earnest, Ho-Sufferer Believer.

James Hervey was a deeply pious English clergyman, sincerely orthodox in his belief, and earnest in his chosen vocation. His "Meditations" were read with reverence, and held a place next to the Bible, in the esteem of religious people in former days, though now superseded by the results of advancing thought.

As a study in genuine orthodoxy—not the diluted modern sort—some excerpts from his "Meditations Among the Tombs" will be of interest, and will prove not unprofitable reading for Spiritualists, as well as modern orthodox people. There can be no doubt that very many of the latter would experience a complete revulsion of thought and feeling against orthodoxy, were such teachings preached and published to-day.

No sooner has the last pang died lodged their reluctant souls, but they are hurried into the presence of an injured and angry God; not under the conducting care of beneficent angels, but exposed to the insults of accursed spirits, who lately tempted them, who now upbraid them, and will forever torment them. Who can imagine their confusion and distress, when they stand guilty and inexorable before their incensed Creator? They are received with frowns. The God that made them has no mercy on them. The Prince of Peace rejects them with abhorrence. He consigns them over to chains of darkness and receptacles of despair, against the severer doom, and more public infamy of the great day. Then all the vials of wrath will be emptied upon these wretched creatures. The law they have violated, the Gospel they have slighted; the power they have defied, and the goodness they have abused; will all get themselves honor in their exemplary destruction. Then God, the God to whom vengeance belongeth, will draw the arrow to the very head, and set them as the mark to his inexorable displeasure.

"Resurrection" will be no privilege to them; but immortality itself their everlasting curse. Would they not bless the grave, that land where all things are forgotten? and wish to live eternally hid in its deepest gloom? But the dust refuses to conceal their persons, or to draw a veil over their practices. They also must awake; must arise; must appear at the bar, and meet the Judge of the world, who will draw the arrow to the very head, and set them as the mark to his inexorable displeasure.

Go out with me, I thought some early morn in springtime, the air is balmy, cool and pure, when old Sol rises in the East and shows his bright arched shining face; peeping over the banks of fleecy clouds, and sends the golden rays of beautiful warm light over the earth, which ushers in a new day. The earth a few moments past quietly wrapped in the arms of slumber, now trembles and awakens with activity and life.

Listen and you will hear the twitter and chirp of birds calling to their mates in musical notes of melody, "To come and join in the chorus of praise to Him the giver of all good."

Yonder you will see on some top-most branch the beautiful red-breast robin pouring his notes of liquid music, and helping to fill the atmosphere with harmony of sounds, which plainly brings to our ears the message of Love, Good Will and Peace to Man.

Let us go out, hand in hand, and wander through some shady woodland underneath the cool branches of state-bell monarachs. Come, let us sit down on this mossy log and listen to the soft sobbing voice of nature. The feathered songsters warbling over our heads in the trees, the monotone buzz and hum of the insects, the sighing of the trees and rustling of the leaves as the gentle winds caress them passing through; interblended with the bleating of sheep and the lowing of cattle from some field nearby. Do we not find the peace and restful calm over our senses, and our hearts thrill with joy and content when we come in close touch with the vibrations of nature?

Let us arise and go forth from the deep shadows of the woodland, and come out into God's bright sunlight. What a fair vision greets our eyes. Hills and valleys clothed with bright, beautiful green, and the cattle and sheep grazing quietly and peacefully together. Does it not bring to our minds a lesson of harmony and contentment, which might truly be copied by man for his benefit. As we run down one of these beautiful grassy meadows with shouts of laughter and glee, do we not truly feel our beings vibrate and thrill with life and love, and rejoice in the voice of thankfulness and praise to God that we too are a part of this beautiful picture of nature? The more we study and delve into the laws of nature and her works, the more prominent this all-pervading principle—LOVE—predominates.

Love robs so-called death of its terrors, when we as Spiritualists who dwell in the light and the light and wisdom know full well that the unseen strands of love, stretched from our earth-planes to the beautiful spheres beyond and that the messages of purity, love and truth flash back and forth from the angel bands gone on, to the faithful still on earth.

They, our angel guides, tell us in words of love and kindness to live pure lives, that we may be fit and worthy messengers to carry the tidings of joy and good cheer to the world. Do not hoard or stint the light given you in selfish greed, lest the source from which it comes to you be shut off, leaving you in darkness, but give it out freely and more light will be given you in abundance.

Let each and every one of us who have loved hands and hearts with the bright, beautiful minds beyond lose sight of self and work together in the grandest and most worthy of causes, the enlightening and uplifting of the human race.

NO REINCARNATION.

We pass but once this way; Our life of joy and pain, No ever can return this day, Upon this old earth again.

We search o'er the boundless blue, Or the changing dull gray sky, We love the good and true, While the fleeting years roll by.

We pass but once this way, Like shadows 'neath the sun, We hope for a brighter day, When our mortal race is run.

When gone is the light of day, Look toward the starlit dome, Within, a voice may say, "My child, behold thy home."

We pass but once this way; Seen in the falling tear, In th' frail flowers of May, And in yonder rolling sphere.

We pass but once this way, With th' universe, through space, And there may come a day, We shall see God, face to face.

AN ANALYSIS OF LOVE.

Its Nature and Its Influence Upon Humanity.

Love is the bright, beautiful, light which sheds its rays of purity and truth over the earth; it is the incentive or force more mighty a thousand fold than fear, to control the destiny of humanity. It is the fundamental principle upon which rests the uplifting and redemption of man. It is the all-pervading virtue which unites, guides and controls, not only humanity but life in all its various forms. It is the feeling which inspires man or woman to superhuman efforts to undertake and perform tasks so great, which otherwise they would avoid with timidity and fear. You can call it confidence, ambition or what you will, but they who are successful are the ones who have love in their hearts for the work they perform. Love to the human being is as sunshine to the birds of the air, the fishes of the sea and flowers of earth; without it they would drop and die.

Where is the mind that can fathom or solve the love a mother has for her infant babe; what will she not do to protect herself to nourish and protect this small blossom of humanity nature has given her to love and cherish. There is no duty we so willingly perform as when we are imbued with thoughts of love. It is the light and happy burden on the minds of those who love, when they are constantly seeking to bring joy to the recipient of their affection. Love in its truest sense, stripped of its garments of fiction, is the fountain of inspiration which unceasingly bubbles up in our hearts, and overflows our minds with thoughts of love and sacrifice for the benefit we can work out and carry to our fellow-beings to be a lasting and permanent good.

To us, as Spiritualists, who are so blessed and fortunate to be chosen by God and his angel world to be the torch-bearers to shed the rays of light for those who are still groping in the dark, it is a duty we should gladly perform with hearts filled with thankfulness, praise and love.

Go out with me, I thought some early morn in springtime, the air is balmy, cool and pure, when old Sol rises in the East and shows his bright arched shining face; peeping over the banks of fleecy clouds, and sends the golden rays of beautiful warm light over the earth, which ushers in a new day. Review of Passing Events.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE, EDITOR-AT-LARGE, N. S. A.

"Prof." Garrett P. Serviss on Ghosts. There is no doubt that "Prof." Serviss' theory will explain many ghostly appearances, that have been seen by those like himself, apt to make no allowance for a high sky line, or be deceived by appearances, but the little theory by no means covers all phenomena of this kind. The voluminous facts gathered by the Psychological Research Society, and endorsed by members who surely are in scientific attainments the equal of "Prof." Serviss, to him such stories are child's prattle. He has cast them into the limbo of outgrown things.

The Secular Press Yields to the Inevitable. There is hope for sensationalism journalism. It is always ready to meet the public demand, and what more sensational than the realm of spirits? It seems very odd, to see right alongside a serious, against the possibility of ghosts appearing or ever having appeared, a prize offered for ghost stories, and not only a prize, but a proviso that such stories must be true, and vouched for by the narrator! The Chicago Evening American leads in this departure, and introduces its offer with the following passage, which shows in a striking manner what remarkable progress the press has made in a few years, since a ghost story was received with derisive laughter. The editor of the American in his prospectus to this new departure says:

"But you will say that you have grown up and found out that there are no such things as ghosts, as if dreams do come true once in a while it is simply a happen-so. Now, do you know that there are some very celebrated scientists who have made the study of the supernatural a lifetime work, and who would differ from you materially?"

"The Society of Psychical Research in England has been investigating for over a quarter of a century on this very subject, and its members have come to the conclusion that the existence of psychic phenomena is no longer doubtful. They think it not beneath their dignity to make search for instances which prove that they are correct."

"Dr. Clarence W. Taber of Chicago, a well-known author and investigator along these lines, recites many stories that have come under his own notes and which could have had no explanation except a ghostly one."

"You know, they used to burn people as witches who dared to believe in such things, but now the world has become enlightened enough to know that the existence of such common occurrences is not a matter of controversy, and no ridicule as many years ago."

"It is possible that the spiritual part of us has in the extreme agony of death or fright from accident almost the power to rise above the horizon of consciousness and communicate with the normal mind of one to whom there is a bond of affinity." Or, does the "ghost" of the one in danger tell our "ghost" about it so vividly that the impression can arouse us to a knowledge of the cause?"

Will spiritual manifestations pass with the editor as "ghost stories"? It was spirits as well as ghosts the Psychical Research Society investigated. The deceased for spirits, are not ghosts. But if the term "ghost" is more palatable, it is all well to label the threshold, to lead people into the vestibule beyond which ghosts become law-abiding spirits and ghostland becomes reality.

THAT AWFUL CALAMITY!

During the past week the secular press has been full of accounts of the destructive earthquake in California. San Francisco has been almost totally destroyed, and other cities greatly injured, the loss of life reaching as high as 5,000. Assistance to the afflicted ones is flowing in from all sides. It is estimated that Chicago alone will send $1,000,000.

LEGERDEMAIN SPIRITUALISM.

Arrest of "Medium" and Wife for Alleged Theft—Omaha Police Take James F. and Mrs. O'Hara, Charged With Taking Mrs. Rebecca Irving's Jewels.

The following is from the Chicago Tribune of April 23: "A search of two months by the Chicago police was rewarded yesterday when James Francis O'Hara and his wife, Lillian, were arrested at Omaha, Neb. They are wanted in Chicago for the alleged theft of $350 and jewelry valued at $1,800 from Mrs. Rebecca Irving, 2229 Prairie avenue, on March 27."

"O'Hara and his wife are Spiritualist mediums and gained the confidence of Mrs. Irving, who told them where she kept her money and jewelry. The police say O'Hara persuaded Mrs. Irving to allow him to keep the money and jewelry while she went on a shopping trip."

"While she was away O'Hara, his wife, and their 3-year-old child left the house. No trace of them was found until on Friday. They were arrested at the conclusion of a Spiritualist meeting which they had conducted. An attempt will be made to secure their indictment to-day before detectives start to Omaha after them."

We do not think either of the above parties possess any mediumistic powers whatever. Their "spirit" manifestations are simply the result of legerdemain, which has become so prevalent in our ranks, especially at camp-meetings, and which The Progressive Thinker is trying to suppress.

That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy be clear and unambiguous. The paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will fill all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

James L. Dow writes from Manhattan, Kansas: "The following resolution was passed by the First Spiritualist Society of Manhattan, at its regular meeting to-day: 'Resolved, That we condemn the practice of vivisection, and believe that it results in no good, that it is cruel, inhuman, and barbarous. We believe that no advancement is ever made through cruelty. We believe that the practice is degrading and demoralizing to those taking any part in it, and laws should be passed making it a penitentiary offense.'"

Prof. W. M. Lockwood is having great success with his lectures and classes at Pittsburg, Pa.

Mrs. Minnie Phillips, No. 295 Washington avenue, Flat 2, Chicago, Ill., appeals to those who know the whereabouts of any woman who had married a John Pressler at any time since January, 1894. He is a tinner and plumber by trade, and is now about 55 years old. Please write her.

Mrs. George Williams, No. 89 Marshall avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, will act as agent for The Progressive Thinker.

Correspondent writes: "Again it gives me pleasure to write the Psychical Research Society of Rockford, Ill., had a rich intellectual feast on Easter Sunday, by two learned discourses, afternoon and evening, from Dr. Geo. B. Wainwright, president of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association, who also fills the chair of Materia Medica in the Chicago Hahnemann Medical College. His discourses were highly instructive, and were listened to with profound interest by a large and greatly interested audience. He traveled over fields of thought, and showed great research in biblical literature as well as to the origin of the Christian religion. His evening discourse, more particularly related to the pagan origin of Easter, and should be everywhere repeated. Mrs. Ella J. Bloom, the honored vice-president of the state association, was the message bearer on both evening sessions. Through her organization came numerous messages from the loved ones on the immortal side of life, which gave great satisfaction to the many recipients. This society has just moved into its new hall, where it has many conveniences not heretofore enjoyed. Spiritualists from all around Rockford will always find a cordial welcome on Sunday evenings with the Psychical Society, whose future seems a brilliant one."

Mrs. H. L. Bigelow writes: "On April 15, at the annual membership meeting of the First Spiritualist Union of San Jose, Cal., were elected to serve the society for the ensuing year: Mrs. H. L. Bigelow, president; Mr. Joseph Murray, vice-president; Mr. J. L. Gordon, recording secretary; Mr. C. L. Graessle, Miss Tillie Gunderson and Mrs. Carrie Phipps, trustees."

Correspondent writes: "The Progressive Spiritualist Lyceum No. 1 met at 525 Belmont avenue, Easter Sunday, with a large attendance. The regular routine was omitted for the day, and instead song service and recitations were taken up, which were rendered in good style by the little ones. After service the children formed a club as auxiliary to the lyceum, giving it the name of Daisy Club, with twenty members. The following are the names of officers elected: Helen Layman, president; Helen Thynsen, vice-president; Alma Warner, corresponding secretary; Henry Kline, financial secretary; Edna Webb, treasurer; Anna Hartley, chaplain. Every one took an active part and carried the heads. This has style befitting to the lyceum and is a new life to the lyceum and wonderful success the superintendent of wonderful success."

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "An unusually successful service was held by the Rising Sun Mission Sunday afternoon, April 15, in its hall, 378 S. Western avenue. The congregation was large and the bright colors of the many Easter gowns and hats had a pleasing effect which was felt and enjoyed. 'Easter' was the subject of Sister E. Briggs' remarks which were brief but convincing. Brother Jones is becoming a popular worker for the Mission, and he also spoke briefly on current events. The messages by Brothers Jones and Thompson were well received. Dr. O. B. Miller was our speaker in the evening, and the crowded hall was a convincing and definite evidence of his popularity. Sister Susie Dill was called upon and her guides gave messages and tests that astonished the skeptics for their accuracy. Sunday evening, April 28, Dr. J. H. Randall will be with us again and we will be treated to the most interesting of inspirational thoughts. We expect a crowded house. Come and see our temple on Oakley Blvd., between Jackson and Adams, when we hold our bazaar from the 11th of May to the 26th. Watch for date of souvenir night."

Eva L. Stewart writes: "Mrs. M. McIntyre was with us on April 8. She pleased her audience very much with her address as well as with her messages. We expect her again during the month of May. On Sunday, the 15th, of the Hyde Park Occult Society had for our speaker Dr. C. A. Burgess, and all who heard him enjoyed his talk very much. We were glad so many young people came to hear him, and all went away wiser than they came, and we hope they will pass on what he said. They gave messages which were recognized by all. Mr. Hillis being present, gave a number which were very convincing. He expects to occupy our hall once a week for his circles. Announcements will be made each Sunday at what time. We are to have a card party at the afternoon and evening of April 26 (Thursday). Hand painted china will be given for prizes. We invite all who came to them before to come again. The painting is to be done by Mrs. Cross, and you know you will get something handsome. Score cards 25 cents each."

Wm. Hassmann, president, writes: "On Easter Sunday, the North Star Spiritual Union greeted a large audience in its hall, 1546 Milwaukee avenue. The evening session was in large numbers, full of pleasure and delight. Sister Lester Krueger in addressing the audience, especially the children, advised them of their duties to their spirit friends as well as those on earth, which made a deep impression. Many spiritual messages were received and brought attention to Easter joy to those present. A large basket of colored eggs were distributed to young and old, and the expressions of best wishes and good will were heard on all sides for the members of this society."

The secretary writes: "One of the most enjoyable and entertaining meetings of the Band of Harmony was given Thursday, April 19, when in the afternoon the friends celebrated the birthday of the pastor, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, and continued in the evening with a musical and literary selection. Many incidents in her life and loving tributes were listened to from friends and members who were present, and letters read from those who were unable to be present. The tie of love that binds Mrs. Richmond and her people never was as strong as on that occasion, as was shown by them in their appreciation of the beautiful and loving ministrations given through her, with her own personal and never-ceasing devotion to the sacred office entrusted to her since the death of her husband. The tables were laden and tastefully arranged, two birthday cakes of enormous size being in evidence. The floral offerings were beautiful. Much praise is due the artists who assisted in making the evening delightful, and the committees who were in charge. With this occasion close the meetings in the hall for the season. The next Band of Harmony meeting will be held at the home of the pastor, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, 3802 Ridge avenue, Rogers Park, May 3. Take Clark Street limits car to barn; then get Evanston car to Lunt avenue; walk west three blocks. All bring lunch as usual."

Dr. Emma D. Cory, lecturer and test medium, writes from Sedro Woolley, Wash.: "My husband and I expect to pass many future evenings in profit and pleasure, reading together these 12 volumes of premium books. I see an article written by A. D. Norton from Bellingham, Wash., in regard to my work, referring to the cabinet work. While I have had some remarkable phenomena under strict test conditions, I do not pose as a cabinet medium, nor do I care to do so. While I have the genuine, there are many fakes. I have never used this power as a money-making scheme. I am not doing that kind of thing, but I am a teacher of the true philosophy of life, holding two regular services every Sunday and meeting with wonderful results. I alternate the work in Bellingham with Blaine, and have chartered two societies, the First Spiritual Church of Bellingham and the First Spiritual Church of Blaine, of which I am the regular pastor. As a platform worker and test medium I seem to be thoroughly appreciated."

Sunday, April 20, 1906, "Our Associates."

Geni of Thought:—"Keep good company and you will be one of the number."

For information concerning the Progressive Lyceum, authorized by the Paper for the National Spiritualists Association, address John W. King, Spiritualist Temple, Galveston, Texas.

ism was celebrated at the First Church of the Soul, Detroit, Mich. 8:30 o'clock in the evening. The hall was filled with the most beautiful decorations with Old Glory, cut flowers and potted plants. The hall was crowded. Mrs. Crawford, pastor, was ably assisted by our state missionaries, E. W. White and wife, Mrs. Nellie Metcalf and Mrs. Minnie Sharlow. Mrs. Crawford then christened two little children with the beautiful floral service."

R. S. Cobb writes from Gonzales, Texas: "Having enjoyed quite a treat along spiritual lines in our town in the last few days, I thought it would not be amiss to make mention of it in your grand paper, The Progressive Thinker. Mrs. Isa Wilson Kaynor of Chicago, now for a while located at Dallas, Texas, arrived on Wednesday evening and lectured Wednesday and Thursday evenings at 8:30 o'clock in the court house. Only two lectures had been delivered here before, and by Mrs. Hinsdale of Ft. Worth. Mrs. Kaynor and Mrs. Hinsdale are indeed, as stated by Ella Wheeler Wilcox, God's messengers sent to cheer and help struggling humanity. They have put the people to thinking, and I am confident it will not be long until we can organize a good Spiritualist society here. Oh! that the church members could know and realize the beautiful truths of Spiritualism, and get a foretaste of the pleasure and consolation as a result of spirit return and communication between our loved ones in their beautiful homes amid the heavens! In our home this morning before Mrs. Kaynor took the train for Ft. Worth, where she will lecture to-night, we had a private family sitting, and our hearts were made to rejoice in the many absolute proofs of continuity of life."

F. J. Cotta writes: "A new Spiritualist society has been organized at 1800 N. Ashland avenue, known as the Light Her Light, under the leadership of Mrs. Mary E. G. Howe. They are going to give a coffee lecture April 25, afternoon and evening. There will be entertainment and tests to every one attending."

T. J. McFerron writes from San Diego, Cal.: "We the Spiritualists of San Diego are making great calculations on the good time that is in store for us during the mass convention which will be held here May 4, 5 and 6 under the leadership of Mrs. Kaynor. It will be three all-day meetings, and conducted as it will be by some of our best state workers, we can realize what a treat it will be. Will C. Hodge is slowly recovering from his recent illness contracted while in Oakland some months ago."

Maurguette Mac writes: "Thursday evening, April 26, Mrs. A. Burdard will hold her regular spiritual social in her parlors, 3019 Vernon avenue. Good psychics always present to give short readings and spirit messages to those present. Prof. Leon is always present, and also, others. Refreshments served. Come and have a good time."

H. D. Morgan writes: "The annual meeting of the First Association of Spiritualists of Washington, D. C., was held April 17 and 18. The following officers elected to serve the ensuing year: President, Mr. F. A. Wood; vice-president, Mrs. M. J. Stephens; secretary, Mrs. H. D. Morgan; treasurer, Mr. W. H. Crowell; trustees, Dr. J. P. Simmonds, Henry Steinberg, F. C. Just, Mrs. L. L. Keeler and Mrs. J. H. Moore. The secretary's report shows an increase of members, and a decided growth of the auxiliary, which has proved itself one of the strongest supports of the association, which is due, we feel very largely to the perfect harmony now existing in our society. Another season we will hold our services at Gude Bros' new hall, 1214 F street N. W., and we are looking forward to still further growth and prosperity."

Helen Stuart-Richings closes a most satisfactory and pleasant two months' engagement with the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, Pa., on April 29. May 3 will receive ordination sanction from the commission appointed by the board of trustees of the N. S. A. in the First Spiritual Church of Baltimore, which she is a member; May 5 and 6, she will speak before the convention of the Connecticut State Spiritualist Association at Hartford, and after a few days' visit with friends in New Hampshire, she will leave for points in New York and Ohio. Address until May 15, 64 Dover street, Manchester, N. H."

Maggie Henry writes: "At Spiritual Mission Chapel, Old Fort, East, services were very interesting. Our rostrum was decorated with flowers and ferns. After an invocation by Prof. F. M. Stoller, and singing by the audience, we had a recitation by little Miss Leona McAvoy, entitled 'Easter Morning.' The Professor introduced the speaker, Dr. J. H. Randall. He was highly appreciated. At the close of the lecture we had a musical treat from Miss Ella Carr, a banjo solo. She was followed with a recitation by Miss Christy Souls. The large audience was delighted. We are all greatly indebted to all the talent; the ladies are public entertainers and they kindly donated their services. We hope that all will be with us again."

Mrs. M. L. O'Dell writes from Paw Paw, Mich.: "The Paw Paw Valley Spiritualist Association held its annual meeting April 1, and the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Dr. B. O'Dell; vice-president, Mrs. E. C. Towlers; secretary, Nellie Phillips Raleigh; treasurer, Helen Sherman; trustees, M. L. O'Dell, John Sherman and Emory Place. Delegates to the state convention, Dr. B. O'Dell and M. L. O'Dell. The following Sunday we held our anniversary meeting. Mrs. Marian Carpenter of Detroit, gave two very able addresses. It was the first public work she had done since returning from Cuba, where she has spent the winter, and I think the sunny Southland had a very beneficial effect, for she never did better work, both lectures and messages."

Waking Up in Missouri. No doubt many readers in Missouri wonder what the press agent of the Missouri State Spiritualist Association is doing that they see no report, and henceforth we shall endeavor to re-echo Missouri by having a report weekly.

The Missouri State Association has its new by-laws, and any person interested in the philosophy of Spiritualism can receive one free of charge by writing Brother Gates, the secretary, 4130 West Belle Place, St. Louis, Mo. All the societies chartered by the state of Missouri report excellent interest being taken in its cause. At the last meeting of the state board the matter of missionaries for Missouri was taken up and discussed, and while the matter has not been definitely settled upon, yet the state board expects to have one or more state missionaries working in the state and building up subordinate societies in towns where no regular societies are now organized. The state board of Missouri has organized a dramatic club known as the Garrick Sketch Club, the purpose of which is to give entertainments to assist in maintaining its missionaries, and also to assist subordinate societies in need of funds. Its first entertainment will be given on Monday, May 4, and we hope to report a splendid financial success, the money to be used for the advancement of the cause of Spiritualism and free thought.

Sunday, April 15, the Temple Lyceum of St. Louis, about fifty altogether, took the car and visited Sister Price's society at South Seventh street, and we calmly spent a most enjoyable day. It was certainly inspiring to see the hall filled with children eager to learn the truth in order that they may not be compelled in later years to renew their learning as our older people have had to do. Much credit is due Bro. Beauvais in connection with his work in the lyceum.

Bro. H. H. report from all the Missouri societies; they should write the Editor-at-Large, 3204 Lucas Avenue, St. Louis, Mo., in order that we may know their progress. We have been instructed by the state board to ask persons living in the state of Missouri in any locality, who think that there could be a society organized in the community, to correspond with the secretary, H. R. Gates, 4130 West Belle Place, St. Louis, Mo. Also all organized societies that would like to have the services of a missionary during the coming summer and fall will please write Brother Gates what assistance they can towards securing the needed assistants. The same will be given up immediately, before the executive board meets, and give their attention. G. A. GILBERT, Editor-at-Large.

God's Great Love. To the Editor:—On Feb 7 and 8 of this present year it pleased God to sweep out of existence, by the medium of a cyclone, 10,000 human lives in the Society and Tamouti group of islands, also inflicting $5,000,000 damage. What a peculiar way God took to show his great love for his children!

I don't have time for people supposed to be of human origin believe most subjects, to eliminate the idea that any supreme intelligence, as is claimed by Christians, is capable of such a wholesale slaughter of men, women and children? Does any sane person really believe it? Reason forbid!

Think of it, 10,000 human souls ushered into eternity at once, without hardly a moment's warning! Is it anything to be wondered at that there are those who repudiate the existence of such a God? Would any earthly parent be guilty of an act so heartless and cruel? Saying that God's ways are not our ways, and "whom he loveth he chasteneth," neither explains nor satisfies any one but a dyed-in-the-wool Christian.

Out upon such nonsense!

Sister Helen of Arlington Junction, Spiritualist. For more than thirty years she had known that death did not end all, and was never so happy as when listening to, or conversing about, this beautiful philosophy and receiving messages of love and encouragement from those loved ones gone before her to the realm of the spirit. She was a great student and constant reader of The Progressive Thinker. She was a kind and loving mother and a devoted wife, loved by all who knew her. She was at the time of her transition secretary of the Progressive Spiritualist Society of Monroe. Her funeral was largely attended, and was held at the home of the Rev. Mrs. Challen, of which she was a charter member, and its first Noble Grand. The discourse was delivered by a Spiritualist minister. A FRIEND.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

New York State Annual Convention.

The annual convention of the New York State Association of Spiritualists will be held in the city of Buffalo, June 1, 2 and 3.

The convention will meet at Spiritualist Temple, corner of Jersey and Prospects streets. There will be sessions daily; the day sessions of Friday and Saturday to be devoted to business and the election of officers, while all the evening sessions and the day sessions of Sunday are for lectures, meditation, etc.

The growing interest in Spiritualism and in the important truths for which it stands demands of each individual Spiritualist greater devotion and larger sacrifices for the cause. Changed conditions demand departures from old beaten paths in the presentation of these important truths.

More people are seeking this light than ever before. The need for the inspiration which higher angelic forces are ever ready to give was never greater than at the present time; hence the need of united energetic action.

The convention of 1906 will be called upon to deal with important questions which the changing conditions are forcing upon us, and representative workers and Spiritualists from all over the state will be present.

We urge upon all societies the early selection of delegates, and that the proper reports and credentials be filed as early as possible with Herbert L. Whitney, Secretary, No. 35 Irving Place, Brooklyn, N. Y.

A full programme will be published later.

Anniversary at San Jose, Cal.

On April 8, Anniversary exercises were celebrated in an all-day meeting. The hall was beautiful with yellow bunting festooned and kept in place by paper sunflowers, beautiful lilies and other flowers in abundance everywhere in the hall—the work of the floral committee. Sister Gage, chairman of the dining-room committee, was on hand, and soon with her willing assistants had the banquet prepared, in readiness for the society and friends. Meanwhile the lyceum, Miss Merle Munst leader, had a very interesting session.

At 11 a. m., the conference meeting was held, Brother Joseph Murray presiding. The subject continued from the previous Sunday, "The Power of Thought," was announced, and a large number of those present gave short talks.

At 1 o'clock all present joined in the grand march to the strains of sweet music, and were halted before the dining-table. At the given word all were seated and served by the attendants with the delicacies spread before them. The tables, four in number, were decorated with California poppies, and four large cakes were beautifully frosted in sunflower design—the work of Sister Gage. About seventy partook of the dinner and then adjourned to the assembly hall to greet friends at 2:30.

The president, Mrs. Bigelow, called the meeting to order, and the following program was carried out: Invocation, Mrs. M. E. G. Howe. Poem, "Glad Tidings," by Mrs. Bigelow.

Song, "Now Speed Away," by Mrs. Hamby, Mrs. Phipps and Mr. Howe.

Our resident speaker, Mrs. N. P. Fox, gave an address of welcome.

Song—trio—Mrs. Book, Mr. Howe and Miss Linda Link.

Address by President of the State Association, Arthur S. Howe, "Spiritualism of the Past."

Sister M. E. G. Howe read from a number of flowers being on the person in the hands of those present in the audience.

At 7:30 the meeting was opened by congregational singing. Invocation, Sister Fox. Song, Mrs. Book, Mr. Howe, Miss Linda Link. Poem, "Miss Merle Munst. Address by Arthur S. Howe, "The Present and Future of Spiritualism." Instrumental music, Miss Linda Link. Mrs. M. E. G. Howe of San Francisco then gave some excellent readings from flowers which were all recognized and pronounced correct.

Quite a number of books were sold—and thanks for donation tendered to owners of books.

Thus ended the exercises of the 53th anniversary of Modern Spiritualism—a day enjoyed by all present and leaving pleasant memories of the occasion for all future time.

WARNED IN DREAMS.

A Lady Relates a Number of Her Experiences.

Many times I have been warned in dreams. In 1892 we had moved to a new town in Humboldt county, Iowa. A short time before Christmas I got a letter from a dear friend who lived at Sanborn, asking me to visit her for a while. As I had a widowed daughter living with me, I could leave home, so I got to her place on Thursday, and as Sunday was Christmas she expected her children home for a week. As we had not met for a long time, we had a fine visit Friday and Saturday evening. We went to bed after 11. As her husband worked in the shops he got up early about two o'clock I woke and it seemed as if a voice had said, "Get up and go home."

I thought, "It's some cake I ate," and went to sleep.

After a while I was aroused again with the same voice, "Go home, you are wanted." That time I did not go to sleep so soon, and near 5 o'clock I was again called, "Get up and go home; you are wanted." Soon after I heard my friend get up, so I got up and got my things together and went downstairs. My friend said, "What is the matter?"

I told her I must go home on the morning train. She said, "Write and tell me what has happened as soon as you can; I am sick of my presentiments."

Well, I did not get home until 5 o'clock Saturday. My people were surprised to see me, and asked what brought me home. I told them I did not know; I was told to come home, so came.

I was suffering with a bad headache and could not sleep. It got close to 2 o'clock, and I heard a noise in the next house. We were living over a store. The new town was one string of stores on one side of the street. As I heard the noise I looked out and saw fire coming over the top of the next building. I got my people up and dressed in 5 o'clock time. We were none too quick to save a few of our goods and get out alive.

The fire took every store on the street, 2, I think.

Who called me, at the time I could not tell; now I know. It was my dear father, who died many years before.

I was not a believer then, but often before and since have I heard the voice.

Now can anyone tell me why I was not made to see and be convinced long before I was, for it is only four years since we understood the true belief.

I have one son. It matters not how far he is from me, I always know when he meets with an accident, and have often seen it happen. I am told it's a spirit wave sent from him to me, and my spirit father impressed it on my mind so strong that I got a chance to see it. I am so new in the belief I sometimes wonder if the beautiful things told me would correspond with what others know.

A brother came to me one night some years ago, and called me by name, saying, "I am almost gone—good-bye." He lived in California, and I right here in Dakota. I called my husband and said, "William is dead." In a few days I got a letter; he died the night I told him.

Who can tell me how the spirit with me twenty-four hours before the fire and so far from my home, knew of its going to happen? It is something I would like to have explained—how they know?

Three years ago my husband's brother-in-law died. Two weeks before it happened I told my husband, "Silas is going to die; you will hear Thanksgiving." He died at 2 o'clock Thanksgiving day—sick only three days.

A year ago I said, "Alden's wife is dead." My husband won't believe what I tell him, so for fun, he wrote to a niece. She answered, "Yes, she is dead and buried." I said, "Is it the spirit with me that knows of those things? I am not advanced enough to know by what way the messages come. The dear father's spirit with me says he never leaves me, as I am in poor health. He often tells me how much we could learn if we had spiritual meetings to go to. We both take pleasure in The Progressive Thinker. From one who is trying to be

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of
HUDSON TUTTLE.
Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space available, and hence there is a considerable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request is made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.
HUDSON TUTTLE.

J. A. Brown: Q. I desire an explanation of an incident in my life. I was in an insurance office and traveling from town to town. While in a small city in Northern Colorado, I went into a billiard room to play a game, to while away time. I was called to the back entrance of the hall, and believing steps led from the door to the ground, stepped forward. It being night, I did not see that the steps had been removed. As a result, I fell and broke my arm. The next morning, about the same time, in a neighboring city, there happened to be a medium giving public tests. She gave a thorough description of me, my occupation, but erred in saying I had been killed out right, and gave a message which she said I wanted delivered to a young lady who was present. I am certain of the principles common to all psychical manifestations. So much is known that when difficulties in the solution of problems that arise, are met with, we may rest assured that these principles are not invalidated, but some one recognized condition or influence is involved.

It has been clearly shown by many recorded facts, that thoughts which go out at the moment of death, or at an accident, are more intense than at other times and hence more efficient in impressing those sensitive to them. It is made apparent by facts that such impressions are not necessarily made at the identical moment. An intermediate interval, longer or shorter, may intervene between the moment the thoughts are sent out, and their reception. Furthermore, it may be premised that it is not essential that the thoughts be directed to the person who receives them. Such thoughts start from a center and go out in all directions, and are received before they become effaced in the ether, has not been determined. The space furnished by distances afforded on this earth's surface, do not perceptibly affect the transmission. It is not the thinker who traverses the distance, but the thought wave. To say that it is otherwise, would be like asserting that the light waves went across the sea to the eye of the sailor watching the beacon light. The waves of light go out over the wide expanse, and wherever there is a receiving eye, (as a receiving instrument) it gives its message. There may be only one ship on the wide horizon, with one lookout to catch the rays; there may be scores, all receiving the same intelligence. The eye is a perfect receiver of light, but it is rare to find an organization receptive to the thoughts of another, and hence the rarity of the occurrence. It is the beautiful method by which spirits who are harmonious, transmit their thoughts, and converse across wide spaces as though face to face. Yet even with them, receptivity, the ability to thus converse, depends on the harmony of those receiving and transmitting.

One principle more is involved, that of reception of thoughts by the sensitive from persons in this life. W. T. Stead in his experience as automatic writer, affirmed that he has received many messages from mortals, and was unable to distinguish the influence from that of spirits.

This correspondent does not particularize as to his sensations at the time of the accident. It is presumable the thought passed through his mind, that he would or had received mortal injuries, and some message he would have delivered. If so, the thought waves would go forth, unrecognized in all the immensity of the circle of their reach, except where they broke on a sensitive receptive instrument.

The conditions furnished by an audience are not conducive to the best receptivity, yet a medium, prepared for giving tests, might be an ideal recipient of thought waves, coming from every or any source, attuned in harmony.

Arthur F. Blackburn: Q. Is Socialism by Spiritualism? A. Socialism is an indefinite term and it would not be safe to say yes or no to the question until we know exactly what is meant by socialism. Spiritualism supports the doctrine of evolution in social and political life, against revolution; and this is the same as saying that there is no institution that is equally self-evident, and cannot be evolved into something better. Spiritualism stands for justice, and there can be no disputing the justice of the proposition that the wealth of nature belongs to the people and not the individual. This is so self-evident of the air and water, no one disputes. Were it not for educational prejudice, it would be equally self-evident of the land and mineral deposits. The land belongs to those who use it; or as in the conflict of races the rule is, to those who make the best use of it. The law that permits any one to hold more than he can use would legalize his holding every acre of the world's surface, and alienating mankind. That a few men are by law allowed to grasp all the coal, iron and oil, deposited by generous nature, and all mankind compelled to pay whatever price the owners please thereon, is an injustice and wrong few will care to advocate.

The railroads, telegraph and telephone have become so vast in their influence, so intertwined into national life, that they escape from individual responsibility and controlled by conscienceless trusts are a menace to the government and liberty.

Individual enterprises might be conducted on lines for the greatest good, and all these vast enterprises be as helpful to the general public as though owned and operated by the state. But men called to these great undertakings, get to the profit by their assertive selfishness. They are not conducting business by the golden rule, and hence a few men control the treasures which belong to the whole people. For if the subject is considered for a moment it will be seen that originally the government, that is the whole people, owned all the land, the water courses, the mineral riches, and all these have been taken from its possession without fair equivalent, and in most instances by downright robbery.

There is another axiom which cannot be gainsaid: Labor has a right to the products it creates. The machine or invention that assists has a right to a just portion, not the whole or the lion's share. It is because these principles of economic and social justice have been ruthlessly trampled under foot, that we are instead of growing toward the right, peacefully, trembling on the verge of a revolution. For this, capital and labor, which should be one in interests, and mutually helpful as dependent, are grappling in a combat mutually destructive. Individual control of the great utilities, and natural wealth, has become an oppressive tyranny, such as no nation in the world ever before submitted to. No robber baron in the Middle Ages ever imposed such exactions as these captains of industry do to-day, and by this means gain the fabulous wealth by which they ally their families with the descendants of the most atrocious of these robber barons.

The nation is nearing the parting of the ways. The "captains of industry" have betrayed the great trust reposed in them, and the people can be no longer fooled by the sops thrown as crumbs to hungry dogs, of church charities, libraries and college endowments. What they demand is not charity but justice. Right or wrong they feel that this robbery, this hopelessness for their children, should be—must be—prevented. It may come peacefully now, or it may be deferred, until the breaking of the barriers will call for fierce explosions, and unleash the terrific passions which ride the whirlwind.

What kind of a socialism shall we have? That will depend on how these great social questions are met. Changes demanded may be so quiet that there will be no intimation that transformations in ideas and business methods have taken place; or there may be constant conflict. In the midst of this conflict, when old ideas are disappearing and new and startling theories pushed to the front; when with the valuable are the most crass and impractical, it stands everyone in hand to become informed, not only on one side, but all sides of these economic and political questions. I know of no book more instructive on the plain, common-sense, scientific side than that of Hon. R. A. Dugue, of Alameda, Cal.: "The Public Ownership of Public Utilities." In a pamphlet of 30 pages, he has presented that side with a fairness and clearness, which is characteristic. Previously he has written a story, "Henry Ashton," in which he carries into effect, practical life his theory of government. It is an interesting story, and his Utopia is surpassed by the perfect care of the perfect social government. And yet the reader is not wholly satisfied with the harmony, and thoroughly ordered arrangement. The fundamental idea of government is to recognize the activity of the individual, and allow of the most perfect freedom commensurate with the rights and freedom of all. A social state in which the government has complete supervision seems to encroach on the independence of its individual members. The battle ground of the past has been on this field for determination of where the right of government, and of the individual, terminated. The "golden mean" in the language of the Chinese statesmen and seers, Confucius, is to be sought, is the one practical method and leads forward.

A ROCKY ROAD TO HEAVEN.

John stood with silent bowed head, at the gate of Paradise. Was he weighed down with gold and sin, and fear shown in his eyes.

St. Peter said, "I'll state your case, you ask that you be sainted; The Lord loveth a cheerful giver, if his money isn't tainted."

Then Peter went before the throne, John looked through the key-hole. He wished to know what he would have, by paying so much toll. Saw an illuminated sign, with these words on it painted:

"The Lord loveth a cheerful giver, if his money isn't tainted."

St. Peter soon returned to John: "I have a new law to tell you. You have to first refine your gold, by melting it in hell. The gold up here has no alloy," at this John D. he faints. "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver, if his money isn't tainted."

LEGERDEMAIN.

The Part It Has Played In Injuring Honest Mediumship, and Corrupting Our Ranks.

The Articles Published under this Head are Especially Directed to Camp-meeting Officials, Hoping there Will Be a Decided Change for the Better in their Management.

Spiritualists are everywhere awakening! The various camp-meeting officials are calmly considering the necessity of banishing from their grounds those materializing mediums who have ever used artificial torgery, in carrying on their work of deception. Poor Mr. Maybee, now in the Work House at Detroit, Mich., in consequence of his deceptive practices, is a fair specimen of that class who are working along the same lines he did. It is a sad commentary on materializing mediums to know that when the spirit is grabbed it PROVES TO BE THE MEDIUM OR A CONFEDERATE EVERY TIME, dressed in artificial torgery and posing as a spirit, like Mr. Maybee.

Spiritualists, especially camp-meeting officials, should consider this matter well. Take for example Mr. and Mrs. Amunson of 1125 Sixth street, Minneapolis, Minn., materializing mediums. They were exposed recently at a private seance, and the mask was lifted Letter Number Four.

In our preceding articles it was our purpose to show how EASY IT MIGHT BE TO DECEIVE—how any faker might produce fraudulent manifestations. It is the easiest thing in the world to deceive a credulous person.

The desire for immortality is inherent in all to live in another world after death—to have unlimited time in which to realize that degree of knowledge for which the soul longs, and which seems impossible of attainment in this brief span of our earthly existence, gives the person possessed of the powers to demonstrate the fact that there actually is another world; that our highest aspirations are possible of attainment, an extraordinary position in this physical world.

With this intense desire to penetrate the mysteries of the spirit world, it is not strange, in this age of commercialism, that a MULTITUDE OF PERSONS should come forth claiming to possess the ability to supply the desired information. There is, and moreover, there has always been somebody to supply the demand; and in so doing, the transaction may be legitimate or otherwise.

For instance, rain is needed, and the rainmaker appears. Justice has always been in demand, and the judge came as a natural consequence. Wealth is desired, and a thoroughgoing, someone is ready to assist in obtaining it, for a consideration. The "Get-rich-Scheme" comes in response to this desire for wealth. He is the legitimate product of this law of supply and demand. Long life and health are desired, and the quack doctors flourish. The young lady desires to know her future in the matrimonial line, and the fortune teller gets her dollar. The unscrupulous man who seeks to get something for nothing will readily find some one to assist him, and in most instances, he gets nothing for something. The man to supply his demands always APPEARS ON SCHEDULE TIME.

And so it is with these unscrupulous persons who take advantage of this universal DEMAND FOR SPIRITUAL KNOWLEDGE. THEY SIMULATE THE GENUINE MANIFESTATIONS IN SUCH A CLEVER MANNER THAT IN MOST INSTANCES THEIR VICTIMS ARE THOROUGHLY DECEIVED.

The great problem before us to-day is, how are we to distinguish the fraud from the genuine? What are we going to do about it? What are we going to do about it? AND OUR VARIOUS STATE ASSOCIATIONS, what do they propose to do?

These are questions that should not be passed over lightly. If we are to maintain the integrity of our cause; if we are to have National and State Organizations worthy of the confidence of the world—yes, if our local societies are to be respected, then we must find a way to PURGE OUR CAUSE OF THIS CURSE—THIS FRAUDULENT MEDIUMSHIP.

And what are we to do with these fakes when we have discovered them? Suppress them? Who ever heard of a fake medium retiring from business after being exposed? They move on to the next town, and do more business than ever. The clairvoyant mediums who are KNOWN TO BE MEN OF HONOR, weighs nothing against the bare statement of the exposed medium that he is the genuine article. And there is no remedy so long as our State and National officials are unwilling to devise some plan to make it impossible for fakes to continue in the business. TO SAY THE TRUTH, NOTHING CAN BE DONE TO PURIFY OUR CAUSE IS NONSENSE. To admit that our associates are powerless to rid themselves of this blighting curse would be to charge those in power with being imbeciles. And we know they are not.

It is not especially important to catch a fake in the act to know that he is a fake. The exposure of a little common sense will often determine the character of the seance given. When it has been asserted by such authorities as ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS that there must be HARMONY IN THE CIRCLE; that vibration is the basic principle in the production of phenomena; that the circle must be composed of persons whose minds are in harmony in order to secure good results—then how is it possible for a medium to give two or three seances in one day, as is frequently done at camp-meetings, to audiences composed of all sorts of people? Here may be found a company of fifteen or twenty persons, of various ages, of various minds, and the evil-minded—the ill-tempered side by side with the pure and noble. The grossly ignorant and the intellectual are all here assembled. The medium together with members composing the circle is the instrument through which the people of the spirit world are to give their messages. Each individual may be compared to the keys of a musical instrument. NOW DOES IT SEEM REASONABLE THAT THE SPIRITS WOULD BE ABLE TO PLAY UPON SUCH AN INso effectually that both confessed that they had been DECEIVING THE PUBLIC FOR YEARS. They never gave a genuine materialization, yet glibly Spiritualists flocked to their seances. Their exposure is hideously startling, and will prove a nightmare to the Spiritualists of Minnesota.

Oh! Angels of Light, how long, how long is our cause TO BE BLIGHTED BY MONSTERS OF INIQUITY!

When will the eyes of camp-meeting officials be opened to the legerdemain, the practices of the hideous vampires in our ranks! A full and graphic account of the Minnesota exposure will appear soon.

The necessity for the existence of The Progressive Thinker is becoming more apparent every day, and Spiritualists generally are beginning to realize this fact. Send in your subscriptions now, and thus keep up the PROCESSION. Stirring events will continue to follow, and without this paper you cannot keep informed in reference to the status of our cause.

HARMONIOUS INSTRUMENT AS JUST DESCRIBED? It is simply impossible to manifest their presence under such conditions. Any one ought to know that this statement is true.

Study the laws of mediumship. What a great many need is more knowledge and less phenomena. Ignorance of these laws makes them the easy prey of the unscrupulous trickster.

I feel sure that some good brother will maintain that I have given more space to this subject than necessary; that, in relatively speaking, there is no great amount of fraud practiced in the ranks of our present-day mediums.

The writer has had exceptional advantages to study the subject; and besides has received direct statements from mediums who are in the field to-day, THAT THEIR OWN WORK AS WELL AS OTHERS, WHO, LIKE THEMSELVES, ARE REGARDED AS "GENUINE," IS STRICTLY FRAUDULENT. "How these statements were secured is another story. Let it suffice for the present to say that there are a good many of them, and that their NUMBER IS INCREASING DAY BY DAY." And the worst in the lot is the genuine medium who will give a genuine seance and then give a fake seance when "the conditions are such that the genuine is not possible."

And right here is another problem which we have not yet considered. That this is true need not be questioned by anyone who will observe closely. What is to be done with this kind of a medium? Who can answer? The common sense will tell us, when properly used. To illustrate this point: A rumor got into circulation in a prominent camp-meeting that a well-known lady who had engaged a cottage, and was expected to arrive in a few days, had fallen from a window of a hotel in Chicago, and was killed. THE SPIRIT OF THIS LADY APPEARED IN THE EVENING IN ONE MATERIALIZING SEANCE, AND TWO OR THREE TRUMPET SEANCES. She was glad to meet her friends—very glad indeed! The accident was something terrible. Her life was taken away in a twinkling, but she was pleased to know that she was as much alive as ever. And indeed she was, for on the following day she came into camp carrying her grip, and was greatly surprised to learn that she had been killed in an accident! It was all a mistake. Some one else bearing her name had met with an accident, and while it was not fatal, gave rise to the rumor.

But what about the mediums in whose seances the spirit of this lady appeared? What would be a common-sense view of this matter? Had this lady lost her life, the appearance of her spirit would have been regarded with no suspicion. But under the circumstances, the audience should have been warned, and well, right here you are left to figure out your own conclusions. The application of common sense to this problem cannot fail to secure the correct answer.

Now, that you have the correct answer, here is another: She was a test medium and was giving answers to questions from persons composing her audience. Taking up a slip of paper upon which appeared a question, she said: "The voice tells me that if you go down into the Trenton rock forty-seven feet deeper, you will find oil in paying quantities."

The next answer was as follows: "The voice says you should put down the drill in the north-east corner of your farm, and that if you do this, you will find oil in great quantities. He says you will get a gusher, whatever that is."

And this medium proceeded with her readings, until she had located about thirty paying oil wells. Strictly speaking it was an act of pure fraud. It seemed that the greater part of the audience were engaged in the oil business.

Now let us take a look into this oil business. Thirty men hailing from the oil fields had placed their questions in the hands of this particular medium. They were being strictly for business. Evidently they knew nothing of the phenomena and philosophy of Spiritualism, and cared nothing about either. What they wanted was oil, and that, too, in paying quantities, and they had been told that this medium could give correct answers to their questions.

And just suppose for a moment—that "voice" that supplies the answers to the medium was required to perform a service which, when we come to think of it was something prodigious. He had to flee to those distant oil fields, visit the properties upon which these thirty questioners owned lands or land upon which oil leases were held. The owner of this paper had to look through solid time—some to a depth of nine hundred feet or more, and from general indications decide, as to the quantity of oil contained in the Trenton rock in which oil is found in that particular section. And remember, he had to perform this Herculean job all inside of a few minutes.

And just think of what a memory that Voice had, that he could visit these lands, situated miles away; that he could remember each oil prospect, and could remember distinctly the exact number of feet to be drilled into the "Trenton" in order to get the best results! Why the whole performance was simply astounding. The gods of ancient Greece might have wrought greater wonders, but we do not recall them.

What are your conclusions? I leave this with you to think about—to figure it out from a rational standpoint. All authorities on Spiritualism agree that a spirit is not very different from what it was when it dwelt in its tabernacle of clay; that the spirit becomes a sage when it leaves the body is a myth from the theologues of the past. A spirit endowed with the marvelous power that would enable it to locate thirty oil wells inside of thirty minutes and render a correct verdict in each case, would be placed with Rockefeller at a fabulous sum. But who believes that any spirit could accomplish such a work? The wonder is that sensible men would believe such work to be among the possibilities.

We would ask our readers that, when they attend seances to be on the alert. Simply be guided in your investigations by reason, the same as you would be if investigating a business proposition.

And another thing: Abolish medium worship. It may seem strange, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that many persons regard mediums with feelings akin to those accorded to some persons, these mediums are as gods.

The honest, genuine mediums, may THEY BECOME MORE NUMEROUS. THEY ARE NEEDED. Let them be supported. They are to be the saviors of the world—to eventually open the gates between the two worlds, that all may know the grand truth of immortality and enjoy to the fullest measure communion with their departed friends.

Bless the honest medium—give him your kindest thoughts along with your financial support. FOR VERILY, AN HONEST MEDIUM IS THE NO-BEST WORK OF GOD.

AN ONLOOKER'S VIEW.

Thoughts From the Land of the Cactus.

What a veritable olla podrida is your paper every week, with its messages from its hosts of correspondents and writers. The mind that cannot find food fitted for its condition must be diseased beyond cure.

First comes the forceful editorials on the vital subjects of the past, the present and the future, and then the logical answers to numerous questions by that veteran, Hudson Tuttle. In the same category I find the Sage of San Leandro, Cal., and the venerable Dr. Peabody, the "globe trotter," besides a great number of others whom I knew through The Progressive Thinker years ago, or as I might say, in a former incarnation when I was a regular subscriber.

I read what they all have to say, and find many things that are old truths to me, who have been in the Spiritualist fold for over half a century, but often clothed in a new formula of words. Among such is that luminous article of J. Clegg Wright, in the issue of February 24.

The scientific investigator backed up through the phenomena occurring in the presence of honest mediums, has been and always will be the main foundation upon which to base a philosophy. I have never known a cornerston to Spiritualism through its philosophy. All have come, and must continue to come through the phenomena occurring in the presence of, or through, reliable mediums.

Of this class of scientific investigators was Prof. Robert Hare in the very early days of the phenomena. It is a dead pity his most instructive work could not be in the hands of all investigators. It would show them the tortuous pathway of an honest man seeking the truth.

Then there was that noble jurist, Judge Edmonds, and the accomplished and polished scholar, Prof. S. B. Brittan, as bright a mind as illumined our horizon to-day. Long since they solved the riddle of the ages, "to be or not to be."

The seeker for truth in this field should not be discouraged at small events. I remember once I visited that most celebrated man, Dr. J. V. Mansfield, the so-called spirit postmaster, from his abode. I answered sealed letters. I went away disgusted and had I been a cavalier I would have pronounced him a humbug, a fraud. Later I sent two sealed letters to him in New York, the last one sealed with wax by Wells Fargo & Co.'s agent in San Luis Obispo, Cal., and got the most absolute proof of his powers as a medium for answering sealed letters. Wells Fargo & Co.'s agent certified on the back of the letter he sealed that it had never been opened, and yet with no address upon its back it was answered as perfectly as any earthly correspondent could have done if he had had the enclosure before him, and yet the name of the one to whom it was addressed was signed to the answer. The answer was characteristic of the spirit addressed when in the form and that was no less a person than Col. James Flisk, Jr.

In my investigations I have recognized the limitations of Col. the highest and most perfect spirits have learned that there are "bottlers in" on the other side the same as here.

I say, continue to give the world the phenomena from the tin rap up through the scale, omitting none, but supplementing the old with new and higher forms as rapidly as media are able with the necessary chemical and physical elements for their production. It is the same to-day as fifty years ago. There is a certain class of talkers and writers who decry and belittle the phenomena and phenomena hunters, as they call regular attendants at seances, forgetting that had it not been for the same ever recurring manifestations they would not have been exponents of any sort of a spiritual philosophy.

LIFE and REMINISCENCES

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

By Edward C. Smith.

"The Record of a generous life runs like a vine around the memory of our dead, and every sweet unselfish act is now a perfumed flower."

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL was a great and brilliant man, he was the greatest genius of his age. His place is beside Shakespeare, Voltaire, Goethe and Shelley. He was a great Lawyer, Politician, Reformer, Orator, Critic and Philosopher. His wonderful gift of language touched with the spirit and charm of poetry aided by his powerful gift of wit and humor, made him the most formidable foe the church has ever had.

He was great because he was honest. He shook the world with his eloquence and reasoning. His arguments were never answered. As a Lawyer his arguments were always so convincing that he won his case.

He knew many things by learning and more by intuition.

He was an intellectual Giant, and it is very probable that the wonderful combinations he possessed, the world will never see again.

The author who was a close friend and great admirer of Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, was assisted by near relatives who collected a great amount of valuable data, and in no other way could this information be obtained. The writing of the "Life and Reminiscences" was purely a labor of love; and it is useless to say has been written in the fairest and kindest spirit, every detail having been carefully recorded. Much of this data was collected and revised before the Colonel's death, and great care was taken in only recording after careful research.

This valuable edition has been aptly illustrated with many beautiful half-tone illustrations of the Colonel in different periods of his life. Also portraits of his sisters and brothers, family, father and mother, together with a genealogical chart, also many valuable reminiscences. The work is well written, handsomely bound, and beautifully printed. All admirers of the Colonel will welcome its publication.

"HOW SHALL I BECOME A MEDIUM?"

It is fully answered in "Mediumship, and Its Laws, Its Conditions and Cultivation," by Hudson Tuttle. Price 35 cents. Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio

MR. LYMAN'S PLEA FOR BIRDS.

Why should we longer cling to that relic of savagism? How many are wont to look upon shooting down any bird or animal of any wild species, as being not only sport, but right as well as privileged, and so follow on in the chase with eager purpose, we might say with savage cruelty, to slay, and all for sport.

A late English writer has well said: "The birds are the poets of the air, and singers of the sky."

"In the earliest, even in prehistoric ages when language was a hierarchy on stone and other imperishable substances, there was mention of birds. Later they figured in the myths, legends and ballads, the delight of every nation, coming down to us from the childhood of the race, still treasured in its maturity. In classic Greek we find birds songs, the Hebrew Scriptures contain them, Latin poets have left exquisite rhymes, and from India and the mystic East, we have songs of all the feathered folk in those unknown skies."

The birds of black plumage are considered the most ominous and prophetic. The Arab prophet says:

"I have seen the blackbird of separation; Cicero was forewarned of death by a dark and fearsome owl; Shakespeare calls them 'night's black agents'; Horace speaks of the 'shaded crow'; and one of the most beautiful poems of our own Bryant tells how

"The robins and the wrens are flown,
And from the shrub the jay—
And from the wood-top caws the crow
Throughout the gloomy day."

Not less worthy of our delight are the peaceful and innocent—the lordly and symmetrically formed—native wild animals of the woods, the mountains and the plains; their playful gambols and fleetness, disclose their delight in conscious life.

After being a pioneer in California for nine years, beginning with "the days of forty-nine," and witnessing there the great and cruel slaughter of the game which in that favored clime was so very plentiful, in both bird and animal species, and then in '84, becoming a pioneer in Montana and again witnessing and joining in a similar onslaught upon the peaceful as well as the ferocious and destructive species, I became so deeply impressed with the great and cruel wrong done to the innocent wild-bird and animal life by the hunter's chase and killing "just for the sport of it," that I have long desired to give in a public way an urgent plea to spare the innocent creatures, for that in reality and in principle to a great degree, human life was as sacred as is the human life. So I would say, let us stop and think and consider.

Why should we longer cling to that relic of savagism? How many are wont to look upon shooting down any bird or animal of any wild species, as being not only sport, but right as well as privileged, and so follow on in the chase with eager purpose, we might say with savage cruelty, to slay, and all for sport.

All sportsmen not beset with more or less savage instinct, have not failed to witness the accusing, as well as terror-stricken look of the large, expressive eyes of all kinds of wild, peace-loving animals, like deer, antelope, elk, etc., gazing at them with mute, but bitter reproach, while the terrible death agony was manifest in their struggle; a look as accusing and as appealing as might be seen in human eyes under like conditions. And why not? These peaceful innocents are endowed with life—the same life—as are their destroyers, and by the same creative power.

How pleased to see by the humane disposed that nature provided the birds and animals in such variety to furnish a more pleasing and animated landscape for man, not that he should find savage sport in their destruction. How painful to the more humane and thoughtful to see the lovely animals, the sweet singers and birds of beautiful plumage, whether deer or duck, quail or quail, all in their native wild state, peaceful, happy, enjoying to the full the gifts of life, wounded or killed by cruel hearted man.

The writer, then, would plead with all hunters to open their eyes and their hearts to the great wrong and horror of such practice. The difference is less than one step between the red life-current in man and in the animal. All life is sacred, is from the same divine source; think of them as your friends and you will not, even to supply your table with so-called dainties, shed their innocent blood, for are not all peace-loving, innocent forms—animal or birds—in which flow the red life-currents, of the one family and from the one creative source with man?

There are men who have criminal habits and they must be restrained by law. So under the law of "the survival of the fittest," there are animals with habits of destroying man, or of destroying the needed means for man's support and progressive life; these are not to be classed with the beautiful innocents of entirely peaceful habits. Spare the latter, whether bird or animal, in all places for any and all purposes and be conscious of the sweet enjoyment of a truly humane feeling toward the unoffending innocents, whose enjoyment of life is as precious to them as is your own to yourself.

The writer knows whereof the things he is writing; he has traveled the road and has gained the foolish renown of the mighty hunter, but would not now stain with his life-blood the beautiful plumage of a wild duck; rather instead the true and sensible delight would be in witnessing the rapid flight, the bright plumage, the graceful poise and poetry of motion on the water.

And so of all the beautiful birds, the sweet singers of the woods and fields, so full of happy life. The sensible bird will not harm them, for the birds alive, with their graceful motions will give him far more joy than when killed, and the boy's finer feelings will then remain forever free from bitter regrets. O, how pitious a sight to witness the dying, quivering innocent, helpless birds!

DIED A SPIRITUALIST.

His Physical Body Claimed by the Catholics, but They Could Not Capture His Spirit.

To the Editor:—Doubtless the many readers of The Progressive Thinker will remember the able contributions made to its columns a few years ago by Mr. Paul F. de Gournay of Baltimore, Md. He was a very dear friend of mine, and when I filled engagements in this city some twelve years ago, he was my constant companion, and by his fatherly advice did much to encourage me in carrying on the work for our cause.

Returning to this city after an absence of ten years, I find that my dear friend has been translated to that better and more glorious world that lies just beyond the River of Death. There were circumstances in his life that I feel ought to be recorded in the historical literature of Spiritualism.

Occupying an exalted position in his own country, France, he was naturally allied to the State Church of that country, the Roman Catholic, but after living a number of years in the United States, he was brought in contact with Spiritualism. Being pre-eminently intuitive and inspirational he soon was led to fully accept the truths taught in the philosophy. In advancing Spiritualism he was a power, for his family as well as his former associates in the Catholic church opposed him on every hand, and this opposition continued even up to the very hour of his translation.

To show the sterling integrity and bravery of the man, I want to relate the following circumstance: Just forty-eight hours before his spirit took its flight to a happier world, he, realizing that he was surrounded by Catholics who would misrepresent him in his dying hours, sent for a true and tried Spiritualist friend, and wrote, and gave into his keeping the following letter:

"Baltimore, Md., July 23, 1904.
"Feeling my end approaching, but in the full enjoyment of my faculties, I wish to declare, all statements to the contrary that may be made, that I die a Spiritualist. No! do not die, but pass into a brighter and more glorious life, to immortality, where I shall meet my loved ones and all the great minds that have worked for the good of mankind."

"PAUL F. DE GOURNAY."
So this letter proves the consistency of this true man, who found the philosophy of Spiritualism good enough to live by, and also good enough to die by. After his translation, the Catholics claimed his body and held a funeral in accordance with the rights of their church, but we Spiritualists know that Paul F. de Gournay was a Spiritualist still. The mummers of the church could have no effect on his emancipated spirit.

Two years have passed since he went into spirit life, and now as I write these lines he stands beside me. Through my clairvoyance I hear him say: "My expectations have been fulfilled to the uttermost. Through The Progressive Thinker I would send greetings to all my friends, and let me say to all the world, that SPIRITUALISM IS TRUE, and Paul F. de Gournay is satisfied."

I append to this letter the obituary notice published in the local Baltimore papers at the time of his death. I think these things are worthy of being made a matter of record, as there was no prominent notice of his translation in our papers.

I am Sincerely,
OSCAR A. EDGERLY,
Baltimore, Md.

Col. Paul F. de Gournay, who in his own country, France, was the Marquis de Gournay de Marcheville, died last night at his home, 309 West Hoffman street, after a long illness. Col. de Gournay was a native of Brittany, but was a thorough cosmopolitan. He was consul here for France for seven years, and retired about four years ago. He fought through the Civil War in the Confederate Army, having been captain in a troop organized by him in New Orleans at the beginning of that war.

The troop of artillery, raised by him at his own expense, first fought in the Army of Virginia, then served with the Army of Northern Virginia at the seven-day battle of Yorktown and was then transferred to the southwestern part of Virginia and was in the gallant defense of Port Hudson, in which Col. de Gournay was prominent. During the siege he was made lieutenant colonel and commanded a battalion. After the capitulation of Port Hudson he became a prisoner of war, and remained as such until the close of the war. He was wounded at the siege of Port Hudson by a piece of shell which struck him in the chest. He was esteemed very highly by Major General Frank Gardner, who commanded the troops during the siege of Port Hudson. After the close of the war Colonel de Gournay went to France, and remained there for several years. He then returned to Baltimore and resumed his literary work, which had been interrupted by the war.

Colonel de Gournay, after leaving college, went to Cuba to manage large plantations owned there by his father. He became enthused with the Cuban cause and was appointed private secretary to Lopez, and was one of the three men who followed the career of that patriot to its close.

He was the divine plan too high a stand for that, let that high stand, then, include the humane love of right even toward the unoffending wild creatures—birds and animals, intended to be his companions and friends and he will no longer cause the precious life-blood to go out in the death struggle.

L. B. LYMAN.

PROPHECIES REALIZED.

They Were Made in October, 1905, and Some of Them, We Regret to Announce, Have Proved True.

Abbe Moreau, in a Paris dispatch to The Minneapolis Sunday Journal, Oct. 23, predicted the catastrophe which has overwhelmed San Francisco. Not only this, but he announced that the spring of 1906 would be marked by four principal disturbances, and the occurrences of March and April have fulfilled his prophecy.

Here is Abbe Moreau's specific statement of the disturbances to be expected, and the verification of his forecast:

(a) The west coast of the two Americas.
(b) The line including the volcanic district of eastern Asia.
(c) The South Sea Islands and Australia.
(d) The depression of the Mediterranean.

(Vesuvius in eruption April 5, 1906, and succeeding days.)

Abbe Moreau's prediction was published in The Sunday Journal October 23, 1905, in a Paris dispatch of the New York Herald cable service, exclusively used in the northwest in The Sunday Journal. The dispatch read as follows:

Paris, Oct. 28.—Abbe Moreau, writing on the subject of the recent solar activity, says: "As the solar activity will slowly diminish, it is highly probable that earthquakes will occur in March or April, next."

It will be remembered that Abbe Moreau, in an article which was widely copied, predicted the earthquakes which a few months ago devastated India, and which, he holds, were due to sunspots. He maintained the following in an article published this week:

"There is a connection between solar activity and volcanoes and even earthquakes. The awakening of the internal forces of the globe coincides with a sudden change in the curve of sunspots if it rises or if it falls. The number of sunspots is not alone a decisive factor; there must be sudden augmentations or diminutions."

"Earthquakes, and especially volcanic action, are localized on the lines of fracture of the globe, and particularly at the intersection of these lines; (a) The west coast of the two Americas; (b) the line including the volcanic district of eastern Asia; (c) the South Sea Islands and Australia; and (d) the depression of the Mediterranean, cutting the three first lines of fracture almost at right angles."

"These are facts. Hypotheses less certain have been suggested. The sun acts on the crust of the earth by causing its potential electricity to vary or by modifying the heat sent to the earth. For both there would be a dilation or shrinking of the envelope."

IN THE NEW TEMPLE.

Erected for Spiritualists by Mr. Munger, Now Passed to Spirit Life—Rev. and Mrs. Sprague Begin a Series of Meetings—Noted Missionaries of the Spiritualist Faith Commence a Series of Meetings at the Munger Temple—Readings.

Rev. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague of Jamestown, N. Y., arrived in Macomb, Ill., Saturday night, and on Sunday morning conducted the first of a series of special meetings to be held in the Spiritualist Temple on East Washington street. It had been planned to dedicate the new church Sunday but on account of Mr. and Mrs. Sprague arriving in the city so late and because Mrs. G. Cooley, another prominent worker, failed to reach here Sunday the dedicatory services were postponed to some future date. Announcement of the date of the dedicatory services will be made in The By-Stander as soon as the date is arranged.

There was quite a large crowd of people congregated at the new church Sunday morning to hear the noted Spiritualist missionaries. Rev. Sprague was the first speaker. He is a man with a pleasant personality and is an interesting talker. He told his audience that Spiritualism had come to help educate and help man come to an understanding of the gifts that have been given him. He said that if people wished to investigate Spiritualism the best place to do it was in the ranks. "We wish to see the walls and the barriers between the various dogmas torn down," said Mr. Sprague, "and all come together for good, giving everybody the freedom of speech. Any minister of the gospel is welcome to use our platform. He may abuse us from it if he wishes and all we would ask would be the privilege of making a reply." The phenomena of modern Spiritualism are of the same kind as that upon which every other religion rests. We do not come here to antagonize any other religion." The speaker made quite a lengthy talk and then said that Mrs. Sprague would give a few readings.

Mrs. Sprague, who is a noted medium and also an ordained minister, is a devoted worker. Among other things which she said were:

"I am very glad to see so many here at our meeting today. This is a beautiful structure which Mr. Munger left here. We knew him before, he left the material world and we learned to love him. He always wished to do something to leave as a monument. He has left it in this building and you people should feel very thankful to him. You should honor the memory of Mr. Munger for he was a grand and noble soul. His hope was that he was going to live and be well and strong when this building was dedicated. We regret his absence in the material sense, but he is here in the spirit. I knew he was here when I entered the building this morning. Look how he has arranged everything so conveniently for the benefit of you people. Friends, Brother Munger is at the wheel today and he is not going to let this work stop."

Mrs. Sprague then gave some readings. She pointed towards some ladies sitting in one section of the room and said that she saw two spirits. "One of these spirits is an old lady, I

PREDICTS EARTHQUAKES IN FAR-OFF ORIENT.

Rev. Oscar A. Edgerly, While Under Spirit Control, Tells of Future Disasters.

Claiming to have predicted to a certain extent, while under spirit control, the earthquakes of San Francisco and the eruption of Vesuvius, Rev. Oscar A. Edgerly, of the Spiritual Church, West Franklin street, Baltimore, Md., stated in his lecture, that under similar conditions the next seismic disturbances, in the not distant future, would occur in the Orient, particularly in the southern portion of India and in the region of Japan, and that the disturbances would be far greater than that of Vesuvius and San Francisco.

"In what sense, if any, could the earthquake of California be considered the visitation of God?" was one of the questions asked last night after Rev. Edgerly had placed himself under spirit control. He spoke, it was stated, while under the influence of the spirit of a deceased Presbyterian minister named Campbell, and his answer to the question asked, was, in part, as follows:

"The disturbances are in accordance with the laws of nature and are not the direct visitation upon the people who are the sufferers from such natural disturbances. Had this occurred in a barren desert it would not have aroused the same feeling it does with, because human life would have been almost, if not entirely, exempt from the operation of the destructive forces, and the disturbances are the result of a more general agitation of natural forces than our scientists believe."

The seismic disturbances, or earthquakes, as they are called, are the result of the planet being influenced by the moon, so is the crust of the earth disturbed and caused to break by the attractive forces of other planets operating upon the matter contained within the crust of the earth.

"At the suggestion of the associate spirit that stands by my side, the next seismic disturbance in the not far distant future will occur in the Orient, and particularly in the southern part of India, and in the region of Japan, which will be far greater than the present phenomena in California."

After the question had been fully answered, the question, "Is God's Justice Man's Justice?" was asked, and several others, which the spirit is supposed to have answered through Rev. Edgerly.

Rev. Edgerly stated to a representative of The American that a few days before the eruption of Vesuvius he reported a spirit stated through him that there were certain conditions in process of formation which would soon result in volcanic disturbances on the shores of the Mediterranean, and that conditions were ripe for a volcanic process going on in the interior of the earth, to cause the worst earthquakes on the Pacific Coast and in other parts of the earth, that have ever been recorded in the history of humanity.

Rev. Edgerly stated that while under the influence of spirit control he predicted that Galveston would be overthrown by a tidal wave. The prediction was made on April 29, previous to the month of September, when the terrible disaster occurred in Galveston.—Baltimore American.

can see her there and she has a message for you."

The medium then described the appearance of the spirit and the lady in the audience kept nodding her head that the description was correct. The medium then described the man spirit that was near the lady. "This spirit," he said, "is a man with a white hair, and is pale. He walks with a cane. His hand is palsied." The lady declared that the description was a perfect one of her father and mother who had been dead for many years. The strange part of it is that the lady does not believe in the spiritual doctrine in any respect and had never talked with or seen either Mr. or Mrs. Sprague before.

Mrs. Sprague then directed her attention to another part of the room and pointing down to a man said, "I see spirit forms beside you."

"You were born far away from here."

He nodded yes.

"The country in which you were born was rough. There was a large mountain off to the left. Also a large mountain to the right. The house in which you were born was not large. There was a large grove of trees at the rear of the house. The well from which water was secured was an old-fashioned well-sweep and water clear, cool and pure."

She evidently described his birthplace correctly for he kept nodding at each statement she made. She then described four spirits which were then standing beside him and called them by name. The man acknowledged all her statements were correct.

She gave two more readings and the services were closed.

Sunday Night.

Another meeting was held Sunday night and there was a large audience. Mr. Sprague read many passages from the bible, showing that the Spiritualist doctrine is founded upon the bible. A number of readings were given by Mrs. Sprague which mystified the congregation.

Spiritualism.

Rev. and Mrs. Sprague are boarding at the home of Mrs. Edgerly on East Jefferson street. A representative of The By-Stander called there Monday morning to learn something of the history of Spiritualism. Mr. Sprague very kindly furnished the following information:

"Modern Spiritualism was established through the mediumship of two little girls at Hydesville, N. Y., in 1848. They were daughters of Mr. and Mrs. John D. Fox, well known members of the Methodist church."

IT HAS THE RIGHT RING.

A Letter From the President of the State Spiritualist Association of Missouri.

I wish to pay my tribute of praise to Prof. Lockwood for his article on "Spirit Photography," and Brother J. A. Wertz for his splendid articles on Leggedman. Both articles are giving a line that the Spiritualists are giving the public need education on badly. They should be put in pamphlet form and distributed by the state associations in every society over which they have jurisdiction. Missouri for one will be glad to purchase and distribute same.

To me, the only solution to the problem, "How to get rid of the fake element," is the education of the masses so that they will demand absolute scientific proof of the genuineness of the physical phenomena, given out by sensational coin-grabbing mediums (?), or refuse to attend their circles. When Spiritualists demand test conditions that are test conditions to the intelligent investigator as well as to the medium, and refuse to attend a circle unless the reasonable request is agreed to, the frauds will go out of business for lack of patronage.

I know that "old chestnut" will be rung in, in reply, that if you bring a suspicious condition into a circle, it will spoil the harmony and prevent phenomena; but I deny that asking for reasonable proof of the genuineness of dark room phenomena throws a harmful condition over a circle of genuine truth seekers. If this be the case, how did Crookes, Wallace, Zollner and the many other scientists get their scientific proof of the genuineness of spirit return? And if it was not necessary for them to testify their intelligence, it is not necessary for you and me, and the medium, that demands this of yours truly will wake up to the fact that while I am a Spiritualist I am not (as my wife says) one of the easy kind.

There are many apparently intelligent Spiritualists who attend a materialization seance (?), where from thirty to forty spirit (?) forms come forth three or four times a week, not counting equal afternoons, and in a room so dark as to make it impossible to see, let alone recognize one face and who cry out in holy horror when one expresses a doubt as to the genuineness of phenomena produced in violation of every known natural law.

I know a poor, uneducated woman who is led by every fake medium in town, and who deprives herself and family of the necessities of life, in obedience to the requests of her spirit friends (?) to come again and they will be able to give her some more. Brother Francis, if I could believe that my loved ones who have passed over would enter into a conspiracy with some coin-grabbing medium (?) to catch my hearers' earnings for them to dole out and call it a reward—but why go further? Such a belief is an insult to their memory and my own common sense. In the language of Puck, "What fools we mortals be."

May the grand work that is being done by The Progressive Thinker go on. May its vigorous fight on fraud be continued without fear or favor, and as the X-mis of truth turned on all from the highest to the lowest, wherever a squeal of protest is heard, let the search be long and thorough. "Tis the galled jade that winsces."

thousands of people, congregated to hear our gospel. There are 20,000 medium public afternoons in the United States. There are 250,000 Spiritualists in the organization and it is estimated that there are three and a half million people in this country who believe in Spiritualism.

"It is the popular movement and has encircled the globe. It is taught in every civilized country on earth. We send missionaries to other countries unless we receive a call for them."

"Spiritualism is an organized religion and we have national and state officers. The next national convention will be held in Chicago next October."

"Spiritualism is organized for the purpose of advancing the cause of human progress, and not for the purpose of antagonizing any religion. We are children of one father God and of one mother Nature."

Meetings This Week.

There will be meetings held at the Munger Temple on East Washington street, beginning at 8 o'clock, except on Thursday evening, when a meeting for Spiritualists alone will be held. At this time a society for the investigation and promulgation of the truths of Spiritualism will be organized. Reading circles and development classes will be established and later on a Lyman and Aid Society for carrying on the work here will be organized.—The By-Stander, Macomb, Ill.

A GIRL MIND READER.

She Is the Most Remarkable Now Before the Public.

Miss Myra Maxwell of Minneapolis, Minn., a gifted mind reader, was entertained at Le Sueur at the home of Miss Clara Parker, president of the Monday club. Miss Maxwell gives manifestations of her mystic gift only for friends. In one of her prettiest exhibitions she entered the room swiftly, blindfolded and walking beside, but not touching, her sympathizer, crossed the room without hesitation, turning aside for chairs and tables as though she could see; went to a little girl that was standing in the corner with her face to the wall; led the girl across the room; lifted her up and placed her in the lap of a woman, all exactly as it had been arranged by the spectators that she should do. A closed hunting-case watch was held in the hand of a good subject who knew what time the watch showed. Miss Maxwell could instantly tell the exact hour and minute by reading it from the mind of the subject. She had not used her gift for a full year previous to last evening, but showed all her power, unimpaired by lack of practice.

That Terrible Earthquake!

It Is Graphically Portrayed by a Prominent Lawyer and Spiritualist, Who Passed Through the Awful Ordeal.

We have just passed through the most terrific earthquakes that, from all accounts, San Francisco has experienced within historic times. I have survived the destructive shocks of many earthquakes, but none so terrible—none that left such widespread and utter ruin in its wake.

The shock commenced at about 5:15 p. m., April 18. My wife and I were occupying the fourth story of the Gault House at 1208 Market street. We were both awake at the time.

We arose, and upon the side of the bed, and this continued, seemingly, for hours, though the actual time was only from three to five minutes.

Large buildings all around us were swept to the earth, attended by frightful shrieks of the maimed and dying. When the swaying and heaving of the building had ceased, and the structure remained intact, we went to the window and saw that as far as the city of San Francisco was concerned, the earthquake in its maddened work had left. Two blocks from us a large building was shaken down, carrying to their death three hundred souls, killing, maiming and pinning them to the debris for three and a half hours, when flames consumed all the mortal remains of the three hundred.

As the flames were gradually approaching our place, we packed many of our valuables and had them taken down to Golden Gate Avenue at the northern side of the Gault House, where the fire had not started. We then returned to our apartments and watched the progress of the ravages. As the north wind was blowing, we felt that there might be a possibility of escape; but the fire continued gradually to approach Market street, igniting building after building. It finally reached Sterling's large carpet and furniture house nearly opposite the Gault House, when the large building was soon enveloped in flames. The fire then spread to all the buildings on the south side of Market street, enveloping Krogan's large furniture store, directly opposite my building, in flames. We then left the building, leaving everything that was there, sent our goods that had been packed to a warehouse for storage to a place out of danger as we thought, and as all supposed.

We then remained on the streets watching the progress of the consuming flames south of Market street. At 8 o'clock p. m., every building on the south of Market street was utterly destroyed by the fire, and the Gault House remained unharmed, having survived the seismic shock of the fiery calamity. At that hour the military law, complete control under martial law, allowed us to return to our apartments.

We repaired to our deserted rooms, and at the windows on the Market street side, we looked over that part of the desolate city. As far as the eye could reach there was nothing but ruin, but the fallen and ruined walls, and the seething flames in their destructive work.

As Mrs. Lewis and I stood at the windows a terrible scene presented itself. There was one vast ocean of burning. Lived, molten fire! One could but think of Dante's description in the Inferno, of the damned in eternal hell. We were weary and distressed with the terrible scenes and experiences of that fateful day.

We retired, had a refreshing sleep and awoke at two o'clock in the morning.

We then saw the lurid sky on the western side of Market street, and going to the windows we saw that that side was in flames. The fire was within one block of us, and approaching rapidly before a driving gale. We attired ourselves rapidly in such clothing as we could most quickly reach, and gained the street as rapidly as possible, and in our flight left all our money. We shot back with hundreds of others to the corner of Sixth and Mission streets, where everything had been swept by the fire the day before. There we remained in sight of our building and saw it reduced to ashes. The whole district north of Market street was then destroyed by fire. The city is a total wreck, left in ashes and debris. The value of the property stored the day before was all consumed. We lost everything but the scanty raiment with which we were clad. My law library, all my legal papers and documents, and all valuable papers went up in smoke. My miscellaneous library containing many rare and valuable books that can never be replaced, was entirely destroyed. Many valuable manuscripts which cannot be duplicated were lost in the flames.

But what I feel the loss of more than all things else is the scientific and psychic data, historical and literary notes and references that for more than forty years have been collecting and classifying are gone. The record of my experiments in biology made during the last thirty years are also gone.

And what I sorely regret is the destruction of bound volumes of The Progressive Thinker for three or four years, and these I fear cannot, in their entirety, be replaced.

The new City Hall, the Hall of Justice, Old Fellows' Temple, Masonic Temple, the St. Francis Hotel, the Palace and the Grand Hotel, are gone. The newspaper offices—the Call and the Examiner—buildings are destroyed, and the Chronicle building badly injured.

All that is left of many of these buildings is simply the massive iron frames, all the brick and stone having been shaken out by the seismic shock; and all except the United States Mint and the post office has been reduced by the flames. This shattering furnishes a lesson and a warning to architects and builders in the future. With iron blinds to protect the windows such destruction would not happen.

At the outset martial law was declared and the military took charge, and at once compelled the closing of all schools.

There could be no trifling with the military authority. More than two hundred men were shot down in the streets by the soldiers for stealing and for insulting women. Several men were shot for refusing to work when ordered by the military. For four days my wife and I camped upon the streets, with hundreds of thousands of others. Here the rich and the poor met upon a common level, and through it all extreme good nature prevailed.

John D. Spreckles' wife gave birth to an infant upon the desolate streets of San Francisco.

My wife, with me and also hundreds of others found our only shelter under the broad canopy of the heavens for four days.

But yesterday the stench from decaying bodies in the ruins became unbearable, and we managed to get over to Oakland, at No. 305 14th street, corner of Harrison, where we were temporarily housed. How many of the dead, how many of the charred remains of the human race, will never be known.

On the 19th and the 20th I saw lying by the wayside and in the debris the charred bodies of the deceased. On Howard street I saw lying on the sidewalk in front of a demolished hotel what appeared to be the burned and charred body of a beautiful woman. The head and neck and shoulders were only burned and charred, not beyond recognition, but the lower limbs and body were almost entirely consumed.

While I have passed through the fiery furnace, as it were, to Moloch, I have great reason to be thankful, and to rejoice at my extreme good luck—I say extreme good luck—yes, when compared to that of the unnumbered unfortunate victims who went to death through the wreck of buildings and the burning fires.

There is no need, however, of murmuring or complaining. Under the ETERNAL LAWS OF NATURE, IT WAS TO BE; and all who came to San Francisco were born in the doomed city came into the world under the laws of Nature's unerring and eternal law.

The seismic shock, and burning fires have swept the city, to be almost inevitably followed by the dire calamity of pestilence caused by the decaying bodies buried by the debris. No one who has not passed through this terrible experience can form the slightest idea of the dire calamity. No pen, however facile, can describe it. No imagination, however fertile, can portray the dire result. I can never forget these terrible incidents which must ever remain undescribed, and indescribable, for want of human power to perform the task.

CHURCH IS TOO SLOW.

Christians Think They Are Sailing to Heaven in Excursion Boats.

"The Church and Social Ideas" was the subject of a lecture delivered at the Trinity Church, Sixth avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., by the Rev. Dr. W. A. Stanton, pastor of the Shadyside Baptist Church, in which he uttered the following sharp criticisms:

"The church is slow, exceedingly slow. It took it 300 years to learn who Christ is, 400 to learn the nature of sin, and even now it has not learned the right method of saving souls. The world regards the church not so much as a soul and society saving institution but as a close corporation, a limited partnership, a self-centered aggregation of saints seeking their own personal wealth, and their own solitary post mortem mansions in the skies. If the church does not give us a sociological religion that will teach Christians to mingle with the people of the world and influence them rightly, God will destroy the church and give us something better. Too many of the Pittsburgh churches are simply pleasure excursion boats sailing toward the heavenly shores. The passengers, who must be of just the right social standing, sit quietly on board watching the scenery and enjoying themselves, while there is no room in the boat for drowning sinners or a cargo of good works."

A PROPHETIC DREAM.

No Doubt Induced by a Wise Spirit Who Foresees the Disaster.

Ament the earthquake at San Francisco comes a story which will cause believers in telepathy and kindred sciences to take a firmer hold on their belief. This morning a little Marie, five years old, related to her mother, which she had had during the night and which was to the effect that she had dreamed that she was in a large city and that the place had been

A Little Pilgrim.

This is a charming narrative illustrating the beauty grandeur and sublimity of the spirit side of life, the realms of souls, the immortal spheres of existence. Margaret O. W. Oliphant is the author. And while it has been read by millions in the past, it will prove refreshing and soul-inspiring to our readers to again peruse it and feel its thrills of inspiration, and enjoy its uplifting influence.

Chapter V.—Continued.

Pain was written in his face. I drew away to leave him room, with mingled pity and horror that this poor wretch should be the partner of the only shelter I could find within so short a time of my arrival. I who—It was horrible, shameful, humiliating; and yet the suffering in his wretched face was so evident that I could not but feel a pang of pity too. "I have nowhere to go," I said. "I am a stranger. I have been badly used, and nobody seems to care."

"No," he said, "nobody cares; don't you look for that. Why should they? Why, you look as if you were sorry for me! What a joke!" he murmured to himself—"what a joke! Sorry for some one else! What a fool the fellow must be!"

"You look," I said, "as if you were suffering horribly; and you say you have come here for years."

"Suffering! I should think I was," said the sick man; "but what is that to you? Yes, I've been here for years—oh, years! that means nothing—for longer than can be counted. Suffering is not the word. It's torture; it's agony! But who cares? Take your leg out of my way."

I drew myself out of his way from a sort of habit, though against my will, and asked, from habit too, "Are you never any better than now?"

He looked at me more closely, and an air of astonishment came over his face. "What d'ye want here," he said, "pitying a man? That's something new here. No, I'm not always so bad, if you want to know. I get better, and then I go and do what makes me bad again, and that's how it will go on; and I choose it to be so, and you needn't bring any of your d-d pity here."

"I may ask, at least, why aren't you looked after? Why don't you get into some hospital?" I said.

"Hospital!" cried the sick man, and then he too burst into that furious laugh, the most awful sound I ever had heard. Some of the passers-by stopped to hear what the joke was, and surrounded me with once more a circle of mockers. "Hospitals! perhaps you would like a whole Red Cross Society, with ambulances and all arranged?" cried one. "Or the Misericordia!" shouted another. I sprang up to my feet, crying, "Why not?" with an impulse of rage which gave me strength. Was I never to meet with anything but this fiendish laughter? "There's some authority, I suppose," I cried in my fury. "It is not the rabble that is the only master here, I hope." But nobody took the least trouble to hear what I had to say for myself. The last speaker struck me on the mouth, and called me an accused fool for talking of what I did not understand; and finally they all swept on and passed away.

I had been, as I thought, severely injured when I dragged myself into that corner to save myself from the crowd; but I sprang up now as if nothing had happened to me. My wounds had disappeared; my bruises were gone. I was as I had been when I dropped, giddy and amazed, upon the same pavement, how long—an hour?—before? It might have been a year, I cannot tell. The light was the same as ever, the thunderous atmosphere unchanged. Day, if it was day, had made no progress; night, if it was evening, had come no nearer,—all was the same.

As I went on again presently, with a vexed and angry spirit, regarding on every side around me the endless surging of the crowd, and feeling a loneliness, a sense of total abandonment and solitude, which I cannot describe, there came up to me a man of remarkable appearance. That he was a person of importance, of great knowledge and information, could not be doubted. He was very pale, and of a worn but commanding aspect. The lines of his face were deeply drawn; his eyes were sunk under high arched brows, from which they looked out as from caves, full of a fiery impatient light. His thin lips were never quite without a smile; but it was not a smile in which any pleasure was. He walked slowly, not hurrying, like most of the passers. He had a reflective look, as if pondering many things. He came up to me suddenly, without introduction or preliminary, and took me by the arm. "What object had you in talking of these antiquated institutions?" he said.

And I saw in his mind the gleam of the thought, which seemed to be the first with all, that I was a fool, and that that was the natural thing to wish me harm, just as in the earth above it was the natural thing, professed at least, to wish well,—to say good-morning, good-day, by habit and without thought. In this strange country the stranger was received with a curse, and it took an answer not unlike the hasty "Curse you," then, also! which seemed to come without any will of mine through my mind. But this provoked only a smile from my new friend. He took no notice. He was disposed to examine me, to find some amusement perhaps—how could I tell?—in what I might say.

"What antiquated things?" "Are you still so slow of understanding? What were they—hospitals? The pretences of a world that can still deceive itself. Did you expect to find them here?"

"I expected to find—how should I know?" I said, bewildered—"some shelter for a poor wretch where he could be cared for, not to be left there to die in the street. Expected! I never thought. I took it for granted."

"To die in the street!" he cried with a smile and shrug of his shoulders. "You'll learn better by and by. And if he did die in the street, what then? What is that to you?" "To me!" I turned and looked at him, amazed; but he had somehow shut his soul, so that I could see nothing but the deep eyes in their caves, and the smile upon the close-shut mouth. "No more to me than to any one. I only spoke for humanity's sake, as a fellow-creature."

My new acquaintance gave way to a silent laugh within himself, which was not so offensive as the loud laugh of the crowd, but yet was more overpowering than words can say. "You think that matters? But it does not hurt you that he should be in pain. It would do you no good if he were to get well. Why should you trouble yourself one way or the other? Let him die—if he can—That makes no difference to you or me."

"I must be dull indeed," I cried,—"slow of understanding, as you say. This is going back to the ideas of times beyond knowledge—before Christianity." As soon as I had said this I felt somehow—I could not tell how—as if my voice jarred, as if something false and unnatural was in what I said. My companion gave me a twist as if with a shock of surprise then laughed in his inward way again.

"We don't think much of that here, nor of your modern pretences in general. The only thing that touches you and me is what hurts or helps ourselves. To be sure, it all comes to the same thing—for I suppose it annoys you to see that wretch writhing; it hurts your more delicate, highly cultivated consciousness."

"It has nothing to do with my consciousness," I cried angrily; it is a shame to let a fellow-creature suffer if we can prevent it."

"Why shouldn't he suffer?" said my companion. We passed as he spoke some other squalid, wretched creatures shuffling among the crowd, whom he kicked with his foot, calling forth a yell of pain and curses. This he regarded with a supreme contemptuous calm which stupefied me. Nor did any of the passers-by show the slightest inclination to take the part of the sufferers. They laughed, or shouted out a gibe, or what was still more unbecoming, went on with a complete unaffected indifference, as if all this was natural. I tried to disengage my arm in horror and dismay, but he held me fast with a pressure that hurt me. "That's the question," he said. "What have we to do with it? Your fictitious consciousness makes it painful to you. To me, on the contrary, it is a pleasurable feeling. It enhances the amount of ease, whatever that may be, which I enjoy. I am in no pain. That brute who is— and he flicked with a stick he carried the uncovered wound of a wretch upon the roadside—"makes me more satisfied with my condition. Ah! you think it is I who am the brute? You will change your mind by and by."

"Never!" I cried, wrenching my arm from his with an effort. "If I should live a hundred years."

"A hundred years—a drop in the bucket!" he said with his silent laugh. "You will live forever, and you will come to my view; and we shall meet in the course of ages, from time to time, to compare notes. I would say good-bye after the old fashion, but you are but newly arrived, and I will not treat you so badly as that." With which he parted from me, waving his hand, with his everlasting horrible smile.

"Good-bye!" I said to myself, "good-bye! why should it be treating me badly to say good-bye?"

I was startled by a buffet on the mouth. "Take that!" cried some one, "to teach you how to wish the worst of tortures to people who have done you no harm."

"What have I said? I meant no harm; I repeated only what is the commonest civility, the merest good manners."

"You wished," said the man who had struck me,—"I won't repeat the words; to me, for it was I only that heard them, the awful company that hurts most, that sets everything before us, both past and to come, and cuts like a sword and burns like fire. I'll say it to yourself, and see how it feels: God be with you! There! it is said, and we all must bear it, thanks, you fool and accursed, to you."

And then there came a pause over all the place, an awful stillness,— hundreds of men and women standing clutching with desperate movements at their hearts as if to tear them out, moving their heads as if to dash them against the wall, wringing their hands, with a look upon all their convulsed faces which I can never forget. They all turned to me, cursing me with those horrible eyes of anguish. And everything was still; the noise all stopped for a moment, the air all silent, with a silence, that could be felt. And then suddenly out of the crowd there came a great piercing cry; and everything began again exactly as before.

While this pause occurred, and while I stood wondering, bewildered, understanding nothing, there came over me a darkness, a blackness, a sense of misery such as never in all my life—though I have known troubles enough—I had felt before. All that had happened to me through-out my existence seemed to rise pale and terrible in a hundred scenes before me,—all momentary, intense, as if each was present moment. And in each of these scenes I saw what I had never seen before. I saw where I had taken the wrong instead of the right step, in what wantonness, with what self-will it had been done; how God (I shuddered at the name) had spoken and called me, and even entrusted, and I had withstood and refused.

All the evil I had done came back, and spread itself before my eyes; and I loathed it, yet knew that I had chosen it, and that it would be with me forever. I saw it all in the twinkling of an eye, in a moment, while I stood there, and all men with me, in the horror of awful thought. Then it ceased as it had come, instantaneously, and the noise and the laughter, and the quarrels and cries, and all the commotion of this new bewildering place, in a moment began again. I had seen no one while this strange paroxysm lasted. When it disappeared, I came to myself, emerging as from a dream, and looked into the face of the man whose words, not careless like mine, had brought it upon us. Our eyes met, and his were surrounded by curves and lines of anguish which were terrible to see.

"Well," he said, with a short laugh, which was forced and harsh, "how do you like it? That is what happens when— If it came often, who could endure it?" He was not like the rest. There was no sneer upon his face, no gibe at my simplicity. Even now, when all had recovered, he was still quivering with something that looked like a nobler pain. His face was very grave, the lines deeply drawn in it; and he seemed to be seeking no amusement or distraction, nor to take any part in the noise and tumult which was going on around.

"Do you know what that cry meant?" he said. "Did you hear that cry? It was some one who saw—even here, once in a long time, they say, it can be seen—"

"What can be seen?" He shook his head, looking at me with a meaning which I could not interpret. It was beyond the range of my thoughts. I came to know after, or I never could have made this record. But on that subject he said no more. He turned the way I was going, though it mattered nothing what way I went, for all were the same to me. "You are one of the new-comers," he said; "you have not been long here—"

"Tell me," I cried, "what you mean by here. Where are we? How can one tell who has fallen—he knows not whence or where? What is this place? I have never seen anything like it. It seems to me that I hate it already, though I know not what it is."

He shook his head once more. "You will hate it more and more," he said; "but of these dreadful streets you will never be free, unless—"

And here he stopped again. "Unless—what? If it is possible, I will be free from them, and that before long."

He smiled at me faintly, as we smile at children, but not with derision. "How shall you do it? Between this miserable world and all others, there is a great gulf fixed. It is full of all bitterness and tears that come from all the universe. Those drop from them, but stagnate here. We, you perceive, have no tears, not even at moments—Then, 'You will soon be accustomed to all this,' he said. 'You will fall into the way. Perhaps, you will be able to amuse yourself to make it passable. Many do. There are a number of fine things to be seen here. If you are curious come with me and I will show you. Or work—there is even work. There is only one thing that is possible, or if not possible—' And here he paused again and raised his eyes to the dark clouds and lurid sky overhead. "The man who gave that cry! If I could but find him! he must have seen—"

"What could he see?" I asked. But there arose in my mind something like contempt. A visionary! who could not speak plainly, who broke off into mysterious inferences, and appeared to know more than he could say. It seemed foolish to waste time, when evidently there was still so much to see, in the company of such a man; and I began already to feel more at home. There was something in that moment of anguish which had wrought a strange familiarity in me with my surroundings. It was so great a relief to return out of the misery of that sharp and horrible self-realization, to what had come to be, in comparison, easy and well known. I had no desire to go back and grope among the mysteries and anguish so suddenly revealed. I was glad to be free from them, to be left to myself, to get a little pleasure, perhaps, like the others. While these thoughts passed through my mind, I had gone on without any active impulse of my own, as everybody else did; and my latest companions had disappeared. He said, no doubt, without any need for words, what my feelings were. And I proceeded on my way. I felt better, as I got more accustomed to the place, or perhaps it was the sensation of relief that that moment of indescribable pain. As for the sights in the street, I began to grow used to them. The wretched creatures who strolled, or sat about with signs of sickness or wounds upon them disgusted me only, they no longer called forth my pity. I began to feel ashamed of my silly questions about the hospitals. All the same, it would have been a good thing to have had some receptacle for them, into which they might have been driven out of the way. I felt an inclination to push them aside as I saw other people do, but was a little ashamed of that impulse too; and so I went on. There seemed no quiet streets, so far as I could make out, in the place. Some were smaller, narrower, with a different kind of passers-by, but the same hubbub and unresting movement everywhere. I saw no signs of melancholy or seriousness; active pain, violence, brutality; the continual shock of quarrels and blows, but no pensive faces about, no sorrowfulness, nor the kind of trouble which brings thought. Everybody was fully occupied, pushing on as if in a race, pausing for nothing.

The glitter of the lights, the shouts and sounds of continual going, the endless whirl of passers-by, confused and tired me after a while. I went as far as I could go to what seemed the outskirts of the place, where I could by glimpses perceive a low horizon all lurid and glowing, which seemed to sweep round and round. Against it in the distance stood up the outline, back against the red glow, of other towers and house-tops, so many and great that there was evidently another town between us and the sunset, if sunset it was. I have seen a western sky like it when there were storms about, and all the colors of the sky were heightened and darkened by angry influences. The distant town rose against it, cutting the firmament so that it might have been tongues of flame flickering between the dark solid outlines; and across the waste open country which lay between the two cities, there came a distant hum like the sound of the sea, which in reality was the roar of that other multitude. The country between showed no greenness or beauty; it lay under the dark overarching sky. Here and there seemed a cluster of giant trees scathed as if by lightning, their bare boughs standing up as high as the distant towers, their trunks like black columns, without foliage. Openings here and there, with glimmering lights, looked like the mouths of mines; but of passengers I hardly saw any. A figure here and there flew along as if pursued, imperfectly seen, a shadow, only a little darker than the space about. And in contrast with the sound of the city, here was no sound at all, except the low roar on either side, and a vague cry or two from the openings of the mine, a scene all drawn in darkness, in variations of gloom, deriving scarcely any light at all from the red and gloomy burning of that distant evening sky.

A faint curiosity to go forwards, to see what the mines were, perhaps to get a share in what was brought up from them, crossed my mind. But I was afraid of the dark, of the wild uninhabited savage look of the landscape; though when I thought of it, there seemed no reason why a narrow stretch of country between two great towns should be alarming. But the impression was strong and above reason. I turned back to the street in which I had first alighted, and which seemed to end in a great square full of people. In the middle there was a stage erected, from which some one was delivering an oration of some sort. He stood beside a long table, upon which lay something which I could not clearly distinguish, except that it seemed alive, and moved, or rather writhed with convulsive twitchings, as if trying to get free of the bonds which confined it. Round the stage in front were a number of seats occupied by listeners, many of whom were women, whose interest seemed to be very great, some of them being furnished with note-books; while a great unsteady crowd coming and going, drifted round—many, arrested for a time as they passed, proceeding on their way when the interest flagged, as is usual to such open-air assemblies.

California State Convention. The convention of the California State Spiritualists Association on Friday, Saturday and Sunday, April 13, 14, and 15, at Santa Barbara, Cal., was a grand success. Officers of the state board present from San Francisco, President Arthur S. Howe and wife, State Organizer Allen F. Brown and wife, State Treasurer, Mrs. Mollie Vasey, State Secretaries and other local talent, including Mrs. Mary C. Vasey of Los Angeles, awakened great interest in the cause.

The board left for Los Angeles on April 17, and were hospitably entertained by C. Bowman of Los Angeles, and Mrs. Lily Thibault of San Bernardino, director of the state board and their testimony to the work of organization.

A grand meeting of three days promised, and despite the fact that San Francisco is the home of the president and state organizer, Los Angeles rejoices that they and their wives were in Los Angeles at the time of the awful disaster; and the Occidental Mystic will please be patient, as without doubt the entire plant of its editor, A. S. Howe, was destroyed. But an effort will be made to renew its publication as soon as possible.

BILLINGS, MONTANA.

A New Lyceum Organized, and Other Good Work.

We now have a Lyceum in Billings, Mont. We have called it the "Sunlight," and it is doing finely. It is a new Lyceum, and it is doing everything possible to make the meetings attractive and interesting to the children and their parents.

We celebrated the fifty-eighth anniversary of Modern Spiritualism with a meeting, in which the children took part. We had an excellent musical program, recitations and addresses by members of our society here, and the affair was a decided success in every way.

Easter Sunday was also observed with a special program for the Lyceum children, and many of the little ones gave recitations and songs, ending with a military drill in which both children and grown-ups took part.

I want especially to mention the excellent work which has been done here by Mrs. Eva McCoy, who has been serving our society since last November. I am sure that few could have filled Mrs. McCoy's place here and given such complete satisfaction as she has, in her last work and in her social relation with those with whom she has come in contact. Mrs. McCoy has made many warm friends here, and has been instrumental in making the cause of Spiritualism respected here.

We are to have a state convention June 2, 3 and 4. We are expecting visitors from the other states of the state, and hope to make the convention a step in the advancement of the work in Montana.

We are planning to have an auditorium of our own some time in the near future, although for the present, Eureka Hall is sufficiently large for our meetings.

We are expecting the Rev. Moses Hull the 9th of June to give us a series of lectures.

We have been having an interesting series of lectures here the past two weeks, the speaker being Dr. Alexander J. McIvor-Tyndall of England. Dr. McIvor-Tyndall is an attractive and capable speaker, and has been very successful here in interesting large audiences of our best known people. He is on his way East from California and stopped over here in response to a personal letter I sent him, asking him to give us a few days.

Although Dr. McIvor-Tyndall is not affiliated with any special society or organization, he evidently believes in and approves of the claims of Spiritualism, as his lecture "Proofs of Immortality," stated. He calls his work psychic science, and his private classes, which I had the pleasure of attending, are more in the line of Psychology and metaphysics, because, he says, he believes that one of the great needs of to-day is to develop the individual soul to a plane where we may readily come in rapport with the higher intelligences of the spirit world.

He has already delivered the following lectures here, and has promised to speak on "The Truth About Spiritualism" before he leaves.

We feel very grateful to Dr. McIvor-Tyndall, because he has interested many people here who were prejudiced against Spiritualism, and the newspapers, which are not given to reporting lectures favorable to our cause have been glad to get full reports of Dr. McIvor-Tyndall's lectures.

I enclose a review taken from the Helena Independent, as it is longer than the one in our home paper, on the subject, "Proofs of Immortality." Other subjects upon which Dr. McIvor-Tyndall has spoken here are: "The Devil's Death, The World Inevitable, The Call of the Century, Mental Shackles, Telepathy, and Dangers in Psychic Research. I feel that it would be difficult to overestimate the good Dr. McIvor-Tyndall is doing in Montana, and possibly he reaches more people, who as he does independently, than if he came under the direct classification of Spiritualist.

Letter From Nellie S. Baade The First Association of Spiritualists of Washington, D. C., are certainly a credit to the cause they so ably represent.

The Ladies' Auxiliary with a membership of about thirty people, several of them resident mediums, meet every Thursday evening at the home of the president, Mr. W. W. Weller, each and all do their best to make it a source of pleasure and instruction concerning the spiritual needs of the hour.

Last evening recitations from two of the Lyceum scholars were a great credit to their instructors. Goldie Evans, a young Miss of eleven years, who is developing wonderful inspirational powers and mediocrity of the highest order, is the grand-daughter of J. H. Nixon, Spring Hill, Kansas. Little Goldie's prospects are favorable for becoming a bright and shining light in the cause of Spiritualism, which has been made possible through her faithful instructors at home and in the Lyceum. Too much praise cannot be given Mrs. M. J. Stephens, the conductor of the Lyceum. Always at her post, faithful in the discharge of her spiritual duties, also a fine test medium.

Last Sunday, being Easter, the children were remembered and enjoyed the occasion. With the eggs typical of life, with songs, recitations and congratulations extended each to the other, and the hall laden with the perfume of lilies and roses, we all felt inspired to press on to the goal of our high calling. Our guides gave lectures suitable to the occasion, followed by spiritual messages.

There have been no transitions from this society during the past year, but at present Mrs. Collins is dangerous, if not at her home. We are all sending out best thought for her speedy return to health and happiness. She is a medium of remarkable ability, and has many friends here as elsewhere. She is an earnest teacher of the Lyceum, and is a power for good.

As the time draws near for my departure, it is with a feeling of sincere regret for I have enjoyed every moment of the time since coming here, and shall be loath to part with the dear people of Washington.

JUST JIM.

Such merry laughter I heard one day From some children's voices, of mirth and glee; And spied them down under a walnut tree.

Then with a laugh they scampered away, Along down the path by the brook-side's brim, And each one cried with a whoop! and hey!

"Hello! Now I bet you can't catch me, Jim!" Then, by and by, as they came to rest Near the grapevine swing close by where I stood, A man came down from the hillock's crest.

And a dog sprang gayly from out the wood.

"Come, tell me your name, my little man?"

"It's Basil, please sir!" the elder one said;

"And what is yours? tell me if you can?"

"Why, mine's only Mark," and he hung his head.

"And where is Jim, then? I pray you tell."

"Up there!" and they smilingly beckoned him.

"Why, he is your grandpa! I know him well;

His name is Mark, too; so it can't be Jim!"

"Oh, he is our Jim, sir; don't you see? And every day for the sun goes dim."

He comes to play with us under the tree, He ain't an old grandpa—he's just our Jim!"

"And, oh, we're so happy! Every day We come to the woodland to wait for him—

All the bright days from the first of May, And just 'cause we love him, we call him Jim!"

Oh, happy children! when youth has fled, Will they always keep that pet name for him?

When the grass grows green above his grave, Will they love him still? will they call him Jim?

A time rolls on, 'life's autumn' appears— When their hair is white and their eyes grow dim,

And cares and toils have come with the years— To their children's children, will they be Jim?

Ah, well! with us all may some dear, fond name Live green in our hearts while the suns grow dim!

With the changing years let there still remain Some dear loved form, who is only— Just Jim!

TRIBUTE TO THOMAS PAINE.

The Patriot, the Free Thinker, the Great Man of the Age and Time, and the One Whose Name is Still Honored.

Arbor Day in this city was celebrated by the Philadelphia Spiritual Society by planting an Oriental Plane Tree in Independence Square, by addresses by Samuel Wheeler and Edgar W. Emerson, assisted by the officers and children of the Lyceum.

Mr. Wheeler spoke of the great celebration of the last three days in honor of Benjamin Franklin, the friend of Thomas Paine, whose religion was to do good, and all mankind were his brethren and that of the original trees in the square that had sheltered the signers of the Declaration of Independence, but few remained. Here on this sacred piece of ground many illustrious spirits hovered around. A century and a quarter ago, when the immortal Declaration was read by John Dixon, on July 8th, from yonder window in the Philosophical Society, under the shade of that decaying oak tree, stood Thomas Paine and Robert Morris, Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson, and some Indians; by yonder stately elm stood Benjamin Rush, and the great Stephen Girard had many a time passed through this square to his country house, and in 1779, Thomas Paine could have been seen hurrying through the square on his way to the coffee house, with his subscription of $500, to his friend Blair McLaughlin, to help George Washington's starving soldiers at Norristown, and later, in 1787 the man in the faded brown coat, with the model of his iron bridge, could have been seen in this square showing the same to Dr. Benjamin Franklin, and the members of the Philosophical Society, of which he received the degree of A. M. as a tribute for his scientific discoveries.

You children will soon be grown to men and women, and can view with pleasure the work you have done to-day. I take great pleasure in naming this tree, William R. McNeill, late president of the Lyceum, on this his 54th birthday.

Recitation: "Lines to Early Spring"—Wadsworth—Miss Florence C. Clark. Singing by the children of the Lyceum—"Star Spangled Banner."

Mrs. Henry M. Shupe, directress of the Lyceum, made a brief address which was followed by singing by the children.

The Lyceum children were then marched in double file through Independence Hall, and saluted the Liberty Bell, and the marble bust of Thomas Paine, in the main hall.

"Thou Shalt Not Covet."

There are but four words found in the bible that are of any practical value to the spirit of man, providing man obeys them. These words are found in the Tenth Commandment, and reads, "Thou shalt not covet."

Moses relegated the Commandment to the rear, when he assigned it to the tenth place, feeling, no doubt, that it was of the least importance as a Commandment, when compared with the balance of the commandments.

The duty of the church, then, is to lift the Tenth Commandment from its obscure position to the place now occupied by the First Commandment. As a commandment of real value to man, it should take precedence over every other Commandment, and be strictly obeyed. Murder, adultery, theft, false swearing, dishonoring father and mother cannot be considered as Commandments. They are Commandments, "Thou shalt not covet." All crime is preceded by covetousness; in its absence the 6th, 6th, 7th, 8th and 9th Commandments are superfluous.

A Little Pilgrim.

This is a charming narrative illustrating the beauty and grandeur and sublimity of the spirit side of life, the realms of souls, the immortal spheres of existence. Margaret O. W. Oliphant is the author. And while it has been read by millions in the past, it will prove refreshing and soul-inspiring to our readers to again peruse it and feel its thrills of inspiration, and enjoy its uplifting influence.

Chapter V.—Continued.

Pain was written in his face. I drew away to leave him room, with mingled pity and horror that this poor wretch should be the partner of the only shelter I could find within so short a time of my arrival. I who—It was horrible, shameful, humiliating; and yet the suffering in his wretched face was so evident that I could not but feel a pang of pity too. "I have nowhere to go," I said. "I am a stranger. I have been badly used, and nobody seems to care."

"No," he said, "nobody cares; don't you look for that. Why should they? Why, you look as if you were sorry for me! What a joke!" he murmured to himself—"what a joke! Sorry for some one else! What a fool the fellow must be!"

"Suffering! I should think I was," said the sick man; "but what is that to you? Yes; I've been here for years—oh, years! that means nothing—for longer than can be counted. Suffering is not the word. It's torture; it's agony! But you care? Take your leg out of my way."

I drew myself out of his way from a sort of habit, though against my will, and asked, from habit too, "Are you never any better than now?"

He looked at me more closely, and an air of astonishment came over his face. "What d'ye want here," he said, "pitying a man? That's something new here. No; I'm not always so bad, if you want to know. I get better, and then I go and do what makes me bad again, and that's how it will go on; and I choose it to be so, and you needn't bring any of your d-d pity here."

"I may ask, at least, why aren't you looked after? Why don't you get into some hospital?" I said.

"Hospital!" cried the sick man, and then he too burst into that furious laugh, the most awful sound I ever had heard. Some of the passers-by stopped to hear what the joke was, and surrounded me with once more a circle of mockers. "Hospitals! perhaps you would like a whole Red Cross Society, with ambulances and all arranged?" cried one. "Or the Misericordia!" shouted another. "I sprang up to my feet, crying, 'Why not?' with an impulse of rage which gave me strength. Was I never to meet with anything but this fiendish laughter? 'There's some authority, I suppose,' I cried in my fury. 'It is not the rabble that is the only master here, I hope.' But nobody took the least trouble to hear what I had to say for myself. The last speaker struck me on the mouth, and called me an accursed fool for talking of what I did not understand; and finally they all swept on and passed away."

I had been, as I thought, severely injured when I dragged myself into that corner to save myself from the crowd; but I sprang up now as if nothing had happened to me. My wounds had disappeared; my bruises were gone. I was as I had been when I dropped, giddy and amazed, upon the same pavement, how long—an hour?—before? It might have been a year, I cannot tell. The light was the same as ever, the thunderous atmosphere unchanged. Day, if it was day, had made no progress; night, if it was evening, had come no nearer,—all was the same.

As I went on again presently, with a vexed and angry spirit, regarding on every side around me the endless surging of the crowd, and feeling a loneliness, a sense of total abandonment and solitude, which I cannot describe, there came up to me a man of remarkable appearance. That he was a person of importance, of great knowledge and information, could not be doubted. He was very pale, and of a worn but commanding aspect. The lines of his face were deeply drawn; his eyes were sunk under high arched brows, from which they looked out as from caves, full of a fiery impatient light. His thin lips were never quite without a smile; but it was not a smile in which any pleasure was. He walked slowly, not hurrying, like most of the passers-by. He had a reflective look, as if pondering many things. He came up to me suddenly, without introduction or preliminary, and took me by the arm. "What object had you in talking of these antiquated institutions?" he said.

And I saw in his mind the gleam of the thought, which seemed to be the first with all, that I was a fool, and that it was the natural thing to wish me harm, just as in the earth above it was the natural thing, professed at least, to wish well, to say good-morning, good-day, by habit and without thought. In this strange country the stranger was received with a curse, and it took an answer not unlike the hasty "Curse you, then, also!" which seemed to come without any will of mine through my mind. But this provoked only a smile from my new friend. He took no notice. He was disposed to examine me, to find some amusement perhaps—how could I tell?—in what I might say.

"What antiquated things?" "Are you still so slow of understanding? What were they—hospitals? The pretences of a world that can still deceive itself. Did you expect to find them here?"

"I expected to find—how should I know?" I said, bewildered—"some shelter for a poor wretch where he could be cared for, not to be left there to die in the street. Expected! I never thought. I took it for granted."

"To die in the street!" he cried with a smile and shrug of his shoulders. "You'll learn better by and by. And if he did die in the street, what then? What is that to you?"

"To me!" I turned and looked at him, amazed; but he had somehow shut his soul, so that I could see nothing but the deep eyes in his caves, and the smile upon the close-shut mouth. "No more to me than to any one. I only spoke for humanity's sake, as—a fellow-creature."

My new acquaintance gave way to a silent laugh within himself, which was not so offensive as the loud laugh of the crowd; but yet was more exasperating than words can say. "You think that matters? But it does not hurt you that he should be in pain. It would do you no good if he were to get well. Why should you trouble yourself one way or the other? Let him die—if he can—That makes no difference to you or me."

"I must be dull indeed," I cried,—"slow of understanding, as you say. This is going back to the ideas of times beyond knowledge—before Christianity—" As soon as I had said this I felt somehow—I could not tell how—as if my voice jarred, as if something false and unnatural was in what I said. My companion gave me a twist as if with a shock of surprise then laughed in his inward way again.

"We don't think much of that here, nor of your modern pretences in general. The only thing that touches you and me is what hurts or helps ourselves. To be sure, it all comes to the same thing,—for I suppose it annoys you to see that wretch writhing; it hurts your more delicate, highly cultivated consciousness."

"If has nothing to do with my consciousness," I cried angrily; "it is a shame to let a fellow-creature suffer if we can prevent it."

"Why shouldn't he suffer?" said my companion. We passed as he spoke some other squalid, wretched creatures shuffling among the crowd, whom he kicked with his foot, calling forth a yell of pain and curses. This he regarded with a supreme contemptuous calm which stupefied me. Nor did any of the passers-by show the slightest inclination to take the part of the sufferers. They laughed, or shouted out a gibe, or what was still more wonderful, went on with a complete unaffected indifference, as if all this was natural. I tried to disengage my arm in horror and dismay, but he held me fast with a pressure that hurt me. "That's the question," he said. "What have we to do with it? Your fictitious consciousness makes it painful to you. To me, on the contrary, who take the same view of nature, it is a pleasurable feeling. It enhances the amount of ease, whatever that may be, which I enjoy. I am in no pain. That brute who is"—and he flicked with a stick he carried the uncovered wound of a wretch upon the roadside—"makes me more satisfied with my condition. Ah! you think it is I who am the brute? You will change your mind by and by."

"Never!" I cried, wrenching my arm from his with an effort, "if I should live a hundred years."

"A hundred years,—a drop in the bucket!" he said with his silent laugh. "You will live forever, and you will come to my view; and we shall meet in the course of ages, from time to time, to compare notes. I would say good-bye after the old fashion, but you are but newly arrived, and I will not treat you so badly as that." With which he parted from me, waving his hand, with his everlasting horrible smile.

"Good-bye!" I said to myself, "good-bye! why should I be treating me badly to say good-bye?"

I was startled by a buffet on the mouth. "Take that!" cried some one, "to teach you how to wish the worst of tortures to people who have done you no harm."

"What have I said? I meant no harm; I repeated only what is the commonest civility, the merest good manners."

"You wished," said the man who had struck me,—"I won't repeat the words; to me, for it was I only that heard them, the awful company that hurls most, that sets everything before us, both past and to come, and cuts like a sword and burns like fire. I'll say it to yourself, and see how it feels. God be with you! There! it is said, and we all must bear it, thanks, you fool and accursed, to you."

And then there came a pause over all the place, an awful stillness,— hundreds of men and women standing, clutching with desperate movements at their hearts as if to tear them out, moving their heads as if to dash them against the wall, wringing their hands, with a look upon their convulsed faces which I can never forget. They all turned to me, cursing me with those horrible eyes of anguish. And everything was still; the noise all stopped for a moment, the air all silent, with a silence that could be felt. And then suddenly out of the crowd there came a great piercing cry; and everything began again exactly as before.

While this pause occurred, and while I stood wondering, bewildered, understanding nothing, there came over me a darkness, a blackness, a sense of misery such as never in all my life—though I have known troubles enough—I had felt before. All that had happened to me through-out my existence seemed to rise pale and terrible in a hundred scenes before me,—all momentary, intense, as if each was present moment. And in each of these scenes I saw what I had never seen before: I saw where I had taken the wrong instead of the right step, in what wantonness, with what self-will it had been done; how God (I shuddered at the name) had spoken and called me, and even entreated; and I had withstood and refused.

All the evil I had done came back, and spread itself before my eyes; and I loathed it, yet knew that I had chosen it, and that it would be with me forever. I saw it all in the twinkling of an eye, in a moment, while I stood there, and all men with me, in the horror of awful thought. Then it ceased as it had come, instantaneously, and the noise and the laughter, and the quarrels and cries, and all the commotion of this new bewildering place, in a moment began again. I had seen no one while this strange paroxysm lasted. When it disappeared, I came to myself, emerging as from a dream, and looked into the face of the man whose words, not careless like mine, had brought it upon us. Our eyes met, and his were surrounded by curves and lines of anguish which were terrible to see.

"Well," he said, with a short laugh, which was forced and harsh, "how do you like it? That is what happens when—If it came often, who could endure it?" He was not like the rest. There was no sneer upon his face, no gibe at my simplicity. Even now, when all had recovered, he was still quivering with something that looked like a nobler pain. His face was very grave, the lines deeply drawn in it; and he seemed to be seeking no amusement or distraction, nor to take any part in the noise and tumult which was going on around.

"Do you know what that cry meant?" he said. "Did you hear that cry? It was some one who says—ever here once in a long time, they say, it can be seen."

"What can be seen?" He shook his head, looking at me with a meaning which I could not interpret. It was beyond the range of my thoughts. I came to know after, or I never could have made this record. But on that subject he said no more. He turned the way I was going, though it mattered nothing what way I went, for all were the same to me. "You are one of the new-comers," he said; "you have not been long here."

"Tell me," I cried, "what you mean by here. Where are we? How can one tell who has fallen—he knows not whence or where? What is this place? I have never seen anything like it. It seems to me that I hate it already, though I know not what it is."

He shook his head once more. "You will hate it more and more," he said; "but of these dreadful streets you will never be free, unless—And here he stopped again.

"Unless—what? If it is possible, I will be free from them, and that before long."

He smiled at me faintly, as we smile at children, but not with derision.

"How shall you do it? Between this miserable world and all others, there is a great gulf fixed. It is full of all bitterness and tears that come from all the universe. Those drop from them, but stagnate here. We, you perceive, have no tears, not even at moments—Then, 'You will soon be accustomed to all this,' he said. 'You will fall into the way. Perhaps, you will be able to amuse yourself to make it passable. Many do. There are a number of fine things to be seen here. If you are curious come with me and I will show you. Or work—there is even work. There is only one thing that is possible, or if not possible—And here he paused again and raised his eyes to the dark clouds and lurid sky overhead. "The man who gave that cry! If I could but find him! he must have seen—"

"What could he see?" I asked. But there arose in my mind something like contempt. A visionary! who could not speak plainly, who broke off into mysterious inferences, and appeared to know more than he could say. It seemed foolish to waste time, when evidently there was still so much to see, in the company of such a man; and I began already to feel more at home. There was something in that moment of anguish which had wrought a strange familiarity in me with my surroundings. It was so great a relief to return out of the misery of that sharp and horrible self-realization, to what had come to be, in comparison, easy and well known. I had no desire to go back and grope among the mysteries and anguish so suddenly revealed. I was glad to be free from them, to be left to myself, to get a little pleasure, perhaps, like the others. While these thoughts passed through my mind, I had gone on without any active impulse of my own, as everybody else did; and my latest companion had disappeared. He said, no doubt, without any need for words, what my feelings were. And I proceeded on my way. I felt better, as I got more accustomed to the place, or perhaps it was the sensation of relief after that moment of indescribable pain. As for the sights in the street, I began to grow used to them. The wretched creatures who strolled on at about with signs of sickness or wounds upon them disgusted me only, they no longer called forth my pity. I began to feel ashamed of my silly questions about the hospital. All the same, it would have been a good thing to have had some receptacle for them, into which they might have been driven out of the way. I felt an inclination to push them aside as I saw other people do, but was a little ashamed of that impulse too; and so I went on. There seemed no quiet streets, so far as I could make out, in the place. Some were smaller, narrower, with a different kind of passengers, but the same hubbub and unresting movement everywhere. I saw no signs of melancholy or seriousness; active pain, violence, brutality, the continual shock of quarrels and blows, but no pensive faces about, no sorrowfulness, nor the kind of trouble which brings thought. Everybody was fully occupied, pushing on as if in a race, pausing for nothing.

The glitter of the lights, the shouts and sounds of continual going, the endless whirl of passers-by, confused and tired me after a while. I went as far as I could go to what seemed the outskirts of the place, where I could by glimpses perceive a low horizon all lurid and glowing, which seemed to sweep round and round. Against it in the distance stood up the outline, back against the red glow, of other towers and house-tops, so many and great that there was evidently another town between us and the sunset, if sunset it was. I have seen a western sky like it when there were storms about, and all the colors of the sky were heightened and darkened by angry influences. The distant town rose against it, cutting the firmament so that it might have been tongues of flame flickering between the dark solid outlines; and across the waste open country which lay between the two cities there came a distant hum like the sound of the sea, which was in reality the roar of that other multitude. The country between showed no greenness or beauty; it lay under the dark overhanging sky. Here and there, seemed a cluster of giant trees scathed as if by lightning, their bare boughs standing up as high as the distant towers, their trunks like black columns, without foliage. Openings here and there, with glimmering lights, looked like the mouths of mines, or of passers-by, there were scarcely any; a figure here and there flew along as if pursued, imperfectly seen, a shadow, only a little darker than the spaces about. And in contrast with the sound of the city, here was no sound at all, except the low roar on either side, and a vague cry or two from the openings of the mine,—a scene all drawn in darkness, in variations of gloom, deriving scarcely any light at all from the red and gloomy burning of that distant evening sky.

A faint curiosity to go forwards, to see what the mines were, perhaps to get a share in what was brought up from them, crossed my mind. But I was afraid of the dark, of the wild uninhabited savage look of the landscape; though when I thought of it, there seemed no reason why a narrow stretch of country between two great towns should be alarming. But the impression was strong and above reason. I turned back to the street in which I had first alighted, and which seemed to end in a great square full of people. In the middle there was a stage erected, from which some one was delivering an oration of some sort. He stood beside a long table, upon which lay something which I could not clearly distinguish, except that it seemed alive, and moved, or rather writhed with convulsive twitches, as if trying to get free of the bonds which confined it. Round the stage in front were a number of seats occupied by listeners, many of whom were women, whose interest seemed to be very great, some of them being furnished with note-books; while a great unsettled crowd coming and going, drifted round,—many, arrested for a time as they passed, proceeding on their way when the interest flagged, as is usual to such open-air assemblies.

California State Convention.

The convention of the California State Spiritualist Association on Friday, Saturday and Sunday, April 13, 14, and 15, at Santa Barbara, Cal., was a great success. Officers of the state board present from San Francisco, President Arthur S. Howe and wife, State Organizer Allen F. Brown and wife, State Treasurer Mrs. Mollie Phelps. These speakers and other local talent, including Mrs. Mary C. Vasek of Los Angeles, awakened great interest in the cause. The board left for Los Angeles on April 17, and were hospitably entertained. W. C. Bowman of Los Angeles, and Mrs. Lily Thibault of San Bernardino, director of the state board added their testimony to the work of organization.

A grand meeting of three days promised, and despite the fact that San Francisco is the home of the president and state organizer, Los Angeles rejoices that they and their wives were in Los Angeles at the time of the awful disaster.

Subscribers of the Occidental Mystic will please be patient, as without doubt the entire plant of its editor, A. S. Howe, was destroyed. But an effort will be made to renew its publication as soon as possible.

BILLINGS, MONTANA.

A New Lyceum Organized, and Other Good Work.

We now have a lyceum in Billings, Mont. We have called it the "Sunlight," and it is doing finely.

Mrs. Carrie Smith has been in charge of it, and is doing everything possible to make the meetings attractive and interesting to the children and their parents.

We celebrated the fifty-eighth anniversary of Modern Spiritualism with a meeting, in which the children took part. We had an excellent musical program, recitations and addresses by members of our society here, and the affair was a decided success in every way.

Easter Sunday was also observed with a special program for the lyceum children, and many of the little ones gave recitations and songs, ending with a military drill in which both children and grown-ups took part.

I want especially to mention the excellent work which has been done here by Mrs. Wya McCoy, who has been serving our society since last November. I am sure that few could have filled Mrs. McCoy's place here and given such complete satisfaction as she has, in her test work and in her social relation with those with whom she has come in contact. Mrs. McCoy has made many warm friends here, and has been instrumental in making the cause of Spiritualism respected here.

We are to have a state convention June 2, 3 and 4. We are expecting visitors from the other cities of the state, and hope to make the convention a step in the advancement of the work in Montana.

We are planning to have an auditorium of our own some time in the near future, although for the present, Eureka Hall is sufficiently large for our meetings.

We are expecting the Rev. Moses Hull on 28th of June to give us a series of lectures.

We have been having an interesting series of lectures here the past two weeks, the speaker being Dr. Alexander J. McIvor-Tyndall of England. Dr. McIvor-Tyndall is an attractive and cultured speaker, and has been very successful here in interesting large numbers of our best known people.

He is on his way East from California and stopped over here in response to a personal letter I sent him, asking him to give us a few days.

Although Dr. McIvor-Tyndall is not affiliated with any special society or organization, he evidently believes in and approves of the claims of Spiritualism, as his lectures are full of spiritualistic statements. He calls his work psychic science, and his private classes, which I had the pleasure of attending, are more in the line of Psychology and metaphysics, because, he says, he believes that one of the great needs of to-day is to develop the individual soul to a plane where we may readily come in rapport with the higher intelligences of the spirit world.

He has already delivered the following lectures here, and has promised to speak on "The Truth About Spiritualism" before he leaves.

We feel very grateful to Dr. McIvor-Tyndall, because he has interested many people here who were prejudiced against Spiritualism, and the newspapers, which are not given to reporting lectures favorable to our cause have been glad to get full reports of Dr. McIvor-Tyndall's lectures.

I enclose a review taken from the Helena Independent, as it is longer than the one in our home paper, on the subject, "Proofs of Immortality."

Other subjects upon which Dr. McIvor-Tyndall has spoken here are: The Devil's Den, The World Invisible, The Call of the Century, Mental Shackles, Telepathy, and Dangers in Psychic Research. I feel that it would be difficult to overestimate the good Dr. McIvor-Tyndall is doing in Montana, and possibly he reaches more people, working as he does independently, than if he came under the direct classification of Spiritualism.

Letter From Nellie S. Baade.

The First Association of Spiritualists of Washington, D. C., are certainly a credit to the cause they so ably represent.

The Ladies' Auxiliary with a membership of about sixty people, several of them resident mediums, meet every Thursday evening at the home of the president, Mr. Wood, where each and all do their best to make it a source of pleasure and instruction concerning the spiritual nature of the hour.

Last evening recitations from two of the Lyceum scholars were a great credit to their instructors. Goldie Evans, a young Miss of eleven years, who is developing wonderful inspirational powers and mediumship of the highest order, is the grand-daughter of J. H. Nixon, Spring Hill, Kansas.

Little Goldie's prospects are favorable for becoming a bright and shining light in the cause of Spiritualism, which has been made possible through her faithful instructors at home and in the Lyceum. Too much praise cannot be given Mrs. M. J. Stephens, the conductor of the Lyceum. Always at her post, faithful in the discharge of her spiritual duties, also a fine test medium.

Last Sunday, being Easter, the children were remembered and enjoyed the occasion. With the eggs typical of life, with songs, recitations and congratulations extended each to the other, and the hall laden with the perfume of lilies and roses, we all felt inspired to press on to the goal of our high calling. The services gave lectures suitable to the occasion, followed by spiritual messages.

There have been no transitions from this society during the past year, but at present Mrs. Collins lies dangerously ill at her home. We are all sending out best thought for her speedy return to health and happiness. She is a medium of remarkable ability, and has many friends here as elsewhere. She is an earnest teacher of the Lyceum, and is a power for good.

As the time draws near for my departure, it is with a feeling of sincere regret, for I have enjoyed every moment of the time since coming here, and shall be loath to part with the dear people of Washington.

JUST JIM.

Such merry laughter I heard one day From some children's voices, of mirth and glee; I stopped to listen along the way, And smiled them down under a walnut tree.

Then with a laugh they scampered away, Along down the path by the brook-side's brim, And each one cried with a whoop! and hey! "Hello! Now I bet you can't catch me, Jim!"

Then, by and by, as they came to rest Near the grapevine swing close by where I stood, A man came down from the hillock's crest, And a dog sprang gayly from out the wood.

"Come, tell me your name, my little man?"

"It's Basil, please sir!" the elder one said; "And what is yours? tell me if you can?"

"Why, mine's only Mark," and he hung his head.

"And where is Jim, then? I pray you tell."

"Up there!" and they smilingly beckoned him.

"Why, he is your grandpa! I know him well; His name is Mark, too; so it can't be Jim!"

"Oh, he is our Jim, sir; don't you see? And every day 'fore the sun goes dim, He comes to play with us under the tree, He ain't an old grandpa—he's just our Jim!"

"And, oh, we're so happy! Every day We come to the woodland to wait for him— All the bright days from the first of May, And just 'cause we love him, we call him Jim!"

Oh, happy children! when youth has fled, Will they always keep that pet name for him?

When the grass grows green above his head, Will they love him still? will they call him Jim?

A time rolls on, life's autumn appears— When their hair is white and their eyes grow dim, And care and toils have come with the years— To their children's children, will they be Jim?

Ah, well! with us all may some dear, fond name Live green in our hearts while the suns grow dim! With the changing years let there still remain Some dear loved form, who is only— Just Jim!

TRIBUTE TO THOMAS PAINE.

The Patriot, the Free Thinker, the Great Man of the Age and Time, and the One Whose Name is Still Honored.

Arbor Day in this city was celebrated by the Philadelphia Spiritual Society by planting an Oriental Plane Tree in Independence Square, by addresses by Samuel Wheeler and Edgar W. Emerson, assisted by the great cellars and children of the Lyceum.

Mr. Wheeler spoke of the great celebration of the last three days in honor of Benjamin Franklin, the friend of Thomas Paine, whose religion was to do good, and all mankind were his brethren and that of the original trees in the square that had sheltered the signers of the Declaration of Independence, but few remained. Here on this sacred piece of ground many illustrious spirits hovered around. A century and a quarter ago, when the immortal Declaration was read by John Dixon, on July 8th, from yonder window in the Philosophical Society, under the shade of that decaying oak tree, stood Thomas Paine and Robert Morris, Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson, and some Indians; by yonder stately elm stood Benjamin Ray and the great Stephen Girard had many a time passed through this square to his country house, and in 1779, Thomas Paine could have been seen hurrying through the square on his way to the coffee house, with his subscription of $500, to his friend Blair McClurgan, to help George Washington's starving soldiers at Norristown, and later, in 1787 the man in the faded brown coat, with the model of his iron bridge, could have been seen in this square showing the same to Dr. Benjamin Franklin, and the members of the Philosophical Society of which he received the degree of A. M. as a tribute for his scientific discoveries.

You children will soon be grown to men and women, and can view with pleasure the work you have done to-day. I take great pleasure in naming this tree, William R. McGlenn, late president of the Lyceum, on this his 54th birthday.

Recitation: "Lines to Early Spring"—Wadsworth—Miss Florence C. Clark. Singing by the children of the Lyceum—"Star Spangled Banner."

Mrs. Henry M. Shupe, directress of the Lyceum, made a brief address which was followed by singing by the children.

The Lyceum children were then marched in double file through Independence Hall, and saluted the Liberty Bell, and the marble bust of Thomas Paine, in the main hall.

"Thou Shalt Not Covet."

There are but four words found in the bible that are of any practical value to the spirit of man, providing man obeys them. Those words are found in the Tenth Commandment, and reads, "Thou shalt not covet."

Moses relegated the Commandment to the rear, when he assigned it to the tenth place, feeling, no doubt, that it was the least important as a Commandment, when compared with the balance of the commandments.

The duty of the church, then, is to lift the Tenth Commandment from its obscure position to the place now occupied by the First Commandment. As a commandment of real value to man, it should take precedence over every other Commandment, and be strictly obeyed. Murder, adultery, theft, false swearing, dishonoring father and mother cannot be considered as Commandments. They are Commandments, "Thou shalt not covet." All crime is preceded by covetousness; in its absence the 6th, 6th, 7th, 8th and 9th Commandments are superfluous.

LEGERDEMAIN INFERNALISM

The articles now running in The Progressive Thinker will open the eyes of Spiritualists as never before. All along the line The Progressive Thinker has awakened a feeling that will not subside until all the charlatans shall have been driven from our ranks, or sent behind the bars as Mr. Maybee was. The exposure of Mr. and Mrs. Amundson of Minneapolis, Minn., illustrates most graphically the condition of our cause. For years little children, old men, old women, Indians, etc., have "materialized" at their seances—every one a fraud—nothing but deception throughout—Infernalism itself instead of unsullied Spiritualism! Oh! Angels of Light, Love and Purity, how long must Spiritualism endure the practice of Legerdemain Infernalism?

There is a great commotion to-day throughout the entire ranks of Spiritualism on account of the deep-seated hold the fakes have on our ranks. Medium after medium is exposed perpetrating their various satanic methods of deception, and thus illustrating the necessity of vigorous action on the part of all friends of honest mediumship and pure Spiritualism. For many years Spiritualism has presented to the scrutinizing public an UGLY ULCER, an ulcer that has NAUSEATED THOUSANDS of Spiritualists themselves, and to-day it is being probed as never before.

That ulcer had for a long time been carefully concealed, and to mention it was criminal, would arouse intense opposition, strife, hatred, and vexatious difficulties too numerous to mention.

Two years ago we resolved to do one of two things—either retire from the management of The Progressive Thinker, or probe this ulcer TO THE VERY CORE. After mature reflections, and AFTER MANY VISIONS, indeed, as we believe, by exalted spirits, we resolved to pursue the latter course, and we have been doing it right along, and shall continue in the same course until that ulcer is healed—a course that every rational Spiritualist will endorse.

The constant accumulation of data

Tom Sawyer's power to get some one else to whitewash a fence by gently convincing his comrades that whitewashing is not work but play of the most alluring species, and to exact from them a premium to revel in the fun of whitewashing, cannot compare with the gentle art of C. Amundson, "phenomenal psychic," who has collected thousands from an unsuspecting public by convincing them that his wife, seances in black and white gowns, in the absence of light is a veritable legion of spirits.

For years Mrs. Amundson, incorporeal, has been worth her weight in gold, but to-day she has lost her incorporeal asset, and the goose that laid the golden egg in the Amundson household has met with a violent death. The incorporeal duties of Mrs. Amundson have been dispensed with, and the shades of "Bob Kelly," which knew her once shall know her no more.

Tom Sawyer's aunt soon convinced her nephew's friends that whitewashing, after all, was work, and an equally powerful agent last week convinced several hundred in St. Paul and Minneapolis that it takes more than black and white gowns and a flimsy veil of white silk to make a spirit out of any man's wife.

There was something pathetic as well as tragic in the unmasking of the two "spirit mediums" in that little home in Southeast Minneapolis. By one fell swoop Amundson's system was swept to the winds. He had paid dearly to acquire the skill which, right after night, held in thrall the educated as well as the ignorant and illiterate.

Exchanges Wife for Power.

Years ago he was attacked by a serious illness which made it necessary for him to seek an easier trade than the one he was following. At that time there came across his path a woman in magic, a creator, as he termed it, of "bogus mediums." He took this man into his home and in return for a series of lectures on how to become a medium, Amundson fed him and housed him.

Not content with pulling off the masks, the exposing party went behind the scenes and in the investigation which followed a mass of information on "fake" Spiritualism was gathered which would fill a work of many volumes as of interesting reading as the "Arabian Nights."

Worked Many Games.

Amundson's reward was not confined to the entry of which he charged, nor the various extras collected for photographs which he made of the spirits as they floated before his gruesome looking cabinet. He exerted an influence over the daily conduct and the destinies of his victims. One old man was induced through message from the spirits, perhaps a message from "Bob Kelly," the master spirit, to go to Canada and dispose of mining interests which the spirits advised him to sell. For this valuable information he was induced to relinquish $1,000, with a promise of an additional thousand before May 1. This devotee of Amundson's brand of Spiritualism is still away in his spirit errand.

One woman confesses that for months she had done washing at the Amundson residence, and instead of receiving money for her labor she was induced to sit for spirit messages and the materialization of other of the side lines of the convincing Amundson. The spirits apprised her of the fact that it was good for her health to wash and clean and that her labor would meet a rich reward in the spirit land.

Miss the Dog Healer.

Since the exposing of Amundson the neighbors about his home have missed a familiar figure known as "the dog healer." He was once a great healer, but lost his power through the holding of a dog. He had deplored his skill in making so low and was in search of in regard to the deception being practiced in our ranks, presents a spectacle that is TRULY APPALLING! You who do not have this data before you; you who rest quietly in your own secluded home singing "The Sweet By and By," "Nearer, My God, to Thee," excluding all unpleasant thoughts from your minds, regaling yourself in the sweet nectar of a self-satisfied consciousness, and not wanting to "defile" yourselves by thinking about anything "unclean," have little or no conception of the extent that legerdemain Spiritualism has been fostered and practiced at camp-meetings and among the public generally, and it is YOU who generally oppose this cleaning process, this probing process, this effort to purify the MOST GLORIOUS TRUTH that ever was presented to mortals. It is YOUR lamentable ignorance, ascribing everything to the "spirits" when you can not "understand" how the "phenomena" could be produced otherwise, that has encouraged the fakes.

And now comes the exposure of two most "remarkable" mediums, Mr. and Mrs. C. Amundson, who reside at 1125 Sixth street southeast, Minneapolis, Minn. For years they have been carrying on their appalling deception, their legerdemain Spiritualism, and at any time they could have produced af-

the lost touch when he wandered into one of Amundson's seances. The spirits became especially active over the professor and promised a full restoration of his powers if he would only hold his chair down long enough. Through the assistance of "Bob Kelly," his wonderful healing power was to be brought back. "Bob Kelly," Mrs. Amundson in black tights, told him that to regain his skill he must perform certain duties, such as sawing and splitting wood and the performance of general household duties about the Amundson house, so as to be constantly within range of the spirits. "Bob Kelly" in his messages dubbed Amundson "vice-regent of the spirits on earth plane." He is still in quest of the lost "touch."

So confident was Amundson of his grip upon his followers that he dispensed with the usual precautions when as cabinet guide he sent the spirits forth. They mingled in the most familiar way with the members of the circle, and "Bob Kelly" used to roll about the parlor floor at the very feet of the astonished corporeals.

Classes of Manifestation.

There are five classes of manifestations which were commonly practiced by Amundson, and under these five heads the usual evening seance was given. Some features were done in the light, but most of them in the dark. First of all, materialization of the spirit of "Bob Kelly" must come in order to make the conditions favorable for the entry of the other spirits. In Mr. Amundson's system, "Kelly" was known as the chemist spirit. He is the spirit which paves the way for all the other manifestations. He determines what form the subsequent manifestations shall take, and as chemist he manufactures their clothes. He is the only spirit which is beyond doubt mere thin air.

It was very vital to the success of the expose that "Kelly" should come out of the cabinet that evening. If "Kelly" had not, then all their labors would have been in vain. If "Snow Flake" had been caught or the spirits of the innumerable Indian guides, who were supposed to be tutelary spirits, had been grabbed, Amundson could have extricated himself by saying that the manifestation was impersonation and the spirit had taken possession of his wife as a medium.

But with "Bob Kelly" caught in the flesh, there was no appeal. It was a blow at the foundation of his system. On his own confession, "Bob" was the real spook, the chief spirit. He materialized through his own free will. The suspense of the circle that evening of the expose, caused by fear that "Bob Kelly" would not appear because conditions would be declared unfavorable by Amundson, was intense. For sake that reason everyone in the circle was just as good and unsuspecting as he or she could be.

When Mrs. Amundson first enters the cabinet, which is built across one corner of the room, she is dressed in a black dress and loose blouse. If any one is observant, it can be noted that she is rather bulky and seems to be carrying a load under that quiet and unassuming dress. From the cabinet runs a long rope, regulating a kerosene lamp in one corner of the room, the end of which hangs from one corner of the cabinet. The spirits are supposed to use this to regulate the light, making conditions the best for their entry into the mystic circle before the cabinet. A music box is usually started in order to set in vibration the ether waves upon which the spirits descend at ease. Those in the circle before the cabinet must join hands and cast their best thoughts toward the cabinet in order to make the circuit and create a battery from which the spirits draw strength to make their terrestrial appearance. Fake mediums always operate in pairs, usually a man and wife. The wife, as in Mrs. Amundson's case, us-duvants from insatiable gullibilities that their spirit manifestations were absolutely genuine. To such an extent was this endorsement of fraudulent mediums been carried on, that the history of Spiritualism WILL HAVE TO BE RE-WRITTEN in a measure, and the questionable spirit manifestations eliminated therefrom.

The deception practiced by Mr. and Mrs. Amundson in Minneapolis for years has been CRUEL, HEARTLESS, SATANIC! It was practiced under the holy name of Spiritualism. Sacred songs were sung to render more secure the tricks performed. Under the guise of angels, satanic orgies took place. Mothers, looking for their dear ones in spirit life, were heartlessly deceived by a woman dressed in tights. And such deception has been going on for years! It has defiled every city. It has injured our camp-meetings! It has disgusted the angel world! It has made, in the estimation of the public, fakes and Spiritualism almost synonymous in meaning!

SPRIT RETRN. IF UNDEFILED BY THE FAKER ELEMENT, WOULD LEAD THE WORLD! IT WOULD ENTER EVERY HOME, AND BECOME THE GREAT PURIFIER OF RELIGION, POLITICS AND BUSINESS.

usually acts as a medium and takes her position within the cabinet, while the husband as cabinet tender sits near the entrance. It is the duty of the cabinet tender to place in a circle all those attending the seance. There is method in this. If he knows anyone to be unfriendly and fears that he or she might be tempted to test the etheric realm of a spirit by attempting to grab it, such a person is given a seat far in the rear and watched closely. The faithful are given a seat near the cabinet so the released spirits may operate without any great fear of being embraced.

Don't Grab the Spirits.

"Don't grab the spirits," is the written law of all such seances. It is explained by the cabinet tender that such an infraction of the rule might cause hemorrhage of the medium and even death. Amundson obviously explained on the evening of the exposing that a person at a recent seance had grabbed a spirit and the medium had a sore arm for weeks.

When the cabinet tender informs those in the circle that they are paying for the medium's time and the rent of the chair upon which they are sitting, and not for the manifestations they may see, the medium makes a bow and disappears within the darkness of the gloomy cabinet. There is a sliding door to the cabinet and also curtains. The sliding door is to be used when a curious person attempts to invade the sanctities of the cabinet after a spirit has retreated within. That gives the medium time to change garments before the door is beaten down.

As the medium cheerily bows to the circle before her, each member smilingly says good-night and she departs to go into her trance and yield up her own self to the approaching spirits. The wooden shutter goes down before the kerosene lamp in the corner of the room. Members of the circle tighten grips in their anticipation of a communion with the spirits.

"Snow Flake" Appears.

The white figure of a child appears before the curtain. It is "Snow Flake," the cabinet guide. Members of the circle picture some child of theirs claimed by the angels of death on the childish face of "Snow Flake" crouching realistically before the cabinet door. Tears come to their eyes and they appeal to "Snow Flake" to guide the spirit of their lost child to them.

Masks off! Who is "Snow Flake?" Nothing but the crouching figure of Mrs. Amundson swaying back and forth on her knees, making a bow and summing childish tones and grinning upon the excited members of the circle. A brown curly wig which she has drawn from a little black bag bound under her dress gives her head the appearance of that of a child. A child's toy chair at her side, together with a number of toys, make the delusion complete. A silk heavy veil thrown over her crouching, swaying form gives the appearance in the imperfect light of the child's white shroud. At a signal from Amundson she departs to make up for another spirit.

Between the two there exists a code of signals indicative of friendly or unfriendly conditions. "Can't you come out," means get back as quick as you can. "Come out dear, yes, that is right, come along," means that the coast is clear, and no enemy lurks in the circle to clasp her in his embrace.

"Bob Kelly" Is Next.

If the seance is to go on "Bob Kelly" must now appear. He is the chemical spirit who paves the way for all the other manifestations. At this point, in order to give Mrs. Amundson time to divest herself of her skirts, the circle is sanctimoniously requested by Mr. Amundson to sing "Nearer, My God, to Thee," while the lightning chain, made by his spouse, is used. Three verses of the hymn, usually given her time enough to make up as "Bob Kelly." The hymn ceases, hands tighten again, the shutter descends on the lamp and darkness falls over everything. It is impossible even to see a hand before your face. Mysterious knockings are heard, for which the foot of Mr. Amundson is responsible, but those in the circle in their excitement think that the sounds denote the activity of approaching spirits following in their advance. "Kelly" is "Kelly," advances. On his breast is a luminous anchor. He drops to his knees, and is seen either to splice a piece of rope or make a flag, which he afterward delivers to a member of the circle who draws back in terror, but yet is flattered at receiving so much attention from a spirit like "Kelly," who has within all the degrees of the spirit world which has inhabited for 1,500 years and is now its ruler.

Spirits Let Loose.

"Kelly" soon disappears behind the cabinet, and then the spirit world is let loose. Mrs. Amundson has redressed by this time and is back upon the chair within the cabinet and in a trace, again to be taken possession of by the spirits which Kelly's shade has made possible.

At this point Mrs. Amundson puts on the regalia of an Indian chief with feathers illuminated by luminous paint, and commences with the band of feathers is a copper nose piece which fits over her nose, and which makes her look like an Indian. Dressed in this garb, she goes forth as an Indian guide, either as "White Feathers," "Gray Feathers," or an indefinite number of Indian chiefs. Each one in the circle has an Indian guide and Mrs. Amundson hovers over each of them in her Indian disguise, touching and even caressing them, but on pain of killing the medium—Mrs. Amundson within the cabinet—they must not grab the spirit.

The spirits, says the sign over the mantelpiece, want to feel free to come out to their friends. If too effusive a welcome is accorded then they will shrink back in sheer bashfulness. In time the Indian guides return to their ethereal tepees behind the confines of the back cabinet, and while Mrs. Amundson is divesting herself of the Indian regalia, the circle sings by way of inspiration another hymn, accompanied by the music box and the mysterious knockings of Mr. Amundson's No. 11 shoes.

Then in rapid succession come the spirits of the deceased relatives of friends of those sitting in the circle. Repeated visits have enabled the medium to learn volumes concerning the history of her guests, and inquiry on the outside has supplemented what was not voluntarily given. Stored in the little black bags about her person she has the names and addresses of nearly all the departed spirits of some of the relatives and friends of those in the circle. All this is called impersonation.

This grows wearisome in time and the circle calls for another form of manifestation—etherification, it may be, if "Bob Kelly" rules it. This is produced by Mrs. Amundson throwing out a vague white shroud to which are affixed several luminous pictures of departed persons. These pictures are painted in flesh colors and with paint which shines brightly in the dark. The delusion is complete and the pictures have the appearance in the dark of being human beings, although if any member of the circle happens to get a side glance at the device he would be readily discovered that the spirit had a very fat face.

Pictures of dead relatives" are secured by the fakes, and they paint them on these cards and reveal them at opportune times. Hundreds have been deceived into believing they were looking upon the faces of their departed loved ones and friends. By bowing down, another picture can be made to stand up without the medium going into the cabinet. This is termed transfiguration. One picture shown is of a Mr. Wilson and his daughter. Their pictures were made to work overtime in the Amundson establishment.

Flower Materialization.

One of the other forms of deception is flower materialization. This is done in the daylight, and the medium draws flowers with broken stems from under a table, which indicates that the spirits have made a visitation to some place where the flowers grow. Mrs. Amundson does this trick by legerdemain. The flowers in some manner are extricated from the folds of her dress.

Then there is slate-writing, which is done by the medium holding the slate on her knee in one hand and placing the other hand on the table before members of the circle. The slates are done, so that the seance may be made to appear to be a message which is represented was written by the spirits.

Other slates are prepared in advance with paintings of flowers and elaborate messages. When the members first see the slates thus prepared the writing and pictures are concealed by means of false faces of slates. The cabinet tender then places the slates under the table the false plates are quickly removed by the medium and the prepared message is handed back. A charge of 50 cents is made for this. A member complained about the price to Amundson, and off his guard, Amundson said:

"Why that is cheap. It took me two days to make it. I had to raise the price."

Flowers often come between the slates. Those who have lost relatives by drowning often get messages on slates filled with water. Mrs. Amundson has a syringe filled with water from which she pumps water into the slates.

Spirit Photography.

One of the greatest sources of income is derived from spirit photography. Victims are induced to pay large sums of money for what is represented to be a picture of the departed. It is often a puzzle to explain how the medium gets a photograph of the dead person in order to secure the correct likeness from the spirit "photograph." But the fakers rely on the fallibility of human memory, and in most cases little suspicion is aroused as to how the likeness is secured.

The victim is usually induced to bring the picture to the seance, and the "seance" is placed in the covers of the slates, he slips it into the cabinet. The medium seizes it, passes it out by a secret door, where a photograph is made within a very few moments. In other cases women at the seances leave their handbags on the backs of chairs or among their wraps. These are usually secured by the medium, and the information concerning the family history of members of the circle. Pictures are often obtained this way. This reason advanced by the medium for requesting a member of the circle to bring a photograph is that it magnetizes the cabinet.

In case the photograph is not brought to the seance, the medium takes the person who has neglected in obeying her suggestion, ostensibly to visit, but before she leaves she either manages to steal a photograph or take a snapshot of one by means of a pocket camera.

Pictures Are Uncanny.

Most of the spirit pictures have an uncanny appearance. The faces are usually blurred and very white. This is usually due to the poor snapshots taken of the originals, which must be done at the highest point of speed. Even this tends to strengthen the faith of the victim, for the picture to him looks ethereal.

Any sum of money is extorted for these cheap reproductions which the victim will give. Some have paid as high as $25 for nothing more than a false reproduction of a photograph of a deceased member of his family. Pictures which are represented to be spirit photographs of the Indian guides also are sold. They are crayon sketches of the ordinary type of Indian heads and bring as high as $15 apiece. Amundson had them turned out by the hundreds by a Minneapolis artist.

The believer in true Spiritualism does not recognize or sanction any of the forms of manifestation practiced by the fakers. They have a sacred and righteous conviction of the hereafter, and hold in reverence all the accepted tenets relative to it. These so-called spirit mediums usually receive their worst rebuff from the genuine Spiritualists.

Must Collect Data.

Success in the work depends upon the ability of the fakers to collect data concerning their patrons. Every spare minute is spent in running down the minutest details respecting them, and each fact is carefully jotted down in a book. As patrons come to have confidence in a medium they unconsciously confide much of their history to him, especially the circumstances regarding the taking off of their beloved ones. None of this is lost on the medium, but carefully noted to be used at a later date.

The patient may forget in time just what was told the medium, and when from the cabinet they hear repeated the very facts they themselves once told they think it wonderful and become converts to the system. When the raid was made in the hand of Amundson there was a small white card upon which were written the names of the particular spirits which his wife had revealed and incidentally some connection with members of the circle that had gathered that evening. Among the names on the card were the following: Ethel, John, Gladys, Florence, Judge Lemon of Maryland. The latter is called out each evening and appears to be a general utility spirit.

So firmly do persons come to believe in the system that they never notice little things which under ordinary circumstances are ridiculous enough to upset any one's belief. Take the slate messages, for instance. Nearly all of them show evidence that they have been written by illiterate persons. A message supposed to have been sent by Hinawata is signed Hinawata. The simplest words are spelled wrong, the writing is almost illegible and the messages painfully alike and monotonous.

Forgot Mother Tongue.

One person received a message from the spirit of his grandmother, who had never left the shores of Norway. It was written in good English, in fact so good that the grandson had difficulty to make it out. He remarked: "She doing better den me," but he believed on.

Another once asked why he never received a message in German from a person who was not in the habit of writing English. He could not understand why the English should be the accepted language of the spirit world. Still he believed with the Norwegian who was waiting patiently to get a message in his mother tongue.

One of the great sources of revenue is when a patron gets so taken up with the system that he desires to become a medium and summon "Bob Kelly" and the other spirits to the expenditure of 50 cents to have another to do it. He is then taken for sittings. A ribbon is tied onto a certain chair in the circle and he sits on that in order "to develop." He usually develops as long as he has any money left, and then he is told that because of certain conditions he will never make a medium. He is consoled with "many are called, but few are chosen."

By the aid of luminous paint spirits can be made to appear to come up through the floor. The paint is supplied to fake mediums at $1 an ounce. One of the expositors, in order to induce some of the others to aid in the unmasking of the Amundsons, wrote to certain of the mediums, and his success to educate fake mediums. He received the following letter:

Teach Fake Mediums.

"Dear Friend:—Would you like to learn a business that will bring you a net income of $100 a month and even more? You should take up the giving of astrological and intuitive readings by mail, same as we are doing, and thus place yourself in a position to be independent of others. We can easily teach you this business and assure you of success from the very start. We write you this letter because we sincerely believe you are a person especially adapted to the business. We make this offer to only about one person in three hundred.

"We will teach you sufficient astrology so that you can give as pleasing, truthful and satisfactory readings as we are doing, so you can answer questions and letters deductively and inspirationally. We will teach you to advertise, where to advertise, how to get up your literature so as to bring you orders. In fact we will carefully instruct you in our business from A. to Z. so that within three weeks' time you will be started in a grand paying occupation, with easy, light work, lots of spare time for yourself, right in your own home. You can even use only your spare time and you will reap a handsome income in money for the same.

Our reputation is a sufficient guarantee that we can and will do as we promise. We are making a grand success from an artistic and financial standpoint, and we can make you equally successful if you will follow our instructions. We have received something like $50,000 a month and have made about $5,000 in this business, and there is no reason why you cannot do the same. You can, with little effort, at least earn a handsome monthly income. Your starting in the business will in no way interfere with us, as there are over 80,000,000 people in the United States, and as you have as yet no competitors, you will have pleased patrons in every country of the world, so you see the field is unlimited. Our pupils also have been very successful.

"Our charge for instructing you in this business is only $25, which is a very insignificant sum when you understand that you receive a knowledge that is worth thousands of dollars and a financial aid, and will place you in a position to become independent and prosperous.

"Remember it is not necessary for you to use a typewriter. We made a grand success when we first started without the use of a typewriter, but our business has grown so large that it is now necessary to use one. It will most likely prove the same with yourself. Please do not lay this letter aside without giving it serious consideration. Better still, remit us $25 at once and we will immediately send you the instructions so you can start your business at once and without delay. Trusting to hear from you soon, I am Yours for success."

Such art as Amundson practiced is within the reach of any one for a small outlay of capital. Companies are engaged in doing nothing else and have thousands of students all over the world.—The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, April 22, 1906.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT OF THE EXPOSE.

A sensational exposure of fake Spiritualistic mediums who have collected thousands of dollars from Minneapolis and St. Paul victims was made in a dramatic manner Monday evening at a private seance at the home of Mr. and Mrs. C. Amundson, 1125 Sixth street southeast, when Mr. Amundson, who is a painter and paperhanger, and his wife, both posing as Spiritualists, were revealed as fakers.

The exposure was conducted exclusively by St. Paul people. It was delightfully exciting. Mrs. Amundson was representing the spirit of "Bob Kelly," a sailor, who is supposed to have been in the spirit world more than a thousand years.

The sixteen persons present at the seance sat in breathless silence, when, suddenly, two of the spectators sprang from their seats and seized the supposed spirit, which was in reality the living Mrs. Amundson, clothed in black tights and draperies and veil of white silk.

MR. AMUNDSON, TOO, WAS SEIZED AND IN ALARM, THREATENED TO CALL THE POLICE. CONFESED THEY HAD BEEN DECEIVING THE PUBLIC FOR YEARS, AND IMPLORED MERCY.

Many of the people in the circle, who were unaware of the deception being practiced and of the plot to expose the fakers, added to the excitement made by the struggling captives growling over the revelation and incidentally over the fact that night after night at 50 cents a chair they had sat in the circle while the fakers had pretended to bring their loved ones in the spirit world in communication with them.

INDIGNATION IMMEDIATELY FOLLOWED UPON THE FIRST SURPRISE AND WOMEN IN THE CIRCLE SHRIEKED, "LOOK AT BOB KELLY; WHY, HE'S WEARING TIGHTS!"

Mrs. Amundson cowered from their vituperation and, hiding her head in shame, she moaned, "This is killing me; I always objected to it."

Carefully Planned.

The expose had all been carefully planned for weeks beforehand in St. Paul. They had carefully called for a male spirit, with the view of making the exposure most complete. When Mr. and Mrs. Amundson were at the seance they never let the others know they had never learned Spiritualism nor affiliated with any of the accepted organizations of Spiritualism. They acknowledged having studied their tricks in books.

Last night three of the victims kept a vigil over C. Amundson for fear that he might attempt to leave the city before reimbursing his victims for the money they had paid. He has secured from them through alleged spirit pictures and slate messages. One victim paid $250 for alleged communications with his departed and for pictures, which purported to have been taken of the spirits while the trance was in progress, while, in fact, Amundson confessed before every one that they were done by a photographer in Minneapolis.

One of those who had been duped secured the bank book of Mr. and Mrs. C. Amundson, which showed that they have on deposit over $300 in the Savings Bank of Minneapolis. This was placed in charge of one member of the party, and while Amundson is guarded in his own home an attempt will be made to secure the money. Amundson declared after the expose that as far as it is in his power he would return all that had been secured from them.

The Conspirators.

The men who are supposed by Mrs. Amundson to have been the ringleaders in the plan were Dr. William Shiffman and a man by the name of Torkelson, and they, with Mrs. Shiffman and Mrs. Torkelson, gathered together a small group to attend the seance. Among the others were Sydney Harper, W. W. Allen, an attorney; Mrs. Julia Childs and her daughter, Miss Childs.

Two relatives of Mr. Amundson's, a Mr. Willard and Theodore Ryan, were also present, although they did not disclose themselves until after the seance. These two men are the ones on whom Mrs. Amundson places the responsibility for the exposure, as the wife of Mr. Willard is a medium, and she is alleged to have a great prejudice against materialization.

Were Left Destitute.

When asked how she first came to hold the meetings Mrs. Amundson explained that one accident after another and one set of circumstances following upon another had left the family destitute, without money and without means of earning any. Mr. Amundson, in taking care of her and attempting to work at the same time, was in turn stricken with sickness, and Mrs. Amundson determined to take up anything whereby she might make money enough to live.

"We managed to pay our rent," she said, "but we were in debt at the grocery store for more than $50, and we knew that it would be a long time before we would be able to pay that, let alone get the means to supply our selves with food and clothing. I made up my mind to take up the Spiritualist work, and Mr. Amundson was perfect in familiar with all about the tricks employed by mediums. Years ago he was a Spiritualist, and a medium was living in the same house with him. He discovered that the man was a fake and forced him to tell him the method he used to delude the people. In that way Mr. Amundson learned what was necessary to the presenting of the phenomena, and it made him very easy for us when we started to take it up. We started with little Sunday seances to see how it would work, and then, as we were successful, it gradually became a greater issue in our lives. We have been holding two meetings a week, but it is not true that we coaxed people to come to them.

"The people think now that they know how it was done, but they do not know that we did it the way we did in the first place. There are test conditions that make it IMPOSSIBLE FOR THE TRICKS TO BE SEEN THROUGH, and many mediums practice them. We did not intend to keep it secret, for we never felt right about it, but we did hope to make enough money to live."

Good Place for Spirits.

The rooms where the seance was held was an uncanny-looking place. The cabinet, which the spirits were supposed to emerge from but in one corner of the room and was of plain board painted a dead black with a large opening covered with black curtains.

When the hour for the seance was at hand Mrs. Amundson disappeared behind the dark curtains and Mr. Amundson, who was supposed to be the spirit of "Bob Kelly," came out next and the company to question. WHILE "BOB" WAS BUSY WITH THE FLAG THE CONSPIRATORS FLUSHED OUT AND THE FALSE MESSAGES OF THE AMUNDSONS WERE FULLY EXPOSED.

While the prisoners were securely held a search was made and all kinds of paraphernalia discovered.

Secret Panel.

In a secret panel behind the fireplace were two trumpets, with which trumpet communications are held. Jumbled about were headgears used for the impersonation of Indian guides. Inside was a large chair for the medium and a little child's chair to accommodate Snow Flake. The windows were sealed up with heavy frames covered with building paper, and over this were heavy black curtains. There was no possibility of the least ray of light penetrating the rooms and exposing the deception practiced every afternoon and evening.

The greatest graft was in the sale of spirit photographs at $15 each. In some instances these were alleged to be spirit pictures of Indian guides. The parlor of one family was adorned with five of these pictures, as many as the wall space would comfortably allow. They represented an investment of $75. The family had dropped over $300 in all before they discovered the fake.

Another system of coaxing the dollars was through the slate messages bearing a picture of a flower, a spirit picture and opposite it a message. Two slates were secured from victims which had on them paintings of flowers.

Money Returned.

Mr. Amundson returned the money he had collected at the seance. He then pointed out as his own collection a large sign which hung over the mantel and contained the following rule of the seances:

"We have five forms of manifestations: materialization, transfiguration, impersonation and portrait. All of these manifestations may occur during a seance. If you attend our meeting you do so of your own free will and must comply with our rules and conduct yourself just as you would at any other religious meeting. We charge for our time and the seance. We have no control whatever over the manifestations; they depend on the condition you bring with you. If we have no manifestation your money will be returned, not otherwise.

"You must not handle or touch the forms without their permission; we wish them to feel free to come out to their friends. To grab hold of a form would be liable to result fatally to the medium, producing hemorrhage or even death.

"In case you are called upon to receive a message you are to place your hands in those of the cabinet attendants to form a battery and obey faithfully instructions that they may give you."—Minneapolis Tribune, April 17, 1906.

Science and a Future Life

Is He Out of Place?

When an Orthodox Minister Officiates at the Funeral of a Spiritualist.

"Who wonders that Col. Ingersoll was an agnostic for 'infidel,' when his father was a Presbyterian preacher, and he was compelled to hear such God-dishonoring, such heart-crushing doctrines preached, which have made more agnostics, more infidels, more scoffing atheists than all the Humes, Paines, Volneys and Voltaires that ever lived or spoke or wrote upon the historic page."

One by one our sensitives, gifted with inspiration and the power to consciously converse with the dwellers in the higher life, are laying down their mortal burdens and passing into the higher realms of immortality—the real realm-life of the spirit.

The above words refer to Mrs. Briggs of Battle Creek, long a resident of this city, a most amiable, excellent, and cultured woman, esteemed by all who knew her, and loved by the many who knew her best, and withal, a sincere and devoted Spiritualist. Not only was she a Spiritualist, but a writing medium, attending our speaking occasionally in the Spiritualist hall when her delicate health would permit. Never did I hear a more beautiful, uplifting prayer dropped from a human lips than I once heard from her at a Spiritualist social at their hall, and when hearing two or three of her inspirational lectures read to me by a gentleman friend of hers, I was wrapt in delight and almost ecstasy at her exalted teachings and beautiful descriptions and occupations of those who had passed the crystal river of death into that "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

It is asked who was the speaker engaged at the funeral service? It was the Rev. Dr. Potter, pastor of the Presbyterian church. He read in the commencement of the services several passages of scriptures, such as, "Man that is born of woman is of few days and full of trouble." The choir sang that familiar hymn, "Nearer, My God, to Thee," composed by a Unitarian, and he closed his well-considered remarks by repeating a part of the poem commencing, "There is no death," composed by a Spiritualist. And so his sermon, sandwiched in between Unitarianism and Spiritualism was pleasant to hear.

It greatly delighted me as far as it went—as far as hope and faith—being definitely noncommittal concerning the condition of the dead.

After speaking brotherly and highly of the family, and especially so of the deceased, he assured us that the Indian in his wild forest home believed in the future life; that the ancient Greeks believed in the beautiful isles of the blessed; that all tribes and nations believe in some form of future life, though unacquainted with the Christian religion. He referred to the appropriateness of death in this spring time of swelling buds and opening flowers. He reminded us also that the birds when they felt the chills of autumn frosts, instinctively turned their flight southward, but now they were returning to these northlands, making our groves and forests ring with their music. He referred to the goodness of God in the revolution of seasons, and the bringing of seed-time and harvest.

All through this discourse Brother Potter showed ardent wisdom and the goodness of his heart by not referring to the belief or the sublime doctrines of the Spiritualists. He did not even indirectly set forth what Presbyterians believed necessary for salvation. Not a word did he breathe about the fall of man, the resurrection of the physical body, the judgment day, the atoning blood, nor the terrible fate of the sinful as held by the Presbyterian denomination.

When a Presbyterian minister has attended a funeral and becomes convinced that he has called to preach, he goes before the presbytery and is asked by this body of ordained preachers, the following questions:

"Do you sincerely receive and adopt the confession of faith of this church," etc?

The preacher answers in the affirmative, and the following are some of the doctrines taught in the confession of faith of this Presbyterian church:

"By the decree of God, for the manifestation of His glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life and others foreordained to everlasting death.

"These angels and men thus predestinated and foreordained are particularly and unchangeably designed, and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished.

"Those of mankind that are predestinated unto life, God before the foundations of the world were laid, hath chosen in Christ unto everlasting glory out of his mere free grace and love, without any foresight or faith or good works, or preference in either them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions."

Here follow selections from Presbyterian confession of faith:

"God by an eternal and immutable decree hath chosen some men to eternal life, and also, according to His sovereign power, He hath passed by and foreordained the rest to dishonor and wrath."

"The punishments of sin in the world to come are everlasting separation from the comfortable presence of God, and the most grievous torments in soul and body, without intermission, in hell-fire forever.

"At the day of judgment the wicked shall be set on Christ's left hand, and thereupon shall be cast into hell, to be punished with unspeakable torments, both of body and soul, with the devil and his angels forever."

"The end of God's appointing this judgment day is for the manifestation of the glory of His mercy in the eternal salvation of the elect, and in the damnation of the reprobate. These reprobates shall be cast into eternal torments and be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of His power."

Here, then, we have Presbyterianism straight to that "man by the lost communion with God," and so, "under his wrath and curse," are made liable to all the miseries of this life, to death itself, and to the pains of hell-fire forever—tormented "soul and body in hell-fire forever"—the unspeakable "torments of hell with the devil and his angels" and the "damnation of the reprobate." Now, honestly, do Presbyterian ministers believe these doctrines of reprobation, REASON IS PARAMOUNT.

We should never surrender our Reason to Spirits or Mortals.

I have been greatly interested in the "Symposium," the great question under discussion being one of vital importance to the cause all over the world. I have not attempted to trespass upon your pages for a long time, but my interest in the movement to root out the frauds from the ranks, causes me to once more take up my pen, as feeble as its power to say a few words in its favor.

And first, let me heartily endorse the article by Will J. Erwood, in No. 853, of your paper. In speaking of the indication to "how down," "worship as absolute the dictum of exalted souls," he has echoed my sentiments to perfection.

Also in "surrendering" our reason to them, or any other power on earth or in heaven, there cannot be too much said in utter protest.

In the fourteen different states I have worked in as a speaker, I have met too much of this kind of thing, both among mediums and followers of the noble cause I love so well.

Many times our loved ones will give us advice when it is needed, and in my own case, have helped me over many hard places, but never did they tell me to "surrender" my reason. They would let me have my strong opinion to bridge the chasm, and at the last extremity, when I could see no way out, they would point the way, and I never found their advice to be wrong. We are not to be paddled through the sea of life as though we were a boat, but we have reason, and that reason is to be used, and it is for our best good to use it under all conditions.

Now, a word about materializing. I know that my sister stood before me in the army tent in Virginia, as tangible to my sight as any human form could be, and spoke to me in just as perfect a voice as I ever heard full from the lips of mortal.

But was she flesh and blood? Not by a long way. I know a beloved friend of mine, that the great act of mine towards her was that I was one of the bearers to place her body in the grave. Yet I know that she came to me in a circle by the Pickeringers, in Rochester, N. Y., as "natural as life itself." Every movement, every look was as perfect as when she was in the flesh. But did she have flesh and blood? I deny it; she had only the "something of the sort." And if I had attempted to make her a present of a new bonnet, or shoes, she would not have taken them to her home beyond the vale.

This miser will have no use for his gold over there, nor will we have any for wearing apparel of the materialistic sort.

Sometimes the materializations have been tested. I will give one that was told me by a Spiritualist who once lived in a "haunted house," moved in to it because it had that name, to test the matter for himself. The house became notorious, and some people would not dare there on account of the constant rappings that went on there. It was a small town in Maine, in or in the immediate vicinity of Springvale. One night two young men came there, as many others had done to see what they could see. The two were strangers to the parties living there, and to themselves as well, coming from different directions. They were given a room to do as they pleased when the family retired. After sitting for some time in the room, and directly a woman, apparently quite old, walked out of the room into the one where the two young men were seated. And to the utter astonishment of one of them, she pulled a revolver from her pocket and fired point blank at the center of the figure before them; they gradually disappeared before their eyes. It frightened the man that did not do the shooting, for he was sure there would be a murder when the other fired. But there was no murder, and no blood to mark the spot, though the bullet struck the partition beyond.

If that spirit had materialized flesh and blood, there would have been some signs of it left in that room. I am heartily with the movement to cleanse our ranks of all fraud, all tawdry, all pretence, and let the world see that we practice what we preach. The Jesuits from the other side, have done more to retard the adoption of religion by the whole world than everything else combined, for it is from their tremendous power that our religious influence by taking materialistic persons and mixing fraud with real genuine manifestations.

Some denounce our mediums for taking pay for their work. I say the "workman is worthy of his hire."

They have to eat as others do, and have to have clothes to wear. The physical body is our best medium, have not got so spiritual that they can live without the necessities. So let us not cry out too much about "Commercialism."

Seattle, Wash. P. C. MILLS.

seated in the room with the lifeless body of this good woman, who found Spiritualism good to live by and good to die by; and looking upon her calm, quiet face in the flower-embowered casquet, I fancied that I saw a smile upon her countenance, caused by the glimpse while dying of her loved ones gone before. This often occurs.

And thinking of the distinguished Robert Dale Owen, once our ambassador to Italy, author and Spiritualist, preaching the sermon over the dead body of his wife—the wife whom he so loved—I said, how good, how appropriate, it would have been to have had one of Mrs. Briggs' magnificent lectures treating of immortality, or the meeting of the loved ones in the beyond, of the scenery over there—too beautiful, too glorious for tongue to tell—O how we should have enjoyed the reading of one of these beautiful lectures of hers, inspired by the angels that do the Father's will!

Upon the whole, it seems as it is appropriate—would you be so good, brother or sister Spiritualist, to have some orthodox preacher conduct your funeral services, preaching the doctrines of his denomination—or not preaching them?

FICTION AND FACT.

Legendary Beliefs Are Not Historical Facts.

With reference to the "Legendary Beliefs Are Not Historical Facts," I wish to make a statement, as Dr. W. Brainard of Grinnell, Iowa, made a criticism in No. 851, to my article in No. 848.

I cannot affirm that the record of Jesus and his disciples, that I quoted from, is true in regard to their fate as martyrs, as it is in regard to their teaching.

Do not the orthodox ministers teach the people to have faith, and not to reason on the subject? There is more fiction in the literature of modern times than truth, and it is claimed by our educators that fiction of a high order does great good to the reading public.

Then why will not legends of a high order, which have the same influence and wholesome effect among the masses?

Millions of human beings have died with the hope of a higher life beyond the borderland, through the so-called legendary teachings of Jesus and his followers.

I was raised an orthodox, yet my parents taught me while a child, about spirit life and the angel world. From them and other sources I learned of the unseen powers that are higher than man. By study, experience and observation I am slowly outgrowing man-made creeds. I love the doctrine of Spiritualism and the mystic, because it teaches the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. I like the science, philosophy or religion that takes in all suffering humanity, and teaches that all souls, whether good or bad, will reach the same future destination, through love of God, and progression.

Accept everything in the bible, or out of it, that leads men and women to a righteous living, thinking and doing, and reject the rest. Wherever the bible teaches slavery, Mormonism, hate, ignorance, superstition, and a God of wrath and vengeance, reject it, for such teachings are born of the evil spirit.

I am resolved to accept the truth, if I know it, whether in the bible or out of it. I read the editorials in The Progressive Thinker, and am learning to understand what is true, and what is false, more and more, as the scales fall from my eyes.

Brother Brainard, you are mistaken if you think I believe the immaculate conception.

I have investigated the subject too much for a priest to deceive me on that subject. I began to weaken on orthodoxy in reading the book of martyrs, the history of the Reformation, and Ingersoll's great lectures on the cruel systems of past history, together with the ignorance, prejudice and superstition that he exposed. He showed intelligent people that belief with its evil attributes, had deluged the world with human gore. Is it not strange that a man of his intelligence could not discern the spiritual side of life?

For many years, I have been seeking after facts in regard to things terrestrial and celestial. A few years ago I bought Wilmore's New Analytical Reference Bible, and all of the verses on each subject are placed together.

On pages 1018 and 1020, under "Comprehensive Bible Helps," are given the following historical references in regard to the manuscripts of the Old and New Testaments:

"All of these books were written within the first century after Christ, but between two and three hundred years before the present. They were finally settled down by the councils of Laodicea (A. D. 360), Hippo Regius (A. D. 393) and Carthage (A. D. 397)."

"The books of the New Testament are written in Hellenistic Greek, as commonly spoken, and generally understood, not only in Asia Minor, but also in Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and everywhere else."

"Manuscripts and editions of the Bible. Before the invention of art of printing in the middle of the fifteenth century, books were produced by re-writing, and existed only as manuscripts."

"The sacred original manuscripts of the Old Testament were lost when Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem (B. C. 588), and the original manuscripts of the collection and manuscript arrangement by Ezra and Nehemiah were lost in the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (A. D. 70)."

"The oldest manuscripts extant date from the tenth century. The manuscripts of the New Testament are both older and more numerous than those of the Old Testament."

"It is a well known fact that the manuscripts of the old Bible are of doubtful authority, when they were destroyed so often, and not written again until the 10th century?"

Belief on such events must be based on tradition.

Is it any wonder that ordinary mortals will believe the legends that come from those old teachers, when classical scholars of Greek, Latin and other languages of modern times accept and teach them as true?

Mr. Brainard, this world has always been a mystery, and all persons should do the best they can, according to their light and knowledge. We all need facts.

Mary and her son Jesus were not the only persons that went to heaven soul and body, as we read from tradition.

Through all the ages there have been two powerful forces at work, the good and the evil, and humanity gets terribly mixed in trying to serve both of them. The conflicts of the human races have been raging through all ages, while combatting error, and more light is dawning through the clouds of despair and doubt.

In this country our forefathers in the revolutionary war, achieved the first grand victory over despotism, and their descendants in the Great Rebellion wiped out black slavery. It now remains for coming generations to abolish slavery and ignorance of all kinds.

How Times Change Things. An educated man who would today quote the bible as an authority on any physical subject would be an object of ridicule in the eyes of an educated hearer. Our Bible is but the mold of two thousand years ago into which was poured the fundamental principles of religion. Its facts are not history, but they have been considered for centuries as history. Indeed, there is no history in the Bible.

CELEBRATING, MICHIGAN.

Some Pertinent Remarks to Cowardly Spiritualists.

It was my privilege to be with the earnest, hustling Spiritualist society at Cheesaning, Mich., April 1. This little town sets a pace in things spiritual, of which some of our much larger places might well be proud.

Working not for self-popularity or official position, but banded harmoniously together, with the good of our loved ones standing out prominently before them as they are pushing zealously forward in a manner that is winning the respect of their town's people. Undaunted in their inability to have speakers at all times, they persist in floating their banner on the breeze, and instead of taking the popular route to some of their neighboring churches, sitting in their cushioned pews, supporting an orthodox divine, together with a chosen given as an only and infallible receipt for their salvation, each and every Sunday morning finds them congregated in their pleasant hall, where (no speaker being present) Mr. Hopkins, a silver-haired veteran, an earnest truth-seeker, and an able reader, entertains them by reading some of the best lectures or writings he is able to find.

Then they have a Lyceum of real lively boys and girls, with Miss Mattie Sheriff as their able leader. A question was put to these little people by Miss Sheriff, which I thought the grown up boys and girls would do well to ask themselves occasionally, and I believe if they could all respond with the proper answer, they would touch the keynote to the solution of the harmony and downfall which is altogether too prevalent in our Spiritualist societies.

Do you want to know what that question was, Mr. Spiritualist? And will you apply it to your individual self, and see what the result will be? It was this: "Have you had self-control? Have you held your tongue?"

Here's success to the Spiritualists of Cheesaning, and a hope that their success will be a motion for Spiritualists elsewhere to move forward. Don't be ashamed because the angels have swung open the gates, and our loved ones have come through their shining portals, bringing the "glad tidings" that they live, and that there is no death. Rise up, and greet them with glad hearts, and let them know that your love has not perished. Ashamed of the dear ones whom we loved so when they left us, and who return to us with the angels' glory on their brow? Why, you had better be ashamed of your limited amount of courage. Do not go on darning your trousers by crying, "highest revelation; do not go on darning your soul with a fear that somebody will find out that you have got hold of a truth that points you straight up to heaven, and that some of its glory comes down to you; that you have got in touch with God's telephone, as it were, and that messages of love and joy from the dear ones gone before, come floating over the etheric words that bind your souls together, filling you with a "peace that passeth understanding."

Ah, but this last, this wonderful peace, cannot be possible if you are possessed with a feeling of fear that Mother Grundy, or some of her relatives, will find out your secret. No, peace and fear do not go very well together; they never did, on the same throne. If they should accidentally get housed together, there would certainly be trouble before morning.

Get rid of your fear, brother Spiritualist, put on a new coating of moral courage and see how happy you will feel. Stand up and be counted. Don't try to slide in at the back door. You cannot get to heaven by that route. Heaven and a guilty conscience cannot harmonize. Come in at the front door, by all means, Mr. Spiritualist, and do not wait until after dark. Stand up and let the world know you relish a truth when you find one.

Did I hear someone say they were too proud to let any one know that they were Spiritualists? Go to the rear, my friend; take a back seat; don't let any of the angels' glory into your soul; it might demolish some of that mis-directed pride; you might forget your prestige. Proud indeed! "Why need the spirit of mortals be proud?" Poor overburdened Spiritualist! what a pity that your loved ones returned, wasn't it?

"Too proud to be a Spiritualist!" Well, what have you got to be proud of? Not proud of your truth? Not glad that your loved ones live, and have assured you of the fact? Well, then it must be your hypocrisy you are proud of. If it looks better to you than the truth, then I suppose you are happier with it, and I have no doubt you will win the everlasting friendship of Mother Grundy, and quite likely will be of considerable value to her friends and followers.

Again I say, Stand up, Mr. Spiritualist, and be counted. Let no coward pull it down, Gird you not with coward's fetters, If you'd wear Truth's shining crown.

FAILED TO CONVICT.

The Medical Fraternity Lose Out in Oklahoma.

The inability of the medical fraternity to convict Prof. Samuels at New-Ark will enable him to continue to relieve distressed humanity. Why a man who lives only to do good, to cure or to disengage people, to relieve sufferers, should be persecuted because forsooth he cannot obtain a license from a board whose examination is so foreign to him as the German language is to an Englishman, is beyond finding out. It can only be accounted on the ground of a selfish desire of the medical fraternity to compel him to accept their ipse dixit or die. But when the Bible tells us that Jesus healed by the laying on of hands, caused the blind to see and the lame to walk without administering medicine; and he was crucified. Verily we are not far descended in the 2,000 years that have passed since the introduction of the Christian religion. It is not alleged of Prof. Samuels that he was a wicked person; but, having obtained the sanction of a law to protect physicians, they endeavor to create a monopoly in their line.—Fratricide, Medford, Okla.

A REVERIE.

Let me live the life that seemeth best to me.

It may not be the even road
The soul hath devious ways of reaching home
And finding God.

Two birds once left the self-same nest
At dawn of day.
One flew to shady forest glades and sang
A roundelay.

It laved its rooded breast within
The mirrored pool.
And drank from silvery running streams
Both clear and cool.

At night, it hovered 'neath the Gentle mother wing,
And dreamed of newer, sweeter songs
It yet would sing.

O'er sandy fields to dusty, crowded streets
The other flew;
Within its beak a fresh, sweet sprig
Of tender rue.

It saw a crippled child, the gay,
Painted,
Cheek of sin,
It heard a woman's broken cry, above
The noise and din.

At night it sought the mountain and Found an eagle's nest;
A war of peace and sorrow surged Within
Its feathered breast.

So you and I may some day stand
Before the throne,
Your soft white hands upon your breast
To greet unknown.

Temptation passed with royal step,
proud,
Uplifted head,
Self-centered on the pure in life,
To goodness wed.

While my breast shall show a thousand Scars and wounds,
I have lived, have set myself within
No lines or bounds.

My shield a crumpled leaf, of battles
Lost and won,
My path a crooked path yet winding Toward the sun.

For I have walked the valley deep,
with Comrades in despair, Climbed the rugged hills of life, with Angels bright and fair.

But who shall say when both are judged,
All is said,
That you have lived the larger life, or I
With my sins upon my head.

Let me live the life that seemeth best to me.
It may not be the even road,
The soul hath devious ways of reaching home
And finding God.

THE CLINTON CAMP.

Particulars in Reference to this Favorite Place of Resort.

Dear friends, we send you a cordial greeting and say to you that the coming camp is thrilling in interest and full of prophecy of great things. The management has been untiring in efforts to give to the public a program more excellent than in the past, and take pride in saying we think we have succeeded. In fact, our hearts thrill at this great voice of opportunity from a people coming into the light, and we feel sure a "Camp Ideal" is about to blossom into full fruition. "Behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it." You will remember the opening date, July 29, and arrange to be present when "Old Glory" unfurls herself to the success of the camp.

The Diamond Jo line of steamers has granted the usual half-fare transportation for the round trip from all points between St. Louis and St. Paul. The Western Passenger Association extends the one and a third fare, on the certificate plan, from all points in Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Illinois, Missouri, Nebraska and Kansas. This is a larger territory than was granted last year, and with a rate a little more than half-fare for round trip should be eagerly taken advantage of, and bring travel our way. This is a very generous favor from the hands of railroad officials, and we should show our appreciation by persuading our friends that it is cheaper to travel than to stay at home.

Among the intensely interesting features of the camp season will be the children's lyceum under the able direction of Mrs. Emma R. Abbott, of Whitewater, Wis. She will also conduct a school in Physical Culture and Oratory. Mrs. Abbott is a successful teacher, charming in personality, and her natural, as well as acquired manners win for her the love and admiration of all who see and hear her.

A special day has been granted the Central Howard Association, whose object is "To awaken public sentiment in behalf of the worthy ex-prisoner." The day will be under the management of Rev. F. Emory Lyon of Chicago, who has been so worthily termed "The Prisoners' Friend." This is a most excellent institution, and we ask that a full attendance be given Dr. Lyon on August 6.

A Morris Pratt Institute special, August 8, will present a program far superior to all previous ones and a hearty co-operation is invited.

The evening of August 6, Mme. Stuart-Richings will tender a benefit to the M. V. S. A., which promises to be of unusual interest. Madame Stuart-Richings is a Bachelor of Dramatic Art, a lecturer and an author usually writing under the pen-name of "Helen Hawthorne."

Our list for the platform ranges as follows: Dr. B. F. Austin, Mme. Stuart-Richings, W. F. Peck, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague, Mrs. Alice Barry, Rev. Thomas Grimshaw and Miss Harlow. For the message service Mrs. J. A. Murtha, Georgia Gladys Cooley and Mrs. Henrietta Lichtig will voice the words of love, hope and courage from those gone before.

We have given a synopsis of a part of the work commenced. Finally, for the success of all our aims and plans we ask the earnest co-operation of all interested along this line.

The announcements are in the hands of the Allen Printing Co., Clinton, Iowa, which insures a high grade of work and prompt service. Send in your orders to Remarkable Invention.

AN INSTRUMENT THAT RESTORES EYESIGHT.

Spectacles Can Be Abandoned.

This instrument, which the inventors have patented, is called "Actina"—a trademark word.

In the treatment of eye diseases the invention of "Actina" claims there is no need for cutting or dragging the eye for most forms of disease. Cataracts, pterygia, and other ailments of the eye can be removed without the use of the knife. The new and more humane method is a fact and there will be no more blind or near-sighted people.

"Actina" has been tested in hundreds of cases and has effected marvelous cures. So confident are the inventors that this device is an article of great merit that they give absolutely a free trial. They want everyone interested to make their own investigation and a personal test of "Actina." One who has used it writes an article in the "Lancet" which is a complete dictionary of diseases which "Actina" cures, and which others think of it. What marvelous cures it has effected, and all about the responsibility of its own use, will be sent absolutely free upon request. This book should be in the library of every family. A NEW GATECHISM BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

Fourth Edition—Six Additional Chapters—200 Pages, Bound in Cloth, $1.00.—Containing Likeness of the Author.

"A New Gatechism" has enjoyed a remarkable sale both in America and England, and George Jacob Holyoake, in his introduction to the English edition of "A New Gatechism," says: "A New Gatechism" is the boldest, the brightest, the most varied and informing of any work of the kind extant. The principal fields of human knowledge, which the churches have neglected round with supernatural terrors, the Gatechism breaks into, cherishing what is fair and showing what is deformed. The notes which there are many, both ancient and contemporary, are as striking as the text. The book is a cyclopaedia of theology and reason in a nutshell.

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any questions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, but that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet he should be distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the mind of our correspondents that the Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly, with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have they will, and in order to do more work, we have had to do more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE. that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

The Rising Sun Mission Bazaar commences on the 11th of May, and ends on the 25th, instead of the 4th to the 25th.

Mrs. Hamilton Gill, trance medium, has moved to 891 West Adams street, second flat. The friends will please note that the usual Sunday and Thursday evening meetings have been discontinued until further notice, owing to Mrs. Gill's poor health. Private sitting only by appointment.

Mrs. G. M. Killmer would like to have a Spiritualist missionary do some work in the southern part of Minnesota. One is needed there.

Friends and patrons of Mrs. G. Partidge can reach her by addressing 212 W. First street, Salt Lake City, Utah.

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "The congregations of the Rising Sun Spiritualist Mission on Sunday, April 22, were warm in their praise of our workers. Sister Martha Price delighted her listeners, and the guides of Brothers Chas. A. Thompson and James gave tests to many who needed them badly."

Geo. B. Warr, a well-known medium, the evening service, and the extra large congregation which greeted him was one of thinking men and women who came to learn more of our beautiful philosophy. Eminent workers from all over the city were there and were loud in their praise of the speaker's knowledge of the occult and his ability as an orator. Sisters Kitchner and Hill received warm congratulations for the comfort and blessings their tests had afforded. Sunday, May 6, Sister Martha Price will again serve us in the afternoon, and the evening will be devoted to the mediums. Dr. L. C. Koehler will also speak on this occasion. Elegant music by a string orchestra will be a prominent feature. See our ad in another column. Sister Martha Andrews, one of our oldest and most ardent workers, passed to the higher life, April 12, after fifty-four long years of unselfish service for the cause of Spiritualism."

Geo. H. Brooks' present address is No. 114 President street, Wheaton, Ill., where he can be addressed for engagements.

Mrs. E. J. Jaquet has returned to the city and is located for an indefinite time with Mrs. W. E. H. Madison street. Mrs. Jaquet and Mrs. Hill will answer calls in or out of the city, and while here will give private readings. Mrs. Jaquet will be pleased to meet all her old friends and patrons.

Mary E. French of Clyde, Ohio, writes: "We closed our lecture season with Mrs. Marian Carpenter, on the evening of April 21 and 22. She was most both nights by a large audience. Her messages were fine. Going to Cuba did not lessen her inspirational powers by any means. The lectures give one courage to battle with the storms of life, which we all must do. We reach the sunlit hills of the beautiful. J. C. Craig, attorney, is another inspirational speaker whom the world will soon know more of. His development has been rapid, and he possesses great psychic power. We also have other mediums here developing various gifts."

Mrs. H. E. Russeque, on April 8, lectured for the First Spiritualist Society of New York, afternoon and evening, on "The Relation that Modern Spiritualism Holds to the Development of the Last Century," and on "Infidelity and Our Faith." Her lectures always attract the closest attention.

Laura L. Crawford writes from Detroit, Mich.: "The Band of Harmony, auxiliary to the First Church of the Soul, celebrated its first birthday, April 5, at the home of the pastor, Mrs. Laura L. Crawford, 198 Fourth street, with a membership of 52. A welcome greeted everyone present. There was a splendid program of music and recitations and encouraging words from visiting pastors and mediums, showing a spirit of harmony and good will toward all. I have just organized a lyceum of the workers on their platform until they have their papers or credentials passed upon by the State Board." A very excellent idea.

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

We go to press early Monday morning, hence communications intended for that current issue should reach this office not later than the previous Saturday morning. Bear this in mind.

ALWAYS GIVE YOUR FULL NAME AND ADDRESS WHEN SENDING NOTICES OR COMMUNICATIONS FOR PUBLICATION. OTHERWISE THEY WILL FIND THEIR WAY TO THE WASTE BASKET.

Brother Williams writes from Norristown, Pa.: "Though this somewhat benighted town of ours, containing over 25,000 inhabitants, has never made much of a public stir in Spiritualism, yet there are some earnest followers of the cause among us. We have for the last three months or more been having regular lectures and test meetings every Sunday afternoon and evening. Mrs. McDonald of Boston, a gifted medium, a tireless worker, and a fearless exponent of the cause of Spiritualism, has been holding these meetings. On Easter Sunday we had some special services. In the afternoon we had an inspiring lecture and very convincing tests by Mrs. McDonald, and in the evening she was assisted by Mrs. Volk, of Philadelphia, who gave an interesting lecture, and both mediums gave test messages to an appreciative audience."

D. P. Cook writes from Stoneham, Mass.: "If the writers of many articles in The Progressive Thinker on the future, were as close in touch as I am, with my spirit wife, they would express themselves differently."

J. G. Kaplan writes from Minneapolis, Minn.: "Enclosed you will find clippings from the St. Paul Pioneer Press, containing an exposure of those rank tricksters, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Amundson of this city, who posed as materializing mediums, and under that disguise defrauded many citizens of Minneapolis of their hard earnings, as you will see by the clippings enclosed. I think it would be a good plan for you to publish at least part of the exposure for the benefit of the patrons of your valuable paper, valuable to the cause of Spiritualism, because it stands for the HONEST AND TRUE ONLY, and is not afraid to publish an account of fraudulent mediums' work, thereby exposing their tricks to the public."

Mrs. A. Sexsmith writes: "The Easter services of the Golden Rule Spiritualist Society on Sunday afternoon and evening, April 15, were as usual, largely attended. In the afternoon there were short talks and messages by Pastor Mrs. Hill, Sister Jaquet and Sister Hans, which were greatly enjoyed. In the evening we had with us as speaker, Hon. Chas. E. Hughes. He took for his subject, 'Thou Shalt Not Steal.' He received much applause. The christening of two of our members by the pastor was beautiful, one being the baby of the Golden Rule Society, he being not quite two years old. Chas. E. Hughes, a good time is assured. Music by Kirkland's orchestra. Meetings every Sunday afternoon and evening at O'Donnell's College Hall, South Pauline street, between Washington Blvd. and Park avenue. All welcome."

Oscar A. Edgerly writes: "On Sunday, April 29, I shall conclude a very pleasant and most successful engagement with the First Spiritualist Church of Baltimore, Md. Since I have been serving the church, I have found its officers and members very earnest and zealous in co-operating with me in every endeavor to advance its interests and our cause in general. Mr. Charles R. Sherm, the efficient president, is ever alert to safe-guard in every way the interests of our cause in this city. I have been greatly gratified at the large audiences that have greeted me every Sunday. Judging from the many kind words of appreciation from my listeners, I am led to believe that the efforts of my spirit guides have met the approbation of the people. I wish we had more societies in the United States like those in Cleveland, Ohio, Pittsburgh, Pa., Washington, D. C., and Baltimore, Md. My friends throughout the country will see by the list of engagements that I have sent you the 'General Survey' that I am being kept very busy. For this I am thankful to my beloved spirit guides as well as to hundreds of friends in earth life, who seem ever ready to give me a kind word and a cheery 'God speed' in my efforts for our cause. With very best wishes for our greatest missionary, The Progressive Thinker."

My Elmo, Pastor, writes: "The Chicago Spiritual Alliance Society, holding services in Vincennes Hall, 3514 Vincennes avenue, are enjoying good audiences at all services. Mrs. Lillie Bell, a well-known Chicago psychic, is assisting as well as Prof. H. S. Frazer. Our lectures have been highly pleasing and we never fail to receive plenty of excellent tests from our psychic. On the 4th of May we will have with us, Dr. Burgess, president of the Chicago Spiritual League, who will deliver an address entitled, 'To-day.' Our services are open to all who may be seeking spiritual truth. All are cordially welcome."

Mrs. E. L. Nicholson writes: "I returned about a month ago to Seattle, after a three months' stay in San Diego, Cal. The society at that place is blessed with a lovely temple, and have as President, C. A. Muss, who certainly is the right man in the right place. Great harmony prevails in the society and any true, honest worker is made to feel very welcome in their midst. They endeavor to adhere closely to the resolution made at their last State Convention, which was, 'Not to use money in the work upon their platform until they have their papers or credentials passed upon by the State Board.' A very excellent idea."

Brother Williams writes from Norristown, Pa.: "Though this somewhat benighted town of ours, containing over 25,000 inhabitants, has never made much of a public stir in Spiritualism, yet there are some earnest followers of the cause among us. We have for the last three months or more been having regular lectures and test meetings every Sunday afternoon and evening. Mrs. McDonald of Boston, a gifted medium, a tireless worker, and a fearless exponent of the cause of Spiritualism, has been holding these meetings. On Easter Sunday we had some special services. In the afternoon we had an inspiring lecture and very convincing tests by Mrs. McDonald, and in the evening she was assisted by Mrs. Volk, of Philadelphia, who gave an interesting lecture, and both mediums gave test messages to an appreciative audience."

D. P. Cook writes from Stoneham, Mass.: "If the writers of many articles in The Progressive Thinker on the future, were as close in touch as I am, with my spirit wife, they would express themselves differently."

J. G. Kaplan writes from Minneapolis, Minn.: "Enclosed you will find clippings from the St. Paul Pioneer Press, containing an exposure of those rank tricksters, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Amundson of this city, who posed as materializing mediums, and under that disguise defrauded many citizens of Minneapolis of their hard earnings, as you will see by the clippings enclosed. I think it would be a good plan for you to publish at least part of the exposure for the benefit of the patrons of your valuable paper, valuable to the cause of Spiritualism, because it stands for the HONEST AND TRUE ONLY, and is not afraid to publish an account of fraudulent mediums' work, thereby exposing their tricks to the public."

Mrs. A. Sexsmith writes: "The Easter services of the Golden Rule Spiritualist Society on Sunday afternoon and evening, April 15, were as usual, largely attended. TOPIC FOR THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.

Sunday, May 6, 1906: "Motion, Life, Joy."

Gen of Thought.—"Labor in life, 'tis the still water follows;" "Idleness ever despoilth, bewailth; Keep the watch wound, for the dark dust assaileth, Flowers droop and die in the stillness of noon."

"Work and pure slumber shall wait on thy pillow, Work, thou shalt ride over Care's coming billow." "Be noble and the nobleness that lies In other men sleeping, but never dead, Will rise in majesty to meet thy own; Then wilt thou see it gleam in many eyes."

Then will pure light around thy path be shed, And thou wilt nevermore be sad and lone."

For information concerning the Progressive Lyceum, authorized Lesson Paper for the National Spiritualists Association, address John W. Ring, Spiritualist Temple, Galveston, Texas.

and should be followed by other states, and thereby help to estimate the desirable element which is so injurious to our cause. While in that city I had the pleasure of becoming better acquainted with that dear old pilgrim and veteran worker, Dr. J. M. Peebles, whose lectures are filled with light and knowledge. Brother and Sister Hull were also there, and as usual did a very excellent work, not only for the society, but for the Morris Pratt Institute, whose welfare they always so earnestly espouse. I also had the pleasure of meeting our dear friend and brother, Will C. Hodge, who was at that time unable to fill his accustomed niche in the Temple work. He is a grand, good and earnest worker, and we can all afford to have him resting on his oars. The cause needs him, and we hope to hear very soon of his entire recovery. They have much good home talent in San Diego, so never lack workers."

Wm. Hassmann writes: "The hall of the North Star Spiritual Union, 1548 Milwaukee avenue, was well filled with spirit seekers and seers on April 22. Sister Lester Krueger, on account of being ill, has been confined to her home for the past week, her presence being missed by many who loved to hear her. We trust she will be with us again next Sunday evening. Brother J. T. Temple, the speaker for the evening, gave a very instructive lecture, followed by Bro. White, a very able speaker. Spirit messages were given by Bro. Temple and Bro. White, all recognized. After the president had invited the audience to bring their skeptic friends along, he also asked them all to give out their best thoughts toward Sister Lester Krueger for a speedy recovery. The demand for the copies of 'The Progressive Thinker' was larger than could be supplied."

Since the close of the camp season last August, Oscar A. Edgerly has filled the following engagements: September with the First Spiritualist Society of Jackson, Mich.; October with the society of Elkhart, Ind.; November he filled a return engagement at Jackson, Mich.; during December he served the Ladies Spiritualist Temple, First Society of Cleveland, Ohio, during January 1906, he was with the First Spiritual Church of Pittsburgh, Pa.; February he was with the First Association of Spiritualists of Washington, D. C.; March and April with the First Spiritual Church of Baltimore, Md. Mr. Edgerly's engagements so far as made for the season of 1906 and 1907 are as follows: First two Sundays of May 1906 with the society at Worcester, Mass.; last two Sundays of May with the society at Pittsfield, Mass.; first Sunday of June at Providence, R. I.; Sunday, June 17, Lynn, Mass.; July and until August 20, he will act as chairman at Grand Lodge Camp, Mich.; August 22 until August 26, inclusive, he is engaged at City of Light Assembly, Lily Dale, N. Y.; will give lectures and October he is engaged with the society in Newport, Ky., and Cincinnati, Ohio; November and December he is engaged with the Ladies' Spiritualist Temple Fund Society of Cleveland, Ohio; January, 1907, is still open for engagement; February is engaged with the First Spiritual Church of Pittsfield, Pa. March, with the First Association of Spiritualists of Washington, D. C. April, May and June, 1907, still open for engagement. Permanent address, 42 Smith street, Lynn, Mass.

Mrs. G. Williams writes: "The Ladies' Spiritualist Temple Fund Society of Fullerton street, Cleveland, Ohio, will give an entertainment Thursday night, May 3, at 8 o'clock. Admission free. Prof. W. F. Peck of St. Louis, Mo., will give lectures from the stereoscope, which will be very entertaining to all. His lecture on phrenology last Thursday evening, proved very enjoyable to all present. The Professor gave quite a few readings to different persons in the audience, and they proved very beneficial. He will lecture on Sunday at 3 and 7:30 p. m."

Maggie Henry writes: "At Spiritual Mission Chapel (Old 77) we had a very large and intellectual audience, judging from the philosophical questions asked. All were pleased with the answers given by our speaker, F. M. Stoller, who certainly is inspired when lecturing. At the close of his lecture he was followed by spirit messages by several visiting mediums, and psychometric readings by our speaker, your correspondent and others. We decided to discontinue the afternoon meetings for the present, hoping those who have attended them will attend the evening services."

Mrs. N. J. Willis, trance medium, has moved to 122 Western avenue, Cambridge, Mass., where she will be pleased to receive her friends.

H. A. Corpse writes from Walla Walla, Wash.: "Mr. Harry J. Moore has just finished a most interesting and instructive course of lectures in this city. He has made a number of fast friends here and all hope to see him back again in a short time. With his assistance the cause here is growing slowly but surely and people are beginning to recognize us for what we are worth."

We are glad to learn that Mrs. Adeline L. Ballou, the known lecturer and artist, passed safely through the San Francisco earthquake, and can now be addressed at No. 408 Thirtieth street.

D. writes from San Pedro, Cal.: "On Sunday morning, April 15, at 5:15 a. m. I saw an uplifted hand with index finger extended to the zenith. Upon asking what it meant, I got the words, 'Up North.' I asked several medium friends, and asked in ballot at meeting Sunday evening, but got no explanation. On Wednesday morning at 5:15

San Francisco, which is north of us was badly shaken by an earthquake and nearly destroyed by fire, as you now know. My daughter and other members of my family reside there, and now I presume it referred to the disaster."

Mr. J. Wisker writes of the National Spiritual Church, Detroit: "We are pleased to report that the interest awakened by our anniversary service was shown on Sunday, April 22, when Mrs. Drew Jenkins, assisted by Rev. J. Boyle, held a service, consisting of two little girls. One was named after the spirit daughter of Mrs. Jenkins. Rose petals, cranin and red, were used as a shower over them. Placing wreaths on their heads, they were baptized into the church of True Spiritualism. Addresses, solos and spirit messages were also given. Many full and complete answers were given, and responded to as correct. Our society is growing. New members are coming in right along."

IT IS ALL ALONG THE LINE.

The Cry is Being Raised, "Drive Out the Parasites That Are Now Sapping the Life Blood of Our Beloved Cause."

Mediumship is a sacred gift, and when wielded FOR GOOD ALONE, has a wonderful work to do. When debased for the sole purpose of money-getting by fraud and deception, it becomes the lowest of the low.

I notice many mediums are crying "Fraud hunters!" Were there no fraud there would never have been a hunter for fraud. If we had had no counterfeits, gold or currency, we would not have had any laws to prohibit the counterfeiting. The parasite life of the San Jose Scale has developed a system of spraying to destroy its effect upon our fruits of all kinds. These little parasites attach themselves to the great fruit tree, whose fruit is most delicious and good for man (it is not forbidden fruit), but they destroy the fruit and then later the tree itself. Just so the Tree of Life demonstrated by the Tree of the media of all ages has been attacked by the parasites. They grow and thrive upon the Tree of Life; then destroy the life that has sustained them for years.

The only knowledge man has of a continued life of individual consciousness has just come through mediumship in all ages. It is really the Tree from which the race has plucked the knowledge of continued life, and like our fruit trees the parasites attack it, seeking to destroy its usefulness by first attaching themselves to Spiritualism, and then sapping the life out of it by trickery and fraud.

The priests of the past and present are the co-laborers with a class of fraud mediums: "Why is this? may be asked, yet simply answered. The priests and fraud mediums are both acting for one and the same purpose—the making of money! The occupation of the priest with the full knowledge of spiritual truth before the world, would be gone; the fake medium would likewise be out of employment. For the purpose of establishing any truth, ERROR MUST BE ELIMINATED. The forces of error, either in the pulpit or in dark seances must be understood and plainly set forth. Like the San Jose Scale, they must be studied, and the chemist goes to work to destroy the influence of these parasites upon the Tree of Life."

The Progressive Thinker is doing and has been for a long time a grand work in its laboratory in its efforts to destroy the steady microbe of priestcraft and fraud mediumship. We can already see a better blessing for the fruit of truth from the Tree of Modern Spiritualism. Long may you live."

"The Moleculer Hypothesis of Nature." By Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood. Professor Lockwood is recognized as one of the ablest lecturers on the spiritual rostrum. In this little volume he presents in succinct form the substance of his lectures on the Molecular Hypothesis of Nature, and presents his views as demonstrating a scientific basis for Spiritualism. The book is commended to all who love to study and think. Price, 25 cents.

TRULY PROPHETIC.

Death Comes to Teacher as in Dream—Stricken on the Day Set in Forecast at Prophecy—Life Was Portrayed Accurately and Future Career Was Set Out—Eid Came Suddenly—Psychic Expert Friend of Former Omaha Man, Says Son Sent Message.

Omaha, Neb.—William H. Allen, formerly a well-known and popular educator of Omaha, Kansas City and other Western cities, who recently died of apoplexy at Edgemont, S. D., where he was Superintendent of the Public Schools, had a strange dream one night a year ago in which he was forewarned of the precise time of his death.

In his dream, as Mr. Allen related it later, he saw a map representing a view of 50 years, or all but one year of his life. The map was divided into five sections, each section representing a decade of his life, all the principal events and many of the incidents of which were clearly revealed to him.

He took up the map and examined it section by section, smiling here over some bit of comedy in his life, weeping there over some bit of tragedy and living over again the years ago. When he was done with the fifth section of the map he laid it aside and reached for the sixth. But he found no sixth.

Warned of Fatal Sickness. Again picking up the fifth section he discovered in bright red letters in a corner thereof a command to turn it over and read what was written on the reverse side. He turned it over and there found a map presenting a clear view of the last thirty years of his life, and a forecast of the next, or fifty-second year.

The forecast told him that a sickness would befall him at the end of his fifty-second year and besought him to be careful of his health lest the sickness should end his life, and then a voice whispered in his ear telling him that he would fall ill on his fifty-second birthday and that if he did not die then he would live to be 80 or 90 years of age.

Mr. Allen was amused rather than depressed by the dream and treated it lightly when he related it to his family, and to some of his friends the next day.

"We have all sorts of dreams," he said. "There is no accounting for them, but they are not to be taken seriously, especially as forewarnings." Mr. Allen on his fifty-second birthday arose apparently in excellent health.

"Do you know," said he to his wife at the breakfast table, "that I never thought of that strange dream I had a year ago after I related it to you until I got up this morning? It came into my mind again when I was dressing. I never felt better in my life than I do this morning and I am fearful that that dream is going to disappoint me by failing to fulfill itself."

Stricken on Birthday. Mrs. Allen then told of her worries and urged her husband to be careful about his health.

Mr. Allen went to the school, but in a short time returned to his home and complained of not feeling well.

The family physician came and assured Mr. Allen that he would soon be well again.

A short time later Mr. Allen was sitting in his armchair by a window reading his morning paper. Suddenly the paper fell from his hand and he fell forward upon the floor.

His wife heard the sound made by the falling body and hastened to her husband's side, but he was dead. The dream of the year before had come true.

Physicians who were summoned pronounced the cause of death to have been apoplexy.

Twenty years ago Mr. Allen's infant son died and a psychic expert, a friend of his, to whom the story of the dream was related, said: "It was Mr. Allen's son who whispered to him in his strange dream a year ago. The son was old enough to warn him. He could not tell his father that he would die at the end of the year, for he was earth-bound and was not permitted to do so. But he gave him all the warning he could that when the summons came he might be prepared to die."

A PUZZLED INVESTIGATOR.

She Writes of Her Peculiar Phenomenal Experience.

I have never known much about Spiritualism, until recently, as my parents regarded such manifestations as hallucinations, and discouraged investigation.

I have always had premonitions and intuitions that surprise people, and often have knowledge of things that I can't account for. I read people like an open book, and my first impressions are always correct. If I change my opinion I generally have cause to rue it. Not long ago a religious fanatic (one of that sect that believe we are commanded to pick up serpents) told me I had the gift of "discerning of spirits" and if I did not use it for the glory of God it would be taken away from me.

Travelling clairvoyants have told me I had undeveloped powers, but I did not pay any attention to them, although I have had strange dreams and warnings, and on three or four occasions heard a mysterious voice. This voice always quoted scripture, so I thought it the work of my subconscious mind. (I had been a Bible student.)

Coming home late one night, I saw an illuminated form floating along about a block from me, but I set that down for an illusion of some kind. Soon after, I was awakened one dark night by the sound of music, as though two persons were playing a serenade just outside my room. Suddenly a light shone on the wall and a man and woman came through the wall playing instruments and laughing as though they had played a good joke on me. They were strangers to me and the man advanced, shook hands with me and introduced himself saying, "I am Dr. Burson." (I think that was the name.) His hand was warm. I supposed ghost hands were cold. How about? Several writers for The Progressive Thinker tell of cold hands being placed on them. My visitors vanished, a sort of rigor passed over me, and I lay staring at the wall unable to believe my eyes. I decided it was a very realistic dream.

A few nights after that I was again awakened by a chorus of voices singing and apparently passing by in the air above me. I could not see them distinctly, but they were singing. They were singing about "the home among the angels" and a woman's voice led all the rest. I was wide awake this time, and tried to speak and tell them I heard, but could only smile. A convulsive shudder passed over me and they were gone.

When these visions pass I feel like I had been hypnotized. I am a nervous, sensitive person, with a great power of concentration, and would be a good hypnotic subject, but have refused to go farther than the cataleptic stage because I was afraid of it. I don't care to go into anything that might unsettle my mind. I have always been considered a very keen-witted person, but as I say, a trifle nervous. I have written a great deal for publication and know that several of my poems, at least were inspired, for they came to me almost complete and were not ground out as some of the others were.

I should be glad if some one would interpret these visions to me, as there are no Spiritualists near here that I know of.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of
HUDSON TUTTLE.
Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby terse, which of all things is to be decried. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.
HUDSON TUTTLE.

J. J. Fly, Q. Is the personality of Jesus recognized by any historian save Josephus. Do you know of any history (reliable) where Jesus was spoken of save the New Testament?

A. The brief mention of Christ made by Tacitus, is now regarded as an interpolation; the letter of Abgarus to Christ is a forgery; Origen, the greatest of the church fathers, after years of labor for Christianity, renounced that faith and returned to the old pagan faith. The passage in Josephus is admitted by the most prejudiced, as a bungling interpolation. In all the histories of that time there is not a line, not a word of mention of this greatest event that ever transpired on the stage of history, the birth and death of the supreme God, his burial and resurrection. Not a line outside the New Testament.

R. M. B., Q. Are there contradictory statements made in the New Testament, and where are they found? Have we facts disproving the New Testament?

A. It would be difficult to crowd into the space given to this department all the contradictions to be found in the New Testament. Perhaps one of the most glaring is made in its genealogy. The common understanding is that Christ was "unbegotten," and hence could have no human ancestry. Matthew sets out to trace him back to Abraham, through the royal line of David, starting with Joseph whom he makes the father of Christ. If he was not, then this pedigree is false and written for the purpose of deception. St. Luke has greater ambition, and starting with Joseph "who was the son of Heli" ends with Adam! David is not in it. Both these evangelists, it is claimed, wrote by inspiration, the absolute truth, yet they are in direct conflict.

T. requires great petting skill to harmonize the statements of the New Testament writers with history. The strongest evidence against the New Testament is that it was written in Latin after that language had been corrupted by contact with barbarians, and not in the Latin of the Augustine age when it is claimed to have been written. It is written in monkish Latin of the Middle Ages, what went before, or if anything did, we do not know.

S. J. S. Reynolds, Q. Why do certain animals see in the dark as clearly as in the light?

A. The explanation given in text books is that the aperture admitting light, is capable of a much greater extension, than in other animals, thus much larger volume is received and condensed on the retina. But this does not fully account for all facts. The eyes of some animals that see in darkness have a much smaller aperture than others that cannot see. There is without doubt a higher degree of sensitiveness in the retina, as indicated by larger optic ganglia, and impossibility to rays of light, unrecognizable to eyes fitted to broad daylight. The eyes of animals seeing in the dark, are so sensitive to light that the aperture contracts in bright light until the pupil is scarcely visible. Animals have other guidance than sight alone. This is possessed in common with those who see in the day. Pigeons when liberated in a room, flew from side to side, avoiding every obstacle placed in their way, as dextrously as though the cruel operation had not been performed. A turtle having its head cut off, will avoid irritation, and move around obstacles. These beings have a sense not yet determined, and the eyes of animals seeing in the dark, are susceptible to light waves, not recognized by others.

W. B. V., Q. I have vibrations along my spine and shoulders and through the solar plexus, at times annoying and painful. I have consulted several mediums, who have told me that these were spirit influences, and they promised to relieve me of them, exacting a goodly fee, but I am no different. One said she would treat me for six months and relieve me of this influence in six months, for $25. I do hope you can recommend some good occultist who will be able to relieve me.

Here is an instance of the banefulness of the doctrine of obsession which has stained the record of Spiritualism. And this is taken advantage of by harpies to wring money out of the victims. Every nervous indisposition, what once was called hysteria, is the influence of evil spirits. "Mediums" encourage this insidious insanity and then bleed their victims to the last farthing! Promises to drive away evil spirits for twenty-five dollars pay down, and "treatment" after another week for six months! I am not able to recommend "a good occultist," but

I might give the address of several who would demand even more than the rapacious "medium" for absent treatment" by the light of the moon. There are instances of control by undesirable influences, but that does not prove that every disturbance of mind or nerves is the work of spirits. I diagnose the case as one of badly disturbed and exhausted nerves, and I see no spirit interference whatever. The best thing this correspondent can do is to consult an able physician, one who is honest and will tell him the truth. If he will free his mind from the belief that these "influences" are not outside of himself, and take proper precautions to conserve his vital forces, with healthful living, he need not even consult a physician.

These vibrations indicate a serious condition of the nerves in the region most vital, and while he waits for something to be done for him by an occultist, or absent treatment, time will be lost, and it will be too late to do anything. It reminds me of a correspondent in this department who wrote, saying that spirit lights floated before his eyes, whenever it was dark, and wanted directions how to cultivate, and advice. I wrote him that it was not spirit lights at all that he saw, and no indication of clairvoyance, but incipient catalepsy, and to consult an oculist at once, and possibly something might be done to avert the calamity which threatened him. Two years afterward he wrote me that he had become blind from the cause I had assigned.

AFTER DEATH.

The Orthodox Churches Advancing—At the First Presbyterian Church in Kalamazoo, Mich., Rev. H. W. Gelston Gave Expression to Remarks in Harmony With Spiritualism.

By way of introducing his sermon entitled "After Death," on Easter morning, Rev. Henry W. Gelston said: "When Henry D. Thoreau was on his death bed in company with Parker Pillsbury, his intimate friend leaned over, took his hand and said: 'Henry, you are so near the border, can you not see something on the other side?' But Thoreau shook his head and said: 'No, one world as it is, Paris is as a maxim of wisdom; but as for myself, I took issue with both the wisdom and the philosophy of the statement. I do not believe that we can live this life as it should be lived without the consciousness of its relation to the next life.'"

Extracts of his remarks on the main theme of the sermon followed. "I am going to attempt a line of argument, this morning, which some of you may think venturesome and speculative, because it is generally supposed that we cannot know anything about the next world; but if the laws that govern the universe are eternal, then they cannot change, and what is essentially true here must be essentially true there.

"The laws that govern life processes are perpetual as long as life exists, whether in time or eternity, and if we have a knowledge of those laws here and have a knowledge of our relation to them, then we also have a knowledge of them anywhere and everywhere, for we are already in eternity. Time is only a part of the eternal, but a part and cannot be separated from it.

"From this it follows that our life in the other world is governed by the same laws that control development in this world. They are just the same and I want to quote a few verses from a poem that has been most comforting to me:

"I cannot and I will not say that he is dead—
He is just away.
With a cheery smile and a wave of the hand,
He wandered into an unknown land
And left us dreaming how very fair
It needs must be, since he lingers there."

"Oh, you who the wildest yearn
For the old-time step and the glad return Think of him as faring on
As dear in the love of there as the love of here.

"Think of him as just the same, I say,
He is not dead, he is just away."
"If this be true, then life is life in the next world and is just as natural as it is in this world. People do not change in any such sense as that they become other than themselves.

"We cannot think of heaven as located in some star, because the stars are all composed of matter like our earth, and spirit is therefore of other worlds. But we are justified of thinking of it as the realm of spiritual manifestation, and however much such a realm may transcend the boundaries of this world, we find resident in our own atmosphere and about the earth the manifestation of spiritual forces, which science calls eternal energy and which manifest themselves in the infinite forms of vegetable and animal embodiment in the world as a spiritual reality, belong to the same realm of being that mind belongs to.

Electricity and gravity are forces that belong to the eternal constitution of things; they are therefore indestructible and will be the servants of the mind on the other side just like this, only in a far higher degree. Therefore, whether it exists near by or far off, is the natural home of the spirit of man, and it follows from this line of reasoning that our friends may be and naturally are near us much of the time, though they are not confined to any one locality, but have unlimited freedom and can go where pleasure leads them, in the boundless universe of God."

"Success and How To Win It." A lecture and course of twenty-four successful lessons by Dr. B. F. Austin, B. A., D. D. The titles of some of the lectures are as follows: Self Help; Financial Success; Ideals; Economy; Planning; Attraction; Courtesy; Kindness and Tact; Angel Help. Price 25 cents.

"Spiritism and Mrs. Leonora B. Piper, and Dr. Thomson J. Hudson's Theories in Regard to It." By Ex-Judge Abram H. Dalley. This pretty volume contains fifty-seven of the author's latest and choicest poems. Neatly bound in cloth, and with portrait of the author. Price, 75 cents. Cloth, $1.

MANY CONVINCING TESTS.

Experiences in the Phenomena of Spiritualism.

Having traveled a great deal and having had much experience in Spiritualism and its phenomena, many friends have requested me to write, giving some of my experiences for your paper.

In the past thirty or forty years I have received hundreds of messages, some verbal, some on paper, and some slate-writing, the latter to my mind being the most convincing phase of mediumship, for honest investigators, a dishonest one is just as bad as a dishonest medium. I have no use for either, one is a fraud and the other is an impostor.

While I have had genuine materialization, I should not advise new investigators to try it, for we old-timers might be deceived in some of them.

When we get independent slate-writing as hundreds of us have, in broad daylight, with only one other mortal beside ourselves in the room, and we know as well as we know anything, neither of us did it, and that we had washed and dried the slates, and that it was not on the slates before, and it was impossible for the medium to have known the names signed, let alone the subjects spoken of that answered the many questions that were in a sealed letter.

I will now relate one of the most convincing, that happened on July 9, 1905, with a noted and well known medium of Washington, D. C. He was going to leave the city the next day, and I wanted test of slate-writing before he went. So I wrote some questions to six of my nearest and dearest relatives, and one dear old comrade, seven in all. I got nine messages written on five slates, and all were written between two slates, or one held on top of the one that the writing was on, held by the medium and myself.

I got nine nice letter messages, the writing was much the same I had received from them while they were in earth life, with full name and middle initial signed to each.

I asked them to give me some good messages with some good advice. Each one seemed to be written in their own familiar handwriting, some very coarse and some very fine writing.

I would give this too long, and of no interest to others, so I will merely give the names just as they were signed, together with place of living and passing away, to show that it would be impossible for a strange medium to know.

The names are as follows: My father, Mattie C. Thatcher, passed on at Vernon, Van Buren county, Iowa; my mother, Hannah T. Thatcher, Millville, Shasta county, Cal.; brother, Jonathan Thatcher, Seattle, Wash.; my sister, Almira Thatcher, Mt. Sterling, Iowa; my sister, Rebecca Hilles, Vernon, Iowa; my wife, Virginia M. Thatcher, Mt. Sterling, Iowa; my uncle, S. B. Thomas, Tacoma, Park, District of Columbia; my nephew, Will Thatcher, Shasta county, Cal.; my old comrade, Zack B. Thomas, Washington, D. C. The above said slate-writing was done just as I have stated, and no mortal did it.

I know neither of us did it, and there was no other person in the room. I have often taken questions for relatives and other friends, sealed in envelopes, and no possible way of knowing what the question was, or that he answered them, by mind-reading. Every question was answered just the same, and if any one doubts this statement, and is interested enough to make an investigation, I feel certain that they will get answers to each subject, if not more than six to ten questions are asked, for $2.

I have had another test, on April 2, 1906, with the same medium. I got very satisfactory answers to questions from some of the same above-named parties, father, mother, brother Jonathan, wife Virginia, and comrade Zack B. Thomas, with all names signed in full.

Now if it be true, that all we know comes through our five senses, we would be perfect idiots if deprived of all five senses. Now, if we believe this slate-writing was fraud, and not genuine, would be to not believe my own senses in that, as I would in other things, and admit that I was an idiot.

Why is it that some people will believe things they never saw, that were claimed to have happened thousands of years ago? In regard to spiritual phenomena a neighbor said to me, "I would not believe it if I saw it," and yet he would believe things that he never saw, that were claimed to have happened before he was born, such as the whale swallowing Jonah, or vice versa. One way is just as good for one as the other. "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

Give me common horse sense in place of bigoted religious prejudice. We are having some very good spiritual work in Washington, D. C., this season. The First Society have had many good speakers and mediums, also many other societies have been doing good work. The Temple League has worked hard and has laid up some money for the purpose of a building for Spiritualists to meet in. I have made my home for more than a year with the president of the Temple League Society, Mrs. W. M. Farrow, 50 M Street Northwest, Washington, D. C. We also held weekly meetings at her home, with good results.

Theaters Condemned by the Church.

The doctrine of the church on this subject was clear and decided. The theater was unequivocally condemned, and all professional actors pronounced to be in a condition of mortal sin. That was the sentence of the church upon those whose lives were spent in adding to the sum of human enjoyment, in scattering the clouds of ignorance, and charming away the weariness of a jaded mind. None can tell how many hearts it has wrung with anguish. The man who did more than any other to remove the stigma that rested upon actors was unquestionably Voltaire. There is, indeed, something singularly noble in the undying zeal with which he directed, tried and eloquence, the keenest wit and the choicest reasoning to the defense of those who had so long been friendless and despised.—Lecky.

"How to Train Children and Parents." Mrs. Elizabeth Towne takes the position that in many cases it is the parents that need the training more than the children, and advises parents to look to themselves. Twenty-five cents. Not to be spent than in buying this little book. Everyone that has the care of children should read it. Price 25 cents.

"An Infamous Dynamite Roman Catholic Conspiracy Detected and Exposed." "Romanism Exposed." Two pamphlets by Rev. J. G. White, author of "Starting Facts." Price, 10 cents each, or two for 15 cents.

God and Religion.

"The religion of Science is the religion of Truth, and embraces the heavens and the earth, and respects facts only. It is a saving religion because it saves from error, puts away the chains of superstition, and thrives in the light of Truth, and with perfect freedom to think and grow—a fearless Progressive Thinker."

Let me go on the pinnacles of thought, Whereso'er it may seem that I ought, To inquire and find out all I can Of the heavens and earth, and of man.

The universe is a living organism. Its primary essentials are Mind and Matter.

Its forces are positive and negative. The Mind of the Universe is its Soul-life.

The universal energy is the power of God manifest in positive and negative forces throughout the cosmos. Earth is a magnet, having positive and negative poles, so atoms also possess polarity. All matter is polarized. All motion comes of attractions and repulsions—causative of endless changes, new combinations, forms, and compounds in endless variety and in varied processes of growth and decay.

The mind or soul-life of the atom is its affinity or power of choice by which a negative mate is selected and a new creation thus effected, and a new substance endowed with new life, and soul possessed with affluence, which may form farther alliances, or having served the wants of the organism, aged or otherwise, effaced, with weakened or exhausted vitality, may disintegrate in obedience to dissolving affinities. Thus life and death go chasing each other, essential in the life and economy of the Universe as the living organism of man.

The earth comes into the family life of the Sun, in its turn, abundantly possessed of the germs of life, which manifesting in due time and unfolding potentials, as we see in plants, animals, make the world at length the home of sentient life and of ultimate intelligence, progress, and civilization, bountifully supported with seedtime and harvest, and with all the resources of earth, neath overhanging skies, and the inviting twinkle of the stars, engaging man's attention and interest, and rewarding him progressively with better understanding and creation.

Man is beyond question the highest expression of mind known or conceivable by us. He is a correlated creative man, and highest ultimate creature in the Universe; and, born of God, and crowned with immortality, which is his birthright as sure as he is the ultimate conception of the Infinite Mind. This, it seems to me, is fairly a dialectic conclusion, and most fully satisfies human reason and hopes, and, coupled with psychic phenomena, subjective mind powers and communications, is doubly assuring of an inheritance commensurate with its source.

I speak of man in a cosmic sense as being truly a child of the Infinite Parent, whose children inhabit millions on millions of worlds, the Suns of which speak up with tongues of fire, and from out the immensity, telling us of kinship and interrelations inspiring and grand, and that make the heavens brighter in our thoughts and contemplations, and give us a nobility.

As no being can come from nothing, and as the Universe is clearly an organism, and man its highest expression, so I claim he is a child of that Organism, as truly as the babe is a child of its parents, and as truly as the Father is Infinite, and we finite, unable to comprehend his existence further than we can the Universe, does not lessen the certainty and logical necessity of such Being, omnipotent, omniscient and omnipresent, living in and controlling all:—

"To Him there is no low, no great, no small."
He fills, He bounds, connects, and equals all."

I am aware of the difficulties in the way of such conception. Familiar with the anthropomorphic ideas accompanying all ancient religions, and by no means eliminated, altogether from modern theology, in fact a Sunday-school presentation to children of our time, it is more difficult to accept this broader view, but remember we are looking after a sovereignty, which can be the All-in-All.

As of our world, so of all the sister planets. All are born alike as we, with the same inheritance of evolutionary forces. Out of the Solar womb with germinal seeds, all alike have come, and all alike are nourished and fed. All are members of the same family, and one in the inter-related life of inseparable governments of the Supreme Being; for by the use of the telescope and spectroscopy it is learned that the stars are all so many suns, constituted like our own; and that they, too, in all probability, must have families of worlds to feed and clothe; and over and through all there reigns one Universal Mind. And this is the God of science, the God of reason, the God of the Universe, without a devil, a witch or a miracle, which are only fancies of ignorance, and so are dissipated by the light of knowledge.

The God of the Universe is manifest in uniformity of government and dispensations amazingly regular and perfect. The same causes, laws and effects are everywhere alike related, and under like conditions the same action and results are observed, and unity in all throughout is announced. There can, therefore, be but one true religion, and that the religion of Science that recognizes God as the Soul and Life of the Universe, and God of Mars, Jupiter, and of other systems of worlds as well as of our little Earth—best known only because we live here.

The Mosaic version of Creation is unanimously rejected by scientists because it plainly contradicts the facts of God's own handwriting. It is unreasonable, untrue, and withal absurd and ridiculous, and altogether unsuited to the advanced thought and mind of the present age. The moulding of Adam, the rib creation of Eve, the doctrine of original sin and the Devil, in short, the whole fabric of the Jewish religion is little if any in advance of other ancient religions, and like them must pass away and give place to more advanced ideas; for I tell you the world moves, because it is alive, and God is in it; not the Mosaic God of Earth only, finite and changeable, but an all-embracing, eternal God of the Universe, of countless worlds, without a Devil or hell anywhere; save the imagination of unlearned minds.

The religion of Science is the religion of Truth, and embraces the heavens and the earth, and respects facts only. It is a saving religion because it saves from error, puts away the chains of superstition, and thrives in the light of Truth, with perfect freedom to think and grow—a fearless Progressive Thinker.

MATTERS OF INTEREST.

Trumpet Seances Held in Canton, O.

To the Editor:—I would like, briefly as possible, to make mention of some matters of interest that took place in two interesting trumpet seances I recently attended in Canton, the medium being Mr. D. A. Herriek, trumpet medium and trance speaker, of Akron, Ohio.

The first place on the 6th, and the second on the 13th of March, and both were held in the home of Mr. John Reller, of this city.

During these seances it was not an unusual occurrence to hear three, four and five different conversations being carried on by denizens of the spirit world and their friends of earth, and among those of the spirit spaces was one was a spirit claiming to be our martyred president and former fellow-townsmen, William McKinley, and there is no doubt in my mind and in the minds of others who were there that it was Mr. McKinley who spoke to us. This spirit gave a solemn but very interesting talk, also in a deliberate and forceful manner which was indeed characteristic of Mr. McKinley. In part he said:

"I, William McKinley, am greatly interested in the cause and progress of Spiritualism at large, and especially so in its progress in Canton, my home for many years. I am also still interested in Canton, and the welfare of my numerous friends and former fellow-citizens."

Mr. McKinley also referred to his assassin and the premeditated, unwarranted and uncalculated act that was the cause of his, Mr. McKinley's passing prematurely to the spirit side of life.

These remarks, however, were made in a kindly and sympathetic spirit. Mr. McKinley, when addressing the writer, also said: "Mr. Kidd, I thank you for Judge Munson, for the great kindness you did me in getting my message to my dear wife. I also request of you to remember me kindly to Judge Munson, also extend to me my heartfelt thanks for the great favor and other favors he has done for me."

For the benefit of the readers of your paper and as explanation of the above, I will say Judge A. Munson, of Medina, Ohio, received an important message from Mr. McKinley for his wife who resides in Canton, with instructions to see that it was delivered to her. Judge Munson, knowing that I lived in Canton, wrote me, saying, he had in his possession an important message from Mr. McKinley for his wife, and asked me if I could not suggest some way to get the message to Mrs. McKinley, other than sending it through the U. S. mail, since he feared it might be intercepted.

After receiving from Judge Munson and reading a copy of the message, I saw it was certainly characteristic of Mr. McKinley, therefore through a relative, a sister of Mrs. McKinley, I got the message to her. Now that Mr.

McKinley knew the task had been performed, which was indeed a favor to him, it was natural for him to thank those who performed the task.

Judge J. W. Underhill, a veteran in the cause of Spiritualism, who passed to the spirit side of life from Canton a few months ago, also came, and in speaking to the writer he stated his regrets that the Spiritualists of Canton did not take up and act on his proposition made to them a year before his death.

By way of explanation I will say that Judge Underhill pledged himself to give $3,000 to the Spiritualists of Canton, with which to build a church, if they bought a lot and put in the foundation. This they failed to do, and as a result they have no place they can call their own and in which to hold meetings.

Too bad, but too late, so far as Judge Underhill's proposition is concerned.

Mr. Herriek expects to return to Canton the first of April to hold more seances and will probably deliver some lectures. E. R. KIDD.

FUTURE LIFE

In the Light of Ancient Wisdom and Modern Science.

BY LOUIS ELBE.

This is the authorized translation of the famous book which has been created so wide a stir in scientific and religious circles throughout France, under the title "La Vie Future." It will be received with equal interest here, and will arouse very general discussion, as the subject is one engaging not only scientists but laymen in ever-increasing numbers. The fundamental question of the "Immortality of the Soul" has disturbed the great thinkers of all ages, and for the solution of this eternal enigma humanity still seeks in vain. This volume offers for the first time a complete presentation of all the available evidence hitherto to be found only in the most scattered and inaccessible forms. With great care and exactness M. Elbe has arranged a plain statement of the discoveries, theories, and ideas of the greatest investigators together with his own illuminating views and comments, and a mass of authentic information regarding the beliefs of the primitive races. The book is divided into two parts, the first part being devoted to the ideas of the Survival as considered by the Primitive races, and the second to deductions drawn from the Fundamental sciences. With Portrait of the author. Price $1.20; postage 10c.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

By Edward C. Smith.

"The Record of a generous life runs like a vine around the memory of our dead, and every sweet selfish act is now a perfumed flower."

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL was a great and brilliant man, he was the greatest genius of his age. His place is beside Shakespeare, Voltaire, Goethe and Shelley. He was a great Lawyer, Politician, Reformer, Orator, Critic and Philosopher. His wonderful gift of language touched with the spirit and charm of poetry aided by his powerful gift of wit and humor, made him the most formidable foe the church has ever had.

He was great because he was honest. He shook the world with his eloquence and reasoning. His arguments were never answered. As a Lawyer his arguments were always so convincing that he won his case.

He knew many things by learning and more by intuition.

He was an Intellectual Giant, and it is very probable that the wonderful combinations he possessed, the world will never see again.

The author who was a close friend and great admirer of Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, was assisted by near relatives who collected a great amount of valuable data, and in no other way could this information be obtained. The writing of the "Life and Reminiscences" was purely a labor of love; and it is useless to say has been written in the fairest and kindest spirit, every detail having been carefully recorded. Much of this data was collected and revised before the Colonel's death, and great care was taken in only recording after careful research.

This valuable edition has been aptly illustrated with many beautiful half-tone illustrations of the Colonel in different periods of his life. Also portraits of his sisters and brothers, family, father and mother, together with a genealogical chart, also many valuable reminiscences. The work is well written, handsomely bound, and beautifully printed. All admirers of the Colonel will welcome its publication.

THE GREAT EMANCIPATOR.

The King Who Was Dreaded as an Enemy, Now Hailed as a Friend.

There was once a King who was dreaded by all his subjects. It seemed to those living in fear of his despotism that his reign had lasted from the beginning of time and would continue to the end. There was no escaping his searching eye and his out-reaching arm. They might fly to the uttermost part of his domain; bury themselves in the deepest caves, seek a hiding place on the highest mountains or in the thickest forests, they could not escape his summons when it pleased him to send for them. Their whole existence was poisoned by the dread of the time when the terrible eye of the King would fall upon them, and they would have to meet him face to face. The accounts and legends of his aspect were so terrible that all dreaded to look upon him, and would flee to any place, or suffer any privation rather than look upon his awful sovereign. Many tried to drown the fear in the whirl of pleasure, but all in vain; in the midst of every scene of happiness, in the peaceful pursuits of their daily life, as well as in the clash of the battlefield, the summons might come to friend, lover or comrade. All must go; the aged and decrepit, the strong man bearing the burdens of others, or the infant just entering upon life's journey, all were liable to receive the call and to pass through the door of the King's castle and be seen no more; though friends might accompany them to the door and with all the strength of their love seek to hold them back, their doom was sealed. Love, desire or prayer availed naught, the terrible door closed and shut them away from all help and love, and more heart-rending than all else, no one knew what fate had befallen them on the other side.

The King must be cruel and heartless, or he would not snatch the best loved from them; how did they fare? What was the fate that awaited them all? Hearts broke with the anguish of longing to know how it was with their loved ones, but the door was closed; there was no return to tell those left behind of the dire fate that was supposed to be theirs. A few, rendered desperate and despairing by the circumstances of their lives, and knowing that they must some time be called to enter the dreaded castle of the tyrant King, were brave enough to thrust open the door and enter unbidden; all well knew that the door was not fastened on the inner side, but the dread of what might be their fate upon entering deterred all but a few. From making any attempt to approach it, even to follow those who had been called.

All sorts of expedients were tried to placate the dread King; many appealed to God for protection, asking him to go with them when they obeyed the summons; all sorts of sacrifices were offered to God; costly buildings were erected and enormous sums of money spent in the effort to gain the approbation of the Almighty that he might be persuaded to assist them through their inevitable ordeal. If there had been no such King, or if any one could have overcome and dethroned him, that the dread of his power could have been taken from the people, there had not much been paid to any God; it was chiefly the fear of the King and the hope of assistance when the call came, that turned the hearts of the people to God.

At length a rumor arose, that in an obscure corner of the kingdom an angel had appeared; a radiant maiden, bringing to all who would listen, an almost unbelievable story about the dreaded King; she said the old fear that had enslaved them so long was groundless; that the King was no tyrant or revengeful monster, but a kind and loving friend, a deliverer, an emancipator; that his domain on the other side of the door was a beautiful country, of pleasant hills and peaceful valleys, of trees, birds and sweet flowers, far more lovely than their own land; that when their friends passed the portal of the castle door to their troubles, their pains and anxieties dropped from them forevermore; that they received garments of purity and splendor, and were met and welcomed by those who had preceded them; that none were lost or missing; that the infant was taken to the arms of some mother soul, and that the aged were unfettered and cared for by those whom they had supposed were forever gone from their sight. She told them that it was a land of joy, surprises, of happy reunions, of satisfied longings; and that there a pure desire of the soul was gratified, and every right wish found its fulfillment, and better still, she proclaimed that the terrible door so long dreaded was no door at all; only a thin curtain swayed and moved by heavenly breezes, and that those who tried and really wished, could hear the voices of their own, could catch glimpses of radiant, happy faces, and receive messages of love and comfort from the heavenly land.

But, alas! although a few welcomed the angel and listened to the glad story and hastened to try and get glimpses from their departed ones, and were cheered and comforted, many there were who refused to listen or believe. They preferred to still be held in the old bondage of fear; their fathers had told them that the great King was a tyrant to be dreaded, and that the door of the castle was barred against any return; their holy books had taught them, or so they had understood them, that no messages could be received from those who had passed the terrible door, and they would not believe the message of the heavenly angel, even though they heard the voice of mother, wife or child; even though they might catch glimpses of dear faces long since passed from their presence, they would not believe; the old beliefs and fears were so deeply grounded in their natures that they could not accept the message of truth and freedom; they preferred to believe it a delusion; the angel a falsifier; a tempter to lead them away from the beliefs of their fathers; they turned from the appeals from their own that came from the other side of the curtain, closed their hearts to their cries, and went their own old way; but for those who could believe and accept the message, what a relief; what comfort and peace; no more dread of the

JEWS AND CHRISTIANS.

Why Seek to Convert Hebrews to the Christian Religion?

To the Editor:—Although a gentle, I want to thank you for your friendly editorial in defense of the Jews. The New York City Jews, against the assault made upon them by Archdeacon Russell, in his after-dinner speech at the banquet of the Hamilton Club, in Brooklyn, New York, February 19, last, and to whom your editorial reply in last week's Progressive Thinker, was a stinging rebuke.

It was in this same speech this same Archdeacon Russell made the audacious proposition to convert those New York City Jews, from Judaism to Christianity.

Those Hebrews, he claims, for Christian's protection's sake, be converted to Christianity, stating that they would gladly renounce Judaism for Christianity, if, (as he says) "the truths of Christianity were only presented to them."

Now, I cannot see why Christians should want to send missionaries to Jews, when there is so much missionary work needed among Christians, for the criminal classes are not of the Jews, but of the Christians.

The Jews of today are among the most devout and consistent as religiousists, along the lines in which they worship. The Jews, too, as a rule, are sober, industrious, gentle and law-abiding citizens. It would, therefore, be more consistent for the Jews to send missionaries to Christians.

But, Mr. Editor, what are really the "truths—the basic or fundamental truths of Christianity to which the Jewish gentleman refers and with which he proposes to convert the Jews?

Here they are in a nutshell: In the ages of long ago, when the human race was in its childhood state of mental darkness, ignorance and superstition, when the thunderbolt and lightning were to our ancestors the awful signal of Divine displeasure, then it was when certain foxy men, more foxy than the rest, invented the story telling how Adam, the first man, and Eve, the first woman, made their first acquaintance with the Divine.

At any rate, it was upon this alleged first acquaintance was founded by a system of self-appointed priests, despising the people, the circumstances of their lives, and knowing that they must some time be called to enter the dreaded castle of the tyrant King, were brave enough to thrust open the door and enter unbidden; all well knew that the door was not fastened on the inner side, but the dread of what might be their fate upon entering deterred all but a few.

From making any attempt to approach it, even to follow those who had been called. All sorts of expedients were tried to placate the dread King; many appealed to God for protection, asking him to go with them when they obeyed the summons; all sorts of sacrifices were offered to God; costly buildings were erected and enormous sums of money spent in the effort to gain the approbation of the Almighty that he might be persuaded to assist them through their inevitable ordeal.

If there had been no such King, or if any one could have overcome and dethroned him, that the dread of his power could have been taken from the people, there had not much been paid to any God; it was chiefly the fear of the King and the hope of assistance when the call came, that turned the hearts of the people to God.

At length a rumor arose, that in an obscure corner of the kingdom an angel had appeared; a radiant maiden, bringing to all who would listen, an almost unbelievable story about the dreaded King; she said the old fear that had enslaved them so long was groundless; that the King was no tyrant or revengeful monster, but a kind and loving friend, a deliverer, an emancipator; that his domain on the other side of the door was a beautiful country, of pleasant hills and peaceful valleys, of trees, birds and sweet flowers, far more lovely than their own land; that when their friends passed the portal of the castle door to their troubles, their pains and anxieties dropped from them forevermore; that they received garments of purity and splendor, and were met and welcomed by those who had preceded them; that none were lost or missing; that the infant was taken to the arms of some mother soul, and that the aged were unfettered and cared for by those whom they had supposed were forever gone from their sight.

She told them that it was a land of joy, surprises, of happy reunions, of satisfied longings; and that there a pure desire of the soul was gratified, and every right wish found its fulfillment, and better still, she proclaimed that the terrible door so long dreaded was no door at all; only a thin curtain swayed and moved by heavenly breezes, and that those who tried and really wished, could hear the voices of their own, could catch glimpses of radiant, happy faces, and receive messages of love and comfort from the heavenly land.

But, alas! although a few welcomed the angel and listened to the glad story and hastened to try and get glimpses from their departed ones, and were cheered and comforted, many there were who refused to listen or believe. They preferred to still be held in the old bondage of fear; their fathers had told them that the great King was a tyrant to be dreaded, and that the door of the castle was barred against any return; their holy books had taught them, or so they had understood them, that no messages could be received from those who had passed the terrible door, and they would not believe the message of the heavenly angel, even though they heard the voice of mother, wife or child; even though they might catch glimpses of dear faces long since passed from their presence, they would not believe; the old beliefs and fears were so deeply grounded in their natures that they could not accept the message of truth and freedom; they preferred to believe it a delusion; the angel a falsifier; a tempter to lead them away from the beliefs of their fathers; they turned from the appeals from their own that came from the other side of the curtain, closed their hearts to their cries, and went their own old way; but for those who could believe and accept the message, what a relief; what comfort and peace; no more dread of the

WHENCE IS THE POWER?

A Serious Question for Spiritualists to Consider.

To the Editor:—With your permission I will occupy a little space in your paper in answer to Brother Kopp and scores of other Spiritualists. Permit me to say there is not probably (as generally understood) a materializing medium in the United States to-day. So think A. J. Davis, Hudson Tuttle, and many of the most brilliant minds of the age. I think the wisest course for Spiritualists to pursue would be to abandon it altogether. I was led to believe by reading The Progressive Thinker, that it was perfectly easy to become convinced of its truth. This grand paper is ablaze with spiritual phenomena. Step forward and know the truth, seems to be the watchword. But, alas, the truth proved hard to find.

Brother Kopp says he has a table he rode around his room, and asks where the power comes from? I have one and a large man and myself rode it round and round until it was actually broken to pieces; am keeping it as a memorial of occult force. Where does the power come from?

No one can tell. The more thoroughly we examine it, the less are we convinced of its spiritual origin. Can any one tell where the power comes from that moves our earth with its vast oceans and continents, with a velocity of a thousand miles an hour and keeps it up for endless ages? We call it the power of the sun, the centrifugal force, but what do we know about it? Absolutely nothing!

Where does the power come from that moves Polaris, and Alcyone, the latter a million times larger than our own sun, with a sweep and destiny incomprehensible to man? In the cosmos there seems to be a vast vortex of power whose center is everywhere. The lines of this power run out in physical and mental directions.

We have a man in our state who does not know the letters of the alphabet, nor one figure from another, yet he is one of the most rapid calculators in the world. The great German mathematician (Euler) spent years in making the prime factors of a certain number. "This man solved it in a moment's time. He will solve the most difficult and intricate problems with a rapidity and certainty that is absolutely astonishing. Calculate an eclipse so rapidly that an astronomer's head would swim. Equally at home in the higher branches of mathematics, geometry, trigonometry, mathematics, he does not know the meaning of such terms.

Problems solved: No. 1.—How many times will a clock strike in two thousand years? Answer given as fast as I could write it down. No. 2.—If the earth was a globe of sand one million grains to each cubic inch, how many grains? Answered in one minute. No. 3.—Two trains start from a depot, one going north thirty miles per hour, the other east forty miles per hour. They run night and day a thousand years. How far apart are they? Answer given in two minutes. You who think you are mathematicians, try to solve it. You will be some time "figuring it out in your head."

The spectroscopic demonstrates the unity of the material cosmos. We now know that every sun that sparkles upon the bosom of infinity, and sweeps in its measureless cycles through endless eons is chemically the same as our own. May not Spiritualism be the key stone to the arch that bridges the visible and the invisible worlds demonstrating the intelligent unity of all power?

Where does the power come from? Every other organ of his brain seems latent but mathematics? Is it probable or possible that some great calculator disembodied, occupies so small a part of his brain? We think not.

Probably your wife talking to you through the trumpet is the reproduction of impressions long since recorded upon the brain. I saw in my office a Graphophone Grand, with many records and some blanks. The cell structure of the brain may be compared to one of the blanks. It is ready to receive a record. Every thought, every word, every musical note, everything that happens to a person through a lifetime, is faithfully recorded upon the cells of the brain. Mark you, there is no record before birth. There may be psychical impressions, but no living records. This living record may be produced at any time, or a part of it. To a person who is clairaudient they are audible, and this fact will explain a very large class of psychical phenomena, both among religionists and Spiritualists.

Brother Spiritualists the world over, let us place our feet upon the foundation of eternal truth. Were I an artist I would paint or build me a home of immortal beauty, would festoon it with flowers, and fill its gardens and walks with fountains of perpetual youth. Its quiet retreats would be like the "Garden of the Gods" where the "Sons of the Ages" could hold their councils.

This home would be occupied with loved ones and kindred spirits in the kingdom of eternal progression. Its furnishings would be good deeds, kind acts, and noble efforts for the uplift of suffering humanity. Its labors would not be confined to a favored few, but would broaden out to the world, or universe wide condition. Music, art, poetry, sculpture, intelligence, knowledge, philosophy, would be its hand-maidens.

Its mornings would be filled with tireless activity, its noonday resplendent with noble effort, its evenings consecrated to a calm and hallowed peace, and its sublime philosophy of Spiritualism would be its "magna charta." Guardian angels with snowy wings would be its ministering servants inviting the weary to repose under its ambrosial bowers. In a rainbow arch over this heavenly home would be clusters, constellations and galaxies of celestial spheres and spirit homes, sparkling diamonds upon the bosom of beauty and extending to infinity. Love would be its atmosphere, its life, its being, and eternal progression its inspiration.

THE HIGHEST WISDOM.

It Consists in Cultivating and Beautifying Our Spiritual Life.

There is only one life you chafe at to the soul of man—one continuous life from the beginning throughout the endless eons of eternity, and which life is being evolved from the less perfect to the more perfect. In accordance with the laws of eternal progression, the elemental properties of the soul have existed since creation had a being, and such properties have become more refined and perfect as the life journey has proceeded. When the soul is born into human life its individualization commences, and the severe struggles which it must make, during its incarnation, are necessary in order that it may reach the life which awaits it beyond the grave! But the life journey is continued upon a higher plane over yonder. Sorrow and pain school the soul for higher and greater achievements. They teach us to sympathize with the afflicted, to mourn with those who weep, to feed the hungry and to help the lowly down-trodden.

All of human life is made up of experiences, and those experiences are all that we take with us when we pass over "Death's cold stream." As we make our records, so they will be, until we change them with other experiences, which greater knowledge and development will enable us to make.

The individual soul at its earthly birth embarks upon an endless voyage which becomes more and more glorious and interesting as it advances. And he who lives the nearest in accord with the great laws of Infinite Power, will make the most rapid progress. He who shall deserve most will receive most. He who labors the most faithfully and persistently will surely receive the greatest reward. The reward which the faithful soul will receive will be the happy consciousness of well doing.

The earthly rewards of wealth and distinctions will be unknown in the after life. And we must remember that we are living for eternity where spiritual excellence and development will alone be worth possession.

Heretofore we have been far too apt to give too much importance to the perishable things of life, and to regard too highly human honors and distinctions, which do not and cannot survive the tomb.

In an earthly sense we bring nothing into the world when we are born, and at our deaths we take nothing out of it. But in the spiritual sense we bring the potentiality of progress into the world at our birth, and take with us, at our earthly dissolution, the character which we have built during our earthly pilgrimage.

It is the part of the highest wisdom to cultivate and beautify our spiritual life, which is immortal, and thus be prepared for the grand possibilities of that higher world which awaits us on the other side of the grave.

In the very nature of things the incarnate soul can know but little of the life beyond death. The boy knows but little of the trials and labors of manhood, and it is well that he does not. He will soon enough learn them. Man, in his incarnate state, cannot understand the great things that are going on in the spiritual world, but the spiritual life which will be his birthright in the "Land of the Dead."

Revelations from the light land of the hereafter will at times reach the incarnate soul. Enough of heavenly light will be shed upon human life, to satisfy mankind that the soul is incapable of annihilation; and that the survival of the spirit after death is a great truth which man admits of no doubt.

With the assurances of the continuity of life, all of the trials and labors of earth become benedictions instead of sorrows.

A KINDLY INVITATION.

And the Comprehensive Response by Col. R. T. Van Horn. A copy of Both Letters.

Canaan, Mo., April 21, 1906.
Dear Col. Van Horn, Kansas City, Mo.:—Will you prepare a paper upon the subject of Materialization as your contribution to a symposium that is to present the message of Spiritualism to the world in book form under the comprehensive title: "The Latest Word of Spiritualism."

Your long experience in this field of investigation qualifies you to speak with authority, and I know of no one better able to give the philosophical explanation of this wonderful phenomena than yourself.

Trusting you may be able to accede to my request, and hoping that I may hear from you soon, I am, with best wishes,
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

Response by Col. R. T. Van Horn.
Kansas City, Mo., April 30, 1906.
Rev. Harrison D. Barrett:

Dear Sir:—Your letter of the 21st came a few days ago, and would have been answered sooner but for a visit of a grippe, that disarranged the thinking machine.

I accept the compliment implied by your request as too flattering. I have a very peculiar notion—that our material thinking apparatus is not equal to unfolding the philosophy of spirit power—as we note it in phenomena. Conclusions in thinking are always controlled by the premises from which the concept starts.

In regard to "materialization," the trouble is we start with a material concept. A materialized form is not a real thing—but a fac simile. In recent discussions about "fraud," a strange objection by writers of repute has been urged; that spirit power cannot make a flesh body, with bones, blood, lungs and viscera in general. When such ideas come from ex cathedra sources, what is the use of trying to treat materialization for what it really is? Our old nursery adepts were wiser—they called them "ghosts." Your watch is composed of substance the man with the muck-rake collects. It is only manipulated by unseen forces into the wonderful thing that measures time for you. And it is owing to the degree of skill in manipulation that you carry a good or poor time-piece.

Precisely is it so in materialization. The power or force is invisible, the material the emanations from the sitters and medium. The manipulation is to the degree the substance available can be harmoniously blended by the unseen manipulators—or in our vernacular—chemists. Were I to write a volume it would only be an elaboration and possibly a confusion of these conditions.

It might be regarded by some as egotism, or as empiricism by others, but to me, the saddest feature of "ghost" "fraud" is the want of "knowledge on the part of writers, and the utter absence of the real factor in all phenomena—the power or skill of the unseen workers. All phenomena is from or by individual agents or workers on "the other side."

Results as in this life according to the skillful worker and the facility or obscurity of the work of the material and the elements present.

We are too much like children looking at a circus presentation—taking the flesh tights, cupid wings and motley jokers, as the real beings from fairy land, rather than the fac similes they are to the older observers. Despite all our experience we insist on the materiality of miracles and miraculous beings.

What we want and need is less bad blood, less sound-hunting and epileptic, more charity, more study of phenomena, more common sense, and—more mediums.

I am not clear whether an octogenarian ought to make promises involving clear thinking, cogent writing, and all based upon a dispassionate openness to any one. But before deciding at all, I should know the scope or purpose of the proposed symposium. If it is to be a discussion—or a pro and con debate of the "fraud" question, I have no heart for the task. In my personal experience I have found it too much the rule that the more facts of experience you have to offer, and the more unusual and striking the manifestations you have witnessed, the more your reputation as a deluded wonder monger and observer—not to mention fool, is enhanced.

Thanking you again for the courtesy and contents of your letter, this is all I feel at liberty to say at this time.
Very truly yours,
R. T. VAN HORN.

LEGERDEMAIN INFERNALISM

The articles now running in The Progressive Thinker will open the eyes of Spiritualists as never before. All along the line The Progressive Thinker has awakened a feeling that will not subside until all the charlatans shall have been driven from our ranks, or sent behind the bars as Mr. Maybee was. The exposure of Mr. and Mrs. Amundson of Minneapolis, Minn., illustrates most graphically the condition of our cause. For years little children, old men, old women, Indians, etc., have "materialized" at their seances—every one a fraud—nothing but deception throughout—Infernalism itself instead of unsullied Spiritualism! Oh! Angels of Light, Love and Purity, how long must Spiritualism endure the practice of Legerdemain Infernalism?

Gradually Legerdemain Infernalism is being brought to the attention of Spiritualists everywhere, and there is an awakening all along the line as never before. One good lady, however, writes us that Spiritualists should look "exclusively for the good," and "NEVER for the bad!" That "charity should step to the front, as that alone COVERS a multitude of sins."

For years those who have looked for tricks, deception or the practice of legerdemain in our ranks have been met with determined opposition, until our Cause had become badly defiled.

The use of artificial tongs in the dark cabinet HAD BECOME WELL-KNOWN UNIVERSAL.

Bogus Spirit Return had stepped to the front, and with its aid money, jewelry, and valuable bonds have been handed over to the unprincipled actors therein.

One lady in this city, as said before,

INIMICAL LEGISLATION.

Fraudulent Practices Are a Menace to Our Cause.

One of our scientific Spiritualists who is familiar with our cause asserts that Spiritualism has been held back at least twenty-five years because of the fraudulent practices under cover of spiritual gifts. No one familiar with existing conditions in our large cities can doubt that our cause has suffered and is suffering severely from these abuses.

If we are unable to figure out a remedy for these unfortunate conditions, we can hardly expect otherwise than that the ruthless hand of the law will reach out in its crudeness and take the matter in hand.

The city of Buffalo is moving in that direction and is now considering the enactment of an ordinance prohibiting the practice of clairvoyance, fortune-telling, sorcery, magic, and soothsaying except by those licensed by the city authorities so to do and the license fee proposed to $300 annually.

The president of the state association has appeared before the ordinance committee and endeavored to secure a modification of the conditions of the ordinance, and below is a brief synopsis of some of the arguments presented.

We fully realize that even if our suggestions are carried out, we have only a crude solution of the question, and since other cities may move in the same direction, some Spiritualists may have the time and the inclination to dispose to think out and present a better way to deal with this menace to our cause.

To the Ordinance Committee of the Common Council of the City of Buffalo:—In relation to the proposed ordinance imposing a $300 license fee for the practice of clairvoyance, fortune-telling, etc., in the city of Buffalo, it is claimed by those favoring the enactment of this ordinance that it is necessary for the protection of the people from impostures and fraudulent practices of dishonest persons who, it is claimed, flock to the cities for a few days or a few weeks, as the case may be, and through glaring advertisements, claiming marvelous powers, either in the schools and depart for new fields for new victims.

That there is much truth in this claim and that fraudulent practices of this character do actually take place, we do not dispute, and no one more deeply regrets these conditions than the Spiritualists themselves; and the organized movement of Spiritualism will welcome any legitimate action by the city authorities that will weed out these practices being carried on under the name of spiritual gifts.

So that in so far as the intent and purpose which it is claimed prompts the movers of this ordinance as introduced, would as it seems to us, reach way beyond the mark at which it is aimed, and would, if enforced, do great injustice to a large body of Spiritualists who are doing honest, conscientious work for the uplift of the human family.

Consequently, as president of the New York State Association of Spiritualists and representing the organized movement of this religion, I ask the privilege of presenting a few thoughts from the standpoint of a Spiritualist.

First—Clairvoyance is the spiritual sense of sight and with persons thus gifted, it is just as natural to see clairvoyantly as to see with the physical eye, and while the spiritual or clairvoyant sight is a natural gift, it is a finer, more attenuated sense of sight, and the person so gifted discerns the more attenuated spiritual body and spiritual things which cannot be seen or discerned with the physical eye.

The nature of clairvoyance in this particular respect is so similar to the physical sense of sight that the one can no more be reached and prevented by legislative enactment than the other, consequently it must be the abuse of this gift or the improper use of the word to cover fraud and dishonesty that has no relation whatever to clairvoyance, that we are to deal with. Consequently the enactment and enforcement of this ordinance as it applies to clairvoyance, without some modifying feature, is hardly a practical thing to do.

Second—Furthermore, the practice of clairvoyance is an important part of the religion of Spiritualism; it furnishes proof of the continued life of was thus tricked out of $250 in money and $1,800 in jewelry. Another lady, lately passed to spirit life, was induced to give up $2,000 in bonds to one Rogers and could never regain a cent of it.

This lady who suggests that such persons should not be brought to judgment, should not be searched out, should not be molested by fraud-hunters, certainly approaches very near the line of actual criminality, an alder or abettor to crime and criminals.

Ever since we started this crusade against actual crime and criminals in our ranks, we have heard just such statements as this lady makes, BUT NEVER ONCE HAVE THEY EXPRESSED A SINGLE WORD OF SYMPATHY FOR THOSE WHO HAVE BEEN DECEIVED AND SWINDLED BY BOGUS TESTS OR BOGUS MATERIALIZATION.

But the spiritual atmosphere is gradually clearing, in this country and Europe, and the morale of our cause is advancing to a higher plane.

Read carefully what H. W. RICHARDSON, president of the New York State Spiritualist Association, has to say concerning these fraudulent practices—THEY ARE AN ACTUAL MENACE TO OUR CAUSE.

Hon. C. R. Schirm, Josephine B. Scott, N. H. Eddy, Dr. Wilkins and Mr. Wertz have something of special importance to say.

A PRACTICAL QUESTION.

Hon. Charles R. Schirm, an Ex-Congressman, and a Prominent Lawyer and Spiritualist of Baltimore, Md., Occupied the Platform of the First Spiritual Church of That City, the Speaker for the Evening, Mr. Oscar A. Egerly, Being Ill. Mr. Schirm Replicated to a Number of Written Questions, and Among Them to the Following.

Q. Why are mediums who practice fraud allowed to exercise their mediumship?

This is a practical question and I will try to answer it in a practical way. There are frauds in everything. Wherever influence, money or power is the just compensation for sincere and genuine service, there will be found the imitator and the fraud. There are frauds in the church; there are frauds in the courts; there are frauds among doctors; there are frauds among business men; there are frauds among mechanics and there are frauds among common laborers—every field of human activity has its small quota of frauds. Human nature is the same everywhere. Some callings on account of their confidential character offer greater opportunity for imposition and, therefore, are more attractive to those who seek to make a living by their wits.

There are fraud mediums, I regret to say, persons who profess to be mediums, but who are fakirs and tricksters, pure and simple. They have no spiritual power; they have no real connection with Spiritualism or spiritism or anything like them. They are men and women who are preying upon the community for the sake of pelf. They make sport of the tenderest sentiments of the human heart, and laugh up their sleeves at the unsuspecting souls they have duped. To expose this field of humbug and to expel them from the ranks of Spiritualism under whose banner they endeavor to shield their nefarious practices, is one of the most difficult problems with which the National Spiritualists Association has to grapple; and too much cannot be said in praise of the efforts of the spiritual press which is leading its way to that worthy end. This class of frauds is ingenious and insinuating; they affect all THE GRACES OF THE SPIRIT, and succeed often in making friends among honest Spiritualists, and sometimes deceive the "very elect" themselves. This makes the task all the harder, because in all sincerity, many of our good people rush to the defense of the impostors, believing they are aiding to exonerate those who are wrongfully accused.

It may be possible THAT A BAPTISM OF FIRE will yet have to accomplish the CLEANSING AWAY, the burning out of that BAND OF HEARTLESS IMPOSTORS. The time may come when every professed Spiritualist shall be compelled openly to renounce or espouse the truth as we know it, when suffering and sacrifice will be visited upon the heads of the true and the faithful. Then you may expect these so-called mediums, when accused of being Spiritualists, to repudiate the cause and, with cursing and swearing, say: "I know not the man." (Matthew 26:74.)

The fraud is no philanthropist, nor is he a patriot, and when the time comes for the display of moral or physical courage, he will flee from the camp and leave the protection of the WHITE AND GOLD FLAG OF SPIRITUALISM to the heroism of nobler souls.

We have also to deal with a problem that in some respects, is even more difficult than the one to which I have just directed your attention. We have mediums who have genuine gifts, who sometimes give true communications, and at other times false ones. What they give at one time is from the spirit, and what they give at another time is purely from themselves. This is largely due to the fact that we exact of our mediums to be at all times, as it were, "on tap." We seldom consider the time, the place or the conditions, but what we demand is "tests." We regard the medium as a sort of machine, created to serve us at all times. A medium must have no private griefs or sorrows; his or her mind must not be burdened with care, all the medium has to do is to be an impersonal something and to have even less attention than an actual machine. This demand upon the medium has brought with it a dread of losing prestige and support, and as a result, mediums have resorted to deception.

Again, poverty sometimes induces good mediums to resort to imposition, when they are unable to get anything from the spirit side; and, having once compromised with dishonesty, it is easy to slip into the habit. When the real and the spurious are intermingled, it is extremely difficult to distinguish them. The confidence established through a real and pertinent communication is not easily shaken. It covers a vast amount of stuff before we permit ourselves to suspect, and when we do suspect, even after we are convinced, we are restrained from attempting to expose the fraud by three considerations.

First, the difficulty of convincing others of what we ourselves are convinced; second, the fear of the enmity of the medium and her adherents; and third, the natural shrinking from quarrels and publicity.

Another evil that leads to a species of fraud is the attempt of HALF-DEVELOPED MEDIUMS TO DO PUBLIC WORK. It is a source of great chagrin and embarrassment to intelligent Spiritualists to listen to the twisting, guessing and apologizing of these raw recruits. But nobody likes to say anything, and so the wrong goes on.

There is still another class of people, usually new to Spiritualism, who imagine, as soon as they feel a chill down the back, that they are mediums, ordained to illumine the world. Mediums they may be, but they do not distinguish themselves between a lightning-rod and an arc lamp. But we take comfort in the fact that every human movement, in its early stages, has its crudities, and that everything in the world must be tried before it can be run wild. SPIRITUALISM IS NO EXCEPTION. EDUCATION, DISCIPLINE AND CULTURE WILL EVENTUALLY BRING A MORE PERFECT MEDIUMSHIP, AND A MORE PERFECT MEDIUMSHIP WILL BE THE MOST POTENT FACTOR IN THE EXCLUSION OF ALL FRAUDS.

This lady should exhibit sympathy for those who have been swindled, deceived, and their tender hearts torn to shreds—they are the ones who need it and not the villainous tricksters, that she would not have exposed.

This class never expresses any sympathy whatever for the deceived, but the deceiver—charity in abundance for him or her!

But the spiritual atmosphere is gradually clearing, in this country and Europe, and the morale of our cause is advancing to a higher plane.

Read carefully what H. W. RICHARDSON, president of the New York State Spiritualist Association, has to say concerning these fraudulent practices—THEY ARE AN ACTUAL MENACE TO OUR CAUSE.

To the Editor:—W. F. Shaw of Toledo, Ohio, has announced his intention of giving materialization of spirit forms in public through the mediumship of Mrs. E. B. Roberts whom as per card enclosed he advertises as having been in the employ of the Psychological Research Society of New York City for seven years. Before starting on his tour for the season he arranged for a seance at half price (50 cents) for advertising purposes in Maumee, Ohio. For several days he labored to elicit an audience, promising to give full form materialization in the light, figures that were to come from the cabinet across the room to their friends, give their names and converse in ordinary tones and dematerialize in a flash. At the same time he obtained an amount of local history and biography that he deemed sufficient for the purposes. At a late hour 8:30 p. m. (promised at 7 p. m.) Mrs. Roberts and two young men arrived. Mr. Shaw having preceded the party. As he entered the medium did not enter the circle until the cabinet was prepared and everything in readiness, he requested much of the help of Mrs. Roberts in the preparation. Even after she had entered the cabinet (an alcove curtained off from the sitting room) there was more pinning together and arranging of the curtains before "the forces" were satisfied. Then when settled down to business the performance began. All the light was from one window and the light was in a box with a semi-transparent screen, securing the feeble light. The falsetto voice of "dear Rosa" chattered nonsensical directions and explanations, and "the General" said to be the guide, belittled forth some adjustable sentences and the forms began to appear. None of the promises were fulfilled and it was the worst display imaginable. All the figures wore cream-colored cheese-cloth drapery, and resembled the pictures of Lazarus arising from the tomb. The audience was requested to sing (presumably while the medium was changing her togery, but to sing or play softly while the spirit was in view.) There was a ridiculous performance throughout, and all were thoroughly indignant. Some would not pay and others demanded their money back and got it, but the more timid were shamelessly cheated out of their money.

The whole outfit required for costuming the bogus spirits was easily concealed in the blouse waist and beneath the garments of Mrs. Roberts. All of the figures returned to the cabinet to dematerialize and the shadow of the person standing between it and the light concealed the sham sinking through the floor which was done apparently by skillful manipulation of the curtains. But a small part of the audience was given there, but the name and address of the audience are given as far as can be obtained, if any desire further information, and a description of the party follows:—Mr. Shaw is a portly, fine-looking man of about 55 years, with high forehead, dark hair, good features and possessed of a voice and manner of speaking that suggests insincerity.

husband," and the other as "his brother, Mr. Roberts," might well be mistaken for the mother of them, and is at least 60 years old in appearance, she has dark complexion, with long, drooping nose, long chin, deep set mouth, and uncertain, shrinking manner. With a muslin band across forehead and hair and wig over both she represented an aged gentleman, but evidently she was unable to obtain a good description of Gen. Hunt, the former owner of the old historic home in which the meeting was held.

The faces of the lady spirits were covered with gauze and were averted whenever one attempted to get a good view as the light would admit of. The following persons were present and can be addressed for information on the deception so insulting to the intelligence of the circle: Mr. and Mrs. Saunders Van Ransselaer, Mrs. Mabel Howard, Mrs. C. Schinke, Mrs. Catharine Phillips, Mrs. Edith Westfall, Mr. and Mrs. N. P. Glann, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. I. Scott, all of Maumee; Mr. Sydney Phillips, Mrs. Jennette Charles and friend, Mrs. Stickle of Perryburg, O. There were others but cannot at present give exact address.

A WARNING TO THE PUBLIC.

Alleged Mediums Clearly Exposed in Buffalo, N. Y.—How Long, Oh! Angels of Light, Love and Purity, How Long is our Grand Cause to Be Afflicted With "Phenomena" Produced by Legerdemain or Deception?

To the Editor:—During the last two months there has been an advertisement in the Buffalo papers of a woman named Roberts who had been giving materializing seances at No. 90 Tracey street, which, according to reports, has been very well attended.

There are two gentlemen in Buffalo by the names of H. H. Hoyt and Geo. I. Allen who are investigators along the lines of Spiritualism. Thinking this would be a good opportunity to pursue the investigation, they proceeded to No. 90 Tracey street, for the purpose of investigation, and the following account will explain how they succeeded.

Before starting they had made up their minds that the "phenomena" was the result of fake work, pure and simple, and they went prepared to meet it on these grounds.

You are aware that an undertaking of this kind requires a great deal of what is commonly known as "nerve" on the part of anyone who attempts to make a thorough investigation. One never knows what is to run up against. Should the operators be what is commonly known as fakirs, they are, undoubtedly always prepared to meet any and all interference with their methods. I might say that these two men, though not very large in stature, are supplied with an abundance of the aforesaid "nerve."

At a short description of the seance room might interest some of your readers. The room is about sixteen feet square. In one corner was a small curtained cabinet in which the medium took her position, she being a woman of medium size. Directly in the opposite corner, up next to the ceiling was a shelf and a curtain behind which Robert placed a small light lamp. From that curtain running along the ceiling over the cabinet was a string which manipulated a rolling curtain behind the fixed curtain of gauze, by which they controlled the light, making the room light or dark to suit their convenience.

After placing this light on the shelf they proceeded to "Nearer, My God, to Thee," after which a small weak voice was heard in the cabinet purporting to be that of a child four years old, the cabinet control. Then Roberts informed the audience, which contained about twenty-four people, that the forces were about to commence operations. He then proceeded to turn out the light, making the room dark, with the exception of the faint light in the corner, as explained before.

After singing another song, there came from the cabinet a stentorian voice that General So-and-So had arrived. Very soon a large form appeared, which was outlined by phosphorescent lights. He proceeded around the circle, shaking hands with quite a number, and then retired to the cabinet. Roberts informed the audience that this was the spirit that would bring others which would appear later. This General was about 5 feet 10 inches, perhaps 6 feet tall, the medium being an ordinary-sized woman, probably 5 feet 4 inches tall, making a very good impression on the gullible people in the audience who believed in all they saw. Then several other forms appeared.

Hoyt and Allen were located in one corner of the room under the light on the shelf. An Indian chief appeared, and proceeded to shake hands with a few of the audience, and then he helped Roberts lead the spirit around, bringing the spirit directly in front of Hoyt and Allen. Allen being armed with an electric torch, placed it directly in front of the supposed Indian's face, and touched the button. The light did the rest! The Indian turned out to be a man who some claimed—was a medium, another, and others claimed was her son.

Immediately there was a perfect bedlam let loose, everyone springing to their feet and exclaiming, "fake! fake!" and trying to light the gas. Roberts and the so-called Indian used their best efforts to stop them. After a short time, some one opened a door which led to a small room. After Roberts and his assistant both had their paraphernalia all safely stored away, the light was lit. In the meantime, the medium lying on the floor, had Roberts exclaiming, "Do you want to kill this medium? She is now in a dead faint." At the same time, she was yelling at the top of her voice in a faint.

Then, after denouncing Roberts and his pals, Hoyt and Allen demanded that they refund the money taken, which was 50 cents per head. Roberts refunded the money to each and every one present. The landlady of the house made her appearance and informed Hoyt and Allen that they were formed Hoyt and Allen that they were in a private house and that she would have them arrested for a disturbance. They took a different view of it, claiming that it was an advertised affair, and charging admission for some, made it a public affair, and they had a right to be there and a right to their money, and they had proved they had been defrauded.

If Roberts continues this performance in Buffalo, he will have some one besides Hoyt and Allen after him.

PRECAUTIONARY MEASURES.

Mr. J. A. Wertz Presents Certain Test Conditions Which Will Prevent Trickery or Deception on the Part of the Medium.

Now that a great many mediums are anxious to convince the public that their work is genuine—are willing to sit under strict test conditions in fact, and, moreover, in many instances do give seances under such conditions, the writer has invented an apparatus which promises to meet the requirements of both medium and investigator. We feel assured that it will especially please that class who prefer to give their seances under test conditions. I might mention two or three materializing mediums who always insist upon giving their seances with their feet in a pan filled with flour, their hands filled with bran and tied fast to their chairs.

Now my wire cabinet is vastly superior to the methods just named. The medium is not required to sit for an hour or even longer, in a cramped position as he necessarily would be with his hands in a rigid position in giving a seance in the manner indicated above. On the contrary he sits inside this wire cabinet, with the free use of his hands and feet. The superiority of this wire cabinet over all the test seance apparatuses now in use must be apparent to all. There is no patent on my invention, and all are cordially invited to use it. Its superior merits will no doubt make it popular with the various state and local societies as well as with the mediums themselves. Its use in test seances will supplant all other devices used in the test seance room without doubt.

And this is how my wire cabinet is made: First, secure 18 feet of poultry netting with a width of four feet, then cut off four feet, leaving a strip 12 feet in length. Bring the ends together and fasten them with bits of wire. This makes a cylinder 4 feet wide and 4 feet high. Next trim the 4-foot strip previously mentioned into a disk, fasten this over the top of the cylinder, and the cabinet is ready for use. In giving a test trumpet seance the medium should be seated in the center of the room. The cabinet is then dropped over the medium, and fastened to the floor with staples—or carpet tacks will answer quite as well.

A paper box or some other light article should be placed upon the top of the cabinet. Then place the trumpet on this box. The trumpet itself should be coated with a small quantity of phosphorus, enough to make it distinguishable in the darkened room. Fraud would be out of the question so far as the medium is concerned. The only flaw in the arrangement would be the possibility of trickery upon the part of a confederate. But this danger may be well nigh disposed of by caution exercised in choosing the members to form the circle.

For a test materializing seance the wire cabinet may be used in the same manner as in the trumpet seance. The medium is seated inside the wire cabinet which is to be placed inside of the cabinet proper in the presence of the investigator. From the illustration it will be seen that our cabinet is certainly a great improvement, and since their cost is of no consequence, and that anyone can make one in a few minutes, we hope to see them in general use.

There is still another class of people, usually new to Spiritualism, who imagine, as soon as they feel a chill down the back, that they are mediums, ordained to illumine the world. Mediums they may be, but they do not distinguish themselves between a lightning-rod and an arc lamp. But we take comfort in the fact that every human movement, in its early stages, has its crudities, and that everything in the world must be tried before it can be run wild. To the Editor:—W. F. Shaw of Toledo, Ohio, has announced his intention of giving materialization of spirit forms in public through the mediumship of Mrs. E. B. Roberts whom as per card enclosed he advertises as having been in the employ of the Psychological Research Society of New York City for seven years. Before starting on his tour for the season he arranged for a seance at half price (50 cents) for advertising purposes in Maumee, Ohio. For several days he labored to elicit an audience, promising to give full form materialization in the light, figures that were to come from the cabinet across the room to their friends, give their names and converse in ordinary tones and dematerialize in a flash. At the same time he obtained an amount of local history and biography that he deemed sufficient for the purposes. At a late hour 8:30 p. m. (promised at 7 p. m.) Mrs. Roberts and two young men arrived. Mr. Shaw having preceded the party. As he entered the medium did not enter the circle until the cabinet was prepared and everything in readiness, he requested much of the help of Mrs. Roberts in the preparation. Even after she had entered the cabinet (an alcove curtained off from the sitting room) there was more pinning together and arranging of the curtains before "the forces" were satisfied. Then when settled down to business the performance began. All the light was from one window and the light was in a box with a semi-transparent screen, securing the feeble light. The falsetto voice of "dear Rosa" chattered nonsensical directions and explanations, and "the General" said to be the guide, belittled forth some adjustable sentences and the forms began to appear. None of the promises were fulfilled and it was the worst display imaginable. All the figures wore cream-colored cheese-cloth drapery, and resembled the pictures of Lazarus arising from the tomb. The audience was requested to sing (presumably while the medium was changing her togery, but to sing or play softly while the spirit was in view.) There was a ridiculous performance throughout, and all were thoroughly indignant. Some would not pay and others demanded their money back and got it, but the more timid were shamelessly cheated out of their money.

The whole outfit required for costuming the bogus spirits was easily concealed in the blouse waist and beneath the garments of Mrs. Roberts. All of the figures returned to the cabinet to dematerialize and the shadow of the person standing between it and the light concealed the sham sinking through the floor which was done apparently by skillful manipulation of the curtains. But a small part of the audience was given there, but the name and address of the audience are given as far as can be obtained, if any desire further information, and a description of the party follows:—Mr. Shaw is a portly, fine-looking man of about 55 years, with high forehead, dark hair, good features and possessed of a voice and manner of speaking that suggests insincerity.

care, all the medium has to do is to be an impersonal something and to have even less attention than an actual machine. This demand upon the medium has brought with it a dread of losing prestige and support, and as a result, mediums have resorted to deception.

Again, poverty sometimes induces good mediums to resort to imposition, when they are unable to get anything from the spirit side; and, having once compromised with dishonesty, it is easy to slip into the habit. When the real and the spurious are intermingled, it is extremely difficult to distinguish them. The confidence established through a real and pertinent communication is not easily shaken. It covers a vast amount of stuff before we permit ourselves to suspect, and when we do suspect, even after we are convinced, we are restrained from attempting to expose the fraud by three considerations.

First, the difficulty of convincing others of what we ourselves are convinced; second, the fear of the enmity of the medium and her adherents; and third, the natural shrinking from quarrels and publicity.

Another evil that leads to a species of fraud is the attempt of HALF-DEVELOPED MEDIUMS TO DO PUBLIC WORK. It is a source of great chagrin and embarrassment to intelligent Spiritualists to listen to the twisting, guessing and apologizing of these raw recruits. But nobody likes to say anything, and so the wrong goes on.

There is still another class of people, usually new to Spiritualism, who imagine, as soon as they feel a chill down the back, that they are mediums, ordained to illumine the world. Mediums they may be, but they do not distinguish themselves between a lightning-rod and an arc lamp. General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must be accepted for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that the Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work and it is essential that all copy to insure insertion in our paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be submitted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE.—That all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES OF YOUR POEMS sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

The Rising Sun Mission Bazaar commences on the 11th of May, and ends on the 25th, instead of the 4th to the 25th.

Wm. Emmette Coleman writes: "In the great fire in San Francisco, Cal., I lost my large library and practically everything else I had in the world. Many of the other Spiritualists have lost their all."

Mrs. Arthur Howe, who was in the San Francisco disaster, writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "Everything is a complete wreck, and all we own in the world now is a small grip with just enough clothes to take us through a week's convention in Santa Barbara and Los Angeles. We are with Mrs. Dye, and will remain for a while."

Correspondent writes: "The Chicago Spiritual Alliance Society, holding services at 3514 Vincennes avenue, in Vincennes Hall, are favored at all services with large and appreciative audiences. On Sunday, May 7, we had with us Mrs. E. Beel and Prof. H. S. Fraser, test mediums. Plenty of tests at all the services. A cordial invitation is extended to all interested in the manifestation of things spiritual to attend the meetings. Mrs. May Elmo, pastor."

H. D. Morgan writes: "Sunday, April 29, closed the services for the season held by the first Association of Spiritualists of which I am a member. Rev. Nellie S. Baade, who has ministered to the Association during April, held a very pleasing consecration service Sunday evening, which Mrs. Baade will later on report in detail. Mrs. M. J. Stephens gave a benefit service for the San Francisco homeless ones May 1. She was assisted by Mrs. M. T. Longley, Mrs. J. Warnock, and Mrs. M. J. Stephens, which netted with the contribution sent to Mrs. Stephens a goodly sum."

W. H. Mitchell writes from St. Joseph, Mo.: "I cannot close this note without thanking you for the noble work you and The Progressive Thinker are doing for the grand philosophy of Spiritualism. Long live you and your noble paper, to stand up for truth against fraud, superstition and ignorance, all of which will ultimately land in hell of their own making. There are a great many Spiritualists in this city, and some good mediums, but not near the harmony I would love to see among Spiritualists."

N. H. Eddy writes from Buffalo, N. Y.: "Sunday, April 29, Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn of Boston, closed a month's engagement with the First Spiritual Church of Buffalo, N. Y. Her lectures and poems have been given from subjects handed up from the audience, and they were very able discourses. Mrs. Allyn is a bright and intellectual woman. She has a very pleasant faculty of inspiring and interesting her audiences. Her labors have been satisfactory, and we await her return in 1907, when she is expected to serve our society for a month or two."

Mrs. H. H. Howe writes: "The Psychic Research Society of Rockford, Ill., are entertaining their audiences with some of the best talent in the spiritual ranks. We have had since the first of the year, Harrison D. Barrett, Dr. G. B. Warner, Georgia Gladys Cooley, Mrs. E. J. Hansen, Ella J. Bloom, Mrs. West, Mrs. Burdette, and others. May 13 we are to have Harrison D. Barrett again for an afternoon and evening. Those wishing to can bring their lunch and join the picnic party in the dining-room adjoining the hall. May 29 we are to have a sociable and dance. Admission twenty-five cents. Collins' Orchestra."

Elizabeth J. Jaquet writes: "It was my privilege again to unite with the Golden Rule Society at Paulina street, both with its afternoon and evening meetings, which are always well attended. In the afternoon, Mrs. Hill, Mrs. Hansen and Mrs. Jaquet gave short talks and messages. Mrs. Soxemith was our musician for the afternoon, as Mrs. Cole was absent, but the evening brought her healing face and her sweet, and we were glad to have her with us. his spirit guides into an eloquent, forcible and convincing speaker, scientific in his arguments and positive in his assertions, deduced from personal experience. Trance mediumship of that kind proves to be a blessing and should be encouraged by all possible means. If mortals would furnish the very best conditions for their mediums, they would receive better results every day. Mediumship is like a tender plant that must not be exposed to the cold, piercing winds of human selfishness, as it will droop, wither and fade away in loneliness, want and despair, the fruits of neglect and wrong treatment. Give mediumship all the sunshine possible; be kind to it, encourage it and treat it with forbearance and patience if you want it to thrive and develop in all its beauty of heavenly inspiration. Mediumship is a gift from heaven; without this world would be a bleak, barren desert without hope and without joy; let us, then, take care of our mediums."

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "On Sunday afternoon the Rising Sun Mission had for its speaker Sister E. Briggs, who asked for questions and replies, the following: 'How can I best help earth-bound spirits?' and 'Was the destruction of San Francisco an act of Providence?' She answered them satisfactorily as was evidenced by the complimentary remarks. Brothers Thompson and Jones did their share of work in voicing messages from the other world. Dr. J. H. Randall was our speaker for the evening, his lecture being helpful and instructive. It was gratifying to note the presence of such noted out-of-town workers as Mrs. DeWolf-Klier of Des Moines, Ia., Mr. Chas Peterson and mother of Michigan, and several prominent Spiritualists from Aurora. Sister Susie Thompson pleased her friends by giving up to her guides and delivering test after test, the expected ones who felt decidedly better for having attended the Rising Sun Mission. Mrs. E. Briggs will again be with us on Sunday afternoon, May 13, and Dr. J. H. MacFarland will address us in the evening. Our bazaar will attract hundreds of strangers and make them acquainted with Spiritualism and its blessings. Are you not going to the bazaar? Every Spiritualist of Chicago is interested in the success of our bazaar as it means a permanent home for the diffusion of Spiritualism in Chicago. Don't what you can in articles, money, or good, helpful thoughts and help us help others."

Wm. Hassmann writes: "With gratitude to the members as well as the friends of the North Star Spiritual Union at their 1541 Milwaukee avenue, we welcome, Sister Lester Krueger Sunday evening, April 29, after having been confined to her home for a couple of weeks on account of being sick. She is still yet a little under the weather. She bravely faced the storm, and the lecture she gave on 'How Children Can Be Trained to Practice the Golden Rule,' was fully deserving of a well-earned while for every parent to bear in mind. Sister Miller gave some splendid readings from questions. She is a very good and true test medium, and we hope that she will be with us again in the near future. We also invite other mediums to visit us on meeting nights as new forces bring new thoughts. The Progressive Thinker, which is for sale at all our meetings, should find its way into every home."

Arthur S. Howe, president of the California State Spiritualist Association, and editor and publisher of the Occidental Mystic, writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "Our entire home, personal effects and printing plant of the Occidental Mystic, of 600 N. Hyde street, San Francisco, was destroyed by fire, but was aided by the Spiritualists of California, hope to soon commence its re-publication. Our subscribers will kindly send to us at 1127 W. 18th street, Los Angeles, their names and addresses, and date of expiration, if possible. All renewals, new subscriptions or donations toward the re-publication of the Occidental Mystic will be gratefully acknowledged. Exchanges and friends will assist us greatly by extending this notice by the editors."

Della B. Platt writes: "Mrs. Marian Carpenter, a true worker and fine lecturer, was with us a few Sundays ago. Following her came Dr. J. M. Peebles, that veteran worker in the cause, and we truly feel that we have been very benefited. Mrs. Carpenter was with us that grand worker, Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie, who gives us fine spiritual words of truth and wisdom. The 13th of this month we are to have a christening at the morning service, and a flower memorial in the evening for our loved ones gone before."

Jacob Norvall, the healer, writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "Jacob W. Norvall, Jr., sold his business in San Francisco for a short time. He met with Prof. Sabig there, a Hindu, and medium, and was told to leave inside of three days or he would meet with injury. He left just the day before the disaster, to join me in this city."

R. Mitchell writes: "The Spiritualist Church of the Students of Nature at 761 W. North avenue, had a treat April 29, when Sister Frava with her beautiful spiritual instructions. Sister Kirchner surprised our society with her convincing tests. Dr. O. E. Miller and sister will be with us May 13."

Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie writes from Battle Creek, Mich.: "The meeting of last Sunday, April 29, was largely attended and a warm welcome tendered the writer. It has been nine years since last lecturing here. Many changes have taken place, but also many familiar faces met me. I am slowly but surely regaining strength and courage, and with the help of the unseen ones feel that I will be able to carry out all plans for the season's work."

W. J. Howes writes: "My wife and I will be going on our vacation the latter part of May, and will be in the vicinity of St. Paul, Minn., and Rush City, Minn., for about three weeks and would be pleased to receive the attention and waiting engagements during that period. Address me at No. 2108 W. Congress street, Chicago, Ill."

E. W. Sprague and wife, the N. S. A. Missionaries, are engaged to serve at the following named camp-meetings at the coming season: Hallett Park, Mich., August 2 to 7 inclusive; Clinton, Iowa, August 9 to 14; Delphos, Kans., August 17 to 26; Winfield, Kans., August 28 to Sept. 3. Last Monday they went to Beardstown, Ill., for three or four days. They organized a society at Macomb, Ill., consisting of 32 members.

F. H. Eggleston, president, writes from Fort Worth, Texas: "We had a delightful time the other evening and I got so enthused it caused me to write these few lines that way out in Texas we can get spiritual manifestations, though we do wear horns sometimes. Thursday evening, April 26, Mrs. Isa Wilson Kayner of Dallas, who is a speaker of that society, came over and gave us a test seance. The house was packed and the most of the people were skeptics. She gave all tests except, which took her about three or four hours on her feet. Her work was grand. She convinced everyone there was something in this truth. She was to return to Dallas that night but the people kept her over here until Saturday. Oh! such a noble character, may she reap a hundred fold for her faithful and good work. She will ever be remembered in the hearts of the people. I was just talking to Mr. and Mrs. Holt, members of the society, who said that they received a letter from an old friend and Spiritualist of this city who moved to San Francisco last year. This letter was received two or three months ago, stating not to write him at San Francisco; that he was going to leave there for the reason that he was to leave the city for it would be destroyed, which he did. Oh! if we had the proper conditions our friends on the other side could communicate with us and save us a world of sorrow."

The Great Blessing of Death. Have You Read

Rev. A. P. Fitch's Sermon at Mt. Vernon Church, Boston, Mass.,—Splendor of Faith, Heroism of Devotion All Revealed. When Men's Souls Pass to Great Beyond—Francis Bailey Woodbury Says It is a "Sample of New England Orthodoxy, Printed in the Boston Advertiser, an Old Conservative Paper."

Rev. Albert P. Fitch, pastor of the Mt. Vernon Congregational church, Beacon street, at the morning service at that church yesterday, preached on "The Blessing of Death." Mr. Fitch dwelt on the great good which has been accomplished by death, and the omnipresence of the spirits of the departed.

He took his text from the 15th verse, chapter 12, of the Acts: "And they said unto her, 'Thou art mad, but the consoling affirmed that it was ever so. Then said they, 'It is an angel.'"

Mr. Fitch first dwelt on the persecutions of Herod and the many Christians who met death at his hands, and the great significance of their deaths to the church.

"It was a disheartened church for Herod had stretched for his hand," said the preacher. "To James and Peter all the disciples turned, and now one of them had received baptism and had perished by the headman's hand. But I would have you see that even here the death of James and the imprisonment of Peter had all done their work. So stricken to the heart was the church by James' death that it was a baptism of blood. Then and there before the tribunal declared his faith, and accused and accused went forth to death together."

"Each Christian, so the church believes, is in the care of a spiritual being. There is a higher one that guards our life. I think many of us when we come to our supreme crisis are overwrought with the solemn sense that it is not we, but that spirit who enables us by some beneficence to dominate the storm of passion. Surely the belief of the church in these guardian angels is beautiful."

"I think there is no more touching subject for us as we grow older, and as one by one go those whom we love, than this connection between the spirits that live there and the spirits that live here. Is it the physical presence which makes men dear to us? No, it is the heart to heart that makes men live but the hand into the hand. True comradeship here is invisible. It is invisible."

G. L. Benson writes: "On Sunday evening we attended the meeting of Mrs. Mary B. Hill, known as the Moon Lodge, and there found a house filled. I saw there for the first time a Spiritualist seance. Certainly the ceremony was very beautiful and impressive. It was the baptism of a young man, and the words of hope and encouragement which were given, not only to the young man, but to all who were present, were those which would tend to help each to live better."

S. A. Sherman writes from Stevens Point, Wis.: "I delivered the funeral address of Mr. David R. Rodgers a few days ago in this city. He was a prominent citizen. I have delivered about a dozen funeral addresses of some of the most prominent people in the country."

Frank B. Henderson writes: "I find my time for renewing is drawing near, and you have been pleased to remind me of that fact. I have kept the fact steadily in view. It is unnecessary to remind me on such occasions, for your loss of my subscription can never equal my appreciation of the absolute need of the Progressive Thinker. I just can't do without it."

The Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association.

The Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association held its annual convention in Milwaukee, April 22-24, at Lincoln Hall.

Sunday, April 21, the local societies held an afternoon and evening mass meeting at Severance Hall. Both meetings were well attended. Mr. Brooks acted as chairman. All local mediums as well as Mr. W. J. Erwood, Mrs. C. McFarlin and Mrs. Coffman, spoke encouragingly of the advancement of Spiritualism. The lectures given by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond during the convention were received with much appreciation.

The work of Mrs. Coffman as test medium, was well received. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

Rev. Geo. H. Brooks, president, Wheaton, Ill.; Mrs. Catharine McFarlin, vice-president, LaCrosse; Mrs. Emma J. Owen, second vice-president, Whitewater; Miss Louise G. Loebel, secretary, Milwaukee; Mr. W. E. Bristol, treasurer, Oakfield; trustees, Mrs. Amanda Snyder, Milwaukee; Mr. W. F. Worthing, Oakfield; Dr. F. L. Mehtrens, Milwaukee, and Mrs. Julia Smead, Milwaukee.

The convention was a financial as well as a spiritual success. The president will publish an open letter telling the true standing of the association. LOUISE G. LOEBEL, Secretary W. S. S. A.

definable, it is a kind of sympathy, a kind of affinity. Do space or time, does the absence of the body here separate the lover from his beloved? And why then should the departing of the body, which is merely an accident of life, change the communion of soul to soul?

"When men's immortal spirits are free from the incubance of the body is there not something which gives to a man a renewed blessedness? Do you think that God has kept his blessings for this world only in the blessedness of life? I say to you there is blessing in that thing which we call death."

"First of all I will have you note this solemn fact: there are some great purposes which cannot be wrought out by life and which must be accomplished by death. Ever and ever all history of mankind shows that to accomplish some consummation as it has been expedient for a man to die. The faith for which men die, by their death conquers the world. Life is always growing out of death. Death is always been the world's greatest blessing."

"There was John Brown, a struggling woolen dealer. He could not do anything for the slaves until he died for them. The day he died emancipation was assured. Has there been any light in the world, any act of heroism, any great revelation that so effects as the death of one? Abraham Lincoln was never the power in these United States before his death that he was after. His death was a power in itself."

"Nor is it simply the rare souls that bless the world when they go over. What is it we find always? To see the splendor of faith, the heroism of devotion, and death is the great enlightener of these things. It rends the veil of prejudice. As a man lies in death you begin to know him, and the essence of his character is revealed to you. And by his death you and the world come to know death. Death makes us a string of high and holy hopes. The dearest blessing in death is the communion of saints. It makes us believe that heaven is not a Hebrew city, but a reality."

"We should take death for what it is and bless God. It is an enlarging of powers. It is the taking of the scales from the eyes. It is adding one more to the cloud of blessed spirits who encompass us about. They are not gone, they are here to help, part of this atmosphere. Then shall we not live in the sight of God and God's saints?"

GOD, MAN AND THE EARTHQUAKE

As Graphically Illustrated by the Truth Seeker Editor—"Nothing Has Been Heard From God Except Another Slight Shock or Two, Just to Remind the People That He Still Lives."

San Francisco is rapidly recovering from the disaster of the earthquake, and the homeless who remain there are being fed and sheltered and otherwise provided for to the best of man's ability. Nothing has been heard from God except another slight shock or two just to remind people that he still lives. No muna, no quails, have been sent from heaven, on the contrary one relief train bearing food and supplies had to be delayed by a towerman to avoid collision with a passenger train—but that was all the work of man: relief train, rails, tower, towerman and all. No creator anywhere around. No still small voice after the fire which came after the earthquake, but the Lord passed by. He said no power to the faint, and to the stricken he gave no strength."

But the people of San Francisco—that great city which in an hour is come to naught—the people helped every one his neighbor, except the thieves who were shot down for plundering the dead; and every one on the brother, he of good cheer, and took another shot at a prowling robber. So the carpenter encouraged the goldsmith, and the blacksmith his helper, and scripture was fulfilled in some way, to the great relief of the plous. But God was never a refuge and strength, never a present help in the trouble, as the people had much fear when the succeeding slight shocks were felt. Even the youths were faint and weary, and the young men utterly failed, the militia in their insanity shooting the rescuers. The promises of the Bible went all awry. The power, the wisdom, the justice, the love of God was never for a moment manifest. General Funston was the omnipotent, Mayor Schmitz the omniscient, with Governor Pardee a good second to both. The whole people of the country were the Great Benevolence. They have contributed directly and indirectly. Men with cash have given big checks, storekeepers have given provisions and clothes, barber shops and bar-rooms have given a day's receipts, concerts, circuses, theatres, all have swelled the fund, even churches and Sunday-schools have forgotten the heathen for a moment and given their pennies to a worthy cause.

But man, born of woman, and that not miraculously, has done it all. God's part was to bring the desolation. He pressed the button, man did the rest. If anyone finds in this any cause to thank God, he is a poor and mean-spirited creature for whom a special earthquake ought to be prepared. The great fish was for Jonah. The thinkers of God for the catastrophe are of the class which believes "the whole story, and of any lower class of mentality it is impossible to conceive."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called for such a host of respondents that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby as terse, while all things to be said are crowded into a few lines. We are weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give what information I am able to the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is exacted.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Levi Wood: Q. Was the Leland Stanford University founded by the advice of spirits?

A. I will answer this question by giving in full an editorial on the subject, from the Kalamazoo Telegraph. I do so for the reason that this journal has not been over partial to Spiritualism, and hence its endorsement indicates the wonderful change which recently has been shown by many reputable newspapers and magazines.

Moreover, the article gives a full and fair presentation of the subject, leaving nothing to be asked for. While at Lake Pleasant camp, I met Mr. and Mrs. Stanford. They came on a hasty visit for the purpose of consulting the spirit of their son, through Maud Lord. Mrs. Tuttle and I had the pleasure of sitting in the chairs held for their special benefit. That was before the world had any intimation of the building of the great university. Mr. and Mrs. Stanford desired to converse with their son, in heart to heart communion, but even more they wished to learn his desires and have his advice on the great work which was to be his monument. If it be asked, "What has Spiritualism done for the world?" let the Kalamazoo Telegraph answer:

"Every great undertaking has for its vital principle the concept of a masterful mind. The outward form in which such ideas find expression may be obliterated. But not so with the ideas. They survive everything except the conditions that compelled their birth."

"Leland Stanford, Jr., University at Palo Alto, Cal., was more than the concept of a masterful mind. It was the last grand passion of a strong man who violated custom by having his greatest passion in his old age; it was the brain and heart-child of a woman bowed with grief, and if this man and this woman were right, the university was established and its great end was reached. In obedience to the expressed wish of their only son—a son who died at the threshold of manhood and whispered from the land of spirits his wish that his parents should bequeath their enormous fortune to the creation of a great university."

"Leland Stanford, Jr., University will therefore survive the shock of earthquake, because the idea that gave it existence still lives. It will live even though the man and the woman who expressed the idea are dead, and most of its fifteen buildings are in ruins, with a resultant loss of over $4,000,000, because the need of a great place of learning for the youth of the land still exists."

"A broken heart will run through many editions," said Oscar Wilde, speaking of books. Leland Stanford, Jr., University stands the greatest strength lies in the fact that it was founded on two broken hearts. The Stanfords had an only child—a son—who bore the name of the father and was the idol of the mother. When this boy was a toddler Stanford was engaged in his great undertaking of building the Central Pacific railway. The work dragged, and Stanford went to take command. Away into the mountains he went, and in 239 days he built 530 miles of railway. In this time he was home but once. And that once was to see this boy who had fallen ill."

"In 1884 the boy was sent east to college. The parting was not without a fresh pang on the part of the doting mother, who disliked to see her boy go far away. But it seemed best that he should go, and she gave him up. Little did she know that she was giving him up for ever. He came back in a baggage car—dead."

That was the real birth of the university whose buildings have just fallen. Always inclined toward Spiritualism, the Stanfords now became devotees to it. Only their feet touched the earth. In thought and in soul they were millions of miles away—away from their son in the land beyond the stars. And one day they came back to the earth with a message.

"It was a message from their son. This son, they told their friends, desired them to build a great university for the sons and daughters of other parents and to bestow upon it all of their fortune."

"That settled it. They never questioned the wisdom or the lack of wisdom of the proceeding. It was enough for them to know that their son wanted them to do this thing. And straightway they proceeded to do it."

"The grant of endowment was made the next year after the boy's death—in 1885. It conveyed to the university about 90,000 acres of land in California. This grant included the Palo Alto ranch of 9,000 acres in Tehama county and the Gridley ranch of 22,000 acres in Butte county. Two and a half millions in cash were also thrown in, making the total endowment $40,000,000.

The cornerstone was laid in 1887, and the university was opened to students in 1891.

"The university was thus fairly on its feet in 1893, when Senator Stanford died. But the events of the next few years showed that the troubles of the institution had just begun—financial troubles that Stanford never dreamed would appear."

"Possibly it was merely fate trying to show the world the fiber of Mrs. Stanford, but, at any rate, the United States government began suit to recover from the Stanford estate millions upon millions that were claimed to be due the government as interest upon a loan made to aid Stanford to build the Central Pacific. The instant the suit was brought the Stanford estate was tied up. The university was in imminent danger of being compelled to close its door for lack of money to pay current expenses when Mrs. Stanford came to its rescue. Like Queen Isabella of Spain, when Columbus wanted some money, Mrs. Stanford had some jewels. They were rare jewels—jewels such as Isabella had not."

"Mrs. Stanford never said anything about her intentions, but one day she called the trustees of the university together and gave them $3,000,000. She had sold her gems."

"Then began the good luck of the university that lasted until last Wednesday morning. The government lost its suit against the Stanford estate and the $3,000,000 originally devoted to the university was released. And when Mrs. Stanford died about a year ago, she gave to the university the last dollar that remained of the Stanford estate—about $6,000,000, making its total endowment $36,000,000."

"Inside the quadrangle at Palo Alto are buried the ashes of the man, the woman and the boy whose existence made the university possible. The man and the woman were strong in many ways, but in no way so much as in the strength of their love for their son."

Abbie E. Culver: Q. What is the meaning of "Plerian spring," in the following lines:

"A little learning is a dangerous thing, Drink deep, or taste not the Plerian spring?"

A. A celebrated fountain near Corinth. It flowed from many fountains of the rock and from early times attracted attention. The flow of water was in the high tide of Greek civilization increased by cutting into the rock, and the torrent was received in a marble basin. It was named after the nymph Pleron, who in the beautiful myth dissolved in tears after the death of her son, slain by Diana. It was here the winged horse Pegasus, was seized by Bellerophon, as it came to drink, before attacking the Chimæra. It was held sacred by the ancient poets, to the muses, and the coming of Pegasus to the spring, is the poetic way of speaking. Later the abundant sparkling stream became a symbol of knowledge, and to acquire learning was to drink of its waters. No other draft so inspired the poet, or sharpened the reason of the sage.

THE EXCELLENT WORKER.
MR. WILE J. ERWOOD.

He Retires Most Gracefully From a Position He Has Honored, and Pays a Well-Merited Compliment to G. H. Brooks, His Successor.

To the Editor:—For the first time in four years the writer knows what it is to be free from the cares of an executive work—a fact to be sure, a good deal of relief to him. Aside from the connection with the Westwood Camp Association, he now has no ties to prevent him from accepting engagements generally. With the close of the recent convention of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association, my correspondence has arisen to the position of "high private in the rear rank," as Geo. H. Brooks, the excellent worker from Wheaton, Ill., has stepped into the presidency of that association. In this change much wisdom has been shown, as Bro Brooks is a man of wide experience and versatility. A strong board has been elected to assist him in the work. Among them are Mrs. Catherine McFarlin, of Plainville, Minn., and Miss Louise Loebel, who is the new secretary.

The writer closed, just before the convention, an extensive missionary trip in this state; during this trip Mrs. Coffman of Grand Rapids, Mich., served the association as test medium. She is an excellent clairvoyant and clairaudient, as well as trance medium, and her work was well received by the many to whom she ministered. She was also the test medium at the convention, and did some very touching work there.

As the speaker of the occasion we had the incomparable Cora L. V. Richmond, whose presence acted as a magnet for the people. This lady needs no encomiums from me, but as I believe in giving our flowers while the worthy ones are still in the bud, I wish to say what is already widely known—that Mrs. Richmond's work is incomparable. The writer knew Mrs. Richmond, when he was a little fellow, going to the Catholic church. He was mightily afraid of her, because he had been told that she was "in league with the devil." The only fear he has of her now is that he will not be able to hear her as often as he would like to.

Brother William Richmond was present, and we enjoyed his companionship very greatly.

All in all, our convention was one of the best and most harmonious that the writer has ever attended in the good old state of Wisconsin.

The genial president of the Illinois State Association, Dr. Geo. B. Warner, spent a day with us, and greatly cheered us on our way. The way this excellent worker has grown in the last couple of years is a marvel.

Then we had that dear young man, A. J. Weaver, of the Morris Pratt Institute with us. What a jewel his lecture was, only those who had the privilege of listening thereto can understand.

The school was well represented by Brother Weaver and Secretary Emma J. Owen.

Many other good people were there, but as the State Secretary has undoubtedly written a full report, I need not mention them in detail. I will simply add that it was the strongest hope that the Spiritualists everywhere in this state, will rally to the support of President Brooks, and aid in carrying out the plans he has outlined for the ensuing year.

Relative to his own work the writer would say that he is contemplating a trip through Indiana, to begin very soon, and would be glad to hear from all the points therein that desire a visit from him while en route; and the latter part of August, and early part of September, he will be in Kansas, and would be glad to hear from societies and localities where there is a desire for a visit from him while in that vicinity.

"Being a sort of 'free lance' now, I will be glad to correspond with any societies wishing a speaker during all or a part of the coming fall and winter season. Address me at Black River Falls, Wis., for the present."

WILL J. ERWOOD.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Mass-Meeting at Whitewater, Wis., May 16 and 17.

There is to be a grand mass-meeting at Whitewater, Wis., for two days, following the annual meeting of the Morris Pratt Institute on the 15th. There is to be a good program offered to the friends. Mr. and Mrs. Hull will then be home. Mr. Hull is to assist Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond and others are expected to be there. The program to be carried out has not yet been arranged in full, but I can assure all who attend a glorious good time.

Thursday evening there is to be a social, one of the kind you read of. The school and friends of Whitewater will do all they can to make it pleasant for all who come.

I forgot to say in the proper place, that Mrs. McFarlin will also be present, also Dr. Mehrrens and wife, Miss Louise Loebel, secretary of the state society, and others.

This is the first mass meeting since the convention in Milwaukee, and it is to be followed by many others through the state.

Your humble servant, the writer of this, wishes the friends everywhere to arouse and let us all work with a will. I shall be present at the mass-meeting, and at all others to be held in the state. I will try and do my best by the friends. One and all who can, should attend the Whitewater meeting and enjoy the feast of things.

I will keep up my meetings in Milwaukee for the month of May, and assist one Sunday in the afternoon at Hodgerson's meetings; one Sunday at Hedgeron at Dr. Fred. Mehrrens', and the last Sunday we are to hold another union meeting at Severance Hall, afternoon and evening, and all the friends are invited. On Saturday evening the 26th, all the societies in Milwaukee are to have a party, for the benefit of the state society, and in the prospect now is that there will be a large attendance; so you see we are to keep the ball rolling.

G. H. BROOKS.

VARIOUS PERPLEXING PROBLEMS

Carefully Considered by Mrs. M. Emilie Kratz of Los Angeles, Cal.

The way of the transgressor is hard, if one should judge from the many writers who so openly and fearlessly denounce what is heretofore been accepted as truth by those professing to be seekers of truth, viz., Spiritualists who have for years accepted materialization as given by the many charlatans who have made their pretensions as being materializing mediums.

"The white dress, shoes and doll" have had a two-fold mission. First, some mortal was made the richer by the Mr. and Mrs. Gulliver's generosity. Second, its publicity has aroused not only doubt in the minds of those who are investigating Spiritualism, but it has brought forth sentiments and testimonies from those who by careful and studious investigation are willing to aid in turning the searchlight on these wrong-doers, who have for years been able to deceive even the elect, thus putting on their guard those desirous of only truth.

The question arises, since all true Spiritualists are desirous to have our ranks purified, is the materializing medium the only barometer that weighs our ship of truth? Are there not others, far more destructive in their dealings with human kind?

The materializing mediums are at least as harmless so far as their exhibition goes, they at least develop patience, if not common-sense, for who has not set for three long hours or more in some closed, air-tight room, breathing and rebreathing the foul, contaminated air of a dark seance room, for just this message: "I am glad to greet you—must go now—will have more strength next time. Come again." (One dollar, please.) Whilst in this we miss one dollar, yet the exhibition, and the pleasure of having embraced and kissed some supposed spirit, has made many of us soar skyward, so long as the delusion lasted.

All of the materialized spirits (supposed) as produced from the cabinet, that it was the writer's fortune to greet, at least made no pretensions at solving life's troubles and sorrows, for others, as is the case with many professing clairvoyants, who assume to be able, through their guides, to take the web of an individual life and weave and unweave it at will, in their business readings (also at one dollar per hour).

Then we have the locator of mines, who has caused more financial and mental wreckage, than all materializers combined, if this were a possibility. Many call upon them and their guides to just locate one mine (we will not be choiced—gold, silver or copper) for the sole benefit of our "Moses" and his school (including his faithful wife Mattie) so that their closing days of life's activity might be spent in the splendor of a restful home shelter. Would this be asking too much, of either medium or of the spirit world, whom these two have so faithfully served?

Then we have to contend with the wonderful developing medium, who has been instrumental of more souls being "obsessed," and division wrought in families, with great personal damage to the wonderful mediumship to be developed, through their guides—also at so much per development. Just so long as these conditions exist, must we expect the public and our secular press to brand us as lunatics.

WEIRD EXPERIENCES.

Spiritualism Is Advancing the World Over, and Occult Experiences Are Becoming Common.

Four investigations of spiritualistic phenomena relating their personal experiences to a large audience in the salon of the Royal Society of British artists.

The meeting was under the auspices of the London spiritualistic alliance, and the fragments of autobiography were of a decidedly good character. The narrative of Mr. George Spriggs, however, was, in the opinion of experts, the most remarkable of many extraordinary experiences related.

In December, 1884, said Mr. Spriggs, Mr. H. J. Brown, of Melbourne, lost two sons in a yachting accident. They had sailed away in a boat and not returned. Under control, he (Mr. Spriggs), who had not known the boys or heard of their death, was able to inform their mother of their fate, describing the exact place and time of the accident. One of the boys explained that his body had been eaten by a shark, but said that of his younger brother would be discovered.

Later came confirmation of the news received from the spirit world. On the following Sunday the youngest brother's body was found near the spot described by the medium. On December 27 a large shark was caught in Hobson's bay. It was cut open, and inside were found pieces of the waistcoat worn by the dead boy, his watch and chain and certain coins and other curios in his possession at the time of the accident.

The hands of the watch—an English lever—pointed to 9 o'clock, the very hour mentioned by the medium nine days previously.

In regard to this gruesome narrative even the Psychological Research Society, observed Mr. E. W. Wallis, who presided, could not find a flaw in the evidence.

Mr. Spriggs' control was a spirit known in life as Dr. Jenkins, who preferred, however, to call himself "Light." On one occasion "Light" had materialized himself in Mr. Spriggs' bedroom, and in answer to questions had stated his name.

Admiral Osborne Moore, a more recent convert to Spiritualism, who had been diligently pursuing his investigations in New York and England, declared that he had never known anyone who had served thirty years ago, and who was now in the spirit world, had made himself known to him at least twenty times.

An interesting incident was related by Mrs. W. P. Browne. On the death of her son, Horace, said this lady, she had instituted a memorial prize at a public college. In the year 1891 a book was printed with "The Horace Browne Memorial Prize" and the college arms. Unknown to any one but herself, she took one of these forms, folded twice, to a seance and held the folded sheet tightly in her hand. Twice attempts were made by materialized hands to drag the paper from her fingers. The third time she started up, and handed forward a little book, which she had written in a book were printed with "The Horace Browne Memorial Prize" and the college arms. Unknown to any one but herself, she took one of these forms, folded twice, to a seance and held the folded sheet tightly in her hand. Twice attempts were made by materialized hands to drag the paper from her fingers.

Although careful search was made in the room, the paper, says Mrs. Browne, had never been found. She herself entertained the point whatever but that it was taken away by her son.

THE ORIENTAL PLANE TREE.

The Part It Is to Play in Perpetuating the Memory of Wm. R. McGlenn.

The Lyceum of the Philadelphia Spiritualist Society held unique services in Independence Square, on Saturday afternoon, April 21, 1906, by planting an Oriental Plane Tree in memory of their late arisen leader, Wm. R. McGlenn. This is the first time the privilege of planting a tree in this old historic square has ever been granted any individual, corporation or society.

The privilege to hold exercises was secured by Mr. R. S. Williams, who also presented the tree, the only one of its kind in the square, to the society.

The Lyceum children opened the services of dedication. Each carrying an American flag, the band of about thirty children marched to the tree, where they gave the flag salute, and sang "The Star Spangled Banner."

Mr. S. Wheeler, president of the society, in his opening remarks spoke of Philadelphia's great heritage of patriotism, and referred feelingly to Washington, Franklin, Jefferson and Paine, and the place of Philadelphia in the history of colonial and revolutionary times. He then introduced Mr. Edgar W. Emerson, the speaker for the month, who spoke briefly of the historical association of the surroundings, and the sentiment which prompted the commemoration of the lives of those who have done things. He tried to impress upon the tender minds of the children the great heroes of the past, who made it possible for them to stand there that day and enjoy the privilege of a liberty-loving people.

After Miss Florence Clarke, a bright miss of 9 years, recited Wadsworth's "Lines Written in Early Spring," and the Lyceum sang "Shoulder to Shoulder," Mr. Williams presented Master Henry Shope with a spruce to be planted at the foot of the tree; then Mrs. Henry M. Shope, leader of the Lyceum, dedicated the tree. Sprinkling the trunk with a rose, she said: "I now dedicate this tree to commemorate the memory of Wm. R. McGlenn."

Mrs. Shope is leading all her energies to make the Lyceum a success, for she realizes how much the planting of this living monument means to the children, and how they would look back in after years and live over again under its branches, and will keep in memory with living green, the many kindnesses of their beloved leader, Mr. Wm. R. McGlenn.

Mrs. McGlenn, former assistant of her husband in the Lyceum, was present and assisted in the ceremonies. After the dedication the children of the Lyceum marched through Independence Hall, saluting the Liberty Bell as they entered, and gave the flag salute as they left the building. In showing the children through the Hall, Mrs. Shope particularly pointed out the faces of some of the great men of the past, and especially she spoke of the face of Thomas Paine, whose bust was lately admitted to the State House, and said that in the future she would tell them of his greatness.

LIFE and REMINISCENCES OF Col. Robert G. Ingersoll. By Edward C. Smith.

"The Record of a generous life runs like a vine around the memory of our dead, and every sweet unselfish act is now a perfumed flower."

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL was a great and brilliant man, he was the greatest genius of his age. His place is beside Shakespeare, Voltaire, Goethe and Shelley. He was a great Lawyer, Politician, Reformer, Orator, Critic and Philosopher. His wonderful gift of language touched with the spirit and charm of poetry aided by his powerful gift of wit and humor, made him the most formidable foe the church has ever had.

He was great because he was honest. He shook the world with his eloquence and reasoning. His arguments were never answered. As a Lawyer his arguments were always so convincing that he won his case. He knew many things by learning and more by intuition.

He was an intellectual Giant, and it is very probable that the wonderful combinations he possessed, the world will never see again.

The author who was a close friend and great admirer of Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, was assisted by near relatives who collected a great amount of valuable data, and in no other way could this information be obtained. The writing of the "Life and Reminiscences" was purely a labor of love; and it is useless to say has been written in the fairest and kindest spirit, every detail having been carefully recorded. Much of this data was collected and revised before the Colonel's death, and great care was taken in only recording after careful research.

This valuable edition has been aptly illustrated with many beautiful half-tone illustrations of the Colonel in different periods of his life. Also portraits of his sisters and brothers, family, father and mother, together with a genealogical chart, also many valuable reminiscences. The work is well written, handsomely bound, and beautifully printed. All admirers of the Colonel will welcome its publication.

13 OUR THIRTEENTH 13

Another Unprecedented Offer

Read the Following Explanatory Sketches:

Our Thirteenth Premium Book, now in press, will contain 356 pages of the most interesting and valuable spiritual occult and scientific literature to be found in the same number of pages of any book ever published. It is a work that no one, not radically prejudiced against everything outside of a creed, can pick up and not find some interesting information.

Heading the list of articles is one by Mrs. M. T. Longley, entitled "The Spirit World, Where Is It? Its Conditions and Employment," and in which her guide separates the spirit worlds of the various inhabited planets as the planets themselves are separated, but explains with great precision the spheres or spirit worlds surrounding this particular planet.

These spheres, it is claimed, "are creatable, that one can create his own sphere, and come in touch with others who are in the same rate of vibration, who are in a similar sphere or condition."

In this profound lecture is something highly educative to the spirit, and must be of value after transition. It is full of comfort and information—comfort to those who long to be again with their loved ones gone, and information as to their source of employment when they get there.

Countess Wachtmeister. The second lecture is by Countess Wachtmeister, and gives in a straightforward way the founding of and the purposes of the Theosophical Society. Placing before the reader three distinct objects.

First—To form a nucleus of a universal brotherhood without distinction of race, caste, sex, creed or color.

Second—To study comparative religion, philosophy and science.

Third—To investigate the unexplained laws of nature and the powers that lie latent in man.

This lecture shows the difference physically and psychically between people, especially women of America and those of Europe; teaches how to unfold the psychic powers, and gives reasons why so many mediums in Spiritualism unfold psychically, but so often into unreliable mediums, and how to avoid these dangers, and the dangers of obsession. It treats of crystal-gazing; the power of frenzy, indulged in by the derelicts; ceremonial magic; of unforgiveness through the imagination; the deep breathing process; lastly, giving the methods, to an extent, practiced and taught by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, in the unforgiveness of the power to enter the astral realm at will. Along the line of "Theosophy" it is interesting and instructive, and will enlighten anyone as to the objects and benefits of its teachings.

Cora L. V. Richmond's lecture on the theme, "The Twentieth Century Fulfillments," is replete with prophecies. It gives a resume of the many prophecies of science that have in regular order been fulfilled; tells how the energies, mentally and physically, are being inclined to the invention of the most destructive munitions of war, and how this will lead to universal peace among nations; how the physical unfoldments will raise the standard of true wisdom and morality, perpetuate the peace and harmony of the future human race. Mrs. Richmond is too well known as an instrument in the hands of highly unfolded spirits, as a lecturer, improvisatory and author to need any laudatory comments.

She also has three other lectures in the book, one upon the subject, "God Is a God of the Living, Not a God of the Dead," "Spiritualism and Christianity," and "Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage."

C. W. Leadbeater.

"Dreams and Their Significance," is the title of the fourth lecture in the book, and was delivered by C. W. Leadbeater, the noted English Theosophical lecturer of London, to a Chicago audience.

This is a very candid, logical and explanatory analysis of the causes and effects of dream impressions or waves, how received by the physical organism, the brain, and how it may be affected by conditions, disturbances internal and external; the etheric part of the brain; the astral brain, etc. This is one of a series of interesting lectures delivered by Mr. Leadbeater in Chicago, others of which are contained in this book. For instance, here are their themes: "Man and His Bodies," "Reincarnation," "The Law of Cause and Effect," "Life After Death—The Heaven World," "Telepathy and Mind Cure," "Invisible Helpers," " clairvoyance—What is it?" All these lectures must be taken as profound, logical and scientific from the Theosophical standard of reasoning, and whether approved in their entirety by the reader or not, something of deep interest, of instructive tendency, of elevating power will be found in them.

Prof. W. M. Lockwood.

"The Relation Science Holds to Natural Philosophy—Its Conflict with Every Phase of Religion," is the title of the fifth lecture in the book, and was delivered by Prof. W. M. Lockwood, of the University of Chicago, to a Chicago audience.

Prof. W. M. Lockwood. The relation of science to natural philosophy, its conflict with every phase of religion, is the title of the fifth lecture in the book, and was delivered by Prof. W. M. Lockwood, of the University of Chicago, to a Chicago audience.

ture, and he recites many instances of the progress of science, and its popularity with the entire thinking, reasoning world, including advanced theologians, and the effect this progress is having upon the previously beclouded and befogged minds of credulous humanity. This production is in his usual deliberate, concise, analytical and instructive style of expression, and must be studied to be understood.

Prof. J. S. Loveland produces a profound criticism of the famous mathematical argument, "As to the Existence of a Soul." He takes a firm stand against mental or intelligent causation, and in favor of material causation; considering the phenomena of life from the vegetable and animal kingdoms. This is indeed, one of the Professor's strongest and most analytical lectures, and will be read with deep interest by everyone.

Mrs. Helen P. Russegue offers a lecture for our book on the subject, "What Has Spiritualism Given to the World?" which was delivered before a Boston audience. The lecture beams with spiritual thought from beginning to end, and states the relative position to this and the after life, of the spiritual teachings.

Rev. Minot J. Savage's lecture is a comparison of Ancient and Modern Ideas from the text, "And Death Shall Be No More." Herein he compares the idea in the Old Testament, that "death ends all," which presents such a gloomy, dismal prospect of any future state, to that of the New Testament, where Paul says, "To die is gain," and to the present day growing belief that it is only "transition." The lecture is one of his most logical upon a matter that will interest every reader.

Prof. Alexander Wilder, M. D., contributes his views, gathered from a careful study of the subject, "Burying Alive a Frequent Peril," and relates many incidents that have come before him in his life experiences, and those related by other people. Some very fascinating reading and precautionary suggestions are given in this essay by Dr. Wilder. It should prove remedial of present-day methods of interment without proper investigations of the deceased form.

Dr. J. M. Peebles.

"Watchman, What of the Night? The Morning Cometh," are the first words of Dr. J. M. Peebles, in his lecture on "Spiritualism, in Its Relation to Life," delivered in London, Eng. He gives an illustrative word-painting of the high moral standard to be attained by and through true soul inspiration, and cites the reader to Jesus as standing upon the "summit of moral science," and cites many other Bible characters who reached almost the same height; also the changing attitudes of science or the sciences. This is a masterly discourse, and will be read with a warm degree of appreciation.

Ella Dare presents an essay on "Our Finer Forces," and in it deals with the action of the unseen upon and in co-relation with the seen; the laws of vibration; psychological functions, etc. She is known to the readers of The Progressive Thinker mostly by her beautiful poems, in which the "finer forces" are involved to their limit. Her essay is a lesson in itself upon the necessity of right thinking and right speaking and how to subdue the turbulent spirit. It is a pleasing and instructive addition to the book.

Baba Bharata.

"Wonderful Spiritual Phenomena," is an article from the New York Herald, and tells of materializing of food; spirits from heaven; praying in the clouds; the most extraordinary phenomena of modern times, etc., by Baba Bharata, a "holy man" who came to New York to make converts to his faith, which is "Love for all men." This is a fascinating production and a welcome bit of reading will it be to all.

Rev. Daniel W. Hull's

lecture on "Whence Our Christmas?" delivered before an audience at Tacoma, Wash., is an analytical criticism, or search into ancient history for the origin of the day held sacred by all Christians, and celebrated in all Christian countries. The lecture is wholly from a biblical standpoint and to the bible student will prove of value.

M. M. Mangasarian.

This noted liberal lecturer and traveler discourses upon "The Abysmal Monster," telling the story of his travels in Europe and the Orient, and of the human ignorance noticeable; gives his thoughts on prayer, liberty, churchianity and degeneration. The lecture is full of interesting data and convincing thought.

Prof. Elmer Gates.

In an article from the New York Herald, gives some theories and some demonstrated facts relative to "Moral Sense Colors, and Their Influence Upon Human Conduct," the results of experiments in Color Psychology. This is a strictly scientific deduction and explanation of a matter all are interested in.
